By a charter-party it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants that the steamship Dalbeattie should proceed to a loading berth in Leith and Victoria Docks, London, and there load, and being loaded should proceed to five of certain named ports. The charter-party provided as follows:

> Stevedore to be appointed by the charterers in London only, but employed and paid for by owners at current rate. The cargo to be taken to and from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense, but to be taken on board and discharged by the owners and at their expense. Ten clear working days are to be allowed the said charterers (if the ship is not sooner despatched) for loading, the day of departure not counting; and all working days on demurrage over and above the said laying days in port of loading to be paid for at the rate of 20*l.* per working day. Lay days to commence on the steamer being placed at the charterers' disposal, with clean swept holds and with steam cranes and all other appliances ready for work, notice of which to be given to the charterers in writing. The charterers' liability on this charter to cease when the cargo is shipped, except for freight due from charterers and any demurrage in loading, the owner having an absolute lien on the cargo for average and demurrage in discharging.

The charterers, as the owners knew, were putting up the ship as a general ship. The charterers shipped some cargo at Leith, the loading there occupying three working days. The captain did not then make any inquiries of the charterers as to the cargo to be loaded at London.

The ship then proceeded to London, and on the voyage encountered bad weather. She arrived in the Victoria Docks, London, on the 18th March, before 7 a.m., and the captain then gave the charterers notice that the ship was ready to load. Upon taking off the hatches, it was found that, owing to the bad weather, part of the cargo had shifted and part had been damaged. The captain had a survey made, and it was found to be necessary to land part of the cargo to be re-conditioned, and to re-stow some of the cargo which had shifted. It also became necessary to shift some of the cargo in order to enable the London cargo to be properly stowed.

The charterers had at all times sufficient cargo alongside the ship to be loaded. Owing to the necessity of moving and re-stowing part of the cargo, and owing to some delay on the part of the stevedore, who had been appointed under the terms of the charter-party, the loading was not completed until the 31st March.

The owners then brought this action to recover the sum of 60*l.* for three days' demurrage in London, and also the sum of 28*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* for expenses in shifting or removing part of the cargo at London.

At the trial the jury found, in answer to specific questions left to them, that (1) the ship was properly loaded at Leith as far as the stowage of the ship was concerned irrespective of convenience for loading other cargo at London; (2) the captain was justified in loading her at Leith as he did with the information as to London cargo which he possessed or could have obtained, looking to the proper trim of the vessel for her voyage to London; (3) the way in which the ship was loaded at Leith, irrespective of the shifting of the cargo in the storm, did not increase to any appreciable extent the time occupied in loading at London so as to increase the number of days for which demurrage could be charged; (4) the loading in London was not delayed through the shifting of cargo in the storm; (5) half a day was a reasonable time for the stevedore in which to have unloaded and reloaded Leith cargo that had shifted in the storm; (6) looking at the various ports for which the cargo in London was to be consigned, the captain could not have loaded the cargo at Leith in such a way as to avoid unloading, in London, the whole or a considerable portion of the cargo that was put in Nos. 1 and 3 holds at Leith, irrespective of its having got shifted through the storm; (7) the shipowner did not by any act or default prevent the charterer from loading the ship within the stipulated lay days; (8) the captain was not negligent in stowing the cargo at Leith.

Upon further consideration the learned judge ordered judgment to be entered upon the findings for the plaintiffs for 88*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.*

The defendants applied for judgment or for a new trial.

Cohen, Q.C., Newsom, and Leck for the appellants.—The delay in loading at London arose from the necessity of shifting the cargo, and from the delay on the part of the stevedore. The stevedore was, according to the terms of the charter-party, the servant of the owners, and the charterers cannot be charged with any demurrage on account of that delay. It was part of the duty of the owners to move and re-stow the cargo which had been damaged and shifted on the voyage from Leith, and the charterers are not liable for any delay arising therefrom:

> Notara v. Henderson, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. Div. 225;
> Hingston v. Wendt, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 181; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 126; 1 Q. B. Div. 367;
> Burton v. English, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 768; 12 Q. B. Div. 218.

Treating the charterers as the owners of the goods, the captain was not their agent to incur the expenses of unloading and re-stowing; he was not their agent of necessity, because this occurred at London, where the charterers could have been consulted.

Willes Chitty for the respondents.—There is an absolute obligation upon the charterers to load within the stipulated time, and it was for them to show that the time was exceeded owing to the default of the shipowners:

> Budgett v. Binnington, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 592; 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 493; 25 Q. B. Div. 320.

The stevedore was not the servant of the shipowners, but was the servant of the charterers, and they are responsible for any delay caused by his negligence:

> Blackie v. Stembridge, 6 C. B. N. S. 894.

The expenses claimed are the expenses of shifting the Leith cargo to enable the London cargo to be properly stowed, which would not have been necessary if the charterers had given the captain sufficient information at Leith as to the nature and destination of the London cargo.

Cohen, Q.C. was not called upon to reply.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the shipowners brought an action against the charterers to recover certain expenses, and also for three days' demurrage in London, and the question is whether there was any case upon which the judge could properly hold that the shipowners were entitled to recover either sum. The action is one between the shipowners and the charterers, and the rights of those two parties must be determined by the charter-party, and the case must be considered just as if no bills of lading had been given at all. Now the charter-party provides that the ship "shall with all convenient speed proceed to a loading berth in Leith and Victoria Docks, London . . . and there load such lawful merchandise as the charterers may think proper to ship as will go down hatchways and stow, not exceeding 1500 tons weight . . . and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to . . . and deliver the same as customary as fast as steamer can deliver, remaining always afloat." There is the obligation of the shipowner, viz., to place the ship at the disposal of the charterers at two different places to be there loaded. What is the obligation created by the agreement "to be loaded?" Loading is a joint act of the shipper or charterer and of the shipowner; neither of them is to do it alone, but it is to be the joint act of both. What is the obligation on each of them in that matter? Each is to do his own part of the work, and to do whatever is reasonable to enable the other to do his part. This puts upon the shipper the obligation of bringing the cargo alongside the ship, and of doing a certain part of the loading, What is that part of the loading? By universal practice the shipper has to bring the cargo alongside so as to enable the shipowner to load the ship within the time stipulated by the charter-party, and to lift that cargo to the rail of the ship. It is then the duty of the shipowner to be ready to take such cargo on board and to stow it in the vessel. The stowage of the cargo is the sole act of the shipowner. What is a reasonable course of action for both parties? The shipper has all the lay days within which to bring his cargo to the ship, and, if he did not act reasonably, he might bring it all upon the last of those days; to do so would be unreasonable; he must act reasonably and bring the cargo alongside in sufficient time to enable the shipowner to do his part within the lay days. The shipowner must receive and stow the cargo reasonably as it is brought alongside. Now the shipowner, if no stevedore is to be employed by the terms of the contract, may employ a stevedore or not as he chooses; he may load the ship by his own officers, without the assistance of a stevedore, and stow the cargo in that way; if there is no obligation upon the shipper to employ a stevedore, the captain may, if he chooses, employ one, and, if he does, the stevedore is his servant, and he is liable for all his wrongful acts or conduct. Very often the charter-party contains a stipulation as to the employment of a stevedore. Sometimes it is stipulated that the charterer is to employ and pay a stevedore, and if he is to employ a stevedore to stow the cargo, then he is liable for the consequences of bad stowage. There is also another way in which the arrangement is made. The charterer may desire to have good stowage, but yet not to be under any obligation for the stevedore's actions; the charterer makes a contract with the shipowner or captain that the shipowner or captain shall employ a stevedore, to be appointed or nominated by the charterer. In such a case the shipper nominates a good stevedore, and then leaves him to be the servant of the shipowner, just as if he had been nominated by the shipowner. What, then, does this contract say upon that matter? It says: "Stevedore to be appointed by the charterers in London only, but employed and paid for by owners." At Leith, therefore, this matter was left under the ordinary rule; but in London the stevedore was to be appointed by the charterers but employed and paid for by the owners. Now, if the stevedore was to be appointed by the charterers and to be paid by the shipowner, then the stevedore would be the servant of the charterers; but I have no doubt that the words "employed and paid for by owners" were put into this contract for the very purpose of providing that the stevedore was to be deemed to be the servant of the shipowner. In this case, therefore, the stevedore who was to be appointed was to be the servant of the shipowner, but was to be nominated or appointed by the charterers. This, then, is a charter-party in a form which provides that the stevedore is to be the servant of the shipowner. Then comes a clause which provides as follows: "The cargo to be taken to and from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense, but to be taken on board and discharged by the owners." That imposes an obligation which would exist without any such clause. In this case the obligations of the two parties are, that the cargo is to be taken to the ship and lifted to the ship's rail by the charterers, and is then to be taken on board by the shipowner and then stowed by the shipowner when taken on board. Now there was this peculiarity about the cargo, that there were two ports of loading; and the ship was to be loaded in this way at each of those ports; the joint act of loading was to be done at each port; each party was bound to do that which might be reasonable at each port; and each party was bound to give reasonable information to the other if so requested. If the captain had, at Leith, asked for information from the charterers as to the cargo to be loaded at London, and the charterers could have given such information but did not do so, that would have been unreasonable conduct on their part, and the shipowners could, at all events, have recovered damages in an action against the charterers. The shipowner, however, knew that cargo was to be loaded at London, and he knew pretty well what that cargo would be, and it was his duty to leave the ship in such a condition that the London cargo could be put on board at London, and for that purpose to ask for information from the charterers if he wanted any. If he did not ask for any information he took the risk. He might have asked for such information, and was entitled to get it, if the other party could reasonably give it. He did not ask, and therefore took the risk. When the ship came to London, he found out what the London cargo consisted of, and he had to arrange to take it on board, and for that purpose to re-arrange the Leith cargo. That is all a matter of stowage. The shipowner solely had undertaken that matter. He was to stow the cargo because the stevedore was his servant. If the charterers had cargo ready, and the shipowner was obliged to move the cargo, which was already on board, in order to stow the London cargo, that cannot impose any obligation on the charterers. If by so moving the cargo the shipowner was not ready to take on board the London cargo so as to do it within the lay days, that difficulty arose from the obligation which lay upon him, and which he failed in fulfilling. If the shipowner failed in fulfilling his part, but the charterers had cargo ready to be taken on board, the shipowner cannot charge the charterers for demurrage. All the delay was the delay of the shipowner, and the delay of the ship was his misfortune. There is very strong evidence in this case that the stevedore at London took a longer time than was necessary to do his work in London, and the jury have in fact so found. It is impossible for the shipowner to charge the charterers for that. It is said that the charterers did not perform their part of the loading, and they had not cargo ready to be taken on board, and that the stevedore was delayed by that fact. That point was raised at the trial, and the evidence showed conclusively that there was always cargo ready to be taken on board, and the case must, therefore, be dealt with on the assumption that there was always sufficient cargo alongside the vessel. It is clear that there was default on the part of the stevedore at London, and it is beyond doubt that he was the stevedore of the shipowner. The claim for demurrage, therefore, cannot be sustained.

As to the claim for expenses, if they were the expenses incurred in taking out the damaged cargo, there would have been a curious question raised. If that had been done in a case of necessity, the cesser clause would have had nothing to do with it. If not done in a case of necessity, the captain would not be the agent of the shippers unless he had consulted them and obtained their authority. In this case, if the charterers are treated as being the shippers, the captain could not be their agent of necessity at London, because they were at London, and could be consulted. The captain could have told them that their goods were damaged, and have asked them to consider what ought to be done. The captain was not, therefore, their agent here, and they cannot be charged with those expenses. If these expenses were the expenses of moving the cargo to make room for the London cargo, then they were expenses of stowage, and the charterers cannot be charged with them. The plaintiffs had no cause of action on either claim, and the learned judge at the trial ought to have directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendants. This appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendants.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add to the exhaustive judgment of the Master of the Rolls, with which I entirely agree.

KAY, L.J. concurred.

Appeal allowed; judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors for the appellants, Lowless and Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Botterell and Roche.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Thursday, Jan. 12, 1893.

(Before DAY and COLLINS, JJ.)

WILSON, SON, AND CO. v. KILLICK AND OTHERS. (a)

Practice—Adding parties—Order XVI., rr. 11, 48 —Joint contract—Charter-party—Non-joinder of a defendant residing out of the jurisdiction.

A defendant cannot claim, as a matter of right, to have his joint contractor added as a co-defendant under Order XVI., r. 11, when the joint contractor is a foreigner residing out of the jurisdiction.

Pilley v. Robinson (58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 110; 20 Q. B. Div. 155) only applies to cases where, under the old practice before the Judicature Acts, a plea in abatement could have been put forward, and that could not be done if the joint contractor whose non-joinder was complained of was a foreigner residing out of the jurisdiction.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Wright, J. in chambers ordering the plaintiffs to join as co-defendant, M. Burghart Bernier, of Antwerp, a foreigner residing out of the jurisdiction.

The plaintiffs were shipbrokers at Santos in Brazil, and had disbursed a ship owned by the defendants and chartered by M. Bernier. To secure their expenses the plaintiff, on the 10th May 1892, took a guarantee to be performed in London, entered into by both the owners and the charterer up to 2600*l.*, and a further sole guarantee by the owners for whatever should become due over that amount. Originally the writ was issued for 2190*l.*; subsequently a second writ was issued for 344*l.* Both actions were brought against the defendants, the owners, only. They were afterwards consolidated, and proceedings were then taken under Order XVI., and the defendants paid into court 1617*l.*, and were granted leave to defend.

On the 10th Dec. the defendants took out a summons, under Order XVI., r. 11, to have M. Bernier, the charterer and their joint contractor on the guarantee, added as a defendant, and their statement of defence was delivered on the 12th Dec. The master referred the point to the learned judge, who with great reluctance decided that he was bound to make the order asked for on the authority of Pilley v. Robinson (58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 110; 20 Q. B. Div. 155), which gave a defendant an absolute right to have his co-contractor joined with him.

On the face of the order it was stated that it was made on the authority of that case, and the judge refused to grant a stay or to allow the defendants the costs of their summons.

The plaintiffs thereupon appealed to the Divisional Court.

By rule 11 of Order XVI. it is provided that

No cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the misjoinder or non-joinder of parties, and the court may in every cause or matter deal with the matter in controversy so far as regards the rights and interests of the parties actually before it. The court or a judge may, at any stage of the proceedings, either upon or without the application of either party, and on such terms as may appear to the court or a judge to be just, order that the names of any parties improperly joined, whether as plaintiffs or as defendants, be struck out, and that the names of any parties, whether plaintiffs or defendants, who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter, be added . . ."

(a) Reported by HENRY LEIGH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By rule 48 of the same Order,

Where a defendant claims to be entitled to contribution or indemnity over against any person not a party to the action, he may, by leave of the court or a judge, issue a notice (hereinafter called the third party notice) to that effect . . . the notice shall be served within the time limited for delivering his defence . . . and therewith shall be served a copy of the statement of claim, or if there be no statement of claim, then a copy of the writ of summons in the action.

By rule 20 of Order XXI.,

No plea or defence shall be pleaded in abatement.

By 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 8, it was enacted,

That no plea in abatement for the nonjoinder of any person as a co-defendant shall be allowed in any court of common law, unless it shall be stated in such plea that such person is resident within the jurisdiction of the court, and unless the place of residence of such person shall be stated with convenient certainty in an affidavit verifying such plea.

Boyd (Simey with him) for the appellants.—This order ought not to have been made. It was made on the authority of Pilley v. Robinson (58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 110; 20 Q. B. Div. 155), which has no application to the present case. That case only decided that such an order should be made where under the old practice, before the Judicature Acts, a plea in abatement could have been put forward. Here no such plea could have been pleaded, because the proposed co-defendant is a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction, and therefore Pilley v. Robinson (ubi sup.), and the dictum of Lord Cairns in Kendall v. Hamilton (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 418; 4 App. Cas. 504), on which Pilley v. Robinson (ubi sup.) was decided, are in my favour. By putting in his defence on the 12th Dec. the defendant incapacitated himself from relying on a dilatory plea, and had he been under the old practice before the Judicature Acts, he could no longer have pleaded in abatement. The form of "Plea of the non-joinder of a contractor as defendant," given in Bullen and Leake's Precedents of Pleading, contains the allegation "That the alleged promise, if any, was made [or debt, if any, was contracted] by the defendant jointly with G. H., who is still living, and who, at the commencement of the suit, was, and still is, resident within the jurisdiction of this court, and not by the defendant alone . . ." The only question is one of right, on which ground alone it was decided by Wright, J. in favour of the defendant; his decision shows that his discretion, had he felt himself free to exercise it, would have been exercised against making the order.

Carver for the respondent.—Kendall v. Hamilton (ubi sup.) must not be construed so narrowly. Lord Cairns did not mean to confine it to the strict rules of plea in abatement. Every co-debtor has a right to have the other co-debtors sued with him—all the learned Lords are very clear upon that—it is an absolute right formerly enforced by plea in abatement, now by order, under Order XVI., r. 11. The fact of residence outside the jurisdiction did not formerly affect a plea in abatement. The point was decided in Sheppard v. Baillie (6 Term Rep. 327), in which, to a plea in abatement by the defendant, that the promises mentioned in the declaration were made by him and others jointly, and not by him only (the others being still alive), there was a replication that the proposed co-defendants were, at the commencement of the suit, and still continued in Scotland, and had not any goods, lands, or other property in England, or within the jurisdiction of the court. It was there held that the replication was bad, that all must be joined, and that the plaintiff must proceed to outlawry against those who were out of the country. In the present case, therefore, had it been under the old practice, before 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 8, a plea in abatement could have been pleaded, notwithstanding the proposed party's residence out of the jurisdiction; and this case is therefore within Pilley v. Robinson (ubi sup.) and Kendall v. Hamilton (ubi sup.), and the plaintiff is entitled to the order asked for as a matter of right. The object of the plea in abatement was to make the plaintiff give a better writ. [DAY, J.—A better writ means a writ against all persons liable and available to the process of the court.] It was held otherwise in Sheppard v. Baillie (ubi sup.), before the passing of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42; the only thing that could get rid of the right would be to show that M. Bernier could not be sued. [COLLINS, J.—He cannot be sued as a matter of right.] He is a well-known trader, and there is no doubt he could be sued here, and that the court would so exercise its discretion. We have paid many of the charges, the rest for lighterage, &c., are more properly due from Bernier. [DAY, J.—You are liable on your guarantee, and your remedy is indemnity.] I claim repayment from him. [DAY, J.—Then your remedy is under Order XVI., r. 48.] That was argued in Pilley v. Robinson (ubi sup.), and was decided otherwise.

Pickford, for other of the defendants, concurred in these arguments.

DAY, J.—This appeal must be allowed, and the order must be set aside. The form of the order shows that the judge in making it acted solely on the authority of the case of Pilley v. Robinson, and, in fact, it is so stated specifically in the order itself. I am of opinion, however, that the case is not within Pilley v. Robinson at all. I do not wish to be taken as throwing any doubt whatever on that decision, or reflecting on it in any way; I desire to express my entire concurrence with the learned judges who decided that case; but it is not applicable to this case. Pilley v. Robinson merely decided that where, under the old practice prior to the Judicature Acts, there might have been a plea in abatement, there ought now to be proceedings under Order XVI. In the present case, had it been under the old practice, no such plea could have been put forward. The defendant seeks to have added, as his co-defendant on the record, the name of a person residing abroad, out of the jurisdiction, who was a joint contractor with him in the contract on which the plaintiff is suing; and before Wright, J. it was argued that the defendant was entitled to compel the plaintiff to sue this person whom he did not wish to sue, and could not sue. All that Pilley v. Robinson and Kendall v. Hamilton, on which it was based, decided was, that where a plea in abatement could formerly have been pleaded Order XVI. should apply. But it certainly is not a matter of right in such a case as this, where the proposed party is out of the jurisdiction, and where the defendant therefore could not have pleaded in abatement. The rule also confers large discretionary powers to add parties, but of these it is not here sought to take advantage. We are not asked to decide this question on discretion, but as a matter of right. It may be also that the defendant has a right to indemnity, in which case he might apply under rule 48. In my opinion this order, which was made by Wright, J. with great reluctance, must be set aside.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. So far as the discretion of the learned judge was exercised, it was exercised against the proposed addition; but the question was decided as one of right, on the ground that the plaintiff was concluded by Pilley v. Robinson. Is the defendant entitled to add his co-contractor against the will of the plaintiff? If he shows that, under the circumstances of the case, he could have put forward a plea in abatement under the old practice before the Judicature Acts, he is so entitled. But it is obvious that he was not heretofore entitled to plead in abatement if his co-contractor never resided in England: neither, therefore, is he now entitled as a matter of right to have him added as a co-defendant. Pilley v. Robinson does not touch the point at all. If the defendant fails in his contention of right, the point must be decided as a matter of discretion, which in this case has already been exercised against the defendant.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Ingledew, Ince, and Colt.

Solicitors for the defendant, Pritchard, Englefield, and Co.

May 3, 4, and 30, 1892.

(Before WILLS, J.)

ARMSTRONG AND OTHERS v. ALLAN BROTHERS. (a)

Bailment of goods — Shipping note — "Clean receipt"—Shipping note containing condition that clean receipt should be given before goods were received on board—Shipowner receiving goods without giving clean receipt — Refusal by shipowner to give clean receipt or re-deliver goods—Liability of shipowner for conversion.

The plaintiff A. sold to the plaintiffs N. and Co. a quantity of linseed oil to be delivered alongside a vessel in the Thames, and paid for in cash "in exchange for mate's receipt." N. and Co. engaged with the defendants, shipowners, for shipment of a large quantity of linseed oil to Montreal. A., being ready to deliver fifty barrels of oil, lodged with the defendants' wharfinger this document, "Received fifty barrels linseed oil from N. and Co. No goods to be received on board unless a clean receipt can be given." This last clause was on all the shipping notes used by N. and Co., and this fact was known to the defendants. When the fifty barrels of oil were brought alongside the ship, they were received by the defendants' tally clerk and stowed in the hold; but the defendants gave to A. a receipt containing the words "old casks," which prevented the receipt from being a "clean receipt" or a "mate's receipt," and A. thereupon demanded either a "clean receipt" by the omission of the words "old casks" or a re-delivery of the goods. The defendants refused to give a clean receipt or re-deliver the goods, as they had been overstowed, and N. and Co. refused to accept the receipt or pay for the oil. As a fact the casks were in every way entitled to a clean receipt. In an action brought by A., as owner of the goods, as for a conversion of the goods by the defendants:

Held, that, on the delivery and acceptance of the goods on the terms that "no goods should be received on board unless a clean receipt were given," there was a complete contract of bailment between A. and the defendants, and a duty arose on the part of the defendants to give A. a clean receipt before they stowed the goods on board, and, as they had not done so, A. had a right to demand re-delivery of the goods, and on the refusal by the defendants to re-deliver they had been guilty of a conversion, for which they were liable to A. to the extent of the loss incurred by him.

ACTION tried on the 3rd and 4th May before Wills, J. without a jury. The facts and cases cited appear fully in the written judgment of the learned judge.

Bucknill, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the plaintiffs.

Witt, Q.C. and Joseph Hurst for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 30.—The following judgment was read by WILLS, J.—The plaintiff Armstrong is an oil manufacturer, and the defendants are the owners of the steamship Montevidean. On the 15th April 1891 Armstrong sold to Nickoll and Co. 100 tons of linseed oil in good, strong, iron-bound casks fit for export, "to be delivered alongside a wharf or vessel in the Thames or docks, and paid for in cash in exchange for wharf or mate's receipt." Nickoll and Co. on the same day engaged with the defendants for shipment of 400 tons of linseed oil to Montreal during the season. On the 6th June, Armstrong was ready to deliver, in accordance with his contract, fifty barrels, and the defendants' steamship Montevidean was ready to load in the Albert Dock. Armstrong thereupon lodged with one Ambler, defendants' wharfinger, at his office on the quay, the following document: "Received on board the Montevidean, Montreal, lying Royal Albert Dock, fifty barrels linseed oil from Nickoll and Knight, South Sea House, London. (Then followed the brand.) No goods to be received on board unless a clean receipt can be given." The last clause was printed in red ink, and was on all such shipping notes used by Nickoll and Co. They had been accustomed to ship linseed oil by the defendants' vessels, and the defendants were aware that Nickoll and Co.'s notes always contained this clause. The wharfinger with whom this note was lodged sent it in the usual course of business to the office of the defendants in the City, where a clerk in the freight department, Prinz, prepared and signed a document in the following form: "Broker's order. 103, Leadenhall-street, E.C., London, June 6, 1891. To the officer in charge on board steamship Montevidean, lying in (a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Royal Albert Dock, for Montreal. Please receive from ——, for account of Nickoll and Knight, fifty barrels of linseed oil. N.B.—These goods are received subject to the conditions of the usual bill of lading or shipping card of the line, and by accepting this broker's order, shippers expressly agree to the terms thereof. Not responsible for the detention of barges. (For Allan Brothers and Co.), C. M. PRINZ." The material conditions on the card of the line are, no goods will be received on board from barges without the broker's order. All goods received subject to the conditions of the bills of lading, mate's or dock company's receipts required in exchange for bills of lading. The bills of lading begin with the words, "Received in apparent good order and condition," and contain no special clauses affecting this case. The shipping note was returned by the defendants to Ambler, accompanied by the broker's order. Both were handed in about the 8th June by Ambler to Armstrong's lighterman. On the 11th June Armstrong sent a barge laden with fifty barrels of linseed oil alongside the Montevidean. The lighterman lodged the two documents at the office of Ambler, who gave instructions to the tally clerk to receive the goods on board. Linseed oil is always shipped in casks seasoned by having carried petroleum. New casks are unfit for the purpose. I find as a fact that the casks in question were of the usual character, and in sound condition, and in every way entitled to a clean receipt, and I wholly disbelieve some exceedingly flimsy evidence to the contrary. I also find that the tally clerk could see, and did see before any cask was removed from the barge, exactly what the casks were, and that there was no difference between one cask and another. The tally clerk received the whole of the casks, and they were immediately stowed in the hold. The lighterman, in the usual course of business, applied at Ambler's office for the ship's receipt, and received the before-mentioned shipping note of Nickoll and Knight, with these words written across it, "S.s. Montevidean; received fifty casks, old casks.—E. AMBLER, 11-6-91." The lighterman objected to the words "old casks," and told the defendants' wharfinger, Ambler, as the fact was, that the casks were such as were always used in the shipment of linseed oil. Ambler, however, refused to give any other receipt. Such a document, if in order, would be a "mate's receipt," within the meaning of the contract between Armstrong and Nickoll and Knight. The words "old casks," however, prevent it from being a clean receipt, and it is conceded as a matter, not of construction, but of mercantile usage, that, in the contract of sale, "mate's receipt" means a clean receipt, and the lighterman took the receipt back to Armstrong, who received it from him on the 12th. Armstrong went immediately to the office of the defendants, and asked for a clean receipt or for a re-delivery of the goods. Both were refused. He sent his lighterman to the ship the same evening with a barge, and demanded the return of the casks. The casks were then overstowed, and re-delivery was refused. The defendants have always refused to give a clean receipt unless Armstrong or Nickoll and Knight would give them an indemnity against all loss which might be made on account of the clause "old casks." This action was brought by Armstrong alone on the 13th June. On the 23rd July the writ was amended by joining Nickoll and Knight and Co. as plaintiffs. The subsequent history of the consignment may be told in a few words. Nickoll and Knight refused to accept the mate's receipt, or to pay for the oil; but, the oil having arrived in very fine condition, the consignees at Montreal being in want of it, gave an undertaking to the ship to hand over bill of lading, and be responsible in damages, and procured delivery which was made about the beginning of August.

The consignees have always been willing since delivery to pay Nickoll and Knight, who in their turn have been willing since then to pay Armstrong for the oil; a period two or three months later than the time at which he ought to have been paid. Armstrong would have received the contract price for the oil had he not been afraid of prejudicing his rights in the present action. The damages claimed are therefore, under the circumstances, trivial, being confined to the loss of interest and some small expenses, amounting altogether to about 3*l*. Both parties, however, treat the case as involving a serious question of principle, and as of much importance with respect to future transactions. No course of business or trade usage, with respect to shipping notes with this clause, was shown. Two similar disputes had arisen before with respect to shipments by defendants on account of Nickoll and Co. In one case Nickoll and Co, obtained an indemnity from their sellers, and gave one to the defendants. In the other, the defendants gave a clean bill of lading. By the contract of sale, the goods did not pass to Nickoll and Co., at all events until the mate's clean receipts were given, for not till then could Armstrong do anything to entitle himself to payment. It is not worth while discussing whether the moment at which the property would pass was when the mate's receipts were tendered, as nothing turns upon the distinction. There seems to have been a bailment of the oil by Armstrong to the defendants on the terms that the goods should not be taken on board unless a clean receipt were given. The oil was Armstrong's. There was nothing in the terms of the shipping note which in any way represented it to be Nickoll and Co.'s. It must be notorious that, with shipments of goods, the property constantly is not in the shipper at the time the goods are delivered on board, and the intimation that they came from Nickoll is not a representation as to property, but merely a direction to ship them as part of the goods for which they had engaged room. There is, therefore, nothing in the nature of an estoppel which prevents Armstrong from assuming his true character as owner. If the defendants had known whose the goods were they would have done exactly the same. When, therefore, Armstrong had lodged the shipping note, or the defendants had returned it with the broker's order, which imposed fresh terms, but none inconsistent with the direction not to ship unless a clean receipt could be given, they undertook to accept the bailment provided their terms were agreed to. The defendants were well aware, from previous transactions which had led to disputes, that the note contained the terms in question, so that the case is free from any difficulty on that head, and when the note and broker's order were again lodged with the defendants on the 11th June Armstrong signified his willingness to deliver his goods as part of those for which Nickoll and Co. had engaged room. On the delivery and acceptance of the goods the contract was complete, and the duty arose on the part of the defendants towards Armstrong to complete their contract by giving clean receipts. I can understand a case in which no objection to the condition of the goods might be discovered till after they were stowed; but no difficulty of that kind arose here, for the clerk admitted that whatever objection he had to the casks was visible as they lay in the lighter, and I am satisfied that he knew exactly what they were before being taken on board. Even were it otherwise, it is clear that on such a contract there are reciprocal obligations as to the condition of the goods, and that the person shipping the goods is bound to tender none but those for which clean receipts can be given, and if he tendered goods in bad condition it may be that he could not complain if they were stowed without discovering the defects. At all events, if, under such circumstances, he put the shipowner to expense and trouble in raising them from the lighter and returning them, he would be liable. If I am right that there was a contract of bailment between the plaintiff and the defendants. it is of very little consequence whether the term upon which this case has to be decided was an absolute undertaking by the defendants not to receive on board goods that they were not ready to give a clean receipt for, or that, if they did so, they would give a clean receipt. In either case there is a breach of contract, and the damages are the same. I am inclined to think, however, that the true view is, that there was an absolute undertaking not to receive the goods unless the defendants were prepared to give a clean receipt. It seems to me that the owner of goods has a perfect right to impose his own conditions when he delivers to the shipowner, and the latter has a perfect right to say, "I will not take them," But when he assents to such a condition, and then refuses to give a clean receipt, the owner may say, "Non hæc in fœdera veni; give me my goods." The condition seems reasonable. There can be no doubt that the consequence of the refusal may be exceedingly serious to the owner of the goods; he cannot get paid for them, and may find it difficult to insure, especially with a dispute as to their condition. They are at his risk, and he may have no one at the port of discharge to look after them. The intended consignee is not likely to accept them, and may not be able to get them without the bill of lading. If the market has gone down he is certain to refuse to have anything to do with them. Such circumstances seem to invest the refusal to return them with every element of a conversion. The case is nearly covered by authority: (Peek v. Larsen, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 580; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163; L. Rep. 12 Eq. 378.) The plaintiff shipped goods without notice of a charter. The master refused to sign bill of lading, except with words indicating that it was subject to the charter-party. The plaintiff then demanded re-delivery, which the master refused. A bill was filed to restrain the shipowner from sending the ship away with the goods. Upon an order of the court the goods were removed and placed in bond to await the result of litigation. Lord Romilly held the plaintiff was entitled to the goods and to damages. "How can you compel him to let his goods remain on board according to a charter-party by which the moment he heard of it he refuses to be bound?" The same observation surely does not apply with less force when the owner has given notice before that he will not allow them to be shipped unless a clean receipt is given, and when that term has been acceded to. Thesiger, L.J. commented upon and approved of this case in Jones v. Hough (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 248; 5 Ex. Div. 115), and held that the shipowner was bound to return them upon demand. In this instance the demand for the return of the goods was made with great promptitude. There was an attempt to show that this action was brought without giving the defendants reasonable opportunity for inquiry, but they completed their inquiries on the 12th June, and the action was not brought until the 13th June. And it is clear they had then made up their minds to take the ground they have since taken in defending this action. It was urged that before the oil was demanded it was over-stowed and difficult to get at. The same argument was used ineffectually in Peek v. Larsen (ubi sup.), and it seems impossible to hold that the defendants' own act in doing so can relieve them from an obligation to return goods that they never ought to have taken on board, or to pay damages. It was urged that, if there was a conversion at all and the damages must be the value of the goods, and as the real damage was only 3*l.*, there could have been no conversion. The argument is a fallacy; in trover the damages are the real loss sustained: (Chinery v. Vaill, 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 466; 5 H. & N. 288; Brierly v. Kendall, 17 Q. B. 937.) In my opinion the plaintiff Armstrong is entitled to judgment for 3*l.*, with costs on the High Court scale.

Judgment for the plaintiff Armstrong for 3*l.*, with costs on High Court scale.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, George E. Philbrick.

Solicitors for the defendants, Pritchard and Sons.

Wednesday, Jan 25, 1893.

(Before Lord COLERIDGE, C.J. and CHARLES, J.)

MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF SOUTHPORT v. MORRIS. (a)

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 318—Ship—Navigation—Electric launch not having certificate carrying passengers on an artificial lake.

The appellants were convicted by the justices of Southport on a charge that they, being the owners of an electric launch, did ply with more than twelve passengers on board without having a duplicate of a certificate of the Board of Trade put up in a conspicuous part of the vessel so as to be visible to all persons on board the same, contrary to sect. 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The vessel was an electric launch owned by the appellants in which passengers were taken for hire on pleasure trips on an artificial lake in a park also the property of the appellants.

Held, that the electric launch used on the lake in question was not within sect. 2 of the Act which defines a ship as "a vessel engaged in navigation," and that the Act, therefore, did not apply, and the conviction was wrong. (a)

(a) Reported by MERVYN LL. PEEL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a case stated by the justices of the borough of Southport in Lancashire. The information was in the following terms:

For that the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses on the tenth day of August one thousand eight hundred, and ninety-two, at the borough aforesaid, being then the owners of a certain electric launch used for carrying passengers called the Bonnie Southport, unlawfully did allow the said electric launch to ply, and the said electric launch did then ply with more than twelve passengers on board without having the duplicate of a certificate issued by the Board of Trade for such vessel under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (being a certificate then in force and applicable to the voyage), put up in some conspicuous part of the said vessel so as to be visible to all persons on board the same, contrary to sect. 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

The case stated by the justices was as follows:

1. At the hearing of the said information the appellants and respondent appeared and were represented by their solicitors and the following facts were either proved before us or admitted by both parties.

2. That the appellants were the owners of an artificial lake or piece of water on the foreshore in the said borough, a land-locked lake not open to the sea except at high spring tides, in or abutting on a park provided by them and laid out on the said foreshore, and the said lake had been excavated from the sand on the said foreshore to a depth of three feet or thereabouts, and was surrounded by a concrete wall or path. The lake is about half a mile in length and about 160 yards in width.

3. That the said lake was used for boating purposes, and the appellants had placed on it for hire a certain vessel or launch called the Bonnie Southport of about three tons burthen capable of carrying twelve passengers and upwards and propelled by electricity from accumulators charged by a direct current dynamo from a charging station.

4. That the said launch had not been registered as a British ship under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

5. That no duplicate of the certificate mentioned in sect. 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 had been on the said 10th Aug. 1892 put up in any part whatsoever of the said launch as required by sect. 317 of the said Act, and no such certificate was in force for the said launch on the said 10th Aug. 1892, or had indeed ever been issued to such launch.

6. That the said launch on the said 10th Aug 1892 proceeded from the landing stage of the said lake on a trip round the said lake and back again to such landing stage, having on board twelve passengers and upwards; in fact, there were on board between thirty and forty passengers.

7. That each of the said passengers had paid the appellants or their duly authorised officer or servant the stipulated fare for such trip.

8. On these facts we were of opinion that the Bonnie Southport was a passenger steamer plying with passengers within the meaning of the 318th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and the Acts amending the same, and that the offence charged in the information was proved.

9. And we, the said justices, adjudged and determined that the appellants for their said offence should forfeit and pay the sum of twenty shillings, and the sum of seven shillings for costs.

The question upon which the opinion of the said court is desired is, whether we, the said justices, upon the above statement of facts, came to a correct decision in point of law, and if not, what should be done in the premises.

F. W. Raikes (F. W. W. Kingdon with him) for the appellants. — A vessel of this description does not come under the Merchant Shipping Act, or at any rate not a vessel used as this vessel was, and therefore she could not require a certificate. A ship is defined in sect. 2 of the Act as a "vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars." This vessel was not used in navigation. Cases of this sort are specially provided for by the Public Health Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59), s. 44, the second clause of which provides that, "An urban authority may either themselves provide and let for hire, or may license any person to let for hire any pleasure boats on any lake or piece of water in any such park or pleasure ground, and may make bye-laws for regulating the numbering and naming of such boats, the number of persons to be carried therein," &c. The lake on which this vessel was is in the park of the corporation, is only three feet deep, and boats cannot get to it from the sea. It is impossible to say there was navigation on it. The boat only goes from the pier and back to the pier.

The Attorney-General (Sir Charles Russell) (H. Sutton with him) in support of the conviction. —The importance of this case lies in the difficulty which the Board of Trade have felt in drawing a line as to what vessels come under the Act. It is necessary that they should have control to ensure that passenger ships are not overcrowded, and that the hull and machinery are in a safe condition. Here it is not clear that with thirty or forty people, and perhaps with children, on board there might not be an accident even in three feet of water. At any rate, the line must be drawn somewhere. If the Act does not apply to a vessel on three feet of water, what would be the rule as to one on four feet? The section in the Public Health Act 1890 does not apply to a vessel of this description, but only to row-boats such as you ordinarily see on ornamental waters. This vessel is used in navigation within the meaning of sect. 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. Sect. 291 provides that the fourth part of the Act shall apply to all British ships. Sect. 303 enacts that the expression "passenger steamer" shall be held to include every British steamship carrying passengers to, from, or between any place or places in the United Kingdom, excepting steam ferry boats working in chains. Then by sect. 309 it is provided that the owners shall have surveys made, and the surveyors are to make declarations as to the efficiency of the ship and the limits within which she is fit to ply; and by sect. 312, upon the receipt of such declarations the Board of Trade shall, if satisfied that the provisions of the fourth part of this Act have been complied with, cause a certificate in duplicate to be prepared and issued. By sect. 317 it is directed that one of the duplicates of the certificate shall be put up in some conspicuous part of the ship. By the concluding passage of sect. 318 it is provided that, if any passenger steamer plies or goes to sea with any passengers on board without having one of the duplicates of such certificate put up as aforesaid, the owner shall for each offence incur a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds. And by sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 46), these provisions are made applicable to ships propelled by electricity. This last provision must have been aimed at cases like the present, since electricity has not as yet been applied to sea-going ships. Moreover, by sect. 16 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80), vessels carrying passengers not exceeding twelve in number are expressly excepted from these requirements, and this exception would protect small vessels to which the Act was not intended to apply, but the present case does not come within it. If this case is held to be not within the Act it will be difficult to protect the public in cases where they may be exposed to much danger.

(a) The Merchant Shipping Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 46), s. 5, provides that "The provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and the Acts amending the same, with respect to steamships, shall apply to ships propelled by electricity or other mechanical power, with such modifications as the Board of Trade may from time to time prescribe for purposes of adaptation."

Raikes, in reply, contended that the language of the sections cited from the Act of 1854 showed they were not intended to apply to a case like the present, and that the launch could not be said to be plying, and cited

Hedges v. Hooker, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 822; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 386.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is a case of some difficulty, because we have to decide the construction of an Act which may apply to vessels on other sheets of water besides the one now in question. Such sheets of water, whether artificial or natural, differ much in size, and the result is that, in construing the words of the Act, an interpretation which is obvious and sensible as regards certain of these sheets of water becomes absurd when applied to other and smaller sheets of water and ponds; such, for example, as the pieces of water in any of the public parks in, and in the neighbourhood of, London. There is no reason that I can see why, if the sheet of water in the present case is one to which the Act applies, it should not apply to these and to hundreds of others in parks or places which are opened for the benefit of the public. So it would not be easy to hold that the words of the Act apply to a case like the present. We should have to construe words obviously not meant to apply to the subject-matter. Yet, if they do apply, we must hold that they were intended to do so. I have, however, been unable to persuade myself that the present case is within the words of the Act. The Attorney-General argued that we must draw the line somewhere in construing this Act; but I do not think this is necessary. There is a line, no doubt, and it may be that some artificial lakes are well within that line. If you have a sheet of water four or five miles long and of considerable depth, it would be hard to say that it was not within the Act, even though it were artificial. This launch cannot come within the provisions of sect. 318 unless it is a ship, and by sect. 2 a ship is a vessel used in navigation. But in the present case can we say this is a vessel used in navigation? No doubt to navigate means to drive a ship. In the abstract, if you send a vessel round and round it is navigation. But I cannot bring myself to say that this is a ship used in navigation. It might be that a vessel plying for hire, say, on one of the great Irish lakes, and going from one end of it to the other, would be within the Act. But here we cannot say that it is a vessel used in navigation. Everybody but a lawyer would laugh at the idea of a boat going round a pond being a ship used in navigation. And if it is not, it is under no Act, and there is an end of the case. I do not agree with the contention of the appellants that the second sub-section of sect. 44 of the Public Health Act 1890 is in disagreement with the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. But under that section the fullest protection is given to the public by the power to make bye-laws. And I may observe that, if anyone were drowned owing to a licensee of the corporation under that section by overloading a boat, it might be a subject for an indictment for manslaughter. So the safety of the public is not in question; that is sufficiently provided for. But it would be straining the terms of a useful law to hold that this case was within it. It is not within the fair meaning of the words used in the Act. The conviction must be set aside.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have felt a great deal of difficulty during the hearing owing to the way in which the intention of the Legislature has been expressed. But, after hearing a very full argument, I have come to the conclusion that the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 does not apply to a boat of the description of the launch used where it was. It is impossible to say that it is a vessel engaged in navigation within sect. 2. I am strengthened in this view by the way in which sect. 309 is expressed. Having regard to these sections and to sect. 303, I am of opinion that the Act does not apply to a case like the present. I concur in the rest of the observations which the Lord Chief Justice has made. (a)

The conviction set aside.

Solicitors for the appellants, Andrew, Mellor, and Smith, for J. Davies Williams, Southport.

Solicitor in support of the conviction, The Solicitor for the Board of Trade.

Tuesday, Jan. 17, 1893.

(Before Lord COLERIDGE, C.J. and CAVE, J.)

THE SALT UNION LIMITED (apps.) v. WOOD (resp.). (b)

Steamship navigating rivers — Refusal of crew to obey orders — Proceedings before justices —Employers and Workmen Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90), s. 4—Seamen—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 243.

The respondent was employed on a steamship

(a) De minimis non curat lex is a well-known maxim. It is, however, difficult to understand the logic of this decision.—ED.

(b) Reported by W. H. HORSFALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

belonging to the appellants, which was exclusively used for the conveyance of salt upon the rivers Weaver and Mersey from Winsford to Liverpool.

The appellants' vessel was registered under the Merchant Shipping Acts as a British ship; no articles of agreement in writing had been entered into between the respondent and the appellants, nor was the respondent registered as a seaman.

The respondent having refused to obey the orders of the appellants, proceedings were taken against him under the Employers and Workmen Act 1875. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that proceedings could only be taken against him under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

Held, that the appellants' vessel not being a sea-going ship the proceedings were rightly taken under the Employers and Workmen Act 1875.

THIS was a case stated by certain justices acting in and for the county of Chester on an application in writing of the appellants, who were dissatisfied with their determination upon the question of law which arose before them as hereinafter mentioned, on the 24th Aug. 1892, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Middlewich, in the said county of Chester.

1. On the 24th Aug. 1892 the appellants and respondent and their respective solicitors appeared before the said justices on a summons under the Employers and Workmen Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90), issued on the complaint of the appellants, wherein it was alleged that at Wharton the respondent did, on the 19th Aug. 1892, unlawfully refuse to carry out his contract of service with, and to obey the orders of, the appellants, who claimed damages in the sum of 10*l.*

2. The following facts were either proved or admitted by both parties, namely: the respondent was one of the crew of the screw-steamship Albion, a vessel or barge exclusively used for the conveyance of salt upon the rivers Weaver and Mersey from Winsford, the place of its manufacture, to Liverpool, where it was transferred to ocean-going vessels. The voyages of the Albion were upon the rivers Weaver and Mersey only, and so far as upon the river Mersey the same voyages were upon tidal waters, and did not extend on such tidal waters beyond the limits of the port of Liverpool.

3. The Albion was registered under the Merchant Shipping Acts as a British ship in 1887 at the port of Liverpool, her gross tonnage being 142.87 tons and registered tonnage 102.99 tons as appeared by the certified copy of the entry of her registration.

4. The crew of the Albion consisted of three men, respectively known as "captain," "engineer," and "hand or mate" on the Albion.

5. The respondent's duties were to obey the captain's orders in navigating the Albion, and also in tarring, scraping, cleaning the cabin, putting hatches on, working the derrick at Liverpool, assisting at the locks, &c. He was paid weekly wages and so much per ton, winding trip money, and tonnage.

6. No articles of agreement in writing had been entered into between the appellants and respondent, nor was he registered as a seaman. The contract of service was determinable on a week's notice from either party, and a notice given by the respondent to the appellants was put in.

7. It was alleged that the respondent on the 19th Aug. 1892 refused to comply with the order of the superintendent of the vessels and barges of the appellants to transfer himself to another vessel.

8. The respondent's solicitor contended that the Albion was a ship and the respondent a seaman as respectively defined by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 2, and although sect. 13 of the Employers and Workmen Act 1875, which enacted that that Act should not apply to seamen, had been repealed by the Merchant Seaman (Payment of Wages and Rating) Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 16), yet the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 243, which provided for the punishment of acts and disobedience by seamen and others by implication took away any other remedy against the respondent for breach of contract, and the appellants could not take proceedings for the recovery of damages under the Employers and Workmen Act 1875. The respondent's solicitor cited the case, Great Northern Steamship Fishing Company v. Edgehill (11 Q. B. Div. 225) as an authority.

9. The appellants' solicitor, on the other hand, contended that the respondent was a workman within the meaning of the term workman as defined by the Employers and Workmen Act 1875, s. 10, and that the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 did not apply, as the respondent was not what is generally known as a seaman, but only a waterman, and the Albion was a river vessel, not a sea-going ship, to which class of vessels the section quoted by the respondent's solicitor, namely, sect. 243, only applied, and that therefore the appellants' only remedy was by summons under the provisions of the Employers and Workmen Act 1875.

The justices were of opinion that the Albion was a "ship" and the respondent a "seaman" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and on the authority of the case of The Great Northern Steamship Fishing Company v. Edgehill (ubi sup.), they held that the appellants had no remedy under the Employers and Workmen Act 1875, and therefore dismissed the complaint.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the respondent was a workman who could be dealt with under the summons issued under the Employers and Workmen Act 1875, or whether he was a seaman, and ought to have been summoned and dealt with under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

The Employers and Workmen Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90) enacts:

Sect. 4. A dispute under this Act between an employer and a workman may be heard and determined by a court of summary jurisdiction, and such court, for the purposes of this Act, shall be deemed to be a court of civil jurisdiction, and in a proceeding in relation to any such dispute, the court may order payment of any sum which it may find to be due as wages or damages or otherwise. . . . .

Sect. 10. The expression "workman" does not include a domestic or menial servant, but save as aforesaid, means any person who, being a labourer, servant in husbandry, journeyman, artificer, handicraftsman, miner, or otherwise engaged in manual labour, whether under the age of twenty-one years or above that age, has entered into or works under a contract with an employer, whether the contract has been made before or after the passing of this Act, be express or implied, oral or in writing, and be a contract of service or a contract personally to execute any work or labour.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) enacts (Part III., Masters and Seamen, Application):—

Sect. 109. The various provisions of the third part of this Act shall have the following applications, unless the context or subject matter requires a different application. So much of the third part of this Act as relates to rights to wages and remedies for the recovery thereof. . . .

And the whole of the third part of this Act shall apply to all sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom.

Sect. 243. Whenever any seaman who has been lawfully engaged, or any apprentice to the sea service commits any of the following offences he shall be liable to be punished summarily as follows:

(4) For wilful disobedience to any lawful command he shall be liable to imprisonment for any period not exceeding four weeks, with or without hard labour, and also at the discretion of the court, to forfeit out of his wages a sum not exceeding two days' pay.

J. Eldon Bankes (with him Joseph Walton, Q.C.) for the appellants.—It is submitted in this case that the justices were wrong in deciding that this was a "ship" and the respondent a "seaman" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. By sect. 109 the third part of that Act is applied to all sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom. This ship was registered, but she was not "seagoing." The decision in The Great Northern Steamship Fishing Company v. Edgehill (ubi sup.) does not apply to the present case, because there the ship was a sea-going ship. The vessel in the present case is used exclusively for navigating rivers, and cannot be said in any sense to be a sea-going vessel.

Carver for the respondent.—It is submitted that proceedings should have been taken against the respondent under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and not under the Employers and Workmen Act 1875. Part III. of the former Act is by sect. 109 applied to all sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom, and sect. 243 (which is included in Part III.) deals with offences of the class which it is alleged that the respondent committed. Sect. 109 does not limit the operation of sect. 243, for if it did, Part III. does not apply at all to foreign ships, whereas it has been held that it does so apply:

The Milford, Swab. 364;
The Jonathan Goodhue, Swab. 524.

The vessel in the present case was registered in the United Kingdom, and was fit to go to sea. Some of the vessels belonging to this fleet do as a matter of fact go to sea, and there is no reason why this vessel should not do so. The vessel is, therefore, a sea-going ship within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and the proceedings against the respondent ought to have been taken under that Act.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This case has been most fairly and lucidly stated, and very clearly argued on both sides. The point which we have to decide is a very simple one, namely, whether sect. 243 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 does or does not apply to this case. If it does the proceedings are not rightly taken, and if it does not they are rightly taken. That depends upon the true construction of sect. 109 of that act, which enacts in the last paragraph that "the whole of the third part of this Act shall apply to all sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom," then follow certain exceptions which do not apply in this case. This ship is registered, but she must also be a sea-going ship as well in order to come within the provisions of the statute. I am of opinion that she is not a sea-going ship. We must give a simple, sensible interpretation to an eminently practical Act of Parliament, and with regard to which it is exceedingly important that its true meaning should be understood, and should be a meaning capable of being at once applied by tribunals that have to apply it. If we were to accede to the view which has been urged upon us by the respondent we should have to decide not whether a ship does go to sea, that is a sea-going ship, but whether according to a variety of considerations she could go to sea, or was fit to go to sea, or under certain possible circumstances might be sent to sea. If all these questions were to be taken into consideration upon the point of the jurisdiction of the magistrates, I cannot see anything more difficult to enter into. It appears to me, however, that we can very properly hold this simple proposition that a sea-going ship is a ship that goes to sea, a ship, whose course, practice, and occupation is to go to sea. It is admitted that this ship does not go to sea in any ordinary or reasonable sense. She is one of a line of ships which navigate the river Weaver, and the upper part of the estuary of the river Mersey, where they meet and transfer their cargoes to ocean-going ships. That is the duty of the ship in this case. It cannot to my mind in reason be said that she is a sea-going ship. It may be she might go to sea extremely well, but she does not, and the question is not whether this section applies to all ships capable of going to sea. It applies to sea-going ships, and it appears to me that this ship does not go to sea. Therefore the first question we are asked, whether the respondent was a workman who could be dealt with under the summons issued under the Employers and Workmen Act 1875, must be answered in the affirmative, and the second question, whether he could be dealt with under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, in the negative.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The point in this case is after all a comparatively narrow one, and turns on the interpretation which is to be put on the last clause of sect. 109 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and that depends upon the application of the principle, Expressio unius exclusio alterius. The application of that maxim depends on what the unus is and what the alter. The cases cited from Swabey's reports, when you come to consider them are rather decisions in favour of the appellants than the respondent, because the judge in those cases did not mean to say that the clause which I refer to had no meaning at all, but he had to consider what the unus was and what the alter was. The unus is obviously a sea-going ship, registered in the United Kingdom. Was the alter all other ships, whether British or foreign, or was it simply ships that did not go to sea? It seems to me that the judgment of the learned judge there must be taken not to mean that there was no exclusio at all, and that the alter did not embrace foreign ships, but only those that did not go to sea, and that consequently the section applied partly to foreign ships. If that was the ground on which he came to his conclusion, that, as I said, would be rather in favour of the appellant than the respondent. With regard to the other point, whether she is a sea-going ship, I entertain no doubt whatever, and I entirely agree with what my Lord has said on that point.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellants, J. H. Cooke, Winsford.

Solicitor for the respondent, J. W. Thompson, Liverpool.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Nov. 18, 21, Dec. 1 and 16, 1892.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords WATSON, HALSBURY, MORRIS, and FIELD.)

MORGAN v. CASTLEGATE STEAMSHIP COMPANY; "THE CASTLEGATE." (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN IRELAND.

Charter-party — Disbursements of master on account of ship—Authority to pledge credit of owner — Maritime lien on ship or freight— Merchant Shipping Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 46).

The Merchant Shipping Act 1889 gives a maritime lien on the ship to the master for disbursements on account of the ship only in cases in which he has authority to pledge the credit of the owner, and does not extend to disbursements for things which the charterer, and not the owner, was bound to provide under a charter-party. There can be no lien on freight where there is not a lien on the ship in respect of the same debt. (b)

Smith v. Plummer (1 B. & A. 582) followed.

Judgment of the court below affirmed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal in Ireland (Lord Ashbourne, L.C., Palles, C.B., and Barry, L.J.), reported in 29 L. Rep. Ir. 55, who had reversed a decision of the judge of the Admiralty Court (Townshend, J.).

The action was brought by the appellant as late master of the steamship Castlegate against that vessel and the freight to recover the sum of 1391*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, for which he became liable in respect of two bills of exchange drawn by him whilst master of the ship in payment for necessaries supplied to the vessel by Wilson, Sons and Co., at St. Vincent and Monte Video. It appeared that in Jan. 1890, while proceeding on her outward voyage to Buenos Ayres, the Castlegate called at the port of St. Vincent to procure coals and water, which were necessary to enable her to proceed on her voyage, and, at the request of the appellant as master of the vessel, Wilson, Sons, and Co. (Limited) supplied the necessary water and coals and paid certain charges, taking from the appellant a captain's bill of exchange for 313*l.* On her homeward voyage Wilson, Sons, and Co. Limited supplied to the vessel further coals and necessaries, taking from the appellant a second bill of exchange for 1078*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* The bills of exchange not being met at maturity, Messrs. Wilson, Sons, and Co. Limited arrested the cargo of the Castlegate on her arrival at Cork for freight in a cause of necessaries supplied to the vessel, and thereupon the assignees of the bill of lading paid into court the sum of 1392*l.*, the estimated balance of freight; and the owners of the ship, in order to save the vessel from arrest, paid into court the sum of 1500*l.* The cause for necessaries was dismissed by the judge of the Admiralty Court, whose decision was affirmed upon appeal. Wilson, Sons, and Co. Limited thereupon commenced an action in the High Court of Justice in England against the appellant on the bills of exchange given by him, and judgment was entered for the plaintiffs. The appellant thereupon instituted the present cause of disbursements against the fund paid into court, and the judge of the Admiralty Court held that the appellant was entitled to a lien on the funds in court, and to be paid the amount of his liability under the bills of exchange out of them. The Court of Appeal, however, reversed that decision, on the ground that under the charter-party the charterers and not the owners of the vessel were to be liable for disbursements in respect of necessaries furnished to the ship, and that therefore the appellant, as master, had no authority to pledge the credit of the owners of the vessel. The master appealed.

Pyke, Q.C., J. Walton, Q.C., and Hollams appeared for the appellant, and argued that the question was, whether the captain had a maritime lien for necessaries supplied on his credit. The object of the Merchant Shipping Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 46) was to confer upon a captain the lien which he had been supposed to have before the decision of this House in The Sara (61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 26; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 43; 14 App. Cas. 209), and to extend that lien. The words are "disbursements on account of the ship," not "on account of the owner." The words occurring in the earlier Acts have had too narrow an interpretation put upon them. See

The Beeswing, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 484; 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554;
The Fairport, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 62; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536; 8 P. Div. 48;
The Turgot, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 548; 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 276; 11 P. Div. 21;
The Durham City, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 411; 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 339; 14 P. Div. 85.

The decision of the court below, that he has no lien either on the ship or the freight, is a hardship upon him, as he cannot prevent the owners from chartering to whom they please, and on what terms they please, and the coals were a necessity for the ship, in the supply of which the owners had an interest. The owner may be liable, either directly or indirectly, to indemnify for payments properly made. The judgment of the court below is based on a misconception, that there cannot be a liability in rem unless there is also one in personam. See also

The Edwin, Br. & Lush. 281.

Sir W. Phillimore and Aspinall, Q.C. (with them F. Satow), for the respondents, supported the judgment of the Court of Appeal as to there being

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b) The Merchant Shipping Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 46), s. 1, provides that "every master of a ship . . . shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of disbursements properly made by him on account of the ship, and for liabilities properly incurred by him on account of the ship, as a master of a ship now has for the recovery of his wages."—[ED.]

no lien on the freight where there is no lien on the ship, and cited

Smith v. Plummer, 1 B. & Ald. 582;
The Ringdove, Swa. 310;
The Jonathan Goodhue, Swa. 524;
The Edward Oliver, L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 379; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 575; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 507;
The Orpheus, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 308; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 531; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 855;
The Dowthorpe, 2 W. Rob. 81;
The Tasmania, 13 P. Div. 110; 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 263; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 305.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Dec. 16.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell).—My Lords: This appeal arises in a cause instituted in the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland by the master or late master of the steamship Castlegate against the vessel and freight for disbursements made by him, or for which he was liable, to the amount of 1391*l.* 11s. 9*d.* On the 20th Nov. 1889 a charter-party was entered into between the Castlegate Steamship Company and Douglas H. Morgan and Co. whereby the vessel was chartered to the latter firm for a term of six calendar months at the rate of 930*l.* per calendar month for the use and hire of the vessel. The charter-party contained a stipulation "that the charterers should provide and pay for all the coals, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, and all other charges whatsoever except" certain charges "above stated," with which I need not trouble your Lordships. Of that charter-party the master of the vessel had notice. The vessel sailed on a voyage to Buenos Ayres under that charter-party. In the course of her outward voyage certain coals were required for the Castlegate, and at the port of St. Vincent those coals were supplied to the vessel by the firm of Wilson, Sons, and Co. Limited, and in respect of those coals a bill was drawn by the plaintiff as master upon Douglas H. Morgan and Co. for the amount of 313*l.* 1s. In the month of Feb. 1890, whilst still on her outward voyage, and in April 1890 on her homeward voyage, the Castlegate at the port of Monte Video needed further supplies of coals, and these again were procured from the same firm, and the captain gave his draft upon the firm of Douglas H. Morgan and Co., the charterers, for the sum of 1078*l.* 10s. 9*d.*, the total of those two drafts being 1391*l.* 11s. 9*d.*, in respect of which the action was brought. Douglas H. Morgan and Co. effected a sub-charter-party of the steamer for the homeward voyage with the firm of Sampson and Co. They were to pay a freight of 22s. 6*d.*, and they again sub-chartered the vessel to the firm of Arning, Brauss, and Co. at an advanced freight. When the vessel arrived in this country an attempt was made by Messrs. Wilson and Co. Limited, the firm who had supplied these coals, to enforce their claim against the vessel. They instituted a cause of necessaries in the local Admiralty Court of the borough of Cork against the vessel, cargo, and freight. Thereupon the assignees of the bill of lading paid into court the sum of 1392*l.*, which was the balance of the freight after deducting the advanced freight and the cost of loading; and the owners, to save the ship from arrest, paid into court 1500*l.* The case was subsequently transferred to the High Court of Admiralty, and was there heard and dismissed by the judge of the Admiralty Court. These two sums which I have mentioned, representing the freight and ship, were transferred with the cause to the High Court of Admiralty. Under these circumstances the master of the Castlegate, the present plaintiff, having been made liable in an action brought against him by Wilson and Co. upon his drafts, for the amount thereof, the firm of Douglas H. Morgan and Co., the charterers, having become bankrupt, he in his turn instituted these proceedings with the view of making the ship and freight liable in respect of the disbursements. The learned judge of the Admiralty Court gave judgment in his favour, determining that he was entitled to the lien which he claimed, and directed that the sum which represented the freight should first be made available, and that if it did not prove sufficient he should enforce his lien against the ship or those representing the ship. This judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and the question which your Lordships have to determine is, whether the judgment so reversing it was right.

The claim of the plaintiff to this maritime lien was rested upon the 1st section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1889, which provides that "Every master of a ship, and every person lawfully acting as master of a ship, shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of disbursements properly made by him on account of the ship, and for liabilities properly incurred by him on account of the ship, as a master of a ship now has for the recovery of his wages." The case on behalf of the appellant was, that these were disbursements and liabilities properly incurred by him on account of the ship, inasmuch as they were incurred for the purpose of procuring coals which were necessary to enable the vessel to prosecute her voyage as a steamer in the adventure in which she was engaged. There can be no doubt that in a sense this expense may properly be said to have been incurred "on account of the ship" if you regard those words as including all disbursements which are necessary or desirable for the purpose of enabling the ship to be effectively used. But it is, in my judgment, impossible to treat the question of the construction of this section as if it had to be entered upon without any regard to previous legislation or decisions. The words to which I have called your Lordships' attention were not new words; they had been used in legislation relating to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, and had received judicial construction. In the 10th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and the 33rd section of the Admiralty (Ireland) Act 1867, it had been provided that "the Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by a seaman of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, whether the same be due under a special contract or otherwise, and also over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship." In The Mary Ann (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8) those words were held to give the master of the ship a maritime lien for disbursements made by him on account of the ship; and that decision remained unquestioned in this House, was treated as law, and had effect given to it for a considerable number of years. In The Sara (61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 26; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 14 App. Cas. 209), which came to your Lordships' House, it was held that the decisions to which I have referred were erroneous, inasmuch as the Admiralty Court Act in England, to which I have alluded (and of course the decision applied equally to the Admiralty Court Act in Ireland) did not create any maritime lien which had not existed before, but merely conferred jurisdiction upon the Court of Admiralty in cases in which it did not possess jurisdiction before. Immediately following the decision that the maritime lien which it was supposed had been created by the Act of 1861 did not exist, the statute upon which the appellant relies was passed. There can be no doubt that it was passed for the purpose of creating the lien which it had been supposed existed by virtue of the section which gave jurisdiction to the Court of Admiralty. Whilst that lien was supposed to exist, the question arose in the courts within what limits the right was to be confined upon the true construction of the words to which I have called your Lordships' attention, "disbursements made by the master on account of the ship." In The Turgot (54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 276; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 548; 11 P. Div. 21) the question arose under circumstances almost precisely similar to those which have given rise to the present controversy. In that case the vessel was under charter. The charterers were bound (as in the present case) to provide, amongst other things, coals. The master had put his name to a draft in respect of the coals which had been provided, and he sought to enforce a maritime lien, in respect of that liability, against the ship and freight. The then President of the Probate and Admiralty Division held that he was not entitled to do so. His reliance was of course placed upon the very same words which are relied upon here. This liability, he said, arises in respect of, and may therefore be regarded as, a "disbursement in respect of goods supplied on account of the ship." The learned president, after calling attention to the fact that "by the charter-party," while "the owners were to provide and pay for provisions and wages," "the charterer was to provide and pay for coals," and "the captain was to be appointed by and to follow the instructions of the charterers," said: "After the coals and provisions were supplied, the captain proposed to pay for them by drawing on the charterer," and believing, from a statement made to him, that there were instructions from the owners to that effect, "the captain did draw on the owners for the coals and provisions." The learned president then proceeded: "I am of opinion that the captain is not entitled to recover in respect of the coals, as by the terms of the charter-party he had no authority to pledge the owners' credit in respect of them. It was argued that the master had an implied authority to pledge the owners' credit as their agent ex necessitate in order to enable the ship to sail." "But the authority of the master depends on the facts; and as the charterers were bound to pay for the hire of the vessel during its detention, the owners had no interest in obtaining its immediate departure." And he accordingly held that the plaintiff, whilst entitled to recover for the disbursements which he had made in so far as they were disbursements which the owners under the charter-party were liable to pay, had no right against the ship or freight in respect of the disbursements which he had made for the supply of coals, which the charterers were bound to provide and pay for. It was therefore a distinct decision that disbursements made by the master on account of the ship must be limited to disbursements which he had a right to make on the credit of the owners of the ship, and did not extend to disbursements made by him for purposes for which the charterers ought to have made provision, even though in a sense they might be said to have been made on account of the ship. That decision did not stand alone. The same conclusion was arrived at in other cases; and it seems to me that it would be contrary to all sound principle not to bear those facts in mind when construing the statute which was passed after the decision in The Sara (ubi sup.). In relation to this very matter there had been what may without impropriety be called a course of decision in the Court of Admiralty putting a construction upon those words "disbursements on account of the ship." When the Legislature altered the law as this House determined it to exist in the case of The Sara (ubi sup.), and restored the law which was supposed to exist before, it cannot for a moment be supposed that the Legislature was ignorant of the construction which had been consistently put upon the words in the former Admiralty Court Act, which was supposed to create a lien. I cannot conceive that, if it had been intended to create a wider lien than had been held to exist under the previous words which were supposed to create it, the Legislature would not have used different words to those upon which this construction had been put, so as to make that intention clear and unambiguous. I do not for a moment suggest a doubt as to those decisions which had been arrived at upon the construction of the words used in the previous Act being correct; but it seems to me that, even if they could be shown to be more doubtful than I think they have been shown to be, I should still feel myself compelled, in construing the section on which this case depends in the Act of 1889, to say that I cannot think the Legislature intended these words to have the effect of creating a maritime lien extending at all beyond that lien which had been held to be created by exactly similar words in the previous legislation. For these reasons I entertain a clear opinion that the judgment of the court below in respect of the alleged maritime lien on the ship must be affirmed.

But it is said on behalf of the appellant, and I own with very considerable force, that if it be true that inasmuch as there was no power to pledge the owner's credit, there ought not to be, and cannot be, a maritime lien upon this vessel, which is the property of the owners, yet as regards the freight, which was the charterers', inasmuch as there was authority to pledge the credit of the charterers for these coals, a maritime lien ought to be enforced against the freight. As a matter of equity, no doubt there is much to be said for that contention; and certainly, speaking for myself, if I could have seen my way to do so, I should have given effect to the contention of the appellant. But there appear to me to be insuperable difficulties to taking such a course as that. In the first place, one would have to say that whilst these disbursements, when regarded as affecting the owners of the ship, were not "disbursements on account of the ship," the very same disbursements, when you were looking at the cases as affecting the charterers, were "disbursements on account of the ship," because those are the words, and the only words, which could give the right insisted upon under the statute; and that appears to me of itself to be a very great difficulty. But besides that, no authority has been cited in which the Court of Admiralty has ever granted process against freight for the purpose of enforcing a maritime lien upon it, except as consequential upon and in connection with process against the ship. No case was cited to us in which the one had not been connected with the other, or in which, where there was no power to arrest the ship because there was no maritime lien enforceable against the shipowner, there had nevertheless been held to be a power to arrest the freight, or that from which the freight arose, for the purpose of enforcing a lien against the freight. Under these circumstances, having regard to the difficulties which arise upon the construction of the Act of Parliament, which alone gives any such maritime lien, and to the practice of the Court of Admiralty with respect to lien upon ship and freight, I do not see my way to giving, even in respect of the freight, where I should be fully inclined to do so if I could, the relief to the plaintiff which he seeks in this action. For these reasons I am of opinion that the decision appealed from must be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs. Lord Halsbury, who is unable to be present to-day, has asked me to state that he concurs in the opinion which I have expressed to your Lordships.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: The appellant was master of the steamship Castlegate during the six months following the 14th Dec. 1889, whilst she was chartered to Douglas H. Morgan and Co., at the rate of 930*l.* per month. He, as well as the officers, engineers, firemen, and crew, were employed by the respondents, the owners of the vessel, who were bound, by the terms of the charter-party, to provide and pay their wages, for insurance on ship and engine-room stores, and to maintain the ship and machinery in an efficient state. The charterers undertook to pay port dues and various other charges, and "to provide and pay for all her coals." Whilst the owners continued, through the appellant, to retain possession of the ship, they parted with all control over her movements, which were placed under the direction of the charterers. The lump sums stipulated for her hire were not dependent upon the freights which she might earn; and the charterers might have kept the vessel unemployed during the whole period covered by the charter-party if they had chosen to do so. In these circumstances, the legal relation of the appellant to the owners and charterers respectively does not appear to me to admit of dispute. He was the agent of the owners in procuring necessaries which they were bound to supply, and the agent of the charterers only in providing coals or other necessaries for which they were responsible. The charterers employed the Castlegate to carry a cargo, on their own account, from Antwerp to Buenos Ayres. They then sub-chartered to Samson and Co., at 22*s.* 6*d.* per ton for a cargo of wheat or maize, to be carried from a port in the river Parana to certain ports on he Continent or in the United Kingdom. Samson and Co., by another sub-contract, parted with their right, at an increased freight of 24*s.* 6*d.* per ton, to Arning, Brauss, and Co., who directed the vessel to proceed to Cork Harbour, where she arrived on the 11th May 1890. Neither of these sub-charters affected the obligation of Douglas H. Morgan and Co. to provide coals for the use of the ship. On the outward voyage the appellant obtained, as agent for the charterers, cash advances and coals from the firm of Wilson, Sons, and Co. Limited, to the amount of 313*l.* 1*s.*; and, on the homeward voyage, he obtained from the same firm similar advances, and a further supply of coal to the amount of 1078*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* For these sums he drew bills upon Douglas H. Morgan and Co., the first of which was dishonoured at maturity, and the second was not accepted. Wilson, Sons, and Co. Limited, on the 19th Jan. 1891, recovered judgment against the appellant as drawer for the amount of these bills with interest. On the arrival of the Castlegate at Cork, both ship and cargo were attached, at the instance of Wilson, Sons, and Company Limited, under warrant of the local Court of Admiralty. The attachment was released upon payment into court of 1500*l.* as representing ship, and 1392*l.* as representing freight. The proceedings and the moneys paid into court were thereafter transferred to the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland, whereupon the appellant applied to that court for a declaration that he had a valid lien for his disbursements upon ship and freight, and for payment of these disbursements out of the funds brought into court. The learned judge of the High Court of Admiralty affirmed both liens claimed, and directed that the appellant's disbursements should be paid in the first instance out of freight money, the balance, if any, to be paid out of money representing ship. By the order appealed from that decision was reversed, and the present appellant's application dismissed with costs.

It was conceded in argument that the master of a ship has no maritime lien for necessary disbursements on account of ship, except in those cases where it is given him by sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1889. The difficulty of applying the provisions of the Act of 1889 to the present case arises from the fact that the respondents, who are under no liability to pay for the appellant's disbursements, are owners of the ship, and that the charterers, who are clearly responsible for them, are the owners of the freight. As regards the appellant's alleged lien upon ship, I have had no difficulty in coming to the same conclusion with the Court of Appeal. It had been held by Dr. Lushington, in The Mary Ann (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8), that the Admiralty Court Act 1861 gave the master a lien on ship for necessary disbursements; and that decision was followed, though not always approved of, by the Admiralty Court, in a series of cases ending with The Sara, in which the judgment of Butt, J. was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 328; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163; 12 P. Div. 158). These cases established the principle that there could be no lien upon ship, in respect of disbursements for which the master had not authority to bind the owner, or, in other words, that no maritime lien could attach to the res for any sum which was not a personal debt of its owner. On appeal, your Lordships held that the rule which had been accepted by the courts below in the case of The Sara (Hamilton v. Baker, 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 26; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas, 413; 14 App. Cas. 209) was not warranted by the Act of 1861; and it is matter of common knowledge that the object of the Legislature in passing the Act of 1889 was to give shipmasters a statutory lien for disbursements, in place of the right which had been erroneously accorded to them in the Admiralty Court. Whether as the appellant maintains, it was the intention of the Legislature to establish a wider lien than that which had been given effect to in The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) and subsequent decisions, depends upon the language of the Act. The clause upon which the appellant relies, provides that every master of a ship shall, "so far as the case permits," have the same rights, liens, and remedies for recovery of "disbursements properly made by him on account of the ship," as a master of a ship has for recovery of his wages. In the case of lien for wages of master and crew, the Legislature has recognised the rule that it attaches to ships independently of any personal obligation of the owner, the sole condition required being that such wages shall have been earned on board the ship. But that rule, which is founded upon obvious considerations of public policy, constitutes an exception from the general principle of the maritime law, which I understand to be that, inasmuch as every proceeding in rem is in substance a proceeding against the owner of the ship, a proper maritime lien must have its root in his personal liability. It was argued that the case of lien for damages by collision furnishes another exception to the general rule, and there are decisions and dicta which point in that direction; but these authorities are hardly reconcilable with the judgment of Dr. Lushington in The Druid (1 W. Rob. 391) or with the law laid down by the Appeal Court in The Parlement Belge (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 273; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234; 5 P. Div. 197), where Brett, L.J., with the assent of James and Baggallay, L.JJ., said: "In a claim made in respect of a collision the property is not treated as the delinquent per se, though the ship has been in collision, and has caused injury by reason of the negligence or want of skill of those in charge of her, yet she cannot be made the means of compensation if those in charge of her were not the servants of her then owner, as if she were in charge of a compulsory pilot. That is conclusive to show that the liability to compensate must be fixed, not only on the property but on the owner through the property." The clause in question does not expressly, neither, in my opinion, does it by implication enact that the master shall have a lien on ship, independently of the owner's personal liability. The qualifying words, "so far as the case permits," seem to indicate that, in the view of the Legislature, there might be cases in which master's disbursements, even if properly incurred in a question with some one or other, would not carry a statutory lien. Then the condition upon which a lien is given to the master is, that the disbursements shall have been "properly incurred by him on account of the ship." The statute does not prescribe what disbursements shall be regarded as properly incurred on account of ship; it leaves that matter to be determined according to the existing law. Whether that reference relates to the general principles of the law maritime, or to the law as laid down by Sir James Hannen in The Turgot (54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 276; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 548; 11 P. Div. 21), one of the cases which, in so far as it concerned the existence of a lien, was overruled by your Lordships in The Sara (ubi sup.), is immaterial to the result of this case; because, in either view, no liability capable of carrying a lien on ship can be properly incurred by a master on account of ship in the absence of express or implied authority from the owner. I am therefore of opinion that the Act of 1889 does not empower the appellant to fix upon the respondents' ship a liability which he had not their authority to incur, or one which was not necessary for the protection of their interests. He had implied authority from the charterers, because the disbursements were necessary in order to enable the vessel to prosecute her adventure, which was theirs; but he was at liberty to choose whether he would or would not pledge his personal credit for their debt. It was argued that the Legislature must presumably have meant to enforce the same policy in the case of disbursements as in the case of wages. It appears to me that any such presumption is excluded by the terms of the statute; and I can find no reason, either of equity or of policy, for enabling the master of a vessel, who is not bound to incur a liability, to relieve himself, when he does choose to incur it, out of the property of his owners, although they may derive no benefit from it, and by the terms of his employment he is debarred from incurring it on their personal account.

The question whether the appellant has a statutory lien upon the freight brought into court is attended with more difficulty. If the respondents, instead of chartering, had themselves navigated the Castlegate, these disbursements, although made for the purpose of enabling her to earn freight, would have been properly incurred on account of ship, within the meaning of the Act, and the appellant would have had a statutory lien both upon ship and freight. Under the charter-party the interest which they previously had was divided, the respondents remaining owners of ship, whilst the charterers became the owners of any freight which she might earn. The appellant argued, with much plausibility, that, although the effect of that arrangement might be that he ceased to have a statutory lien on ship for disbursements which were not made in the respondents' interest, the charterers became quoad freight the owners of the vessel, and consequently that disbursements properly made in their interest were incurred "on account of ship," within the meaning of the Act, and must therefore carry a statutory lien upon freight. If the Court of Admiralty were a court exercising equitable jurisdiction, in the sense of English law, the appellant would have a very strong equity to a lien upon the freight of the Castlegate. His disbursements were made in the interests of the charterers, and with their authority; and, but for these disbursements, the freight now in court would never have been earned. However cogent these considerations may be from an equitable point of view, it does not necessarily follow that the appellant is entitled to a maritime lien. The difficulty which the appellant has to encounter, in this branch of his claim, is to be found in the fact that the Admiralty Court has never recognised the possibility of there being a proper maritime lien upon freight which is not associated with or founded upon a right to proceed in rem against the ship. No process having for its sole object the attachment of cargo in order to enforce a maritime lien for freight can issue from that court. The warrant to arrest cargo must apparently be accompanied by a warrant to arrest the corpus of the ship; an attachment of the ship being an essential preliminary to the court's exercising jurisdiction to enforce a proper lien on freight. These circumstances appear to me to necessitate the inference that no claim which cannot be enforced, either against the ship or her owners, can, according to the practice of the Courts of Admiralty, be attended with a maritime lien upon freight. The absolute dependence of a lien on freight upon the liability of the ship to attachment for the same debt appears to me to have been recognised by the Court of Queen's Bench in Smith v. Plummer (1 B. & A. 582), where the captain of a vessel claimed a lien for wages upon ship and also upon freight. The Court negatived both liens, the first on the authority of previous decisions, and the second for the reasons thus stated by Lord Ellenborough, C.J.: "Then, if he has no lien on the ship, as appears from these cases, he can have no lien on freight, as the lien on the freight is consequential to the lien upon the ship." I am, for these reasons of opinion that the circumstances of this case do not permit of the appellant having a lien upon freight, and that the decision of the Court of Appeal on this point also must be affirmed, I have come to that conclusion with reluctance, because I feel that the appellant's claim for payment out of freight is supported by plain considerations of equity. But it rests with the Legislature to provide a remedy, should they deem it necessary, and not with the court, whose duty it is to administer the Act as it stands.

Lord MORRIS (whose opinion was read by Lord Field).—My Lords: I concur. But on the question whether the appellant has a statutory lien on the freight brought into court, I desire to add that the Court of Admiralty in Ireland for the present is not a part of the High Court of Justice in Ireland, and its jurisdiction in reference to the matters in controversy in this case is purely statutory: vide 30 & 31 Vict. c. 114, s. 33, which provides: "The Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship." In my opinion, even if the disbursements claimed on account of freight which were not on account of the ship were a lien on the freight, such lien should be enforced in the High Court of Justice in Ireland, and not in the Admiralty Court, which court would have no jurisdiction to entertain the question whether there was a lien on the freight when there was no lien on the ship.

Lord FIELD.—My Lords: I concur in the motion which has been made. With regard to the alleged lien upon the ship I have nothing to add; but with regard to that claimed upon freight I agree that the question is not so free from doubt. If the principle that the res, whether ship or freight, is only available for the master's lien in cases in which he has incurred the liability in respect of which the lien is claimed with the authority of the owner of the res is adopted, it should seem that, inasmuch as, first, the freight now sought to be attached was earned for the charterers under their sub-charter, and was in the first instance payable to them; and, secondly, the liability incurred for the coals was incurred with their authority, the two necessary elements to the existence of the maritime lien here claimed do concur. Moreover without the coals the ship could not have earned the freight now sought to be attached, and "service done" is of the very essence of maritime lien. On the other hand, the freight could not have been earned without the ship and her wages and necessary expenses which were to be contributed by the respondents, and the master incurred the liability in question with full notice of the condition of the charter. There seem to me to be equitable considerations on both sides, and I gladly take refuge in the conclusion arrived at by Lord Ellenborough, C.J. in Smith v. Plummer (ubi sup.), that the freight is an incident of the ship, and cannot be got at unless the ship can also be attached.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for appellant, Ingledew, Ince, and Colt.

Solicitors for respondents, Maples, Teesdale, and Co., for Leitch, Dodd, Bramwell, and Bell, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Wednesday, Dec. 7, 1892.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LOPES and KAY, L.JJ., assisted by NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.)

THE SARAGOSSA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision—Overtaken vessel—Manœuvres for third vessel — Course — Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 20, 22, 23.

Where a vessel which is being overtaken by another deviates from her course, it is the duty of the overtaking ship to exercise reasonable care to keep out of the way of the former, and she is relieved from the absolute obligation prescribed by art. 20 of keeping out of the way.

An overtaken vessel which finds it necessary to manœuvre for a danger of navigation is to blame if she deviates from her course more than is necessary to avoid immediate danger.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action from a decision of the President finding their vessel, the Saragossa, solely to blame for a collision with the plaintiffs' steamship Ambient.

The collision took place off Lowestoft, about 3 a.m. on the 16th Dec. 1891.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 3 a.m. on the 16th Dec. 1891 the Ambient, which is a screw-steamship belonging to the port of Sunderland, of 1034 gross and 668 net tons register, whilst on a voyage from the Tyne to London with a cargo of coal was in the North Sea about abreast of the Corton Light. The wind was about W. by N. blowing a strong breeze, the weather being fine and clear and moonlight, and the tide was ebb setting to the northward and eastward with a force of about two knots an hour. The Ambient was proceeding a S.W. by W. magnetic course, and was making a little over eight knots an hour. In these circumstances those on board the Ambient observed the stern light of a vessel (which proved to be the Saragossa, and which had been in sight for a considerable time previously) distant about three-quarters of a mile, and bearing about five points on the port bow of the Ambient. The Saragossa was apparently upon a course parallel to the Ambient. The Ambient kept on her course very slowly overhauling the Saragossa. After some little time, and whilst the Saragossa was still on the port bow of the Ambient, the helm of the Ambient was starboarded a little in order to clear a fishing smack (the Buttercup) showing a green light, and when the smack was cleared the helm of the Ambient was ported, and she was just about getting back on to her course when the Saragossa was seen to be coming towards the Ambient as if under a port helm, and immediately afterwards to open her green light broad on the port bow of the Ambient. The helm of the Ambient was immediately put hard-a-port, and her engines were kept going ahead to give the Saragossa a better chance to starboard back on to her course as she could and ought to have done, and as it was seen that she was continuing to act as if under port helm, she was loudly hailed to go full speed astern; but, nevertheless, she came on at great speed and still apparently under port helm, and, although just before the collision the engines of the Ambient were stopped to ease the blow, the Saragossa, with her stem struck the Ambient on her port side a little abaft the engine-room, thereby doing her such damage that she sank shortly afterwards.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL and BASIL CRUMP, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the defendants with breach of arts. 16, 18, and 22 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

On behalf of the defendants it was stated that, shortly before 3 a.m. on the 16th Dec. 1891, the Saragossa, a screw-steamship belonging to the port of Newcastle, of 1789 tons register, with engines of 170 h.p. nom., with a cargo of coal and telegraph poles, whilst on a voyage from the Tyne to the River Plate, was in the North Sea between the Corton Light and Lowestoft. In these circumstances the mast head and red lights of the Ambient (which vessel had been seen for some time coming up astern of the Saragossa and overtaking her) were particularly observed five or six points abaft the starboard beam of the Saragossa and from half to three-quarters of a mile distant. Shortly afterwards the Saragossa hauled out a little from the land under a starboard helm and then steadied again on her course S.W. by S. The Ambient was apparently on a parallel course with the Saragossa and going faster, and she continued to draw up along the starboard side of the Saragossa as the vessels proceeded. When Lowestoft was about abeam the helm of the Saragossa was starboarded to pass under the stern of a ketch which was standing in to the land and across the course of the Saragossa on the starboard tack, and after clearing her it was ported for a smack (the Strive) sailing to the northward, which opened her red light nearly ahead of the Saragossa and some distance from her. After porting for the smack the helm was steadied, and the Saragossa was then heading a little southerly of her original course. At this time the Ambient, which was now broad on the starboard bow of the Saragossa, was observed suddenly to come rapidly towards her as if under a hard starboard helm, and the engines of the Saragossa were at once reversed full speed astern and the helm starboarded; but the Ambient came on apparently at full speed, and with her port side about the main rigging struck the stem of the Saragossa, doing the Saragossa great damage, and so injuring herself that she shortly afterwards sank.

The defendants (inter alia) charged the plaintiffs with breach of arts. 18, 20, and 24 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The following articles of the Regulations are material to the decision:

Art. 20. Notwithstanding anything contained in any preceding article, every ship, whether a sailing ship or a steamship, overtaking any other, shall keep out of the way of the overtaken ship.

Art. 22. Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

Art. 23. In obeying and construing these rules, due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation; and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

At the trial, before Jeune, J., the learned President found that the Saragossa was the leading ship, that both ships were on substantially the same course, and that the Ambient was slowly overhauling her. The Ambient was therefore an overtaking vessel within the definition laid down in The Franconia (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 721; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 295; 2 P. Div. 8), and was bound to keep out of the way, while the Saragossa, the overtaken ship, was bound to keep her course. The starboarding of the Ambient for the Buttercup was not sufficient of itself to have brought about the collision. She may have starboarded sufficiently to take in the Strive as well, but he held she did not over-starboard. It followed from the direction of the blow that there must have been some porting on the part of the Saragossa. It was difficult to see why she should have ported for the smack, as they were red to red; but as a matter of fact he thought that she clearly ported at the last moment, and ported hurriedly, to avoid, as she thought, the smack. The fact was, the look-out on the Saragossa was defective, and she was not conscious that the Ambient was in the position she was. If she had been, her true course would have been to have stopped long before she did. It was the duty of a ship that is being overtaken not needlessly or recklessly to place the ship which is following her in difficulty, and that, the Trinity Masters and himself thought, the Saragossa did. Then there was the question whether the Ambient was called upon to take any action. Both he and the Trinity Masters agreed that she was not, that the Strive, being well red to red of her, would of course cause her no apprehension, and that she had no reason to suppose that she would be placing the Saragossa in any difficulty by keeping on her course without stopping. The result therefore was, that the Saragossa must be held alone to blame for the collision.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Laing appeared for the defendants, in support of the appeal.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Dawson Miller, for the plaintiffs, contrà.

The Master of the Rolls (after reviewing the facts, and saying that he thought the collision, as found, was solely caused by the extreme porting of the Saragossa, continued):—If that be so, what is the rule of law? If the ships were an overtaking vessel and a vessel being overtaken, then the first rule is this: "Every ship, whether a sailing ship or steamship, overtaking another, shall keep out of the way of the overtaken ship." That is an absolute rule, equivalent to an Act of Parliament. If that rule stood alone, whatever the overtaken ship did, however much she might deviate from her course, the other is bound absolutely to keep out of her way, and nothing can excuse it except inevitable accident. There was a case in the House of Lords in which the nautical advisers found that a man was put into such a position with regard to the other ship by the fault of that ship that any sailor of ordinary care and skill would have done just what the man did. The House of Lords held, nevertheless, that he was within the rule, and was bound to keep out of the way. It was a severe finding, I think—it overruled the Court of Appeal—but it shows that the rule is absolute. What is the effect of it? Why, you say to a man, "You are to keep out of the way. We don't tell you how to keep out of the way. It may be by starboarding, or by stopping and reversing, or going at full speed. It may be in any way you please. You are to have the choice; you have the obligation of doing it which way you will, but do it you must." It was thought right that if you put that tremendous obligation upon the overtaking ship you must give him all the means to carry it out, and therefore there is another rule: "Where, by the above rule, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course." That is, that the ship on whom the heavy obligation lies may not be hampered by anything the other does. He must have his full liberty to go ahead of you, astern of you, within ten feet of you on one side or the other. If he is to have that obligation you must keep your course, so that he may not be hampered by you in any way as to his choice. Then it seems to me that that at once makes the rules correlative, and that the obligation on the one and the obligation on the other exists at the same time. If the ship which ought to keep her course does not keep her course, she takes away from the following ship that tremendous obligation — takes away half his choice. If she ports, that may prevent her from starboarding, or if she starboards, it may prevent her from porting. So the two rules are to my mind of necessity correlative. If they are, and the ship has not kept her course, and hampers the other, which she must do, because she takes away some part of his water which is for the purpose of, as between them, his choice—if she takes away that choice, his absolute obligation to keep out of the way is gone. That he has another obligation, which I will presently state, cannot be doubted.

But there is one set of circumstances under which the vessel which is to keep her course may be excused from deviating from it, and that is by the 23rd rule: "In obeying these rules, due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rule necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." I take it myself that the last part of that rule refers to both parts of it. You must have regard to any danger of navigation which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. What those dangers of navigation are it is not necessary to say. There are too many. You could not possibly state them all. No doubt it has been said, if there is a rock or a wreck in the way, so that by keeping on her course the ship would be immediately running into it, and that should be discovered at a time when she could not stop, that that would be a danger of navigation. But they say more than that: "Any special circumstances . . . necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." I cannot help thinking that there might be special circumstances, such as some sudden hurricane of wind coming on and catching a sailing ship, which would prevent her keeping on her course, and which, if she did not deviate, would put her into immediate danger. That would excuse her. This being a deviation from the rule by one ship, it is for her to show that she was obliged to do so in order to avoid immediate danger. I will not say now whether that means immediate danger to herself or to another ship. I am inclined to think it will include immediate danger to another ship, as for instance, the smack. If she were obliged to port to avoid immediate danger to the smack, I think she would be excused from deviating from her course; but the learned judge has found that she was not obliged to deviate at all, and, secondly, that if she was she was not entitled to deviate as much as she did. Then I cannot help thinking that, if she is not excused for deviating at all, or deviated more than was necessary to avoid danger, she broke the rule. The other ship, then, in my opinion, is relieved from the absoluteness of the rule that she is bound to keep out of the way at all events. But then there is the common law rule, which immediately attaches, that where one person does the wrong thing, or a negligent thing which is the wrong thing, the other is not immediately absolved from all care. The other is then bound still to act reasonably, and to do all that can be reasonably expected to avoid danger. There is this difference only, that he has no longer an absolute obligation not to avoid the danger. He has to do all that a man in his position could reasonably do to avoid the danger. If he is a person in command of a ship he has to do that which a sailor of ordinary care and skill ought to do under the circumstances in which he is placed. Now, the circumstances, according to the finding of the learned judge, are these, that he is going on his course with no occasion to suppose that the other ship will port her helm and come towards him; certainly no occasion to suppose that she will put her helm hard-a-port. She does put her helm hard-a-port, according to the finding of the judge, when there was between the ships about seven lengths, and when the Ambient was not yet past her, and when she was about five points or more on the port bow of the Ambient. She then does not port slightly, but puts her helm hard-a-port, so as to be coming round quite quickly, so that though the Ambient ported her helm, and kept on as quickly as she could, the other caught her on the port quarter. The learned judge asked the Trinity Masters whether, taking the Saragossa to be doing that, they thought it was a desirable thing for the Ambient to port her helm, and keep on as hard as she could. The Trinity Masters say it was the best thing she could do. We have asked the gentlemen who assist us whether, given the position of the two ships as found by the learned judge, it was the best thing the Ambient could do in the circumstances to put her helm hard-a-port, and go away as fast as she could. They tell us it was the best thing. In these circumstances the rule that she must do everything she reasonably can do to avoid collision is fulfilled. She did what was best in the attempt to avoid collision. She is not liable, therefore, under the common law rule. The collision is shown to be caused by the sole action of the Saragossa in breaking the rule which she was bound to observe, and breaking it in the violent way in which she did. The collision, therefore, was solely the result of a wrongful act of navigation on the part of the Saragossa, and the judgment of the learned judge must be supported.

Lopes, L.J.—In this case the Saragossa is the leading ship and the Ambient the following ship, and the question arises, what are the relative duties in the case of ships thus placed? It appears to me that the rule is this, that the leading ship is bound to keep her course, and the overtaking ship is bound to keep out of the way of the leading ship. If the leading ship does not keep her course, the burden, and I use the word advisedly, is then upon her to establish a necessity for departure from the rule that she is to keep her course, and she must also prove that she did not deviate more than that necessity demanded. But there is another case one must consider, namely, the case where there is a wrong manœuvre by the leading ship, such as it is said there was in this case, where she deviates more than is necessary, or where she deviates when there is no necessity at all. In this case it would be a wrong manœuvre of the leading ship. What, then, is the duty of the following ship? It is this. She must exercise all due care and skill. She must use all reasonable care and skill to avoid any collision or any immediate danger, notwithstanding the wrong manœuvre of the leading ship, and if she does not she must take the consequences. Applying these rules to the present case, it appears to me that from first to last the Ambient has done nothing wrong. It appears that when she starboarded for the smacks she was bound to do it, and afterwards resumed her course. At this time she is, I take it, the following ship. The Saragossa being the leading ship, her duty is to keep her course. She does not keep her course, but ports. Directly she does it the duty is cast on her to justify that action on her part. It may be she was justified in the circumstances in porting slightly, but what did she do? She put her helm hard-a-port. If she did that, it is clear to my mind she did that for which there was no necessity, and in these circumstances she would be breaking the rule with regard to keeping her course without any adequate justification for so doing. But then it is said still that the Ambient, having regard to immediate risk of collision, did not do what a reasonable, careful, and skiful seaman would do to avoid a collision which was imminent. What the Ambient did was to put her helm hard-a-port, and keep on full speed, her idea no doubt being that that would be the most efficient means of removing her from any risk arising from the Saragossa. It is said that that is not the best course, and that the better course would have been to have stopped her engines and reversed. That, again, is a purely nautical matter, and I find that the President consulted the Trinity Masters with reference to it. He says that it is quite clear to the Trinity Masters that stopping or reversing at the time when she saw the Saragossa approaching her would not have been desirable, and that the result would have been to enhance the danger of the collision. We have had an opportunity of consulting those who advise us with regard to nautical matters, and they hold the same opinion. I think, therefore, the decision of the President was the right one, and we cannot say it should be interfered with.

Kay, L.J.—I have had considerable doubt during the arguments in this case whether the Saragossa should be considered alone to blame for the collision which has taken place, but that doubt has been removed chiefly by the opinion which the nautical assessors have given to us in the course of the case. There can be no doubt that the Ambient was a ship which was overtaking the Saragossa up to the moment of collision; therefore the rules which relate to overtaking ships apply in this case to the Ambient. The Saragossa showed a light over her stern. That seems to show that at any rate the ships were near enough to make that proximity dangerous, and that each ship had a duty to one another under these rules. Then another article which may or may not apply to this case is art. 18, which provides that every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary. Then art. 20 provides that, notwithstanding anything contained in the preceding article, every ship, whether a sailing or a steamship, overtaking another, shall keep out of the way of the overtaken ship. I am afraid I hardly concur in the view which my learned colleagues have taken of that article. It does not seem to me to be subject to any difficulty whatever. It is an absolute rule that the overtaking ship shall keep out of the way, and the reason seems to be that the ship which is following has far the best chance of adopting some manœuvre which will keep her clear than has the leading ship, and that the look-out will probably be more vigilant at any rate forward than aft. Therefore, the look-out will see from the following ship more certainly and more readily that she is in danger than from the leading ship. I read that as an absolute rule on the subject, of no difficulty whatever. Then the next rule is, that where, by one of the above rules, one ship is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course. That is subject to art. 23, that, "in obeying and construing these rules, due regard shall be had to dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." Now, applying these rules to this particular case, the duty of the Saragossa, when the ships were near enough to one another to make any kind of danger, was to show a stern light, which she says she did. Her next duty was to keep on her course, unless it was necessary to alter it to avoid danger. As the Master of the Rolls says, that may mean danger to the leading ship herself, or to some other ship with which she may possibly collide if she keeps on her direct course. So, if the Saragossa diverted from her course because she wanted to avoid the Strive, and it was necessary to divert from her course for that purpose, and she did not divert more than was necessary to avoid the Strive, to my mind she was keeping her course within the meaning of the rules. Therefore, one of the main questions is, Did she divert more than was necessary to avoid the Strive? The learned President has found that she did; and I do not see how we can possibly differ from that finding, looking to the whole of the evidence. I believe, if it was necessary to divert at all, which seems doubtful, as they were red light to red light when she ported her helm—if it was necessary to divert, I cannot help thinking the true result of the evidence is that which the learned judge has found, that she diverted very much more indeed than was necessary to make her perfectly safe against any collision with the Strive. If she did, and assuming there was a wrongful divergence, did that relieve the Ambient from the obligation of the 20th rule that she should keep out of the way of the overtaking ship? I cannot satisfy myself that it relieved her at all. I quite agree that, if a collision takes place by reason of the other ship's divergence from her course, that ship would be only liable; but if she had diverged at a time and manner that the Ambient could either have kept out of her way by altering her course or reversing, then, if the Ambient, having a perfect opportunity of doing that, did not choose to do it, the collision then, nevertheless, might be alone the fault of the Ambient, or it might be the joint fault of the two ships. It is the advice which we have got upon this point which makes me agree entirely with the decision of the learned President. What the Ambient did was this: She put her helm hard-a-port when she saw that the divergence of the Saragossa was bringing her into dangerous proximity to her. She did not stop and reverse. The Trinity Masters who were advising the President found that that would not have been a good thing to do; that she did, in fact, the best thing she could under the circumstances by putting her helm hard-a-port and not stopping and reversing. We have asked the gentlemen who assist us here, and they agree with that. I therefore think that, even assuming as I do that there was still an obligation on the Ambient, under the 20th rule, to keep out of the way of the Saragossa if she could, she did everything in her power to get out of the way of the Saragossa, and that stopping and reversing would not have been a useful manœuvre to have adopted under the circumstances. Accordingly it follows that the Saragossa was alone to blame for the collision which took place, and I think this appeal should be dismissed with costs. Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Botterell and Roche.
Solicitor for the respondents, Charles E. Harvey.

Thursday, Nov. 3, 1892.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LOPES and KAY, L.JJ.)

ARMSTRONG AND OTHERS v. ALLAN BROTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Conversion—Sale of goods—Delivery to shipowner—Shipowner not to accept goods without giving a clean receipt—No clean receipt given—Refusal to re-deliver to vendor—Subsequent acceptance by vendee and payment of vendor—Liability of shipowner.

The plaintiffs N. and Co. engaged with the defendants, who were shipowners, for the shipment of a large quantity of oil to Montreal during the season, and it was arranged that the defendants were to receive no goods on board unless a clean receipt were given. The plaintiff A. sold fifty barrels of oil to N. and Co. and delivered them to the defendants. The defendants received the oil, but refused to give a clean receipt for it. The plaintiff A. demanded re-delivery, which the defendants refused, as other cargo had been stowed on the top of it. N. and Co. having agreed to pay A. for the oil in cash in exchange for mate's receipt, refused to pay for the fifty barrels. A. brought an action against the defendants for conversion, and afterwards amended the writ by adding N. and Co. The consignees at Montreal accepted the oil and paid N. and Co., who thereupon paid A.

Held, that A. had waived the right of saying that the property in the goods had not passed to N. and Co., and therefore, since the goods were not his at the time that re-delivery was refused, no action lay for conversion; and further, that no action lay for his loss of interest through the delay in payment to him of the price of the goods.

Judgment of Wills, J. (reported ante, p. 277; 67 L. T. Rep. N. S. 417) reversed.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of Wills, J. upon the trial of the action without a jury, reported ante, p. 277; 67 L. T. Rep. N. S. 417.

The facts are fully set out in the report of the judgment of the learned judge.

The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff Armstrong.

The defendants appealed.

Witt, Q.C. and Hurst for the defendants.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and R. M. Bray for the plaintiffs.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think that judgment ought to have been entered in this case for the defendants as against Armstrong. I will take the case step by step. Goods were sent to the defendants, who are shipowners, in the name of Nickoll and Co., who are some of the plaintiffs, to be dealt with by them under the terms of a contract which had been previously made between them and Nickoll and Co., whereby they had agreed to give Nickoll and Co. a certain amount of room in their ships for the export of cargo during the season. There was a stipulation between them that no goods were to be received on board unless a clean receipt could be given, and the shipowners therefore were either bound to accept the goods and give a clean receipt for them; or else, if they could not give a clean receipt, they were not bound to accept the goods. As a matter of fact they accepted the goods, which are the subject of this action, but it was done contrary to their authority to receive because they refused to give a clean receipt. In such a case, if Nickoll and Co. shipped goods and demanded them back and were refused, they might sue in trover. Now the goods in this case were brought to the ship by the plaintiff Armstrong under a contract between himself and Nickoll and Co. Then, if there was nothing more, Armstrong might have sued. Now this fact is to be considered, that the contract between Armstrong and Nickoll and Co. was wholly unknown to the defendants, nor were the defendants bound to anticipate the likelihood of its existence, nor could they possibly have known what were the terms of it. Therefore the contract between Armstrong and Nickoll and Co. cannot be relied on here as against the defendants. So far then Armstrong might treat what happened as a wrongful conversion of the goods. The next day he brought this action. Not being able to rely as against the defendants on the contract with Nickoll and Co., his claim must be that the defendants are in possession of his goods, and that he is therefore entitled to the return of the goods or their value, and possibly special damage to be asked for at the time the action was brought. If the contract between Armstrong and Nickoll and Co. is not to be taken into consideration, where is there any special damage? Armstrong would be entitled to the value of the goods at the time, and might get damages under the statute in the nature of interest for the delay. These damages would not be part of the cause of action, but something which the jury could give if they think fit. Since, therefore, under the contract between Armstrong and Nickoll and Co., the property in the goods did not pass unless the defendants gave a clean receipt, Armstrong might have insisted on the return of the goods. But then Nickoll and Co. dealt with the goods in a way which he says they had no right to deal with them. Nickoll and Co. sold the goods, they assumed that the goods belonged to them and used them accordingly. Then Armstrong might have sued Nickoll and Co. for the conversion of his goods, but, instead of repudiating what they did, he adopts it and treats the sale of the goods by Nickoll and Co. as a thing which they had a right to carry out, and further he has received the agreed price of the goods. Consequently he has waived his right of saying that the property never passed; it is impossible for him to say now that the property did not pass by his contract of sale to Nickoll and Co. Therefore, when the goods had been shipped and he demanded them back and was refused, the goods were not his. Therefore trover will not lie, and judgment must be for the defendants.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

That is enough to decide the case, but there is another ground also. He has received the price of the goods, therefore he cannot get it again. But he also claims special damage, namely, the loss of interest by reason of his not having been paid for the goods by Nickoll and Co. as early as he would otherwise have been. That is to say, he claims this interest as a matter of right, as part of his cause of action. There are two objections to this. First, he had no right to immediate payment by Nickoll and Co. because no clean receipt was given for the goods; and secondly, he cannot sue the defendants for the result of a breach of a contract not known to the defendants under the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Ex. 341). Then there is a claim for the expenses of a barge which he sent on the 12th June to bring back the goods. But he sent the barge after he had made a demand for re-delivery, and after a refusal to re-deliver which he had chosen to treat as final. Therefore he cannot recover for that. I think the judgment in the court below was wrong, and that this appeal must be allowed.

Lopes and Kay, L.JJ. were of the same opinion.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: for the plaintiff, George E. Philbrick; for the defendants, Pritchard and Sons.

April 4 and 5, 1892.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Fry and Lopes, L.JJ.)

The Duke of Buccleugh.(a)

Practice—Collision—Parties—Final judgment—R. S. C., Order XVI., rr. 2 and 11.

The court has power under Order XVI., rr. 2 and 11, in a collision action in personam tried in the Admiralty Division, to add or substitute new plaintiffs after judgment, but before the reference to assess the damages.

In a collision action in personam by owners of ship and cargo, which, having been carried to the House of Lords, resulted in a decision in favour of the plaintiffs, the name of the cargo owner's agent was by mistake inserted in the writ as a plaintiff. Prior to the reference to assess damages this mistake was discovered, and on application to substitute the name of the real cargo owner:

Held, that the court had power under Order XVI., rr. 2 and 11, to grant the application, and that in the circumstances it ought to be made.

This was an application by plaintiffs in a collision action in personam, asking for the addition or substitution of fresh plaintiffs.

The action was instituted by the owners of the sailing ship Vandalia and her cargo, and her master and crew, against the steamship Duke of Buccleugh.

The defendants counter-claimed.

The Vandalia, her cargo and crew's effects, were all lost in the collision.

The writ, which was entitled "between George F. Smith and others, plaintiffs, and the Eastern Steamship Company Limited, defendants," was indorsed as follows: "The plaintiffs, as owners of the ship or vessel Vandalia, of the port of St. Johns, New Brunswick, the owners of her cargo and her master and crew claim compensation against the Eastern Steamship Company Limited, the owners of the steamship Duke of Buccleugh, for the loss of the said vessel Vandalia, her cargo and crew's effects, occasioned by a collision which took place in the English Channel in the month of March 1889."

At the trial before Butt, J., on the application of the defendants, the learned judge ordered the plaintiffs to give the names and addresses of the plaintiffs, and accordingly such names and addresses were given to the plaintiffs, the owner of cargo being described as "Funck, merchant, of Bishopsgate-street, London," and the writ was amended by the insertion of such names as plaintiffs.

(a) Reported by Butler Aspinall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case, which was taken to the House of Lords, resulted in a decree finding the Duke of Buccleugh alone to blame.

The plaintiffs' solicitors, when preparing their claim for reference, ascertained that Meissner Ackerman and Co., of New York, and not Funck, were the real owners of the cargo. It appeared that, although the cargo was invoiced to Funck and Co., they were only holders of the bills of lading as agents for sale.

The plaintiffs' solicitors thereupon issued a writ in personam at the instance of Meissner Ackerman and Co., against the Eastern Steamship Company Limited, claiming for the loss of their cargo by collision. The defendants appeared, but refused to admit liability, stating that they intended to defend the action.

The cargo owner then took out the present summons in the original action, asking that Meissner Ackerman and Co., should be added as plaintiffs, or substituted for Funck.

The application having been refused by the registrar, the cargo owner appealed to the judge, by whom the summons was adjourned into court for argument.

Rule of the Supreme Court, Order XVI., r. 2:

Where an action has been commenced in the name of the wrong person as plaintiff, or where it is doubtful whether it has been commenced in the name of the right plaintiff, the court or a judge may, if satisfied that it has been so commenced through a bonâ fide mistake, and that it is necessary for the determination of the real matter in dispute so to do, order any other person to be substituted or added as plaintiff upon such terms as may be just.

Rule 11. No cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties, and the court may in every cause or matter deal with the matter in controversy so far as regards the rights and interests of the parties actually before it. The court or a judge may at any stage of the proceedings, either upon or without the application of either party, and on such terms as may appear to the court or a judge to be just, order that the names of any parties improperly joined, whether as plaintiffs or as defendants, be struck out, and that the names of any parties whether plaintiffs or defendants who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter, be added. No person shall be added as a plaintiff suing without a next friend, or as the next friend of a plaintiff under any disability, without his own consent in writing thereto.

Kennedy, Q.C. in support of the application.—The court has power to make the order asked under Order XVI., rr. 2 and 11. Analogous orders have been made by this court before:

The Ilos, Swa. 100;
The Minna, L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 97.

[Jeune, J. referred to the case of Heard v. Borgwardt, W. N. 1883, p. 173.] That case deals with rule 12. In Admiralty the decree fixing the liability is not final judgment.

Barnes, Q.C. and F. Laing for the defendants.—The court has no power to grant the application. The proceedings were over as soon as the court determined the question of liability. If so, the court cannot add parties after judgment. By the decree the plaintiffs named in the writ are entitled to recover what damage they, the plaintiffs named therein, have sustained. By adding fresh plaintiffs the court would in effect vary the decree. In The Ilos (ubi sup.) and The Minna (ubi sup.) the plaintiffs on the record had beneficial rights. At common law this application would not be granted:

Walcott v. Lyons, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 399; 29 Ch. Div. 584;
Chapman v. Day, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 907;
Phillips v. Homfray, 24 Ch. Div. 439;
Attorney-General v. Corporation of Birmingham, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 77; 15 Ch. Div. 423; Munster v. Cox, 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 474; 10 App. Cas. 680.

The object of the rules was to prevent plaintiffs on the record who had obtained judgment losing the benefit of such judgment by misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties. It was not meant to give the benefit of proceedings to a stranger who only seeks to come in after liability has been determined.

Kennedy, Q.C., in reply, cited

The Freedom, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 392; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 495; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 136;
The James Armstrong, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 390; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 380; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 46.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 29.—Jeune, J.—Having considered my judgment in this case, I will now deliver it. The writ was amended by order of the court directing the names and addresses of the plaintiffs to be given. One Funck was by a bonâ fide mistake described therein as the owner of cargo. It subsequently appeared that Funck was not the owner, and I am now asked to substitute the names of Messrs. Ackerman, the real owners, for his. If I have the power, I think that this amendment ought to be made. The defendants have been in no way prejudiced by the name of Funck having been on the record instead of that of Messrs. Ackerman, and if it were not that they desired to fight the case over again, they would not be prejudiced by having to pay Messrs. Ackerman. Mr. Kennedy, in support of this application, relies on rules 2 and 11 of Order XVI. [Reads them.] It appears to me that the circumstances of this case satisfy the conditions of rule 2 in this, that there was a bonâ fide mistake. I will presently consider whether it is necessary for the determination of the real matter in dispute that the names of the real owners of the cargo should be on the record. I will also consider whether the circumstances do not satisfy the condition of rule 11, whether or no the presence of the cargo owner before the court is not necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter. But it is said—and this is the real point for decision—that in this case final judgment has been given by the House of Lords, and that therefore the application to amend is now too late, whether you rely on the words "at any stage of the proceedings," or "for the determination of the real matter in dispute." Two arguments, which really resolve themselves into one, were pressed upon the court. It was said that a plaintiff who has a cause of action cannot be substituted for one who has none, and reliance was placed on the decision in Walcott v. Lyons (ubi sup.); but it will be seen on looking into that case that the Court of Appeal would apparently have allowed the substitution if the terms they imposed had been acceded to; and in the case of Long v. Crossley (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 793; 13 Ch. Div. 388) a plaintiff with a right was substituted for a plaintiff with none. Indeed, the provisions of rule 2, making a boná fide mistake a condition, seem to include and point to the person who was erroneously brought forward, having no right in himself. I think, however, that this argument was really put forward only in combination with the argument founded on the proposition that the addition or substitution of a party cannot be made after final judgment. Such proposition is perfectly true. The case of the Attorney-General v. Corporation of Birmingham (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 77; 15 Ch. Div. 423) shows that in the Chancery Division, after the final decree, one defendant cannot be substituted for another. The case of Keith v. Butcher (ubi sup.) shows that for this purpose in the Chancery Division final decree means the actual drawing-up and entering of the final decree; and when, as in the case referred to of Munster v. Cox, the question is one of adding after final judgment a defendant who hitherto had been no party, for the purpose of getting execution against him, the case is of course even clearer. But this action is in the Admiralty Division, and what I have to consider is, what do the words "at any stage of the proceedings," or "determination of the matter," mean when applied to proceedings for collision in that division. The important question in such cases is the conduct of those on board each ship; or, to put it in other words, which ship is liable for the collision, and the personalities of the owners of the ship and cargo are generally so immaterial till it comes to payment and receipt of the damages, that often, if not usually in practice, the names of the owners of the ship and cargo do not appear in the pleadings, and seldom if ever is any question of the ownership of ship or cargo raised at the hearing. The result is, that the only question determined by the decree is the fixing of the liability. The amount of damages and the persons to receive them are questions left to be determined by the registrar and merchants. I think that the fact that the damages remained to be assessed rendered the decree of the judge at the hearing no final judgment. The learned counsel for the defendants relied on the analogy of common law, and said, on the authority of Chapman v. Day (ubi sup.), in the Queen's Bench Division, that a judgment determining the liability was a final judgment, though the damages remained to be assessed; but I think that the judges in the Court of Appeal in reversing that judgment intended to express a different view, because they followed their judgment in Phillips v. Homfray (ubi sup.), a case in the Chancery Division decided shortly before. In the latter case Bowen, L.J., delivering the judgment of himself and Cotton, L.J., said: "The claim of the plaintiff is in substance so far as these inquiries are concerned an action for trespass. The inquiries, whatever the form of language in which they are directed, are an assessment of damages, and until they have been completed the action is still undetermined." It would appear therefore that, both in the Queen's Bench and Chancery Divisions, a judgment is not to be considered as terminating the action while damages remain to be assessed. But in the Admiralty Division the matter does not rest only on assessment of damages. The title of the plaintiffs remains after the decree open to question, and it appears to me that the defendants are in this dilemma, that if the decree is final Mr. Funck must be regarded as owner of the cargo, or if he is not to be so regarded, the decree is not final. The practice in the Admiralty Court goes far to show that a decree at the hearing was never considered final in the sense that a new claimant could not be introduced afterwards as a party to the suit to get his damages assessed, and when assessed, to receive them. In the case of The Ilos (ubi sup.), where the action was brought, not by the registered owner, but by a person having a bill of sale—whether taken after or before the collision does not appear—Dr. Lushington after decree, and when the matter was before the registrar and merchants, refused to dismiss the defendants on the ground of want of title in the plaintiffs, ordered the reference to proceed, and added that, if there was any doubt who was entitled to receive the amount of compensation after it had been assessed, he should direct the amount to be paid into the registry, and throw upon the party claiming it the onus of establishing his ownership. In The Minna (ubi sup.) Sir Robert Phillimore approved and followed the case of The Ilos (ubi sup.). It is said by Mr. Barnes that in both these cases the plaintiffs on the record had, or might have had, beneficial rights; but that does not appear to me to meet the point that the Court of Admiralty considered the decree of the judge still left open the question of the title of the plaintiffs as owners of ship or cargo. Reliance is placed on rule 12, as showing that no application to add or substitute a party can be made after the trial—an argument which no doubt commended itself to the mind of Field, J. in Heard v. Borgwardt (ubi sup.) as supporting the decision in Attorney-General v. Corporation of Birmingham (ubi sup,), which he was following. But I do not think that rule militates against the view I have expressed. If the word "trial" does not include the reference to the registrar and merchants, as I think it does, then the mode of application is left unprovided for in the case where the trial within the meaning of rule 12 does not terminate every stage of the proceedings within the meaning of rule 11. The proper order I think will be to add Messrs. Ackerman as plaintiffs, as in this way any rights the defendants may have against Mr. Funck will be preserved. The costs of this application must be paid by the applicants, and I think they should be paid before Messrs. Ackerman are added, as plaintiffs' costs other than the costs of this application will be reserved.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

April 4.—Barnes, Q.C. and F. Laing, for the appellants, cited, in addition to the cases cited in the court below,

Onslow v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 211; 25 Q. B. Div. 465:
Ex parte Chinery, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 342: 12 Q. B. Div. 342; and Salaman v. Warner, (1891) 1 Q. B. 734.

Finlay, Q.C. and Dr. Stubbs, for the respondents, were not called upon.

April 5.—Lord Esher, M.R.—The question as a matter of law turns upon Order XVI., rr. 2 and 11. The rule which applies to the case is rule 2, but it is necessary to carry into rule 2 the requisites of rule 11. It is obvious that there might be a wrong plaintiff on the record; e.g., if Funck was the indorsee of bills of lading, indorsed to him that he might act for the goods owner, he was agent for the owner. The real owner was still the real plaintiff, although the name of his agent was put upon the record. It is said that Funck's name was put on without his authority. These actions are really fought by underwriters. I will assume that the wrong name was put on the record. It was not fraudulent. It was not done with any motive. It was a mistake. The rule says that, if the wrong plaintiff was put on, the court might put on the right one. The application was within the very words of the rules. But it is said this cannot be done after the decree fixing the liability. That argument is opposed to the very words of the rule, which are "at any stage." The decree fixing the liability in the Admiralty Court is not a final judgment. The proceedings are not over. If there were no other judgment to be signed the proceedings are not over, for the assessment of damages has to be sent to the registrar and merchants. I take it that there would be if necessary another decree after the registrar and merchants have found what the amount of damages ought to be. If there was any difficulty about it, that would be drawn up in the final order, and then there would be a monition. If the practice in the Admiralty Court is now altered by the issue of writs of fieri facias, such alteration makes my view all the stronger. It is then said that there is no consent in writing on the part of the right plaintiff. It is no doubt necessary that his consent in writing should be got. It shall be got. The result is, that the order must stand with the variation that the plaintiff's consent in writing is to be obtained within six weeks. The appellants will have to pay the costs of the appeal.

FRY, L.J.—The words of Order XVI., rr. 2 and 11, are quite ample to justify and require the amendment. I base my decision upon the words "at any stage of the proceedings." It has been argued that the rules do not apply after final judgment. In my opinion, they apply as long as anything remains to be done in the case. In this case there remains the assessment of damages. Here the name of a person has been improperly but bonâ fide joined as plaintiff, and the names of other persons are necessary to settle the questions at issue. It is in this case the duty of the court to substitute the names of the right plaintiffs.

LOPES, L.J.—The case is well within the rule.

Solicitors for the appellants, Gellatly and Warton.

Solicitors for the respondents, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Monday, March 27, 1893.

(Before LINDLEY, KAY, and SMITH, L.JJ.)

THE SHIP CRESCENT; THE GREAT NORTHERN STEAMSHIP FISHING COMPANY LIMITED v. OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP CRESCENT. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Practice—Appeal from County Court—No note of proceedings in County Court—Order for examination of witnesses before Admiralty Divisional Court—Jurisdiction—Collision—Rules of Supreme Court 1883, Order LIX., r. 8.

Where an appeal is brought from a County Court, and no note of the evidence or proceedings in that court has been taken, a Divisional Court has jurisdiction to order that the witnesses of both parties called and examined in the County Court be produced and examined at the hearing of the appeal, care being taken to prevent the appeal assuming the form of a new trial.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Jeune and Barnes, JJ.) affirmed.

AN action was brought in the City of London Court by the Great Northern Steamship Fishing Company Limited, against the owners of the steam-tug Crescent, to recover the sum of 100*l.* and costs for damages caused by collision between the Crescent and a ship belonging to the plaintiffs.

The case was tried by Mr. Commissioner Kerr on the 1st March 1893.

Neither party took any note of the evidence given at the trial, or of what occurred there. The judge was not requested to take any note, and he did not take any. He found for the plaintiffs.

The defendants gave notice of appeal, and moved before the Divisional Court, under rule 8 of Order LIX., for an order that, upon the hearing of the appeal, the witnesses called and examined at the trial of the action in the court below, both by the plaintiffs and the defendants, might be examined vivâ voce before the Divisional Court, upon the ground that the learned judge in the court below had taken no notes of the evidence, and that otherwise the appellants would be deprived of their right to appeal.

Order LIX., rule 8, provides that, on any motion by way of appeal from an inferior court, the court to which any such appeal may be brought shall have power, if the notes of the judge of such inferior court are not produced, to hear and determine such appeal upon any other evidence or statement of what occurred before such judge as the court may deem sufficient.

The Divisional Court (Jeune and Barnes, JJ.), on the 6th March 1893, decided that the appeal ought to be heard, and ordered that the witnesses of both parties called and examined in the court below be produced and examined at the hearing of the appeal.

The plaintiffs now appealed against that order.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Butler Aspinall with him) for the appellants.—Rule 8 of Order LIX. of the Rules of Court 1883 empowers the court to which any appeal from an inferior court may be brought, if the notes of the judge of such inferior court are not produced, to hear and determine such appeal upon any other evidence or statement of what occurred before such judge which the court may deem sufficient. But that rule does not empower the court to make such an order as has been made by the Divisional Court in the present case. If that is carried out, there will be practically a new trial, not an appeal. An appeal to, not a new trial by, the Divisional Court is the proper remedy for a person dissatisfied with the decision of a County Court. A party has a right to appeal from a final judgment of a County Court judge in an Admiralty action under sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888:

The Eden, 66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 387; (1892) P. 67; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 174.

Under that section a note of what took place at the trial in the County Court made or authenticated by the judge is a condition precedent to any appeal from his decision being heard:

(a) Reported by E. A. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cook v. Gordon, 61 L. J. 445, Q. B.

Such an order as this ought not at any rate to be made except under special circumstances:

The Busy Bee, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 293; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 527.

He referred also to

The Confidence, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 79; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 201.

F. R. Laing, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think we can go to the length of discharging this order. It is a somewhat unusual one. [His Lordship read it and continued:] The action was brought in the City of London Court. The matter not being a very important one as regards the amount of money involved, no one took any note of what was said by the witnesses, or of what took place at the trial. The learned commissioner, as is known, is so overburdened by his work that he is unable to take notes of the evidence. It is unfortunate that there are no means of having notes taken of what takes place in the court, but perhaps there may be hereafter. In the meantime matters are at a deadlock. The decision was against the defendants. They have a right to appeal. But there are no materials upon which the Divisional Court can hear the appeal. The defendants accordingly applied to that court to make an order, under Order LIX., r. 8, of the rules of court for the examination before them of the witnesses examined at the trial of the action in the court below. The court had power to make such an order, and has, in the exercise of its discretion, made the order which I have read. Can we say that it is wrong? I think that the defendants are not entitled under the rule to have a new trial, but only to have the evidence given in the court below reproduced. I admit that there may be some difficulty in preventing fresh evidence being given, and the appeal so becoming practically a new trial, but the Divisional Court must be trusted to deal with that as they think best. I cannot say that the Divisional Court was wrong in making the order in question, and I think we should be doing more harm than good if we were to reverse their decision. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Rule 8 of Order LIX. does not authorise a new trial, but, there being nothing in the present case to show the Divisional Court what took place in the City of London Court, it has power to hear the appeal upon any evidence of what occurred in the court below which it thinks fit. What evidence can be obtained except by calling the witnesses and asking them what evidence they gave at the trial? There is, I admit, a great difficulty in drawing a distinction between that and a new trial, but this court has not to deal with that. I cannot say that it was not within the jurisdiction of the Divisional Court under the rule to make the order in question if there are no other means of finding out what took place at the trial. They may say that they will have the witnesses before them and ask them to repeat all that they said. That is within the very letter of the rule, but means of ascertaining the evidence must be used in such a way, if possible, as to prevent the appeal taking the form of a new trial; but we must leave the Divisional Court to deal with that. All that we say now is that the Divisional Court was not going beyond its jurisdiction in making the order appealed from.

SMITH, L.J.—I quite agree. I only add that this case does not either agree or disagree with Cook v. Gordon (ubi sup.), which was a case under sect 120 of the County Courts Act 1888. If that case ever comes up again for discussion the court which has to deal with it will not, in my opinion, be fettered by anything which has happened to-day.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Lowless and Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, J. A. and H. E. Farnfield.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Nov. 17 and 18, 1892.

(Before Lord COLERIDGE, C.J. and WILLS, J.)

FELLOWS AND OTHERS v. THE OWNERS OF THE VESSEL LORD STANLEY. (a)

Court of Passage of the City of Liverpool—Jurisdiction—Admiralty—Action in rem—Rules of Court—Power to make rule in nature of Order XIV.—Ultra vires—Prohibition.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 10, 13, 23, 25, 35—The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), ss. 1, 6.

An action in rem being brought in the Court of Passage in the City of Liverpool Admiralty Division to recover a sum of money as wages due to seamen, the plaintiffs took out a summons in the above court calling upon the defendants to show cause why they (the plaintiffs) should not sign final judgment for the amount claimed and costs. The deputy registrar made a decree that the defendants should pay 22*l.* 6*s.* 10*d. and costs, under an "order" made by the assessor or judge of the said court on the* 10*th Feb.* 1882. This "order" purported to apply a procedure similar to that under Order XIV. to Admiralty actions in rem or in personam, brought in the Court of Passage to recover a debt or liquidated demand in money, and to enable a plaintiff, on showing that there was no defence to the action, to enter up judgment or decree for the amount indorsed on the writ, together with interest (if any) and costs. No affidavit of merits was put in by the defendants, but they objected to the jurisdiction of the Court of Passage to make the aforesaid "order."

Held, on an application by the defendants for a writ of prohibition, that the "order" made by the assessor or judge of the Court of Passage was ultra vires, neither the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 nor the Amendment Act of 1869 giving such power, and that therefore the registrar had no jurisdiction to make the decree.

APPEAL from Chambers.

This was an application for a writ of prohibition to the judge of the Court of Passage at Liverpool. In this case an action in rem was brought in the Admiralty Division of the Passage Court of Liverpool.

(a) Reported by T. R. BRIDGWATER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The claim indorsed by the plaintiffs on the writ was a sum of money alleged to be due to them as wages for services rendered on the vessel Lord Stanley, to the owners of the vessel for wages in lieu of notice and for commission and ten days double pay, under sect. 187 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

The mortgagee in possession of the vessel intervened to defend the action.

An appearance on behalf of the defendants was duly entered.

A summons was then issued out of the Court of Passage calling upon the defendants to show cause why the plaintiffs should not be at liberty to sign final judgment in the action against the defendants.

At the hearing of the summons before the deputy registrar the only evidence produced was the affidavit of the plaintiffs' solicitor.

No affidavit of merits was put in on behalf of the defendants, but objection was taken to the jurisdiction of the Court of Passage to make a summary order or decree for final judgment without trial. The deputy registrar, however, overruled the objection, claiming the right of the court to make the said decree by virtue of the order of the 10th Feb. 1882 made by the assessor of the Court of Passage, and accordingly made an order giving the plaintiffs leave to sign judgment for the full amount claimed and costs.

The defendants thereupon appealed to Barnes, J., the Vacation Judge in chambers, who upheld the decree. From his decision they appealed to this court.

The following is the order made by the assessor of the Passage Court.

General orders for further regulating and amending the practice and procedure of the Court of Passage of the City of Liverpool, made and signed the 10th Feb. 1892 by T. H. Baylis, the assessor and presiding judge.

Order No. II. provides that

Whereas it is desirable in Admiralty actions brought in the said Court of Passage to recover a debt or liquidated demand in money upon a contract express or implied (as, for instance, for wages, necessaries, or towage), or to recover damages or unliquidated claims (as, for instance, for wrongful dismissal), or partly the one and partly the other, and the writ of summons has been specially indorsed with the particulars of the amounts sought to be recovered after giving credit for any payment or set-off, and default has been made in entering an appearance in such actions within the time prescribed by the orders or rules in such cases, that the plaintiff should be at liberty to proceed at once to judgment, decree, and execution. I do hereby order that the registrar of the said court shall, and may proceed to hear and determine the said actions, and assess the damages in the case of unliquidated claims, and make such orders, rules, and decrees therein as to him shall seem fit in the same manner, and as fully as the assessor or other presiding judge of the said court could, or might, or can, or may do.

And whereas it is desirable in Admiralty actions in rem or in personam—both or either—brought in the said Court of Passage to recover a debt or liquidated demand in money, with or without interest arising upon a contract express or implied (as, for instance, for wages, necessaries, towage, or payment of a liquidated amount of money), and the writ of summons has been specially indorsed with the particulars of the amount sought to be recovered, after giving credit for any payment or set-off, that the plaintiff shall be at liberty where the defendant appears to a writ of summons so indorsed, or where a third person, by leave of the court, intervenes in any such action, to apply for leave to enter up judgment or decree, and to issue execution thereupon as hereinafter mentioned. I do order that when an appearance has been entered to a writ of summons so specially indorsed as aforesaid, the plaintiff may, on affidavit made by himself or by any other person who can swear positively to the debt or cause of action, verifying the cause of action, and stating in his belief that there is no defence to the action, call on the defendant, or such third person, to show cause before the assessor or registrar why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to enter up judgment or decree for the amount so indorsed, together with interest, if any, and costs. A copy of the affidavit shall accompany the summons or notice of motion. The assessor or registrar may thereupon, unless the defendant or such third person as aforesaid, by affidavit or otherwise, satisfy the assessor or registrar that he has a good defence to the action on the merits, or disclose such facts as may be deemed sufficient to entitle him to defend, make an order empowering the plaintiff to enter up judgment or decree accordingly, and to proceed to execution thereupon, as in ordinary cases in Admiralty actions in the said court.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) enacts as follows:

Sect. 10. In an Admiralty cause in a County Court the cause shall be heard and determined in like manner as ordinary civil causes are now heard and determined in County Courts; save and except that in any Admiralty cause of salvage, towage, or collision, the County Court judge shall, if he thinks fit, or on the request of either party to such cause, be assisted by two nautical assessors in the same way as the judge of the High Court of Admiralty is now assisted by nautical assessors.

Sect. 13. The judge of every County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall hear and determine Admiralty causes at the usual courts held within his jurisdiction, or at special courts to be held by him, and which he is hereby required to hold as soon as may be after he shall have had notice of an Admiralty cause having arisen within the jurisdiction of his court.

Sect. 23. For the execution of any decree or order of a County Court in an Admiralty cause the court may order, and the registrar on such order may seal and issue, and any officer of any County Court may execute, process according to general orders. . . .

Sect. 25. The Court of Passage of the borough of Liverpool shall, upon an order in council being made which shall appoint the County Court of Lancashire, holden at Liverpool, to have Admiralty jurisdiction, have the like jurisdiction, powers, and authorities as by that order are conferred on the said County Court; but nothing herein shall be deemed to enlarge the area over which the jurisdiction of the Court of Passage extends, or to alter the rules and regulations for holding the said court, or to take away or restrict any jurisdiction, power, or authority already vested in that court; and fees received in that court under this Act shall be dealt with as fees received in that court under its ordinary jurisdiction.

Sect. 35. General orders shall be from time to time made under this Act for the purposes in this Act directed, and for regulating the practice and procedure of the Admiralty jurisdiction of the County Courts, the forms and processes and proceedings therein or issuing therefrom, and the days and places of sittings for Admiralty causes, the duties of the judges and officers thereof, and the fees to be taken therein.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) enacts as follows:

Sect. 1. This Act may be cited as "The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869," and shall be read and interpreted as one Act with "The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868."

Sect. 6. The assessor of the Court of Passage of the borough of Liverpool shall have power from time to time to make general rules and orders for regulating the practice and procedure of the Admiralty and Maritime jurisdiction in the said court, and for other purposes mentioned in section thirty-five of "The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868," and any general rules and orders already made, or hereafter to be made, by the said assessor for any of the purposes aforesaid, shall be of full force and effect as if the same had been made under this or the aforesaid Act.

J. D. Crawford in support of the application for a writ of prohibition.—Before 1868 the Court of Passage had no Admiralty jurisdiction, but was only a court of record for the trial of civil actions:

4 & 5 Will. 4, c. xcii.;
16 & 17 Vict. c. cxxxi., s. 52.

By the Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 25, the Court of Passage has the same powers, authorities, and jurisdiction as is conferred on the Liverpool County Court in Admiralty under that Act (vide Order in Council, Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice, 2nd ed., p. 817). Sect. 10 provides that an Admiralty cause is to be tried in the like manner as a civil cause. Sect. 13 provides that Admiralty causes shall be heard and determined by the judge. It is submitted that the effect of these provisions is that Admiralty cases are to be heard in the ordinary way, that is in open court by the judge on evidence taken. The assessor's order, if upheld, would actually repeal these sections. There is no power to do this given to the assessor by the Order in Council. Sect. 6 of the Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) does not give the power to make the order upon which the decree was made. This section gives the assessor power to make rules and orders regulating the practice and procedure of the Court of Passage. But this section only gives the assessor the same power to make rules and orders for his Court in Admiralty that is given to the County Courts by sect. 35 of the Act of 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. 71), the reason of this being that no power nominatim had been given by the Act of 1868 to the assessor to make rules and orders. The intention was to deal with the Court of Passage and the County Courts in Admiralty on the same lines (see sect. 25 of the Act of 1868):

The Ganges, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 12; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 317; 5 P. Div. 247.

The Acts of 1868 and 1869 are to be read and interpreted as one Act (32 & 33 Vict. c 51, s. 1). This further shows that sect. 6 gives the same power with regard to the Court of Passage as sect. 35 with regard to the County Courts. It incorporates sects. 10, 13, and 23, and shows that no such rule or order is to be inconsistent with them. This order in effect repeals them. There is no such procedure as Order XIV. in the County Court, therefore the Court of Passage, which is for the purposes of Admiralty the same as a County Court, can have no such jurisdiction as exists under Order XIV., which only applies to the Queen's Bench. It is a new jurisdiction having the force of a statute. It has no application to an action in rem in Admiralty with the wide powers of arrest and sale of the ship and the intervention of a third party who is not named in the writ. This rule applying Order XIV. to the Passage Court is ultra vires. It is true that the assessor of that court has power to make rules regulating practice and procedure, but he cannot create a new jurisdiction:

Spears v. Daggars, 1 Cababé & Ellis, 503.

Order XIV. gives important judicial powers against the abuse of which large powers of appeal are given. This Order, however, gives large judicial powers with practically no right of appeal.

Dr. Commins appeared on behalf of the plaintiffs against the writ.—The order appealed from is good and within the powers of the assessor to make. This is a mere matter of procedure or practice and not of jurisdiction, and therefore the writ should be refused.

Pickford (J. Walton, Q.C. and W. F. Taylor with him) appeared on behalf of the mayor and corporation of Liverpool. This writ of prohibition should be refused. The order made by the assessor is a good one and within his jurisdiction. The power given to the judge of the Passage Court to make rules is identical with that given to the judges of the High Court who have delegated in certain cases their jurisdiction to the masters of the court, and this is just what the judge of the Passage Court has done by this order; he has delegated his jurisdiction to the registrar and deputy-registrar. The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts have given power to the judge to make rules as to "procedure" which is a more comprehensive word than "practice," and would cover such a rule as the one in dispute. [Lord Coleridge, C.J.—Is jurisdiction included in the word procedure?] The word is used in that sense by the judges of the High Court in their new rules—for example, in Order XIV., where the power of dealing summarily is extended and applied to a new class of actions. The rules thus delegate in certain cases jurisdiction to the masters. The power to proceed summarily is a "procedure;' such power is given by the Common Law Procedure Acts: (see sect. 223 of the Act of 1852.) In the Passage Court there is such power in Admiralty cases. In these cases there is an appeal to the Admiralty Division of the High Court. There is no right to a trial by jury in the Admiralty Court where trials are by a judge with or without assessors:

Re Mills, 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 465; 34 Ch. Div., p. 24; dictum of Fry, L.J. at p. 41;
Ind, Coope, and Co. v. Emmerson, 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 778; 12 App. Cas. 300; see dictum of Lord Watson, p. 309.

This rule is good and ought to be upheld.

J. D. Crawford in reply.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—This is undoubtedly an important case, and the learned counsel, who have appeared in it, have argued it extremely well, and have said everything which could possibly help us in coming to a conclusion. Now, this is an application for a writ of prohibition, and the question is, whether the learned judge of the Passage Court of Liverpool had power to make a rule under which in effect, to put it shortly, Order XIV. has been applied to the practice of the Passage Court. The question is, had he such a power, or had he not such a power? Now, the argument that he had such a power depends on the consideration of a variety of statutes, and upon the construction which has been put upon them by successive members of the Rule Committee of the High Court, and of the successive acts of the Rule Committee dealing with questions of practice and procedure, and I think it would be vain after the argument of Mr. Pickford to say that the subject-matter of this rule is not covered by the word "procedure." Order

XIV. and the dealings with Order XIV. under the various rules which have been brought into force by the Judicature Act, is an order dealing with old established forms and procedures, and with subject-matters which were thoroughly familiar to all those concerned in the matter who were dealing with the subject. It appears to me in this case that I am confined to two Acts of Parliament. I think the argument is a short and clear one, and I am unable myself to see any answer to it. I am aware it has been said that Qui hæret in literâ, hæret in cortice. Nevertheless, I cannot but think that, in a recent Act of Parliament dealing with a very limited subject-matter, it is better to stick to the letter. Now, the two Acts of Parliament which we have here to construe are the Act of 1868 and the Act of 1869 which deal with the question of the Admiralty jurisdiction conferred upon County Courts, and the question of bringing the Court of Passage of Liverpool under those enactments. By the latter statute it is expressly enacted that the two Acts shall be read and interpreted as one, and therefore the sections of the latter Act are to be read as if they were sections of the former Act. Therefore you have to deal with those Acts as if they were one Act laying down general principles of procedure in the earlier part, and in the later part bringing a particular court within those principles and rules of procedure. Now, the earlier Act of 1868 enacts, in the sections to which we have been referred, very clearly that in an Admiralty case in a County Court, and by the express words of the section itself it means in the Passage Court, the case shall be heard and determined in like manner as ordinary civil cases are now heard and determined in County Courts, save and except in certain exceptions that are not material here to be considered. The 13th section says: "The judge"—and I read in the words 'of the Passage Court' there because I am told by the Act of Parliament to do so — the judge of the Passage Court shall hear and determine Admiralty cases at the usual courts held within his jurisdiction, or at special courts to be held by him in a way not material now to discuss. There are two enactments there then: first, that the judge of the Passage Court shall hear and determine Admiralty cases as civil cases are determined in the County Court; and then that he, the judge, and no one but the judge, shall hear and determine Admiralty cases in a particular way. Those are sects. 10 and 13 of what I may call the composite or consolidated Act. Then sect. 35 of the same Act says: "General orders shall be from time to time made under this Act for the purposes in this Act directed, and for regulating the practice and procedure of the Admiralty jurisdiction," and that they shall be made in a particular way. Now, reading the two Acts together, they say that rules for the purposes of the Passage Court shall be made from time to time directing the procedure of the Passage Court in a particular way. That is the general law enacting for the first time, and by statute, that a certain jurisdiction shall be given to a particular court, and that that particular court shall exercise it by the judge of the court subject to certain rules. Now, therefore, this statute, because I only propose to count it as one statute, inasmuch as the two are to be read and construed as one Act, goes on to say this: "The assessor of the Court of Passage of the borough of Liverpool shall have power from time to time to make general rules and orders for regulating the practice and procedure of the Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in the said court," and for other purposes mentioned there. Now, supposing that this had been in form one Act, and supposing that there had been a schedule to the Act, which is perhaps as good a way of trying it as any other, and it had been said, "this Act shall apply to the courts or the County Courts mentioned in the schedule," and the schedule had mentioned all the County Courts in England, and amongst others, the Passage Court of Liverpool, could it be reasonably doubted that the power of the judge of the Passage Court of Liverpool to make rules was the same, neither more nor less than the power of the County Court judges who are classed with it? If so, could it be contended for one moment that the jurisdiction of the statute having been entrusted for the first time to a particular set of courts, of which the court in question is one, that those courts had all of them the power of altering their jurisdiction, changing the Act of Parliament and proceeding in—I do not wish to say "defiance" in any offensive sense—but proceeding without the slightest regard to the definite, deliberate, and clear enactments of the statutes themselves? I think it could not, and I do not think anybody would argue that it could. It is said that there is a difference, because in the later statute the assessor is given a power apparently without the sanction of the Lord Chancellor and without the form given in the earlier Act, and that it would seem that the assessor has a power in the Passage Court of Liverpool which a County Court judge has not in himself. I am not prepared to say that may not be the case. It may be so. It may be that within the limits of the Act the judge of the Passage Court can proceed in a way in which no other County Court judge can. It does not seem to me to signify, and I am not prepared to say that might not be so. But the question is whether, putting the two together, a power which it would be impossible to argue under the words of the earlier Act to have been given to all the County Court judges is, under the words of the later Act, reserved to one judge only. This is one Act giving for the first time a statutory jurisdiction, and ordering in plain terms that statutory jurisdiction to be exercised in a particular way, and I think it would violate all principles of justice to suppose that it gave power in that very Act to repeal those sections, and to enable the judge for the first time empowered under the Act of Parliament to exercise jurisdiction in a particular way, to exercise it in a totally different way, and in a way altogether substantially and gravely different from the mode in which the jurisdiction in the earlier Act is directed to be exercised. I think no such intention can exist.

Now that would probably be sufficient to decide this case, namely, that the jurisdiction for this purpose is statutory; that the judge has powers which are statutory powers; that he is to exercise them according to the statute, and that there is in this Act of Parliament nothing to show that he has power to repeal the very Act of Parliament which confers the jurisdiction upon him, and to exercise that jurisdiction which he gets only by Act of Parliament, in a way totally contrary to the enactments of the Act of Parliament itself. But I cannot help observing that when one looks at the moral reasoning of the section, one's conclusions are considerably strengthened, because, as has been well pointed out, if this power exists in the judge of the Passage Court it exists in a way and to an extent without the limitations which have been thought necessary to the exercise of the powers in every other case. No other County Court has got it. No set of rules framed by the County Court judges contain this power. It is not suggested that any Act of Parliament has given it to any other County Court; and further than that, in cases in the Superior Courts where one would have thought they might have trusted it if at all, the power to apply Order XIV. has been limited by a variety of safeguards which do not exist in this Act. Parliament has to be invoked; the rules have to be laid upon the tables of both Houses, and if either of the Houses of Parliament think fit it can, by disapproval, stop the operation of the rules from the moment of its disapproval. But there is no such provision here with regard to the judge of the Passage Court. I have come to this conclusion without difficulty. It is no doubt an important case, but I am of opinion that this prohibition should go.

Wills, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have very little to add to what has been already said by the Lord Chief Justice. It seems to me that Mr. Pickford is right in saying that as far as the expression "practice and procedure" is concerned, it is sufficient to cover, at all events, one part of the subject-matter of this rule, namely, the application of what is commonly called Order XIV. Whether it is sufficient to cover the other part, namely, the transference of jurisdiction from the judge of the Passage Court to the registrar, may be more open to question, I think, because it does not seem to me that the relative positions of the judge of the Passage Court and the registrar of the Passage Court are at all analogous to the relations which subsist between the judges of the High Court and the masters. As I had occasion to point out when I dealt with a similar case (Spear v. Daggars, 1 Cababé & Ellis, 503), the judge of the Passage Court occupies a somewhat anomalous position. He is not really a judge of that court in the same sense that a judge of the High Court is judge of the High Court, able to exercise all the jurisdiction which may be exercised within powers of that kind, because he is only a statutory assessor who has the right to preside at trials, and to give judgment there. There is no such relation between him and the registrar as exists between judges and masters. There is no appeal from the deputy registrar or the registrar to him, and he really exercises certain statutory jurisdiction at the public sittings of the court, and no more. I do not think he has any jurisdiction, for instance, to entertain the interlocutory proceedings which take place before a trial comes to a hearing. Therefore the analogy between the transference of certain powers as a matter of procedure from the judges to the masters is a very incomplete one. I only point this out because I do not think it necessary to decide that question, and I only point it out because it should not be lost sight of, and if the question ever should arise again in any analogous case, I should desire to very seriously consider the question of whether such a transference as has been effected by this order of the powers of the assessor to the registrar does come properly within the expression "procedure" when applied to such an exceptional court and such an exceptional state of things as exists with regard to the Passage Court. But, as I say, I do not think it necessary to decide that, because it seems to me that the answer to Mr. Pickford's argument is what the Lord Chief Justice has pointed out, namely, that in sect. 10, sect. 13, and sect. 23 of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, the jurisdiction to deal with Admiralty matters is in terms cast upon the judge, and in sect. 23 there is the very significant fact that the processes are to be made by the registrar after an order of the judge. I think that this rule which the learned assessor has made here amounts to a repeal of part of the Act of Parliament under which, and for the purposes of which Act, the rule was made. The power to make rules is confined to making rules under the Act, and I think a rule which repeals so important a part of the Act of Parliament as I have indicated, and takes away the jurisdiction of the assessor and casts it upon the registrar is a repeal pro tanto of the Acts of 1868 and 1869. I therefore come, without hesitation on this part of the case, whatever hesitation I may have had upon the earlier parts of the case which were discussed at so much length, to the same conclusion which has been already arrived at by the Lord Chief Justice, and I think this prohibition must go.

Solicitors: for the appellants, Pritchard, Englefield, and Co., agents for Miller and Williamson, Liverpool; for the respondents, Venn, agent for W. A. Tetlow, Liverpool; for the Mayor and Corporation of Liverpool, Venn, agent for G. J. Atkinson, Town Clerk of Liverpool.

Tuesday, Jan. 17, 1893.

(Before Day and Collins, JJ.)

The Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company Limited v. Pitts, Son, and King. (a)

Insurance—Marine—Policy—Warranty—Average—Stranding of ship—At time of stranding goods in lighter—Construction of valued policy—Inclusion of advanced freight as part of value of goods.

The defendants insured with the plaintiffs and other insurers a cargo of maize from San Nicolas and from Buenos Ayres to a port in Europe; the subject-matter of the insurance was described in the policy to be "26,910 bags of maize from San Nicolas, 6065l. at 1 per cent.; 8299 bags of maize from Buenos Ayres, 1875l. at seven-eighths per cent." The policy contained a further statement that by agreement the goods were valued at "7940l. (included 1361l. 6s. 6d. advance on freight)." The policy covered all risk in craft, and contained a warranty against particular average, unless the ship or craft should be stranded.

The 26,910 bags were shipped at San Nicolas, but while on her way down the river to Buenos Ayres the ship stranded; at that time the 8299 bags were in lighters in Buenos Ayres roads awaiting her arrival. Ultimately the ship was got off and proceeded to Buenos Ayres, where she was surveyed and found to be seaworthy, the cargo from San Nicolas (which had been taken out) was reshipped, the 8299 bags waiting in the lighter in Buenos Ayres roads were put on board, and the ship proceeded on her voyage to Europe, in the course of which a large part of the cargo was damaged by water owing to the perils of the sea. It was admitted that a claim for particular average in consequence of the stranding arose in respect of the bags shipped at San Nicolas, but the defendants claimed (1) to be entitled to recover also upon the bags shipped at Buenos Ayres; they further contended (2) that the loss should be calculated upon the full 7940l. without any deduction in respect of advanced freight. In the average statement the first contention of the defendants was adopted, but not the second. The plaintiffs having sued to recover money alleged to have been overpaid by them:

(a) Reported by T. R. Bridgwater, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, first, that, as at the time of the stranding of the ship the 8299 bags were only at risk in the craft, and not at risk in the ship, the warranty attached, and the defendants were not entitled to recover a particular average loss in respect of such bags; secondly, that the policy was to be treated as one policy upon valued goods, and not as a policy by which advanced freight was separately insured, and that therefore the particular average loss should be calculated upon the full amount of 7940l.

THIS was a special case stated under Order XXXIV., r. 1, which provides that "the parties to any cause or matter may concur in stating the questions of law arising therein in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court."

The following therefore are the facts which appeared from the special case:—

1. The action was brought to recover money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs.

2. By a policy of insurance dated Sept. 17, 1890, the defendants insured with the plaintiffs and other insurers certain maize valued at 7940*l.* by the s.s. Craighton for a voyage at and from San Nicolas and Buenos Ayres to St. Vincent, for orders to a port of the United Kingdom or Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both inclusive. The subject-matter of the insurance was described in the policy to be

> 26,910 bags of maize from San Nicolas, 6065*l.*, 1 per cent.;
> 8299 bags of maize from Buenos Ayres, 1875*l.*, ⅞ per cent.;

and it was stated that the goods were by agreement to be valued at > 7940*l.* (included 1361*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* for advance on freight).

The policy included all risks of steam navigation and in craft or transhipments, or while waiting transit, and it contained a warranty that the risk should be free from particular average, unless the ship or craft should be stranded, sunk, or burnt, or in collision, the collision to be of such a nature as might be reasonably supposed to have caused the damage.

3. The s.s. Craighton had on April 2, 1890, been chartered to load a cargo of wheat and (or) maize in bags, but not exceeding 2550 (10 per cent. more or less) tons English, to be loaded in the river Parana at not more than two safe loading ports or places to be named by the charterers, not higher than Rosario, all of the cargo with the exception of 550 tons, which were to be shipped in Buenos Ayres roads. The freight was to be at the rate of 30*s.* for cargo loaded up river, and 22*s.* for cargo loaded at Buenos Ayres, all per ton of 2240lb. gross weight delivered of maize, and was to be paid as follows: viz. sufficient cash for the ship's use at ports of loading (if required by the master), to be supplied on account of freight at current rate of exchange, subject to 5 per cent. to cover insurances, and other charges, and the balance of freight, on the right and true delivery of the cargo, in cash.

4. The charterers shipped on board the s.s. Craighton at San Nicolas, in the river Plate, 26,910 bags of maize under the charter-party, and she sailed therewith from the said port towards Buenos Ayres on July 20, 1890.

5. On July 21, 1890, the s.s. Craighton, while proceeding down the river, stranded under circumstances shown in the average statement; about 800 tons of the cargo were discharged into lighters, and on Aug. 2, at 6 a.m., she floated, and proceeded at 7.45 a.m. to Buenos Ayres, arriving in Buenos Ayres roads at 11 a.m. on the same day. Owing to the stranding and to the consequent discharge into lighters, a portion of the cargo was lost, and other portions thereof became wetted and damaged. At the time of the stranding 8299 bags of maize, which were afterwards put on board in Buenos Ayres roads, were in lighters lying in the roads awaiting the s.s. Craighton.

6. At Buenos Ayres the s.s. Craighton was surveyed, and was found to be seaworthy to continue her voyage. The 800 tons of maize which had been discharged into lighters, and the said 8299 bags of maize awaiting in lighters, were then shipped on board her together in Buenos Ayres roads, no distinction or separation being made in taking on board and stowing the separate lots. There were no distinguishing marks on any of the bags comprising the cargo, and the bags and their contents were all similar to one another. Bills of lading for 26,910 bags, 7259 bags, and 1040 bags were signed by the master, dated Buenos Ayres, Aug. 9, 1890. The bills of lading, together with the policy, were assigned by the charterers to the defendants, who became the purchasers of the cargo.

7. The Craighton left Buenos Ayres on Aug. 13, 1890, and during the voyage from Buenos Ayres to the United Kingdom a considerable portion of the cargo was lost, and a large part of the remainder was damaged by water owing to the perils of the seas.

8. The Craighton eventually arrived at Plymouth on Sept. 22, and a claim was made upon the plaintiffs and other underwriters under the policy for a payment on account of the said losses and damage.

9. On Dec. 16, 1890, the plaintiffs, on account of any claim which the defendants might be able to establish under the policy in respect of the damage but without prejudice, paid to the defendants the sum of 250*l.* A memorandum of the payment of the said amount was indorsed on the policy.

10. Average statements, dated June 2, 1891, and Sept. 25, 1891 (which were attached to, and formed part of the case), were prepared, from which it appeared, and it was admitted in the case, that there had been a particular average loss on the whole of the maize, and that (subject to the defendants' contention thereinafter mentioned), if the defendants were entitled to claim under the policy for a particular average loss on the whole cargo, including the 8299 bags shipped at Buenos Ayres, as well as that shipped at San Nicolas, the plaintiffs were liable under the said policy to pay the defendants the sum of 269*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.*, shown in the statement of June 2, 1891, but if the defendants were entitled to claim for a particular average loss only on the portion of the cargo shipped at San Nicolas, and not on the 8299 bags shipped at Buenos Ayres, the plaintiffs were liable to pay to the defendants the sum of 217*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* only, as shown in the statement of Sept. 25, 1891.

11. The plaintiffs' claim in the action was for 32*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.*, being the difference between the sum of 250*l.* paid to the defendants by the plaintiff, and the said sum of 217*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* together with interest at 5 per cent. from Dec. 16, 1890.

12. The plaintiffs contended that the warranty "free from particular average" attached to and was in force during the voyage from Buenos Ayres to the United Kingdom in respect of the 8299 bags of maize which were shipped at Buenos Ayres, notwithstanding that the vessel had previously stranded on the voyage from San Nicolas, and before arrival at Buenos Ayres, and that therefore the amount due from the plaintiffs to the defendants was 217*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* and no more, and they were entitled to recover back the sum of 32*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* as money received of the defendants for the use of the plaintiffs.

13. The defendants contended that, having regard to the stranding, they became entitled to claim in respect of the particular average loss on the whole cargo.

14. The defendants also contended that the average statement did not correctly show the amounts which they were entitled to claim in respect of particular average, because the amount found in the statement of June 2, 1891, was arrived at by taking the value of the cargo for the purpose of particular average at 7940*l.* less 1361*l.*, 6*s.* 6*d.* the freight advanced by the charterers at the port of loading in accordance with the charter-party, and the amount found in the statement of Sept. 25, 1891, was arrived at by allowing a proportion of the particular average so ascertained in respect of the San Nicolas shipment. The defendants contended that the particular average payable under the policy should have been calculated upon the full 7940*l.* (or the proportion thereof in respect of the San Nicolas shipment) without deduction of the freight advanced.

15. The questions left for the opinion of the High Court were as follows:—(a) whether or not the defendants were entitled to claim under the circumstances for the particular average loss on the 8299 bags of maize shipped at Buenos Ayres? (b) whether in estimating the amount of the particular average loss, the amount of the freight advanced should be deducted from the valuation of the maize in the policy?

16. Should the court answer question (b) in the negative, the amount of the defendants' claim under the policy was to be re-adjusted in such manner as might be directed by the court, and judgment to be entered in accordance with the result of such re-adjustment.

17. Should the court answer question (b) in the affirmative, judgment was to be entered for the plaintiffs for 32*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.*, or for the defendants for 19*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.*, according as the court should answer question (a) in the negative or in the affirmative.

18. In any case interest at 5 per cent was to be allowed on the amount of the judgment from Dec. 16, 1890, and costs to abide the event.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Hurst with him) for the plaintiffs.—As regards the first question, whether or not the defendants were entitled to claim under the circumstances for the particular average loss on the 8299 bags of maize shipped at Buenos Ayres, we say that the underwriters are not liable in respect of goods which were not on board when the stranding took place. A claim for particular average on these goods is not let in by the stranding independently of the clause covering risk of craft. It was decided, in the case of Burnett v. Kensington (7 T. Rep. 210), that a particular average loss need not necessarily be connected with the stranding, but the goods must be on board the ship at the time she stranded. The clause covering risk of craft was introduced in consequence of the decision in the case of Hoffman v. Marshall (2 Bing. N. C. 383), in which case it was held that a policy on goods in ship did not cover them while in craft for purposes of loading or discharge. That clause only makes this difference, that it covers the stranding of the craft in which the goods are at risk. To let in a claim for particular average, the goods must not only be at risk under the policy, but they must also be at risk in the actual ship or craft that is stranded, and at the time that the stranding takes place. In the present case there were in fact two separate voyages: one from San Nicolas to Europe; and the other from Buenos Ayres to Europe, and the insurances were on different quantities of goods at different rates of premium for the two different voyages. See the case of Biccard v. Shepherd (14 Moo. P. C. 471), where there were also two voyages and the policy covered two risks. On the earlier voyage from San Nicolas to Europe, before the commencement of the subsequent voyage from Buenos Ayres to Europe, the stranding of the Craighton had taken place, and the stranding of the vessel cannot therefore let in a claim for particular average in respect of goods which were not to be laden until the ship arrived at Buenos Ayres, and which were not at risk in the ship until then. If the mere stranding of either a ship or craft were the condition on which a claim for particular average would be let in, then, if the whole cargo were safely landed at the end of the voyage, except one single bag, and the lighter with the last bag on board were stranded, a claim for particular average in respect of the whole cargo would be let in. As to the second question, whether in estimating the amount of the particular average loss the amount of the freight advanced should be deducted from the valuation of the maize in the policy, the proper way to find this out is to ascertain the actual sound value of the goods at the port of delivery (which would include freight), and also their actual damaged value at that port; the proportion so ascertained is then applied to the value of the insured goods. This would not in an open policy include freight, but would practically be the shipping value of the goods with insurance and commission; which shows that an insurance upon goods is not intended to afford the merchant a complete indemnity, but to put him in the situation in which he was at the beginning of the risk. The same principle of computation is applied to a valued policy, but, as it is not the object of an insurance upon goods that the merchant should get an indemnity in respect of the freight, money which is expressed in the policy to be insured in respect of freight ought not to be treated as part of the value of the goods. The true meaning of this policy is, that it is one upon advanced freight which would not be recovered by an ordinary policy upon goods. Should the defendants be right, in contending that it is part of the value of the goods, there can be no possible object in putting in the words:

Lewis v. Rucker, 2 Burr. 1167.

Channell, Q.C. (Carver with him) for the defendants.—As regards the first question, the general doctrine of law is this, that if a ship be stranded the warranty against particular average is gone altogether, and the policy must be construed as though the warranty were not in it; and even though in a particular case it is proved as a fact that the damage to the goods did not arise through the stranding, yet a particular average loss in respect of them is recoverable. This doctrine is the result of a convention among underwriters in consequence of the difficulty of ascertaining in a particular case whether damage arose from the stranding or not. Only such a stranding is excluded as could not possibly have caused the damage, such as a stranding which takes place after the goods are actually landed. It cannot be said here, that the stranding cannot have caused the damage; the fact that the Craighton was certified to be seaworthy after she left Buenos Ayres is by no means conclusive, for she might have been fit for ordinary weather, and yet, by reason of the straining consequent upon the stranding, unfit afterwards to encounter the exceptional weather which she actually experienced. It was to this straining of the vessel that the surveyors attributed the large amount of damaged cargo. It is not necessary that the stranding should be the actual or proximate cause of the damage, providing that the stranding be the potential cause of the damage, and this is clearly a stranding which might have been such cause. As to the goods put on board at San Nicolas it is admitted that the shippers are quite entitled to recover for the damage caused to them during the voyage to Europe solely on account of the stranding; and yet it is contended that the shippers are not entitled to recover in respect of those goods which were shipped at Buenos Ayres, although they are insured in the same words in the same policy. As regards the second question, the advanced freight on particular goods is merely an addition to the value of the goods; it stands on the same footing as premiuns of insurance and commission, and even in the case of an open policy it might, perhaps, be contended that it was one of the expenses of the shipper at the port of shipment against which the insurance was intended to indemnify him. The shipper can of course protect himself by valuing his goods in the policy of insurance, so as to include the advance on freight. The form of the policy in this case does not amount to a separate policy. It is one policy on goods valued at an amount which includes the advanced freight:

Usher v. Noble, 12 East, 639.

Day, J.—This action was brought by the underwriters to recover back money which they had paid to the assured in respect of an alleged loss upon a policy of insurance to which I will more particularly refer. The average statement has been prepared, and according to this statement the plaintiffs claim to recover back a certain portion of the money which they paid on account of the loss. The claim may be considered, and has very properly been considered, under two heads. First of all, there is a claim in respect of a sum of money to which I need not particularly refer, because to me it has not been very clearly ascertained. We have to determine a question of principle, and the sum of money depending upon each case is immaterial for our consideration, but the first ground upon which the plaintiffs seek to recover back money from the defendants alleged to have been overpaid in respect of this policy is, that the goods, or a portion of the goods insured by this policy were not on board the ship at the time of the alleged stranding; and the second ground upon which they seek to recover back money is in respect of the terms of the insurance said to be covering an advance on freight as distinguished from value of goods. I will make more clear what I mean when I come to consider each head in detail. I will deal with them in the natural order in which Mr. Walton dealt with them in opening the case on behalf of the plaintiffs. I am in no way suggesting that the order in which Mr. Channell dealt with them afterwards was not the proper order. He very properly, in my judgment, dealt with them in inverse order from motives of convenience, which I need not now regard when dealing with the particular arguments put forward by counsel, one side and the other. What I term the first point in the question is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in respect of certain goods not having been on board the ship at the time of the stranding. Now the policy which I have before me is a policy which was entered into by the plaintiffs with the defendants in respect of maize which was to be shipped on one particular ship, and was to be conveyed from ports in Brazil to Europe. The subject-matter of the insurance was described to be 26,910 bags of maize from San Nicolas, the value is stated at 6065*l.*, and the rate of insurance is 1 per cent. It also covered 8299 bags of maize to be insured from Buenos Ayres, value 1875*l.* and the rate of insurance seven-eighths per cent. Thus we have two distinct lots of maize insured to be conveyed from different ports or shipping places of different values and at different rates of insurance.

Now, the facts of the case are exceedingly simple. On the passage down the river from San Nicolas (which lies higher up the river Plate than Buenos Ayres) to Buenos Ayres, the ship having the 26,910 bags of maize on board undoubtedly stranded. She was got off, and was taken to Buenos Ayres, where she took from lighters the 8299 bags of maize and proceeded with the whole cargo for a port in Europe. On the voyage to Europe the whole of the maize was damaged by perils of the sea, and the assured have claimed against the underwriters in respect of this particular average loss. The policy contained as usual a warranty against particular average loss with the usual exception. The exception covered the stranding of ships, "warranted free from particular average unless the ship or craft be stranded." I need not read, the rest of the warranty, or the exception—"unless the ship be stranded." Now the ship was stranded, and it is said, because she was stranded, that therefore the assured are entitled to recover in respect not merely of damage done to the 26,910 bags of maize which were undoubtedly on board of her at the time of the stranding, and which undoubtedly were at risks under this policy at the time of the stranding, but that they are also entitled to recover in respect of average loss sustained by the 8299 bags which were not on board the ship at the time of the stranding, but which were put on board the ship after she had recovered from the stranding and was examined and certified to be seaworthy and about to take her voyage to the European port. The maize at the time of the ship being stranded was lying in a craft off Buenos Ayres awaiting the arrival of the ship from San Nicolas. The maize undoubtedly was lying quite safely in the craft. It sustained no damage in the craft, nor was it in any way prejudiced by the stranding of the ship at San Nicolas. It was in no way affected by it at that time. The maize was put on board the ship when she arrived at Buenos Ayres, and had been certified to be seaworthy, and in course of the voyage to Europe it sustained injury by reason of the perils of the sea, it sustained damage by reason of sea water or otherwise. The whole of the maize was damaged, not only that which was on board the ship when she stranded, but that portion of the maize which was put on board after she had stranded at Buenos Ayres. The first question we have to determine is, whether the assured are entitled to recover in respect of the loss sustained by them on the maize which was not on board the ship between San Nicolas and Buenos Ayres, but which was put on board the ship at Buenos Ayres, having been at the time of the stranding in the craft awaiting the arrival of the ship off Buenos Ayres. Now, I have come to the conclusion that this claim is ill-founded, and that the assured have no claim against the underwriters in respect of the average loss sustained by the maize which was not on board the ship at the time of the stranding. I have carefully considered the character of this policy of insurance. No doubt it is one policy of insurance in this sense, that it is made out on one paper, you have one person assuring, and you have another person underwriting, you have one owner of the cargo, and you have one underwriter, but you have in one sense two different voyages; that is to say, in the one case you have a voyage from San Nicolas to Europe, and in the other you have a voyage from Buenos Ayres to Europe. Although, no doubt the routes to be traversed will be from Buenos Ayres to Europe precisely the same, the goods will come in the same ship, and come at the same time, but the risk insured against is a different risk. The one is a risk from San Nicolas to Europe, the other is a limited risk from Buenos Ayres to Europe alone. The maize is clear and distinct in weight, measure, and value, and the rate of premium to be paid to the underwriter upon it is different; in the one case it is one per cent.; and in the other case it is seven-eighths per cent., a different rate of insurance. It is not for me to give any opinion, or to form any opinion, as to what the contention might be by counsel on behalf of their respective clients under any particular state of circumstances; but I should hardly have expected that any argument would have been presented to us on behalf of the assured but for the words which are found in the policy, namely, that the insurance is to cover "all risks of steam navigation, and in craft or transshipment, or while waiting transit, and for any conveyance from the shippers' warehouses to those of the consignees, each craft or the total loss of any package to be considered as if separately insured." The insurance applies no doubt to the maize when in craft, and there is no doubt that under this policy, whether it is considered as one policy or whether it be considered for practical purposes as two policies, the maize was insured while in craft, and if any misfortune had occurred to the maize under the policy while in craft, recovery might have been had upon it but it does not seem to me to follow that, because it is insured whilst in craft, it is insured at the same moment while in ship. It seems to me that the two things are consecutive, the being in the craft and being in the ship. The goods are in the craft when putting them on board the ship, and they are in the craft afterwards when the ship is unloaded into craft at the port of destination, but the two ideas, to my mind, are essentially consecutive one before the other, one in craft at one time, and in ship at another, but not in craft and in ship at the same time. The goods are insured in the craft while in the craft; and they are insured in the ship while in the ship and not in the craft. To my mind, the insurance while in the craft is covered by the policy, and it is by the policy applicable to the craft, and all the incidents of the risk and all the incidents of the insurance are applicable to the craft. When the goods are in the ship, then the risks and the incidents of the policy are applicable to the goods while in the ship. My idea is, that when the ship was stranded the goods were in the craft, and the only stranding for which the underwriters would be responsible would be for stranding in the craft. In that case the warranty was not to apply. It seems to me that to read this in any other way is to put a very inconvenient and very unnecessary and to my mind, unreasonable construction upon the warranty. It seems to me that the warranty and the exception are merely incidental to the risk, and unless you have the risk you do not have the warranty, and you do not have the exception. Here, there was no risk as to this part of the cargo at the time of the ship's stranding, for it was not in the ship, and consequently no warranty applicable to the ship, and no exception in the warranty applicable to the ship. It seems to me that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover back so much money which they have overpaid as is applicable to the average loss upon the 8299 bags which has been allowed to the assured.

As to the second ground upon which the plaintiffs seek to recover back moneys overpaid, I am of opinion that the defendants have an answer to that claim. I think that Mr. Channell has made out that the money which has been allowed in respect of advanced freight has been properly allowed to the assured. I put the best construction that I can upon the provision in the policy—"that the said goods and merchandises, &c., for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and assurers in this policy, are and shall be valued at 7940*l.* sterling (included 1361*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* for advance on freight"). I adopt the construction which has been put upon this by Mr. Channell, and do not accept the argument of Mr. Walton, although I may say it was an exceedingly ingenious argument, and an exceedingly able argument. That observation is applicable not only to the argument of Mr. Walton upon this particular point, but it is also applicable to his argument upon the first point. It was a most able and a most interesting and convincing argument, although he has failed to convince me that he is right as to the second point. I come to the conclusion that this is really an insurance on valued goods, and that, being the scheme of the parties to insure on valued goods, that is not vitiated by the circumstance that out of abundant caution the merchant has stated in valuing these goods: "It is well that you should know that I have taken into account as part of their value the freight which I have had to pay on account of the carriage of the goods to the port of destination. In valuing the goods I was at liberty to add the freight which I should have to pay to get them there, because I wished to get my profit and the advantage I should have of my speculation. Therefore I do not value the goods at the price which they cost at the port of purchase, but I value them at the port of destination, and valuing them at the port of destination, I have thought fit to add the sum I have paid on account of advanced freight, which undoubtedly does enhance the value of the goods, or may be taken to enhance the value of the goods and go to make up what the goods are worth at the port of destination." I do not think he loses the benefit of the valued policy on the insurance on the goods by stating that he is valuing the goods as at the port of destination, and in stating further the quantity of money which he adds to the invoiced price of the goods for the purpose of getting at such valuation. He has stated here that he advanced on freight 1361*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*, and that he has added that to the invoiced cost of the goods at the port of shipment, and that it is thus amongst other ways he makes up the valuation at which he puts these goods. It seems to me that is quite lawful, and that the fact of his stating how he makes his sum out does not in any way affect the substantial gist of the policy, which is on valued goods, and I do not consider that this can be treated as a policy upon valued goods to the extent of the less amount, that is to say, to the extent of 7940*l.* less the 1361*l.* and a further policy in respect of freight. I consider this is a policy on valued goods explaining merely how it is that the value has been made up to this amount. It seems to me that, if the defendants had sought to deal with this in another way in contingencies which it is not necessary now to contemplate, and if they had sought to sue upon this, not as a policy upon goods, but to sue upon it as a policy upon advanced freight, then they would have had no remedy in respect of the goods lost or injured, and it would have been a clear answer for the underwriters to say. "This is not a policy on advanced freight; it is a policy on goods in which you have merely taken the trouble to explain how you have got at the value of the goods." The defendants are entitled to hold the amount stated by the average stater, and to that extent the plaintiffs' claim has failed.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I desire to say I agree with the observations that have fallen from my brother Day as to the arguments on both sides. I certainly never listened to an argument from which I derived more pleasure and assistance than the arguments on both sides in this case. Now the case raises two points. First of all, it is said by the plaintiffs that they are entitled to recover back a certain sum of money, which has been received as upon a particular average loss, in consequence of the ship having stranded. Upon the point whether there was such a stranding as to let in the right of the assured to claim for a particular average loss, I am of opinion that there was no such stranding. The claim on that head arises with respect to a certain quantity of maize which was shipped at Buenos Ayres. The policy embraces a quantity of maize which was shipped at San Nicolas, and it embraces a further quantity of maize which was to be shipped and was shipped at Buenos Ayres. Before the maize in question was put on board the ship, the vessel in its passage from San Nicolas higher up to Buenos Ayres lower down stranded, and it is contended that that stranding is a stranding which entitles the owner of the maize shipped at Buenos Ayres to say within the meaning of the contract of insurance that there has been such a stranding as entitles him to claim for a particular average loss on the 8299 bags of maize. Now it seems to me that the question whether the stranding does carry with it those consequences depends on whether or not the stranding took place during the adventure. It is clearly decided that, given that the stranding did take place during the adventure, it is entirely immaterial whether the actual mischief which happened can be traced or not to the stranding; but that is a very different thing from saying that it is immaterial when the stranding took place. The stranding is one of the things dealt with by the contract between the parties. What the parties contract for is, for a particular adventure. They insure themselves against certain risks upon a certain voyage, and stranding is one of those risks. If the stranding takes place during the time of the contract, it follows they can recover damage, whether the damage can be traced to the particular stranding or not. That seems to me to be clear, and to be common sense, but it is also to my mind abundantly supported by authority. When you look at the case of Roux v. Salvador (1 Bing. N. C. 526), which itself follows the earlier decisions, the point there decided was that, where during a voyage goods had been landed at a point short of the original destination, and the ship was afterwards stranded when those goods were no longer on board the ship, no particular average could be claimed in respect of those goods. That was the point that had to be decided; but, in order to arrive at a decision on that point, it was necessary to examine the principle, and that principle, when ascertained, applied equally to a stranding before the risk had attached to the goods as to a stranding after the risk had ceased to attach to the goods; and in dealing with the case Tindal, C.J.; says, this: "The general principle laid down in Burnett v. Kensington (7 T. Rep. 210), that if the ship be stranded the insurer is liable for any average damage, though quite unconnected with the stranding, is not disputed; the policy after the stranding must be construed as if no such warranty had been written on the face of it. But the question is, within what limits of time a stranding must take place in order to produce such effect. Now, every other clause in the policy relates to the voyage insured and to that alone; the liability of the underwriter on goods commences with the putting them on board, and ceases upon their being discharged and safely landed, or with any other legal termination of the adventure." And when you come to consider the reason of the rule it is obvious that it must be so. A stranding has taken place during the adventure. The question is, or was—was the particular damage which took place there capable of being attributed to that stranding or not? It was found that to embark upon that inquiry would necessarily involve a very difficult examination, and therefore, by convention of the parties, as Lord Kenyon puts it in a case of Nesbitt v. Lushington (4 T. Rep. 783), where the ship stranded, the underwriters agreed to ascribe the loss to the stranding, but, as was pointed out in the argument, in order that they should so ascribe it, the stranding must take place in the course of the adventure. Therefore, the stranding must take place in the course of the adventure. Mr. Channell says, the stranding did take place in the course of the adventure here. Why? Because, he says, the goods were at risk. That is putting the difficulty one stage further off, and we have now to see not merely whether the goods were or were not at risk, but whether they were at the risk contemplated in the adventure. In my opinion they were not. As far as the stranding of the ship is concerned, that is limited to the adventure embraced in the time when the goods are put on the ship. That is the adventure which is contemplated when there is a provision about stranding. The anterior state of things is dealt with by a separate contract. The time when the goods are in the craft is covered by a separate specific provision. True it is in the same policy, and between the same persons, but covering a different risk; and but for that provision about the risk to craft Mr. Channell does not and would not contend, as I understand, that an anterior stranding would let in a right to claim for particular average, subject to another observation he made, that in the particular facts of this case the anterior stranding was traceable in its effect upon these goods; but subject to that if the goods had not been at risk by the reason of this provision covering the risk to craft, Mr. Channell does not claim that the absence of such a provision as to the risk to craft would let in the claim to particular average. Now that deals with the whole point as to particular average, subject to one argument of Mr. Channell, and that is, that upon the facts of this case it must be taken that the antecedent stranding caused part of the damage to the goods, inasmuch as it put the ship in such a condition that the subsequent straining brought about damage to the goods which would not have happened to them but for the antecedent stranding. I think that point was satisfactorily met by Mr. Walton's short interpolated reply. The stranding in question must be taken to have nothing whatever to do with the subsequent damage to the goods, inasmuch as it is conceded and admitted on both sides that the ship was seaworthy at the date of the commencement of the adventure, that is, at the time the goods were put on board. That seems to me to prevent the antecedent stranding having any connection in point of fact with that damage to the goods. Moreover, it seems to me, when analysed, to come back really to the same point we have already decided. It is an attempt to introduce into the adventure something that happened before the adventure. Therefore upon that first part of the case I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have made out their claim.

Now we come to the second point, which is whether or not the ascertained percentage should be allowed as upon the whole value of 7940*l.*, or only upon that value less the amount of 1361*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*, the advanced freight. It seems to me the question to be decided upon this is not a matter of law, but simply a question of what did the parties mean by framing the contract in these terms? That is what I have to set myself to answer, and according to my answer the fate of the question must be determined. The question is, did the parties here intend to insure the cargo agreed at a certain value, or did they intend to insure cargo agreed at a certain value and advance freight ascertained at a particular amount? If they did the latter, then I think Mr. Channell is wrong. If they did the former, I think Mr. Channell is right. Now, looking at the whole of the language in which this contract is couched, I have come to the conclusion that what the parties really did mean was to value the cargo and to insure a valued cargo. What they say is this: "The said goods and merchandises, &c., for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and the assurers in this policy, are and shall be valued at 7940*l.*" Nothing could be more clear than that—that what they are valuing is the goods and merchandises, and they are giving those goods and merchandises a conventional value by an agreement between the assured and the assurer—7940*l.* including 1361*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* for advance on freight. It seems to me by adding that statement they have not entitled themselves to, and would not be able to allege against the underwriters if they disputed it that they had acquired, an insurance on advanced freight. I think the underwriters could at once answer them and say, "It is perfectly true you mentioned the sum which is the sum you paid for advanced freight; but in the very sentence in which you did so you in terms agreed that should be treated as part of the value of the cargo, and therefore if the circumstances do not admit of your recovering as upon a loss of the goods, this contract does not entitle you to claim as upon an independent insurance on advanced freight." The advanced freight is simply thrown in as part and parcel of the value of the goods, and the right to recover in respect of the advanced freight, in my judgment, stands or falls upon the right to recover for the lost cargo. Therefore the inference I draw upon that part of the case is in favour of the defendants. My judgment therefore agrees with that of my learned brother upon both points.

Solicitors: for the plaintiff, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton; for the defendants, Crowders and Vizard, for Shelley and Johns, Plymouth.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Tuesday, Dec. 6, 1892.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. H. Jeune) and BARNES, J.)

THE FERRO. (a)

Bill of lading—Excepted perils—Stowage—Negligence of stevedore—Management of ship—Liability of shipowner.

A cargo of oranges was shipped on board the defendants' vessel under a bill of lading, which contained a clause excepting "damage from any act, neglect, or default of the pilot, master, or mariners, in the navigation or management of the ship."

The cargo was damaged through the improper and negligent stowage of the stevedore.

Held, that inasmuch as the stevedore was not included in the list of persons mentioned in the bill of lading whose acts and defaults were excepted, the defendants were not exempted from liability.

Held also, that the words "management of the ship" did not include bad stowage.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants, the owners of the steamship Ferro, against a judgment of the learned judge of the Cardiff County Court, for 121*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* damages for depreciation of plaintiff's goods by improper stowage.

The action was brought by the indorsee of a bill of lading dated the 20th Feb. 1892, which was for the carriage of 833 cases of oranges from Valencia to Liverpool.

The vessel at the time was under a charter-party to a Mr. Ries, of Valencia, but no reference to this appeared in the bill of lading, nor had the plaintiff any notice of it.

The bill of lading was signed by the master, and the excepted perils included "any act, neglect, or default of the pilot, master, or mariners in the navigation or management of the ship."

The charter-party, dated the 23rd Nov. 1891, which was admitted in evidence at the trial, provided that the cargo should be "properly stowed by a regular stevedore appointed by charterers, or their agents, at the risk and expense of the steamer, he being wholly under the direction of the master."

After the plaintiff's oranges had been loaded the vessel went to Almeria, where she took in a quantity of oranges in a rotten, broken, and dirty condition, and these were placed immediately over and resting on plaintiff's goods.

On arriving at Liverpool the plaintiff's oranges were discovered to be damaged, and were sold at a loss, as found by the learned judge, of 121*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* The damage was partly caused by the bad state of the cargo taken in at Almeria, and partly by improper stowage at Valencia, some of the boxes being placed on the angle-irons of the hold, so that they were broken and their contents damaged when the cargo settled.

The learned County Court judge found as facts that the plaintiff's goods were in these particulars improperly and negligently stowed, and that the stowage at Valencia and Almeria was negligently done by the stevedore employed there. It was contended by the defendants that the acts complained of were within the excepted perils of the bill of lading, which included "any act, neglect, or default of the pilot, master, or mariners in the navigation or management of the ship." They also said that the acts which caused the damage were done in the stowage of the cargo, and that the stowage was part of the management of the ship. On the meaning of the words "management of the ship" the learned County Court judge referred to the case of the Canada Shipping Company v. British Shipowners' Mutual Protection Association (61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 312; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 388, 422; 22 Q. B. Div. 727; 23 Q. B. Div. 342), in which it was decided that bad stowage was not covered by the words "improper navigation," and expressed himself bound by the opinion of Charles, J., who said, in giving judgment, that the damage "was caused by the act of the plaintiffs (the shipowners) in putting the goods into a ship which had not been effectually cleaned. She was then loaded unfit to receive a cargo of wheat, and, as might have been anticipated, the wheat was spoiled. That this was an improper management can scarcely be disputed." In the present case, however, he thought it very doubtful whether the word "management" did include stowage. He decided in favour of the plaintiff on the authority of Hayn v. Culliford (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 182; 4 C. P. Div. 182) and Sandeman v. Scurr (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 86); he referred also to Blakie v. Stembridge (28 L. J. 329, C. P.; 29 L. J. 212, C. P.; 6 C. B. N. S. 874); The Catherine Chalmers (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 598; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 847), and Scrutton on Charter-parties, 2nd edit., p. 106, note (h), on the ground that the defendants were liable for the damage done to the plaintiff's goods by the negligence and bad stowage of the stevedores, and that they were not relieved from liability under the bill of lading. The defendants now appealed.

Pyke, Q.C. and Bailhache, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The words "management of the ship" must refer to the cargo, because the object of the clause in the bill of lading is to protect the shipowner against an action by the owners of the cargo. It was mismanagement of the dunnage which led to the damage. Opening the hatches, moving the tarpaulin, and putting the dunnage on the cargo is part of the management of the ship, so also is laying the foundation of lead and timber in order to make the hold level for the stowage of cargo: (Canada Shipping Company v. British Shipowners' Mutual Protection Association (ubi sup.). Blakie v. Stembridge (ubi sup.) does not cover this case, because there the master was away on shore and the mate did the stowage:

The Helene, B. & L. 324; L. Rep. 1 P. C. 231.

The fact that there is bad management on the part of the master and somebody else does not make it any the less bad management by the master. Even assuming that the master did not interfere, it is his negligence if the cargo is badly stowed. [BARNES, J.—There is no negligence on the part of the stevedore if he obeys the master.]

Sandeman v. Scurr (ubi sup.).

If the court should come to the conclusion that the stowage of the boxes on the angle-irons comes within the words "management of the ship," whereas stowage of rotten oranges on the top of the plaintiff's goods does not, then it may be necessary to apportion the damage and limit the defendant's liability.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL and BASIL CRUMP, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Abel Thomas, Q.C. and Carver for the respondent, contrà.—Management of the ship would be something done in the sailing of the ship in order to carry the cargo safely, and not the placing of boxes in particular positions. The evidence shows that the master knew nothing of the stowage. It is not sufficient to prove that the master was guilty of negligence, but it must also be shown that the other officers of the ship have not been guilty of negligence.

The PRESIDENT.—There are two points raised in this case, and though either would be sufficient to decide it, I propose to say a few words about each of them. The first of these is whether the injury that was done to the cargo was done by the negligence of the stevedore, or the stevedore and the master in stowing the cargo. Of course, if the negligence was the negligence of the stevedore, then it was not the negligence of any person whose negligence was one of the exceptions in the bill of lading. What is the fact in this case? In the first place, the charter-party has been referred to to show what the relation of the stevedore to the master was. The charter-party provides that the cargo is to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchants' risk and expense, and to be "properly stowed by a regular stevedore appointed by the charterers or their agents, at the risk and expense of the steamer, he being wholly under the direction of the master." Now it is said that that shows that, as the stevedore was to be wholly under the direction of the master, every act of his would have for this purpose to be considered as the act of the master. I don't think that is the real meaning and effect of the words. What I think is intended by these words is, that he should be generally under the direction of the master, and not under the direction of the charterer, but it does not mean to say that every simple act of his in stowage was to be considered as under the direction of the master. As to the facts, the learned judge in the court below has found that the plaintiff's goods were improperly and negligently stowed, and that the stowage at Valencia and Almeria was negligently done by the stevedores employed there. It seems to me that that finding, if it is accepted, disposes of the point, because I think the learned judge did find that the negligence was the negligence of the stevedore, and not the negligence of the master. He draws no distinction between the two, nor does he say, nor was he asked to say, that both the stevedore and the master were negligent. When we look at the evidence, it appears to me that the finding of the learned judge was amply justified. The very language of the charter-party stipulating that the stevedores should be persons experienced in such matters, and the evidence that the captain was not experienced, points to this, that the captain did not interfere with the general stowage of the cargo, though he may have done so with regard to details. Further, when we know that the captain seems to have known very little about the details of the stowage, I cannot help thinking that that strongly corroborates what I think was the learned judge's view. The captain was asked, "Was the ship loaded by the charterer's stevedore?" and the answer is "Yes." Having given that evidence in chief, then he was asked about the matter in cross-examination. "You superintended the whole of the loading?" "Yes."—"Yourself?"—"Except for a few minutes, when I had to run ashore for the ship's business."—"You told them how to do it?" "The stevedore stowed it, but I told him sometimes that he had better do it so-and-so." He was not pressed with regard to any particular act of negligence, whether he was a party to it or not; and the conclusion to which the judge rightly came was that the negligence was the negligence of the stevedore. If that was so, and it was the joint negligence of the two, it would be the same. If it was the negligence of the stevedore, the case is brought within the decision in Hayn v. Culliford (ubi sup.), where Lord Bramwell said: "It is clear that, if that is the contract, the defendants are liable on the ordinary contract of a carrier, unless (and there is not) there is some clause in the contract to relieve them. Whether the words in other respects would extend to those cases we need not say, as there is one respect in which they would not; they extend to the acts of captains, officers, and crews; they do not extend to the acts of the defendants, and their other agents and servants, therefore not to the acts and defaults of the stevedore. But it is by these acts and defaults that the goods were damaged." So I think that case is exactly in point.

As to the other point, it is said that this negligent stowage falls within the word "management" in the bill of lading. There appears to be no distinct authority as to the meaning of this word "management" with relation to stowage. Bad stowage, it was admitted in argument, and I think rightly, does not come within the term "navigation." In a case decided by Willes, Keating, and Montague Smith, JJ., Good v. London Steamship Owners Mutual Protection Association (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 563), it is clear from the obiter dicta, or rather from the interpositions in the course of argument, that bad stowage does not fall within bad navigation, unless bad stowage affected the safe sailing of the ship. Can it fall under the word "management?" On that there appears to be no distinct authority, because the obiter dictum of Charles, J., which has been referred to, only comes to this, that having a ship in a dirty condition would be bad management. The learned judge did not say bad management within the meaning of a clause like this, and even if he had I should have thought that it was quite one thing to say that having a ship in a dirty condition may be bad management of a ship, and quite another thing to say that mere bad stowage is bad management of the ship. A distinction was attempted to be drawn here between the two pieces of negligence and their effect in this case. It is said that, whatever may be said as to taking in rotten oranges at Almeria, the stowage at Valencia stood in a different position, because there part of the damage was caused by placing boxes in a particular way on the iron girders of the ship. Therefore it is said that that was bad management of the ship. I confess I see no distinction of that kind. It is clear that taking in rotten oranges was a matter of bad stowage and nothing else, and it appears to me that the ship not being improperly constructed, but boxes of oranges being simply placed near the girders, again brings it back to a question of bad stowage. So it was bad stowage and nothing else. Is that mismanagement of the ship? I confess I cannot bring myself to think that it is, and it would be an improper use of language to include bad stowage in such a term. It is not difficult to understand why the word management was introduced, because, inasmuch as navigation was defined as something affecting the safe sailing of the ship in the case I have referred to, it is easy to see there might be things which it would be important to guard against connected with the ship itself and the management of the ship which would not fall under navigation. Removal of the hatches is management of the ship, but that would have nothing to do with the navigation. I cannot help thinking that, inasmuch as people know perfectly well what is meant by stowage and proper stowage, it could hardly be intended to include improper stowage in the bill of lading. The parties would have used the words stowage or improper stowage, and not allowed it to be covered by a strained construction of these words. I think, therefore, on both points that the appeal must fail.

BARNES, J.—In my judgment, in order to relieve the shipowners from negligence such as that which is found by the learned judge, there ought to be clear and explicit language in the bill of lading. The plaintiffs say in this case that the language used in the exceptions fails in two particulars to cover the negligence in question, first, because the act, neglect, or default excepted is confined to that of the pilot, master, or mariners, that is so far as persons are concerned; and secondly, is confined to acts, neglect, or default in the management or navigation of the ship. As to the first, it seems to me quite clear from the evidence here, especially after the remarks of Mr. Thomas, in which he showed that the captain had never had such a cargo before, and was giving an account as to the stowage which was not accepted by the court—it seems to me that the stevedore was really the responsible person for this stowage, and that it was his negligence which caused the damage. As the stevedore is not included within the enumeration of the persons excepted, that want of exception in the bill of lading would be fatal to the defendants' case. But I think it is important one should express the view one holds about the question turning on the construction of the word "management" of the ship. I am not satisfied that it goes much if at all beyond the word "navigation." Some things may be suggested to which the word "management" is slightly applicable beyond that of "navigation," but I feel that it is not such clear and expressive language as to include within it the words "improper stowage." It seems to me a perversion of terms, if one might say so, to say that the management of a ship has anything to do with the construction of this document as to the stowage of the cargo if, dealing with the two points in this case, one illustrates it in this way. The first point being that the cargo was damaged by putting bad oranges above it, I say it seems a perversion of terms to say that the stowage of rotten oranges above sound ones is management of the ship. It is stowage of cargo. Again, supposing the cargo was improperly placed against the beams or angle-irons of the ship, if one were in the hold of that ship, and ran one's head against it, it would be a remarkable perversion of terms to say it was improper management of the ship. So it is to say that improper stowage is improper management. By the use of proper language that expression "proper stowage" can be covered, but in my judgment "management" does not exonerate the shipowners. This appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Alex. Wilson and Cowie, Liverpool.

Solicitors for defendants, Ingledew, Ince, and Co., Cardiff.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

May 2 and 4, 1893.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords MACNAGHTEN and MORRIS.)

HOUSTON AND CO. v. SANSINENA AND CO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party—Bill of lading—Incorporation of terms and conditions into charter-party.

Where an agreement in special terms and for a special purpose has been entered into between a shipper of goods and shipowner, such special terms cannot be modified by reading into them the general words of a bill of lading under which the goods have been shipped.

By an agreement of the nature of a charter-party it was provided inter alia that shipowners should fix, in a suitable place on board their ship, proper refrigerating machinery and insulated chambers, and should, during the voyage, keep the chambers below a certain fixed temperature, any accident to the machinery or cause beyond the owner's control not preventing; and it was further provided that the performance of the agreement was to be subject to the exceptions mentioned in the bill of lading, and the agreement was to be read as if such clauses and conditions were repeated therein, and all cargo was to be "received and carried subject to the terms and conditions in the said bill of lading except as altered by these presents."

By the terms of the bill of lading any loss or damage was excepted which might result from "the consequence of any damage, breakdown, or injury to, or defect in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, or their appurtenances, refrigerating engines or chambers, or any part thereof, however such damage, &c., might have been caused, and notwithstanding that the same might have existed at, or at any time before, the loading or sailing of the vessel, or by unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means had been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness."

The refrigerating engines proved to be unfit and insufficient, and the insulated chambers were not kept at the agreed temperature, whereby the cargo was damaged.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the exceptions in the bill of lading were not incorporated with the agreement so as to lessen or qualify the obligation of the owners to provide proper machinery, and to keep the chambers at the agreed temperature, and that they were liable for the loss so caused.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Fry and Lopes, L.JJ.), reported in 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246, who had affirmed a judgment of Charles, J. upon a preliminary point of law raised by the pleadings. The action was brought by the respondents, who were consignees of a cargo of frozen meat, against the appellants, who were shipowners, to recover damages for breach of contract in regard to the carriage. The defendants pleaded that the damages complained of were covered by the exceptions in the bill of lading.

The facts appear from the head-note above, and in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

Bigham, Q.C. and T. G. Carver appeared for the appellants.

J. Walton, Q.C., and Pickford, who appeared for the respondents, were not called upon to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellants their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell). — My Lords: I think that the judgment of the court below in this case was right. The question turns entirely upon the construction of a contract entered into between the parties on the 9th May 1889. The shipowners, who are the appellants at your Lordships' bar, by that contract undertook to provide three steamers, which were to commence a service from Boca, Buenos Ayres, for the purpose of bringing frozen meat to this country. The 3rd clause of the agreement was in these terms: "The owners shall at their own cost fix in each of the two additional steamers in a suitable place on board proper refrigerating machinery and insulated chamber, the latter to be placed under the main deck. The machinery may be of any description, so long as insurance can be effected at equal rates with that for Heliades. During so much of the voyages of the said steamers as such steamers shall have meat carcases of the charterers on board, the owners shall supply the steam necessary for working the said machinery, and shall keep the insulated chambers in which such meat carcases are at a temperature not exceeding twenty-eight degrees Fahrenheit; any accident, breakdown, or mishap to the machinery, or cause beyond the owners' control, not preventing." The meat was shipped under the provisions of that agreement, in one of these vessels. The meat was damaged on its voyage to Liverpool, and the plaintiffs sustained loss in consequence. It is to be taken for the purpose of this case and the appeal that these stipulations of clause 3 were not complied with by the owners, and that if the matter had rested solely upon those provisions they must be regarded as having broken their contract by not fitting up proper refrigerating machinery, in the manner provided for, for the purpose of keeping the insulated chamber at the prescribed temperature, and of course it is admitted that they were not prevented from doing so by the particular causes excepted in that clause. The primâ facie case of liability, which is thus made out if the contract had stood, it is sought to get rid of by a reference to the provisions contained in the 16th clause of the contract. So far as material it is in these terms: "The performance by the owners of their part of this agreement is subject to the exceptions and perils mentioned in the bill of lading according to the form attached hereto, and the agreement herein contained on the part of the owners shall be read as if such clauses and conditions were herein repeated. All cargo shipped by the charterers in pursuance of this agreement shall be received and carried subject to the terms and conditions in the said bill of lading (except as altered by these presents), and bills of lading in such form shall be given therefor." It is said that the form of bill of lading which is there referred to contains a provision which exempts the owners from liability under the circumstances which I have mentioned. By the bill of lading the goods shipped were "to be delivered in the like good order and condition." Then come a number of provisions which are commonly found in bills of lading, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, or thieves, of whatever kind," and a number of other matters of that description, amongst which occur these words, "boilers, steam, or machinery, or their appurtenances, or from the consequence of any damage, breakdown, or injury thereto, or from defective hull, machinery, refrigerating engine or chamber, or any part thereof, outfit, tackle or other appurtenances, howsoever such damage, defect, or injury may be caused, and notwithstanding that the same may have existed at or at any time before the sailing or loading of the vessel." Then come "collision, stranding, straining, jettison of any kind," and so on. The bill of lading is not very artificially drawn, because there is really no exception; there do not follow the words which one would expect to find completing the sentence. It begins, as I have said, with "the act of God, the Queen's enemies," but it never indicates that they are referred to as being excuses for the non-delivery of the cargo in good order and condition. No doubt that must have been what was meant.

Now the contention is that, inasmuch as you find amongst all these and other matters mentioned in the bill of lading these words with regard to the refrigerating chamber, the owners, even although they did not fit up this refrigerating chamber, and did not, although not prevented by the specially excepted causes, keep the refrigerating chamber at the proper temperature, and there was consequent damage to the meat, are not under any liability whatever. The contention is that, although if the shipper had ascertained before he put his goods on board that the refrigerating chamber had not been properly constructed, he might have refused to put his goods on board, yet, although this failure to protect the meat results from the clearest and most unquestionable want of care and attention on the part of the shipowners, and indifference to whether they perform their contract or not, if it was not discovered before the shipper put his goods on board, then, although the goods may be utterly destroyed, he has no claim against the shipowners for the loss. That would certainly be a very startling result; and, although it may be true that it is somewhat in excess of an accurate statement to say that it would render this 3rd clause in the contract a nullity, yet, seeing what was the object and intention of the charterer or shipper in securing this insertion of an absolute obligation on the part of the shipowners, it would obviously defeat what must manifestly have been his intention. It is said that it is not uncommon to find general provisions, absolute provisions, in a charter-party, or a policy of insurance cut down by words which in reality contradict the general and absolute obligation which seems to be imposed. That is perfectly true, but that observation does not seem to me to be applicable to the present case. A policy of insurance, a charter-party, or a bill of lading is constantly used in a common form which is to be applicable to a vast variety of transactions, and (I speak more particularly of a charter-party and of a policy of insurance) the general and absolute provisions of those instruments are frequently cut down by the special stipulations which the parties have made with reference to the particular adventure. But in the present case the specific and particular agreement is that which creates the very obligation which, it is said, does not really exist. It is said that that obligation is cut down, and is not to have full force and effect by reason of the incorporation of the general terms in a form of bill of lading. Now it appears to me that there the very same principle applies in the opposite direction. Where the parties have made, with reference to this particular case, their special and particular stipulation, the very principle which leads you, in such cases as I have referred to, to give effect to the special stipulation, rather than to the general words which are common in instruments of that description, points to your taking the course which the courts below have taken, in regarding as of primary importance the express and specific stipulation which has been made with reference to this particular case, and as of secondary importance the incorporation in the contract of the general terms in the form of the bill of lading if there seems to be a conflict between them. The agreement here in clause 16, which incorporates the bill of lading, contains this provision, that "all cargo shipped by the charterers" "shall be received and carried subject to the terms and conditions in the said bill of lading (except as altered by these presents)." The contention on the part of the appellants is that that provision has no relation to what are called the "exceptions and perils," that it has no relation to the clause of the bill of lading which contains a recital of these perils and exceptions from liability to deliver. I am quite unable to accede to that argument. Can it possibly be said that, if you are asking on what terms the cargo shipped is being received and carried, you are to exclude, as forming none of those terms, these exceptions upon the obligation to deliver the cargo? It seems to me that those are the "terms and conditions" of the bill of lading on which the cargo is received and carried as much as any term of the bill of lading relating to the freight or the discharge of the cargo, or anything else. Therefore I am of opinion that this part of clause 16 refers to the present case, and that, the cargo being received and carried subject to the "terms and conditions in the bill of lading as altered by these presents," you are clearly not to allow any provision in the bill of lading to override any express stipulation contained in this agreement, because if it is a stipulation which cannot have full effect given to it in conjunction with the bill of lading, the bill of lading must be regarded as being to that extent altered by it. That is the view which has been taken by the court below: but even if that were not the true view, still, if what has been called the first part of clause 16 (to my mind the whole of clause 16 must be read together) were read alone, I should come to the same conclusion. That clause provides for the performance of the agreement by the shipowners "subject to the exceptions and perils mentioned in the bill of lading." Now, where you have an absolute contract, such as is contained in clause 3, I do not think, looking at the provisions in the bill of lading, you can say that the performance of it is prevented by the perils which are found mentioned in the bill of lading. The perils mentioned in the bill of lading are perils relating to carrying the goods and delivering them in good order and condition. Of course you are not bound to apply every part of the exceptions and perils in the bill of lading to every part of this contract. It is general; it provides generally that the performance of the agreement on the part of the shipowners shall be subject to those exceptions and perils. It is very difficult to read, in every instance, exceptions and perils such as are to be found in the bill of lading into every part of this contract—indeed it seems to me that it would be impossible. The question is what modification they were intended to effect of the obligation imposed by the various stipulations of this contract. I am of opinion that when one looks at the distinct and unequivocal agreement which the parties have entered into here in clause 3, it would be contrary to all sound principle, seeing especially that they have in the latter part of clause 3 excepted only certain perils which cover to some extent the same ground as is covered by the exceptions and perils mentioned in the bill of lading, and that the exceptions contained in the latter part of clause 3 are much narrower than those contained in the bill of lading—I say that I think it would be contrary to all sound principle to hold that such a clear and unequivocal contract as this was in any way affected by the provisions contained in the bill of lading. For these reasons I move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords, I quite agree, and for the same reasons.

Lord MORRIS.—My Lords, I concur.

Judgment appealed from affirmed; and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Pritchard, Englefield, and Co., for Simpson, North, and Johnson, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondents, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

March 17 and Nov. 21, 1892.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords WATSON, HALSBURY, MORRIS, and FIELD.)

GILROY AND CO. v. PRICE AND CO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SECOND DIVISION OF THE COURT OF SESSION IN SCOTLAND.

Bill of lading—Exceptions—Neglect or default of master or crew—Unseaworthiness—Pipe not properly cased.

A ship loaded a cargo of jute under bills of lading which contained a clause freeing the shipowners from liability for damage caused by the neglect or default of the master or crew. During the voyage the cargo was damaged by sea water in consequence of an uncased pipe which communicated with a water closet having been broken by the pressure of the cargo upon it. It was proved that it was customary to case such pipes before loading a cargo of jute, and that after the cargo was loaded the pipe could not be seen or got at without removing a part of the cargo.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the case fell within the rule laid down in Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72), and that the owners were liable for the damage, as the ship was unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, and therefore the exceptions in the bill of lading did not relieve the shipowners from liability.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland consisting of the Lord Justice Clerk (McDonald), Lords Young, Rutherfurd Clark, and Trayner, reported in 18 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th series 569, who had reversed a judgment of the Sheriff Substitute of Lanarkshire, in an action brought by the appellants against the respondents.

The Tilkhurst, a ship belonging to the respondents, sailed from Chittagong for Dundee on the 5th Dec. 1888, laden with a cargo of jute. The vessel encountered heavy gales, and on the afternoon of the 13th Dec. it was found that the forward water closet pipe on the port side had been broken away, and that the cargo in the vicinity was damaged by water. The plaintiffs, who were the onerous indorsees of the bill of lading under which the jute was being carried, claimed from the defenders 3407*l.*, as the agreed amount of damage to the cargo, on the ground that the ship was not seaworthy when she sailed from Chittagong, as the pipe in question was then either cracked or faulty and not cased, as was necessary for its safety. The defenders resisted the claim on the ground that the ship was seaworthy when she started on her voyage, and that the damage was occasioned by the perils of the sea, or else was occasioned by the fault of the master or crew in the navigation of the ship in the course of her voyage, in either of which cases the defenders were exempted from liability under the terms of the bill of lading. The Sheriff Substitute decided in favour of the plaintiffs on the ground that the non-casing of the pipe rendered the ship unseaworthy on starting on her voyage; but his decision was reversed by the Court of Session on the ground that the damage to the pipe was one that arose after the voyage had commenced, and was occasioned by the neglect or default of the master or crew, and that, therefore, the defenders were exempted from liability under the terms of the bill of lading.

March 17.—The appeal came on for argument before the Lord Chancellor (Halsbury), Lords Watson, Herschell, Morris, and Field.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Graham Murray, Q.C.), and Barnes, Q.C., appeared for the appellants.

The Dean of Faculty (Balfour, Q.C. of the Scotch Bar), and Aitken (of the Scotch Bar), for the respondents.

Their Lordships were of opinion that the facts were not found by the court below in such a form as to enable the House to deal with the case, and it was remitted to the Court of Session for amended findings of fact.

Nov. 21.—The appeal came on for argument upon the amended findings:

Graham Murray, Q.C. (of the Scotch Bar), and J. Walton, Q.C., appeared for the appellants and argued that the pipe having been broken by pressure of the cargo, and it being found that it was usual to case a pipe in such a position, such facts amounted to a finding of unseaworthiness, and that the case fell within the rule in Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72). See also Tattersall v. National Steamship Company (50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 299; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 206; 12 Q. B. Div. 297). [They were stopped by the House.]

Bigham, Q.C., and Aitken (of the Scotch Bar), for the respondents, contended that seaworthiness was a question of fact for the jury. The court below has found that the ship was seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, not in express terms it is true, but by necessary implication. The casing of the pipe was a matter which would naturally be attended to after the voyage had begun. [Lord WATSON.—The ship when she sailed was incapable of resisting a storm, and protecting the cargo, in consequence of a structural defect, and that is unseaworthiness.] [The Lord CHANCELLOR.—If the ship was in such a condition that, loaded as she was, she would not keep out the sea water, she was unseaworthy as matter of law. It is a question of law, not of fact.] The findings here amount to a finding of seaworthiness; the finding of "neglect" must imply that the ship was not originally unseaworthy.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the respondents their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell).—My Lords: the pursuers in this action are the owners, or part owners, of a cargo of jute carried on board the ship Tilkhurst, and they seek to recover against the owners of that vessel, who are the defenders, by reason of the damage to a part of the cargo owing to sea water entering the vessel and coming into contact with the jute. The jute was shipped under bills of lading which contained this exception: "Any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilots, master, or crew, in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage, and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and rivers, and of navigation of whatever nature or kind excepted." The effect of an exception of that kind in a bill of lading came under the consideration of your Lordships' House in the case of Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72), and your Lordships were of opinion that under such a contract there was an implied undertaking by the shipowner that the ship was, at the time of its departure, reasonably fit for accomplishing the service which the shipowner engaged to perform, and that if the ship was not reasonably fit the exception which I have just read in the bill of lading was no defence of the shipowner. In the present case the House has to deal with special findings of fact, and, no doubt, cannot enter upon the question whether, so far as the facts were found, they were rightly found or not. The facts found in the interlocutor are: "That the said cargo was damaged in the course of said voyage by sea water, which obtained access to said cargo by means of a hole in the side of the ship, to which was attached or connected the discharge pipe of the forward water closet on the port side." We have, therefore, the cargo damaged by sea-water coming into the ship through a hole in the pipe which permitted its access; and "that said pipe was broken" (that is the next finding) "by pressure of the cargo thereon." It was therefore a pipe with which the cargo was in contact, and was not of sufficient strength to resist the pressure of the cargo; so that if the pressure of the cargo came, owing to the ordinary movements of the ship in the sea during the voyage into close contact with the pipe, the pipe was unable to withstand that pressure, and it would necessarily break, and the water would necessarily come in. The interlocutor further finds: "That said pipe was not cased as it should have been to prevent the pressure of cargo on said pipe. That the want of casing as aforesaid led to the breaking of said pipe and consequent damage of the cargo." When the case first came before your Lordships' House, doubts were suggested whether that fourth finding, which I have just read, was intended to indicate that, as matter of fact, it would have been in ordinary course to case a pipe, or merely that the event proved that the pipe needed casing and that in that sense it ought to have been done; and it was urged before your Lordships that there was nothing in those findings which I have just read inconsistent with the fact that the casing was a matter ordinarily added, or some substitute for it provided, in the course of the voyage, and that the precaution of either so casing the pipe or so fending off the cargo, as that it should not press upon the pipe might, for aught that appeared, be one ordinarily taken in the course of the voyage. In view of those arguments, the House directed that the case should be remitted to the Court of Session for further findings, and it is now found "That in the case of vessels carrying jute, it is according to usual practice that a pipe such as that in question is cased before the cargo is loaded and the ship starts on her voyage. That after the Tilkhurst was loaded, the pipe in question was not visible or accessible without the removal of part of the cargo." It is true that it is found that the pipe might have been got at by the removal of a part of the cargo, though how much there was no evidence before the court enabling them to say. I apprehend that those findings amount to a finding of unseaworthiness at the time when this vessel started on her voyage. Seaworthiness is thus defined by Lord Cairns, L.C. in the case to which I have already called attention: "That the ship should be in a condition to encounter whatever perils of the sea a ship of that kind, and laden in that way, may be fairly expected to encounter in crossing the Atlantic," or in performing whatever is the voyage to be performed. How is it possible to say that in that sense this vessel was seaworthy? Laden in that way, and being a ship such as she was, she had a pipe uncased in such a position and of such a character that, if the ship rolled, the water must be let in. That is a short statement of the facts; and really to say that a vessel of which that, under the circumstances, is a proper description is seaworthy would be, as it seems to me, to reduce the definition of seaworthiness to an absurdity. Therefore it appears to me that the findings amount to a finding that the vessel was not seaworthy.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

But it is said that it is found that this was a "neglect or default" in the course of the voyage, and it is found that it might be remedied in the course of the voyage. In my judgment, if it is found that the vessel was unseaworthy when she started, that is absolutely immaterial. The exception is only an exception which relieves the shipowner in the case of the vessel first starting on her voyage seaworthy. I can understand cases in which a defect which constitutes unseaworthiness at the time of the disaster may have existed at the time when the vessel started, and yet it may have been a case not, properly speaking, of initial unseaworthiness, but of neglect or default in the prosecution of the voyage. If, for example, some port-hole be left open, or there be some means of access for the water, which in the ordinary course of the prosecution of the voyage, if the master and crew were not negligent, would be put right, and it is usual to leave open when starting, there is no doubt that, although it existed at the time when the voyage commenced, it would properly be said not to be a case of unseaworthiness, but of "neglect or default" on the part of the master or crew. But this is not a case of that kind at all, because when you look at all the findings you see that it is obviously a matter not ordinarily remedied in the course of the voyage, but one constituting initial unseaworthiness and not at all of the character to which I have alluded. I do not think that there is anything inconsistent with this view in the fifth finding. It may be that the intention was in the fifth finding to find the case within the exception. If it found it within the exception in spite of unseaworthiness, then that was a decision running entirely counter to the decision of this House in Steel v. State Line Steamship Company which I have already mentioned. If it was not such a finding, then it does not exonerate the defenders from the liability which rests upon them by reason of the other findings, which amount to this, that the cargo was damaged owing to the vessel having been unseaworthy at the time when she started on her voyage. For these reasons I submit that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be reversed and judgment entered for the pursuers to the amount stated in the joint minute.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: it does not appear to me that your Lordships are, by the terms of sect. 40 of the Act of 1825 (6 Geo. 4 c. 120), precluded from entertaining and deciding the questions raised upon the fifth finding, which, according to the terms of the interlocutor, professes to be one of fact. In my opinion that is not its true character. If not a pure finding in law, it appears to me to be a mixed finding of fact and law, and embodies the application of legal principles to the actual facts otherwise found. I rather think it was meant by the court to be a finding to the effect that these facts did not constitute unseaworthiness in the sense of law, but merely amounted to such neglect of the master or crew as fell within the excepted risk. If the finding was merely intended to affirm neglect of the master or crew, that would not be necessarily inconsistent with or exclude the inference that the vessel was unseaworthy. The facts found by the interlocutor appealed from and on remit sufficiently establish that the Tilkhurst was not in a condition to carry her cargo with reasonable safety unless and until the pipe which eventually led to the damage was properly cased. That defect must be regarded as a breach of the shipowners' implied warranty of seaworthiness if it ought to have been remedied before the voyage began. On the other hand, if the want of casing was such a defect as is usually and may conveniently and properly be set right in the course of the voyage, the failure to case was a negligent omission on the part of the master or crew, from the consequences of which it appears to me that the owners of the vessel would be protected by the terms of the bill of lading. It may in some cases be a very nice question whether the defect comes within the first or second of these categories. In Steel v. State Line Steamship Company, the covering of one of the ship's port-holes was left unfastened, and, on her encountering stormy weather, seawater was admitted by the port-hole and injured the cargo. The port-hole fittings in that case were structurally complete, which was not the case with the pipe in question. In remitting the cause for a new trial, Cairns, L.C. thus expressed the test which he thought should be applied for ascertaining whether the injury to the cargo was one due to unseaworthiness or to negligence in the course of navigation. His Lordship said: "It might have been that there was no want of fastening the port-hole when the ship sailed, that the port-hole may have been unfastened afterwards for any particular purpose, and then left insufficiently fastened, and that all this occurred in the course of the voyage through the negligence of one of the sailors; and if so, probably that would be a matter which would be covered by the exceptions in the bill of lading as a case of negligence occurring during the transit of the goods." The case put there, of course, has no analogy to the facts of the present case. But the next illustration which he puts in favour of the shipowner is in these terms: "Or it may be that if the port-hole was unfastened at the time of the sailing of the ship the port-hole may have been so situated and the access to the port-hole such as that at any moment, in prospect of any change of weather, the port-hole could have been immediately fastened, and that the ship at the time of her departure was perfectly free from any charge of not being adequate for the performance of the voyage which she had undertaken." He then proceeds to indicate the considerations which would raise in such a case the liability of the shipowners under their implied warranty, namely, "that the state of things with reference to this port-hole at the time the ship sailed was such that the state of the port-hole constituted a degree of unseaworthiness which could not at any moment, without considerable trouble, have been got rid of." Applying these principles to the actual facts as found by the Second Division, I am unable to discover any ground for exempting the respondents from responsibility. The defect in the fittings of the Tilkhurst, which was the occasion of injury to her cargo, existed before she left Chittagong. That circumstance might not be sufficient to show that she was unseaworthy so long as it could be reasonably suggested or inferred that the pipe could have been cased immediately, at any moment, without considerable trouble. But any such suggestion or inference is excluded by the express findings that, according to the usual practice of jute-carrying vessels, the pipe ought to have been cased before the vessel sailed, and that, during the voyage, the pipe was neither visible nor accessible without the removal of part of the cargo. I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor. I think that the judgment of the Second Division must be reversed, and that the appellants must have decree for the amount of damage settled by the joint minute.

Lord HALSBURY.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I hesitate very much to give any opinion upon the extent and degree to which a vessel having a structural defect at the time of the commencement of a voyage could be prevented from being unseaworthy by something which it might be contemplated to do in the course of the voyage. It is not necessary, I think, to give any opinion upon that subject, because, in any view of the law, it appears to me that this case is outside any such possible contention. This vessel was structurally defective. The vessel was loaded, and it was not intended by anyone that this particular portion of the vessel should be visited or interfered with, or attended to in any way until the completion of the voyage. In the course of that voyage without any unusual peril of the sea, the damage was occasioned to the cargo in this vessel by reason of that structural defect which existed at the commencement of the voyage. I say that I hesitate—I should rather say I decline to enter into the question of what degree of defect may exist consistently with the performance of the obligation by the shipowners to have the ship in a seaworthy condition. I can understand some things which, if permitted to continue, would render the ship unseaworthy. Take the case of a hatchway remaining off, or anything of that sort, in the ordinary contemplation of every business man or sailor, that would be something which would be attended to in the course of the voyage, but if not attended to it would make the ship unseaworthy. I can imagine some things of that sort which, if permitted to continue, would make the ship unseaworthy and bring the case within the exception contemplated by the contract between the parties. But, for my own part, I do not know any case, and I hesitate, or rather decline, to give any opinion upon the subject, where a vessel having an existing structural defect which it is not either usual or easy to remedy during the progress of the voyage, would be prevented from being unseaworthy, because it is a negligence or an omission which those on board might have remedied in the course of the voyage. It is enough, to my mind, to say that it appears to me sufficiently from the facts as found that this structural defect in the vessel did exist, rendering the vessel manifestly unfit for the due and safe carrying of the cargo which she undertook to carry.

Lord MORRIS.—My Lords: In this case it is found that a ship starts with a pipe uncased, though the usual practice is to case the pipe before the loading and starting of the ship. It is further found that the non-casing led to the pipe breaking, and consequently to the damage. It is further found that the non-casing was a default or neglect of the master or crew of the ship, and that the said default or neglect was committed by the master or crew in the ordinary course of the voyage. The bill of lading exempts from liability for any act, neglect, or default of the master or crew in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage. That exemption protects the defenders from the neglect or default of the master or crew in not casing the pipe during the voyage. I fail to see how it can exempt the defenders from liability for starting the vessel with a substantial structural defect in not casing the pipe. I see no inconsistency in the existence of two distinct defaults—viz., first, the default in starting with a non-cased pipe; secondly, neglect in not repairing and remedying that defect during the voyage. The bill of lading protects against the second neglect—it gives no exemption from liability for the first. I concur in the judgment moved.

Lord FIELD concurred.

Interlocutor appealed from reversed; cause remitted to the Court of Session; the respondent to pay the costs in this House and below.

Solicitors for the appellants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton, for J. and J. Ross, Edinburgh.

Solicitors for the respondents, William A. Crump and Son, for Forrester and Davidson, Edinburgh.

Thursday, Nov. 24, 1892.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords WATSON, ASHBOURNE, and MORRIS, with NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.)

THE GENERAL GORDON. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Evidence of negligence.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lord Esher, M.R., and Fry, L.J. given on Feb. 17, 1891, who had reversed a judgment of Butt, J. (with Nautical Assessors), which is reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 533 and 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 117.

The action was brought by the owners of the fishing smack Almoner against the owners of the fishing smack General Gordon in respect of a collision which took place between the vessels in the North Sea on the 7th Nov. 1889.

Butt, J. held both vessels to blame, as reported. The owners of the General Gordon appealed, and the Court of Appeal found the Almoner alone to blame.

The owners of the Almoner appealed to the House of Lords.

Sir W. Phillimore and Aspinall, Q.C. appeared for the appellants.

Cohen, Q.C. and Stokes for the respondents.

On the conclusion of the arguments, the House of Lords affirmed the judgment of the Court of Appeal upon the facts, holding that there was no evidence that the General Gordon had in any way contributed to the collision.

Solicitors for the appellants, Pritchard and Sons, for A. M. Jackson, Hull.

Solicitors for the respondents, Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes, for Hearfield and Lambert, Hull.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 8, 9, 12, 1892, and Feb. 27, 1893.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords WATSON, ASHBOURNE, and MORRIS.)

THE P. CALAND. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 5—Ship not under command—Concurrent findings of fact in courts below.

A steamship which has sustained an accident to her machinery, but still retains the power of proceeding, though at a reduced rate of speed, is not justified in hoisting the signals prescribed by art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea for a ship "not under command," and will be held liable for a collision resulting from another ship being misled by such signals.

Judgment of the court below affirmed.

A vessel so disabled as to be "not under command," within the meaning of the rule, is not justified under ordinary circumstances in continuing to make way through the water.

A vessel which still retains steerage way, but in consequence of some accident can only answer her helm, or stop and reverse, slowly and with difficulty, or is in imminent danger of a breakdown of her propelling power at any moment, may be "not under command" within the meaning of the rule.

The House of Lords will only reverse the concurrent finding of two courts below upon a question of fact if it is clearly demonstrated that such finding is erroneous, not upon a balance of probabilities.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Fry and Lopes, L.JJ., with Nautical Assessors), reported in 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 206; 67 L. T. Rep. N. S. 249, and (1892) P. 191, who had affirmed a judgment of Jeune, J. assisted by Trinity Masters, reported in 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 83; 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 496, and (1891) P. 313, by which he found the steamship P. Caland alone to blame for a collision which took place in the Straits of Dover on the 15th April 1891, between that vessel and the steamship Glamorgan.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts are fully set out in the reports in the courts below.

Sir R. Webster, Q.C., Raikes, and Pritchard appeared for the appellants, the owners of the P. Caland.

Sir W. Phillimore and Holman for the respondents.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the arguments:

The Fanny M. Carvill, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 646; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 566; 13 App. Cas. 455, n.;
The Duke of Buccleuch, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 471; 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 422; (1891) A. 310;
The Theodore H. Rand, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 122; 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 343; 12 App. Cas. 247;
The Hibernia, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 455;
The Ripon, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 438; 10 P. Div. 65; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 365;
The Dunelm, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 305; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 214; 9 P. Div. 164.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Feb. 27.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell).—My Lords: This action was brought in respect of a collision which happened in the Straits of Dover between the steamships P. Caland and Glamorgan, by which the latter vessel was lost. The most important question raised depends upon the construction of the fifth article of the Sailing Regulations. At the time of the collision the P. Caland had at her masthead, in place of the regulation white light, three red lights, indicating that she was not under command. The question is, whether she was, under the circumstances, justified in exhibiting these lights. At the time when she thus exhibited them she was proceeding at a speed which must be taken to have been not less than four to five knots. Both the courts below have held that she cannot properly be said to have been not under command at the time in question. Construing the article as a whole, it is certain that a vessel may not be under command within the meaning of those words as used in the article, and yet be making way through the water; for it is provided that, if making way through the water, a vessel shall carry the ordinary side-lights as well as the three red lights at her masthead. At the same time I desire to say that I do not think that because the rule contemplates that a vessel not under command may be justified in making way through the water, it therefore implies that a vessel in so disabled a condition is always justified in continuing so to make way. This must depend upon the circumstances, and in my opinion a vessel which cannot show that they were such as to justify her in taking this course, must be held to blame for not acting in a reasonable and seamanlike manner, even though she had complied with the statutory regulations. It never was intended that under all circumstances a vessel should be entitled to proceed at a considerable speed through the water, throwing upon other vessels, out of whose way she would ordinarily have had to get, the obligation to get out of her way, though the circumstances might no doubt be such as to justify that course. For example, it might be necessary, in order to avoid some danger which would otherwise be imminent. Or, again, if she were very near port, it might be reasonable and prudent to pursue her course.

With these preliminary observations I proceed to consider the construction of the article. In the Court of Appeal the Master of the Rolls expressed himself as follows: "Now looking at the words of the statute, at the first part of the clause, which speaks of her not being under command, and the second part, her not being under command so that she cannnot keep out of the way—taking those two together, it seems to me that the real construction of the rules is that she must, through some accident be in such a position that she is not under command in this sense, that she could not keep out of the way of another vessel coming near her. But if she can be steered, and can be stopped, and can go ahead—which is necessary in order that she may be steered—then she is under command, and the apprehension of her being likely (however well founded) to be in a few moments out of command does not show that she is out of command at the moment spoken of;" and the other learned judges concurred in this view. I cannot but think that this construction is somewhat too narrow. Suppose the vessel, though having steerage way on her and capable of being steered to port or starboard, yet, owing to some disablement, answered her helm but very slowly, so that, if an occasion for doing so should arise, she could not get out of the way of another vessel in the manner which such vessel would have reason to anticipate. And suppose, though she can stop and reverse, she can only do so after great and unusual delay. I am not satisfied that in either of these cases she might not be properly described as not under command, and not able to keep out of the way of other vessels. It is not necessary to dwell upon the point, as it has no application to the present case; but I wish to guard against being supposed to assent to so narrow a construction as appears to me to have been adopted by the court below. Again, suppose that, owing to a breakdown of the machinery, its ceasing to be capable of propelling the vessel is reasonably regarded as imminent and likely to occur at any moment, I am not satisfied that in this case a vessel may not properly be said, within the meaning of the rule, not to be under command. If she were to allow other vessels to continue their course and to manœuvre on the assumption that she would get out of their way, she might prove unable to take any action at the very time when a change of direction on her part could alone enable her to keep out of the way and thus avert disaster. It would certainly tend to safety if under such circumstances the rule required her to warn other vessels to keep out of her way, and I do not think any violence need be done to the language used to construe it as extending to such a case. Even assuming, however, that the article will bear this construction, I am of opinion that the P. Caland cannot be said to have been out of command at the time of the collision. She was able to proceed at a rate which I think cannot have been less than four to five knots an hour. This speed was maintained, after the damage to the machinery presented itself, and the three red lights were exhibited for half to three-quarters of an hour before the collision. The two vessels were a considerable time locked together, and after they were separated the P. Caland steamed for half an hour before she became stationary. Even then it would appear that the machinery did not come to a standstill on account of its damaged condition, but was intentionally stopped for the purpose of repairing the damage. Under these circumstances, I cannot hold that, owing to the disablement of the machinery, the risk of its ceasing to work was so imminent that the vessel can be said not to have been under command within the meaning of the rule. I think, therefore, that she was not justified in exhibiting the three red lights at her masthead, and must be held to have infringed the Sailing Regulations. And it appears to me impossible to say that this breach of the regulations was in no way connected with the collision which occurred, and cannot be said to have at all contributed to it. In my opinion, therefore, it has been rightly held that the P. Caland was to blame.

The question whether the Glamorgan was also to blame is, to my mind, one of much greater difficulty, and depends upon whether she saw, or ought to have seen, the P. Caland's side-lights. If she did, or could have seen the red side-light of that vessel, it is not disputed that she must be held to blame. The question is, did she or could she have seen that side-light? The evidence of those on board the Glamorgan is distinct that this light was not visible; whilst the evidence of those on board the P. Caland that the light was exhibited is equally unequivocal. So far as regards their demeanour the learned judge before whom the action was tried saw no reason to give credence to one set of witnesses rather than to the other. [His Lordship then discussed the evidence bearing upon this question of fact, and concluded as follows:] Weighing all the probabilities, I confess I should myself be disposed to come to the conclusion that the red side-light was visible, and that those on board the Glamorgan having observed the three mast-head red lights, and being aware that they were approaching a disabled vessel, took it for granted that she was at a standstill, and their observations being directed, under this impression, to the mast-head lights, they failed to observe the red side-light, and accordingly bore down upon the P. Caland under the impression that she was stationary. But both the courts below have on the balance of probability thought it more probable that the red side-light was not visible than that, being visible, it was either unseen or disregarded by the Glamorgan. Now, I quite agree with what has been said in this House in previous cases as to the importance of not disturbing a mere finding of fact in which both the courts below have concurred. I think such a step ought only to be taken when it can be clearly demonstrated that the finding was erroneous. In the present case, although I might probably myself have come to a different conclusion, I cannot say that any cardinal fact was disregarded or unduly estimated by the courts below. I can lay hold of nothing as turning the balance decisively the one way rather than the other. I think the decision of the question of fact at issue depends upon which way the balance of probability inclines, and I am not prepared to advise your Lordships that it so unequivocally inclines in the opposite direction to that indicated in the judgments of the courts below that this House would be justified in reversing the judgment appealed from.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: Whether the P. Caland did or did not, from the time when she came in sight of the Glamorgan until the vessels collided, show her side-lights, as well as the three red lights specified in article 5 of the Regulations, which she admittedly carried, appears to me to be the cardinal question in this appeal. If the P. Caland did not, during that period of time, exhibit side-lights, then she was clearly to blame; because, whilst she was making about four knots an hour through the water, her three red lights conveyed a distinct intimation to approaching vessels that she was stationary. And, upon that hypothesis, I can find no ground for imputing either breach of the regulations or negligent seamanship to the Glamorgan. On the assumption that the P. Caland's side-lights were visible, I think it would be impossible to acquit the Glamorgan of fault. In that case the evidence does not disclose any circumstance which could justify her in steering her course across the bows of the P. Caland. It would, however, be necessary to consider whether the latter vessel was in a condition which warranted her being navigated under signals appropriate to a steamship not under command, and yet making way through the water; and, if not, whether her use of regulation signals, which she was not entitled to assume, was in any degree contributory to the collision. There might possibly be circumstances in which such a misuse of signals might tend to mislead another vessel, and so aid in producing a collision between them. But my present impression is, that the natural effect of a steamship under command masquerading as a ship not under command would be to induce other vessels to give her a wider berth than they would have allowed if she had carried her ordinary foremast light. These questions do not arise for decision in the view which I take upon the main question of fact. But I take this opportunity of stating my entire concurrence in the observations which have been made by the Lord Chancellor as to the construction of the 5th article of the Regulations. Whether the P. Caland did or did not properly exhibit her side-lights is a pure question of fact, mainly depending for its solution upon probabilities which are more or less matter of speculation. The President of the Admiralty Division came to the conclusion that her side-lights were not shown; and his view of the fact was accepted by all the judges of the Court of Appeal. In my opinion, it is a salutary principle that judges sitting in a court of last resort ought not to disturb concurrent findings of fact by the courts below, unless they can arrive at—I will not say a certain, because in such matters there can be no absolute certainty—but a tolerably clear conviction that these findings are erroneous. And the principle appears to me to be specially applicable in cases where the conclusion sought to be set aside chiefly rests upon considerations of probability. I may add that the principle was recognised as governing the decisions of this House in the Scotch appeal of Gray v. Turnbull (L. Rep. 2 H. of L. Sc. 53). That case commenced, not in the Sheriff Court, but in the Court of Session, so that their Lordships were not debarred by any statute from reviewing findings of fact as well as of law. If the question had come before me as judge of first instance, I am not prepared to affirm that I would have answered it in the same way as the learned judges of the Probate Division and the Court of Appeal. But this I can say, that, having done my best to weigh the probabilities of the case, I am unable to resist the impression that, whatever may be my own leaning, their decision is as likely to be right as a finding the other way. In these circumstances, I cannot disregard the rule of the House, and I therefore assent to the judgment proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—My Lords: I concur. I am myself strongly disposed to think that the red side-light was visible. But it is a question of inference and balance of probabilities, and I quite fail to find any clear fact on which I would be justified in arriving at a conclusion different from that of the courts below. It is manifest that your Lordships would be most reluctant to differ from such a conclusion without clear and strong reasons.

Lord MORRIS.—My Lords: I concur.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for appellants, Pritchard and Sons.
Solicitors for respondents, Thomas Cooper and Co.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

April 24 and 25, 1893.

(Present: The Right Hons. the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords WATSON, HOBHOUSE, MACNAGHTEN, and SHAND, and the Hon. G. DENMAN.)

CAMERON AND ANOTHER v. NYSTROM. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL OF NEW ZEALAND.

Master and servant — Common employment— Stevedore and shipowner—Control of discharge of ship by master.

Where a defendant has committed negligence by one of his servants, resulting in injury to the plaintiff, the defence of common employment is available to him only where he can show that the plaintiff was also his servant at the time of the occurrence of the injury.

Where a stevedore had contracted to discharge a vessel for a lump sum, the fact that the master of the vessel had control over some of the incidents of the discharge held not to make the servants of the stevedore the servants of the shipowner so as to free the stevedore from liability for injury to one of the seamen caused by their negligence.

Judgment of the court below affirmed.

Johnson v. Lindsay (65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; (1891) A. C. 371) discussed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand (Williams and Denniston, J.J., Prendergast C.J. and Edwards J. dissenting) upon a motion for judgment after a trial before Denniston, J. and a special jury. The facts appear fully from the judgment of their Lordships.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bigham, Q.C. and Sharpe appeared for the appellants, and their arguments appear sufficiently from the judgments. They cited Murray v. Currie, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 557; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 24.

Ollivier (of the New Zealand Bar), who appeared for the respondents, was not called upon to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell). — The respondent, the plaintiff in this action, was a seaman employed on board the vessel Brahmin. He was at work upon that vessel at the time when he received the injury in respect of which the action was brought. The injury was caused by the fall of some coils of wire, owing to the breaking of part of the gear which was being used in the discharging of the cargo. The discharging gear was, as the jury have found, fixed in an improper and negligent manner, and its being so fixed was the cause of the injury to the plaintiff. The defendants were a firm of stevedores employed in discharging the vessel. They were engaged as stevedores by the master of the vessel to discharge her at the rate of so much a ton. The vessel was to find the gear, but the stevedores brought their own men, foreman and workmen, to effect the discharge. The person guilty of the negligence was the foreman of the defendants, a man named Gellatly, who rigged up the gear. The question raised in the action was whether, in those circumstances, the defendants were responsible to the plaintiff for the injury he received. At the trial, apart from a subsidiary question of contributory negligence, to which their Lordships will call attention presently, the only defence raised, beyond the defence that there was no negligence—a defence which has been negatived by the jury—was that the plaintiff could not maintain an action against the defendants, even assuming that the foreman was their servant and that it was by his negligence the injury was occasioned, because the plaintiff was engaged in a common employment with the stevedores' men, and that their being thus engaged in a common employment precluded the plaintiff in point of law from any right of action. At the time when the question was argued before the court below the case of Johnson v. Lindsay, in which there was a difference of opinion in the Court of Appeal, had been decided in the Court of Appeal (61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 864; 23 Q. B. Div. 508), but not in the House of Lords (65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; (1891) A. C. 371). The majority of the Court of Appeal had held (Fry, L.J. dissenting) that it was not necessary to the defence of common employment that the plaintiff should be in the employment of the master whose servant's negligence caused him injury. The majority of the court came to the conclusion that the sub-contractor and his servants might all be regarded as in the employment of the contractor, whose servant the plaintiff was, and that this sufficed to establish the defence of common employment. In the House of Lords the decision was reversed, and it was held that, in order to make this defence available, there must not only be common employment, but common employment under the master whose servant was guilty of negligence.

It is to be observed that the question of common employment only arises as a defence, on the assumption that the person who did the injury was the servant of the person sued. Unless this be the case theperson sued is under no liability, because he is sued in respect of an injury not caused by himself or by anyone for whom he is responsible. And, therefore, common employment only becomes necessary as a defence, and is only relevant when the person doing the injury is a servant of the person sued. In their Lordships' opinion the House of Lords has determined that, where the person sued has committed negligence by one of his servants, the defence of common employment is only available to him where he can show that the person suing was also his servant at the time of the occurrence of the injury. In the judgment delivered by one of their Lordships (Lord Herschell) in the case of Johnson v. Lindsay the law was thus stated: "These authorities are sufficient to establish the proposition that, unless the person sought to be rendered liable for the negligence of his servant can show that the person so seeking to make him liable was himself in his service, the defence of common employment is not open to him." It is clear, therefore, that in the present case the defence of common employment can only arise and be successful if the defendants can show, admitting that the negligence of their foreman Gellatly caused the injury, that the plaintiff was in their service. Otherwise the doctrine of common employment has no application.

When that was once found to be the law, and the learned counsel who appeared for the defendants was pressed with it, he admitted that it was impossible for him, after the decision of the House of Lords in Johnson v. Lindsay, to maintain that the defendants were free from liability by reason of the doctrine of common employment. But he then contended that the defendants were not liable inasmuch as the person who caused the injury was not at the time really acting in the service of the defendants, but as the servant of the shipowner. No doubt if that could be established it would afford a defence to the action. This appears to be the only question open on this appeal, after the decision in Johnson v. Lindsay. When the evidence is examined the contention appears to their Lordships to be utterly untenable. Gellatly was employed and paid by the stevedores. At the time when he was doing the work in question he was doing it for the stevedores, inasmuch as the stevedores were to be paid a lump sum for discharging the vessel; and it was to enable them to earn the sum so contracted to be paid to them that Gellatly was working at the time he did the act complained of. There was thus present every element necessary to establish that he was the servant of the stevedores. The case for the defendants must go this length, that the stevedores would not have been liable, but that the shipowner would, to any person injured by the negligence of one of the stevedores' men. It seems to their Lordships only necessary to state the length to which the proposition of the defendants must go to show that it cannot be sustained. Reliance was placed upon expressions used in the evidence, with regard to the extent to which the mate and master had the right to direct and control the acts of the stevedores' servants. That does not seem to their Lordships in the least inconsistent with their being the servants of the stevedores, and not the servants of the shipowner. There was no express agreement with regard to the extent to which the master and mate should have control over them. That control is only to be implied from the circumstances in which they were employed. The relation of stevedore to shipowner is a well-known relation, involving no doubt the right of the master of the vessel to control the order in which the cargo should be discharged, and various other incidents of the discharge, but in no way putting the servants of the stevedore so completely under the control and at the disposition of the master as to make them the servants of the shipowner, who neither pays them, nor selects them, nor could discharge them, nor stands in any other relation to them than this, that they are the servants of a contractor employed on behalf of the ship to do a particular work. For these reasons their Lordships think that the main question raised in this action must be decided in favour of the plaintiff. Another question was raised at the trial: whether the defendants are exempt from responsibility, because the plaintiff was in a position in which he would be likely to be injured if any accident happened to the discharging gear. The jury found that placing the plaintiff where he was working at the time of the accident was in the circumstances an act of negligence. It was admitted by the learned counsel for the defendants that unless that involved, and it clearly does not involve, a finding of personal negligence on the part of the plaintiff, it was impossible to argue that it was a defence to the action. Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Lee, Bolton, and Lee.

Solicitors for the respondent, A. R. and H. Steele.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Monday, Feb. 6, 1893.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Smith, L.JJ.)

Wilson, Sons, and Co. v. Balcarres Brook Steamship Company. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice—Parties—Adding defendant—Joint contract—Co-contractor resident out of the jurisdiction—Ship's disbursements—Order XVI., r. 11.

When one co-contractor is a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction, the other co-contractor who has been sued alone is not entitled as of right to an order that his co-contractor shall be joined as a defendant, but the court or a judge has a discretion whether they will, under the circumstances of the case, make such order or not.

This was an appeal by the defendants, the Balcarres Brook Steamship Company, from an order of the Divisional Court (Day and Collins, JJ.) setting aside an order of Wright, J. made at chambers.

(a) Reported by J. H. Williams, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

These defendants were sued by the plaintiffs upon a contract by which they had, jointly with one Benier, agreed to indemnify the plaintiffs against certain disbursements to be made by the plaintiffs in respect of a steamship, of which these defendants were owners, and which had been chartered by Benier.

Benier was a foreigner residing at Antwerp, and had not been made a defendant in this action.

These defendants applied at chambers under Order XVI., r. 11, for an order that Benier should be joined as a defendant.

Wright, J., at chambers, made the order, thinking that he was bound to do so by the decision in Pilley v. Robinson (58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 110; 20 Q. B. Div. 155); he said, however, that if he had had any discretion he would have refused to make the order.

The Divisional Court (Day and Collins, JJ.), on appeal, set aside the order, being of opinion that the defendants were not entitled to the order as of right, and that it ought not to be made under the circumstances of the case.

These defendants appealed.

T. G. Carver for the appellants.—These defendants have a right to have Benier added as a defendant, because he is jointly liable under the contract upon which this action is brought. A defendant, who is sued upon a joint contract, has a right to demand that his co-contractor shall be joined as a defendant:

Kendall v. Hamilton, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 418; L. Rep. 4 App. Cas. 504; Pilley v. Robinson, 58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 110; 20 Q. B. Div. 155.

Before the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, a plea in abatement was a bar to the action, although the co-contractor who was not joined was out of the jurisdiction:

Sheppard v. Baillie, 6 T. R. 327.

By that statute it was provided that a plea in abatement should not be pleaded when the co-contractor, who was not joined, was out of the jurisdiction. Now, by Order XXI., r. 20, the plea in abatement has been abolished, and, therefore, the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, has ceased to be applicable, being only applicable to that particular form of remedy. The reason for that statute has also gone, for now leave to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction can be obtained under Order XI., r. 1. This case comes within Order XI., r. 1 (e) and (g), because Benier is a proper party to this action, and because the contract is to be performed within the jurisdiction:

Massey v. Heynes, 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 470; 21 Q. B. Div. 330.

H. F. Boyd for the respondents.—It is a matter of discretion and not of right whether such an order as this will be made. The word "may" is used in rule 11 of Order XVI., and that imports a discretion; under rule 1 of Order XI. also there is a discretion for the same reason. In such a case as this the proper course for these defendants to take would be to issue a third party notice to Benier, which can be served out of the jurisdiction:

Dubout v. Macpherson, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 166; 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 689; 23 Q. B. Div. 340; Swansea Shipping Company v. Duncan, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879; 1 Q. B. Div. 644.

Both Wright, J. and the Divisional Court refused this order as a matter of discretion, and it would be unfair to the plaintiffs to compel them to join Benier as a defendant; he being a foreigner out of the jurisdiction. Considerable expense and delay would be caused.

Carver replied.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs sued the defendants upon a contract of guarantee. It has not been denied that the guarantee was a joint guarantee by the defendants, the Balcarres Brook Steamship Company and one Benier. The plaintiffs have sued, and have served the writ upon, the defendant steamship company and not Benier. Thereupon an application by summons was made by the defendant steamship company asking for an order upon the plaintiffs that they should join Benier as a co-defendant. The question before us is, what are the rights of these defendants in that matter. Now, Wright, J. at chambers said that, if the matter was one for the exercise of his discretion, he would not, under the circumstances of the case, make the order, but that he thought that the case of Pilley v. Robinson (ubi sup.) determined the matter, and showed that it was a matter of absolute right in the defendants and not a matter of discretion. When the case came before the Divisional Court it was argued by these defendants that they had an absolute right to the order, and that it was not a matter of discretion, and they did not ask the court to exercise any discretion. I will not, however, now bind them to that view of the case. The co-contractor, Benier, is a foreigner resident abroad, and the questions which arise are, first, whether the defendants have an absolute right to have him joined as a defendant; and, second, whether, if the matter is one of discretion, we can say that the way in which the judge at chambers said he would exercise his discretion, if he had any, was wrong.

First of all then, have these defendants an absolute right to this order? Under the common law, if the contract was a joint contract, the defendant had a right to have his co contractor joined, and if the contract was joint the plaintiff failed if he did not sue all the joint contractors. Then it was provided that the defendant must make this objection by a plea in abatement. Then, by the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 8, it became necessary for the defendant to state, in his plea in abatement, the names and residences of the co-contractors whom he said were not joined, and that statute made a distinction between cases where all the co-contractors resided within the jurisdiction and where they did not; if they all resided within the jurisdiction one of them had an absolute right to insist on his plea in abatement; if one was resident out of the jurisdiction the plea in abatement could not be pleaded. That was the state of things after the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42. Then came the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), which, by sects. 18 and 19, gave power to serve notice of a writ upon a defendant out of the jurisdiction. That Act did not repeal the provisions of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, and it was then clear that, although a plaintiff could serve a defendant out of the jurisdiction, he could not plead in abatement because such defendant if a co-contractor was resident abroad. That was the state of things when the Judicature Acts were passed.

The Judicature Acts seem to me to have done only that which the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 did, but upon a larger scale, that is, to have allowed service out of the jurisdiction in more cases than was formerly allowed; and further, by doing away with pleas in abatement, to have prevented the application of the provisions of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42. The Judicature Acts, however, were not intended to alter rights; they gave larger powers in respect of procedure, but intended that procedure to be applied as before the Acts in reference to rights. So that when both co-contractors are resident in this country, then if the present procedure is used in the same way as the previous procedure, one of them, if sued, has a right to bring in the other to be sued as a defendant, because he is a co-contractor. The words of Order XVI., r. 11, certainly do give the court a discretion, the word "may" being used. It is not necessary in this case to decide whether, when both co-contractors are resident in this country, the court can never refuse to order both to be joined as defendants. I doubt whether in an extreme case the court would be bound, without any discretion, to do so. As a general rule, however, I should say that the court is bound to order that both co-contractors shall be joined as defendants. When one of the co-contractors was out of the jurisdiction, before the Judicature Acts, the one who was sued alone could not plead in abatement, that is, he could not force the plaintiff to join the other, and the plaintiff could go on against the one alone. If, therefore, it is right to carry out the rule under the Judicature Acts as nearly as possible in the same way as before with reference to the rights of the parties, when one co-contractor is resident abroad, the court has a discretion whether it will order the one who is resident abroad to be joined as a defendant, but that discretion should be exercised so as to leave the rights of the parties as nearly as possible the same as before. Still, what is now equivalent to a plea in abatement is no longer prohibited; but the court has a discretion whether it will make an order which will have the same effect as a plea in abatement. If it will make no real difference to the plaintiff, the court can probably exercise its discretion and make the order, but that discretion must be exercised with great care, The argument that, where one co-contractor is resident abroad, the other, if sued, has an absolute right to force the plaintiff to join them both as defendants, would give rise to great difficulties; thus, the court must order the co-contractor who is abroad to be joined; the writ must be served upon him; the leave of the court is necessary before that can be done; the court has a discretion whether it will grant such leave, and the court which is asked to give such leave may refuse to give it under the circumstances of the case; that would place the plaintiff in a most absurd position. It must therefore be a matter of discretion. This, then, being a matter of discretion, it seems to me that no harm is done to these defendants by leaving them to their ordinary remedy against their co-contractor. If he was a co-contractor, they can claim contribution from him. If these defendants cannot sue their co-contractor they are seeking to place a burden upon the plaintiffs for the purpose of getting a benefit for themselves. At chambers Wright, J. said that, if he had a discretion he would have exercised it against the application, and the Divisional Court said the same. I should have exercised the discretion in the same manner as the judges below, and I think this appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, was intended to lessen the rigour of the common law, and remove the hardship which was inflicted upon the plaintiff by a plea in abatement when one co-contractor was resident out of the jurisdiction. By the common law, if a plaintiff desired to sue upon a joint contract, he had to sue all the joint contractors. If he did not do so a plea in abatement by those who were sued would upset the action, and this rule compelled the plaintiff to sue all the joint contractors, whether resident within the jurisdiction or not. That was an obvious hardship. The statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, altered that, and enacted that a plea in abatement should not be allowed unless it was stated that the co-contractor who was not sued was within the jurisdiction. Thenceforward the plaintiff could be compelled to sue together all joint contractors who were within the jurisdiction, but not those who were without the jurisdiction. Then, subsequently, the Judicature Acts did away with the plea in abatement altogether. That, however, was not intended to alter the law as to the rights of parties. It still remained the right of a defendant to have all his co-contractors sued together with himself, subject to the provisions of the Judicature Acts. In Kendal v. Hamilton (ubi sup.) Lord Cairns pointed out that the ordinary rule was that all persons jointly liable upon a contract ought to be sued together, and that under the Judicature Acts the application to have an omitted joint contractor included as a defendant ought to be granted or refused upon the same principles as those on which a plea in abatement would have succeeded or failed. He never said that the substance of the old law was affected in the important case of one joint contractor being out of the jurisdiction. There is nothing in the Judicature Acts to show that such an alteration was intended. The language of Order XVI., r. 11, gives a discretion. It might often be most unjust to insist upon a co-contractor being added as a defendant when he is out of the jurisdiction. The contention, therefore, that it is a matter of right fails. As to the exercise of the discretion in this case I have nothing to add. The court below and the judge at chambers thought that, as a matter of discretion, the order ought not to be made, and I cannot say they were wrong.

Smith, L.J.—The question in this appeal is whether a joint contractor who is resident in this country, and is sued here by the plaintiff, can compel the plaintiff to join as a defendant the other joint contractor who is resident out of the jurisdiction. It is clear to me that Wright, J. thought that he was bound to make the order upon the authority of the case of Pilley v. Robinson (ubi sup.). Upon looking at that case it appears at once that it covers only half the appellants' contention; it was a case in which both the joint contractors were resident in this country. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred of that kind I think that the joint contractor who was sued would be entitled to an order that the other joint contractor should be sued in the same way as he would before have been entitled to plead in abatement. That, however, is not the same as this case. The joint contractor who is sued in this case is trying to force the plaintiff to join as a defendant the other joint contractor who is out of the jurisdiction. The old plea in abatement would not have enabled him to do that, because this joint contractor was resident out of the jurisdiction. Now, under the Judicature Acts, the plea in abatement is abolished by Order XXI., r. 20, and by rule 11 of Order XVI. power is given to the court or judge to order that all necessary parties shall be added. By that rule a discretion is given to the court or judge, and in some cases an order to join as defendant a joint contractor resident abroad might properly be made. Here the judge and court would not exercise their discretion to make such an order, and I agree with them in that. The appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: for the appellants, Wynne, Holme, and Wynne, for Simpson and North, Liverpool; for the respondents, Ingledew, Ince, and Colt.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Friday, June 3, 1892.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. H. Jeune) and SMITH, J.)

THE NIFA. (a)

Carriage of goods — Charter-party—Printed and written clauses—Evidence of custom—Discharge.

Where by a charter-party agreeing that the cargo was to be taken to and from the ship at merchant's risk and expense, the parties added in writing that the cargo was to be "supplied as fast as steamer could load and stow same, and discharged as fast as steamer can deliver, and according to the custom of the respective ports," evidence of custom to prove that at the port of discharge the cost of discharging the cargo from the ship's rail on to the quay is paid by the shipowner was not admissible, as the clause as to the payment of delivery and the customary mode of delivery, meaning thereby the time and manner, were not inconsistent, and by the express terms of the charter-party the charterer must pay such expense.

Letters and telegrams between the parties prior to the execution of the charter-party were held not admissible in evidence to explain the contract on the ground of ambiguity.

THIS was an action by the owners of the s.s. Nifa on the Admiralty side of Great Yarmouth County Court, against charterers for breach of charter-party.

The plaintiffs claimed 6*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.*, being the extra cost of discharging 183 standards of wooden goods from the Nifa at Yarmouth in consequence of the defendants' refusal to take them from alongside the ship.

By the terms of the charter-party, the Nifa was to load deals in Sweden, "the cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense, where she can lie always afloat and safe, and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Yarmouth, Norfolk, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and deliver the same, always afloat."

The above was in print, the following clause was in writing: "The cargo to be supplied as fast as steamer can load and stow same, and discharged as fast as steamer can deliver, and according to the custom of the respective ports."

On the Nifa's arrival at Great Yarmouth, she was moored 15ft. from the quay, where she lay always afloat. The charterers, by letter, at once instructed the master of their readiness to receive the cargo on the wharf.

By the custom of the port, the shipowner must deliver on the quay, and pay the cost thereof, and hence communications passed between the parties as to who was to pay the cost of the discharge between the ship's rail and the quay.

It was, however, arranged that this question should be subsequently decided, and that in the first instance the shipowner should deliver on the quay. This they did, and now sought to recover the cost thereof.

At the trial before the County Court judge, he having admitted evidence of the custom of the port as to delivery, and certain letters and telegrams between the parties prior to the execution of the charter-party to explain its meaning, held that the evidence of custom contradicted the clause that the cargo was to be taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense, and gave judgment for the defendants.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The correspondence and the evidence of custom ought to have been excluded. The case of Scrutton v. Childs (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 212; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 373) relied on in the court below is inconsistent with later decisions. The two clauses are not inconsistent. The clause as to custom relates only to the time and manner of discharge, and does not override the express provision that the cargo shall be taken from the ship at merchant's expense:

Holman v. Wade, Times, May 11, 1877;
Hayton v. Irwin, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 666; 5 C. P. Div. 130; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212;
Lishman v. Christie, 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552; 19 Q. B. Div. 333; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 186.

Poyser, for the defendants, contrà.—The intention of the parties is to be gathered from the fact that the clause as to custom is added in writing, as was the case in Scrutton v. Childs (ubi sup.). In the cases cited, all the clauses were printed. The judge was right in admitting the letters and telegrams to explain the ambiguity of the contract:

The Curfew, 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 330; (1891) P. 131; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29.

The PRESIDENT.—The only question we have to decide is, whether evidence of a custom was properly admitted. The County Court judge has admitted it, and has given effect to it in his judgment. There is no need for us to consider the effect of such evidence, because, before we enter into it, we have to decide whether the evidence is admissible. The material words in the charter-party are these: "The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense," and "the cargo to be supplied as fast as steamer can load and stow same, and discharged as fast as steamer can deliver, and according to the custom of the respective ports." It is said that, according to the custom of the port in question, it was not the merchant who had to pay for taking the timber to a place some little distance from the water side, but it is said that that expense is to be borne by the ship. The case of Scrutton v. Childs (ubi sup.) was cited in support of this contention. There, as here, part of the charter-party was in print and part in writing, and the question was which was to prevail. Mellor, J. said: "The parties appear to have forgotten to strike out the printed words, which contradicted the written ones, and the question for us to decide is, which is to prevail of two contradictories." It was there held that, of the two, the written words were to be preferred. But is there any contradiction here? If not, we need strike out nothing In Holman v. Wade (ubi snp.), where the cargo was to be "taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense as customary," an attempt was made to read the words "as customary" so as to override the words "at merchant's risk." That attempt failed. In the case of Hayton v. Irwin (ubi sup.) a similar question arose, but the evidence of custom was excluded. A still stronger case is that of Lishman v. Christie (ubi sup.). It was there provided that "the ship should load as customary a full cargo of fir," and that "the cargo should be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense." Lord Esher's view was, that evidence of custom could not be admitted to vary the provision as to the discharge of the cargo. I see no difficulty in this case in reading this contract so as to involve no contradiction. By the first clause it is clear that the cargo is to "brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense." The latter clause then provides that the cargo is to be "supplied as fast as steamer can load and stow same, and discharged as fast as steamer can deliver, and according to the custom of the respective ports." It appears to me that you may very well say that the words "according to the custom" in the latter clause do not modify "at the merchant's risk and expense," but only control the time and manner in which the cargo is to be loaded, stowed, and discharged. That, I think, meets the point that is raised upon the case of Scrutton v. Childs. I am not saying that, if in fact there be a contradiction between two clauses, the rule there laid down does not apply. But if there is no contradiction, it certainly does not apply. Reliance was further placed upon some correspondence which was admitted. It was said the case of The Curfew (ubi sup.) justified the admission of these letters. In that case evidence was admitted to explain the meaning of the words "always afloat," which were held to be ambiguous. But here there is no ambiguity and no ground to justify the admission of evidence of what passed between the parties to control a contract subsequently signed by them. I think the appeal must be allowed.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

SMITH, J.—This is an action by a shipowner against a goods owner to recover 6*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.*, which the plaintiff had to pay to unload timber from the rail of his ship to the quay. The point in dispute is whether he or the goods owner ought to pay this expense. It seems to me to be a very clear case. First of all, I am of opinion that we can only look at the charter. I protest against looking at letters and telegrams when a written contract has been come to between the parties. When letters and telegrams are put in, you in most cases find that persons holding different views are disagreeing till they come to the written contract. By the charter, who is to pay for taking the goods from the rail to the quay? The cargo is to be "brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense." The words are clear. The merchants are to bear that expense. The shipowner is to put the goods on the ship's rail, and the merchant is to pay the expense of taking them from the rail to the quay. The other material clause is that the cargo is to be "supplied as fast as steamer can load and stow same, and discharged as fast as steamer can deliver, and according to the custom of the respective ports." How is that to be read? It seems to me to be clear that this cargo was to be supplied to the ship at merchant's risk and expense as fast as steamer could load and stow same, and to be discharged from the ship at merchant's risk and expense as fast as steamer could deliver same. We are now asked to strike out the words "at merchant's risk and expense," on account of the written words, "according to the custom of the respective ports." I read those words as meaning the mode of loading and unloading, or possibly as the place where the goods are to be delivered. That does not contradict the express words of the contract that the taking to and from the ship's rail is at merchant's expense. I say, in my view, this is a clear case. Now as to the authorities. It seems to me that in Scrutton v. Childs (ubi sup.) I did not take the right point. I argued whether the printed or written part was to control the contract. The point I ought to have taken—the point always since taken—is that the two clauses were not contradictory. Taking to and from the ship's rail is to be at merchant's expense. To be loaded and unloaded as customary does not contradict that. It means that the loading and unloading are to be according to the custom of the port, but the question of who is to bear the expense is not affected. I do not know whether Scrutton v. Childs (ubi sup.) has been expressly overruled, but, in my opinion, it cannot stand after Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.) and Hayton v. Irvin (ubi sup.). In my judgment, the evidence of custom was not admissible, and this appeal succeeds.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Thos. Cooper and Co.
Solicitors for defendants, Diver and Preston, Great Yarmouth.

Wednesday, June 22, 1892

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE SALTBURN. (a)

Collision—High Court—County Court costs—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3.

Whether successful plaintiffs who having instituted a collision action in the High Court recover less than 300*l. will be allowed costs depends upon the particular circumstances of each case, and if the circumstances are such that the court thinks the plaintiffs acted reasonably in instituting the action in the High Court, they will be entitled to costs.*

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem asking the court after judgment to condemn the defendants in the sum of 226*l.* 5*s.* agreed damages and interest thereon and in the costs of the action.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The collision occurred on the 26th Sept. 1891 about 8.30 p.m. in the Thames between the plaintiffs' steamship the Mentmore of 2231 tons net register and the defendants' steamship the Saltburn of 837 tons net register.

The plaintiffs by their writ claimed 1500*l.* The defendants counter-claimed.

The Mentmore, at the time of the collision, was proceeding down the river under steam in charge of two tugs, when she was overtaken and run into by the Saltburn at Blackwall Point.

The case was tried before Sir Charles Butt, assisted by Elder Brethren. It commenced about 12.15 p.m. on the 24th March, and finished about 11.45 a.m. on the 25th March. Five witnesses were called and examined by each side.

The Saltburn was found alone to blame, and the assessment of the damages was referred to the registrar and merchants.

The plaintiffs filed a claim amounting to 339*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.*, but before the reference was heard the damages were agreed at 226*l.* 5*s.*

Sir Walter Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—The plaintiffs acted reasonably in bringing this action in the High Court. The mere fact that in the event they have got less than 300*l.*, up to which amount the County Court has jurisdiction, ought not to deprive them of costs. There is no hard-and-fast rule. In this case a substantial sum has been recovered. The trial lasted two days:

Rocket v. Chippingdale, 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 641; (1891) 2 Q. B. 293;
The Asia, 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 327 (1891) P. 121; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 25;
The Herald, 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 324; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 542;
The Williamina, 3 P. Div. 97.

Myburgh, Q.C., for the defendants, contrà.—This court in the cases of The Asia (ubi sup.) and The Herald (ubi sup.) laid down the principle that in the absence of exceptional circumstances, plaintiffs who institute actions in the High Court, which they might have tried in the County Court, will not get costs. Rockett v. Chippingdale (ubi sup.) did not overrule the above two cases. In this case there were no exceptional circumstances. The questions in issue were simple matters of fact.

BARNES, J.—This is a case of collision in the Thames. The only question I have now to determine is, whether the plaintiffs who have been successful are entitled to costs in the High Court. I have looked through the cases referred to in argument, and I do not think that there is any substantial difference between them as to the principle which should be applied. The question is, whether the plaintiffs have acted properly and reasonably in bringing this action in the High Court. The cases that have been cited do not really help one in determining any particular case. In my view each must depend upon its own facts, and those facts must be considered having regard to the principle I have just indicated, a principle which seems to run through all these cases, though perhaps somewhat differently expressed. What facts will show that the plaintiff has reasonably and properly brought his action in the High Court must vary considerably in the different cases, and it is difficult to lay down with precision what facts and what state of circumstances will so justify him. In such cases, as I have said, the result must depend on the consideration of the general facts. Apply that principle to this case, and I think that, having regard to the size of these vessels, the nature of the collision, the length of time the trial lasted, and the judgment of the president, this case was a proper one to bring in the High Court. I therefore give judgment for the plaintiffs in the terms of the notice of motion, with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Pritchard and Sons, for Bateson, Warr, and Bateson, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Botterell and Roche.

Wednesday, Nov 25, 1892.

(Before BARNES, J., assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE MONTE ROSA. (a)

Collision—Position of anchor—Negligence—Compulsory pilotage—Thames Navigation Rules 1872, art. 20.

The Thames rule as to carrying the anchor stock awash does not render a vessel liable for a breach of that rule, unless the breach contribute to collision, and consequently, although the defendants' vessel is carrying the anchor in an improper position, if those in charge of the plaintiffs' vessel, being able to see the position of the anchor, could by the exercise of ordinary care up to the moment of collision have avoided it, the plaintiff, who is to blame, cannot recover for damage done by the anchor, unless it is shown that the defendant, on the plaintiff's negligence becoming apparent, could have prevented the injury done by the anchor.

The position of an anchor which is required for letting go in a port is within the jurisdiction of the pilot. If damage is caused by the anchor, so placed by the pilot's authority, the owners are not liable, notwithstanding the fact that the position of the anchor is in breach of a port rule.

THIS was a collision action in rem brought by the Elliot Steam Tug Company against the owners of the steamship Monte Rosa. The collision occurred in Bugsby's Reach of the river Thames on the 1st June 1892.

The facts on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 6 p.m. on the 1st June 1892 the steam-tug Contest, 10 tons register, of which the plaintiffs are owners, was in Bugsby's Reach. There was a moderate S.W. breeze, the weather was fine and clear, and there was little or no tide, it being nearly high water. The Contest, which had been engaged to attend on the Monte Rosa and help her to dock, was proceeding straight up the reach ahead and on the starboard bow of the Monte Rosa. At such time the Contest was hailed by someone on board the Monte Rosa to pass her throw-line on board for the purpose of obtaining the tow hawser. The Monte Rosa was then about thirty feet from the Contest on the port quarter. The tug's throw-line was accidentally thrown on the starboard bow of the Monte Rosa, and whilst the steamer's towing hawser was being made fast and the Contest was all clear of the Monte Rosa, the helm of the latter was suddenly ported without warning to the tug, and although the engines of the Contest were put full speed ahead at once and the helm hard-a-ported, the starboard anchor of the Monte Rosa, which was hanging perpendicularly from the hawse, holed the Contest below the water-line, and then the Monte Rosa's starboard bow and stem struck the Contest on the port side about twenty feet from the taffrail, doing so much damage that she lost her propeller and drove ashore full of water. The plaintiffs alleged that the Monte Rosa, knowing the position of the Contest, ported improperly without warning; that she did not reduce speed after requesting the Contest to pass her throw-line; that she carried her starboard anchor in a negligent and dangerous manner, and that she failed to comply with art. 20 Thames Rules 1872 and arts. 2, 14, 16 Thames Rules 1880.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 6.15 p.m. on the 1st June 1892, the steamship Monte Rosa, belonging to the port of South Shields, of 1558 tons register, bound for the South West India Dock with a general cargo from Philadelphia, was in Bugsby's Reach. The weather was fine and clear with a fresh S.W. breeze, and it was about high water slack. The Monte Rosa, which had been accompanied from Gravesend by the steam-tug Contest, was heading straight up the reach rather to the north of mid-channel under a steady helm at a speed of about six knots, and was in charge of a duly licensed pilot. In these circumstances the Contest, which had previously been on the bow, and afterwards astern of the Monte Rosa, drew up along starboard side, until she had placed herself on the starboard bow of the steamer, and from ten to fifteen yards distant. The Contest was then apparently heading straight up the river, and a line was thrown from her to the Monte Rosa, though no orders to throw any such line or make fast had been given from the latter vessel. Directly afterwards, instead of keeping straight up the reach as she could and ought to have done, the tug suddenly took a sheer towards and across the bows of the Monte Rosa. The Contest was loudly hailed to keep off, and the engines of the Monte Rosa were stopped and her helm kept steady; but the tug continued to angle across the bows of the Monte Rosa, and with her port quarter struck the stem and starboard bow of the latter. She did herself great damage, and also some slight damage above water from the anchor of the Monte Rosa, which was, by the pilot's orders, hanging at the hawse-pipe with the stock above water. It was contended that the tug improperly starboarded, or that her head was negligently allowed to come to port. The defendants also pleaded that the Monte Rosa was compulsorily in charge of a pilot at the time of the collision. Those in charge of the tug were aware of the position of the steamer's anchor.

Art. 20 Thames Navigation Rules 1872 provides that:

> No vessel shall be navigated or allowed to lie in the river with its anchor or anchors hanging by the cable perpendicularly from the hawse-pipe unless the stock shall be awash, except during such time as shall be absolutely necessary for catting or fishing the said anchor or anchors, or during such time as may be absolutely necessary for getting such vessel under way.

Pyke, Q.C. (with him Nelson) for the plaintiffs. —The Monte Rosa infringed art. 20 of the Thames Rules by carrying her anchor where she did. [BARNES, J. referred to Davies v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 546.] That case does not apply. The Monte Rosa is to blame:

The Ripon, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 438; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 365; 10 P. Div. 65;
Cayzer, Irvine, and Co. v. The Carron Company; The Margaret, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 361; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 371; 9 App. Cas. 873;
The Bernina, 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; 5 Asp. Mar Law Cas. 577; 12 P. Div. 89.
The Margaret, 6 P. D. 76; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 375.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Aspinall, Q.C., for the defendants, cited

The Rigborgs Minde, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 232; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 123; 8 P. Div. 152;
The Gipsy King, 2 W. Rob. 537.

BARNES, J. (after reviewing the facts) said:—The Elder Brethren advise me that, in their view, the damage to the plates and the propellor of the tug was done by the anchor, and I see no reason to differ from them. In fact, I accept their view on that part of the case. Finding that the anchor did the immediate damage to this tug, that raises a question of some nicety. Now there can be no doubt that the anchor of the Monte Rosa was carried up the Thames with the shackle up at the hawse-pipe, and in that position the stock was considerably out of the water and the flukes were just in—just about level with the water—and it is clear that that mode of carriage was not in accordance with the rule. The defendants, however, say that the anchor was carried in that position by the orders of the pilot, and that that being so, as the anchor's position is a matter for the pilot to deal with, they are exonerated from liability for anything that happened in consequence of that position of the anchor by virtue of the pilot's orders. That, again, raises two questions, one of fact and one of law. The first question is, whether the anchor was in the position in which it was in accordance with the pilot's orders. I have no hesitation in accepting the story of the two officers of the ship that the anchor was in its position by the pilot's orders at the time of the accident. Then it is contended on behalf of the defendants that, if that is so, the position of the anchor is a matter within the pilot's jurisdiction, even though there is a rule to the effect that it ought not to be in the position to which it was ordered by him. The short way of putting that point is, that the position of the anchor forms part of the navigation of the ship which is in the pilot's jurisdiction. It is said on the other side that that is not the true position with regard to the anchor; that it is analogous to the case of lights. The case of The Ripon (ubi sup.) was cited on the question of lights, where a vessel in the Humber had, in addition to the side lights, by the pilot's orders placed a white light from the main peak showing astern, and it was held that that was a breach of the statutory regulations; that there being no circumstances to make that departure from the rule necessary, and it being impossible to say it might not have contributed to the collision, the owners were not exempt from liability; and that, although the light had been exhibited by the order of the pilot, the master should not have permitted an infringement of the regulation. It is said by Mr. Pyke that that is strictly analogous to the case of the anchor; that in the judgment of the then Butt, J., afterwards the President, the master must consider for himself whether the law in respect of lights is being infringed, and if it is he must take steps to stop such infringement. If one states the case a little more broadly, it is that the position of the lights and their proper exhibition is a matter for the master and not for the pilot. I have considered that with some care by the light of two other cases cited, namely, The Rigborgs Minde (ubi sup.) and The Gipsy King (ubi sup.). In the latter case, in which a vessel had come into collision with another in such a way that the anchor which had not been hoisted on deck, nor catted as proper and customary, and was hanging over her bow under water, made a hole in the other vessel, Dr. Lushington said: "If the pilot, then, is to decide the mode of anchoring a vessel, it appears to me it follows as a necessary consequence that the pilot is responsible to see that the anchor is in a proper situation to be dropped when necessary. In the present case this view of the pilot's duty is confirmed by the rules and regulations of the river in which this collision occurred, and in which he is licensed to act as pilot. Those rules specially enjoin what is to be done as regards having the anchor in a proper position ready to be dropped, and such rules must be considered as peculiarly binding upon the pilot on board the Gipsy King as being prescribed by the authority under which he was entitled to act." In The Rigborgs Minde damage had been done by the fluke of a schooner's anchor piercing the side of a fly-boat. The court held that there was no want of care on the part of the crew, and it was held that the damage was caused by the fault of the pilot in the course of his duty. It is said as against that, that even if it is within the pilot's duty to attend to the position of the anchor and give orders as to the anchor, still the master is to blame, and his owners through him, because the master is bound to comply with the rules, and interfere with the pilot in his orders in connection with his anchorage if they are infringing the rules. I think it would be dangerous to lay that down as a sound proposition in face of such a decision as that of The Argo (Swabey, 462), where a steamer which was being navigated on the wrong side of the channel, contrary to the then section of the Act, was doing so under the pilot's orders, and it was held that the master was not bound to interfere, and that the owners were not responsible for the damage caused thereby. It really comes, when one considers it, to be a question of whether what is being done is part of the ordering of the navigation of the ship and her manœuvres, and that class of case seems to be much more analogous to the present than that of a light, with which the pilot really has nothing to do at the time, and which it is entirely the master's duty to see to, so as to make a ship in a proper state to navigate according to the rules. I therefore think on this point, on which there is not very much authority, that, although the rule is being infringed if the pilot orders it, it is the pilot's fault, and the owners are exempt from responsibility for his action in the matter.

There is, however, a further point in this case which I think is equally fatal, if established, to the plaintiffs' case. The rules of the Thames have not the same sanction that the sea rules have, in this, that by the Thames rules it must be shown that the breach of the rule contributed to the collision, whereas the statutory provisions provide in substance that it is sufficient to show a breach of the regulations, and then, unless the ship breaking the regulation can establish that by no possibility could that breach have anything to do with the matter, she is held to blame. The effect of that difference in the present case and in Thames rule cases is to require the plaintiffs to establish that the breach of the rule contributed to the collision, to bring in principles which have been very tersely expressed in Mr. Marsden's book at page 23, and which are also recapitulated and adopted in Mr. Beven's book on "Negligence," where he criticises the cases. It seems to me that, if the case falls within the second rule as laid down in Mr. Marsden's book, namely, that the plaintiff can recover nothing, though the defendant was guilty of negligence contributing to the collision, if the plaintiff by ordinary care exercised up to the moment of collision could have avoided it, the plaintiff must fail in his case. That rule so stated is adopted, I should think, and certainly is in accordance with the decision, in Cayzer, Irvine, and Co. v. The Carron Company (ubi sup.), where Lord Watson in giving judgment, and dealing with a breach of a rule in that case by a steamer called the Clan Sinclair, said: "The new and wrong position into which I assume the Clan Sinclair had been brought by her neglect of the rule was perfectly apparent to those on board the Margaret, apparent for a considerable time and distance—for a time and distance of such appreciable extent that they could, with ordinary care, have avoided the collision which ensued; and the ground of my judgment is shortly this, that assuming that there was a breach of the rule and culpable neglect at the time, yet the consequence of that neglect could have been avoided by ordinary care on the part of the Margaret. Instead of contributing ordinary care and prudence, those in charge of that vessel adopted a reckless course of navigation which is described so well in the opinions of some of the judges of the court below that I need say nothing further about it." If that is so, it still does not quite exhaust the question, because it may be that, though there was negligence on the part of the steamer and on the part of the tug, still the steamer might have avoided the consequences of collision at the last moment by further action in connection with the anchor. I do not forget in dealing with this part of the case the decision in the case just referred to, where a distinction was, it appears to me, rightly drawn, if I may with all respect say so, between the collision and the damage ensuing, and in my observations I am treating the damage as forming part of the matter which I have to consider; but if in this particular case the anchor was visible, as undoubtedly it was, and being so visible was a source of danger which was apparent to those on the tug, and yet they were guilty of negligence in not avoiding coming in contact with the steamer, it seems to me that not merely the collision but the damage ensuing from it were matters which, although the steamer may have been guilty of negligence, and was in fact guilty of negligence in breaking the rule, should have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care by the tug up to the moment of the collision. That only leaves this matter to be considered: Could the steamer herself have done anything to avoid the damage at the last moment, or within a reasonable time before it? Mr. Pyke's argument is that she could. That question I have asked the Elder Brethren as a matter of nautical skill, and their view on that point is, that from that time when the sheer of the tug towards the bows of the steamer produced any reasonable risk of danger, from that time to the time of the blow was far too short. In their opinion it was almost momentary, and anybody present and able to act, if ordered to do so, could not have acted sufficiently rapidly to have avoided this collision and the damage caused by it, for that is the real point one wants to bear in mind. I am of opinion that the damage was due to the action of the tug; that the anchor was an obvious danger which could have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the tug; that at that time no want of care was exhibited on the part of the steamer which could in any way have affected the matter, and that the tug is alone to blame for this disaster. Therefore the claim must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lowless and Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Tuesday, July 26, 1892.

(Before BARNES J.)

THE WILHELM TELL. (a)

Salvage — Apportionment — Trawler — Seamen — Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104,) s. 182.—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 18—Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Acts 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 41), s. 13.

Sect. 182 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 does not prevent seamen entering into and being bound by an equitable agreement for the apportionment of salvage.

Where the crew of a steam trawler, by articles of agreement in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade under the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883, agreed to "participate in any sum or sums of money arising from any salvage or salvage services performed for any ship in distress or otherwise, in the proportion set forth opposite to their respective names in this agreement," the master, mate, and boatswain, who had agreed to take 10, 7, and 3 per cent. respectively of any salvage, were held bound by such agreement, such agreement being equitable in the opinion of the court, but the owners were not allowed before apportioning the salvage to deduct from it cost of repairs and loss of fishing, but were directed to give the crew a proportion based upon the total award without deductions.

Sect. 18 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, which precludes sect. 182 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 from applying to ships which are "to be employed on salvage service," does not apply to a steam trawler whose crew agree with the owners to take a fixed proportion of any salvage that may be earned.

THIS was an application by the master, mate, and boatswain of the steam trawler Irrawaddy, for a proportion of a salvage award of 1000*l.* given to the owners, masters, and crew of the Irrawaddy for services rendered to the barque Wilhelm Tell.

The services were rendered in the North Sea by several trawlers, of which the Irrawaddy was one, under circumstances of great danger to the salved and the salvors, and at the trial Jeune, J., on a value of 20,000*l.*, made a total award of 7750*l.*, of which he gave the owners of the Irrawaddy, her master and crew, 1000*l.* The learned judge, in dealing with the services of the Irrawaddy, said as follows: "She contributed two hands to the salvage crew, and during the towing did at least her full share, if not more, for she seems to have been in a position of imminent danger from which she was only rescued by the skill of her comrades. She was in the thick of the work, and had two of her men injured, one having his leg broken, and another injuring his hand. I shall award to the Irrawaddy 1000*l.*"

In rendering the services the master injured his finger, and was disabled for a month; and the boatswain broke his leg, and was laid up for thirteen weeks. Neither received wages during this time, but incurred no medical expenses.

The master, mate, and boatswain were serving on the Irrawaddy under articles of agreement in the form prescribed by the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883, by which it is provided (inter alia):

> That every member of the crew, including apprentices, shall be regarded as entitled to participate in any sum or sums of money received for any salvage services performed for any ship in distress or otherwise, in the proportion set forth opposite to their respective names in this agreement.

By the proportions the master was to have 10 per cent, the mate 7 per cent, and the boatswain 3 per cent of any salvage. The master and mate, in lieu of wages, received a share in the fishing profits. The boatswain was paid wages at the rate of 22*s.* a week. In consequence of the salvage services the Irrawaddy had undergone repairs.

The owners of the Irrawaddy, in apportioning the 1000*l.*, had first deducted 93*l.* 1*s.* being unrecovered costs, and 89*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.* for repairs, and then offered the master and mate 10 and 7 per cent respectively on the balance.

In the case of the boatswain, who was paid wages during the rendering of the services, they further deducted loss of fishing during the period of the salvage services and the subsequent repairs, and costs of fuel, and tendered him 3 per cent. on the balance. The master, mate, and boatswain refused to accept this distribution, and now moved the court to apportion the award.

The following Acts of Parliament are material to the decision: —

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104):

> Sect. 182. Every stipulation by which any seaman consents to abandon his right to wages in the case of the loss of the ship, or to abandon any right which he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage shall be wholly inoperative.
>
> Sect. 233. No assignment . . . of salvage made

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

prior to the accruing thereof shall bind the party making the same, and no power of attorney, or authority for the receipt of any such . . . salvage, shall be irrevocable.

The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63.):

Sect. 18. It is hereby declared that the 182nd section of the principal Act does not apply to the case of any stipulation made by the seamen belonging to any ship which according to the terms of the agreement is to be employed on salvage service, with respect to the remuneration to be paid to them for salvage services to be rendered by such ship to any other ship or ships.

Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 41):

Sect. 13. The skipper of every fishing boat shall enter into an agreement with every seaman (not being a boy under such an agreement as is by this Act required) whom he carries to sea from any port in the United Kingdom as one of his crew; and every such agreement shall be in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade . . . and shall contain the following particulars . . . (5) the remuneration which each seaman is to receive whether in wages or by a share in the catch or in both ways . . . and every such agreement shall be so framed as to admit of stipulations to be adopted at the will of the skipper and seaman, in each case as to advance and allotment of wages, and may contain any other stipulations which are not contrary to law.

J. P. Aspinall for the master, mate, and boatswain of the Irrawaddy.—The applicants are not bound by the agreement as to salvage. Sect. 182 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 prevents such an agreement being operative. Sect. 18 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 does not apply to this case, as the Irrawaddy was not to be employed on salvage service. Her occupation was fishing, not salving. Sect. 233 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 is also relied on in support of the contention that sailors cannot by contract fix their scale of salvage remuneration before the salvage is earned. Each case of salvage must be judged by itself. If so, the facts in this case clearly entitle the applicants to a larger proportion of salvage than that offered by the shipowners:

The Enchantress, Lush. 93;
The Pride of Canada, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; Br. & L. 208; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 406;
The Louisa, 2 Wm. Rob. 22;
The Rosario, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 816; 2 P. Div. 41; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 334;
The Ganges, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 72; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 342; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 370.

Even assuming the court to hold that the sailors are bound by the agreement, they are entitled to their percentage on the whole 1000*l.* The owners have no right to make deductions for repairs, loss of fishing, &c.

Butler Aspinall, for the shipowners, contrâ.—The applicants are bound by the agreement, which is equitable. The case is governed by sect. 18 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, inasmuch as it was contemplated that whilst the principal occupation of the Irrawaddy would be fishing, she would also be constantly employed in salvage services, and hence it was that the agreement as to the apportionment of salvage was in the articles. The form of agreement is sanctioned by the Board of Trade under the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883, and so far from depriving the seamen of any right to salvage, fixes what salvage they shall receive, which may in many cases of easy towage services give the seamen more than the court would apportion them. The test is not whether in a particular case the court might have given more, but whether, taking the rough with the smooth, the court thinks the agreement is such as to do substantial justice between the shipowner and his crew. The shipowners were also justified in making deductions for repairs, loss of fishing, &c:

The City of Chester, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; 9 P.Div. 204; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 319.

J. P. Aspinall in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 26.—BARNES, J.— In this case the master, mate, and boatswain of the Irrawaddy ask to have the sum of 1000*l.* less unrecovered costs, apportioned and for an order that the applicants are not bound by the articles of the Irrawaddy to receive only the proportions of salvage set out therein against their respective names. This sum of 1000*l.* has been awarded to the owners, master, and crew of the steam trawler Irrawaddy in a suit between them and the other parties interested, brought by them against the sailing vessel Wilhelm Tell for salvage services rendered in the North Sea to the latter vessel in Dec. 1891, whereby the Wilhelm Tell was with other assistance taken into the Humber. In rendering these services, the master and boatswain of the Irrawaddy were both injured while on board their own vessel. The master received an injury to one of his fingers, in consequence of which he was ill for a month, and during that time he received no pay, but incurred no medical expenses. The boatswain had his left leg broken, and in consequence he was laid up for thirteen weeks. During this time he received no wages; but, as he was treated in the Hull Infirmary, he also incurred no medical expenses. When he recovered he was taken on by the owners of the Irrawaddy as a deck hand. These particulars were furnished to me since the argument. The Irrawaddy was for some time under repair for the damage received by her in rendering the said services. Admissions were put in before me, from which it appeared that at the time aforesaid the master, mate, and boatswain were respectively serving under articles of agreement of which the following is an extract: "And it is also agreed that every member of the crew, including apprentices, shall be regarded as entitled to participate in any sum or sums of money received for any salvage services performed for any ship in distress or otherwise, in the proportion set forth opposite to their respective names in this agreement." Then follows a memorandum, from which it appears that the captain was engaged on the 7th Dec. 1891, at a rate of wages which was based on a share of the fishing profits of 13*s.* 8*d.* per cent. and a share of salvage of 10 per cent. The mate engaged at the same time was to have 1 per cent. of the profits and 7 per cent. of salvage. The boatswain engaged on the 4th Nov. 1891 was to have 22*s.* a week and 3 per cent. of salvage.

It was contended by Mr. Aspinall for the applicants that this agreement was not binding upon them, and that they were entitled to have such an apportionment as the court might deem just under the circumstances without regard to the agreement. He relied upon sect. 182 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and the following cases: The Louisa (2 Wm. Rob. 22); The Enchantress (Lush. 93); The Pride of Canada (9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546); Br. & L. 208; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 406); The Ganges (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 72; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S.

342; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 370); and The Rosario (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 816; 2 P. Div. 41; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 334). Mr. Butler Aspinall, for the shipowners, contended, on the other hand, that the agreement was binding upon the parties on the ground first, that the 18th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 applied to this case; and secondly, that the 182nd section of the Act of 1854 did not prevent the parties from entering into an equitable agreement for the apportionment of salvage, and that the agreement in the present case was equitable. Sect. 182 of the Act of 1854 provides (inter alia) that "every stipulation by which any seaman consents to abandon . . . any right which he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage shall be wholly inoperative." The 18th section of the 1862 Act declares that the above-mentioned 182nd section is "not to apply to the case of any stipulation made by the seamen belonging to any ship which according to the terms of the agreement is to be employed on salvage service with respect to the remuneration to be paid to them for salvage services to be rendered by such ship to any other ship or ships." I do not think the point was referred to in argument, but it is to be noticed that these sections apply only to seamen and not to masters, for, by the interpretation clause of the Act of 1854, the term seaman does not include master. They do not therefore appear to affect the master in the present case. As to the point raised on the 18th section, I am of opinion that the Irrawaddy was not a ship which, according to the terms of the agreement, was to be employed on salvage service within the meaning of that section. She was in fact to be employed, according to the terms of the agreement, in trawling in the North Sea, and the clause as to salvage was only inserted in order to deal with the case of an apportionment of any salvage which she might have the good fortune to earn. The contentions on the part of the applicants give rise to more difficulty; but, in my opinion, the result of the cases above referred to—and also the cases of The Afrika (5 P. Div. 192; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 266), and of The Beulah (1 Wm. Rob. 477; 2 Notes of Cases, 61)—is to show that the 182nd section of he Act of 1854 does not prevent seamen from entering into an equitable agreement for the apportionment of salvage, though it prohibits stipulations by which they abandon their rights to salvage, and that the court will uphold an agreement with seamen for the apportionment of salvage if it is not inequitable. In The Louisa (2 Wm. Rob. 22) Dr. Lushington readjusted the agreed apportionment apparently on the ground that it gave the owners more than the court ever at that time decreed to them, and it would seem as if he must have considered that the scale of apportionment agreed to was inequitable. In The Enchantress (Lush. 93) the same learned judge stated that he would decree an equitable apportionment unless barred by an equitable agreement or an equitable tender; and he said that "local and customary agreements, if equitable, such as that where there is a lifeboat company those who stay shall be rewarded as those who go, the court will favourably consider." The Pride of Canada (ubi sup.) was merely a case in which the owners failed to bring the case within the 18th section of the Act of 1862; but Dr. Lushington, according to the report in the Maritime Law Cases, stated that even before the Act of 1854 no seaman could enter into a stipulation of an inequitable nature. In The Ganges (ubi sup.) Sir Robert Phillimore held that an agreement in that case to pay certain wages and a fixed rate of poundage on towage and salvage money earned by a tug was not equitable, although the sum allowed to the plaintiff, a temporary master, would be very inadequate remuneration according to the general principles upon which salvage is distributed. In The Afrika (ubi sup.) Sir Robert Phillimore adopts the language in The Enchantress which I have quoted above. He says: "On this point I think it necessary to refer to the law laid down in The Enchantress, and I take the law as laid down in that case to be perfectly clear. In that case Dr. Lushington said, 'I conceive a duty is hereby imposed upon me to decree, upon application made, what in my judgment is an equitable apportionment of salvage, unless I am barred by one of two circumstances, either an equitable agreement between the parties or an equitable tender.' In The Beulah (ubi sup.) Dr. Lushington said that he would make an exception to any arrangement made with seamen where there had been any extraordinary personal risk and labour to the seamen. If, however, an equitable agreement had been entered into, I do not myself understand on what principle such an exception should be allowed, unless perhaps it might be considered in exceptional cases that the services of the men were beyond the scope of what was contemplated by the agreement at the time it was entered into. The policy of the law is to protect seamen from improvident arrangements, and to encourage their exertions to save life and property. An agreement which secures these objects appears to me to be unobjectionable. They are secured in the fishing trade in the way I am about to point out. I should observe that no distinction is drawn in the cases between masters and seamen, though, as I have pointed out, sects. 182 and 18 do not apply to masters.

In all these cases there was no special legislation affecting the parties besides the Merchant Shipping Acts; but at the time of the argument in this case the form of articles used for the Irrawaddy was produced, and it then appeared that it was in the form issued by the Board of Trade in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 41). Sect. 13 of that Act provides that, "The skipper of every fishing boat shall enter into an agreement with every seaman (not being a boy under such an agreement as is by this Act required) whom he carries to sea from any port in the United Kingdom as one of his crew . . . and every such agreement shall be so framed as to admit of stipulations to be adopted at the will of the skipper and seamen in each case as to advance and allotment of wages, and may contain any other stipulations which are not contrary to law." The Irrawaddy was a steam trawler to which this Act applied, and her owners were compelled to use this form of articles which had been sanctioned by the Board of Trade. The articles were for trawling in the North Sea, and contained as part of the printed form the clause above mentioned as to the apportionment of salvage, and a column for the insertion of the share of salvage. For such a vessel engaged in such a trade under such articles it seems very reasonable to have a provision for apportioning salvage on a fair basis, taking the rough with the smooth. This form must now be in use among a very large number of vessels, and if a fair percentage of the salvage is allotted to each man on the articles the men have the advantage in easy towage cases which are not infrequent, though their duties may be more arduous in rendering more difficult services. I am informed that the present agreement gives the owners about two-thirds and the master and crew one-third of any salvage award. In my opinion the agreement as to the apportionment of the salvage contained in these articles ought to be supported on the ground that it is entered into in the form and manner which I have described, and is equitable, and that the stipulation as to apportionment is not contrary to law. Moreover, in the present case I do not think that the applicants run any greater risk than any of the rest of the crew, though they were more unfortunate in the accidents they met with. The court would hardly in such a case as this, apart from the agreement, give the owners of a steamer rendering useful towage services upon salvage terms less than two-thirds of the sum awarded. A further point was raised by the owners, that, in arriving at the net sum to be apportioned, they were entitled to deduct certain sums set out in the admissions for repairs, and as against the boatswain certain further sums for loss of profits, time, &c.; but, in my opinion, the owners are not entitled to make those deductions. The agreement is for a certain sum of the salvage, and in my judgment that means the sum awarded, less, as is agreed, the unrecovered costs in obtaining the award. The agreement is binding, and the owners in a particular case may have to bear some disadvantages, just as some members of the crew do. I therefore apportion the sum of 1000*l.* less unrecovered costs in the proportions mentioned in the articles of agreement, and as neither party has succeeded entirely in their contentions I leave each party to pay their own costs.

Solicitors for the master, mate, and boatswain, of the Irrawaddy, Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes.

Solicitor for the owners of the Irrawaddy, F. W. Hill.

Thursday, July 28, 1892.

Before BARNES, J., assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE KATE B. JONES. (a)

Salvage—Agents—Amount of award.

An agent may claim as a salvor, but where the owners of the salved property authorise him to engage or render assistance, and are liable to pay him some remuneration for what he has done, even though his services prove unsuccessful:

The Court, in awarding him salvage for successful services, will take such fact into account, and not award so large a sum as it would to a salvor who ran the risk of getting nothing for his expenditure should he prove unsuccessful.

THIS was a salvage action instituted by the Port Said and Suez Coal Company and certain of their officials and servants to recover salvage for services rendered to the s.s. Kate B. Jones, her cargo and freight, on the coast of Egypt.

The Kate B. Jones, a steamship of 1983 tons, laden with a cargo of wheat on a voyage from Bombay to Belfast, stranded, on the 5th April 1891, on the coast of Egypt, seven miles E.S.E. of Damietta Light, twenty-five miles from Port Said.

She had left Port Said the same day, where she had been supplied with bunker coal by the plaintiff company, whose business (inter alia) was to supply vessels with coal upon production of a coaling order from outside coal merchants, to whom the plaintiff company paid a commission for sending them the order.

The manager of the plaintiff company, a Mr. Royle, upon hearing that the Kate B. Jones was ashore, telegraphed to her owners at Cardiff asking for authority to send assistance. To this the owners replied:

Render immediate assistance; float vessel; wire detailed information respecting vessel's position and local available means of getting vessel off.

Amongst other telegrams was the following from the defendants to the plaintiff company:

Is ship afloat or not? If possible, make all arrangements. No cure no pay.

The plaintiff company, not being able to get the necessary assistance to get the vessel off, determined to use their own staff and plant, and accordingly tugs and lighters were sent to her on the 7th April. Attempts were then made to get her off, but they proved unsuccessful. The plaintiffs then proceeded to transship the cargo into their lighters, which was taken to Port Said, and eventually, on the 10th, the ship was got off, when she proceeded under her own steam to Port Said.

On the 12th April the manager of the plaintiff company telegraphed to the defendants as follows:

Want master sign agreement. Pay for salvage 5 per cent. value on ship, freight, and cargo. Please wire authority.

On the same day he wrote as follows:

We confirm our telegram as to our very moderate demand for 5 per cent. on the value of ship, freight, and cargo. It is thought here that we ought to have asked 10 instead of 5. There is no other firm here who could have saved the Kate B. Jones except the Canal Company, and they would not.

The defendants, in reply, telegraphed:

We request settlement stand over until all particulars ascertained, meantime will give security for salvage.

The defendants, by their defence, admitted the facts alleged in the statement of claim, but pleaded that "the plaintiffs the Port Said and Suez Canal Company before and at the time of rendering the services alleged, were the agents at Port Said for the defendants, the owners of the Kate B. Jones, and for that steamship rendered the said services in their capacity as such agents; and that the other plaintiffs are the servants, employés, and workmen of the plaintiff company." With such defence they paid into court the sum of 1723*l.* 10*s.*, which was 5 per cent. on the value of the Kate B. Jones, her cargo and freight.

The value of the Kate B. Jones was 16,000*l.*, her cargo 16,699*l.*, and her freight 1771*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*, making a total of 34,470*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*

The salvors, in rendering the services, incurred about 600*l.* expenditure, and alleged that they were liable to expend 700*l.* more in respect of repairs to craft and other matters.

Pyke, Q.C. and F. Laing for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Butler Aspinall, for the defendants, contrà.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

BARNES, J.—This is a case of salvage services to a vessel ashore on the coast of Egypt. It appears from the evidence that the plaintiffs at Port Said had coaled this vessel shortly before she stranded. Their course of business seems to have been to supply coals to vessels whose owners were their customers on production of a coaling order which the owners of such vessels obtained by making contracts with, in this case, the firm of Mann, George, and Co., the name of Mr. Royle, the manager of the plaintiff company, being mentioned in that contract to supply the coal. Having made that contract the owners obtained a coaling order, and the plaintiffs supplied the coal, paying Messrs. Mann, George, and Co. a commission on it. The plaintiffs also pay the pilot dues, canal dues, and other expenses, making the profit they obtain only upon the sale of the coal. The plaintiffs are in no sense general agents, and when a vessel has left the port they have nothing more to do with her. On this occasion the Kate B. Jones stranded on a sandy bottom on the coast of Egypt in a position twenty-five miles from Port Said, and seven miles E.S.E. of Damietta Light. She went on at full speed, and was drawing something like 19 feet forward and 20 feet aft. She afterwards worked herself further forward and remained fast. There was a great deal of correspondence by telegraph between Royle and the shipowners, which in substance comes to this, that the 5 per cent. proposed by the plaintiffs was not accepted by the owners, and therefore a correspondence took place as to the amount of bail to be given. The case throughout was treated by both parties as a salvage case, and the end of it is that it has come into court, and the defendants have paid into court 5 per cent. of what was then ascertained to be the value of the ship, freight, and cargo.

The first point raised in the case is, that the plaintiffs are to be treated only as agents. It is not really contended that they are not to be treated as salvors. I think the cases are too strong for Mr. Butler Aspinall to maintain that position, and I do not think he really pressed it. But he does contend that, having regard to the correspondence, their remuneration ought not to be high, because they did not run so much risk as ordinary salvors, for the reason that they might be entitled to some remuneration even if they had been unsuccessful. My opinion, after reading the correspondence, is, that the defendants are probably right in that contention, and that, when an agent is employed in this way, as has been stated in several cases, especially where he is requested to engage services which he will have to pay for whether successful or not, he would be entitled to have what he has done considered, and to have some remuneration even if the matter turned out to be a failure. There are a number of cases dealing with this subject, such as The E. U. (1 Spks. 63), The Undaunted (Lush. 91), The Cargo, ex Honor (L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 87; 15 W. R. 10), and The Melpomene (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 76; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 129; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 122). The award which I am about to make is based upon the principle that probably the risk of the entire loss of the plaintiffs' expenditure if unsuccessful was one which they did not incur. I do not think it necessary to be absolutely certain about this, for it seems to me sufficient to say that probably that is the correct view to take. From the cases which have been cited, I cannot do better than quote a passage from The Cargo ex Honor (ubi sup.) which sums up the law. Dr. Lushington says: "The court on previous occasions has entertained similar applications to the present: (The Favourite, 2 Wm. Rob. 255, and The Purissima Concepcion, 3 Wm. Rob. 181.) In the case of The Purissima Concepcion (ubi sup.) the court went very fully into the question, and I think it unnecessary to occupy time in stating it with more particularity; but the result of it was this, that the court would allow a claim as agent and a claim as salvor to be united and combined under particular circumstances. If the court had not done that, and had attempted to draw the line in all cases where agency was claimed, assistance would have been refused, and it would have led to mischievous consequences. I shall not therefore refuse to consider the merits of the case." I think this is a clear case in which the court is bound to consider the merits, having regard to the circumstances under which the salvage services were rendered, and of course the nature of the services. Now, what are they? Shortly stated, they are these: The plaintiffs' tugs and lighters go to the assistance of the vessel, no other assistance being available. They then attempt, by means of laying out an anchor and by towing, to pull the ship off, but, as she was laden, these attempts were unsuccessful. There was a considerable ground swell. The wind was continually setting her towards the shore, and the only thing to be done was to discharge her. On the 8th 140 tons of cargo were taken out and taken by the lighters to Port Said. In the evening four 135 tons lighters went to the vessel with 100 labourers and on the 9th they got out 400 tons. They then tried to tow her off, but failed, after which the tugs and lighters returned to Port Said. Meanwhile two steamers had declined to render assistance. On the 10th two lighters, 220 tons each, were taken to the Kate B. Jones, and also two native craft engaged by Mr. Tweedie. One or two more attempts were made, but they only succeeded in moving her a few feet. On the 11th, when 1150 tons had been taken out, she floated. Her cargo was valued at 16,699*l.*, and nearly half of it was taken out of her. Hence, if it had not been for this lightening, some 7000*l.* or 8000*l.* worth of cargo would have had to be jettisoned. The weather seems to have been somewhat severe. There was a strong E.N.E. wind. Paragraph 16 of the statement of claim, which is admitted, alleges that "the same night (i.e., the 11th) the wind and sea considerably increased and heavy weather continued to prevail for a number of days." In rendering the services the salvors incurred large expenses, which roughly may be put at about 600*l.* They also allege that they will have to pay another 700*l.*, an estimate which perhaps requires some discounting; but there is no doubt that their lighters sustained some damage. The company's business must also have suffered complete disorganisation in consequence of the tugs and lighters being away. It is to be remembered that the craft and tugs were exposed to considerable risk, which, according to the evidence, could not with any facility have been replaced. It is obvious that the services were of an arduous and somewhat dangerous character. Now, what was the position of the Kate B. Jones? It is clear that she was in great risk, without assistance, of becoming a total loss. She was buried in the sand, unable to move herself about without getting rid of all this cargo and wanting towage assistance. In that dangerous position her loss would have been almost certain. No other assistance was available. Taking all these matters into consideration, and bearing in mind the position of the parties, I think the sum originally suggested by Mr. Royle was quite inadequate. I have to determine what would be a really just remuneration. The conclusion I have come to, assisted by the Elder Brethren, is that, though the award might have been exceeded if no relationship had existed between the parties, a just remuneration is 3500*l.*

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Ingledew, Ince, and Colt.

Solicitors for the defendants, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Monday, Jan. 16, 1893.

(Before BARNES, J. and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE EDENMORE. (a)

Salvage—Agreement—Amount of award—Salvor's expenses.

Where before rendering salvage services an agreement was entered into that the disabled steamer should be towed into port, if possible, by the salving steamer, and whatever services were rendered and loss of time should be settled between the respective owners, the Court, in estimating the amount of award,

Held, that the agreement was to be taken into account as an element reducing the award, as it was open to the construction that the salvors were entitled to some remuneration even though their services were unsuccessful.

Where salvors proved that by reason of the services they had to pay an extra premium to their underwriters to waive a breach of warranty in taking the salved ship into a port prohibited by their policy, the Court held that such payment was an element for consideration in assessing the award.

THIS was a salvage action instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the s.s. Inchmarlo, against the owners of the s.s. Edenmore, her cargo and freight.

The Inchmarlo was a steel screw-steamship of 2967 tons gross, and at the time of the said services was manned by a crew of thirty-one hands all told, laden with cotton on a voyage from Savannah to Liverpool. The Edenmore was a screw-steamship of 2459 tons gross, manned by a crew of twenty-seven hands all told, and laden with a cargo of cotton and oilcake from Galveston to Liverpool. When fallen in with by the Inchmarlo on the 4th Nov. 1892 she was in the Atlantic Ocean, having broken her tail shaft close to the stern post.

Before the Inchmarlo made fast the following agreement was entered into:

At sea, Nov. 4, 1892.—About lat. 41 N., lon 58·20 W. It is this day mutually agreed between W. T. Ashby, master s.s. Inchmarlo, and myself, C. A. Watson, that the s.s. Edenmore shall be towed into port, if possible, by the s.s. Inchmarlo, and whatever services are rendered and loss of time shall be settled between my owners and the owners of the s.s. Inchmarlo.—C. A. WATSON, master s.s. Edenmore; W. THOS. ASHBY, master s.s. Inchmarlo, of Liverpool; witness, A. Richardson, engineer.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The services consisted in towing the Edenmore, in bad weather, into Halifax, and lasted for five and a half days, the distance traversed being about 340 miles.

The plaintiffs at the trial gave evidence that by reason of the services the Inchmarlo lost a subsequent profitable voyage, and was laid up for some time at a loss of 60*l.* a month. They also proved that they had been obliged by going to Halifax to pay their underwriters an additional premium of 342*l.* to waive a breach of warranty in the policy against British North American ports.

The value of the Edenmore was 20,000*l.*; of the cargo, 64,636*l.*; of the freight, 5364*l.* The value of the Inchmarlo was 35,000*l.*; of the cargo, 95,000*l.*; and of the freight, 4660*l.*

Aspinall, Q.C. and Butler Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, contended (inter alia) that the payment of extra premium ought to be taken into account in estimating the amount of the award.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Bateson, for the defendants, (inter alia) contended that by the terms of the agreement the plaintiffs were entitled to some remuneration, even though their services should be unsuccessful, and that such fact ought to diminish the award:

The Kate B. Jones, 69 L. T. Rep. N. S. 197; (1892) P. 366; ante, p. 332;
The Benlarig, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 238; 14 P. Div. 3 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360;
The Alfred, 50 L. T Rep. N. S. 511; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 214.

BARNES, J.—This is a case of salvage services rendered by one large steamer to another large steamer in the Atlantic. The services lasted five and a half days and extended over a distance of about 340 miles. The principal matter to consider in this case is the risk to which the Edenmore, her cargo and freight, were exposed. My view, which is supported by that of the Trinity Masters, is that it was very serious. She had been broken down for seven days without any offer of assistance, and her only chance of safety lay in falling in with a steamer large enough to take her into port. Without that assistance she, her cargo and freight, would probably have been totally lost. Another element is the risk to the Inchmarlo. The defendants contend that the agreement minimises the risk of loss to the salvors in case of the services they rendered not proving useful. The agreement is in these words: [The learned judge read it.] I have carefully considered that agreement, and I incline to the view that it is possible that the proper construction to put on it would entitle the salvors to some remuneration, even if their services were not successful. In assessing the amount of the award, I have borne that in mind, though I must say that in a case like the present, where the services have been successful, it is very difficult to say what precise effect it ought to have on the reduction of the amount of the award. But it does not minimise the danger to the salvors, because they run their risk whether they get paid for their services, or whether they get remunerated by salvage, and although no very special risk has been proved to the salvors in this case, except perhaps a possible collision when the vessels were making fast, it must not be forgotten that these large vessels always run some risk in making fast, and, in the performance of these big salvage services, risk sometimes of collision and sometimes of straining while towing. There is no doubt in this case that the weather was for part of the time extremely severe, although perhaps during the latter part it moderated. There was also some difficulty in getting into Halifax. A point is made by the defendants of the fact that the tow-ropes never parted, but the Trinity Masters tell me that that shows great skill on the part of the salvors, having regard to the size of these vessels and the weather the services were rendered in. The salvors rely on having been put to certain expenditure for port expenses, docking, repairs, and hawsers. They also say that, in considering their expenditure, I must take into account a premium of 342*l.* paid by them to their underwriters to waive the breach of warranty resulting from the deviation caused by the salvage, there being a stipulation in the policies prohibiting their ships from going to certain ports of British North America, including Halifax, at that season of the year. Another element for consideration brought to my notice was, that the vessel was chartered or agreed to be engaged on terms which would have enabled her to make a profitable voyage to the cotton ports and back, whereas she was laid up, her charter cancelled, and lost some 60*l.* a month. These are not items strictly recoverable in the form of specifically giving them to the salvors. They form elements for consideration. The difficulty is to arrive at a proper award on a due consideration of all the elements which go to make it up. The great point, to my mind, is the value 90,000*l.* of the salved property, and after giving due weight to all the elements for consideration, I think the proper award is 5350*l.* Bearing in mind the expenditure to which the owners have been put, I apportion 4225*l.* to them, 375*l.* to the captain, and 750*l.* to the crew.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Bateson, Warr, and Bateson, Liverpool.

Tuesday, Jan. 31, 1893.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE SOTO. (a)

Practice—Costs—Country solicitor—Attendance at the trial.

The registrar, in taxing the costs in an Admiralty action between party and party, has a discretion in allowing or disallowing the costs of the attendance of the country solicitor at the trial in London. The facts that the country solicitor has had the conduct of the case, and has taken the statements of the witnesses, are circumstances which may justify the allowance of his attendance at the trial.

THIS was a summons by plaintiffs in a collision action to review the taxation of their costs.

The collision occurred in the Bristol Channel on the 22nd April 1892 between the plaintiffs' steamship Earl of Chester and the defendants' steamship the Soto.

The Soto was a Spanish ship. The Earl of Chester was a British ship belonging to the port of Cardiff, where her owners carried on business.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs instructed Cardiff solicitors to institute the action against the Soto. These solicitors had agents in London, but practically had the whole conduct of the proceedings, and took the statements of the witnesses. At the trial before Barnes, J. the managing clerk of the plaintiffs' solicitors attended. The plaintiffs obtained judgment, and in their bill of costs as between party and party claimed (inter alia) the costs of the attendance in London of the managing clerk of the plaintiffs' solicitors.

The assistant registrar disallowed such costs.

The plaintiffs thereupon took out the present summons in objection to such taxation. The summons was adjourned into court.

Holman, for the plaintiffs, cited

Bell v. Aitkin, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 363; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 320; 37 L. J. 168, C. P.

Nelson, for the defendants, contrâ, cited

Potter v Rankin, 19 L T. Rep. N. S. 383; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 76;

Re Storer, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 583; 26 Ch. Div. 189.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 31.—BARNES, J.—In this case a summons had been taken out by the plaintiffs' solicitors on behalf of the plaintiffs to review the taxation of the plaintiffs' costs, and the summons came before me in the ordinary course in chambers. As the matter was one of importance, I thought it right to adjourn it into court, where it came on the same day immediately afterwards, and was argued by counsel, though I am afraid they had not so full an opportunity of referring to all the authorities as they would have had if it had been in court in the first instance. The items in relation to which the taxation was questioned were these: "On the 13th June, journey to London, attending all the witnesses, attending court on the 14th June when the case part heard. In court on the 15th when the case concluded, and the Soto held alone to blame for collision. Paid railway expenses, cab hire, and hotel expenses." The suit was between the owners of the Earl of Chester and the owners of the Soto arising out of a collision which occurred in the Bristol Channel between the two vessels on the 7th April 1892. The Earl of Chester, as I am informed, belonged to Cardiff, where her owners carry on business, and the Soto was a Spanish vessel belonging to the port of Barcelona. The Earl of Chester sank after the collision, and the Soto was so much damaged that she had to be beached, and was afterwards, I think, taken into Cardiff. The Earl of Chester had sailed from Cardiff shortly before the collision laden with a cargo of coals. The owners of the Earl of Chester placed the conduct of the proceedings on their behalf in the hands of Downing and Handcock, solicitors, at Cardiff, whose London agents are Downing, Holman, and Co, The owners of the Soto were represented by Lowless and Co., solicitors, carrying on business in the city of London. The hearing took place before me on the 14th and 15th June last year, when I held the Soto alone to blame. The managing clerk of Messrs. Downing and Handcock, of Cardiff, who, as I understand, had taken or supervised the taking of the witnesses' statements, and conducted the proceedings on their behalf, attended the hearing before me in London as solicitors for the plaintiffs. It is in respect of his expenses and charges for so doing that the present question arises. The assistant registrar has disallowed the items, and the plaintiffs have objected to the disallowance on the ground that the plaintiffs' vessel was owned in Cardiff, and they were entitled to be represented on the trial by the Cardiff solicitors whom they employed, their London agents not being in a position to do justice to the case on the hearing; and, further, on the ground that, as they submit, the same principle should apply as in assize cases, when the attendance of the solicitor conducting the case is invariably allowed. The assistant registrar gives as his reason for disallowing those costs that it has been the invariable practice up to the present time not to allow them. He has therefore not exercised any discretion in the matter. It was contended by the plaintiffs' counsel that the attendance of the country solicitor was necessary in the interest of the client, and that the registrar ought to have exercised his discretion in the taxation of these items. On the other hand, it was argued that it has been the rule of practice not to allow them.

As the point is of general importance, I have referred to such authorities as there are, and have made inquiries as to the practice in the different divisions. The following cases all bear upon the subject: Bell v. Aitkin (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 363; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 320); Potter v. Rankin (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 383; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 76); Re Snell (5 Ch. Div. 815); Re Foster; Ex parte Dickens (8 Ch. Div. 598); Re Storer (50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 583; 26 Ch. Div. 189); Ex parte Snow (W. N. 1879, p. 22). Bell v. Aitkin (ubi sup.) was a case in which the action was for the infringement of a patent. The cause of action arose at Stockport. The trial took place in London, and lasted several days, and a verdict was ultimately found for the defendants. The defendants' country attorney, who had been concerned in getting up the case, attended at the trial, as well as the London attorney. On the taxation of the defendants' costs the master allowed the costs of the attendance of the London attorney, but not of the country attorney, considering himself bound by a general rule not to allow both, and not, therefore, at all entering into circumstances of the particular case. Bovill, C.J. said, in the course of his judgment: "Cases may arise in which it is necessary that the attorney who has had the conduct of the case from its commencement, and is acquainted with all the facts, should be present at the trial, and I think that the present was such a case. The master does not appear to have exercised his discretion in the matter, but to have considered himself bound by an inflexible rule that costs such as those in question shall be disallowed. I think that the rule is not inflexible, and that in this case it is right that the master should take the facts into his consideration, and exercise his judgment upon them." Byles, J. gave judgment to the same effect, and Keating and Montague Smith, JJ. concurred. That case was referred to in Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.), where there was a rule moved for a review of the taxation, and in that case the court refused the rule, observing that the circumstances of the case relied upon, viz. Bell v. Aitkin (ubi sup.), were very peculiar. The court gave no further judgment upon this particular point, and do not seem to have dissented from the principle which is cited by the judges in the course of those judgments to which I have referred. The result of these cases appears to me to be that the allowance for the attendance of the country solicitor at the hearing in London is within the discretion of the taxing officer, and that, although as a general rule no allowance will be made, yet such an allowance may be made in exceptional cases, where it is necessary that the solicitor who has had the conduct of the case from the commencement, and is acquainted with all the facts, should be present at the trial. That is what I understand to be the practice in the different divisions of the court, though perhaps there is some difference in the strictness with which the general rule has been applied, and I am informed that in the Admiralty Registry it has in some rare and very exceptional cases been relaxed. The practice of disallowing the costs of the country solicitor in an Admiralty suit probably originated under circumstances very different from those existing at the present day. In former days the proctors and advocates alone had the privilege of practising in the High Court of Admiralty. This exclusive right was abolished in 1859 by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 6; and in 1861, by sect. 30 of 24 Vict. c. 10, certain restrictions against proctors acting as agents for solicitors were done away with; but there seems little doubt, from a perusal of the Admiralty Court Rules of 1859 and 1871, that the mode of conducting the cases continued very much the same as before. The London proctor appears to have been treated as having the real conduct of the case, though his instructions came from an out-port solicitor, and the fees allowed and forms of bills of costs found in Williams & Bruce, 1st edit., Appendix, pp. lxx. to lxxxviii. and ccvi. to ccxxiv. are in accordance with this view. Amongst these forms is given at p. ccx. a list of out-port charges, and to this a note is appended as follows: "The out-port charges are the charges of the country solicitor. They are frequently small in amount, because it often happens that nearly all the matters in respect of which costs are allowed as costs in the cause are transacted in London by the London agent. The out-port charges are usually made out in a separate bill annexed to the bill of costs. In taxing the out-port charges, the charges for all matters done in the country, in respect of which if done in London specific charges might be made, are allowed in the usual way, but in addition to these charges a sum is ordinarily allowed under the head of agency. This is intended to remunerate the country solicitor generally for necessary work and labour in respect of matters for which specific charges cannot be made. The sum allowed of course varies greatly according to circumstances." It seems fairly clear that all the work was treated as conducted in the London Registry, though there would be certain matters which were dealt with by the country agent, for an agency charge was allowed.

In the present day since the establishment of the country registries many cases are conducted entirely in the local registry until the hearing, and in any such case when the hearing, as is usual in the Admiralty Division, takes place in London, the country solicitors on either side have the whole management of the case. In 1870 a registry was established in Liverpool, and I am informed by the Liverpool district registrar that in cases conducted in that registry it has been the practice since its foundation to allow the costs of the attendance of the Liverpool solicitors at the hearing in London, where witnesses are examined, and depositions have been taken by them. By that I understand where they have themselves taken the real conduct of the proceedings, and have had the responsibility of taking the statements of the witnesses. In cases where the solicitors for both parties practise in London, no question arises; but where one side is represented in London and the other at an out-port, or one is represented at one out-port and the other at another, and the case is conducted in London, the question will arise. In this respect an Admiralty action does not differ from some other actions tried in London. There, are however, certain peculiarities about an Admiralty case which are not applicable to most other actions. The hearing of an Admiralty case usually takes place within a very short time of the occurrence, owing to the rapid despatch necessary in a court where the witnesses are seafaring men. The statements of the witnesses of a vessel represented at an out-port are taken by the solicitor with great accuracy; the witnesses usually arrive in London on the night before the hearing under the arrangements which it is necessary to make for this class of witnesses, and the town agent in such a case may have no opportunity of examining them. In the conduct in court of a difficult collision case it is, according to my experience at the bar, most important that the solicitor who is responsible for the case and the preparation of the evidence should be present, and that counsel should have his assistance. The presence of the solicitor having the conduct of the case, who has seen the witnesses, is necessary in many instances for their proper examination in this class of case, and sometimes as a check even over witnesses of his own side, or over the independent witnesses of the other side who have given him statements, and he is often obliged, at a moment's notice, to go into the witness-box to deal with statements made by these witnesses. There are, therefore, in the Admiralty Court cases in which, owing to the exigencies of modern business and to the conditions under which the cases are fought, the presence of the country solicitor may be necessary for the proper conduct of the client's case; and, where such is the case, I am of opinion that the costs of his attendance at the hearing should be allowed. If this principle is cautiously and properly applied no improper charge is thrown on the losing side; whereas, if it is not applied, and the general rule is adhered to in all cases, a successful suitor may have to bear the cost of the attendance of his own solicitor, though that solicitor's presence was necessary to the successful prosecution of his suit. In the present case the attendance of the managing clerk of the plaintiffs' Cardiff solicitors appears to me to have been necessary, and I refer the case back to the registrar to review his taxation, and in doing so he will have to reconsider the allowance for the attendance of the London agent, because, if the country solicitor is allowed for, only such assistance as is necessary for him at the hearing can be allowed.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Downing, Holman, and Co., for Downing and Handcock, Cardiff.

Solicitors for defendants, Lowless and Co.

Tuesday, Feb. 14, 1893.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE ALPS. (a)

Marine insurance—Loss of freight—Perils of the seas—Causa proxima—Repairs—Charter-party.

By a charter-party entered into between the plaintiffs and certain charterers for the hire of the plaintiffs' vessel at so much per month it was provided that, in the event of loss of time from want of repairs, &c., preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four working hours, the payment of the hire should cease from the hour when detention began until the vessel was again efficient.

The plaintiffs insured the chartered freight by a policy effected with the defendants which contained the usual clause specifying perils of the seas, fire, &c.

The vessel was damaged by fire, and there was loss of hire, under the clause in the charter-party, during the time she was being repaired.

Held, that the clause was put into operation through the immediate action of the perils insured against, and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to recover under the policy.

THIS was the hearing of a question of law, under Order XXXIV., r. 2, in an action upon a policy of insurance upon chartered freight of the steamship Alps.

The Mersey Steamship Company Limited were the plaintiffs, and the defendants were the Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company Limited.

The agreed facts were as follows: The plaintiffs, who were the owners of the steamship Alps, by a charter-party, dated the 12th April 1890, entered into by the plaintiffs' agents at New York, Messrs. Pim, Forwood, and Co., and George Christall, of the Trinidad Steamship Company, New York, charterer, agreed to let their vessel and the charterer agreed to hire her at the rate of 425*l.* per calendar month, and at and after the same rate for any part of a month, payment to be made in cash at New York monthly in advance at current rates of exchange. The charter-party contained a clause to the effect that, in the event of loss of time from collision, stranding, want of repairs, breakdown of machinery, or any cause appertaining to the duties of the owner preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four working hours, the payment of the hire should cease from the hour when detention began until the ship should be again in an efficient state to resume her service.

By a policy of insurance effected with the defendants the plaintiffs insured for twelve months from the 9th June 1891 to the 8th June 1892, 1000*l.* chartered freight, including all liberties as per bill of lading in their ship or vessel the Alps.

On the 18th Aug. 1891, at about 3.30 a.m., the vessel, while lying at the Union Stores, Brooklyn, taking in cargo, was discovered to be on fire. The fire was extinguished by pouring water on it, but the fore-peak was found to be completely burnt out. The upper deck was also badly burnt, as well as the sails and stores belonging to the vessel, including towing hawser, and the skin of the vessel was injured by the heat. The vessel was repaired and the repairs occupied thirteen days, and the hire of the vessel for these days was repaid to the charterers. The loss of freight to the shipowners was thus 179*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* Insurances to the extent of 2500*l.* had been effected, and by an average statement a claim for 35*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.* was adjusted for loss of hire against the defendant company's policy on chartered freight.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The proceedings in the action were commenced eleven days previously to the trial, the plaintiffs having issued their writ on the 2nd Feb. 1893. An application was made on the 9th Feb. to Barnes, J., in chambers, to dispose of the matter in dispute under Order XXXIV., r. 2, which is as follows:

> If it appear to the court or a judge that there is in any cause or matter a question of law which it would be convenient to have decided before any evidence is given or any question or issue of fact is tried, or before any reference is made to a referee or an arbitrator, the court or judge may make an order accordingly, and may direct such question of law to be raised for the opinion of the court either by special case or in such other manner as the court or judge may deem expedient, and all such further proceedings as the decision of such questions of law may render unnecessary may thereupon be stayed.

The learned judge accordingly made an order to the effect that the question of law, whether upon the facts stated in an average statement and certain documents therein referred to the plaintiffs were entitled to recover any and what sum, be tried without a special case.

Pickford and Maurice Hill, for the plaintiffs, relied on the dictum of Lord Watson in The Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 581; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 6; 7 App. Cas. 670). The loss resulted from a peril insured against under the policy, and the charter-party provided that payment of the hire should cease during such time as the vessel was disabled.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. for the defendants.—It is submitted that in this case the fire was not the causa proxima of the loss. If it had not been for the provision in the charter the hire would have run on during the time the repairs were being effected, and the loss of hire was therefore caused not by any peril insured against, but by the nature of the contract:

> The Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff. 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 763; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 419; 6 Q. B. Div. 648.

In that case Bramwell, L.J., in giving the judgment of the court, said: "The question still arises, was the loss of the freight a loss by perils of the seas? We are of opinion it was not. We are of opinion that, but for the particular clauses in this charter-party, freight would have continued to be earned, notwithstanding perils of the seas , . . . But for the clause in question, therefore, the time in the charter-party would have run during the time of those repairs . . . The perils of the seas, therefore, have not caused the loss of freight. They are causa sine quâ non, but not causa causans, not the proximate cause of the loss. Suppose there had been a clause that the ship might be put out of pay if she stranded, and she had stranded, not been injured, but put out of pay. That would have been a loss in one sense by the perils of the seas, no less than this, but clearly not covered by the policy." Lord Fitzgerald said in the same case in the House of Lords (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 581; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 6; 7 App. Cas. 670): "If, however, there was a loss of freight, it would remain to be considered whether peril of the sea was the immediate cause of the loss. The maxim, In jure non remota causa sed proxima spectatur applies specially to marine insurances; so that, in order to entitle the claimants to recover here, the loss must be a direct, and not a remote, consequence of the peril of the sea. The touching on the Roman Rock was a peril of the sea, and, probably, but for that, the ship would have completed her undertaking, and earned her two months' freight; but it does not follow that the touching on the rock, and consequent injury, were the causa causans. The freight was not necessarily and directly lost by that calamity and the consequent necessity for repairs. The plaintiffs were deprived of the right to their freight, if they were so deprived, by the action of the commissioners, or their officers, under the special provisions of the charter-party. The loss was not by the perils of the sea, but was occasioned by the contract. I concur in the opinion of Bramwell, L.J., in this case, that the loss was not the necessary and proximate effect of the peril of the sea, and that the plaintiffs have failed to establish the immediate relation of the one to the other." He also cited

> Pink v. Fleming, 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 413; 25 Q. B. Div. 396;
> Mercantile Steamship Company v. Tyser, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 6 (a); L. Rep. 7 Q. B. Div. 73; > Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 789; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125.

BARNES, J. (having drawn attention to the speedy way in which the case had been brought to trial, owing to the parties having availed themselves of the facilities which existed, but which were not ordinarily used, and having dealt with the documents upon which the point of law arose, continued):—The question arises, whether or not the loss was caused by the perils insured against, or one of them, or, as counsel for the defendants contends, is to be treated as a loss not due to the perils insured against proximately, but to the effect of the clause in the charter. The case which both parties agree is decisive of this, according to the way it is looked at, is that of the Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff (ubi sup.). The plaintiffs there sought to recover, under a policy upon "freight outstanding," for loss of hire which had been caused by the Commissioners of the Admiralty putting the ship off pay, under a special clause in the charter-party, which had been effected for the vessel. It is unnecessary to criticise the case with any great accuracy, so far as its own terms are concerned, because it is obvious that Lord Bramwell, in dealing with the case, said that the commissioners, acting under the clause, put the ship out of pay, and then he proceeds to say that no doubt in that case the loss of hire was not to be treated as having been a loss due to the perils of the sea; because, he considered in that particular case, it was not proximately so caused. In the House of Lords, Lord Selborne says: "The result is, that in my opinion a right to the freight in question must be deemed to have accrued under the terms of the charter-party, but to have been subsequently in July 1879 defeated, under the power of abatement by way of mulct, reserved by the contract, to the Board of Admiralty. It has not been without doubt, or, I must add, without reluctance, that I have come to the conclusion that this is not a loss so directly, proximately, and immediately resulting from the perils of the seas insured against as to make it payable under the terms of the policy by the insurers." Then he goes on to say: "The general principle of causa proxima, non remota, spectatur, is intelligible enough, and easy of application in many cases; but that there are cases in which a too literal application of it would work injustice, and would not really be justified by the principle itself, is apparent," and that is apparent from certain observations to which he refers. Then he proceeds a little later on: "If in the present case, the other terms of the charter-party being the same, a power had been reserved to the charterers, or their agents, to determine the contract, and their liability to further freight, on the occurrence of any such damage to the ship, by perils of the sea, as might render her inefficient for the service which she had undertaken, and if such power had been exercised before any further freight was earned, I should have been of opinion that this was a loss of freight by perils of the sea, for which the insurers were liable. Nor would it, in my opinion, have made any difference, although provision might have been made by the contract for the continuance of the troops and stores in the ship, after the exercise of the power to determine the contract, until such time as they could be conveniently landed, or transferred to other vessels. But between such a case, and that of a subsequent mulct under a special power, such as that contained in this charter-party, after freight had been earned, which (unless the power of mulct were exercised) would be payable under the contract, there seems to me to be an important difference. The principle of such cases as Hadkinson v. Robinson (3 B. & P. 388); Taylor v. Dunbar (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 211); and McSwiney v. Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation (14 Q. B. 634) seems to be here applicable, and obliges me to conclude that the risk of loss by the exercise, under such circumstances, of such a special power is different from the risk of loss by perils of the seas, and ought to have been insured against, in some more special manner, if it was the intention of the parties that it should be covered by the policy. I do not dissemble that there appears to me to be something of refinement in the distinction, which the rule laid down by the authorities, as applied to the particular facts of this case, obliges me to make; but, though refined, it seems to be a real distinction, and to justify the judgment of the court below." Then Lord Blackburn says, in Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff, after commenting upon the way in which the charter-party must be looked at: "But as soon as it is ascertained that the policy attached on the hire under a particular charter-party, the charter-party must be read in order to see how the subject-matter was affected by the misfortune which happened. Under one charter-party a temporary disablement of the ship might occasion a loss for which the underwriters on ship would be responsible, but which would not have any effect at all on the assured's right to recover the hire of the vessel whilst she was disabled. Under another, such a temporary disablement might deprive the shipowner of all claim for hire during the time she was disabled. In the first of these cases there could be no claim against the underwriters on freight, for there was no loss of freight. In the second I do not see how it could properly be denied that there was such a loss." And then he comments upon the doctrine of causa proxima, non causa remota, spectatur, and says: "I must own that, I have always sympathised with Lord Colonsay in Rankin v. Potter (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 142; L. Rep. 6 H. of L. 160), where he says, 'something is said about proximate, and remote cause, and these are matters which are very apt to lead us into philosophical mazes,' which I think he did not use as a term of eulogy. I think, as he did, that when we get a clear view of the facts it is best to keep clear of such philosophical mazes. And, as I think, the question here is not what was the proximate cause of a loss of freight, but whether there was any loss of freight."

Now, I do not say that the counsel for the defendants has led me off into a philosophical maze, but he has, with great ingenuity, endeavoured to point out how, under certain circumstances, a claim can be made under this policy for a partial loss, so that, as he contended, full effect might be given to the policy without allowing such a claim as that in question. But that does not seem sufficient to conclude this particular case. Lord Watson says (Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff), putting it shortly: "If I am right in my construction of the charter-party, the case turns upon a very narrow point. The inefficiency of the vessel was admittedly due to perils of the sea, which were within the risks insured by the policy; and if it had been expressly stipulated in the charter-party that freight should cease to be payable as long as the ship was incapable from that cause of efficiently performing her contract, I do not doubt that the insurers would have been liable. That would have been a plain case of cesser or loss of freight by the perils insured against. But that is not the present case." I apply that language to this case. The inefficiency of this vessel was admittedly due to the fire, one of the perils insured against. It has been expressly stipulated in the charter-party that, in the event of loss of time from want of repairs, the hire did cease to be payable so long as the vessel was incapable from that cause of efficiently performing her service. It is a case of cesser, or loss of freight, through a peril insured against. The counsel for the defendants urged that many other causes might produce want of repairs. Yes, but only certain perils are insured against, one of which is fire, and it seems to me that, having regard to the judgments I have referred to, and the principles they seem to indicate, and also to the case of Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), the true view to take of an insurance such as this, applied to a very ordinary form of charter-party, containing a very ordinary and usual clause, is that it casts upon the underwriters the risk of loss of freight when that clause is put into operation through the immediate action of the perils insured against. I therefore think that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed, and my judgment will be for them for the sum of 35*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.* I do not suppose interest is asked for; but this being a test case, I certify that it is a proper one to have been tried in the High Court.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Field, Roscoe, and Co., for Bateson, Warr, and Bateson, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

March 13 and 14, 1893.

(Before BARNES, J., assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE LIVERPOOL. (a)

Salvage—Towage contract—Danger to tow—Supervening circumstance.

Where the owners of a tug contracted to tow a vessel from sea and dock her, and while manœuvring to enter the dock the vessel grounded, and was towed off by the tug, the Court refused to award salvage on the ground that the vessel was never in any immediate danger, and that the tug had not run any risk or performed any service beyond what was contemplated by the parties when they entered into the towage contract.

THIS was a salvage action brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steam-tug Stormcock, against the ship Liverpool, for services rendered in the river Mersey.

The facts, so far as material, were as follows: On the 23rd Jan. 1893 the steam-tug Stormcock, which is a twin-screw of 419 tons gross and 59 tons net register, having engines of 300 horse-power nominal and 1500 actual, with a crew of twelve hands, was engaged in towing the ship Liverpool in the river Mersey from sea. Another tug, the Agnes Seed, was fast to the port quarter of the Liverpool. They arrived opposite the entrance to the Herculaneum Dock about 3 p.m., and the Stormcock, by the pilot's orders, towed the Liverpool round towards the eastward and northward, edging her in towards the dock wall, and continued towing her round until she headed north. She then ceased towing. The tide was flood, it being high water at 3.49 p.m., and the effect of this and a fresh breeze from the west carried the Liverpool past the dock entrance. The Stormcock then pulled her head towards the north-west, but her stern drifted towards the dock wall. The Agnes Seed endeavoured to check the drifting by reversing, but her tow rope parted, and the stern of the Liverpool eventually grounded upon the rock which lies upon the foreshore of the river about one hundred feet from the dock wall and nearly opposite the entrance to the Harrington Dock. Continuing to tow westward the Stormcock gradually brought the Liverpool's head round to the S.S.W., when, with a straight pull, she succeeded in getting her off. The Liverpool, it was contended, was in a position of great peril, as the wind and tide were forcing her in, and if she had not been towed off she would have struck on the rock. By reason of the towage the fifteen-inch Manilla hawser belonging to the Stormcock was rendered useless.

It was alleged on behalf of the defendants that the Liverpool, which is a four-masted steel ship of 3330 tons register, with a crew of thirty-seven hands, bound from San Francisco to Liverpool with a general cargo, engaged the Stormcock to tow her from sea to Liverpool, and there dock her, for the sum of 55*l*. It was contended that the stern of the Liverpool only scraped on some soft red sandstone in the river bed, and was towed round by the tug without difficulty. It was denied that the tug performed anything in the nature of salvage services, or outside the terms of the agreement.

The value of the Stormcock was 15,000*l*.

The value of the Liverpool was 25,000*l*.; of her cargo, 29,000*l*.; and freight 5550*l*: total, 59,550*l*.

Aspinall, Q.C. and W. F. Taylor for the plaintiffs.—If anything happens which puts a different character on the towage, then the tug is entitled to salvage reward:

The Saratoga, Lush. 318;
The J. C. Potter, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 603; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 506; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 292.

Even if there is no risk to the tug she would still be entitled to salvage. Dr. Lushington says, in The Pericles (Br. & Lush. 81): "Risk to the salvor is not a necessary element of salvage, though it does, as we all know, enhance the merit of the service, and earn a higher reward." [BARNES, J.—Is not a ship that has a tug in a sense always in danger?]

The Annapolis, Lush. 355.

There must be danger at the moment the service is rendered:

The Minnehaha, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 811; 1 Mar. Law Cas. 111; Lush. 355.

[BARNES, J. referred to The Lady Egidia, Lush. 513.] The grounding of the Liverpool was a supervening circumstance which the parties to the contract had not contemplated. Under the circumstances, although the tug was not entitled to abandon her contract, she was not debarred from claiming salvage. Opinion of Lord Hannen in

The Five Steel Barges, 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 580; 15 P. Div. 142.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Maurice Hill for the defendants.—It is submitted that this was merely the performance of an ordinary towage contract. The danger per se is immaterial unless the effect of it is to make the tug perform a service not within the towage contract. There could be no salvage where the vessel, with the tug performing an ordinary towage service, was not in a position of danger. The Liverpool was entitled to the services of the Stormcock, and with those services she was enabled to haul round. She got nothing more than she was entitled to under the contract:

The Lady Egidia (ubi sup.);
The Annapolis (ubi sup.).

Aspinall, Q.C. in reply.

BARNES, J. (having dealt with the facts, continued):—It is in respect of the alleged rescue of the vessel from the position of danger in which it is contended she was in touching the ground that the plaintiffs make their salvage claim. When the cases are examined, I think there can be no question about the law applicable to such a case as the present. In fact, counsel on both sides have relied upon the statement of the law as found in the judgment of Lord Kingsdown in The Minnehaha (ubi sup.) as being a correct statement of their own view of it, and of the view which has been since that time, and probably before, accepted by the court. The law as laid down by Lord Kingsdown is as follows: "But if in the discharge of this task, by sudden violence of wind or waves, or other accident, the ship in tow is placed in danger, and the towing vessel incurs risks and performs duties which were not within the scope of her original engagement, she is entitled to additional remuneration for additional services if the ship is saved, and may claim as a salvor instead of being restricted to the sum stipulated to be paid for mere towage. Whether this larger remuneration is to be considered as an addition to or in substitution for the price of towage is of little consequence practically. The measure of the sum to be allowed as salvage would, of course, be increased or diminished according as the price of towage was or was not included in it. In the cases on this subject the towage contract is generally spoken of as superseded by the right to salvage. It is not disputed that these are the rules which are acted on in the Court of Admiralty, and they appear to their Lordships to be founded in reason and in public policy, and to be not inconsistent with legal principles. The tug is relieved from the performance of her contract by the impossibility of performing it; but if the performance of it be possible, but in the course of it the ship in her charge is exposed by unavoidable accident to dangers which require from the tug services of a different class, and bearing a higher rate of payment, it is held to be implied in the contract that she shall be paid at such higher rate." Several other cases have been cited to me, more for the facts to which these principles have been applied. Perhaps the cases which have been most discussed have been those of The Pericles (ubi sup.), The Lady Egidia (ubi sup.), and The Annapolis (ubi sup.). Mr. Aspinall has laid great stress on the fact that there was danger to the salved vessel from which in the course of the towage she was rescued, and there is no question whatever that unless there is danger the salvor cannot maintain any claim for salvage. But I do not think that the argument on behalf of the plaintiffs can be placed quite so high as Mr. Aspinall endeavoured to put it, namely, that in all cases of danger to the salved property the tug is entitled to a salvage award, because that would only be embracing half the proposition to be found in the cases, which is that there must be something done either in the nature of risk run or extra services performed by the tug beyond that which is included in the contemplation of the parties in the service which she is engaged to perform. When the case of The Pericles is looked at, it will be found not to conflict in the least with anything said in The Minnehaha, but to be a case in which, having regard to the facts, the court must have come to the conclusion that the services were beyond those which the tug had agreed to perform. Again, in the case of The Lady Egidia, the other view was taken of the facts, but the same principle applied, and, referring even to the language used in Lord Kingsdown's judgment, it was found that in that case the salving vessel had not incurred any risk or performed any duty which was not within the scope of her original contract. The difficulty of the case is really not in the statement of the law, but in the application of the law to the particular facts of the case. It is perfectly easy to state a case, on the one hand, in which it is clear that the right to salvage ought to be allowed; and to state a case, on the other hand, in which it is equally clear that the claim for salvage ought to be disallowed. There is a kind of line between the two which renders this case and other cases of the same kind somewhat difficult to determine. Lord Cranworth in a well-known case said, "There is no possibility of mistaking midnight for noon, but at what precise moment twilight becomes darkness it is hard to determine." So it is in a case of this particular kind which we have before us. The first point to consider is the danger or risk from which the Liverpool is said to have been preserved. I have heard the whole of the evidence, and considered the point with care, assisted by the Elder Brethren, and the first matter to refer to is the state of the ship's bottom as found after the accident. As has been pointed out by Mr. Walton, the plaintiffs appear to have waited until they had had an opportunity of seeing what the state of the bottom was, in order to judge whether they had, in fact, rescued the ship from something which was a source of danger to her, and after that inspection the claim was apparently launched. The evidence is to the effect that from some seventy feet from the vessel's stern the barnacles, which had accumulated on the ship in the course of her voyage, had been rubbed off on the starboard side of the garboard strake, and beginning with a very small rubbing off, gradually rose until it reached the height of some fifteen or eighteen inches up the garboard strake, at the extreme end of the vessel. The garboard strake in this ship was fitted so that it was slightly above the bottom of the keel, but apparently the edges of the keel and the paint were uninjured. The paint was not injured except in one spot, and the barnacles are stated to have been left still sticking out at the extreme end of the keel, and to be entirely unaffected on the port side of the garboard strake and the keel. One other matter fit to mention is, that those on board the Liverpool appear to have been entirely unaware that their ship was touching; and I think, if I recollect rightly, they so stated to the dockmaster on the following day. The case is thus singular in this, that the claim for salvage is made for a work when those on board of her appear to have been entirely unaware of the fact that they were in danger at the time the services were being rendered. [The learned Judge here reviewed the evidence as to the grounding of the vessel, and continued:]

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The conclusion of fact to which I come, having regard to these considerations, is that it was not a grounding of the ship at all, within the proper sense of that term, but that it was really a touching of the bottom, and that as she was moved off the accumulated surface of the ground—whether soft mud or any other deposit is immaterial for this purpose—was gradually rising and formed a slight bank which increased as the vessel moved and gradually rose, and therefore explains how this marking was deeper aft than further forward; and that as soon as the vessel was turned she was pulled round without any difficulty, and taken into the dock. In fact, to put it in a short form, I do not think on the evidence that this vessel was ever fast on the ground. I have asked the Elder Brethren these questions, which seemed to me matters for their consideration, though I also will express my view upon them. The first is, whether the Liverpool was in any immediate danger, and they are both strongly of opinion that she was not. I have also asked whether the Stormcock incurred any risk, or performed any duties, or rendered any services beyond what was reasonably to be expected of her in the performance of her towing contract, and they again entertain a strong opinion in the negative. I must say that, as far as I am competent to judge, I entirely agree with them in the answers which they have given to these two questions. It seems to me that in such a case as this the tug is engaged for the purpose of avoiding dangers which a vessel of this size must to some extent always run in entering a dock, and that you cannot expect that the vessel will with absolute certainty and precision make her way into a dock unattended by any slight deviation from what is her direct course. Really, when one comes to consider this case, it is obvious that, with a rising tide and the position in which the ship was, she was in no immediate danger at all. The scraping of her bottom is the best explanation of that. Of course, if she had been left there until the tide had fallen she would have been injured, and so she would have been if she had been afloat but had been left lying alongside the dock wall. If she had moved past the dock entrance, and lay alongside the dock wall, and nothing was done with her, I suppose, unless it were perfectly flat on the bottom, she would break her back when the tide fell. But the vessel was turned round, having got a little too far from the entrance, and in turning round she touched slightly against the rock, or muddy surface of the rock, I care not which, and was then taken without difficulty into the dock. In doing that it seems to me quite clear that this large and powerful tug did absolutely nothing more than she ought to do, and could be expected to do, in almost every case of passing a little too far beyond the dock entrance. Then it is said there is some difference in this case because the Agnes Seed had parted her rope. It is quite true that she did, but it does not appear to me or to the Elder Brethren that that parting really caused any additional work to the Stormcock beyond what she was really bound to do. Lastly, the point suggested is, that because the hawser was said to be damaged that would turn this into a salvage service. That is a very strong proposition, and it appears to me unfounded in fact, because I do not think, on the facts here, that there is any evidence to satisfy me that the hawser incurred more than its ordinary wear and tear in the performance of that towage. When one finds recorded in the log-book of the 2nd Feb. that this very hawser, as we are told by the witnesses, was being used to tow a ship called the Eurydice, and used when it was blowing a heavy gale, and when there was a cross sea, and then that hawser parted, I cannot bring myself to believe that the hawser sustained any injury of material importance at the time of this particular occurrence. If it did I cannot understand how it could be said that they were properly using it when they were towing the Eurydice. I ought to say that, while it is the duty of the court to take care to adequately remunerate all salvors for salvage services, in order to encourage those services to be performed—and in this spirit salvage services are always looked upon in this court—it is equally the duty of the court to see, where a towing contract has been made, that a little departure from and divergence from the exact mode in which that contract is to be performed is not magnified into a claim for salvage. Having regard to these various considerations, in my opinion this claim to salvage is not established, and ought to be dismissed with costs.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, J. W. Thompson, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hill, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

March 14, 15, and 21, 1893.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE GLENLIVET. (a)

Marine insurance—Injury by fire—Memorandum in Lloyd's policy—Meaning of word "burnt."

A ship is "burnt" within the meaning of the memorandum of a Lloyd's policy of insurance, "warranted free from average under 3l. per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt," when the injury by fire is sufficient to cause some interruption of the voyage, so that the vessel is pro tempore incapable of being properly used, which may be expressed by the term "temporarily unnavigable."

THIS was an action brought by the Glenlivet Steamship Company Limited against Mr. J. H. Titcombe, an underwriter at Lloyd's, to recover the latter's proportion of the claims made on their insurers by the plaintiffs under policies on the steamship Glenlivet.

Under a policy, dated the 26th Aug. 1891, the vessel was insured for twelve calendar months, and for a like period under another policy dated the 25th Aug. 1892. They contained the usual printed memorandum in a Lloyd's policy, and after the words "ship and freight are warranted free from average under 3*l.* per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded," there was added in writing, "sunk or burnt. The warranty and conditions as to average under 3 per cent. to be applicable to each out and home voyage as if separately issued, and not to the whole time insured."

During the first voyage, on the 6th May 1892, the cross bunker was found to be on fire. Part of the coals were discharged, and the fire extinguished by pumping water on it. On the 29th the port bunker caught fire, and was extinguished in a like manner. There was no damage to the ship herself.

During the second voyage on the 26th July the starboard bunker was found to be on fire, and coal was worked out and water pumped on it to extinguish it, the deck hose being burnt in doing so, and again next day it broke out and was extinguished. About ten tons of coal were destroyed, and the plating of the bunker was damaged and paint burnt off.

On the 14th Oct., in the course of the fourth voyage, the cross bunker was again found to be on fire, and was extinguished with buckets of water. There was some damage to the ship's plating, brick and wood casing, and hatches.

The claims in respect of the alleged damage were all under 3 per cent. The question before the court, according to the agreed statement of issues, was "whether the Glenlivet was or was not "burnt" within the meaning and intent of the policies on all or any of the separate voyages in question. If the court should be of opinion that the vessel was "burnt" in the course of voyage No. 1, the defendant is liable for his proportion of the sum of 5*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* If the court should be of opinion that the vessel was "burnt" in the course of voyage No. 2, the defendant is liable for his proportion of 47*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.* If the court should be of opinion that the vessel was "burnt" in the course of voyage No. 4, the defendant is liable for his proportion of 369*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*" In addition to the agreed statement of facts, the policies, log-books, and survey reports were also produced.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Aspinall, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, cited

Hill v. Patten, 8 East, 373;
Forbes v. Aspinall, 13 East, 323;
Wells v. Hopwood, 3 B. & Ad. 20;
Burnett v. Kensington, 7 T. R. 210;
Doe d. Reed v. Harris, 6 A. & E. 209;
Bibb d. Moel v. Thomas, 2 W. Bl. 1043;
McArthur's Contract of Marine Insurance, 2nd edit. p. 302

Joseph Walton, Q.C., for the defendants, cited

Hoffmann v. Marshall, 2 Bing. N.C. 383.

Counsel's arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

BARNES, J.—This case raises a difficult question of construction of the memorandum commonly used in a Lloyd's policy. The question is as to the meaning of the term "burnt" in the memorandum. In order to appreciate the point it is necessary first to state the facts shortly. [The learned Judge then referred to the particulars of the policies and other details of fact, and proceeded:] The claim on the first voyage is for a small average loss, under 3 per cent., from perils other than fire, and on the second and fourth for small average losses to the vessel herself, under 3 per cent., partly from fire and partly from other perils insured against. I have, therefore, to determine whether the "ship" was "burnt" on any of the said voyages within the meaning of that term in the memorandum. It is agreed that if the ship was burnt on any of the voyages, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for the loss occurring on the voyage or voyages on which the burning occurred, and that if she was not burnt they are not so entitled. As the memorandum originally stood when it was introduced into policies, about the year 1749, it did not contain the words "sunk or burnt." I am informed they have been in use for over thirty years, and I find them in the policy in Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company v. Saunders (1 B. & S. 41), decided in 1861. The memorandum itself was framed to protect the underwriters from frivolous demands in respect of small losses which are most likely to have arisen from natural deterioration or wear and tear, and the original exception of stranding tends to show that this was the scope of the memorandum. The framers had probably in view a casualty of so serious a nature as to be akin to wreck—that is, such a loss as makes it probable that the damage, though under the given percentage, might reasonably be attributed thereto and not to the perishable nature of the subject matter of the insurance. Several cases were decided upon the memorandum after its introduction, and for a time there was a difference of opinion upon its true construction, Lord Mansfield and Buller, J. holding that the words "unless general or the ship be stranded" constituted one exception, and that the claim should be read "free from average, except general average, and average occasioned by the ship having been stranded;" Ryder, C.J. and Lord Kenyon holding, on the other hand, that the words "or the ship be stranded" constituted a condition so that if the ship be stranded in the course of the voyage, the underwriters are liable for an average loss by perils insured against, though no part of the loss arise from the stranding. And so it was finally held, after full argument, in Burnett v. Kensington (ubi sup.). If, therefore, the ship be stranded, the warranty against average or against average under 5 or 3 per cent. is destroyed, and in order to recover for damage, which but for the stranding would not have been recoverable, it is then not necessary to prove that the damage was occasioned by the stranding, and it follows that in all cases of alleged stranding, the inquiry is to be what condition of the ship constitutes a stranding. So also the inquiry in cases where it is said that the ship was "sunk or burnt" is what condition of the ship satisfies the term "sunk" or "burnt."

There have been a large number of decisions upon the word "stranding," and in these various definitions of the word may be found, but, in my opinion, there runs through them all, in a greater or less degree, the idea which was probably present to the minds of the framers of the memorandum of a serious casualty to the ship affecting her safety and navigation, even though, as a matter of fact, the amount of damage sustained is unimportant. This idea is tersely expressed by Lord Ellenborough in the case of M'Dougle v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company (4 M. & S. 503), where he says: "I take it that stranding in its fair legal sense implies a settling of the ship—some resting or interruption of the voyage so that the ship may pro tempore be considered as wrecked; from which misfortune a great deal of damage does frequently arise." That is to say, the vessel becomes for a time in a condition in which she cannot be properly used for the purposes of her voyage or is unnavigable. From the collocation of the words "sunk or burnt" with the word "stranded," and from the primary impression produced by reading these words "sunk or burnt," it is natural and reasonable to construe them upon the principle applied, and with the idea prevailing in arriving at the proper meaning of the word "stranded." The contention of the plaintiffs is that the ship is burnt, within the true meaning of the clause, if any injury whatever is done by fire to any part of the vessel or any part of her fittings or stores; in other words, if anything included in the term "ship" is on fire for however short a time, or damaged by fire, however slightly. Mr. Aspinall, in support of his argument, cited the proverb, "A burnt child dreads the fire." Mr. Walton, in reply, quoted Drayton's lines: "This ayre of France doth like me wondrous well; lets burne our ships, for here we mean to dwell." There have been no cases on the word "sunk" except Bryant and May v. London Assurance Corporation (2 Times L. Rep. 591), in which the report only refers to Grove, J. leaving questions to the jury about stranding; but my impression, from having been engaged in the case, is that the plaintiffs contended that the vessel had become so deep in the water that she could sink no more, and should be considered to have sunk. If I recollect aright, the vessel never for a moment ceased to be navigable, nor was her voyage interrupted; and I think the suggestion that she was "sunk" was not therefore accepted. There are no decisions upon the word "burnt" in the memorandum in the policy, and it is a remarkable fact if, as Mr. Aspinall contended, the momentary setting fire to any part of a vessel—such, for instance, as cabin curtains or fittings—is enough to cause the vessel to be a "burnt" ship, and thereby destroy the warranty, that the present contention has never been brought before the courts since the introduction of the words "sunk or burnt," though one would think that slight damage by fire was not infrequent on vessels, especially large passenger vessels. Cases on the word "burning" in the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 6) were cited to me in support of the plaintiff's contention. They are not of much assistance in construing a mercantile document, but I may notice that Coleridge, C.J., in the case of Doe d. Reed v. Harris (ubi sup.) says at p. 217): "The question is put whether the will must be destroyed wholly or to what extent? It is hardly necessary to say; but there must be such an injury with intent to revoke as destroys the entirety of the will, because it may then be said that the instrument no longer exists as it was," and Lord Denman observed that doubt might be entertained whether the proof in that case would now be deemed sufficient to establish the burning of the will. It was argued for the plaintiffs that the defendants' construction of the word "burnt" in a policy on a ship would make the memorandum practically useless, because a fire which reduced the vessel to such a state that she could not be properly used would always exceed 3 per cent., and the damage caused by such a fire would be recoverable whether the memorandum was inserted or not; but this argument omits the considerations that if the ship is burnt all damage under 3 per cent. caused by any peril insured against, whether before or by or after the fire, would be recoverable, and also that these words "sunk or burnt" being commonly found now, as I understand, in policies on all kinds of goods, if the ship is burnt, average losses on goods which might otherwise be excluded would be recoverable under the policy. Again, this argument would permit of the recovery of all losses by fire under a policy as such, although there is a warranty against losses under 3 per cent., and would place the peril of fire in a different position from any of the other perils assured against. I cannot bring myself to think that it would be a reasonable or businesslike construction of the word "burnt" to hold that the ship is burnt if any part of her or her stores or fittings is slightly injured by fire, whether that fire is one which exhausts itself without danger to the vessel, or, as was also suggested by the plaintiffs, is one which unless promptly extinguished would cause danger to the vessel. In my opinion the more reasonable and businesslike construction is that the ship is "burnt" whenever the injury by fire is sufficient to cause some interruption of the voyage, so that the vessel is pro tempore incapable of being properly used for the purposes of her voyage. This may be expressed by the term "temporarily unnavigable." In the present case, on the first voyage, the coals heated slightly, and water being poured on them, whatever fire existed was extinguished. Even assuming that coals are to be treated as included in the word "ship," which the plaintiffs alleged and the defendants did not deny, there was no interruption of the voyage, nor any interference in any way with the safety or navigation of the vessel. On the second and fourth voyages the heating of the coals caused some damage to the structure of the vessel, but again, there was no interruption of the voyage, or any interference with the vessel's safety or navigation. I am of opinion that upon none of the voyages was the ship burnt within the meaning of the policy, and that the defendants are entitled to judgment with costs.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche.
Solicitors for defendant, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

March 7 and 22, 1893.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. H. Jeune) and BARNES, J.)

THE ALNE HOLME. (a)

Charter-party—Customary manner of discharge—Detention through strike—Demurrage—Appellate jurisdiction of Divisional Court—Cross-appeal.

By charter-party between plaintiffs and defendants it was agreed that plaintiffs' ship should load a cargo of timber and proceed to Sharpness and there discharge it in the customary manner and with the customary steamer despatch of the port; Sundays and any time lost by strikes, lockouts, or combinations of workmen not to count as part of the discharging. Demurrage to be paid at an agreed rate for any detention of the vessel through default of merchants or charterers, and the usual custom of the wood trade to be observed in each port. At Sharpness it is customary to discharge timber into lighters and convey it by canal to Gloucester. Owing to a strike in the port of Gloucester among the labourers who discharged the lighters there were no lighters obtainable when the vessel arrived at Sharpness. As soon as the strike ended the vessel discharged her cargo.

In an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants in the County Court for demurrage the judge held that Sharpness was included in the port of Gloucester, and that after the strike ended, the defendants, with the exception of one day which they had not accounted for, had done all that could reasonably be expected of them in effecting the vessel's discharge. He therefore gave judgment for one day's demurrage with costs.

Held (affirming the decision of the County Court judge), that the discharge into lighters was the mode of discharge accepted by the parties, that the loss of time, beyond the one day, was caused by the strike within the meaning of the charter-party, and that therefore the charterers were excused.

Held also, that, as the Divisional Court has only an appellate jurisdiction, a cross-appeal by the defendants upon a question of fact involving an amount less than 50l. could not be entertained.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the learned judge of the Cardiff County Court by the plaintiffs in an action brought by Messrs. Hine

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Brothers, shipowners, of Maryport, against Messrs. Thomas, Adams, and Co. timber merchants, of Gloucester.

The plaintiffs, who were the owners of the steamship Alne Holme, of 1070 tons gross register, sought to recover from the defendants, who were the charterers of the vessel, the sum of 127*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.* for five days twenty-two hours' demurrage, at the rate of 22*l.* 5*s* 10*d.* per day, for the alleged detention of the vessel at Sharpness.

The claim arose out of a charter-party dated the 15th July 1890, made between the plaintiffs and the defendants for the carriage of a cargo of deals and battens from Tornea to Sharpness. The cargo was to be brought to and taken from alongside the vessel as customary at port of loading and discharge, and was to be loaded and discharged with the customary steamer despatch of the port and in the ordinary working hours thereof. There was also a clause to the effect that "any time lost by reason of . . . . strikes, lock-outs, or combinations of workmen—whether partial or general—not to count as part of the aforesaid loading or discharging time . . . . If, through any fault of the merchants or charterers the vessel be longer detained, demurrage to be paid at the rate of 5*d.* per gross register ton per like day, and pro rata per hour, for any part of the last of such days . . . . The usual custom of the wood trade of each port is to be observed by each party in cases where not specially expressed."

The Alne Holme arrived at Sharpness on the 13th Aug at 10 a.m., and gave notice of readiness to discharge on the same day.

The discharge began on the 16th Aug. and ended on the 26th Aug.

At the time of the vessel's arrival there was a strike in the port of Gloucester among the labourers in the timber trade, which had been going on for several weeks, and came to an end on the evening of the 15th Aug., and the men began work on the following morning.

The customary mode of discharging timber vessels at Sharpness is to discharge them into timber lighters, by which the timber is taken up the canal to Gloucester, and by reason of the long continuance of the strike of labourers, whose business it was to discharge the loaded lighters, all the timber lighters were at Gloucester loaded with timber, which the consignees could not get unloaded there.

The ordinary rate of discharge for the 383 standards of wood, which formed the cargo, was four days and a half, and the plaintiffs claimed five and a half days' demurrage, contending that the clause in the charter-party applied to a strike at the time at Sharpness, and also that the timber might have been conveyed by railway or rafted.

On behalf of the defendants it was contended that Sharpness was included in the port of Gloucester, and that the strike was a good defence; also that the timber could not be conveyed by rail, and that rafting would have spoilt it.

The learned County Court judge held that the defendants were only in default for doing no work on the 21st Aug. As no explanation was forthcoming for not sending lighters on that day he gave judgment for the plaintiffs for 22*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*, for one day's demurrage, with costs. He found that occasionally timber vessels are discharged at Sharpness on to the bank, and their cargoes are then taken away by railway, but that this is only done when the vessel so discharging has a quay berth; that no quay berth was available for the vessel, and that she was moored to a buoy in the dock with her stern to the quay wall at one end of the dock, in the place between the dock entrance and a graving dock, which was unfitted for the discharge of cargo, and at which the discharge of cargo is never allowed and could not be made. He also held on the evidence that Sharpness is within the port of Gloucester, and on this point referred to Nielsen v. Wait (54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 344; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 553; 16 Q. B. Div. 67). He observed further that the plaintiffs gave no evidence that the suggested mode of discharge on to the bank could have been followed or would have been allowed; and that the defendant's evidence satisfied him that this was not a customary mode of discharge, and that it would not have been allowed in this case by the dock authorities, and no evidence was given that rafting was a customary mode of discharging timber vessels in the port, or that it could have been done with this cargo — in fact, the evidence of one witness was that the cargo would have been spoilt by rafting, and that he had never known such a cargo rafted.

The plaintiffs now appealed, their chief contention being that an anterior strike at Gloucester did not come within the clause in the charter-party, which only provided against delay arising from a strike at the port of discharge.

Brynmor Jones, Q.C. and H. Holman, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal, cited

Kay v. Field, 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 423; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 526, 588: 10 Q. B. Div. 241;
Hudson v. Ede, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 698; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 114; 2 L. Rep. 566, Q. B.;
Grant v. Coverdale, 11 Q. B. Div. 543; 9 App. Cas. 470;
Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company, 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 413; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 118; 4 Ex. Div. 165; Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 601; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 129, 302; 5 App. Cas. 599;
Nelson v. Dahl, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 365; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 172, 392; 6 App. Cas. 38.

Aspinall, Q.C. and L. Batten, for the defendants, contrà, and also applied for leave to cross-appeal from the decision giving the plaintiffs one day's demurrage:

The Falcon, 3 P. D. 100; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 566;
The Lauretta, 4 P. D. 25; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 118;
The Hero (1891) P. 294; 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 86;
The Eden (1892) P. 67; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 174; 66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 387.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by BARNES, J.—The learned judge, after dealing with the facts, continued:—We see no reason to take a different view of the facts from that adopted by the learned County Court judge, who had the witnesses before him. The main point urged by Mr. Brynmor Jones was that, even if the facts were taken as above stated, the case fell within the decisions of Kay v. Field (ubi sup.) and Grant v. Coverdale (ubi sup.), and that as the strike only prevented lighters from being discharged at Gloucester it did not prevent the discharge of the ship at Sharpness within the meaning of the charter-party. On the other hand Mr. Aspinall argued that the case was one of a similar nature to that of Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.) It is unnecessary to discuss at any length the distinction between the two former cases and the latter, because that has been fully done in the judgment of the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, who reversed the decision of Baron Pollock, and also in the judgment delivered in the House of Lords in Grant v. Coverdale. It is sufficient to note that in the two former cases the place of loading was the East Bute Dock, and that there were several distinct modes of loading, one of which was interrupted by frost, and thus affected the particular charterer, but would not have affected most of the shippers who used the East Bute Docks; whereas, in the latter case the only way in which cargo could have been brought to the vessel was interrupted by ice. The late Chief Baron, in delivering judgment in Hudson v. Ede, said: "My brother Willes has observed, and we agree with him in opinion, that whenever there was no access to the ship by reason of ice from any one of the storing places from which merchandise was conveyed direct to the ship, the exceptions in the charter-party would apply," Lord Selborne also refers to the matter in his judgment in Grant v. Coverdale (ubi sup). In the present case the only customary mode of discharge of such a cargo as that of the Alne Holme was by lighters, in which the timber is lightered to Gloucester, and it is clear to my mind that the parties contemplated that the discharge should take place in that manner; and, in fact, it was the only possible way in which the discharge could take place. There is no question that the discharge in this manner was delayed by the strike, and for this delay the charterers, in my opinion, are not responsible, It was urged upon us that the vessel might have been sooner discharged at Sharpness, but this could only have been done, if at all, in one of four ways—first by lighters, which under the circumstances was impossible, owing to the strike; secondly, by rafting; but this, if possible, was not a customary mode of discharging a cargo, and would have spoilt the cargo; thirdly, it was said that it might have been put ashore; but this, again, was not customary, and could not have been done; and, fourthly, that the vessel might have discharged at a quay at Sharpness, but the charter provided that she should be discharged at a dock and berth as might be ordered by the charterers or by their agents, after receiving notice of arrival, or so near thereto as she might safely get, and, if ordered to a quay, there was no quay berth available, and the vessel could not have got to the quay probably without longer delay than she experienced, according to the evidence; and discharge of timber on to the quay was not a customary mode of discharge. In truth, it was never contemplated that she should discharge at a quay berth, and the discharge into lighters was the mode of discharge accepted by both parties. Applying the principles of the cases cited to the present case, I am of opinion that the loss of time in question was caused by the strike within the meaning of the charter-party, and that the charterers are excused.

A further point was made for the defendants that the clause in this charter-party "to be discharged with the customary steamer despatch of the port," was substantially the same as that in the case of the Castlegate Steamship Company Limited v. Dempsey (1892) 1 Q. B. 854; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 108; 66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 742). In that case the charter party provided that the cargo was "to be discharged with all despatch as customary, and ten days on demurrage over the above, the said laying days at 6*d.* per nett register ton per day." By the custom of the port of discharge a dock company undertook the work of discharging cargo, and by reason of a strike of dock labourers the discharge of the cargo was delayed. It was held that the effect of the charter-party was not to fix any definite time in which the cargo must be discharged, but to provide that it should be discharged with all reasonable despatch, having regard to the circumstances and the manner of discharging cargo customary at the port of discharge; and, therefore, that the charterers were not liable to the shipowners in respect of the delay which occurred in discharging the cargo. The language in the charter in the present case is slightly different from that in the charter I have just referred to, and the latter charter had no strike clause. The Master of the Rolls and Lopes, L.J. both point out that in the case before them the dock company did both the shipowners' and charterers' work, though it is suggested that it would have made no difference had it been otherwise. As however, there is a strike clause in the present case it is unnecessary to give any decision as to what would have been the case had it been omitted. The plaintiffs further alleged that after the strike was over, the defendants ought to have sent more lighters to the scene than they did, but the judge has found, as a fact, that after the strike had come to an end, they did all that they could reasonably have been expected to do to discharge the vessel, except on one day, the 21st, and there is nothing to show that he has improperly found this fact. The appeal must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Aspinall invited us to allow him to prosecute a cross-appeal against the judgment for one day's demurrage, but as the only ground upon which he could question the judgment on this point was admitted by him to depend upon a question of fact, and the amount was under 50*l.*, no appeal against the judgment lies in favour of the defendants. It was said, however, that as the plaintiffs had chosen to bring the case before the court, the court had power, upon the plaintiffs' appeal, to alter the judgment adversely to the plaintiffs. No authority was cited for any such proposition, and, as this court has only an appellate jurisdiction, the only question before it is whether or not the plaintiffs' appeal is to succeed or fail, and I do not consider that we can entertain what is really a cross-appeal by the defendants, when they have no right to originate an appeal.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Downing, Holman, and Co., for Downing and Handcock, Cardiff.

Solicitors for defendants, Thorneycroft and Willis, for Taynton, Sons, and Siveter, Gloucester.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, July 26, 1892.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., BOWEN and KAY, L.JJ., and NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.)

THE SCHWAN (a)

Collision—Limitation of liability—Separate acts of negligence — Inevitable accident — Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54.

The steamship S. having negligently starboarded across the bows of the steamship A. continued under her starboard helm, and collided with the D., and by her starboarding caused the A. to collide with the M. The S. limited her liability in respect of the damage caused by her improper navigation on the occasion of the collision between her and the D., and sought to make the owners of the A. claim against the fund in the limitation action on the ground that both collisions were caused by the same improper act of navigation, viz., the starboarding.

Held, that the S. had time and opportunity to correct the starboarding before striking the D., and that the damage to the D. happened on a distinct occasion from the damage to the A. by collision with the M., and therefore the S. was separately liable to the A. over and above the fund paid into court in the limitation action.

Inevitable accident is that which cannot be prevented by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill: Lord Esher, M.R., dubitante.

THIS was a collision action instituted by the owners of the steamship Albano against the steamship Schwan.

On the 8th Feb. 1891 at about 9 p.m. while the Schwan, a screw steamship of 1011 tons register, was in the Lower Hope Reach proceeding up the river Thames, she overtook and passed the steamship Albano on her starboard side. The weather at this time was dark but fine, the wind light from the east, and the tide nearly half flood of the force of two to three knots. In these circumstances the Schwan when about three ship's lengths ahead was seen by those on the Albano to be coming off to port under a hard-a-starboard helm across the bows of the Albano. The helm of the Albano was at once hard-a-ported and her engines reversed, the effect of which manœuvres was to bring her dangerously close to the steamship Obedient, which was at anchor on her starboard bow. Her helm was thereupon put hard-a-starboard, but she was carried by the tide across the bows of the steamship Meggie which was at anchor, thereby causing damage to herself and the Meggie.

The Schwan was in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law, and he had ordered her helm to be starboarded as above described to avoid the steamship Obedient, after which the look-out reported the anchor light of the steamship Delambre ahead and distant 250 yards, but although according to the evidence of the Schwan her engines were at once reversed and her helm hard-a-starboarded she with her stem struck the port side of the Delambre and caused her to sink.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Schwan having been found to blame in an action instituted against her by the Delambre on the ground of bad look-out limited her liability. By the terms of the decree in the limitation action it was decreed that "in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things caused by reason of the improper navigation of the Schwan on the occasion of the collision between that vessel and the steamship Delambre the owners of the Schwan are answerable in damages to an amount not exceeding 9855*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*, such sum being at the rate of 8*l.* for each ton of registered tonnage of the said steamship."

The owners of the Meggie meanwhile had sued the owners of the Albano to recover the damages caused by the collision, but their action was dismissed on the ground that the collision was not caused by the negligence of those in charge of the Albano but by the bad navigation of the Schwan which caused the Albano to collide with the Meggie.

The owners of the Albano then sued the Schwan to recover the damage caused to the Albano by her collision with the Meggie.

The defendants by their defence alleged that such collision was caused by the negligent navigation of the Albano, and in paragraph 2 alleged as follows:

Alternatively the defendants say that if the said collision with the Meggie was attributable to the action of the Schwan in the statement of claim mentioned, and was so caused as to entitle the plaintiffs to recover the damages occasioned thereby in an action against the Schwan the said collision and damages were caused by the improper navigation of the Schwan on an occasion on which there was also a collision between the Schwan and the steamship Delambre, and by the same improper navigation as occasioned such last mentioned collision, and that by a judgment of this court in an action 1891, N. No. 517, fo. 157, brought by the defendants against the owners of the steamship Delambre and others the liability of the defendants was limited to 8*l.* per ton of the gross tonnage of the Schwan amounting to the sum of 9855*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.* in respect of the damage to ships, goods, &c., caused by the improper navigation of the Schwan on the said occasion, and in accordance with such judgment the defendants have paid into court in the said action the said sum of 9855*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.* with interest, and have inserted advertisements intimating to all persons having claims to come in and enter their claims on or before the 13th Aug., on pain of being excluded from sharing in the said amount, and that of the premises the plaintiffs had due notice before the commencement of this action, and the defendants say that by reason of the premises the plaintiffs are barred from claiming or recovering in this action, and the plaintiffs' claim is against the said sum of 9855*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.* in the said action 1891 N. No. 517, fo. 157, and the defendants are not further liable.

The plaintiffs by their reply having joined issue alleged as follows:

As to paragraph 2 of the defence the plaintiffs join issue and say that the damage sued for in this action was occasioned by the improper and negligent navigation of the Schwan by the defendants or their servants on a distinct occasion from that in respect of which her owners have limited their liability in the action 1891 N. No. 517, fo. 157, referred to in the said paragraph.

Nov. 12, 1891.—The question of law raised in the said 2nd paragraph now came on for decision.

Sir Charles Hall, Q.C. and Raikes for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Phillimore, and J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, contrâ.

The case of The Creadon (54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 880; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 585) was cited.

Sir Charles Butt.—The only question I have to determine to-day is that raised in par. 2 of the defence. For that purpose I take it as a fact that the collision between the Albano and the Meggie was attributable to the negligence of the Schwan, and was so caused as to entitle the plaintiffs to recover the damage occasioned thereby in an action against the Schwan. That I take as admitted for the purpose of to day. The question is whether the collision and damages in question were caused by the improper navigation of the Schwan on an occasion upon which there was also a collision between the Schwan and the steamship Delambre, and by the same improper navigation as occasioned such last-mentioned collision. If I find that it was, then I should hold that the Albano can recover no more in this action against the Schwan than her pro ratâ proportion of the statutory value of the Schwan which has either been paid into court or secured. I think the question may be stated thus: If the collision between the Schwan and the Delambre was the necessary consequence of the mistake of the Schwan, and the wrongful act of the Schwan in starboarding as she did for the Obedient, then the defendants are entitled to judgment upon this part of the defence; but if it were not the necessary consequence, then I think the result would be otherwise. In other words, if, after she had made a mistake, which for this purpose she admits having made, there was time and opportunity to correct the mistake, and by the use of ordinary care and skill to avoid any evil consequence that would otherwise have arisen from this mistake, and the Schwan did not employ those means, then she cannot say that she has established her plea. Now, there was certainly not less than 300 yards of water between the Obedient, which she almost touched, and the Delambre. I have consulted the Elder Brethren, and they advise me in the first place that it was wholly unnecessary and improper to continue hard-a-starboarding right out into the river after the Schwan had cleared the Obedient, and that the correction of that by a tolerably prompt porting would have prevented any accident with the Delambre. They also advise me that if the pilot had been aware of the position of the Delambre some appreciable time before he was made aware of it, and before the light of the Delambre was brought right ahead of him there would have been no difficulty in avoiding a collision with the Delambre, That is upon the general aspect of the case, but, if you take the pilot's story which is the evidence upon which the defendants most rely, the matter stands thus: His ship has payed off under a starboard helm, till he has brought her to head somewhere towards the south shore, but only three points from the straight course up, and in that position the Delambre, is two to three ship's lengths off, and right ahead. The Elder Brethren advise me that in that position there could have been no difficulty whatever in avoiding the Delambre. Therefore, upon my view of the case, my decision under advice is that the collision with the Delambre was by no means the consequence of the wrong navigation of the Schwan in the action she took to avoid collision with the Obedient. That is putting the case higher than I need, because upon this issue the onus of proof is on the defendants, and if they fail to prove that it was the same act of improper navigation, or, in other words, the same occasion, then they fail. Upon all grounds, therefore, I am of opinion that this plea fails, and that it is not open to the defendants to limit the owners of the Albano, if they succeed in establishing nelgigence in the way described, to receiving a portion instead of the whole of their damages. Upon this part of the defence there must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

It was arranged between the owners of the Albano and of the Schwan respectively, that the question whether the collision between the Albano and the Maggie was due to the negligence of the Albano or of the Schwan should be determined according to the decision of the Court of Appeal in the action between the Meggie and the Albano.

On the 8th March 1892 this appeal came on, but was dismissed.

The judgments were as follows:—

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case a steamship under way ran into a vessel at anchor. The question is whether in the circumstances she is liable. It seems to me that the rule of law with regard to such a collision has been laid down in the Admiralty Court, in the Privy Council, and in this court especially, in the most distinct terms. I am of opinion that what has been laid down in this court is the law which must govern this court, or if that law differs—although I do not think it does—from the law laid down in the Admiralty Court, or in the Privy Council, the Privy Council has no power to overrule this court. In the case of The Anot Lyle (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 576; 11 P. Div. 114; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 50) the definitions of inevitable accident, which were thought to have been somewhat loosely expressed in the Admiralty Court, were discussed. It was a judgment given by Lord Herschell, in the presence of myself and Fry, L.J., who agreed, therefore, with the definition of the law as laid down by Lord Herschell. He said: "Under these circumstances the burden is on the defendants to discharge themselves from the liability which arises from the fact that the Anot Lyle came into collision with and damaged a ship at anchor. The cause of the collision in such a case may be an inevitable accident not arising from negligent navigation; but unless the defendants can prove this the law is clear, and they are liable for the damage caused by their ship." All I can say is that in a very long experience in the Admiralty Court, and dealing since that time with Admiralty judgments, there has always been a marked distinction between the phrase "inevitable accident" and the phrase "mere negligence," and that "inevitable accident" is a far larger term, and meant to be a much larger term, than a case of mere negligence. In the case of The Indus (56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 376; 12 P. Div. 46; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 105) where this matter was considered, the law is stated thus: "It is the duty of a vessel in motion to keep clear of one at anchor if the latter can be seen, and if she does not keep clear she must show good cause for not doing so. In what way, then, could the defendants justify themselves? They could say that everything was done which could be done by careful seamen, but that some overwhelming storm occurred which prevented the ship from being navigated as she ought to have been. They could say that an entirely unforeseen accident which could not have been prevented by proper management occurred to the machinery with the same result. There are yet other things which may be classed under the head of law known as inevitable accident, which is a well-known expression, and, though it may not be philosophically correct, answers its purpose; but the defendants must clearly prove the occurrence of such an inevitable accident." Now, these words were deliberately used with reference to what is taken to be a well-known phrase, "inevitable accident," and which is a head of law well known and distinguished from the case of mere negligence. The ship in motion does not justify herself by merely saying, "I was not guilty of a want of ordinary care and skill." She must show that it was an inevitable accident. That is the law laid down by the court, and it only leaves open this—what is the proper definition of inevitable accident? To my mind these cases show clearly what is the proper definition of inevitable accident as distinguished from mere negligence, from mere want of reasonable care and skill. If that be so, and if the facts which have been found by the learned judge here were to be adopted by us, I should say that the defendants had failed to make out what they are bound to make out to escape liability, because the learned judge in his judgment says that "there was no negligence in his not having observed particularly these vessels at anchor before because they were not in his way; and although as is said porting and hard-a-porting and continuing under a port helm would probably have avoided a collision, and it was probably an error in judgment not so to have proceeded, yet it was a manœuvre on the spur of the moment, done under the man's best judgment formed on the spur of the moment, which is entirely excusable and cannot be held to be negligence." If that was all that the facts showed I should say that the defendants were wrong and that it was not enough for them to show that they were not guilty of a want of reasonable care and skill. That would not show that there was not something better which could have been done and which if it had been done could have avoided the collision. They would have fallen short therefore of showing that it was an inevitable accident.

The collision in this case took place under peculiar circumstances, and the question whether proper manœuvres were employed and whether any manœuvres could have avoided this collision is a question of nautical skill. It is said that the master of the Albano was guilty of negligence in the ordinary sense, i.e., a want of ordinary care and skill, and that he ought to have seen the lights of the Obedient and Meggie. I do not understand that the President found that he did not see them, but he said he did not observe them. There was no occasion for him to have observed them in the sense that he should fix his mind on where they were. They were not in his way and he did not observe them. Therefore there was no negligence in his not observing them. This is a case which requires nautical assistance, which we have. The assessors in the Admiralty Court unfortunately did not agree. The gentlemen who assist us, however, do agree, and in answer to our question say: "We are of opinion that the Albano was proceeding on a proper course and at a proper distance from the Schwan which had passed her, and was two or three lengths ahead when she suddenly starboarded." We therefore have their nautical opinion that the Albano was not too close, that she was proceeding up with care and was at least three lengths from the Schwan when the Schwan starboarded Our assessors go on to say, "That the Albano was unable to distinguish the lights of the Obedient and the Meggie owing to the Schwan intercepting her clear view ahead; that the Albano performed a right manœuvre in stopping, going astern, and putting her helm hard-a-port by which the Albano just cleared the stern of the Schwan; that it was at this time she first saw the lights of the Obedient and the Meggie"—and here comes the important matter—"that there was no room, owing to the three-knot tide setting her up the river to pass ahead of the Obedient and to go under her stern and between her and the Meggie." From that I understand that if she had kept on with her hard-a-port helm she would have gone into the Obedient either way. She could go neither ahead nor astern. What is the consequence of that? The assessors say, "that her then putting her helm hard a starboard was the best thing she could have done," i.e., to avoid going into the Obedient. They continue: "Unfortunately, however, this did not prevent her coming into collision with the Meggie." Why, because she put her helm hard a starboard, which was the best thing she could do. It follows from this that the tide took her, though she did the best thing she could, and drove her down on to the Meggie. If that be so, it satisfies my view of inevitable accident, because something happened over which she had no control and the effect of which could not be avoided by the greatest care and skill. In these circumstances I think she did satisfy the requirement of showing that this accident was caused, so far as she was concerned, by inevitable accident. Therefore, though not for the same reasons, I think the decision is right and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Fry, L.J.—Like the Master of the Rolls, I think we are bound to take the law which governs this case from the cases of The Anot Lyle (ubi sup.) and The Indus (ubi sup.). With regard to the Anot Lyle, I should desire to point out that the judgment given by Lord Herschell, then Lord Chancellor, and concurred in by the Master of the Rolls and myself, states the matter in this way: "The cause of the collision in such a case may be an inevitable accident not arising from negligent navigation; but unless the defendants can prove this the law is clear and they are liable for the damage caused by their ship." Applying that to the facts of this case it means this, that when one ship is at anchor, and another ship in motion collides with her, the ship in motion is primâ facie liable, and can only escape from that liability by showing inevitable accident. Then it is to be observed that the Lord Chancellor, speaking of inevitable accident, connects it with the notion of negligence to this extent that he finds it "not arising from negligent navigation." What is inevitable accident is a point evidently left open by that judgment, and which in that case it was not necessary to decide. In the case of The Indus (ubi sup.), in the same manner it appears to me that the court did not attempt any definition of what was inevitable accident. The Master of the Rolls, in the course of his judgment in that case, illustrated what would be inevitable accident, and he seems to me not to have separated the question entirely from that of care because he refers to unforeseen accident being that which could not have been prevented by proper management. He does not say by any management, but uses the words "proper management." Although neither of these judgments contains a definition of inevitable accident, they nevertheless seem to contain indications that, in determining what is inevitable accident considerations of care, negligence and want of care enter in. Now, turning to the earlier cases on inevitable accident, I first consider the case of The Marpesia (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; L. Rep. 4 S. C. 212; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261) in the Privy Council. Their Lordships there said that "They take the law as they find it laid down by Dr. Lushington in two cases. In the case of The Bolina (3 Notes of Cases) Dr. Lushington says, "With regard to inevitable accident the onus lies on those who bring a complaint against a vessel, and who seek to be indemnified. On them is the onus of proving that the blame does attach upon the vessel proceeded against; the onus of proving inevitable accident does not necessarily attach to that vessel; it is only necessary when you show a primâ facie case of negligence and want of due seamanship." Again, in the case of The Virgil (2 Wm. Rob. 201), the same learned judge gives this definition of inevitable accident: "In my apprehension an inevitable accident in point of law is this, viz., that which the party charged with the offence could not possibly prevent by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill. If a vessel charged with having occasioned a collision should be sailing at the rate of eight or nine knots an hour when she ought to have proceeded only at the speed of three or four, it will be no valid excuse for the master to aver that he could not prevent the accident at the moment it occurred; if he could have used measures of precaution that would have rendered the accident less probable," Here we have to satisfy ourselves that something was done or omitted to be done which a person exercising ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill in the circumstances either would not have done or would not have left undone, as the case may be." Now, I find no intention on the part of the court either in the case of The Anot Lyle (ubi sup.) or The Indus (ubi sup.) to overrule or depart from that earlier definition of inevitable accident, and I cannot help thinking that the Master of the Rolls in the definition which he has given has introduced a somewhat new rule which, as far as I can find, is not sanctioned by any of the earlier authorities, and for myself I prefer adhering to the definition of inevitable accident given by Dr. Lushington in the cases referred to and adopted by the Privy Council in the case of The Marpesia (ubi sup.). Before leaving this question I wish to observe that it appears to me that inevitable accident, as applied to two vessels both in motion, and to one vessel in motion and one at rest differs in this respect, that it is obvious that the facility with which a stationary body may be avoided is very much greater than the facility with which a moving body may be avoided, especially when the law of that motion is more or less unknown; and therefore, though I think that the principle of law applicable to the two cases is the same I think the different circumstances make an important difference in the application of the common principle to the two different cases. Now, applying the rule to the facts of this case, I will say at once that if the matter had been left to my judgment I should have thought it was possible for a vessel to make her way up the Thames with ordinary diligence and proper seamanship without coming into collision with another vessel; but the Master of the Rolls has already read the advice which we have received from our assessors. It is impossible for me not to accept that advice; and upon that it appears to me not to be established that the Albano acted with any want of ordinary care or skill, or that she acted in any way other than the best. If she acted in the best manner in which she could act, it follows that, whichever definition of inevitable accident we adopt, inevitable accident has happened in this case, and the appeal fails.

Lopes, L.J.—I have nothing to add except to shortly state my view of inevitable accident. I think the proper one, and the one I wish to adopt, is that given in The Marpesia (ubi sup.), viz., "Inevitable accident is that which the party charged with the damage could not possibly prevent by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill." I think that is a definition which, according to my view, is consonant with all the authorities. I know no distinction as regards inevitable accident between cases occurring on sea and on land. If this accident had occurred on land I think the definition I have quoted from The Marpesia (ubi sup.) would have been equally applicable. I think this appeal must be dismissed.

Subsequently to this decision judgment was entered by Sir F. Jeune against the owners of the Schwan, holding that the collision between the Albano and the Meggie was due to the negligent navigation of the Schwan, and also in accordance with the decision of Sir Charles Butt pronouncing that the said collision, and the said damage occasioned thereby, arose from the fault or default of the owners, master, and crew, of the said steam vessel Schwan or some or one of them on a distinct occasion from the damage occasioned by a collision between the said steam vessel Schwan and the steam vessel Delambre, and that the defendants are not entitled in respect of the damages recoverable in this action to the benefit of the decree of limitation of liability in action 1891, Fo. 157.

The owners of the Schwan assented to so much of the judgment being entered against them as held the cause of the collision between the Meggie and Albano to be the negligent navigation of the Schwan, but now appealed from the latter part depriving them of availing themselves of the decree in their limitation of liability action.

July 26.—Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall, for the Schwan, in support of the appeal.—It was one act of negligence which led to the collision between the Schwan and Delambre, and the collision between the Meggie and Albano. There were no separate acts of negligence:

The Creadon, 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 880; 5 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 585;
The Rajah, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 102; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 539.

The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 54, speaks of "damage to ships" in the plural, showing that the Legislature contemplated limiting a shipowner's liability in some cases to damage done to more than one ship.

Kennedy, Q.C. and F. W. Raikes, for the respondents, were not called on.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The Schwan, while navigating up the river Thames, had to act for the steamship Obedient, which was at anchor. If the Obedient had been there alone the Schwan would have had her choice of avoiding her in any way she liked; but she had not a free choice, because the vessels Meggie and Delambre were both to the south of the Obedient. There was a space between these two vessels. In these circumstances the proper manœuvre for the Schwan was to have gone to the north of the Obedient, but she chose to starboard her helm and go close across the bows of the Obedient. That put her in a dangerous position with regard to the other ships. Unless she ported very hard indeed she would not go into the Meggie, but unless she ported at once she would probably strike—as she eventually did—the Delambre which was to the south of the Meggie. What was her duty? She was bound to port her helm and go between the Meggie and the Delambre. We are advised that the moment she was clear of the Obedient she ought to have ported her helm so as to go clear of the Delambre. Her first mistake was in starboarding and going to the southward of the Obedient, and her second mistake was after starboarding not using ordinary care and skill to avoid the consequences of that first mistake. Hence it is not the first mistake which was the cause of the accident to the Delambre, but the second. The first mistake was the cause of the accident to the Albano, because by starboarding she prevented the Albano keeping her course and going up between the Meggie and the Delambre. She put the Albano in such a position with the Meggie and Delambre as to cause a collision between the Meggie and Albano, as has already been determined.

There were therefore two mistakes causing accidents to two ships. That makes the Schwan liable to two ships in respect of two different acts of negligence, and hence she is liable to each of them to the extent of her statutory liability. She cannot make them prove against the one fund under the same limitation decree. Then the appellants say that they are not liable to the Delambre, because such collision was solely the fault of their compulsory pilot in not porting his helm after clearing the Obedient. Now the onus of establishing this plea is on the Schwan. She must prove not only that there was fault on the part of her pilot, but that the collision was solely caused by his fault. On reading the evidence I think it proves the contrary, and that the fault was the joint fault of the pilot and the crew, who did not give him due notice of the position of the Delambre. Therefore I think the learned judge was right. I agree with the law as laid down in The Creadon (ubi sup.). I do not think anything turns upon the language of the Acts of 1854 and 1862. If a ship runs into one ship on Monday and another on Tuesday, Sir Walter Phillimore admits that the wrongdoer must be liable to each of these two. So if you run into a ship in the morning and another in the afternoon, what does it signify, or half an hour elapses between the two collisions, what difference does it make? It is not the time which is the substantial thing. The question is, are both the result of the same negligent act of seamanship? If they are not, the Act of Parliament does not apply each as to each of them separately. That I gather to be the decision, and the right decision, in The Creadon (ubi sup.). I am of opinion therefore that this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The question arises in rather a singular manner. The act of starboarding by the Schwan, a negligent act, was a beginning which led to two separate accidents. The Schwan having starboarded, continued doing so, and struck and sank the Delambre. For that she was responsible. But in addition to sinking the Delambre, another result of her starboarding was that she went across the bows of the s.s. Albano which was following her, and caused her to come into collision with the Meggie. The Albano was damaged by that collision, and sues the Schwan, whose owners do not deny that they are answerable to the Albano for the accident. They admit that starboarding was a wrong manœuvre, for the consequences of which they are responsible; but they say that under sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, they are also at the same time liable to the Delambre, because the same act, the crossing of the bows of the Albano, led to the sinking of the Delambre. They say that under that section passed for the protection of shipowners against the negligence of their captains, and limiting their liability in cases of negligence, they are only liable for a proportion of the amount to the Albano, and that they have to reckon with the Delambre as well. The answer which the owners of the Albano make, raises the point under consideration. The Albano says it was not the same act of improper navigation which drove her into the Meggie that caused the collision between the Schwan and the Delambre. They say it was the starboarding of the Schwan across the Albano's bows that drove her into the Meggie, and they say she might still have avoided the Meggie if she had navigated properly, for she might have ported and gone safely up the river. We have therefore to determine whether it was the original act of improper navigation that caused both collisions, or whether, assuming the original starboarding to be negligence, there was not time and opportunity to correct the mistake, and whether by the use of ordinary care and skill, the Schwan might not still have corrected it, and avoided the Delambre. It seems to me that the Albano has a right to say that the Schwan might have corrected the mistake, even if she had crossed the bows of the Albano, which is a view supported by the evidence, and by the advice given us by our assessors. They entertain no doubt that there was time for the Schwan to have ported her helm and gone safely up the river without any danger to the Delambre whatever. But that does not determine the point, because the appellants rely on compulsory pilotage. Supposing we should find that the continuation of the mistake in seamanship was solely the fault of the pilot, then the Schwan would be entitled to say that, though it was the second act of negligence that caused her to strike the Delambre, that second act of negligence was the fault of the pilot, and no one else. But the pilot says that, if the look-out had reported the Delambre earlier he might have avoided her. On whom is the burthen of proof? As the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, it is on the Schwan. They, to succeed, must show that the second collision was due to an act other than the starboarding, and which was wholly due to the pilot, and not to their master or crew. It will not do to merely show that the pilot was in fault. They must show that he only—apart from the master and crew—was in fault. The real point is, if the pilot had been warned earlier, could he have avoided the second collision? If he could, it is impossible to say that the neglect of the look-out to warn him may not have contributed to the collision, and as the onus of proof is on the Schwan, they have failed to discharge it. With regard to the construction of the statute, I have nothing to add to what has been said by the Master of the Rolls. It is clear that you must consider in each case what damage is caused by the one act of improper seamanship; if you find two acts which are distinguished from one another, both leading to damage, then the double damage is not due to the same act of negligence. It is due to two acts, and not to one. The question is, What unseamanlike act of those in charge of a ship has caused a particular accident. The law as laid down in the case of The Creadon (ubi sup.) and as enunciated by the Master of the Rolls is clear upon the question.

Kay, L.J.—This is not a question of law, but of fact, and is put very neatly in the judgment of the court below. The question is, Was it a necessary consequence of the Schwan starboarding to clear the Obedient that she should run into the Delambre. It appears to me clear, and in this the assessors agree, that it was not the necessary consequence, that there was ample time to have seen the Delambre, and to have manœuvred so as to have cleared her. That the Schwan is liable to the Albano no one denies; but it was the failure to alter her course after starboarding, which was the proximate cause of the collision with the Delambre. Then arises the question whether she is excused by compulsory pilotage. But it is not proved that the fault was that of the pilot alone, but also partly the fault of the look-out. If the pilot had known earlier of the presence of the Delambre, he would have ported and cleared her. It is therefore not established that the fault was that of the pilot alone. This appeal must be dismissed.

Solicitors for the owners of the Schwan, Clarkson, Greenwells, and Co.

Solicitors for the owners of the Albano, Pritchard and Sons.

Friday, Dec. 9, 1892.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.JJ., and Assessors.)

The Lancashire. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Fog—Stop and reverse—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18.

Where two steamships are approaching one another in a fog they must stop and reverse, unless the indications are distinct and unequivocal that if both vessels continue to do what they appear to be doing they will pass clear without risk of collision.

Where a steamer going dead slow in a fog heard the whistle of an approaching steamship broadening on her bow, and kept on, but on hearing a whistle at the same bearing as the one before it stopped her engines, and on hearing the next whistle narrower on the bow, reversed them, she was held to blame for breach of article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, for not having reversed her engines when the whistle ceased to broaden.

This was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action from a decision of Barnes, J., finding both ships to blame.

The collision occurred in the English Channel, near the Owers Light, about 8 p.m. on the 10th June 1892, between the plaintiffs' steamship the Ariel, and the defendants' steamship the Lancashire.

At the time in question the Lancashire, a steamer of 4193 tons gross, laden with general cargo, was proceeding down Channel on a voyage from London to Liverpool. There was a fog, and the Lancashire was going dead slow, making three and a half knots. In these circumstances the whistle of a steamer, which proved to be the Ariel, bound from Varna to Hamburg, was heard about one and a half points on the starboard bow. The whistle which continued to be heard gradually broadened on the bow, until it got to about two and a half to three points on the bow, when the next whistle instead of broadening was heard at the same bearing. The master of the Lancashire thereupon stopped his engines. The next whistle was narrower, and showed that the Ariel was closing rapidly. The master of the Lancashire then reversed his engines, but the Ariel immediately after came in sight about 150 yards off, and bearing two and a half to three points on the starboard bow, and with her port side struck the stem of the Lancashire.

At the trial before Barnes, J., he held that the primary cause of the collision was the wrongful porting of the Ariel. As to the Lancashire he asked his assessors the following question: "Were the indications by the whistle from the Ariel under the circumstances which I have stated such as to convey distinctly to an officer of reasonable skill in the locality in which the vessels were, that the two vessels were so approaching that they would pass well clear of each other without risk of collision until the Ariel ported?" The Trinity Masters having answered this question in the negative the learned judge continued: "It follows from that, and in this the Trinity Masters agree with me, that the Lancashire, having regard to the answer which is given to that question based upon the original fine position in which the Ariel was heard ahead on the starboard bow, should have stopped her engines and possibly gone on at a reduced speed again, but have slackened her speed certainly at a time before she did; and on the grounds which I have stated, because there is no doubt that she kept on at a speed of somewhere about three and a half knots up to the time when the vessels were very close to each other, I think that the Lancashire must be found to blame."

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C. and Bucknill, Q.C. (with them Arthur Russell) for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The Lancashire did not break art. 18 of the regulations. The test is whether the vessels were so approaching as "to involve risk of collision." The moment the suspicions of the master of the Lancashire were aroused he stopped. As soon as his suspicions were confirmed he reversed. The decision in The Ceto (62 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1; 14 App. Cas. 670; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 479) must be confined to the circumstances of that case. [KAY, L.J.—I think not. The language there used seems to lay down a general rule.] In that case the courses were crossing.

(a) Reported by Butler Aspinall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Pyke, Q.C. and Miller (with them Sir Walter Phillimore), for the respondent, were not called on.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think that we are bound by the decision of the House of Lords in The Ceto (ubi sup.). It is clear that the second whistle heard on the same bearing as the one before showed, considering the way in which the vessels were approaching, that the Ariel had ported. We have asked our assessors this question, "When the Lancashire stopped were the indications such as to show to the captain of the Lancashire distinctly and unequivocally that if both vessels continued to do what it appeared that they were doing, i.e., the one proceeding slowly on, and the other porting towards the first, they would pass clear without risk of collision?" The answer is of course "No." We must, therefore, in obedience to the decision of the House of Lords, hold that the learned judge was right in finding the Lancashire to blame. I must say, I think that the rule in The Ceto (ubi sup.), so far as it relates to steamers approaching one another in a fog, is one which had never been enunciated before. We are, however, bound by it.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree that we are bound by The Ceto (ubi sup.).

KAY, L.J.—Article 18 prescribes two alternatives, and under the circumstances, according to the rule laid down in The Ceto (ubi sup.), the Lancashire ought to have reversed. She only stopped. She is therefore to blame for a breach of the article.

Solicitors for appellants, Pritchard and Sons, for Bateson, Warr, and Bateson, Liverpool.

Solicitors for respondent, W. A. Crump and Son.

Monday, Dec. 12, 1892.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LOPES and KAY, L.JJ.)

THE DART. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Practice — Collision — County Court — Appeal — Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 45—County Courts Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 50), s. 10—County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s 188, sub-sect. 5.

Where a judgment of the County Court in Admiralty has been altered by the Admiralty Division, an appeal lies without leave to the Court of Appeal.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action from a decision of the Divisional Court of the Admiralty Division, reversing the judgment of the County Court.

The collision occurred on the 27th March 1891, in the Medway, between the plaintiffs' barge Isabella Little and the defendants' barge Dart.

The action was instituted on the Admiralty side of the Rochester County Court. The County Court judge gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Divisional Court of the Admiralty Division, which reversed the judgment of the court below, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs with costs, and refused to give the defendants leave to appeal.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

The following Acts of Parliament were referred to in argument: —

Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66):

Sect. 45. All appeals from petty or quarter sessions from a County Court or from any other inferior court, which might before the passing of this Act have been brought to any court or judge whose jurisdiction is by this Act transferred to the High Court of Justice, may be heard and determined by divisional courts of the said High Court of Justice, consisting respectively of such of the judges thereof as may from time to time be assigned for that purpose pursuant to the rules of court, or (subject to rules of court) as may be so assigned according to arrangements made for the purpose by the judges of the said High Court. The determination of such appeals respectively by such divisional courts shall be final, unless special leave to appeal from the same to the Court of Appeal shall be given by the Divisional Court by which any such appeal from an inferior court shall have been heard.

County Courts Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 50):

Sect. 10. There shall be no appeal from a decree or order of the High Court of Admiralty of England, made on appeal from the County Court when such decree or order affirms the judgment of the County Court, except by express permission of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty. When upon an appeal the High Court of Admiralty alters the judgment of the County Court, no leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council shall be necessary.

Sect. 14. This Act shall come into operation on the 2nd day of November next after the passing hereof.

County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43):

Sect. 188. The Acts specified in the schedule to this Act are hereby repealed from and after the commencement of this Act. Provided that (5) this repeal shall not revive any enactment, right, office, privilege, matter, or thing, not in force or existing at the commencement of this Act.

The County Courts Act 1875 is one of the Acts specified in the schedule to the County Courts Act 1888.

Pyke, Q.C. (with him Baden-Powell), for the respondents, took the preliminary objection that there was no right of appeal.—The right to appeal from the Admiralty Divisional Court is governed by sect. 45 of the Judicature Act of 1873, which does not allow an appeal to this court without leave. It is true that by sect. 10 of the County Courts Act 1875 no leave was necessary where the Admiralty Court altered the decision of the County Court; but the Act of 1875 has been repealed by the County Courts Act 1888.

Bucknill, Q.C. (with him A. E. Nelson), for the appellants, contrà.—Sect. 10 of the County Courts Act 1875 repeals sect. 45 of the Judicature Act 1873, so far as it affects County Court Admiralty appeals. And although the County Courts Act 1888 repeals the County Courts Act 1875, it provides that by so doing it does not revive any enactment not in force at the commencement of the Act. Hence sect. 45 does not apply, and there is an appeal.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Pyke, Q.C. in reply.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think we must overrule this objection, and hear the appeal.

LOPES, L.J.—Sect. 10 of the County Courts Act 1875 is different in terms from sect. 45 of the Judicature Act 1873. They cannot be read together, and consequently sect. 45 of the Judicature Act is repealed to this extent, that in Admiralty actions where a divisional court has altered the judgment of the County Court, leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal is not necessary. And although the last County Court Act repeals the Act of 1875, it does so subject to this, that by sect. 188 it is provided that the repeal "shall not revive any enactment not in force at the commencement of this Act." Therefore sect. 45 of the Judicature Act remains repealed to the extent I have mentioned, and hence there is an appeal where the Divisional Court has altered the judgment of the inferior court.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question, although at first sight very complicated, admits of a clear answer. The Judicature Act of 1873, which came into operation on the 1st Nov. 1875, provided by sect. 45, that from the decision of the Divisional Court upon an appeal from a County Court, there should be no further appeal without leave. The County Courts Act of 1875, which came into operation on the 2nd Nov., enacted that in Admiralty appeals from a County Court, no leave should be necessary to appeal to this court when the Divisional Court altered the judgment of the County Court. These two sections are absolutely inconsistent, and therefore the earlier provision in the Judicature Act was repealed by the later enactment of 1875. Then we have the County Courts Act of 1888, which in its turn repeals the Act of 1875, but provides that the repeal shall not revive any enactment not in force at its commencement. That part of sect. 45 of the Judicature Act 1873 preventing an appeal from the decision of the Admiralty Divisional Court without leave, was not in force at the commencement of the Act of 1888, and therefore by the very words of the Act of 1888 sect. 45 in its application to Admiralty cases is not revived. Hence, in my opinion, there is an appeal without leave from an order of the Divisional Court altering a judgment of the County Court in an Admiralty action.

Objection to jurisdiction overruled.

Solicitors for the appellants, Lowless and Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Ingledew, Ince, and Colt.

Wednesday, March 1, 1893.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.)

THE EIDER. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Practice—Salvage contract—Foreign ship—Lien—Service out of the jurisdiction—Order XI., r. 1 (e).

A German ship belonging to a German company carrying on business in Germany, having stranded on the English coast, her master entered into a written contract with a German and Swedish salvage company, by which they undertook to get the ship off and to convey her to Southampton against "a salvage reward or compensation" of 50 per cent. of the value of the salved property, the value in case of difference to be settled by arbitration, the money to be paid to the German salvage company, who were to have a lien upon the ship and cargo. No place of payment was named in the contract. The ship was got off, and delivered to her owners in Southampton. The value was ascertained by arbitration held in Germany. In these circumstances the Swedish company commenced an action in personam in the Admiralty Division against the German shipowners to recover their proportion of the salvage money due under the contract, and now sought to obtain leave under Order XI., r. 1 (e) to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction.

Held (affirming Sir Francis Jeune), that there was no breach of contract which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, and hence the plaintiffs were not entitled to serve notice of the writ upon the defendants out of the jurisdiction.

THIS was an appeal from the refusal of the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division to allow service out of the jurisdiction of notice of a writ of summons.

The plaintiffs, who were the Neptune Salvage Company—a Swedish company carrying on business at Stockholm—sued the Norddeutscher Lloyd in personam—a German company—to recover money due under a contract for salvage services to the defendants' ship, the steamship Eider.

The Eider having stranded on Atherfield Ledge, off the Isle of Wight, her master accepted the services of the plaintiffs and a German salvage company called the Nordischer Bergungs-Verein, to get her off, and for this purpose entered into a written German contract with the respective agents of the two foreign companies.

By the terms of the said contract, which was on one of the usual printed salvage contract forms of the Nordischer Bergungs-Verein, the two salvage companies agreed to attempt to salve the Eider and convey her to Southampton, against a salvage reward or compensation of 50 per cent. of the value of the salved property, the value of the property in the event of disagreement to be determined by arbitration. It was further agreed (inter alia) that the salvage was to be paid to the Nordischer Bergungs-Verein within ten days of the completion of the salvage services, and that if not so paid the Nordischer Bergungs-Verein were to have a lien upon ship and cargo.

The salvage services proved successful, and on the 30th March 1892 the Eider was safely docked at Southampton, and handed over to her owners' representative in this country.

The salvage on the cargo was paid, some of it being paid by the express authority of the Nordischer Bergungs-Verein, in this country, to the representatives or agents of the two salvage companies.

As the parties could not agree on the value of the Eider, the amount was determined by arbitration in Germany as being 50,000*l*., and the award of the arbitrators was deposited in the German court at Bremen.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Eider was subsequently arrested in a suit in rem for necessaries instituted in this country, and sold by the marshal, realising 6000*l*. Subsequently to the Eider being sold, the two salvage companies commenced an action in rem in this country against the Eider for salvage, but did not proceed with such action.

The Nordischer Bergungs-Verein also instituted proceedings in personam, in Bremen, against the Norddeutscher Lloyd, to recover their share of salvage money due under the agreement, but the German court decided that the defendants were only liable to the amount of the value of the salved res.

In these circumstances the plaintiffs in the present proceedings, the Neptune Salvage Company, applied ex parte to the president in chambers for leave to serve the Norddeutscher Lloyd out of the jurisdiction with notice of a writ of summons, seeking to recover their share of the value of the Eider as determined by the German arbitration.

The application was granted, whereupon the defendants having entered an appearance under protest, moved to discharge the order giving leave for service out of the jurisdiction.

It was alleged (inter alia) in one of the plaintiffs' affidavits that the stipulation in the salvage contract that the money was to be paid to the Nordischer Bergungs-Verein alone was a mistake, and that the name of the plaintiff company, the Neptune Salvage Company, had been omitted by mistake.

The application for service of the writ was made under Order XI., r. 1 (e), which provides as follows:

> Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons, or notice of a writ of summons, may be allowed by the court or a judge whenever: (e) the action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction of any contract wherever made which according to the terms thereof ought to be performed within the jurisdiction.

Jan. 24.—The defendants having entered a conditional appearance, now moved to discharge the order allowing notice of the writ to be served outside the jurisdiction.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C. and English Harrison (with them Butler Aspinall), for the defendants, in support of the motion.—To justify service of this writ out of the jurisdiction, the plaintiffs must establish that the payment of money due under the contract is to take place in this country:

> Bell and Co. v. Antwerp, London, and Brazil Line, 64 L. T. Rep. N. S 276; (1891) 1 Q. B. 103; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 154.

The contract is silent as to the place of payment. The inference however is, that it is to be paid in Germany, where the German salvage company, who are not plaintiffs, carry on business. The contract is a German contract:

> Lloyd v. Guibert, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 283; > Harris v. Owners of Franconia, 2 C. P. Div. 173.

The general rule which applies to this case is that money is to be paid at the place where the person who is to receive the money resides or carries on business:

> Robey v. Snaefell Mining Company, 20 Q. B. Div. 152;
> Rein v. Stein, (1892) 1 Q. B. 753.

Finlay, Q.C. and Dr. Raikes, for the plaintiffs, contrâ.—The court is entitled to look into the circumstances under which the contract was made, in order to determine whether the payment was intended to be in this country:

> Reynolds v. Coleman, 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 588; 36 Ch. Div. 453.

In the present case the work was performed in this country, and the ship was delivered to her owners in this country, and by the very terms of the contract she is to be delivered at Southampton "against a salvage award or compensation." This condition, coupled with the fact that the salvors are to have a possessory lien, should lead the court to the conclusion that payment was intended to be made in this country:

> Fry v. Raggio, 40 W. R. 120;
> Rein v. Stein (ubi sup.);
> Bell and Co. v. Antwerp, London, and Brazil Line (ubi sup.).

The fact that by the contract the money is payable to the Nordischer Bergungs-Verein, and not to the plaintiffs, was an accidental omission.

Sir Richard Webster in reply.—The fact that the defendants might have discharged the lien at Southampton does not show that the money due under the contract must be paid in this country.

THE PRESIDENT.—This case is important, having regard to the amount of money involved, but I do not think anything can be gained by my considering my judgment, because, although when the matter came before me originally I thought the writ ought to issue, I did so in the belief that the money was payable in England as the affidavit stated. I find no fault with that allegation in the affidavit, because that was intended, no doubt in a compendious way, to express what the plaintiffs' contention was. I am afraid that I possibly hastily accepted that as a fact, and on that it seemed to me that the writ ought to go. On further consideration of the matter, and on looking more carefully into the contract itself, and considering the inference to be drawn from it, I think I cannot take that compendious statement as accurate. The question appears to me to be a simple one, and to be a question of fact in a certain sense; that is to say, a question founded on the true construction of the contract, and the inferences to be derived from the terms of it. The matter turns upon Order XI., r. 1, sub-sect (e), which is as follows: "Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons, or notice of a writ of summons, may be allowed by the court or a judge whenever: (e) the action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction of any contract wherever made which according to the terms thereof ought to be performed within the jurisdiction." That means that where you have a contract of which part, and not necessarily all, is to be performed within the jurisdiction, and a breach within the jurisdiction has arisen by reason of that part of the contract not being performed, then the writ may issue. It is not necessary, as has been held, that the whole of the contract should be performed within the jurisdiction; but what is necessary is, that there should be a breach within the jurisdiction, that is to say, a breach of part of the contract which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction.

The authorities on this appear to me to indicate very clearly what the principles are by which this rule should be construed. The leading case is that of Bell v. Antwerp, London, and Brazil Line (ubi sup.). Two propositions appear to me to be made out from the judgment of the Court of Appeal in that case. In the first place, it seems clear that it must be shown that the part of the contract of which the breach is complained must be performed—not may, but must be performed—within the jurisdiction; and secondly, I gather from the judgment of Kay, L.J., that to arrive at this you must look at the words of the contract, taken in connection with the surrounding circumstances. That I think is not inconsistent with any of the other cases which have been referred to. On the contrary, the other cases appear to me to illustrate the principles laid down in that case. Reynolds v. Coleman (ubi sup.) is dealt with in that to which I have just referred, and there it is obvious that the breach complained of was a breach of something which not only was to be done in England, but which could not be done anywhere else. Therefore it is clear that there was a breach within the jurisdiction. Fry v. Raggio (ubi sup.) turned upon the inference to be drawn from all the circumstances of the case, and the two learned judges who heard that case differed in their view as to the inference, one holding that certain facts such as the provision that the payment was to be in English money showed that the payment was to be in England. The other learned judge came to a contrary conclusion, based chiefly on the fact that in his view it was to be paid against documents, and those documents were to be handed over in Italy. The difference between the judges arose from the difference of views as to the facts of the case. But, as has been pointed out, that does not affect the principle that both learned judges held that the question was where the money was to be paid. Rein v. Stein (ubi sup.) further illustrates the proposition that, in coming to the conclusion where the breach has taken place, you must look at all the circumstances. In that case the court were chiefly influenced by the considerations, I think, arising from the course of conduct between the parties, so that what one has to do is to see, in the terms of the contract, and on the inferences to be drawn from the terms themselves and the surrounding circumstances at the time of the making of the contract, what it was that was to be done, the breach for not doing which is complained of.

The most important fact for consideration in the present case is the provision as to whom this money is to be paid. Under the terms of the contract it has to be paid to a German company domiciled in Hamburg, and having no place of business elsewhere. It is quite true that it is suggested that that does not accurately express the intention of the parties, and that it was through a slip in the contract that the terms were not so expressed that the money should be paid to the plaintiff as well as to the Hamburg company. I do not know that that would have made any difference, as the plaintiffs are a Stockholm company. But I do not think that I can adopt that view, as the contract is express; and it seems to me to be reasonable in its terms. I cannot accept the view that a mistake has been made. It appears to me to be clear that the terms of the contract are that the money is to be paid to the Hamburg company, though possibly to be distributed afterwards. If that is so, where was it to be paid? Why surely in Hamburg. It is a general principle that money is paid to a creditor by a debtor where the creditor is. That principle has been well illustrated in the well-known case of Robey v. Snaefell Mining Company (ubi sup.), relating to the delivery of machinery in the Isle of Man, where, although the delivery was to be in the Isle of Man, still, as the plaintiffs resided in Lincoln, it was held that the money was to be paid here in England. That is the strongest fact I have to deal with in this case. It is said there were other parts of the contract itself which would lead to the contrary inference. It is said that the money is to be paid against the delivery up of the ship over which a lien was to extend. I do not think that ought to be carried so far as to say that it meant that money was to be paid where the ship at the time of the conclusion of the salvage services happened to be. I think the contract means that there was to be a lien of a possessory nature; but I do not think it follows from that that the money is to be paid where the res at the time happens to be. No authority has been cited to me for this purpose, and I am not sure whether those first principles which have been alluded to would naturally point to that conclusion. Is anything to be drawn from the surrounding circumstances, or from the terms of the contract which would lead one to a different conclusion? I do not think there is. It is said that the award may make some difference. I do not think it does, because it appears to me that this action is brought not upon the award, but upon the contract. Even if it were on the award, the award is made in Germany by a German, and deposited in a German court. Then it is suggested that part of the money has been paid in London. But the answer to that appears to me to be, that that took place by express authority, and be it observed by the express authority of the Hamburg company, showing, as one would have expected under the terms of the contract, that they were the persons who alone had power to authorise the application of the money, and to determine if they chose where in any particular case it was to be paid. Certainly when one looks at the general course of the case, when you find that it is a contract between three parties, two of them Germans, and one a Swede, a contract governed by German law, although it related to subject-matter which happened to be in English waters, the presumption I think would rather be that the contract would provide that payment should be made to one or the other of these parties abroad rather than in this country. It appears to me therefore on the whole, that there is no ground either on the terms of the contract or surrounding circumstances for saying that this payment of money must take place in England, but that it was intended that the payment should take place in Germany. I am obliged therefore to hold that this writ ought not to be allowed to issue, as it does not fall within the provisions of the rule of court relied upon.

March 1.—The plaintiffs now appealed from the above decision.

Finlay, Q.C. and Raikes in support of the appeal.

English Harrison (with him Sir Richard Webster and Butler Aspinall) contrâ.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs, who are foreigners, have brought an action in an English court; that is to say, they issued a writ in an English court in order to enforce a contract. At the present time the proposed defendants are foreigners resident abroad, and the writ therefore cannot be served without the leave of the court. The leave of the court is asked for, and whether the court can or cannot give that leave depends upon the construction and application of Order XI. The breach complained of is nonpayment of money according to contract. The question must therefore depend upon what is the true construction and application to this case of Order XI., r. 1, sub-sect. (e). That rule provides that the court may give leave to serve the writ abroad where the action is founded on a breach within the jurisdiction of a contract wherever made, where that which is said to be a breach ought to be performed within the jurisdiction. It signifies not where the contract was made. We have so to construe it, as Cotton, L.J. said in Reynolds v. Coleman (ubi sup.), so as to see whether within the true meaning of the rule the payment according to the terms of the contract ought to be performed within the jurisdiction. The contract was made between the captain of a German ship which was on the rocks within the realm of England, that is, within the three-mile limit. It was made by the German captain in respect of a German ship, and was made with foreigners in respect of work to be performed with regard to that ship. Not only was the contract made between foreigners in regard to a foreign ship, but it is a contract drawn up in the German language. It seems to me that it is a German contract, and a contract made by foreigners under the jurisdiction of the German flag; not that that is necessarily conclusive, because, according to the rule of court, the contract may be made anywhere. Therefore, even if the contract be taken to be made in England, the question comes to be the same; but for the purpose of considering the contract I should say it is a German contract. The parties to the contract are now abroad, and neither the plaintiffs nor the defendants are in England. The contract is to perform work to the ship; whether it be called salvage work or not seems to me to be immaterial. It is for work to be done to that ship, and payment is to be made for that work. There is no place specified in the contract for payment. What then is the ordinary rule? It is that the debtor must follow his creditor, and must pay where the creditor is. If this were a contract made in England by two people who were at the time in England, and payment was to be made in England, nevertheless if the creditor went abroad and was abroad at the time payment was to be made, the debtor need not go after his creditor to pay him abroad; he may wait till his creditor comes back to England. The case of Fessard v. Mugnier (18 C. B. N. S. 286) shows that absence of the creditor from England affords an excuse for the want of tender or payment by the debtor where the creditor has gone abroad after the making of the contract, but nevertheless the proper place of payment is determined by the rule that the debtor must follow the creditor, and if he makes a bargain with a person who is abroad at the time when the contract is made, which is the case here—and what makes this case stronger is, that the contract is made by a foreigner who is abroad with another foreigner who is also abroad—the place of payment follows the general rule, and is to be made where the creditor is. But it is said that in this case there is a possessory lien. Now what is the effect of a lien on a contract where there is a contract besides the lien for payment? The lien is an additional security given to the person who has to be paid, but he has a right to be paid irrespective and independently of his lien. Therefore the existence of the lien does not alter the obligation to pay. If the person who ought to pay does pay, the right of the lien does not apply. It is only after the breach of the obligation to pay that the lien attaches. It seems to me that the existence of the lien does not in the least affect the obligation to pay, which is independent of it. Here therefore the obligation to pay, the breach of which is the breach relied on, was an obligation to pay abroad; so that, even if a tender might have been made in England, and even if, which I do not accept, the person who was in possession of the lien here could accept payment as well as tender, it makes no difference. This case must be decided as if there was no right of lien at all, and upon the obligation of the contract. If the argument as to the right to pay the person who is in possession of the thing is sound, and if payment to him would be a good payment, it then only comes to this, that there may in this case be a good payment in England. But then the question arises that there may be a payment abroad. It is, however, more than that. The right payment is abroad, and if it was the case that the payment might be made in either one of the two places, then the case of Bell v. Antwerp, London, and Brazil Line (ubi sup.) applies, and you have the case of a payment which may be made in either one of two places, that is abroad or in England, and if that is so, then the case is not within the rule. Then it is not a case in which the contract for payment the breach of which is complained of is one that is to be performed within the jurisdiction. It is one which may be performed within or out of the jurisdiction, and if so, the decision cited puts it outside Order XI., r. 1, sub-sect. (c). Looking at this therefore in any point of view, it is not a case within the sub-section, and therefore the refusal by the President of the Admiralty Division to allow service of the notice of the writ was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The question comes to a very short point, whether those who seek leave to serve this writ abroad can make out that the contract for a breach of which they are suing is one which according to the terms of it ought to be performed within the jurisdiction. If they cannot make that out, they are not entitled to leave to issue the writ. The expression "according to the terms thereof" has been explained more than once. It means more than according to the actual words. According to Cotton, L.J. in Reynolds v. Coleman (ubi sup.), you are entitled to look into the circumstances under which the contract was entered into. You may look at the surrounding circumstances, and Kay, L.J., in the later case of Rein v. Stein (ubi sup.), refers to the dealing between the parties. The question is whether there is any obligation on the defendants to pay this particular sum of money in this country. We must look to the contract, to the parties to it, and to the circumstances under which it was entered into. The contract is between three foreigners. One party is the Neptune Salvage Company, which is the company asking for leave to serve abroad. It is a Swedish company. Another party is the Nordischer Bergungs-Verein, which is a German company. It has no place of business here. It is resident in Hamburg. The third party, the one sued, is another German company, the owners of the steamship Eider, who have no place of business here. The contract itself relates to the salvage of a German ship called the Eider, which got ashore last summer on the coast of the Isle of Wight. The contract is in the German language. In substance it was that the two salving companies would do the best they could to get the vessel off the rocks and take her to Southampton, and they were to be paid 50 per cent. of her value when salved, ten days after the salvage. Nothing is said as to the place of payment, or as to the currency in which payment was to be made. Payment was not to be made to the Neptune Company, though they were to share in the amount paid to the Nordischer Bergungs-Verein. The contract was so worded and so formed as to confine the obligation to pay to the German company. Whether that was a blunder we need not speculate. This is not an action for rectifying a blunder, and the contract is as before us. Where is the obligation to pay to be performed? The services were to be performed in English waters, and the vessel was to be taken to Southampton; but the contract is wholly silent as to where the payment is to be made. Can this question be solved by any of those principles of law by which lawyers are to be guided? The answer is "Yes." The person to pay is a German company; the person to whom payment is to be made is a German company; and the obligation to pay is to be performed in Germany. It appears to me that this conclusion is too plain for reasonable argument to the contrary. But it is said that the lien clause makes a difference, and that, by reason of the stipulation that the salvors are to have a lien, the obligation as to the place of payment is changed. Is it? It is nothing more than a stipulation that the salvors shall not be compelled to part with the ship till they get payment. It does not affect the obligation to pay, or the place where the obligation is to be performed. The whole of this argument about lien is based on a misconception respecting the legal operation of tender. Tender does not discharge a debt. The obligation to pay is not discharged or extinguished by a tender. The mere fact that the lien might be discharged by tender does not show that the place of performance is changed. That appears to me to be the short answer to the appellants' argument. I think that the case is plain that the judge was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—I also am of the same opinion. We were asked in the first place to construe this contract as if the payment was to be made not merely to the Bergungs-Verein, but also to the Neptune Company, and to do violence to the language as expressed in that respect by reading into the contract words which have been omitted either on purpose or by accident. It has already been pointed out that we cannot do that. This is not an action for rectification of contract. We must therefore take the contract as it stands, and construe it according to its plain language, according to which the agreement made with the plaintiff company is not one for payment to them direct, but for payment through the Bergungs-Verein. But it is alleged that there has been a breach of agreement to pay through the Bergungs-Verein. I do not doubt but that that would be a breach of contract for which an action might lie if there was jurisdiction in this country. That leads us to the further question whether there has been here within the meaning of the rule a breach within the jurisdiction—in other words, according to the language of the rule, whether the contract provides, according to the terms thereof, that the performance shall take place in England. It seem to me that what goes to the root of the whole of this discussion is the doctrine laid down in Bell v. Antwerp, London, and Brazil Line (ubi sup.), that it will not do to show that the performance ought to be made in England or abroad, but that the only cases that come within the rule are where the performance ought to be in England. To my mind the appellants fail to show that the performance ought to be in England. That must be a question of the construction of the contract. Is this a German or an English contract? Beyond all doubt it seems to me to be a German contract. It is made in the German tongue—though I do not say that that is decisive—between the Bergungs-Verein, who have no place of business in England, but had only an agent here at the time, between the Neptune Company, who appear to have a sort of place of business in England, but really are a Scandinavian firm, carrying on business at Stockholm; and the captain of the defendants' ship. It was a salvage agreement made by the captain of the ship, at the place where the vessel was. Now, is that primâ facie a German contract? There is no provision that the payment of the salvage money is to be in England, and none as to where the money is to be paid. Having such a German contract between two foreign firms, one of which, to which payment is to be made, living in Hamburg, and the third party being also Germans living in Bremen, is it really reasonable to suppose that they intended that payment should be made in England? Unless for the mere fact that the salvage service was being performed in England, or that a lien was given for salvage, the matter appears too clear for argument. Two German firms might be living next door. A salvage service is to be performed at the other end of the world, and it is suggested that the contract made between the captain of the ship and the representative of the other German firm is a contract according to which payment ought not to be made by one German firm seeking the other living next door by sending the money across the street. I do not think it possible to say that. If it was not for the suggestion as to lien, such an argument could not for a moment be maintained. But the whole argument as to lien is based on a transparent fallacy. The right of a creditor is a general right. His debtor is bound to seek him, and find him wherever he is. Primâ facie it is a general obligation. But salvage results in placing in the possession of one of the contracting parties the salved property which is the subject-matter of the action, and they have a lien. It is suggested that, because the owner of the ship may have a right to tender in England and get the lien discharged, that shows that his obligation to pay is not a general obligation to pay his creditor wherever he can find him, and that the place of payment is localised. But the tender does not discharge the debt. It may operate to discharge the lien, but it does not discharge the debt, and no English lawyer who is accustomed to plead in these courts can suppose that it does. The defendants were not bound to tender. They were not bound to pay in England because they might have tendered in England, and because they had a right to have the lien discharged. I will assume that the lien could properly be discharged by a tender in England. As to that I say, if you mean to decide the point, it is a different point from that which arises in this case. It is sufficient to say that if there was a right to tender the defendants were not bound to tender, and still less bound to pay here. The general rule is that, where no place of payment is specified, either expressly or by implication, the debtor must seek his creditor. In Haldane v. Johnson (8 Ex. 689) it was held that a covenant for payment of rent when no particular place of payment is mentioned, is analogous to a covenant to pay a sum of money in gross on a day certain, in which case it is incumbent upon the covenantor to seek out the person to be paid, and pay or tender him the money. In the judgment in that case the opinion of Parke, B., in Poole v. Tumbridge (2 M. & W. 223), is relied upon. Most of the cases are collected in Fessard v. Mugnier (18 C. B. N. S. 286), which is very instructive on this subject. It is not necessary to hold that this contract to pay might not be discharged by payment elsewhere than where the creditor is. If the payment was received in England, no doubt there would have been a discharge of the debt. The question, however, is, where is the obligation to pay? Even though it might be performed in England, still, if it had to be performed abroad, it does not come within the rule. For these reasons it seems to me clear that this appeal should be dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Hollams, Sons, Coward, and Hawksley.

Solicitors for the defendants, Clarkson, Greenwells, and Co.

Monday, June 19, 1893.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.)

Frederick Gordon v. J. R. Francis and Co.; The S.S. Recepta. (a)

Writ of prohibition—Admiralty Division—Appeal from judge in chambers—Admiralty jurisdiction—Appeal to Court of Appeal—County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 127, 132.

The Admiralty Division has jurisdiction to grant prohibition, and an application may be made to the judge in chambers for it.

An appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from an order of a judge of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, refusing a writ of prohibition.

An application for prohibition by a party to a County Court Admiralty action was made in chambers under sect. 127 of the County Courts Act 1888, to a judge of the Admiralty Division, and refused. The applicant wishing to appeal, the judge granted him leave to appeal direct to the Court of Appeal without further argument in court. On the appeal coming on the respondent took the objection that, by sect. 132 of the County Courts Act 1888, there was in such a case no appeal to the Court of Appeal from the decision of the Admiralty Division:

Held, that there was an appeal.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff in a collision action instituted on the Admiralty side of the City of London Court, from an order of Barnes, J., sitting in chambers, refusing their application that a writ of prohibition might issue directed to the judge of the City of London Court, and to the defendants, prohibiting them from proceeding on so much of an order as gave the defendants the costs of the action, on the ground that the judge having on the hearing of the action made an order giving the plaintiffs the costs of the action was functus officio, and had no power or jurisdiction to alter or vary his judgment or order, and on other grounds.

The application to Barnes, J. was made when he was sitting in chambers as vacation judge, but was to him as a judge of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division.

On the appeal coming on for hearing counsel for the respondents took the preliminary objection that the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal.

The following enactments were referred to, and are material to the decision:—

The County Courts Act 1888:

Sect. 127. It shall be lawful for any judge of the High Court, as well during the sittings as in vacation, to hear and determine applications for writs of prohibition to any court, and to make such orders for the issuing of such writs as might have been made by the High Court, and all such orders so made by any such judge of the High Court shall have the same force and effect as heretofore.

Sect. 128. When an application shall be made to the High Court or a judge thereof for a writ of prohibition addressed to any court, the matter shall be finally disposed of by order, and no declaration or further proceedings in prohibition shall be allowed. Upon any such application the judge of the court shall not be served with notice thereof, and shall not, except by the order of a judge of the High Court, be required to appear or be heard thereon, and shall not, except by such order, be liable to any order for the payment of the costs thereof; but the application shall be proceeded with and heard in the same manner in all respects as any case of an appeal duly brought from a decision of a judge; and notice thereof shall be given to or served upon the same parties as in any case of an order made or refused by a judge in a matter within his jurisdiction, as the case may be.

Sect. 132. When the High Court or a judge thereof shall have refused to grant a writ of certiorari or prohibition to a court, or any such order as in the last preceding section mentioned, no other court or judge shall grant such writ or order; but nothing herein shall affect the right of appealing from the decision of the judge of the High Court to the High Court itself, or prevent a second application being made for such writ or order to the High Court or a judge thereof on grounds different from those on which the first application was founded.

The Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873:

Sect. 16. The High Court of Justice shall be a Superior Court of Record, and, subject as in this Act mentioned, there shall be transferred to and vested in the said High Court of Justice the jurisdiction which, at the commencement of this Act, was vested in, or capable of being exercised by, all or any of the courts following (that is to say); . . . (5) The High Court of Admiralty. . . . The jurisdiction by this Act transferred to the High Court of Justice shall include (subject to the exceptions hereinafter contained) the jurisdiction which, at the commencement of this Act, was vested in, or capable of being exercised by, all or any one or more of the judges of the said courts respectively, sitting in court or chambers, or elsewhere, when acting as judges or a judge, in pursuance of any statute, law, or custom, and all powers given to any such court, or to any such judges or judge, by any statute; and also all ministerial powers, duties, and authorities incident to any and every part of the jurisdictions so transferred.

(a) Reported by Butler Aspinall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sect. 19. The said Court of Appeal shall have jurisdiction and power to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order, save as hereinafter mentioned, of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice, or of any judges or judge thereof, subject to the provisions of this Act, and to such rules and orders of court for regulating the terms and conditions on which such appeals shall be allowed, as may be made pursuant to this Act.

Rules of the Supreme Court 1883:

Order LIX., r. 4. Every judge of the High Court of Justice for the time being shall be a judge to hear and determine appeals from inferior courts, under sect. 45 of the principal Act. All such appeals (except Probate and Admiralty appeals from inferior courts, and from justices, which shall be to a divisional court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division) shall be entered in one list by the officers of the Crown Office department of the Central Office, and shall be heard by such divisional court of the Queen's Bench Division as the Lord Chief Justice of England shall from time to time direct.

Order LXVIII., r. 1. Subject to the provisions of this order, nothing in these rules, save as expressly provided, shall affect the procedure or practice in any of the following causes or matters: . . . (b) Proceedings on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench Division.

Cranstoun for the respondents.—This being an appeal from a judge in chambers the appellant has gone to the wrong court; he should have gone to a divisional court. The learned judge in chambers was sitting, so far as the prohibition was concerned, as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division. The Court of Appeal, therefore, has no jurisdiction, because the applicant's appeal ought to be to a divisional court. In any case, there is, under sect. 132 of the County Courts Act of 1888, no appeal from a refusal of a judge of the Admiralty Division to grant a prohibition. The words "the High Court" cannot be taken to include the Court of Appeal. [Lord Esher, M.R.—That only applies to the Queen's Bench Division; the argument on the other side is that the judge was sitting as a judge of the Admiralty Court.] The Admiralty Court has no jurisdiction to prohibit. [Kay, L.J.—The Admiralty Court is part of the High Court, and has the jurisdiction which the other courts have.] Secondly, prohibition is a matter appertaining exclusively to the Crown Office (cf. Mulleneisen v. Coulson, 21 Q. B. Div. 3). [Bowen, L.J.—Is there any authority for that? If you are right in saying it becomes a Queen's Bench Division matter as soon as the order is made, are you right in saying that it is Crown Office business before the order is made? Lord Esher, M.R.—The writ could be issued out of the Petty Bag Office, and this was in Chancery. But we have very high authority for saying that prohibition was never Crown Office business at all.]

Butler Aspinall for the appellants.—The object with which sect. 132 was drafted was to prevent parties from running round to the different courts applying for prohibitions as they used to do. [Lord Esher, M.R.—But what do you say to the second part of the section—nothing herein shall affect the right of appeal, &c.?] Where an application is made in the Admiralty Division for a prohibition under sect. 127 of the County Courts Act of 1888, there is nothing in sect. 132 to take away the right to appeal from the Admiralty Division. Sect. 132 is confined to the proceeds in the High Court, and does not overrule sect. 19 of the Judicature Act, giving a right of appeal to the Court of Appeal. Sect. 19 of the Judicature Act gives the appellants a right to appeal. If sect. 132 applies to this case they are concluded by the decision of the judge in chambers. They have then no right of appeal at all; they cannot go to a divisional court of the Admiralty Division, because by Order LIX., r. 4, the Divisional Court of the Admiralty Division is limited to hearing appeals from inferior courts and justices; they cannot go to the Court of Appeal without first going to a divisional court. They cannot go to the Queen's Bench Divisional Court, because it can never have been contemplated that an appeal from the judgment of a judge of the Admiralty Division would lie to the Queen's Bench Division. If the contention of the respondents is right that sect. 132 applies to all applications for prohibitions, requiring as it does a party to go to the High Court before coming to the Court of Appeal, then the same difficulty which, it is contended, exists with regard to the Admiralty Division would exist in the Chancery Division. [He was stopped by the Court.]

Lord Esher, M.R.—It seems to me that the decision on this point depends upon the reading which we think right to give to sect. 132 of the County Courts Act 1888. When one recollects what was the practice with regard to moving for prohibitions in the old courts, that you might move for a prohibition in one court, and, if it was refused, you might move for prohibition in another, and so on, and I believe you might go to the Chancery Courts also in the same way, I think that the Legislature wished to put an end in the new practice to such an unnecessary multiplication of applications for prohibitions, and more particularly if there was an appeal from the first decision. Under the old system there was no appeal, and therefore they went about from one court to another until they got to one which would grant a writ. But, if you can appeal from the first, there is no reason that you should go on multiplying applications to co-ordinate courts or judges. Now this is what you have when you have reached the High Court under the Judicature Act. The first section with regard to appeals is the one which gives the right of appeal from every order or judgment of the High Court. In the 19th section of the Judicature Act, therefore, you have at once something which renders unnecessary the old practice of going from judge to judge, and from court to court, all and each of co-ordinate jurisdiction; you get rid of it because you have the right of appeal from the first refusal to grant the writ. That being so, it seems to me that the real object of sect. 132 is to do away with those repeated applications to judges of co-ordinate jurisdiction, that is to say, to the various divisions of the High Court, and that you are not now to go from one court to another. It might have been argued that you could, if you were to bring into the new practice the old system. I therefore read that section as meaning that, if you have applied for prohibition to a judge of the High Court, you cannot go to another judge of the High Court. If you apply for prohibition to a divisional court of the High Court you cannot go to another divisional court of the High Court. Taking it so, it does not refer to an appeal to this court at all. That construction of the Act leaves both parts of the section applicable, and it appears to me that the appellants' view is strengthened by this, that if the first part of the section had stood alone as applicable with regard to the several applications to the High Court, it would have been said that the Legislature had done away with the right of appeal to a judge of the High Court, or of the Divisional Court. The whole section applies to matters within the High Court, and does not apply to the case of an appeal from the High Court. As to the first point taken, it seems clear that Barnes, J., when he refused this prohibition, was sitting as a judge of the Admiralty Court; that is to say, he was sitting as a judge of the High Court in all the divisions. It was vacation, and he was exercising all the jurisdictions. But when the case of prohibition in respect of Admiralty jurisdiction came before him, I have not the least doubt that the proper way of dealing with it is to say that he acted as judge of the Admiralty Court, and so acting, the Judicature Act has given him, as such judge, all the powers of any judge of the High Court, amongst others the power in such a case to issue or refuse a writ of prohibition. He did not desire any further argument, and, therefore, the appeal is properly brought direct to this court.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first point taken was, that Barnes, J., when he refused to grant this prohibition, was sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench only, and not as a judge of the Admiralty Division; that, therefore, the matter ought to have gone first to the Divisional Court of Queen's Bench, and not have come direct here. That seems to me to be based upon an entire misconception of the effect of the Judicature Act and the practice of granting prohibition. The object of the Judicature Act was to affect every branch of the High Court, so that suitors should not be sent from one branch of the courts of justice to another. Accordingly the courts of common law were clothed with complete power to do all that justice required with regard to the subject-matter submitted to them. It was held by Sir George Jessel, in Hedley v. Bates (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 41; 13 Ch. Div. 498), that the Court of Chancery by virtue of the Judicature Act had power to grant injunctions, to issue writs of prohibition, and otherwise to grant relief as if the subject-matter was within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery.

First of all, it was asserted that prohibition was a matter which necessarily went into the Crown paper, and hence it followed that prohibition belonged to Crown practice and the Queen's Bench Division. That is an absolute mistake. Under the old system applications for prohibition were made to the Common Pleas and Exchequer Court of the Queen's Bench separately, but since the Judicature Act and the merging of all the courts writs for prohibition have been moved for from the Crown side; but there is nothing necessarily to confine prohibition to Crown practice, and it is incorrect to say that essentially it virtually belonged to the Crown side of the Queen's Bench. The second point is a more difficult one; whether, upon the refusal of the judge of the Admiralty Court to grant prohibition, the appellants could come to this court. That depends upon sect. 132 of the County Courts Act of 1888. The true way of dealing with the language of the section, which is exceedingly embarrassing, is to apply to it the broad line of reasoning expressed by the Master of the Rolls. The Judicature Act sect. 19 gave the right of appeal from an order of the Admiralty Court as from any other. We must look at the section of the County Courts Act, which, it is said, has taken away that right of appeal, to see whether it has really done so. If it has, this should be expressed in a clear and effective manner. But, if we look at the words, we cannot put that construction upon them. The words are embarrassing for this reason: under the old system you could go to each division of the courts and apply for prohibition; after it had been refused in the Queen's Bench, you could go to the Exchequer and so on; but after the Judicature Act, and the right of appeal had been given, the language is inapt, and probably the inaptness of the expression did not occur to the draftsman, and the Legislature has enacted that after one refusal of the High Court no other court of co-ordinate jurisdiction can grant the order. But that leaves untouched the right of appeal from a refusal to grant prohibition. Upon that ground I entirely agree with the Master of the Rolls.

Kay, L.J.—I am clearly of opinion that the effect of the Judicature Act is to alter the position of the Court of Admiralty by making it a Superior Court of equal jurisdiction with other branches of the High Court, and also to give to it, as to each of the other branches, the same jurisdiction which each, any, or all of them, had before. Therefore it seems clear that, amongst other jurisdictions given to it by sect. 16 of the Judicature Act 1873, is the jurisdiction to grant, if it should be right and proper, writs of prohibition. By the County Courts Act 1868 Admiralty jurisdiction was given to the County Courts, and most certainly the court which should issue prohibition against a County Court exceeding its jurisdiction in an Admiralty matter would most properly be the High Court of Admiralty, or that division of the High Court to which Admiralty matters are assigned. I have no doubt that Barnes, J., when he entertained this application, was sitting, and should be treated as sitting, as a judge of the Admiralty Division of the High Court. As to the second point, and the difficulty which arises under sect. 132 of the County Courts Act 1888, I do not think the section is addressed to the point raised by the respondents. Its effect is, when an application has been refused by one divisional court, to prevent an application being made to another divisional court. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the words of the section do not take away the right of appeal. Having regard to the fact that it was laid down in the case of Lister v. Wood (23 Q. B. Div. 229), that where a divisional court refuses to grant a writ of prohibition, the Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from such refusal, it would be a strange thing indeed to say that this section interferes with the right of appeal from the refusal of the Admiralty judge. This would be absurd. In this case there is an appeal.

The appeal was subsequently heard and allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche.
Solicitors for the defendants, Keene, Marsland, and Bryden.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

May 9 and 31, 1893.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE ALSACE AND LORRAINE. (a)

Marine insurance — Warranty — Stranding in course of adventure—Insured goods on another vessel at time of stranding—Construction of policy as regards time.

Policies of insurance on two parcels of rice effected by plaintiffs with defendants contained the ordinary memorandum by which rice is warranted "free from average unless general, or the ship be stranded," &c., and a special memorandum as follows: "Warranted free from particular average unless the ship be stranded, &c."

The rice was to be carried in a French ship, and during the voyage she was damaged in a storm and some of the rice was jettisoned, and some more was condemned and sold at a port where the vessel put in for repairs. While the cargo was on shore the vessel stranded and was lost, and the rest of the cargo was forwarded in a British ship, some of it being damaged en route by perils of the sea. Plaintiffs paid freight pro ratâ itineris, according to French law, on all the rice discharged from the French ship. The defendants paid their proportion of general average and forwarding charges, but resisted the plaintiffs' claim for a particular average loss on the damaged rice, including the pro ratâ freight charged against it.

Held, that, as the stranding occurred when the goods insured were not on board the vessel, the warranty against particular average remained good, and therefore the defendants were not liable.

THIS was the hearing of a point of law in an action on a policy of insurance on chartered freight in the ship Alsace and Lorraine.

Messrs. Blackwood, Bryson, and Co. were the plaintiffs and the British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company were the defendants.

According to the agreed statement of facts, by a charter-party dated the 5th Jan. 1892, the plaintiffs, who were a firm of London merchants, through their Calcutta branch, chartered the Alsace and Lorraine, a French vessel of about 610 tons register, then at Calcutta, from the owners' agents, to load a cargo of rice and (or) grain (oats excepted), in bags, the charterers having the option of shipping 100 tons of coolie stores, and therewith proceed to Demerara light-ship for orders to discharge either in one or two of the following ports: Demerara, Trinidad, or Barbados, certain perils, which included dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation excepted. The said charter-party provided that the freight should be at the rate of 37*s*. 6*d*. if cargo were discharged in two ports, and 36*s*. 4*d*. if in one port only, per ton, and should be paid on right delivery of the cargo at the port or ports of discharge on the basis of 20 per cent. per ton net weight delivered for rice and (or) grain, and for coolie stores according to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce Schedule, and that the freight should be payable in cash for so much as might be required for ship's disbursements, and the balance in cash on delivery, at the bank buying rate of exchange for ninety days' bills on London account on the day the delivery of the cargo should be completed.

In pursuance of the charter-party a cargo was loaded, and amongst other goods there were shipped by the plaintiffs, through their agents, two parcels of rice, consisting of 5575 bags and 5500 bags respectively, for which bills of lading were signed, making the goods deliverable at the port or ports as specified in the charter-party, certain perils, which included the said perils, being excepted, unto order, the freight to be paid for the said goods on right delivery of the cargo at the port or ports of discharge as per charter-party.

The plaintiffs insured the said goods with the defendants under two policies of insurance—one for 175*l*. on the 5575 bags, valued at 3915*l*.; the other for 325*l*. on the 5500 bags, valued at 3405*l*. Each policy was in the defendants' usual form and contained the ordinary memorandum by which, amongst other goods, rice is warranted "free from average, unless general, or the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt," and a special memorandum as follows: "Warranted free from particular average unless the ship be stranded, sunk, burnt, or in collision, the collision to be of such a nature as may reasonably be supposed to have caused or led to damage of the cargo."

On the 17th Jan, 1892 the vessel left Calcutta with the said goods and other cargo, but met with heavy weather, which caused her master to jettison some of the rice, and put into Mauritius for repairs, when the cargo was discharged, and part of it which had been condemned was sold. After the cargo was discharged, and whilst being repaired, the vessel was driven on to the coral reefs, where she stranded, and was lost. The accident happened while the whole of the cargo was on shore, and while it was contemplated that as soon as the repairs were finished the rest of the cargo would be reloaded and forwarded in due time to its destination, and it was in fact forwarded in a vessel called the Brazil.

According to French law freight pro ratâ itineris was payable in respect of the carriage of the cargo to Mauritius, and the plaintiffs were compelled to pay, and did pay, freight pro ratâ on all the rice which was discharged from the Alsace and Lorraine.

On the 5th June 1892 the Brazil sailed from Mauritius, and afterwards completed her voyage and delivered her cargo, but in the course of the voyage she met with bad weather, and the plaintiffs' rice on board her was damaged by perils of the seas.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From a statement of the plaintiffs' claim on the two policies it appeared that the amount claimed on the first policy was 87*l.* 15*s.*, and on the second 162*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.*, or in all 249*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.* Of this amount the defendants had paid before action brought, on account of any claim under the policies and without prejudice, the sum of 96*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.*, leaving a balance of 153*l.* 13*s.* 3*d.*, which was now claimed by the plaintiffs. This balance represented the plaintiffs' claim for a particular average loss on the rice, the payment of 96*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.* having been made in respect of general average and other charges not disputed by the underwriters. Pro ratâ freight on the rice was charged against the rice in arriving at the amount of the particular average loss.

The defendants contended, (1) that the f. p. a. warranty in the policies was not deleted, and that they were consequently not liable for anything coming under the head of particular average; (2) that they were not liable for the distance freight paid to the owners of the Alsace and Lorraine at Mauritius. They admitted for the purposes of the action that the Alsace and Lorraine was a vessel of French nationality, and that according to French law freight pro ratâ itineris was payable in respect of the carriage of the cargo to Mauritius. They denied, however, that French law was applicable, or that they were in any event liable in respect of such freight.

R. T. Reid, Q.C. and Hollams, for the plaintiffs, on the question as to whether the ship was so stranded within the meaning of the memorandum as to delete the warranty, referred to

Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company Limited v. Pitts, Son, and King, 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 524; (1893) 1 Q. B. 476;
Burnett v. Kensington, 7 T. R. 210;
Roux v. Salvador, 1 Bing. N. C. 526; 3 Bing. N. C. 266.

And on the question as to the application of French law to payment of freight pro ratâ itineris in respect of the carriage of the cargo to Mauritius, they cited

Dent v. Smith, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 868; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 251; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 414;
The August, 66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 33; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 110; (1891) P. 328;
Lloyd v. Guibert, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 283; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115;
The Gaetano and Maria, 45 L T. Rep. N. S. 510; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 535; 7 P. Div. 137.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Carver, for the defendants, referred to

Rohl v. Parr, 1 Esp. 444;
Phillips on Insurance, s. 1774:
Nesbitt v. Lushington, 4 T. R. 783;
Arnould on Marine Insurance, 6th edit. p. 801.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the judgment.

BARNES, J., having dealt with the facts, and stated the two points contended for by the defendants, continued:—The first point depends on whether or not the ship was stranded within the meaning of the memorandum so as to defeat the warranty, because if the vessel was so stranded, the defendants are liable for the particular average loss, but if the vessel was not so stranded they are not liable. There is no dispute about the facts connected with the stranding, but those facts give rise to a new point in the construction of the memorandum. The plaintiffs maintained that the stranding took place in the course of the adventure, and that therefore the warranties against particular average are defeated. The defendants, on the other hand, maintained that, as the stranding took place when no part of the rice was on board the vessel, the warranties remain in force. There is some lack of precision in the plaintiffs' proposition, but I understand it to mean that the warranties are defeated if the vessel be stranded after the shipment of the goods and while they are covered by the policies, and while the vessel is still engaged under the contract of carriage, even though at the time of the stranding the goods are not on board the vessel. I do not think that the plaintiffs' counsel were able to cite any case or refer to any principle which would establish this proposition. In my opinion the defendants' proposition is in accordance with principle and the authorities. In the recent case of The Glenlivet (68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 860; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 342; (1893) P. 164) I have already dealt with the introduction of the memorandum and the construction of the words "unless the ship be stranded" as a condition, but I may add that the judgments in Burnett v. Kensington (ubi sup.) seem partly based upon the consideration that where a vessel was stranded the underwriters, in order to avoid a difficult inquiry as to whether or not the damage arose from the stranding or how much was owing to that cause, agreed to consider the loss to have happened in consequence of the stranding. The stranding in that case took place while the goods were on board the vessel, and all the observations of the judges are applicable to such a condition of things only, and I do not think they could possibly have imputed to the underwriters a consent to treat the damage on the voyage as due to a stranding, if the stranding occurred when no goods were on board. In all the cases I have been able to refer to except two, the stranding occurred while the goods were on board the vessel. One exception is in the case of Roux v. Salvador (ubi sup.), where goods had been insured free of particular average unless the ship were stranded, and were necessarily sold at a port of refuge, and the vessel, with the rest of her cargo, proceeded on her voyage, and was afterwards stranded. The court decided that there was, under the circumstances, a total loss, and the question of stranding therefore did not arise, but Lord Abinger said: "It has been contended that, the fact of stranding being a condition to let in the claim for a partial loss, it is not material whether the stranding takes place whilst the goods insured are on board or after they have been landed. We are not prepared to adopt that conclusion, but the view we take of this case renders it unnecessary to enter into any discussion of the argument or to pronounce any opinion upon it."

The other exception is the case of the Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company Limited v. Pitts, Son, and King (ubi sup.), in which a steamer coming down the River Plate stranded with one parcel of insured goods on board before reaching Buenos Ayres, where she shipped another parcel of insured goods which were lying waiting for her in lighters at the time of the stranding. A large portion of the insured goods sustained damage on the voyage from Buenos Ayres to Europe, but it was held that the assured could not recover for the damage to the parcel shipped at Buenos Ayres, because of the warranty against particular average, unless the ship or craft be stranded, as the stranding did not occur while these goods were on board the vessel, though they were at risk under the policy in the craft at the time of the stranding. It is from this case that the plaintiffs' counsel take the words "stranding in the course of the adventure," but it seems to me from the whole tenor of the judgments the judges were dealing with the adventure while it lasted on board the vessel. In Phillips on Insurance, sect. 1761, the author says: "The dictum adopted in England appears to be that after a stranding the construction of the policy is the same in respect to all losses on goods on board at the time of the stranding, whether happening before or after the stranding, as if it had not contained this exception." Arnould on Marine Insurance, 6th edit., p. 823, says: "The meaning of the memorandum therefore is . . . should the ship be stranded while the memorandum articles are on board, then the underwriter is liable to pay all particular average losses, whether caused by the stranding or not, just as though the memorandum did not exist." In my opinion it is obvious that the memorandum requires the implied insertion of some words qualifying the generality of the words "stranded, sunk, or burnt," as regards time, and that there should be some such implication as "while the goods are on board the vessel which is stranded, sunk, or burnt." It was practically conceded in argument that, as all connection between the goods sold at Port Louis and the Alsace and Lorraine had been severed by the sale of those goods before the accident, no claim could, according to the case of Roux v. Salvador (ubi sup.), be made for a particular average loss in respect thereof, but the claim for a particular average in respect of those forwarded by the Brazil was maintained although they were not on board at the time of the stranding, and the damage to them happened while they were on board the Brazil. For the reasons I have given I think this claim not maintainable, and in my opinion the fact that it was contemplated that they should be reloaded on the Alsace and Lorraine up to the time of the stranding makes no difference. It never can have been contemplated and would be unreasonable to hold that a stranding at a time when the insured goods were not on board the vessel should defeat the warranty against particular average. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs' claim for a particular average loss entirely fails, and it is unnecessary to express any opinion upon the second point, which only affects the amount of the particular average loss, if any had been recoverable; nor is it necessary to say anything about the points which were touched upon in argument, but do not arise in this case, viz., as to the effect on the warranty of the stranding of a substituted vessel, or of the stranding of the one vessel while the damage occurs in the other. The judgment will be for the defendants, with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Hollams, Son, Coward, and Hawksley.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

May 31 and June 1, 1893.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. H. Jeune.)

THE MOLIÈRE. (a)

Collision—Overtaking ship—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 16, 20.

A vessel which is overtaking another may still be under the obligation to keep out of the way under art. 20 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, notwithstanding that she has advanced from the area covered by the stern light into a position where she has one of the side lights of the overtaken ship in view.

THIS was a collision action in rem brought by the owners of the steamship Baines Hawkins against the owners of the steamship Molière. The collision occurred off Bull Point, North Devon, on the 9th March 1893.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 3.45 a.m. on the 9th March 1893 the Baines Hawkins, a screw-steamship of 464 tons net register, was about seven miles to the W.N.W. of Bull Point, North Devon, bound for Gibraltar from Cardiff with a cargo of coals. The weather was fine and clear with a light N.W. breeze, and the tide was ebb running about one knot. The Baines Hawkins was proceeding at full speed, making seven knots and steering W. half N. magnetic, with her regulation lights duly exhibited. In these circumstances, but at an earlier time when the Baines Hawkins was off Bull Point, the masthead and red side light of a steamship which proved to be the Molière, and which had previously been seen, were noticed to leeward about one mile distant, and bearing about three points abaft the starboard beam. The Baines Hawkins was kept on her W. half N. course, and the Molière gradually overhauled the Baines Hawkins and drew up abeam and in a position to pass all clear, but the Molière suddenly came towards the Baines Hawkins as if under a starboard helm, and caused imminent danger of collision. The helm of the Baines Hawkins was immediately put hard-a-starboard, and the Molière was loudly hailed to keep clear, and the engines of the Baines Hawkins were kept at full speed ahead as the only chance of avoiding a collision, but the Molière came on at full speed and with her port side struck the bluff of the starboard bow of the Baines Hawkins and did her considerable damage.

For the defence it was stated that shortly before 3.30 a.m. the Molière, a screw-steamship of 960 tons gross register with engines of 99 h.p. nominal, belonging to the port of Cardiff, was, whilst on a voyage from Barry to Havre with a cargo of coals, in the Bristol Channel about eight miles to the W. of Bull Point. The Molière had left Barry about 10.30 p.m. the previous day, and after passing the Breaksea her course had been W. by N. magnetic, and later W. magnetic for a short time in order to pass Bull Point at about four miles distant. When Bull Point was abeam the course had been altered to W.S.W. magnetic, and the Molière was proceeding on the said course and was making at full speed about seven and a half knots an hour through the water. There was no wind, the weather was fine and clear, and the tide, which was running to the westward, was of little force. The Molière had her regulation lights duly exhibited. In these circumstances the Baines Hawkins, which had been first noticed a considerable time previously about a mile and a half distant and about three points abaft the port beam of the Molière when the Molière was on her W. by N. course, as aforesaid, and had since been gradually drawing up on the port side of the Molière until she had got before her beam and pretty close to her, was observed to be coming towards the Molière as if under a strong port helm, suddenly rendering a collision most imminent; and, although the Baines Hawkins was loudly hailed and the Molière was kept on her course at full speed ahead as the only chance of avoiding the collision, the Baines Hawkins continued to come on at great speed, at the last moment opening her red light to the bridge of the Molière, and with her stem and starboard bow struck the port side of the Molière about amidships, doing her great damage.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(Inter alia) the defendants charged the plaintiffs with breach of art. 16, and the plaintiffs the defendants with breach of art. 20 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

Art. 16 is as follows:

If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Art. 20 is as follows:

Notwithstanding anything contained in any preceding article, every ship, whether a sailing ship or a steamship, overtaking any other, shall keep out of the way of the overtaken ship.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Baden Powell for the plaintiffs.—The Molière was an overtaking vessel, and it was her duty to keep out of the way. Assuming that she was also crossing the course of the Baines Hawkins, art. 20 would still apply:

The Seaton, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 747; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 191; 9 P. Div. 1;
The Imbro, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 936; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 14 P. Div. 73.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Laing for the defendants.—The Molière was a crossing vessel, as she had the side light of the Baines Hawkins in view, and therefore, under art. 16, the latter was bound to keep out of the way:

The Main, 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 15; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 37; 11 P. Div. 132.

The Baines Hawkins is alone to blame, as she did nothing to keep out of the way until the collision was imminent.

THE PRESIDENT, after dealing with the evidence, which was of a very contradictory character, and rejecting the account given by the Molière as unreliable, continued:—I think, therefore, I must take the story of the Baines Hawkins as being substantially correct. I am not so sure as to that part of it which says the Molière at the last moment threw herself by a sudden action of the helm, described as a sheer, across the path of the Baines Hawkins. If that story is true, then it appears to me there is no need to enter on a consideration of the construction of any of the rules or the law affecting the case, because if it is the fact that the two vessels were about 100 yards from one another when the Molière took the extraordinary step of altering her course in a sudden manner, it would be very difficult on any ground to justify such action. Even if she were a crossing ship at that time, so sudden a course was so improper in placing the Baines Hawkins in very great difficulty that it would be impossible to justify the action of the Molière. But I feel some doubt in accepting that part of the story, because there is the difficulty, which Mr. Walton pointed out, of seeing how the Molière could have got herself into the position in which she undoubtedly was. Though, therefore, I am inclined to think there was some starboarding at a time which might be sufficient to condemn the Molière, I do not desire to rest my judgment solely upon that, although I daresay if I had I might have come to the same conclusion. But looking at the matter on a somewhat broader ground, the Molière must be found to blame.

It appears to me that the view taken by Mr. Aspinall with regard to the obligation on an overtaking vessel is on the whole a sound one; that is to say, that when a vessel is an overtaking vessel within the narrower sense of the word, that is a vessel within the area lighted by the stern light, and then comes, while she is still advancing, into a position in which she sees the side lights, it may well be that her obligation as an overtaking vessel to keep out of the way of the other still continues. It is admitted by Mr. Walton that that would be so if at the time of her seeing the lights there was any risk of collision. I do not see how any other admission than that could be made, because it would be strange indeed if a vessel overtaking came in sight of the side lights, and then suddenly, when there was risk of a collision, threw on the other the obligation of keeping out of the way. It may be possible that where there is no risk of collision at the time, and the vessel comes within sight of the side lights at a considerable distance, the crossing rule may come into force; but in this case I am satisfied that the facts are such that one cannot suppose on the authorities that the obligation of the Molière, as an overtaking vessel, was over. I think, therefore, the obligation upon her to keep out of the way of the Baines Hawkins continued, and that she did not perform that duty. That view appears to me to be consistent altogether with the case of The Seaton (ubi sup.), and consistent also with the two other cases cited—The Main (ubi sup.) and The Imbro (ubi sup.). That disposes of the case of the Molière.

Then there is the question whether the Baines Hawkins is also to blame. Holding, as I do, that there was no obligation on her to get out of the way, I think there is nothing to show that she was to blame. There was no obligation on her to have done anything—even if they were crossing vessels I should have doubted it—until certainly a time very shortly before the collision. If the Molière really starboarded at the last moment, as the Baines Hawkins says, clearly there was nothing which the Baines Hawkins could have done, and on the whole I am inclined to think that the Baines Hawkins, in putting her helm a-starboard when she saw the Molière coming rapidly towards her, did all that she could properly do. The Trinity Masters coincide in this view. The result, therefore, must be that the Molière must be held alone to blame.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche, for Botterell, Roche, and Temperley, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Solicitors for the defendants, Ince, Colt, and Ince, for Vaughan and Hornby, Cardiff.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

April 28 and May 1, 1893.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords HALSBURY, MACNAGHTEN, and SHAND.)

GLYNN v. MARGETSON. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Bill of lading—General words—Construction—Deviation clause.

Where general words are used in a bill of lading contract, and are intended to be made applicable to the circumstances of the particular contract, the main object and intent of the particular contract are to be looked at, and the general words are to be limited to that view.

Perishable goods were shipped under a bill of lading from a port in the south-east of Spain to Liverpool. The bill of lading contained a clause giving the ship "liberty to proceed to and stay at any port or ports in any rotation in the Mediterranean, Levant, Black Sea, or Adriatic, or on the coasts of Africa, Spain, Portugal, France, Great Britain, and Ireland, for the purpose of delivering coals, cargo, or passengers, or for any other purpose whatsoever." After the cargo was loaded the ship proceeded to a port in the north-east of Spain before proceeding to Liverpool. Owing to the delay so caused the cargo was damaged.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the deviation was not justified by the bill of lading, and that the shipowners were liable for the damage.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.), reported in 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 148, 66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 142, and (1892) 1 Q. B. 337, who had affirmed a judgment of Hawkins, J. at the trial.

The action was brought by the respondents, who were fruit merchants in London, to recover damages in respect of injury to certain cases of oranges which had been shipped on board a steamship of the appellants for conveyance from Malaga to Liverpool. The plaintiffs alleged that the voyage had been unduly protracted by a deviation of the ship. The defendants justified the deviation under the bill of lading.

The facts appear sufficiently from the head-note, and the report in the court below.

Bigham, Q.C., Boyd, and Glynn, for the appellants, contended that the words in the bill of lading, if construed in their ordinary sense, justified the deviation. They were intended to give the shipowner a reasonable discretion in the matter, and cannot be restricted to ports lying between Malaga and Liverpool. Of course a reasonable construction must be put upon them. They referred to

Gairdner v. Senhouse, 3 Taunt. 16;
Leathly v. Hunter, 7 Bing. 517;
Leduc v. Ward, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; 58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 908; 20 Q. B. Div. 475.

J. Walton, Q.C., C. C. Scott, and Cecil Carver, who appeared for the respondents, were not called upon to address the House.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellants their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell).—My Lords: The question raised by this appeal is the construction to be put upon a bill of lading by which the shipowner agreed to carry certain goods of the respondents. The shipowners, who are the appellants, alleged that the court below erred in so construing their liability under the bill of lading as to hold that they had broken their contract by proceeding to a port called Burriana after they had taken on board the cargo shipped by the respondents. A cargo of oranges was shipped at Malaga, and the bill of lading is in these terms: "Shipped in good order and condition . . . in and upon the good steamship called the Zena . . . now lying in the port of Malaga, and bound for Liverpool . . . eight third cases of oranges." The port to which the vessel proceeded after she left Malaga was not in the direction of Liverpool, but in the contrary direction taking the vessel farther away from Liverpool than she was at Malaga. Of course it could not be disputed that, if the words which I have read to your Lordships were the only words to be found in the bill of lading relating to the voyage, the shipowner could not justify his act in thus deviating from the stipulated voyage, and would be liable to the shipper in respect of any damage to his goods sustained in consequence of such deviation. In the present case, owing to the delay which took place before the vessel arrived at Liverpool, the oranges were very much damaged, and loss was consequently sustained. But the shipowner seeks to justify the act of proceeding to Burriana by reason of the words which follow those which I have read, "with liberty to proceed to and stay at any port or ports in any rotation in the Mediterranean, Levant, Black Sea, or Adriatic, or on the coasts of Africa, Spain, Portugal, France, Great Britain and Ireland, for the purpose of delivering coals, cargo, or passengers, or for any other purpose whatsoever." The contention of the appellants is, that under those words the voyage to Burriana was justified by the terms of the contract between the parties. It is admitted that the contention of the appellants goes to this length, that after the oranges were taken on board at Malaga upon a vessel said to be bound for Liverpool, the ship might have been sent to any port within the limits named or any number of those ports in any order, staying there any time she pleased, for the purpose of taking in cargo, or delivering it at any of those ports. And it is true that, if their full and complete meaning be given to the words used, that will be the consequence of giving them that meaning. The question is whether they ought to be so construed, or whether there is any reason for putting a restriction upon their construction. These words are printed words in a document evidently intended to be used in relation to a variety of contracts of affreightment. The name of the particular port of shipment as well as the goods to be shipped is left in blank, and these words are treated as a liberty which is to attach to the particular voyage which is agreed upon between the parties. But the main object and intent of the charter-party is the voyage so agreed upon; and although it would not be legitimate to discard the printed words (indeed here the shipowner requires the shipper to undertake to be bound by them as well as by the written words), yet it is well recognised that, in construing an instrument of this sort, and in considering what is its main intent and object, and what the interpretation ought to be from words connected with that main intent and object so expressed, it is legitimate to bear in mind that a portion of the contract is on a printed form applicable to many voyages, and is not specially agreed upon in relation to the particular voyage. The main object and intent, as I have said, of this charter-party is the carriage of oranges from Malaga to Liverpool. That is the matter in which the shipper is concerned; and it seems to me that it would be to defeat what is the manifest object and intention of such a contract to hold that it was entered into with a power to the shipowner to proceed anywhere that he pleased, to trade in any manner that he pleased, and to arrive at the port at which the oranges were to be delivered when he pleased.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Then, is there any rule of law which compels the construction contended for? I think there is not. Where general words are used which are obviously intended to be applicable, so far as they are applicable, to the circumstances of the particular contract, which particular contract is to be embodied in or introduced into that printed form, I think you are justified in looking at the main object and intent of the contract and in limiting the general words used, having in view that object and intent. Therefore, it seems to me that the construction contended for would be an unreasonable one, and there is no difficulty in construing this clause to apply to a liberty in the performance of the stipulated voyage to call at a particular port or ports in the course of the voyage. That port or those ports would differ according to what the stipulated voyage is, inasmuch as at the time when this document is framed the parties who frame it do not know what the particular voyage will be, and intend it to be equally used whatever that voyage is. The ports, a visit to which would be justified under this contract will no doubt differ according to the particular voyage stipulated for between the shipper and the shipowner; but it must in my view be a liberty consistent with the main object of the contract, a liberty only to proceed to and stay at the ports which are in the course of the voyage. In saying that, of course I am speaking in a business sense. It may be said that no port is directly in the course of the voyage (indeed that was argued by the learned counsel for the appellants) inasmuch as in merely entering a port or approaching it nearly you deviate from the direct course between the port of shipment and the ultimate port of destination. That is perfectly true; but in a business sense it would be perfectly well understood to say that there were certain ports in the way between Malaga and Liverpool, and those are the ports at which I think the right to touch and stay is given. Then it is said that this may be done "in any rotation." I do not think that that carries the matter any further. When once the conclusion which I have indicated is arrived at, if the meaning to be given to those words is a meaning such that the vessel may take those ports in any order she pleases in a reasonable sense, nevertheless the ports referred to must still, in my opinion, be ports lying between Malaga and the port of destination, Liverpool, even although there might be justification for her not touching at any particular one of those ports, or more than one of them, in the exact order in which they would come in the voyage between those two places. It is not necessary to decide what effect should be given to those words "in any rotation;" but even giving to them the fullest possible effect they do not seem to me to enlarge the number of ports at which it would be justifiable for this vessel to touch during the course of her voyage. It is to be observed that the liberty which is given is not a liberty simpliciter to proceed to those ports. Purposes are mentioned; and the first which is mentioned is "for the purpose of delivering coals, cargo, or passengers." It is exclusively for the "delivering of coals, cargo, or passengers." It is true those words are followed by the words "or for any other purpose whatsoever;" but I am by no means satisfied that, when you find liberty given to proceed to certain ports "for the purpose of delivering" and "for any other purpose whatsoever," you must not put a limitation upon those words "any other purpose whatsoever," and that it would be legitimate to deduce from them the conclusion that there was authority to the shipowner to proceed to any of those ports for the purpose of taking in cargo as well as delivering it. It is impossible to conceive why there should be this mention of the delivery of cargo, as the thing first mentioned in dealing with the purpose for which the vessel might proceed to these ports, if she was to be at liberty either to take in or to discharge cargo; and it seems to me to throw light at all events upon the construction which ought to be put upon the language used, because the delivering of coals, cargo, or passengers points to the carrying out of a voyage already determined upon in relation to a cargo already on board. I do not put that before your Lordships as by any means the governing consideration, because I am led to the conclusion at which I have arrived upon the same grounds as those which have been so very clearly and fully expressed by the learned judges in the court below. I find myself so completely in agreement with the reasons which they have given that I do not think it necessary to trouble your Lordships with any further observation. I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord HALSBURY.—My Lords: I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me that, in construing this document, which is a contract of carriage between the parties, one must in the first instance look at the whole of the instrument and not at one part of it only. Looking at the whole of the instrument, and seeing what one must regard, for a reason which I will give in a moment, as its main purpose, one must reject words, indeed whole provisions, if they are inconsistent with what one assumes to be the main purpose of the contract. The main purpose of the contract was to take on board at one port, and to deliver at another port a perishable cargo. I do not think the learned counsel who argued this case on the part of the appellants gave sufficient effect in the argument which he addressed to your Lordships to the difference between the ordinary and formal parts of the document which are to be found in print and the written parts; indeed, I gathered from him at one time that he rather contested the legitimacy of considering the difference whether the words were in print or in writing. I suppose that that doubt which he appeared to intimate was justified by the terms of this particular document; because that in the ordinary construction of a commercial document such a principle as I have mentioned has been adopted certainly for something like a century cannot be a matter of doubt; and the reason for it appears to me to be very cogent and relevant to the case before your Lordships. I have in my hand the report of a case in the Court of King's Bench in the year 1803 (Robertson and another v. French, 4 East, 130), in which Lord Ellenborough, C.J., as it appears to me, gives with great precision the ground upon which one part of a document may be relied upon as controlling and cutting down the generality of the words in the other. His Lordship says: "In the course of the argument it seems to have been assumed that some peculiar rules of construction apply to the terms of a policy of assurance which are not equally applicable to the terms of other instruments and in all other cases. It is therefore proper to state upon this head that the same rule of construction which applies to all other instruments applies equally to this instrument of a policy of insurance, viz. that it is to be construed according to its sense and meaning as collected in the first place from the terms used in it, which terms are themselves to be understood in their plain, ordinary, and popular sense, unless they have generally in respect of the subject-matter, as by the known usage of trade or the like, acquired a peculiar sense distinct from the popular sense of the same words, or unless the context evidently points out that they must, in the particular instance and in order to effectuate the immediate intention of the parties to that contract, be understood in some other special and peculiar sense. The only difference between policies of assurance and other instruments in this respect is, that the greater part of the printed language of them being invariable and uniform has acquired from use and practice a known and definite meaning, and that the words superadded in writing (subject indeed always to be governed in point of construction by the language and terms with which they are accompanied) are entitled nevertheless, if there should be any reasonable doubt upon the sense and meaning of the whole, to have a greater effect attributed to them than to the printed words, inasmuch as the written words are the immediate language and terms selected by the parties themselves for the expression of their meaning, and the printed words are a general formality adapted equally to their case and that of all other contracting parties upon similar occasions and subjects." Now, if one applies the principle of what Lord Ellenborough there says to the present case, it seems to me that these particular documents which your Lordships are now construing were obviously intended to fulfil the function which the learned counsel himself very truly described; and there is no doubt, within the ambit of what the parties would contemplate, of the sort of voyage by which probably every one of the terms of the instrument which your Lordships are now construing would be satisfied; and for my own part I should imagine that where it was intended, at some of the distant ports referred to, to have a full and complete cargo taken on board, or that where they had intended from time to time to call at an intermediate port before going to the ultimate port to which the parties agreed, probably there is no one of the stipulations in this contract which would not receive its ample fulfilment. But when one applies it to the particular example of this case in which the parties have in writing expressed the intention that there should be a delivery of goods (and the particular class of goods is not to be omitted from consideration—they were perishable goods taken from one port to another) it seems to me that to apply these general printed words (which might in a particular case, as I say, receive complete fulfilment), as regards each of these stipulations, to the particular contract which the parties had immediately before them when they agreed to this contract as between carrier and customer, would manifestly defeat the very object which both the parties had in view. I also concur with the Lord Chancellor that the particular words which give the liberty are not to be rejected, not as in themselves forming a complete answer to the argument, but as forming part of that general consideration of the entire document which it is the duty of every court, so far as they can, to apply to a document under construction: and that appears to me again to refer to a liberty to deliver in the course of a voyage where the principal voyage has been agreed upon between the parties. Under these circumstances I do not desire to add anything, except to point out that Mr. Bigham's argument, very lucid and able as it was, did somewhat of injustice to Bowen, L.J.'s observation when he said that Bowen, L.J. had assumed something when he stated that it would make it impossible to insure the cargo if such a construction was adopted as was then insisted upon. "It would make it impossible," says Bowen, L.J., "to insure the cargo. It would make it impossible for the consignees of the cargo to know what to do as to taking delivery and to know what they were to do with the bills of lading." It seems to me that that which the learned counsel attributed to Bowen, L.J. he has been guilty of himself. If he assumes that the construction is that which he contends for, his answer that nevertheless business does go on would be good enough; but he seems to forget that the question which we are considering is whether that is the construction: because he must not first assume that that is the true construction and that business does go on nevertheless, which was his answer, but he must consider whether mercantile men when they do go on with business in this form do not recollect that a business sense will be given to business documents, and that therefore they are not under the peril of leaving it absolutely to the shipowner himself to do what he will with the cargo. Indeed the argument seems to me to assume this, that you might get rid of written documents altogether, inasmuch as both carrier and customer have such complete confidence in each other that, however wide and unreasonable may be the construction attributed to a written instrument between carrier and customer, they are not likely to disagree. If that is the argument, I am afraid that the records both of your Lordships' House and of all other courts do not favour that view. Undoubtedly both carrier and customer differ very widely sometimes as regards what is reasonable and what is not, and for that reason they call upon courts of law to construe sometimes somewhat loose and irregular instruments. For these reasons I agree in the motion which my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has made.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I agree.

Lord SHAND.—My Lords: I am also of opinion with your Lordships that this decision must be adhered to. It appears to me that, as it is clear that in this trade a number of perishable cargoes are constantly carried, that is a circumstance not to be lost sight of. In the Mediterranean undoubtedly in certain seasons of the year the main cargoes brought by these vessels are oranges, which are extremely liable to deterioration; and I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the reading which we have been asked to put upon this bill of lading is not only inconsistent with the object of the contract of carriage known to both parties, but would be entirely destructive of that object. I should like to add, with reference to a point which does not seem to have been discussed at all in the court below in regard to that clause of a bill of lading which speaks of the purpose for which calls may be made at the different ports, namely, that they may be "for the purpose of delivering coals, cargo, or passengers, or for any other purpose whatsoever," that while undoubtedly these words, as one looks at them in the first instance, would seem to suggest that it is the case of a vessel which has taken on board all her cargo and is proceeding to deliver her cargo as she goes onwards, yet I should feel great difficulty in restraining those words, in the sense which has been contended for, to the case of delivering cargo only in such a case as the present. I suppose it is notorious that in these voyages on the Mediterranean vessels call at one port after another for the purpose of taking in cargo, and if a case occurred in which a shipper has sent it may be a small portion of oranges or other goods on board a vessel which has got to fill up, I should have considerable difficulty in holding at the moment that the words used in the charter-party as to delivering a cargo might not fairly include receiving a cargo in the course of the voyage. But, my Lords, of course that question is not before the House now, and I do not think that anything which has been said upon that subject forms a ground of decision in this case. I entirely concur in the other ground stated by your Lordships which is so fully given in the judgment of the court below, and I agree that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for appellants, W. A. Crump and Son.
Solicitors for the respondent, Snow, Snow, and Fox.

May 1, Aug. 2 and 4, 1893.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords MACNAGHTEN and MORRIS.)

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD v. TURNER AND OTHERS. (a)

THE ZETA.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Damage—Collision with pier—Admiralty jurisdiction—County Court—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 4—Costs.

Shipowners successfully brought an action in personam in the High Court against a dock company to recover a sum within the limits of the County Court jurisdiction in Admiralty for damage occasioned to their ship by the negligence of the company's servants in bringing her into collision with a pierhead while moving from one dock to another.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that such damage was damage "by collision or otherwise" within the meaning of sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), and therefore, as the action might have been brought in a County Court, the judge at the trial had jurisdiction to deprive the plaintiffs of their costs.

The Ida (Lush. 6) and The Robert Pow (Br. & Lush. 99) disapproved.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R. and Lopes, L.J., Fry, L.J. dissenting), reported in 68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 40; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 237; (1892) P. 285, who had reversed a decision of Sir C. Butt, reported in 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 64; (1891) P. 216; 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 230.

The action was brought by the respondents, the owners of the ship Zeta, against the appellants in the Admiralty Division of the High Court, to recover damages for injuries sustained by the Zeta caused by a collision with an inner pierhead in a dock at Liverpool, the property of the appellants, and brought about, as was alleged and held, by the negligence of the servants of the appellants while moving the ship in the dock.

The plaintiffs' claim was for 221*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*

The learned President gave judgment for the plaintiffs, but refused to certify for costs, on the ground that the action might have been brought in the County Court under sect. 3 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), as amended by sect. 4 of the Amendment Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51). The plaintiffs appealed on this point, and the majority of the Court of Appeal reversed the decision of the President as to costs, on the ground that the County Court, sitting as an Admiralty Court, had no jurisdiction to entertain an action for damages for a collision between a ship and a pier.

The defendants appealed to the House of Lords.

T. G. Carver and Maxwell appeared for the appellants, and argued that the sole question was as to the Admiralty Jurisdiction of the County Court under the statutes of 1868 and 1869. The Court of Appeal laid down three propositions, which are, as we contend, all erroneous: First, that the County Court has, under the statutes, no wider jurisdiction in Admiralty than the High Court. Secondly, that the old jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court has not been extended by statute. Thirdly, that such a case as this was not within the old jurisdiction. As to the first proposition, the Act of 1868 by sect. 3 gives the County Court jurisdiction in cases of "damage by collision," and if that is to be construed as "damage by collision between two ships," the amending Act of 1869 by sect. 4 extends the jurisdiction to "damage by collision or otherwise,"

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

under which this case falls. It is to be observed that the wording is not that the County Court "shall have Admiralty jurisdiction" in certain cases, but that courts "having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, &c.," which is very different. The decisions on the Act of 1868 have tended to narrow the jurisdiction. In Everard v. Kendall (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428) it was held not to apply to barges. The Dowse (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 424; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 135), and Allen v. Garbutt (6 Q. B. Div. 165; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 520, n.) were cases of claims for necessaries. In Reg. v. Judge of the City of London Court (66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 135; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 140; (1892) 1 Q. B. 273) it was held that there was no jurisdiction to entertain an action against a pilot in respect of a collision. But see

Cargo ex Argos, 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 77; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 519; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 134; and
The Alina, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 257; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 517; 5 Ex. Div. 227;

on which we rely, where it was held that the County Court had jurisdiction where the Admiralty Court had not. The Act of 1869 clearly gave the County Court a jurisdiction which cannot be cut down. The words can have only one meaning, to which full effect should be given. On the second point the Admiralty Court had by the Act of 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65) jurisdiction conferred upon it for all damage received by ships. If the dock company had brought an action for damage done to the pier the court would have had jurisdiction: (see stat. 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 7.) The words "in the nature of" damage received by any ship are wide enough to cover everything, and have been so held. For instance, damages for collision with a sunken wreck, The Douglas (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 488; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 502; 7 P. Div. 151); with a lighter, The Sarah (Lush. 549); with a barge, Purkis v. Flower (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 40; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 114); with an anchor, The Rhosina (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 140; 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 30; 10 P. Div. 24 and 131); with a wall, The Industrie (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 446; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 17; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 303); inside a dock, Reg. v. Judge of City of London Court (8 Q. B. Div. 609); with a pier, The Uhla (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 148; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 89; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 29, n.). See also

The Sisters, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 36; 1 P. Div. 117;
The Malvina, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 341; Lush. 493; Br. & Lush. 57;
The Excelsior, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 151; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 87; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 268;
The Clara Killam, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 27; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 161;
The Albert Edward, 24 W. R. 179; 44 L. J. 49, Adm.

The Robert Pow (Br. & Lush. 99) is the only authority the other way, and that case cannot be reconciled with The Nightwatch (Lush. 542). See Williams & Bruce's Admiralty Practice, 2nd edit., p. 73. The Ida (Lush. 6) was relied on in the court below, but the ground of the decision there was that the collision took place in foreign waters. Thirdly, the Court of Admiralty had this jurisdiction before the Act of 1840. The ancient jurisdiction extended to all torts committed on the high seas. The old theory was, that every thing arising outside the jurisdiction of the common law courts fell within the Admiralty jurisdiction (4 Inst. 134), where cases which show what the Admiralty was actually doing in the exercise of its jurisdiction on the high seas are referred to. There were no regular Admiralty reports till the end of the last century, and the only information is from reports of cases of prohibition in the common law courts, but there is no case of a prohibition in respect of anything arising on the high seas. Among the older authorities are:

Sir H. Constable's case, 5 Rep. 106a;
3 Blackstone, Book III., p. 106;
Goodwin v. Tomkins, Noy, 148;
Martin v. Green, 1 Keb. 730, a collision case;
Sheers v. Martyn, 1 Keb. 789, a case of nuisance in a navigable river;
Cross v. Bigs, 1 Keb. 575;
Shepherd's Epitome (1656), p. 361;
Shepherd's Abridgment (1675), p. 128.

In Sir Wm. Burrell's Reports of Admiralty Cases (1758-1774) and Extracts from the Books and Records of the Courts of Admiralty and Delegates (1584-1839), edited by Marsden, cases are found which show what the ancient jurisdiction was:

Fairless v. Thorsen, Burr. 130;
Clarke v. Scattergood, Burr. 243, in 1663;
Tills v. The Mary, Burr. 284, in 1703.

See also the American case De Lovio v. Bait (2 Gallison, 398); The Hercules (2 Dodson, 353), per Sir W. Scott; and The Sylph (L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 24; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 37; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 519), per Sir R. Phillimore. The following are cases where the Admiralty Court has exercised jurisdiction in the case of torts committed on the high seas:

The Ruckers, 4 Ch. Rob. 73;
The Agincourt, 1 Hagg. Adm. 271;
The Lowther Castle, 1 Hagg. Adm. 384;
The Enchantress, 1 Hagg. Adm. 395;
The Beta, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 988; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 447.

The jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court has usually, of late times, been exercised in cases of maritime liens, which has given rise to the idea that it was the characteristic of the jurisdiction; but in early times the proceedings were usually in personam, not in rem.

J. Walton, Q.C. and Butler Aspinall, for the respondents, contended that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right. See, per Kay, L.J. in Reg. v. Judge of the City of London Court (66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 135; 7 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 140; (1892) 1 Q. B. 273), and the case of The Urania (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 156; 10 W. R. 97) there cited. The jurisdiction in personam was obsolete when the Act of 1840 was passed. See The Clara (Swa. Adm. 1), per Dr. Lushington in 1855, and Edwards' Admiralty Jurisdiction, 151. As to the points raised by the appellants: first, the Acts of 1868 and 1869 gave no extended jurisdiction to the County Courts, but only the jurisdiction preserved by the Court of Admiralty. This has been recognised in all the cases, including The Cargo ex Argos (ubi sup.) since 1870, and no alteration was made in the law by the County Court Acts and Rules of 1880 or 1888, but they left the law as interpreted by the previous decisions on the Acts of 1868 and 1869. Secondly, the Acts of 1840 and 1861, in speaking of "damage" by a ship, referred to the strictly technical meaning of damage by collision. The remedy in personam was obsolete; and the remedy in rem was all that was in the contemplation of the Legislature. See

The Robert Pow (ubi sup.). Such an action as this was unheard of in Admiralty in 1840. There is abundant authority that by the beginning of this century the remedy in personam was obsolete. See Brown's Lectures, p. 100, in 1802; and the first edition of Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice in 1868. See also The Volant (1 Wm. Rob. 383). The Admiralty Court seems to have attained its widest jurisdiction in the time of the Commonwealth, under the Ordinance of 1648, but that was set aside at the Restoration, and a Bill to the same effect which was introduced into Parliament was not passed. From the Restoration down to the time of Lord Stowell, the court did very little. This was a matter arising from the negligence of the dock master, who was on shore, and not on the high seas at all, and never could have been within the Admiralty jurisdiction. Nineteen judges have at different times expressed their approval of the decision in Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.), and the interpretation there put upon the Acts, which would be virtually overruled if this decision is reversed. The Cargo ex Argos, and The Alina (ubi sup.) only touch the contract of carriage. If the Admiralty jurisdiction already included all torts on the high seas, the words in the Act of 1861 were useless, but a fresh class of cases sprang up after that Act. The Court of Admiralty only exercised jurisdiction where it could proceed in rem against the ship if necessary. See Seward v. The Vera Cruz (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 474; 5 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 386; 10 App. Cas. 59), per Lord Blackburn.

Carver in reply.—It is a mistake to say that the jurisdiction under the Act of 1840 must be in rem. and that the jurisdiction in personam was obsolete. See The Henrich Bjorn (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 6 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 1; 11 App. Cas. 270); The Sara (61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 26; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 14 App. Cas. 209). The dictum in The Clara (ubi sup.) cannot be relied on. There might have been a proceeding in rem here, for there need not be an arrest of the wrong-doing res. The cases of pilots do appear to lay down that there is no general jurisdiction as to torts on the high seas; but The Urania (ubi sup.) was doubted by Sir R. Phillimore in The Alexandria (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 565; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 464; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 574). The words in the Act of 1840 are wide enough to give jurisdiction in this case.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Aug. 4.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell). — My Lords: The question in controversy between the parties to this appeal is whether the late learned President of the Admiralty Division (Sir Charles Butt) was justified in depriving the respondent of his costs, although he was successful in the action which he brought against the appellants, on the ground that the action might and ought to have been brought in the County Court. The sum in dispute is not large, but the question involved as to the extent of the County Court jurisdiction in Admiralty cases is one of general importance. The cause of action which the respondents established was that their vessel had sustained damage owing to a collision with the dock wall of the appellants, such collision being due to the negligence of the appellants' servants, whose orders the master of the vessel was at the time bound to obey. The amount sought to be recovered exceeded 200*l.*, and it is common ground that, unless the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts conferred jurisdiction on the County Courts to try the case, the respondent was not entitled to maintain an action in that court. It is contended, in the first place, on behalf of the appellants, that whether the action is one which it was competent for the Court of Admiralty to entertain or not, it is within the jurisdiction conferred upon the County Courts by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts. This depends upon the construction of sect. 3 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, as amended by sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869. I think it is impossible to read sect. 3 of the Act of 1868, in conjunction with the other provisions of that Act, without seeing that its purpose was to confer on certain County Courts the jurisdiction exercised by the Court of Admiralty, with a limit of amount exceeding that fixed in the case of common law actions. In my opinion it was not intended to do, and cannot reasonably be construed as doing, more than this. If this construction be correct, I think it follows that sect. 4 of the Act of 1869 has not any wider scope. Full effect can be given to the language used, without holding that it conferred upon the County Courts having Admiralty jurisdiction the power to try all claims for damage to ships, even though they were not cognisable by the Court of Admiralty, up to 300*l.* The decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Alina (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 517; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 257; 5 Ex. Div. 227) does not, I think, tend to establish the proposition that so extended a jurisdiction was conferred, or to impair the authority of the decisions as to the scope of sect. 3 of the Act of 1868. Sect. 2 of the Act of 1869, upon which that decision turned, provided that any County Court appointed at any time to have Admiralty jurisdiction should have jurisdiction to try and determine certain specified causes. The fourth section, which is now in question, provides merely that sect. 3 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 shall "extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*" I need not more fully explain the reasons which have led me to the conclusions I have indicated, agreeing, as I do, with the views expressed as to the construction of the statutory provisions now in question by the Court of Appeal in the case of Reg. v. The Judge of the City of London Court (66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 135; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 140; (1892) 1 Q. B. 273.

The appellants, however, insist that the present case is one within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. They contend, in the first place, that such jurisdiction was conferred by sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1840. That section is in the following terms: "And be it enacted, that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to or damage received by any ship or seagoing vessel, or in the nature of towage, or for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or seagoing vessel, and to enforce the payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas, at the time when the services were rendered or damage received, or necessaries furnished, in respect of which such claim is made." The words "damage received by any ship or sea-going vessel" are certainly as wide as could well be conceived, and, regarding the language of the statute alone, apart from other considerations, I do not think it would be possible to entertain a doubt that the present case was within it. In the year 1861, by sect. 7 of 24 Vict. c. 10 (the Admiralty Court Act 1861), it was enacted that the Admiralty Court should have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship. The construction of this section has frequently come before the courts. It was first considered in the case of The Malvina in the year 1862 (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 341; Lush. 493). This was an action by the owner of a barge against the owners of a steamer for damage sustained by the former owing to a collision. There was a plea to the jurisdiction upon the ground that the barge was not a ship or sea-going vessel, and that the collision took place within the body of a county. It was held by the Court of Admiralty that the Act of 1861 conferred jurisdiction to entertain the suit, and this decision was affirmed by the Privy Council (Brow. & Lush. 57). In the case of The Uhla (L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 29, n.), and more fully reported in 3 Mar. Law Cases, O. S. 148, a cause of damage by the Falmouth Dock Company for injury done to a breakwater by driving against it, was held to be within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. The same decision was arrived at in the case of The Sylph (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 519; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 37; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 24), where the diver had received personal injuries by being struck with a paddle-wheel. It is not necessary to trouble your Lordships with all the cases. It is enough to say that the proposition that the Act of 1861 applies to damage done by a ship to persons and things other than ships has been well established by many authorities, the correctness of which I see no reason to question. It would be a strange result if, in the case of a ship striking against a dock wall, the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction to entertain a claim for damage done to the dock wall by the ship and not for damage done to the ship by its contact with the dock wall. It is said, however, and truly, that the words "damage received by any ship" in the statute of 1840 have received a more limited construction than the words "damage done by any ship" in the Act of 1861, and the respondent naturally relies upon the decision of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Robert Pow in the year 1863 (Brow. & Lush. 99). That action was brought in respect of the damage sustained by a vessel which took the ground owing to the negligence of the steam-tug which was towing her. Dr. Lushington called attention to the fact that there was no collision of any kind between the two vessels, and laid down that the word "damage" in the statute must be taken, according to the well-understood meaning of the phrase in the Admiralty Court, to be confined to damage done by collision. He stated that the purpose of the section was to extend the ordinary jurisdiction of the court to waters within the body of a county. It is to be observed that he also said that for a similar reason the court could not proceed under sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, inasmuch as "damage meant there as in the former statute, damage done by collision." If he meant, as apparently he did, damage done by collision between two ships, the view he expressed as to the Act of 1861 has not been followed. The learned judge himself decided the contrary in the case of The Uhla. In his judgment he said that he had been somewhat staggered by the case cited of The Robert Pow, but on looking at it he found it did not affect the case then before him. The learned counsel for the appellants impeached the decision of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Robert Pow. They contended, in the first place, that the ample words of the statute of 1840 ought not to be controlled in the manner suggested, so as to limit their application to damage caused by collision; and, in the next place, that the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, in relation to matters arising on the high seas, was not confined to claims for damage arising from a collision between two vessels. The case now before your Lordships was elaborately and fully argued, and a review of the judicial opinions bearing on this contention, to which the learned counsel called attention, is enough to show that the questions to be determined are by no means free from difficulty or doubt. It is impossible to reconcile all the opinions which have proceeded from the Bench from time to time, and in the present case Fry, L.J., differing from the two other members of the Court of Appeal, agreed with the late President of the Admiralty Division. I think it will be convenient, in the first place, to consider whether the proposition which formed the basis of Dr. Lushington's judgment, in the case of The Robert Pow, that cases of damage by collision (by which, as I said, I think he meant collision between two ships) were alone within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty at the time the statute of 1840 became law, can be maintained. I may observe at the outset that it is difficult to understand—if "damage" had, as suggested, a well-understood meaning sufficient to authorise, or, indeed, render necessary, a restriction of the words "damage received" in sect. 6 of the Act of 1840—why a similar restriction of the words "damage done" in the Act of 1861 was not equally requisite. As I have already pointed out, the learned judge did, in his judgment in the case of The Robert Pow, state that the same restriction ought to be applied in construing both statutes, but as regards the statute of 1861 he afterwards deliberately receded from this position. The case of The Sarah (Lush. 549) was decided by the same learned judge in the year previous to the decision of the case of The Robert Pow, and the law laid down was certainly very different. In that case a schooner was damaged by a collision with the keel Sarah. The owner of the keel appeared under protest to the jurisdiction, the objection being that the Sarah was not a ship or boat; that the court had therefore no jurisdiction under the Act of 1861, and that it could not entertain the suit under its ordinary jurisdiction. Dr. Lushington said: "The court has original jurisdiction, because the matter complained of is a tort committed upon the high seas. It is not necessary to refer to any statute, and it is immaterial whether the vessel doing the damage was a sea-going vessel; immaterial also by what means it was navigated." The protest was accordingly dismissed. It seems to me impossible to reconcile this statement of the law, and the decision, in this case with the ratio decidendi in the case of The Robert Pow, for it is difficult to see why if the court had inherent jurisdiction to deal with damage caused to a ship through its coming into contact with a keel, damage resulting to a ship from its being forced into contact with the ground should be outside its jurisdiction. It is said that in the case of The Ida (Lush. 6), decided in 1860 (two years before The Sarah), Dr. Lushington stated the law very differently. The facts of that case were peculiar. The master of a Danish ship moored at Ibraila, outside an English ship, cut the latter adrift, whereby she collided with a barge containing part of her cargo, belonging to Turkish owners. Dr. Lushington held that the court had no jurisdiction, the cause being between foreigners as to acts done in a foreign river, and, further, that the act complained of was not due to the ship proceeded against, but to the wholly unwarrantable act of her master, a foreigner in a foreign port. So far, the decision is quite irrelevant to the point under discussion; but Dr. Lushington, in the course of his judgment, said: "The court, it must be remembered, has never exercised a general jurisdiction over damage, but over causes of collision only, and this is no collision in the proper sense of the term." If I am to estimate the relative weight of these conflicting statements of the law, it seems to me that the view expressed in the later case of the Sarah is more important and authoritative. It was the ground, and the sole ground, upon which the court assumed jurisdiction and rejected the protest. It may not have been necessary to go the length of asserting jurisdiction in the case of damage caused by all torts committed upon the high seas, but it was essential that the jurisdiction should cover something more than damage caused by collision between ships. When I turn to prior authorities (and I have examined every one which the researches of the learned counsel brought to the notice of the House), I can find no authority which supports the limitation of the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty laid down in the case of The Ida and The Robert Pow. I do not propose to examine with any minuteness all the authorities which were cited, or to dwell upon the controversy which was carried on between common law judges and the Court of Admiralty as to the extent of the jurisdiction of that court. It is certain that attempts were made to encroach upon the functions of the common law courts, and to entertain suits relating to matters arising, not upon the high seas, but within the body of a county. On the other hand, it is by no means clear that the courts of common law did not sometimes seek, by means of prohibitions, to oust the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court in matters which were lawfully within its functions. In the eighth year of James I. complaint was made to the king by the Lord High Admiral concerning prohibitions granted to the Court of Admiralty, and the complaint, with the answers of the judges, are to be found in the Fourth Institute. The answer to the first complaint is in these terms: "We acknowledge that of contracts, pleas, and querels, made upon the sea, or any part thereof which is not within any county (from whence no trial can be had by twelve men), the admiral hath, and ought to have, jurisdiction." And in the third volume of Blackstone's Commentaries the law is thus stated: "Admiralty Courts have jurisdiction and power to try and determine all maritime causes; or such injuries, which, though they are in their nature of common law cognisance, yet being committed upon the high seas, out of the reach of our ordinary courts of justice, are therefore to be remedied in a peculiar court of their own. . . . As the courts of common law have obtained a concurrent jurisdiction with the court of chivalry with regard to foreign contracts, by supposing them made in England, so it is no uncommon thing for a plaintiff to feign that a contract, really made at sea, was made at the Royal Exchange, or other inland place, in order to draw the cognisance of the suit from the Courts of Admiralty to those of Westminster Hall." There can be no doubt that after the fiction was introduced to which Blackstone refers, any jurisdiction which the court may have previously exercised in relation to contracts made upon the high seas fell into disuse, and it would be outside the present purpose to inquire what jurisdiction the Court of Admiralty possesses in relation to contracts. Your Lordships are at present only concerned with its jurisdiction as regards torts. The fiction to which reference has been made was made use of not only in cases of contract, but also in those cases of tort which were in their nature transitory. This may be supposed to account for the fact that torts committed on the high seas came for adjudication for the most part to the common law courts at Westminster, but it seems certain that the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court in cases of tort was not confined in practice to those which involved a collision between two ships. In the case of The Ruckers (4 Ch. Rob. 73), decided in 1801, the cause of damage was in respect of a personal assault by the master of the vessel on a passenger. The libel was admitted after objection. The registrar having been directed to look into the practice of the court, he reported that he had searched the records as far back as 1730; that many instances were to be found of proceedings on damage on behalf of persons described as of the ship's company against officers or others belonging to the same ship; and several against persons belonging to other ships; that there were other instances of proceedings on the part of A. B. against C. D. without any specification of the capacity in which the person stood. Sir William Scott, who spoke of the action as being "in a cause of damage," said that, looking to the locality of the injury, that it was done upon the high seas, it seemed to be fit matter for redress in that court; that if research had shown that the precedents had been only such as related to persons in the capacity of mariners he should have been unwilling to appear to extend the jurisdiction, though perhaps unable to assign any legal ground for such a limitation but having regard to the report of the registrar, he received the libel. There have been since that date several cases in which damages have been awarded to seamen in respect of assaults and ill-treatment by the master. Three such cases decided by Lord Stowell are reported in 1 Haggard's Admiralty Reports: (The Agincourt, 1 Hagg. Adm. 271; The Lowther Castle, Ib. 384; The Enchantress, Ib. 395.) These cases seem to show that the word "damage" had not, in the practice of the Admiralty Court, invariably the limited meaning attributed to it by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Robert Pow, and that the jurisdiction of that court was not confined within the narrow limits suggested.

The views expressed by Lord Stowell in the case of The Hercules (2 Dodson, p. 371) are also important. That was a proceeding to obtain restitution of the proceeds in the hands of the Court of Admiralty of property which had been piratically taken. Sir William Scott delivered himself thus as to the jurisdiction of the court: "Now, that this court had originally cognisance of all such wrongs, in short, of all transactions, civil and criminal, upon the high seas, in which its own subjects were concerned (and the present parties complained of are so described), is no subject in controversy, for all history of English law supports it. In the reign of King Henry VIII. (28 H. 8, c. 15) its criminal jurisdiction was in a great part removed by statute to a mixed commission, where it still continues to reside. But that was the only part so removed. All the civil authority remained as before, for neither that statute nor any other affected it. All practice of its civil authority since that enactment proves the existence of the same practice before, for nothing occurred to give it new powers. All theory regarding the constitution of the court establishes the conclusion that it must have been so." In addition to cases of personal damage by assault, and the case which I have just referred to, Mr. Marsden's edition of Sir William Burrell's reports supplies a record of two other cases, which appear to me of considerable importance (pp. 243, 284). I am not quite sure that I appreciate the doubt which the Master of the Rolls seems to cast upon the authority of the decisions so recorded, or the manner in which he deals with them in his judgment in the present case. One of the decisions (Clarke v. Scattergood, Bur. 243) so recorded by Mr. Marsden is a sentence made in a suit by the owners of the Warewell against the owners of the Susan, to recover damage for injury to the Warewell and her cargo by the anchor of the Susan, which was unbuoyed, and upon which the Warewell grounded as she lay at anchor in the Thames. The other (Tills v. The Mary, Bur. 284) is a case in which the owners of the Hopewell and her cargo obtained decree against the Mary for their loss by grounding upon the anchor of the Mary, which was unbuoyed. These cases appear to me to indicate the exercise by the Court of Admiralty of jurisdiction in cases of damage received by ships from their collision with foreign objects, owing to the wrongful acts of the owners of those objects. In these cases the injury appears to have occurred in the Thames, but I do not see that this could have conferred jurisdiction if it would not have existed in case the disaster had happened outside territorial waters. Some light is, I think, thrown upon the question of Admiralty jurisdiction by a study of the cases in which prohibitions were issued by the common law courts. They were frequently granted upon the ground that the wrong complained of arose not on the high seas, but within the ordinary jurisdiction of the common law; but no case was cited to your Lordships in which a prohibition had been granted to restrain the exercise of jurisdiction by the Admiralty Court in relation to a wrong committed on the high seas. It is not necessary in the present case to determine the bounds of the jurisdiction exercisable by the Court of Admiralty as regards torts committed on the high seas. It is enough to say that I cannot regard it as established that in the year 1840 its jurisdiction in the case of damage received by a ship was limited to damage received by collision with another vessel. I can find no ground, either on principle or authority, for such a limitation. Nor is it necessary to decide whether the Court of Admiralty possessed jurisdiction in a case similar to the present prior to the Act of 1840, supposing the damage had been sustained upon the high seas. For the reasons I have stated I have come to the conclusion that it is impossible to maintain the proposition that the word "damage" was, according to the well understood meaning of the phrase in the Admiralty Court, confined to damage due to collision between two ships. This proposition was the sole justification alleged, and I can see no other for giving to the language of that statute the very restricted interpretation adopted by Dr. Lushington. Even if its operation, when the words are construed according to their natural meaning, be to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in the case of damage received by a ship upon the high seas, there is nothing in the frame of the enactment to indicate that this was not the intention of the Legislature, though, no doubt, its chief object may have been to extend the jurisdiction which existed in the case of damage received by ships upon the high seas to damage received in the body of a county. It does not provide in terms for an extension to cases where the occurrence is within the body of the county of the jurisdiction which would exist if the occurrence had been upon the high seas; but it gives jurisdiction in certain cases "whether the ship was within the body of the county or upon the high seas." It is to be observed that the learned judges who formed the majority in the court below concurred in thinking that the 4th section of the County Courts Act 1869 only conferred jurisdiction on the County Courts where the Court of Admiralty already had jurisdiction. Yet that statute extends the jurisdiction of the County Courts, under the Act of 1868, "to all claims for damage to ships by collision or otherwise." If the decision that the operation of the enactment in the Act of 1869 is thus limited be sound, it would be difficult to conceive a more emphatic declaration of the Legislature that the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction in cases of damage to ships other than those arising from collision. I do not think it necessary to discuss the case of Reg. v. The Judge of the City of London Court (ubi sup.) or other cases in which it was held that the Court of Admiralty had not jurisdiction to entertain a suit for damage caused by the wrongful act of the pilot. In that and the other cases relating to suits instituted in respect of the negligence of pilots, stress was laid on certain considerations which do not touch the case with which your Lordships have to deal, and I agree with Fry, L.J. in thinking that the decision in Reg. v. The Judge of the City of London Court was not decisive of the present case. At the same time I am, of course, aware that the views which I have expressed conflict with some of the broader grounds upon which the Master of the Rolls based his judgment in that case, and the fact that I am thus differing from that learned judge has made me consider the matter all the more anxiously. I ought to notice one argument which was regarded as of weight by two of the learned judges in the court below. It was said that no disaster similar to that which gave rise to the present action could have occurred on the high seas, and that therefore the Court of Admiralty could not have had jurisdiction in such a case, and has not now jurisdiction by virtue of the statute of 1840, when the occurrence takes place within the body of a county. I am unable to entertain this view. I think that a vessel might by the negligence of the owner of a fixed object come into collision with it and thus sustain damage. Such cases are quite conceivable, although, of course, not likely frequently to occur. The argument that, according to the rule of the Court of Admiralty, where both parties are in fault the damage is divided, and that this rule could not well be applied where a vessel is damaged by collision with a dock wall, appears to have weighed a good deal with the court below. But it appears to me that the difficulty would be precisely the same where the damage was caused by the ship and not received by it, as for example in the case of The Uhla (ubi sup.) and other of the cases cited, and yet the suggested difficulty has not prevented the numerous decisions to which I have alluded, in favour of a construction of the Act of 1861 similar to that now contended for in the case of the Act of 1840. The true answer probably is, and it would be of equal weight in both cases, that the rule referred to has never been applied except in the case of a collision between two ships. But, however, this may be, the argument cannot, I think, prevail against the language of the statute when construed in the light of the practice of the Court of Admiralty and the principles upon which its jurisdiction is founded.

For the reasons I have given I have come to the conclusion that the present action might have been maintained in the County Court, and that the judgment of the late President of the Admiralty Division must therefore be restored. This appeal is presented by the appellants not by reason of the amount of stake, but because it is a matter of importance that the jurisdiction of the County Courts in this class of cases should be established. Under the circumstances, although the respondent must of course pay the costs in the Court of Appeal, I think your Lordships may properly order that there be no costs in this House. I am glad to say that Lord Morris, who is unavoidably absent, entirely concurs in this judgment.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: The action, out of which this appeal arises, was brought against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board for damage to a vessel alleged to have been occasioned by the negligence of the dock officials. While under their orders the vessel was injured by striking against the wall of the pierhead at the entrance to the Nelson Dock in Liverpool. The action was brought in the Admiralty Division of the High Court. The amount claimed was above the County Court limit for ordinary civil actions, but below the limit for Admiralty cases. The trial took place before the late President, Sir Charles Butt. His Lordship found in favour of the plaintiff, but he gave no costs, on the ground that the action might have been brought in the County Court. In dealing with the costs his Lordship, it is admitted, intended to exercise any and every discretion vested in him, either by the General Orders, or by sect. 9 of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), if that section was to be treated as still in force. On appeal, as to costs, Lord Esher, M.R. and Lopes, L.J. (Fry, L.J. dissenting) held that the action could not have been brought in the County Court, and therefore that the President was not justified in depriving the plaintiff of his costs. The majority of the court held (1) That in regard to damage to ships, County Courts having Admiralty jurisdiction had no larger jurisdiction than the Court of Admiralty; and (2) That the action was not one that the Court of Admiralty itself could have entertained. The second point was discussed at length in the judgment of the Court of Appeal. The first was taken to be concluded by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Reg. v. Judge of the City of London Court (66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 135; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 140; (1892) 1 Q. B. 273). In that case the action was brought on the Admiralty side of the City of London Court by the owners of a barge against the pilot of a steam-vessel under compulsory pilotage, to recover compensation for damage by a collision in inland waters, alleged to have been caused by the pilot's negligence. The Court of Appeal held that the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction to entertain an action in personam against a pilot in respect of a collision between two ships on the high seas caused by the pilot's negligence, and that consequently no County Court could have such jurisdiction under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts 1868, 1869. To the decision itself, as it seems to me, no exception can be taken. But I do not think that it can be treated as governing the present case. To say nothing of the authorities which are tolerably clear against the right to sue a pilot for negligence in the Court of Admiralty, the considerations applicable to the two cases are, I think, materially different. The main subject of discussion before your Lordships was the question whether the Court of Admiralty, at the time when the Act of 1868 was passed, had jurisdiction in such a case as that which gave rise to the plaintiffs' action. I do not propose to trouble you by tracing the history of Admiralty jurisdiction from the reign of Richard II., or even by commenting upon any of the numerous cases which the industry of counsel produced. The arguments on the one side and the other are stated in the judgments of Lord Esher, M.R., and Fry, L.J.; and the authorities have been very fully discussed by the Lord Chancellor. Speaking for myself, I think that the question is one of no little difficulty, and I doubt whether it is possible to come to an absolutely clear opinion one way or the other. But on the whole I am disposed to agree with Fry, L.J. In language which was probably intended to remove all difficulties, and difficulties which, as Dr. Lushington said in the case of The Malvina (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 341; Lush. 493), continually occurred from the words of the statute of Richard II. (15 Rich. 2, c. 3), the Act of 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65) defined the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty on the high seas as well as within the body of a county. It enacted that the court should have jurisdiction, among other things, to decide all claims and demands whatsoever for damage received by any ship or sea-going vessel, whether such ship or vessel might have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time when the damage was received. And then the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) declared that the court should have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship. There was, therefore, at the time when Admiralty jurisdiction was given to County Courts legislation in force which seems to have been intended, as Fry, L.J. observes, "to give reciprocal rights in cases of damage done by a ship and to a ship," and in both those cases, as his Lordship pointed out, and as the Lord Chancellor has now more fully shown, it had been determined that it was not necessary that the body receiving or doing damage should be a ship. Then came the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71); and that Act was followed in the next year by the Amendment Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), which is to be read and interpreted as one Act with the Act of 1868.

It cannot, I think, be disputed that if at the time of the passing of the County Courts Admiralty Acts of 1868 and 1869 the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction to entertain such an action as the present, the jurisdiction within the prescribed limit of value was transferred to County Courts having Admiralty jurisdiction. If the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in such a case as that under consideration were more doubtful than I think it is, there would still, perhaps, be something to say in favour of the view that County Courts have by statute that jurisdiction within the prescribed limit of value. Sect. 4 of the Act of 1869 says that sect. 3 of the Act of 1868 shall extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise. Why should not those words have their proper and natural meaning? In the present case there is damage to a ship. The ship has been damaged otherwise than by a collision, taking "collision" to mean collision between two vessels. Why should the language of sect. 4 be cut down to the limits of Admiralty jurisdiction, recognised as in actual operation at the date of the Act, even if those limits could be ascertained precisely? Even if it were a doubtful question whether such a jurisdiction was possessed by the Court of Admiralty, if it were a matter of difficulty, as everybody, I think, must now admit it to be, after the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the present case, why should we reject the plain and ordinary meaning of words which we find in the statute, which may have been intended to put an end to difficulties and doubts on the subject, especially when it is considered that in all matters in which ships and sailors are concerned, it is of extreme importance that any litigation should be disposed of promptly, and on the spot? I agree with Fry, L.J. that no difficulty is caused by the Admiralty rule as to common negligence. That rule, apparently, has never been applied except in cases of collision between ships. In the result I am compelled to hold that this action might have been brought in the County Court, and that the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to interfere with the order made by the President as to the costs of the action before him.

Order appealed from reversed; judgment of the Admiralty Division restored; respondent to pay the appellants' costs in the Court of Appeal: no costs in this House; cause remitted to the Admiralty Division.

Solicitors for the appellants, Rowcliffe, Rawle, and Co., for A. T. Squarey, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondent, Botterell and Roche.

Monday, Nov. 20, 1893.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords WATSON, HALSBURY, ASHBOURNE, MACNAGHTEN, and BOWEN, with NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.)

OWNERS OF THE LANCASHIRE v. OWNERS OF THE ARIEL.

THE LANCASHIRE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Fog—Duty to stop and reverse—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.), reported in 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 352; 69 L. T. Rep. N. S. 250, and (1893) P. 47, affirming a judgment of Barnes, J.

On the 10th June 1892 a collision took place in the English Channel, near the Owers Lightship about 8. p. m., in a fog, between the steamships Lancashire and Ariel. The Ariel was primarily in fault for the collision, but the learned judge before whom the case was tried held that the Lancashire was also in fault, and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The owners of the Lancashire appealed.

Sir R. Webster, Q.C., Bucknill, Q.C., and Bateson, appeared for the appellants.

Sir W. Phillimore, Pyke, Q.C., and Miller for the respondent.

Their LORDSHIPS, without calling on the counsel for the respondent, affirmed the judgment of the Court of Appeal upon the facts, without deciding any question of law; on the ground that, under the circumstances, the Lancashire ought not only to have stopped, but to have stopped and reversed to avoid risk of collision.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Pritchard and Sons, for Bateson, Warr, and Bateson, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondent, W. A. Crump and Son.

Nov. 28 and 30, 1893.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords ASHBOURNE, MORRIS, and BOWEN, with NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.)

OWNERS OF THE SARAGOSSA v. WESTOLL AND OTHERS.

THE SARAGOSSA. (a)

Collision—Overtaken vessel—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 20.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.), reported in 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

289; 68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 400, affirming a judgment of Sir. F. Jeune, President of the Admiralty Division.

On the 16th Dec. 1891, about 3 a.m., a collision took place off Lowestoft between the steamships Saragossa and Ambient, by which the latter was sunk.

The learned judge before whom the case was tried found the Saragossa solely to blame for the collision, and his judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

The owners of the Saragossa appealed.

Sir W. Phillimore and Laing appeared for the appellants.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Miller for the respondents.

Their Lordships, without calling on the counsel for the respondents, affirmed the judgment of the Court of Appeal upon the facts of the case, without deciding any question of law.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Botterell and Roche.
Solicitor for the respondents, C. E. Harvey.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, July 18, 1893.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.)

The Oriental Steamship Company Limited v. Tylor and another. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Advance freight — Payment on signing bills of lading—Duty of charterer to present bills for signature—Loss of ship—Refusal to present bills—Damages.

By a charter-party it was agreed that the ship was to load a cargo of coals and deliver the same "on being paid freight on bills of lading quantity . . . one-third on signing bills of lading and the remainder on unloading in cash . . . the captain or agents to sign bills of lading for weight put on board as presented to him according to railway or dock company's weight without prejudice to the tenour of the charter-party, and without any alteration within twenty-four hours after coals on board." The ship was loaded and had just sailed when she met with an accident and sank. The charterers had not at that time presented any bills of lading for the captain's signature, and afterwards refused to present any. In an action by the owners against the charterers,

Held, that there was an implied obligation on the charterers to present bills for the captain's signature immediately the ship was loaded, and by not doing so they had committed a breach of their duty under the charter-party in respect of which the owners were entitled to damages, the measure of damages being the advance freight which they would otherwise have obtained.

Smith, Hill, and Co. v. Pyman, Bell, and Co. (64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 436; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 7; (1891) 1 Q. B. 742) distinguished.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Pollock, B. at the trial of the action without a jury at the Guildhall.

The action was brought by the owners of the ship Fidele Primavesi against the charterers to recover advance freight payable under the charter-party.

By the charter-party the ship was chartered to proceed to Cardiff and there load a cargo of coals, and, being loaded, should sail to Barcelona and there deliver the same.

On being paid freight on bills of lading quantity less 3 per cent. in lieu of weighing at and after the rate of 11*s.* 3*d.* per ton . . . the freight to be paid as follows: One third on signing bills of lading less 3 per cent. for interest, insurance, &c., and the remainder on unloading in cash . . . captain or agents to sign bills of lading for weight put on board as presented to him according to railway or dock company's weight without prejudice to the tenour of this charter-party and without any alteration within twenty-four hours after coals on board, or to pay 20*l.* per day for each day's delay; all liability of charterers to cease as soon as they have shipped the cargo and paid advance freight and loading demurrage (if any) . . . trimming charges, cost of bunker coals, dispatch money, charters' share of brokerage and difference of re-charter (if any) are payable on signing bills of lading, ship lost or not lost.

The ship was accordingly loaded with a cargo of coals at Cardiff, the loading being completed by 5.30 p.m. on the 11th Aug. The captain then went to the defendants' office to sign the bills of lading, but he was told that the bills were not yet made out, because the charterers wanted to know further details as to where the coals had been loaded. At about 6 p.m. the ship broke ground, and at about 6.30 p.m. she holed herself with her anchor, and she sank in the dock. The captain was not on board when the accident happened, and on asking for the bills of lading a second time at about 6.30 he was again told that they were not ready.

After hearing that the ship had sunk, the charterers refused to present any bills of lading for the captain's signature, and the plaintiffs consequently brought the present action to recover the advance freight which they would have earned but for the defendants' refusal to present the bills of lading for signature.

The action was tried before Pollock, B. without a jury, and the learned judge held that the case was concluded by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Smith, Hill, and Co. v. Pyman, Bell, and Co. (64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 436; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 7; (1891) 1 Q. B. 742) and accordingly he gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Bigham, Q.C. and H. T. Boyd, for the plaintiffs.—The advance freight was due as soon as the ship was loaded. There is no doubt that under this charter-party it was the duty of the charterers to prepare the bills of lading and present them to the captain for signature. The charterers were not excused from doing this by the sinking of the ship, and the plaintiffs are therefore entitled to damages for the breach of duty committed by the charterers, the measure of damages being the advance freight. Smith, Hill, and Co. v. Pyman, Bell, and Co. (ubi sup.) is distinguishable because there there was no obligation to pay advance freight until the owners had exercised their option, which they had not done when the ship was lost.

(a) Reported by E. Manley Smith, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J. E. Bankes (Pyke, Q.C. with him) for the defendants.—There was no contractual duty at all on the charterers to present the bills of lading for the captain's signature, either express or implied. In a case like the present between the owners of a ship and the charterers a bill of lading is nothing but a receipt, and therefore in this case, as the freight could be calculated at any time from the railway or dock company's weights (which under the charter-party are binding), no bill of lading was necessary at all. But supposing that the charterers were bound to present bills of lading, then it is submitted that they had twenty-four hours, or at least a reasonable time in which to do so. Before that time had elapsed the ship had sunk, and the charterers were no longer under any obligation to present bills.

Lord Esher, M.R.—This is an action by the owners of a ship against the charterers. Now, the only contract between them is the charter-party, and the bills of lading, as between them, are no part of their contract, but merely a receipt for the goods put on board. A bill of lading given by the shipowner in accordance with the charter-party does by mercantile law contain certain terms of the contract, which the charterer is able to hand on to the assignee of the bill of lading. The terms of the bill of lading may, by reference, be written into the charter-party, just as in the present case some terms of the bills of lading are to be read into this charter-party and become part of it. By the charter-party the goods are to be shipped at Cardiff, upon certain terms as to loading, and the freight is to be at the rate of 11*s.* 3*d.* per ton upon the weight, according to the bill of lading. Therefore the weight mentioned in the bill of lading is to be read into the charter-party, and is the charter-party weight; therefore the amount cannot be arrived at until the bill of lading has been signed by the master, i.e., until the bill is in existence. That being so, if there was nothing in the charter-party about advance freight, no freight would be earned till the cargo was delivered at Barcelona; then the freight payable would depend on the weight given in the bill of lading; so that, in order to carry out the terms of the charter-party, it is necessary that there should be a bill of lading signed by the master. Now the master cannot draw up a bill of lading just as he likes, he must sign the bill as it is presented to him if it is in accordance with the terms of the charter-party. Now, the bill of lading is to be used by the charterers and assigned to someone else. It is for them to name the consignee. Under this charter-party they may present either one bill of lading for the whole cargo or several bills for different parts of it as they choose. As the bills are to be used by the charterers and are to be drawn up for the cargo in as many portions as they wish, that shows that it is their duty to present them. Moreover, in this case the charterers are to bring the coals from the mine to the ship and have them loaded, and by the terms of the charter-party the weight of coal is to be determined by the railway or dock company. It is not the captain's duty here to see what weight is put on board his ship. In ordinary cases the owners and shippers do the weighing of the goods jointly, but here the shipper alone weighs the cargo. That shows that the number of bills must be settled by the charterers in this case, and therefore the charterers must present them. The first step with regard to the bills of lading in this case is to be taken by the charterers, who must present them either to the master or the agent for signature. Which of those two was to sign was a matter for the option of the shipowners.

Then comes the question, within what time were the bills of lading to be signed? The time is to be calculated, not from the sailing of the ship, but from the loading of the cargo. The captain has authority to sign bills of lading only in respect of cargo which he has taken on board. Bills of lading are almost invariably signed before the ship sails, because in ordinary cases the captain is the only person who can sign them. Here, however, the bills may be signed either by the captain or agents. The time then for signing the bills is to be calculated from the loading of the ship, and the charter-party provides that the ship "being loaded shall sail," that is to say when loaded she must sail immediately. The time of sailing may make the greatest difference as regards the insurance, so that the duty of the captain, when his ship is loaded, is to sail at once or within a reasonable time, having regard to the weather. If there were no obligation here as to advance freight, then the bills ought to have been presented, before the ship sailed. But the charter-party provides that one-third of the freight is to be paid in advance, that is to say, it is payable before the arrival of the ship at her destination. From the moment advance freight becomes payable, it cannot be insured by the shipowner. It is due at that moment, and the liability of the person from whom it is due does not depend whether or no the ship arrives at her destination or upon any vicissitude of the voyage. But the person who is liable to pay the advance freight can insure it. In the present case the charterers are to present the bills of lading, and so they point out the time when the advance freight is to become due. The charterers could not insure the advance freight after the ship had been lost, because there would be no risk. The intent of the parties was that advance freight should be payable at a time when the charterers could insure it. The charterers were to present the bills of lading for signature almost immediately after the ship was loaded, and the sailing and loss of the ship had nothing to do with the matter. The owner could not get the advance freight until the bills of lading were signed, but he was entitled to have the bills presented for signature within twenty-four hours of the loading so as to enable him to obtain the advance freight. The charterers did not present the bills at the time they ought to have done, and now say that since the ship is lost they are not liable for the advance freight. I am of opinion that they are liable, because they did not present the bills of lading in due time, and so prevented the captain from obtaining a right to the advance freight. Having broken their contract in not presenting the bills of lading within the agreed time, they are liable in damages for the breach, and the measure of damages is the amount of advance freight which the owners would have obtained but for the charterers' breach. It was argued that the plaintiffs were bound to show that the captain was ready and willing to sign, but there is nothing in the case tending to show that he was not. I think that the appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems clear to me that under this charter-party it lay upon the charterers to present bills for signature, either to the captain or the agents, and so much was scarcely disputed. But it was said that the ship being lost before a reasonable time had elapsed within which the bills could be presented, it was then too late to sign, and the duty of the charterers to present ceased to exist. The matter depends on the construction of the terms of this charter-party as interpreted by the light of mercantile law. Let us consider what are the exact functions of a charter-party and of bills of lading. When a shipowner enters into a charter-party with the charterers of his ship, the terms of the contract of carriage are contained in the charter-party, and the primary use of a bill of lading is as a receipt given to evidence the reception of particular goods on board the ship for carriage under the charter-party. But it is obvious that the charter-party may make some further use of the bill of lading, and the parties may agree that the bill of lading shall serve some further purpose than as a mere receipt. In the case of this particular charter-party the bill of lading is intended to serve for other purposes as well as a mere receipt, and by observing what those purposes are you get at the answer to the questions that have here arisen. Now, in the first place, the bill is to fix the weight of the goods upon which the freight is to be paid. The captain, or agent, is to sign bills for the weights put on board according to the railway or dock companies weights, and on those weights mentioned in the bills of lading, the freight is to be paid under the charter-party. But besides this, the signature of the bills is designated by the charter-party as the moment at which certain other rights were to arise. Advance freight was to become payable on the signing of the bills. Then, too, certain other charges became payable at the same moment. Then, again, the cesser clause came into force as soon as the cargo was shipped and advance freight and loading demurrage (if any) paid, the advance freight, as I have said, being payable on the signing of the bills. So that the bills are not to be treated in this case merely as receipts, but as documents causing certain sums of money to become payable, and causing certain other rights to arise or cease.

Now, it is the duty of the captain to sign the bills. It is perfectly plain that his doing so depends on the bills being first properly made out and properly presented for signature, and those are matters in which the charterers have to take the first step. Is it conceivable that the rights which are given to the shipowners on the signing of the bills of lading can be delayed by the charterers by not presenting the bills? It is obvious that there must be implied in the charter-party an obligation, in order to make the contract effectual, that the charterers should present bills of lading to the captain, and they cannot, by declining to present, repudiate any liability. It is also clearly implied, as it seems to me, that the charterers must present the bills of lading within a reasonable time, so as to enable the owners to enforce their rights. The matter falls within the general rule that, where the contract between the parties cannot be carried out unless some tacit understanding is implied, the law will imply that understanding so that the contract may be carried out. That being so, the only question left is, can the charterers say that their obligation to present the bills within a reasonable time ceases to exist if the ship is lost before they have presented the bills? I think they cannot, and for this reason: The loss of the ship is not a thing that, as between the plaintiffs and defendants, affects the validity or commercial importance of the bills of lading. The bills are not the contract of carriage, but they are something more than a mere receipt of the goods. The provision in the charter-party as to the advance freight, and as to its payment on the signing of the bills of lading, is in itself an answer to the argument that the bills serve no useful purpose but as a receipt. That distinguishes the case from Smith, Hill, and Co. v. Pyman, Bell, and Co. (ubi sup.). That case turns altogether on words which are not present in this charter-party. There the advance freight was to be paid "if required," so that there was no advance freight payable nor right to have bills signed, but merely an option given to the shipowner to require payment of advance freight. On that ground the Court of Appeal held, that the loss of the ship determined the case, because it determined the option. Here there is no option given, the right is not optional, but absolute, though it is subject to the condition of the signing of the bills of lading. Here the loss of the ship did not prevent the bills being presented and signed, and the loss is therefore immaterial. I agree that the plaintiffs are entitled to damages for the defendants' breach of contract, the measure being the advance freight which they would otherwise be entitled to. The appeal will be allowed.

Kay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is essentially different from Smith, Hill, and Co. v. Pyman, Bell, and Co. (ubi sup.). There advance freight was only to be paid "if required," and there are no such words in the charter-party in this case. The whole of the decision in that case turned on those two words, because the advance freight was not in fact required till after the ship had been lost. It was then held by the Court that the option could not be exercised because the charterer could not, after the loss, insure the freight. Nothing of that kind occurs in the present case; but the words in the charter-party which are relied on in order to bring the case within Smith, Hill, and Co. v. Pyman, Bell, and Co. (ubi sup.) are these: "Freight to be paid as follows: one-third on signing bills of lading less 3 per cent. for interest, insurance, &c., and the remainder on unloading, in cash." Now, assuming that those words are conditional, they are so only in this sense, that if the captain or agents had refused to sign the bills when presented, the condition would not have arisen. It is plain from the rest of the words of the charter-party that the charterers are the persons who are to present the bills of lading for signature. The charter-party says: "The captain or agents to sign bills of lading for weight put on board as presented to him according to the railway or dock company's weight." I agree that there is no express agreement by the charterers that they will present the bills of lading to the captain or agents, but I think that the true meaning of the charter-party is that there is an implied obligation on the charterers to make out and present bills of lading according to the tenor of the charter-party to the captain or agents in order that, by the bills being signed by the captain or agents, the owners may become entitled to be paid advance freight. The bills of lading not having been in fact presented at the time when the ship sank the question arises whether it was then too late for the captain to require bills to be presented to him. The captain pressed for bills, but the ship having sunk the charterers refused to present any. Is the sinking of the ship any excuse for the conduct of the charterers? It seems to me that it did not release them from any liability they were then under to present bills of lading to the captain for signature. There was no option to be first exercised by the owners, the one-third freight was absolutely due unless the captain had refused to sign. That is the distinction between this case and Smith, Hill, and Co. v. Pyman, Bell, and Co. (ubi sup.) The charterers, by refusing to present bills of lading to the captain for signature, committed a breach of their contract to do so, and the measure of damages which they must pay by reason of this breach is the amount of advance freight to which the plaintiffs would have been entitled but for the breach. I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, W. A. Crump and Son.

Solicitors for the defendants, Ince, Colt, and Ince, agents for Ingledew and Sons, Cardiff.

July 24, 25, and Aug. 11, 1893.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., BOWEN and KAY, L.JJ.)

HANNAY AND OTHERS v. SMURTHWAITE AND OTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice—Parties—Joinder of plaintiffs—Action of contract—Actions arising out of the same transaction—Joinder of causes of action—Order XVI., r. 1—Order XVIII., rr. 1 and 8.

The plaintiffs were, separately, shippers of bales of cotton on the defendants' ship on a certain voyage, and took for their shipments bills of lading which were separate from one another, but each of which contained a provision exempting the defendants from loss or damage arising from obliteration of marks on the bales. On the arrival of the ship, the plaintiffs claiming to act under Order XVI., r. 1, joined in an action against the defendants for short delivery.

Held, by Lord Esher, M.R. and Kay, L.J. (Bowen, L.J. dissenting), that the plaintiffs were entitled to join their claims in one action, subject to the power of a judge under Order XVIII., r. 8, to order that if the case of any one plaintiff could not conveniently be tried with those of the other plaintiffs, such case should be tried separately from the others.

THIS was an appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division (Day and Collins, JJ.) directing a stay of proceedings in the action until the plaintiffs should elect which of their claims should be proceeded with.

The action was brought by sixteen plaintiffs, who were shippers and consignees of eight lots of marked bales of cotton shipped in the defendants' steamship Castleton at Galveston in Texas for carriage to Liverpool.

The ship arrived at Liverpool, and the greater part of these bales of cotton were duly delivered to the consignees thereof, and as to these there was no dispute. As to the remaining bales, there were eighteen the marks on which had been obliterated, and it could not be discovered to which of the various consignees these various unmarked bales belonged.

The shippers and consignees thereupon joined their claims for short delivery in the present action. In their statement of claim they gave the marks on each bale alleged not to have been delivered, and claimed the sum of 287*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.* in respect of thirty-three bales alleged by them to have been delivered short.

The defendants stated in their defence:

That if any part of the cotton mentioned in the bills of lading were not delivered (which was denied), the same was never shipped on board the vessel, and that all cotton shipped or received for shipment on board the vessel was duly delivered; that if any bills of lading or other documents were signed or given by the master of the vessel for a greater quantity of cotton than was delivered, the same were signed or given in respect of cotton which was not shipped or actually on board, or delivered into the steamer's custody alongside the quay within reach of her tackle, and the master had no authority from the defendants to sign the said bills of lading, and the defendants are not bound by them; that if the said bills of lading were signed or given, it was provided thereby that the carrier should not be liable for loss or damage occasioned by causes beyond his control or breakage . . . or for insufficiency or absence of marks, numbers, address, or description, or for accidental obliteration thereof; that if any of the said bales of cotton were not delivered the same was occasioned by the causes herein mentioned.

That the agents in Liverpool of the charterers of the vessel, before action, tendered to the plaintiffs eighteen bales which were discharged from the vessel without marks, and the plaintiffs refused to receive the same, whereupon the agents, with the plaintiffs' consent, sold the said bales, and, before action, without admitting liability, paid to the plaintiffs the following sums (which were set out), and the defendants say that the sums so paid are sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim, if any.

A summons was taken out before the Liverpool district registrar to have all the plaintiffs struck out except one. This summons was referred to the judge at chambers, and Mathew, J., at chambers, refused to make an order to strike out any of the plaintiffs, being of opinion that they could all be joined under Order XVI., r. 1, and that the defendants were not embarrassed thereby.

On appeal to the Queen's Bench Division, the Court (Day and Collins, JJ.) reversed the decision of Mathew, J. holding that the plaintiffs ought to have sued separately in separate actions, and they therefore ordered a stay of proceedings in the action until the plaintiffs should elect which of their claims should be proceeded with.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Order XVI., which is headed "Parties," provides by rule 1:

All persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative. And judgment may be given for such one or more of the plaintiffs as may be found to be entitled to relief, for such relief as he or they may be entitled to without any amendment.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Order XVIII., which is headed "Joinder of Causes of Action," provides:

Rule 1. Subject to the following rules of this order, the plaintiff may unite in the same action several causes of action; but if it appear to the court or a judge that any such causes of action cannot be conveniently tried or disposed of together, the court or judge may order separate trials of any of such causes of action to be had, or may make such other order as may be necessary or expedient for the separate disposal thereof.

Rule 8. Any defendant alleging that the plaintiff has united in the same action several causes of action which cannot be conveniently disposed of together, may at any time apply to the court or a judge for an order confining the action to such of the causes of action as may be conveniently disposed of together.

July 24 and 25.—Finlay, Q.C. and Carver for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled under Order XVI., r. 1, to join as plaintiffs in one action. Their claims all arise out of one and the same transaction, and the evidence in each case, if they were tried separately would be the same. There is nothing in the rules which prevents the plaintiffs joining, and it might cause injustice if the defendants were allowed to take each plaintiff in detail. If there should be any inconvenience in trying any one claim with all the others, a separate trial for that case may be ordered under Order XVIII. There are several cases in which persons having different causes of action have been allowed to join as plaintiffs:

Booth v. Briscoe, 2 Q. B. Div. 496;
Ayscough v. Bullar, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 471; 41 Ch. Div. 341;
Arnison v. Smith, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 206; 41 Ch. Div. 98;
Burstall v. Beyfus, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 542; 26 Ch. Div. 35.

They referred also to

Forster v. Lawson, 3 Bing. 452;
Gort v. Rowney, 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 817; 17 Q. B. Div. 625; Sandes v. Wildsmith, 69 L. T. Rep. N. S. 387; (1893) 1 Q. B. 771.

Bigham, Q.C. and Pickford for the defendants.—The plaintiffs' claims arise out of wholly separate, though similar, contracts. There is no case in which plaintiffs claiming on separate contracts have been allowed to join. In Booth v. Briscoe (ubi sup.) there was only one document, a libel, sued on. In Ayscough v. Bullar (ubi sup.) there was only one document, a covenant in a lease, sued on. Burstall v. Beyfus (ubi sup.) was not decided on Order XVI., r. 1. It is not enough to bring a case under the rule that the causes of action are historically connected. If the rule were meant to be as wide as it is contended so as to allow any number of plaintiffs, all with different causes of action, to join as plaintiffs in suing one defendant it would have been drawn in much clearer terms than it is. Even if the plaintiffs are entitled to join under Order XVI., it is submitted that this is a case in which the court ought in the exercise of its discretion to order separate trials.

Finlay, Q.C. replied. Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the defendants are shipowners, who put up their vessel in a foreign port as a general ship for the purpose of loading cotton to be carried to Liverpool. Shipments of cotton were made by several different shippers on several bills of lading. All the bills of lading were in similar terms, and each shipper received a bill stating the number of bales shipped by him, with their marks, and containing a stipulation that the owners were not to be liable for the loss or damage arising from the obliteration of any of the marks. The ship then sailed and arrived at Liverpool. On her arrival it was found that though many of the bales could be delivered to the shippers according to their marks, the number of bales to be delivered according to the bills was short. There were a number of bales which on arrival had no marks on them but there were not enough of these unmarked bales to satisfy all the shippers who required delivery according to their bills. The shippers and consignees then joined as plaintiffs in bringing an action on their bills of lading against the shipowners for short delivery. The owners wish to show that every bale delivered on to the ship was brought to Liverpool, and they say that, if they can do that, they have an answer to all the plaintiffs. Their defence would be to each shipper, either that he had not put on board the bales in respect of which this action was brought, or, that if they were put on board, the owners, after delivering to the shipper all those of his bales which were properly marked, had enough unmarked bales to satisfy the rest of the plaintiff's claim. If the owners could make the plaintiffs bring separate actions for their claims, they would say to each "I have enough unmarked bales to satisfy your claim," and they would say that no evidence would be admissible in any one of their actions as to their having used the same bales to defend the other actions. So that if the shippers sued separately these unmarked bales would be used by the owners as a defence against each shipper or consignee. The same evidence would be given in each separate action, and the result would be a great waste of time and money. Now the question that we have to decide is whether that must happen, or whether the court can say that under the rule the plaintiffs may rightly join in bringing one action. A difficulty might arise if the defendants had a different defence against one plaintiff from that which they wished to put forward as against the others; but if, in the case of any particular plaintiff, any inconvenience in the trial should arise from that cause, that case can be separated from the others and tried alone. Except in that event there can be no difficulty in trying all the cases together. Therefore the matter presents itself to me thus: are we obliged by the rules to say that the defendants have an absolute right to compel all these plaintiffs to sue separately? Now, there is no doubt that the plaintiffs' causes of action are all separate because they are founded on separate contracts. The first rule which we have to apply is Order XVI., r. 1. [His Lordship read the rule.] It seems to me that this case comes within the very words of that rule, but I do not like to construe practice rules according to their mere words if to do so would lead to what, in business matters, would be an absurdity. Large as are the words of this rule, I think that, if the plaintiffs' causes of action are not only separate, but perfectly distinct, they should be tried separately; but, if all the causes of action arise out of the same transaction, then I think that "all persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative."

That construction gives rise to the question, whether in this case there is sufficiently one transaction to bring the matter within the rule. The real ground of all the claims is the conduct of the owners of a particular ship on a particular voyage with regard to one and the same stipulation contained in bills of lading on that voyage. It seems to me that there was one transaction which has given different rights to the different people who have entered into that one transaction with the owners. That is the construction which I put on Order XVI., r. 1, which, it is to be observed, is modified, and perhaps explained, by Order XVIII., r. 8. [His Lordship read the rule.] Rule 1 of the same order provides that the plaintiff may unite in the same action several causes of action; but, if it appear to the court or a judge that any of such causes of action cannot be conveniently tried or disposed of together, the court or judge may order separate trials of any of such causes of action to be had, or may make such other order as may be necessary or expedient for the separate disposal thereof. These rules certainly refer to the "plaintiff," but, as under Order LXXI., r. 2, "the singular number shall include the plural," the word may be read as "plaintiffs." Any injustice or inconvenience, therefore, which may arise through my reading of Order XVI., r. 1, is met by the provisions of Order XVIII., rr. 1 and 8. If the court or a judge should come to the conclusion that the defendants in this case really mean to try and prove a short shipment by any one of the plaintiffs, and that this is a genuine defence, and that that particular defence against that particular plaintiff cannot be fairly tried at the same time as the cases of the other plaintiffs, then the court or a judge can order that particular case to be tried separately from the other plaintiffs' cases. But, if there would be no injustice or inconvenience in trying all the cases together, they would then be all tried together. That, I think, is the right course to be taken both from a business point of view and from the view of the rules. There is nothing contrary to this in what Lord Selborne said in the case of Burstall v. Beyfus (ubi sup.); he was speaking there of a different rule from that which we have to decide on now. I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be allowed, subject only to this: though the plaintiffs have the right of joining in this action, yet, if the defendants can prove to the satisfaction of the court or a judge that it would be unjust or inconvenient in the way I have mentioned that the case of any particular plaintiff should be tried at the same time as the others, they may get an order that that case shall be decided separately.

BOWEN, L.J.—This case depends on the true construction of Order XVI., r. 1. The question is a difficult one, and I cannot say that I entirely agree with the Master of the Rolls. The divergence is not great, but I must say that I differ slightly on the construction of the rules. It seems to me that this order was not intended to allow a writ to be issued with any number of plaintiffs and defendants. A writ of summons is not like an omnibus into which anyone may get as it goes along. The question is, how far the joinder of plaintiffs is permitted by the rule, and what limitation, if any, exists, and is to be read into the rule, and if so, what is the true construction of such limitation. The rule cannot, I think, be really understood without considering its history as well as its language. Before the Judicature Act the law on this point was pretty clear. In the case of a contract all persons with whom the contract was made should join as plaintiffs, and no person could join simply because he was injured by a breach of a contract of another person. As to torts, the law may be summed up as follows: All persons having a joint interest might sue jointly; persons having a separate interest and separate damage had to sue separately; persons having a separate interest and joint damage might sue either separately or jointly. An instance may be found in the case of the dippers at Tunbridge Wells (Weller v. Baker, 2 Wils. 414), which is referred to in the note to Coryton v. Lithebye in 2 Wms. S. 116, where the learning on this subject before the Judicature Act is collected. Another case which throws light on this point is Forster v. Lawson (ubi sup.). In the case of a libel upon partners, if the damage was separate they could not join as plaintiffs in one action, but they could do so if the damage was caused to them in the way of their trade. That, I understand, was the state of the law before the Judicature Act, but I think I ought also briefly to mention the rules as to joinder of plaintiffs under the Common Law Procedure Acts 1852 and 1860. By sect. 34 of the Act of 1852 nonjoinder and misjoinder of plaintiffs might be amended before trial. As regards joinder of causes of action, as distinct from joinder of parties sect. 41 provided that "causes of action of whatever kind, provided they be by and against the same parties and in the same rights, may be joined in the same suit; but this shall not extend to replevin or ejectment." There these two things were kept quite distinct, namely, the constitution of the suit which depended on the joinder of parties, and the law as to joinder of causes of action, assuming that by right joinder of parties the suit was properly constituted. Then came the Common Law Procedure Act 1860. The words of sect. 19 are very important: "The joinder of too many plaintiffs shall not be fatal, but every action may be brought in the name of all the persons in whom the legal right may be supposed to exist." It still remained the theory of the law that a legal right was necessary for the action, and that it must be supposed to exist in the names of certain persons. The section then goes on: "and judgment may be given in favour of the plaintiffs by whom the action is brought, or of one or more of them, or, in case of any question of misjoinder being raised, then in favour of such one or more of them as shall be adjudged by the court to be entitled to recover." The effect of this was that a plaintiff could not be defeated by his having brought the action in the names of too many plaintiffs; but this was subject to a qualification, of which Bellingham v. Clark (1 B. & S. 332) and Stubs v. Stubs (1 H. & C. 257) are leading instances, namely, that the misjoinder would be fatal if inconsistent with the cause of action, that is to say, neither in contract nor in tort could a plaintiff be joined who had not the required interest or damage such as I have already referred to. That state of things still left possibilities of injustice and miscarriage; a plaintiff might still be defeated by a difficulty in showing in which plaintiff out of several the cause of action existed. Then came Order XVI. Rule 1 keeps the same subdivision as there was under the Common Law Procedure Acts, and it begins with the constitution of the action as to joinder of parties. Then Order XVIII. deals with the joinder of causes of action. The framers of Order XVI., r. 1, did not mean that any number of plaintiffs might join against one defendant any number of causes of action whether separate or connected. If that had been meant the rule would have been framed in a very different way; it might for instance have said that all persons may be joined as plaintiffs who choose to join. But the rule has been drawn in a very different way and seems to me to have been drawn on the same lines as previous legislation. It still keeps in sight the distinction between an action and a cause of action. The way in which rule 1 has been drawn shows what was intended by it. It says that all persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom "the" right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist. There are two things in the rule which differentiate it from any such general rule as I have suggested might have been made. One is the use of the word "the," which shows that the rule is drawn on the lines of sect. 19 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1860, and the other is the addition of the words "whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative." Those last words would be unnecessary if the intention was that the rule should enable any number of plaintiffs to sue any number of defendants on any number of causes of action. These two things in rule 1 denote that it is concerned solely with the identity of the relief claimed by the various plaintiffs. I do not know that the view I have expressed differs much from what the Master of the Rolls has said as to reading into the rule a necessity for identity of transaction. If by that is meant this, that the transaction must be the same, the question being merely who possesses the cause of action and to whom did the damage accrue, I do not know that there would be much difference between the view of the Master of the Rolls and mine. But if "transaction" is used in its popular sense, meaning that if the plaintiffs rely on the same evidence there is only one transaction, then there is a difference between us. I think there must be identity in everything except as to the question which plaintiff has the right to sue.

That being my view of Order XVI., r. 1, is it affected by Order XVIII.? Order XVIII. only refers to the joinder of causes of action, it does not enlarge earlier legislation as to the proper constitution of an action in respect of parties. I therefore do not think it enlarges the effect of Order XVI. But I will now consider the cases on the subject. The first is Booth v. Briscoe (ubi sup.). Up to that time the law as regards libel stood thus: If there was no joint interest or damage a number of persons could not be joined as plaintiffs, but partners could sue jointly for a libel on them in the way of their trade because the damage would be joint. In Booth v. Briscoe (ubi sup.) there was one libel upon a number of trustees in regard to the management of their trust. The libel reflected on them personally, but not in the way of their trade or business. The case was just outside the law as it stood before the Judicature Act. The publication of the document was one transaction. the question was as to using it as a cause of action. Bramwell, L.J. and the present Master of the Rolls thought that the case fell within Order XVI., r. 1, the plaintiffs claiming to be entitled to relief in respect of this document either jointly, severally, or in the alternative. The fact that each trustee had a separate cause of action in respect of one document was held not to take the matter out of the rule. In Gort v. Rowney (ubi sup.) there was no decision on this point, but the same minor divergence arose as in the present case, and the Master of the Rolls and myself travelled to the same conclusion on somewhat different lines. Then there is the important judgment of Lord Selborne in Burstall v. Beyfus (ubi sup.). There the cause of action against one defendant was wholly disconnected from the cause of action against the other defendants except so far as it arose out of an incident in the same transaction, and it was held that there was a misjoinder, the case not being one contemplated by Order XVIII. Lord Selborne emphasises the distinction which I have endeavoured to state between the objects of Order XVI., r. 1, and Order XVIII., r. 1. He said this: "To bring into one claim distinct causes of action against different persons, neither of them having anything to do with the other (and only historically connected in the way I have suggested) is not contemplated by Order XVIII., r. 1, which authorises the joinder, not of several actions against distinct persons, but of several causes of action." Then there is also the case of Sandes v. Wildsmith (ubi sup.), in which the Divisional Court took the same view. Under these circumstances the question arises, taking the view which I adopt of the meaning of "one transaction," whether there is in this case one transaction upon which the plaintiffs are entitled to sue together. In my view there is not "one transaction," although there are several things in common to all the plaintiffs. All the goods carried were bales of cotton; they all came together in one ship. But the goods of the various plaintiffs came under different contracts of carriage, and the case of each plaintiff depends on how far as against him the shipowners can show that the quantities in his bill of lading are wrong as to the shipments at the port of loading. It seems to me that the success of each plaintiff depends on that, and to my mind it would be productive of confusion rather than otherwise if the plaintiffs joined, and put all their contracts into one writ. I am afraid that doing this would lead to laxity on the part of the jury. Therefore I must say I am not pressed by any of the suggestions of mischief that might possibly occur in this case. The view which I hold of the effect of these rules, I entertain strongly, and I have therefore thought it right to express it clearly.

KAY, L.J. delivered the following written judgment.—A number of persons, who shipped cotton on the same ship for a particular voyage and took separate bills of lading for their several shipments, describing the bales shipped by each by different marks, have joined in this action against the shipowner for not delivering to each of the plaintiffs the cotton shipped by him. The Divisional Court has stayed the action "on the ground that the various plaintiffs hereto should have brought separate actions in respect of their respective claims." The first question is, whether such an action can be instituted under the General Orders. Order XVI., r. 1, is one of a group headed "Parties. 1. Generally." "All persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative; and judgment may be given for such one or more of the plaintiffs as may be found to be entitled to relief, for such relief as he or they may be entitled to, without any amendment." Rule 4 of the same order in like words provides: "All persons may be joined as defendants against whom the right to any relief is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative; and judgment may be given against such one or more of the defendants as may be found to be liable according to their respective liabilities without any amendment." Rule 11 enables the court or a judge at any stage of the proceedings to strike out the names of any parties improperly joined as plaintiffs or defendants. Standing alone, I should be of opinion that, notwithstanding the use of the word "severally" in rule 1, these rules did not authorise the joining under one writ of different causes of action, either by one or more plaintiffs against one or more defendants. They relate only to parties, not to causes of action, and this seems to me made clear by rule 11. Besides, in rules 1 and 4 the same expression is used, "the right to any relief," which seems rather to point to one cause of action in which several plaintiffs or several defendants may be jointly, severally, or alternatively interested. But then follows Order XVIII., r. 1. This order is preceded by the words "Joinder of causes of action." "Subject to the following rules of this order, the plaintiff may unite in the same action several causes of action; but, if it appear to the court or a judge that any such causes of action cannot be conveniently tried or disposed of together, the court or judge may order separate trials of any of such causes of action to be had, or may make such other order as may be necessary or expedient for the separate disposal thereof." Order LXXI., r. 2: "In these rules, unless repugnant to the context, the singular number shall include the plural and the plural number shall include the singular." Therefore "the plaintiff" in Order XVIII., r. 1, may be read "the plaintiffs" unless the context forbids. There is nothing repugnant to this in the context. Indeed, any other construction would involve the absurd consequence that, if two or more plaintiffs were suing for one cause of action, they could not join another, although one plaintiff might do so. Order XVIII., r. 1, does not say "one plaintiff" or even "a plaintiff," but "the plaintiff," which includes the plural "the plaintiffs." The latter part of the order, expressly enabling the court or a judge to require separate trials of each cause of action, or to make such other order as may be necessary or expedient, prevents any possibility of abuse. Moreover, Order XVIII., r. 8, enables any defendant to apply to the court or a judge to confine the action to one or more of the causes of action included in it. Order XVIII., r. 1, is substituted for sect. 41 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, which provided that "causes of action of whatever kind, provided they be by and against the same parties and in the same rights, may be joined in the same suit." The words "provided they be by and against the same parties and in the same rights" are omitted in Order XVIII.; and the omission would seem to show that under this order they need not be by or against the same parties or in the same rights. It may be suggested that the object of Order XVIII., r. 1, is only to enable several plaintiffs, who together initiate an action under Order XVI., when such action is properly constituted under that Order, to add other causes of action. But that is not the form of Order XVIII. It reads, the plaintiffs "may unite in the same action several causes of action." I confess I am inclined to give the widest effect to this rule which its words permit. The object is to prevent the necessity of a number of separate actions when the matters in dispute can conveniently be tried together. If several plaintiffs were so ill-advised as to unite perfectly separate causes of action against the same or different defendants, the court or a judge could, and doubtless would, correct this under rule 1 or 8 of Order XVIII. at the cost of such plaintiffs. But there may be several causes of action so connected that a great part of the evidence required may be common to them all, or for some other reason it may be convenient or a saving of expense to try them together; and I am inclined to hold that, according to the fair construction of these rules, they are intended to enable this to be done.

The authorities have not settled this question. In Smith v. Richardson (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 256; 4 C. P. Div. 112) Denman, J. adopts a note from Wilson's Judicature Acts: "Order XVI. dealing with parties assumes an ascertained subject matter: Order XVII. (now XVIII.) dealing with subject-matter, assumes ascertained parties. There must, therefore, either be identity of subject-matter, in which case Order XVI. gives ample liberty in the choice of parties; or identity of parties, in which case Order XVII. gives a like liberty in choice of subject-matter." Lord Selborne, in Burstall v. Beyfus (ubi sup.), says that Order XVIII., r. 1, authorises the joinder, not of several actions against distinct persons, but of several "causes of action." The case decides that a defendant against whom the plaintiff had a distinct cause of action could not be joined in an action by the plaintiff against another defendant where the separate causes of action were only historically connected. If the cases of Booth v. Briscoe (ubi sup.) and Gort v. Rowney (ubi sup.) are to be read as intimating an opinion that several causes of action by different plaintiffs can be joined under Order XVI., r. 1, alone, I should with all respect differ from that opinion. But under that rule, coupled with Order XVIII., r. 1, there is more reason for holding this to be possible. In Sandes v. Wildsmith (69 L. T. Rep. N. S. 387; (1893) 1 Q. B. 771) I do not find any reference to Order XVIII., r. 1.

If this be the true effect of the rules, there still remains the question how the discretion given to the Court by Order XVIII., rr. 1 and 8, should be exercised in this case. The full number of bales represented by all the bills of lading together, it seems, were not shipped. Of those actually shipped, some were landed having no marks upon them. These have been sold, and their proceeds divided among the several shippers rateably. This seems to have been done by arrangement, without prejudice to the claims of the holders of the bill of lading against the shipowner. There is, after all, a deficiency or short delivery on each bill of lading. The result would seem to be that there is a primâ facie liability to the holder of each bill of lading. It is argued that, if several actions were brought they might be defeated in detail by saying to each plaintiff, "Your bales were among those that had no marks." But before the shipowners could be heard to say that, they must prove that some of the unmarked bales did belong to the particular shipper, and that the marks have been obliterated. Unless they could do this, the onus being entirely upon them, they could not defeat the action. However, I do not think that there will be any inconvenience, and there may be some advantage and saving of expense, in trying the several causes of action in this case together. There is a complication arising from the circumstance that the goods mentioned in each of these bills of lading were similar—that is to say, bales of cotton—that they were shipped in the same ship, and that each plaintiff is interested in the question whether the missing bales were or were not part of his shipment. It seems to me, therefore, that the best course will be to allow this action to proceed, subject always to the power of the judge under Order XVIII., r. 1, to direct separate trials, or to make such other order as may be necessary or expedient for the separate disposal thereof.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Wynne, Holme, and Wynne, for Forshaw and Hawkins, Liverpool.

Solicitors for defendants, Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., for Hill, Dickinson, and Co., Liverpool.

Friday, June 30, 1893.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., BOWEN and KAY, L.JJ.)

BENTSEN v. TAYLOR, SONS, AND CO. (a)

Charter-party—Description of position of ship—"Now sailed or about to sail"—Condition precedent.

By a charter-party it was agreed that the plaintiff's ship should, after discharging homeward cargo, proceed to Quebec and there load a cargo for the United Kingdom for the charterers, the defendants. At the date of the charter-party the owner and charterers knew that the ship was at or had just left Mobile, and she was described in the charter-party as "now sailed or about to sail from a pitch pine port." The ship did not in fact sail from Mobile till nearly four weeks after the date of the charter-party. The charterers refused to load the ship at Quebec. In an action by the owner against them for this breach of the charter-party:

Held, that the description of the ship as "now sailed or about to sail" was a substantive part of the contract, and that its accuracy was a condition precedent, the breach of which entitled the charterers to treat the contract as at an end.

Held also, that, as a fact, the charterers had waived the performance of the condition precedent, and that therefore the plaintiff was entitled to judgment in his action, and the defendants were entitled to damages sustained by reason of the delay in the sailing of the ship.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial.

By a charter-party dated March 29, 1892, and made between the plaintiff as owner of the ship Folkvang and the defendants as charterers, it was agreed that the ship, described as "now sailed or about to sail from a pitch pine port to the United Kingdom," should "after discharging homeward cargo with all convenient speed sail and proceed to a good and safe loading place as may be directed by the charterers at Quebec," and there load a timber cargo for the United Kingdom.

At the date of the charter-party the plaintiff and defendants knew that the ship was at or had just left, the port of Mobile and was going to Greenock. The Folkvang did not leave Mobile till the 23rd April, and of this the defendants were aware on the 16th May.

The ship arrived at Greenock on the 5th June, sailed for Quebec on the 18th June, and arrived there on the 7th Aug., when the defendants refused to load her.

Between May 16 and June 21 there was some correspondence between the plaintiff and defendants with regard to the delay in the ship's leaving Mobile.

The action was brought by the plaintiff in respect of the defendants' refusal to load the ship, and was tried before Pollock, B., with a jury, and the defendants obtained a verdict and judgment.

The plaintiff moved for judgment or a new trial.

Pyke, Q.C. and Hodges for the plaintiff.—The description of the ship as "about to sail" is not a representation of a fact; it cannot be more than a promise that she will sail shortly, and such a promise is at most a warranty and not a condition precedent the non-performance of which would entitle the defendants to repudiate the contract. It is too vague an expression to be construed as a condition. No particular date is named for the sailing, and the proper date must be a matter of contention. "Where terms are so lax and ambiguous as to lead to a difference of opinion, then the stipulation is not a condition precedent:"

Tarrabochia v. Hickie, 1 H. & N. 183.

The non-performance of this stipulation does not go to the whole root and consideration of the contract, and therefore it is not a condition precedent:

Davidson v. Gwynne, 12 East, 331.

The following cases were also referred to:

Behn v. Burness 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 207; 3 B. & S. 751;
Constable v. Cloberie, Palmer, 397;
Clipsham v. Vertue, 5 Q.B. 265;
McAndrew v. Chapple, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 556; 2 Mar. Law Cas. 339; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 643; Corkling v. Massey, 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 636; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 395; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 18.

If this stipulation was a condition precedent, the defendants by their letters and conduct have waived it, and cannot now treat the breach of it as putting an end to the contract.

Bigham, Q.C. and Carver for the defendants.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action by the owner of a ship against the charterers for damages for refusing to load the ship at Quebec. The charter-party speaks of the ship as "now sailed or about to sail from a pitch pine port to the United Kingdom." The charterers say that the truth of that description in the charter-party is a condition precedent to their loading of the ship, and as the condition was broken they were not bound to load. The owner says that it was not a condition precedent at all, but only a representation that has no contractual effect either as a condition precedent or as a warranty. That is a dispute as to the true construction of this document, and the decision of that dispute is a matter for the judge; the jury have nothing to do with the question of the construction of the contract. The court must know the facts of the case at the time when the contract was made, and when these facts have been determined by the jury the court will proceed to construe the agreement. Now, the facts are not in dispute. Both parties knew that when the contract was made the ship was at Mobile, and was to take on board a cargo of timber there for the United Kingdom. The ordinary time necessary for loading such a cargo there would be about a month, and the parties calculated that on March 29, 1892, the date of the charter-party, this ship was loaded and sailing, or was so nearly loaded that she would be completed and ready to start in a day or two. What then is the meaning of this description of the ship in the charter-party: "now sailed or about to sail"? The expression "now sailed" is clearly a representation of a fact, and so must also be the next part of the sentence, "about to sail." It is a representation that the ship either has sailed or else is not quite loaded, but will be loaded immediately and then will sail. Those representations are put in the charter-party in a part of it where you usually find named the place where the ship is. The place where the ship is is a material point in making the charter-party, for two reasons. The charterer learns what sort of a voyage the ship is about to make, and also how long it will probably be before the ship arrives. Here both parties knew that the ship was at Mobile, or had just left Mobile. It appears to me impossible to say that the statement in this charter-party is a mere representation. I think it was an important part of the contract. Then the question is, was this a condition precedent or a warranty? The leading case of Behn v. Burness (3 B. & S. 751) gives a canon of construction, and at p. 759 comes these words: "Now the place of the ship at the date of the contract where the ship is in foreign parts and is chartered to come to England may be the only datum on which the charterer can found his calculations of the time of the ship's arriving at the port of loading. A statement is more or less important in proportion as the object of the contract more or less depends on it. For most charters, considering winds, markets, and dependent contracts, the time of a ship's arrival to load is an essential fact for the interest of the charterer. In the ordinary course of charters in general it would be so: the evidence for the defendant shows it to be actually so in this case. Then if the statement of the place of the ship is a substantive part of the contract, it seems to us that we ought to hold it to be a condition precedent upon the principles above explained, unless we can find in the contract itself or the surrounding circumstances reason for thinking that the parties did not so intend." The present case is exactly within these words, and, as there is nothing in the contract leading us to a contrary conclusion, we must hold that this statement is a condition precedent. The ship had not then sailed, nor was she nearly loaded and about to sail, so that there was a breach of the condition. The defendants then had a right to treat the contract as at an end, or, if they chose, to treat it as still subsisting. If they chose to treat it as at an end, they were bound in so doing not to lead the plaintiff to believe that the contract still subsisted. The result of the defendants' letter was to leave the plaintiff under the impression that he was still bound to carry out his contract, and therefore the defendants cannot now treat it as at an end. But if they have sustained any damage through the breach, that matter will be referred to an arbitrator under the agreement made by them with the plaintiff. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to judgment on his claim for freight, and the defendants to judgment for the plaintiff's breach of contract.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The first question is what is the true effect of the words "now sailed or about to sail." The law as to the construction of contracts and especially of charter-parties, with reference to conditions precedent and representations made in the contract, is perfectly clear. When a contract is entered into between two parties, every representation made at the time may or may not be intended as a warranty or promise that the representation is true. When the representation is not contained in the written document itself, it is for the jury to say whether the real representation amounted to a warranty, and the jury are always in such a case directed to find whether the representation amounted to a warranty, and whether it was so intended by the parties. But when you have a representation made in a written document, it is obviously no longer for the jury but for the court to decide whether it is a mere representation, or whether it is what is called (I admit not very happily) a substantive part of the contract, that is, a part of the contract which involves a promise in itself. It might be necessary to take the opinion of the jury on matters of fact which would throw light on the construction, but the question of construction itself would remain until the end of the case for the court to decide. But assuming the court to be of opinion that the statement made amounts to a promise, or in other words a substantive part of the contract, it still remains to be decided by the court, as a matter construction, whether it is such a promise as amounts merely to a warranty, the breach of which would sound only in damages, or whether it is that kind of promise the performance of which is made a condition precedent to all further demands under the contract, by the person who made the promise, against the other party—a promise the failure to perform which gives to the opposite party the right to say that he will no longer be bound by the contract. Of course it is often very difficult to decide, as a matter of construction, whether a representation which contains a promise and which can only be explained on the ground that it is in itself a substantive part of the contract amounts to a condition precedent, or is only a warranty. There is no way of deciding that question except by looking at the contract in the light of the surrounding circumstances, and then making up one's mind whether the intention of the parties, as gathered from the instrument itself, will best be carried out by treating the promise as a warranty, sounding only in damages, or as a condition precedent by the failure to perform which the other party is relieved of liability. In order to decide this question of construction, one of the first things you would look to is to what extent the accuracy of the statement—the truth of what is promised—would be likely to affect the substance and foundation of the adventure which the contract is intended to carry out. There, again, it might be necessary to have recourse to the jury. In the case of a charter-party it may well be that such a test could only be applied after getting the jury to say what the effect of a breach of such a condition would be on the substance and foundation of the adventure; not the effect of the breach which has in fact taken place, but the effect likely to be produced on the foundation of the adventure by any such breach of that portion of the contract. It was by the application of that train of reasoning that the court in Behn v. Burness (ubi sup.) appears to have come to the conclusion that, if a ship which at the date of a charter-party is in foreign parts is chartered to come to England, a statement of the place where she is ought primâ facie to be construed as a condition precedent. And the court gave this reason: "The place of the ship at the date of the contract, when the ship is in foreign parts, and is chartered to come to England, may be the only datum on which the charterer can found his calculations of the time of the ship's arriving at the port of loading." In other words, the non-accuracy of such a statement is likely to affect the very foundation of the adventure, because its inaccuracy would displace the only basis, or one of the chief bases, of the calculation on which the parties would act. It is obvious that, when you are dealing with a voyage, the contemplated date of its commencement may be of the utmost importance. Having regard to the time of the year at which it is intended to prosecute the voyage, delay in its commencement, if it is protracted beyond a certain point, may, in many cases, be so vital a matter as to render the voyage impossible, or the risk may be so much increased as to make it no longer possible to have a voyage of the same kind. That is the ground on which it was decided in Behn v. Burness (ubi sup.), that the place of the ship at the date of the charter being the only or main basis on which the charterer can found his calculation of the time of her arrival, a statement in reference to her place ought to be construed as a condition precedent, unless there is to be found in the contract itself, or in the surrounding circumstances, reason for thinking that the parties did not so intend. Now, if that is true as regards the place of a ship which is in foreign parts and is chartered to come to England, the same train of reasoning ought to apply to the time at which a ship is stated to have sailed, or to be about to sail, from the place at which she has been loading, unless the language be so vague as to lead any one to suppose that it was not intended to be a condition precedent.

I quite agree that the vagueness or ambiguity of the statement is one of the elements which would influence the court very much in deciding whether the parties intended that the statement should be a promise the fulfilment of which was to be a condition precedent. That drives us to consider what is the real meaning of these words. Is there anything in them so vague or so ambiguous that they cannot fairly be treated as a statement of a condition precedent? I agree that a condition precedent ought to be clearly expressed. The statement is that the ship has "now sailed or is about to sail." Having regard to what we have heard of the history of the port of Mobile, I have not the slightest doubt that, if that statement does not mean that the ship has actually sailed, it does mean that she is loaded or may at all events for business purposes be treated as actually loaded; that she has got past the embarrassments and dangers attendant on loading, and that her sailing is the next thing to be looked for; and with regard to the suggested ambiguity in the phrase "about to sail," when it is read in conjunction with the other words, it seems to me clear that it does not mean that the ship is to sail within a reasonable or indefinite time, a statement which might lead to endless difficulties and expense, but that if she has not already sailed, she is about to sail forthwith. If that is so, then applying the reasoning which lies at the root of Behn v. Burness (ubi sup.), I have no hesitation in saying that I believe the phrase to be a condition precedent. It is a representation the accuracy of which is made a condition precedent, though I do not doubt that the fulfilment of a promise may equally be made a condition precedent. If that is so, there is an end of the first point in the case. The appellant is clearly in the wrong as to that.

But then comes the question, is not the appellant right in saying that the jury could only reasonably draw one inference from the correspondence between the parties, namely, that the condition precedent had been waived by the defendants? In order to succeed, the plaintiff must show either that he has performed the condition precedent, the onus being on him, or that the defendants have excused the performance of the condition, and we have to consider whether the plaintiff has sustained that burden, so that no reasonable man could doubt that there has been a waiver of the condition or an excuse of its performance. In other words, did the defendants by their acts or conduct lead the plaintiff reasonably to suppose that they did not intend to treat the contract for the future as at an end, on account of the failure to perform the condition precedent, but that they only intended to rely on the misdescription as a breach of warranty, treating the contract as still open for further performance? Did the defendants lead the plaintiff to believe that they intended to treat the misdescription as a breach of contract only, and not as a failure to perform a condition precedent? As soon as you state the case in that way, looking at the facts, the letters which passed before the vessel left for Quebec can only be treated by business men as amounting to an intimation by the defendants to the plaintiff that, although they would insist on treating the contract as broken by reason of the non-fulfilment of the promise that the ship was ready to sail from Mobile immediately, they did not intend to rely upon that as a failure of a condition precedent, but only as a breach of warranty. In my opinion the plaintiff has sustained the burden which lay upon him to prove a waiver of the condition, and therefore this appeal ought to succeed, and judgment ought to be entered in the way which the Master of the Rolls has suggested.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite plain that the words "now sailed or about to sail" were very material words. The charter-party contemplated a voyage to be made by a ship which was then at Mobile to the United Kingdom, and from thence to Quebec, where she was to load a cargo of timber for the United Kingdom. The only mode in which, or at any rate the principal datum by means of which, the charterers could ascertain at what time the ship was likely to arrive in England and get back to Quebec was the statement of the time at which she had left or would leave Mobile, and that statement was made in the words "now sailed or about to sail." They were very important words, and in my opinion they are in no way ambiguous. They mean either that the ship was already at sea, or that she was on the point of sailing—almost ready to start. If it were necessary to decide this point, I should be of opinion that these words amounted to a condition rather than to a mere warranty. But it is not really necessary to decide the point, for, if there was a condition precedent, I have no doubt as to the waiver. The ship did not leave Mobile till the 23rd April, and there can be no doubt that, whether there was a condition precedent or a mere warranty, there was a breach of it. On the 16th May, at the latest, the defendants were aware of the breach. [His Lordship then referred to subsequent correspondence between the parties.] In my opinion the defendants certainly induced the plaintiff to believe that they wished the ship to go out to Quebec, and that when she arrived there they would load her with a cargo of timber, and that they intended to treat the words "about to sail" in the charter-party not as a condition precedent but only as a warranty, for the breach of which they would claim damages from the plaintiff. The defendants are therefore liable for their refusal to load the ship.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Irvine, Hodges, and Borrowman.

Solicitors for the defendants, Wynne, Holme, and Wynne, agents for Simpson, North, and Johnson, Liverpool.

Wednesday, Nov. 8, 1893.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LOPES, and KAY, L.JJ.)

BULMAN v. FENWICK.(a)

APPLICATION FOR A NEW TRIAL.

Charter-party—Demurrage—"Strikes of Work men"—Construction of charter-party.

By a charter-party it was agreed that a vessel should proceed "to London either to the Pool, Regent's Canal, Victoria Docks, Derricks, or Beckton," as ordered by the charterers, eighty-four hours being allowed for loading and discharging the cargo, "strikes of workmen at the port of loading or discharging excepted." The charterers ordered the vessel to proceed to the Regent's Canal. After the vessel left the port of loading a strike of workmen commenced at the Regent's Canal, and the charterers knowing of the strike could have ordered the vessel at Gravesend to proceed to one of the other places named, but did not do so. The vessel proceeded to the Regent's Canal and, owing to the strike, the charterers could not take delivery of the cargo there, though they could have done so at any of the other named places. The lay days were exceeded, and the shipowners claimed demurrage. Held (affirming the judgment of Pollock, B.), that the charterers were protected by the exception as to "strikes of workmen," and were not liable for the delay of the vessel.

THIS was an application by the plaintiffs for judgment or for a new trial on appeal from the verdict and judgment at the trial before Pollock, B., with a jury in London.

The action was brought to recover the sum of 117*l.* as demurrage in respect of the steamer Ashdene.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamer Ashdene. By a charter-party, made on the 18th Nov., 1891, between the plaintiffs and defendants, it was agreed that the said steamer should load a cargo of coals in the Wear, Tyne, or Blyth, as ordered by the agent of the freighters, and proceed to London, either to the Pool, Regent's Canal, Victoria Dock, Derricks, or Beckton, or other safe berth as ordered, and there deliver the cargo.

It was provided by the charter-party that eighty-four running hours should be allowed the freighters for loading and discharging the cargo, "pay Saturdays, Sundays, colliery and all other holidays, the Act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents to machinery and boilers of whatever nature and kind soever, and also accidents to pits or machinery, strikes of workmen at the ports of loading and discharging, riot, commotion by pitmen, storms, floods, &c., excepted.

This charter-party was to remain in force for as many consecutive voyages as the steamer could make from the commencement of the work until the end of Feb. 1892.

The steamer had made six voyages from the Tyne to London, to the Regent's Canal. The charterers had told the master to proceed to the Regent's Canal until further orders.

The steamer left the Tyne upon the seventh voyage on the 10th Feb. at 1 a.m., and she passed Gravesend at 9.30 a.m. on the 11th Feb., and proceeded to the Regent's Canal.

At noon of the 10th Feb. a strike of coal porters commenced at the Regent's Canal. The charterers knew of this strike in the afternoon of that day. The master did not know of the strike when he proceeded to the Regent's Canal. The charterers could have ordered the steamer, at Gravesend, to proceed to one of the other places named in the charter-party.

In consequence of the strike at the Regent's Canal the charterers could not take delivery, and the steamer was delayed there for some days. Subsequently, by arrangement, she proceeded to Beckton, and was there discharged by the 19th Feb. The eighty-four hours allowed by the charter-party were exceeded by 141½ hours.

The plaintiffs claimed demurrage, or, in the alternative, damages for not ordering the steamer to a berth where she could be discharged in a reasonable time, and not using reasonable diligence to procure her discharge.

The action was tried before Pollock, B., and a jury in London. In answer to questions put to them, the jury found (1) that the defendants acted reasonably in ordering the ship to the Regent's

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Canal, but not in allowing her to go there; (2) that the defendants could not have obtained the discharge of the steamer at the Regent's Canal by any reasonable efforts; (3) that the defendants could have obtained her discharge at any of the other places named in the charter-party if they had stopped her at Gravesend, but not if she were allowed to proceed to the Regent's Canal. The jury gave the plaintiffs one farthing damages. Subsequently Pollock, B., entered judgment for the defendants.

Aug. 10.—POLLOCK, B.:—This action was tried before me at the Guildhall in the month of June last. It was an action brought for demurrage of a ship called the Ashdene which was chartered on a coal charter from the Tyne to the Thames, and the claim was practically in respect of a period during which the vessel, the Ashdene, was lying at the Regent's Canal, to which she had been consigned, waiting to unload but unable to do so in consequence of a strike. Now the defendants in their statement of defence set out the terms of their charter and, so far as they are material to the point I have now to decide, those terms are these: It was by the charter-party provided that the Ashdene after being loaded should proceed to London either to the Pool, Regent's Canal, Victoria Dock, the Derricks, Beckton, or other safe berth as ordered. Then the defendants go on to allege that the vessel was ordered to the Regent's Canal, and that she was prevented from unloading there by reason of a strike, which would be covered undoubtedly by the strike clause. In the course of the trial a good deal of evidence was given to show that this question of the strike might have been got over if the defendants had used due diligence to get labourers from elsewhere to unload the ship. That matter, however, became immaterial because the jury found that the defendants could not by any diligence on their part have improved the situation by taking the ship either to another place or by using any reasonable efforts to obtain labourers to discharge her from the Regent's Canal. Therefore, the point became limited at last to the question whether the defendants were within their rights in ordering the vessel to the Regent's Canal, and then, she having come there, whether they were not protected by the strike clause. So far as I am aware there is no case which has hitherto exactly decided the very point in question in this case, although I certainly think it has been decided in principle.

Now the facts with regard to this part of the case were these: The Ashdene left the Tyne under this charter at one o'clock on the morning of the 10th Feb.; the strike of the coal porters at the Regent's Canal commenced at mid-day about 12 o'clock on the 10th Feb., and it lasted until the 17th Feb.; the first that was heard of the strike by the defendants was when the vessel was on her voyage from the Tyne to the Thames, about four o'clock on the afternoon of the 10th Feb. The Ashdene came in and was ready to discharge by 2.30 p.m. on the 11th Feb. There she was waiting at the Regent's Canal ready to discharge, and unable to discharge because of the strike. Upon the 16th Feb. a great many efforts were made to get over the difficulty, and at 5.15 p.m. a telegram was received by the captain of the Ashdene to proceed to Beckton, which was another of the places of discharge mentioned in the charter-party. He went there as speedily as he could, and when he got there the discharge was completed by 7.30 p.m. on the 19th Feb. Now there was some doubt in my mind, and it was suggested to me very properly by the learned counsel that there might be a question upon the construction of the charter-party, whether the defendants had acted reasonably in ordering the ship to the Regent's Canal, the fact being that before she got to the Regent's Canal a strike existed there. Accordingly to save expense, I left it to the jury in this form: (1st) Did the defendants act reasonably in ordering the ship to the Regent's Canal? The jury answered yes, referring to the order that was sent from London to the Tyne before the ship sailed. But then it was further suggested whether, although that might have been reasonable, the defendants' representatives in London when they heard of the strike ought not to have intercepted the vessel at some part of the Thames and ordered her to some other place named in the charter-party where there was no strike. I therefore asked the jury whether, it being reasonable as they had found to order the ship to the Regent's Canal, it was reasonable to allow her to continue her course, and go there after they knew this, and the jury found that was not reasonable, and they also found that if the vessel had been stopped at Gravesend and ordered to some other place of discharge she could have been discharged within the period allowed by the charter-party, but if she was not stopped at Gravesend and she was once allowed to go to the Regent's Canal she could not have been so discharged within the time. Therefore, that raised the question very clearly and neatly whether it was within the right of the defendants, upon the true construction of this charter-party, to order the Ashdene to the Regent's Canal, or to leave that order undisturbed, although before she got there the strike had commenced. Now it is to be observed that there were five different places to which the defendants might have ordered this vessel. In point of fact they ordered her to the Regent's Canal because they were not principals in the matter, but were acting in the carrying out of a sale of coal to one of the London gas companies, and that gas company required the coal near to the Regent's Canal. Therefore it was a matter of great importance that she should go there, and when it was suggested that the vessel might have gone to the Derricks, or the Pool, or that she might have gone in the first instance to Beckton, or the other places, the answer of the defendants was that these clauses were introduced for their benefit, and that they had a right to order her to any one of the five places of discharge mentioned in the charter-party, and if they chose the Regent's Canal, the fact that the strike broke out there was then within the protection of the strike clause. It was not a question whether it was reasonable or unreasonable, and it is also to be observed, in this particular case, that the strike was very sudden and unexpected, and again, none could tell at what period the strike would be over. It might have happened, if they had shifted the vessel's course and sent her to some other place, that the strike would have come to an end at the Regent's Canal, and commenced at that other place. But that becomes immaterial inasmuch as the question to my mind turns on the real rights of the parties under the charter-party, and not on the question whether it was reasonable or unreasonable to send the vessel to the Regent's Canal. I have said why she went there, but it is right that I should observe that the contract, whereby she might be ordered to the Regent's Canal if the defendants so desired, of course had nothing to do with, and could not be affected by, any contract which the defendants had made with third parties. Of course, one sees why she was wanted, having a cargo of coal on board, to be near the gas company's works, but that could not be set up as against the plaintiffs' rights. We must go back, and consider what was the contract between the parties. The conclusion to which I have come is that the option created by the charter-party is created for the benefit of the defendants, that the defendants have the right to act on it, and that, although it may turn out that when the vessel arrives there is a strike, it cannot be said to the defendants that, because there is a strike there, they ought not to have allowed the vessel to go there because it was not reasonable to do so. It is not a question between the plaintiffs and the defendants as to what is reasonable or unreasonable, it is the contract between the parties. Now it is somewhat singular that a case which was cited by the plaintiffs' counsel for the purpose of calling my attention to the dictum of Lord Justice Bowen is the very case that most strongly shows that the view that I have taken of this charter-party is the correct view. The case is that of the Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morrel Brothers (65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 659; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 106; (1891) 2 Q. B. 647), in which Bowen, L.J. says this: "Then we are told that an option is given to the charterer and that it was not properly exercised unless a berth was chosen that was empty," the question there being not one of strike, but whether there was room or not in the berth that was chosen, and then Bowen, L.J. goes on: "but I think there was confusion in this argument also. The option is given for the benefit of the person who has to exercise it, he is bound to exercise it in a reasonable time, but he is not bound in exercising it to consider the benefit or otherwise of the other party. The option is to choose a port or berth or dock that is one that is reasonably fit for the purpose of delivery." That is to say, she is to go to a place where she will be safe and so forth. Then comes the observation which was cited by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs, and it is this: "It will not do, for instance, to choose a dock the entrance to which is blocked, that would be practically no exercise at all of the option, and I think that is what Blackburn, J., meant in Dahl v. Nelson (44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 381; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 6 App. Cas. 38), and follows from the cases he there cited of Ogden v. Graham (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 396; 1 B. & S. 773) and Samuel v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company (8 B. & C. 119)." Now, at first sight, that may seem to help the plaintiffs, but when you come to look at what Bowen, L.J. says here, it clearly shows that the option is a right given by the charter to the defendants, the cargo owner, and when Bowen, L.J., used these words, "it will not do, for nstance, to choose a dock the entrance to which s blocked," he meant to say that, if it became a physical impossibility for the vessel to go there, for instance, if it had been a port in the Mediterranean, and there had been an earthquake so that the mouth of the port was destroyed, so as to create a sort of ademption of that port from the ports named in the charter-party, that reasoning would apply, and it is obvious that that is what Bowen, L.J. meant, when we look at the cases he referred to, and what is contained in the observations of Lord Blackburn in Dahl v. Nelson (ubi sup.). Those are cases in which the port was for all purposes, so to speak, an impossible port. In the present case, so far from this being an impossible port, it was the port not only contemplated in the first instance by the parties, but it was a safe port, and there was nothing to prevent the vessel going there and discharging as quickly and as safely as possible except the strike, and that strike was provided for by the language used in the charter-party itself, and was provided for for the benefit of the defendants. Therefore, the conclusion I come to in this case is, that the defendants were within their rights in sending the vessel to that port, and although this question was left to the jury there ought to be judgment for the defendants. This avoids any further question with regard to costs, because it is clear under those circumstances which I have mentioned there must be judgment entered for the defendants with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Bucknill, Q.C. and T. E. Scrutton for the appellants.—The defendants had, under the charter-party, an option to order the ship to any one of the places named in the charter-party. They were bound to exercise that option reasonably, and they exercised it unreasonably by ordering the ship to the Regent's Canal when they knew that there was a strike there which would prevent the ship being unloaded. They might have given orders at Gravesend for the ship to proceed to one of the other places. There must be an implied term in the charter-party that the charterers are to order the ship to a place where she can be discharged, so far as they are reasonably able to do so. The charterers were bound to exercise their option reasonably, and to select a berth which is reasonably fit for the purpose of delivery. This berth was practically blocked by the strike:

> Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morel Brothers and Co., 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 659; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 106; (1891) 2 Q. B 647;
> Ogden v. Graham, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 396; 1 B. & S. 773.

The charterers were bound to order the ship to a safe berth; that is, to a berth where she could discharge safely. Here she could not discharge at all. The strike made this berth an "unsafe berth" in a commercial sense. If one port named in a charter-party becomes impossible, the charterers may be bound to name another. The Regent's Canal did become an impossible port in a commercial sense:

> The Teutonia, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 48; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 214; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 171.

Bigham, Q.C. and Leck, for the respondents, were not heard.

Lord Esher, M.R.—It seems to me that this case is as clear as any case can be. The question is, whether the plaintiffs detained the ship more than they were entitled to do. The shipowner undertook, by the charter-party, that the ship should proceed to "London, either to the Pool, Regent's Canal, Victoria Docks, Derricks, or Beckton, or other safe place as ordered." There is no limitation imposed upon the charterers' right to order the ship to proceed to any of those places. All of those places are assumed to be "safe ports." There is nothing there from which it is possible to imply any limitation whatever upon the charterers' right to order the ship to proceed to the Regent's Canal, unless perhaps something happens which makes the Regent's Canal a port to which no ship can proceed, such as the destruction of the entrance by an earthquake as suggested by Pollock, B. There is nothing of that kind in this case. The ship was ordered to proceed to the Regent's Canal, and no objection can be made to that order at the time when it was given. It is urged, however, that something happened afterwards at the Regent's Canal before the ship reached there. That was something which created a difficulty in taking delivery by the charterer. The mere fact that a strike had taken place would not be sufficient to justify the charterer in detaining the ship, if by any reasonable exertion he could have taken delivery, for in that case the strike would not have prevented him taking delivery. The jury, however, have answered that question in favour of the charterer, the defendant. The shipowner says that the ship was delayed in the Regent's Canal, and that he is entitled to be paid demurrage. The answer to that claim is, that the ship was delayed by reason of a strike, and that the delay was therefore excused by the clause in the charter-party. This application entirely fails, and must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and think that this is an extremely clear case.

KAY, L.J.—I entirely agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Botterell and Roche.

Solicitors for the respondent, Lowless and Co.

Nov. 14 and 15, 1893.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LOPES and KAY, L.JJ.)

THE BEDOUIN. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Loss of freight—Causa proxima —Time charter—Concealment of material fact.

A charter-party entered into between the plaintiffs and a French company for hire of their vessel contained a clause to the effect that "in the event of loss of time by . . . breakdown of engines or machinery, . . . and the progress of the steamer is thereby delayed for more than twenty-four running hours, payment of hire to cease until such time as she is again in an efficient state to resume her voyage."

An insurance slip, initialled by the defendant, was taken out by the plaintiffs for three months, "freight chartered and (or) as if chartered, on board or not on board, . . . one-third diminishing each month;" and a policy executed in accordance with the slip contained the usual clause as to "perils of the seas," &c.

In the course of her voyage the vessel was delayed for twenty-eight days, owing to the parting of her thrust-shaft. The plaintiffs brought an action on the policy for the loss of hire, and Barnes, J., found as a fact that the breakage was due to a peril of the sea.

Held (affirming the decision of Barnes, J. and affirming the decision in The Alps (68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 624; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 337; (1893) 1 P. 109), that the clause in the charter-party was put into operation through the immediate action of the perils insured against, and that therefore the defendant was liable.

Also that, although the defendant was not informed when he initialled the slip that he was insuring freight under a charter containing the twenty-four hours clause, there was no concealment, of a material fact, as a time charter almost invariably contains the twenty-four hours clause, and this fact together with the words on the slip, "And (or) as if chartered, on board or not on board, . . . one-third diminishing each month," clearly showed the defendant the kind of risk he was asked to insure.

Per Barnes, J.: The loss was one which fell on the policy, although the plaintiffs ultimately earned the whole freight.

THIS was an appeal by the defendant from a decision of Barnes, J., in an action on a policy of insurance in the steamship Bedouin. The Bedouin Steam Navigation Company Limited were the plaintiffs, and the defendant was Mr. Robert Bradford, an under-writer at Lloyd's.

According to the agreed statement of facts, on the 26th July 1889, the steamship Bedouin, belonging to the plaintiffs, was chartered by the Compagnie Maritime du Pacifique, for one voyage to South America and back, to a port in Europe not north of Hamburg. The freight for the steamer was at and after the rate 955*l.* 10*s.* per calendar month, and at and after the same rate for any part of a month, to be paid monthly in advance. The charter contained the clause that "in the event of loss of time by deficiency of men, want of stores, breakdown of engines or machinery, or other causes appertaining to the owners, and the progress of the steamer is thereby delayed for more than twenty-four running hours, payment of hire to cease until such time as she is again in an efficient state to resume her voyage."

On the 9th Aug. 1889 the plaintiffs took out an insurance slip in the following terms: "Bedouin steamship, three months, sailing probably the 11th inst. Freight chartered and (or) as if chartered, on board or not on board, full interest admitted, one-third diminishing each month, premium 15*s.*" A policy dated the 15th Aug. 1889, was executed in accordance with the slip, in which the insurance was described as "for and during the space of three calendar months, commencing on the 11th of Aug. 1889, and ending on the 10th Nov. 1889, both days inclusive," with the common clause afterwards; and then the risk was described as being on "freight chartered or as if chartered on board or not on board, premium 15*s.* per cent.," and in the margin there was the clause, "one-third diminishing each month." The defendant, upon the record, was an underwriter for 40*l.*, forming part of the 1500*l.* altogether effected under the policy.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant alleged that he was not informed at the time of initialling the slip, and was unaware that he was requested to insure hire payable under a time charter. He further alleged, and the plaintiffs did not admit, that the fact of the proposed subject-matter of insurance being of this nature, would materially influence an underwriter in accepting the risk, and in fixing the rate of premium for insuring the same. Also, that the ordinary rate of premium for a higher risk was largely in excess of that charged for a freight risk.

On the 11th Aug. the Bedouin sailed from Liverpool for ports on the west coast of South America, with a general cargo under the charter-party of the 26th July. On the 5th Sept., in the course of her voyage, the thrust-shaft was found to be badly gone at the after side of the first collar, and shortly afterwards it parted, and the vessel was towed into St. Vincent, where she remained until the 3rd Oct., when a new shaft was sent out and fitted, and she proceeded on her voyage and duly delivered her cargo.

The owners had under the cesser clause of hire a deduction or loss, by nonpayment from the charterers of the hire during the time that the vessel was not in an efficient state to resume her voyage, and the plaintiffs claimed from the defendant, in respect of this loss, the sum of 12*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.*, being the amount applicable to his subscription on the policy.

The action was tried before Barnes, J., on the 20th and 21st June 1893, on an agreed statement of facts, but, by consent, evidence was called on behalf of the defendant with regard to the points raised by him in the statement of facts (set out above).

Joseph Walton, Q.C. for the plaintiffs, having cited The Alps (68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 624; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 337; (1893) 1 P. 109) in reference to the liability of the defendant for loss of hire, was stopped by the Court.

Cohen, Q.C. and Hurst for the defendant.—There is no evidence to show that the loss was due to sea perils:

Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company v. Hamilton, 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 695; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 200; 12 App. Cas. 484.

No liability would be incurred until the voyage was over, as the charterers' money was eventually earned, and so there was really no portion of the chartered freight lost: (dictum of Maule, J., in Stewart v. Steele, 5 Scott N. R. 943.) The defendant was entitled to have all the material facts before him. It did not appear on the slip that the risk to be insured was a time charter containing the twenty-four hours clause. This was a material fact which ought to have been brought to the defendant's knowledge, even although he might have inferred it after due consideration:

The Alps (ubi sup.);
Bates v. Hewitt, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 366; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 432; 2 Q. B. 595;
Tate v. Hyslop, 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 581; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 487; 15 Q. B. Div. 368;
Potter v. Rankin, L. Rep. 6 H. of L. 83;
Harrower v. Hutchinson, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 684; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 434; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 584.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. in reply.—There were no signs of a flaw in the shaft. The evidence showed there was an undue strain in a short space of time. That, it is submitted, is a loss by the perils of the seas. As to the second point, this was an insurance for a specific time, and the loss of freight occurred during that time. As regards the alleged concealment, the evidence shows that before The Alps (ubi sup.) underwriters considered that this kind of risk was not covered. Long before the decision in that case an underwriter could protect himself against this particular kind of loss by the warranty clause: (McArthur's Contract of Marine Insurance, 2nd edit, p. 328.) It is submitted that no concealment of a material fact is here proved.

Barnes, J., having stated the facts, continued:—The case of The Alps (ubi sup.) fully deals with the principle which I adhere to in this case, viz., that if the clause in the charter-party is put into operation through the immediate action of the perils insured against, then, apart from other points raised, the underwriters must be liable. In the present case three points are taken on the part of the underwriters by which they distinguished this case from the case of The Alps. The first point is that the loss was not a loss caused by the perils of the sea. This turns upon a question of fact. The point, when it is accurately stated, really comes to this—that the damage to the propeller shaft in this case was not caused by sea perils. It is practically admitted that, if the damage to the propeller shaft was caused by sea perils, the result follows that there must be the delay and the consequent loss of freight, just as there was in the case of The Alps (ubi sup.), when fire caused the delay. But it is said there is no trace here of violent storms or hurricanes, and that unless that is so, the propeller cannot be inferred to have been broken by anything which amounted to a sea peril. With regard to that point, it appears to me that I must take the facts as stated by the parties, coupled with those documents which I have liberty to refer to, viz., the log-book and surveys. I have looked at those, and having regard to the admission made in this case that the shaft was a fit one, that the ship was seaworthy, and to the fact that there was weather which appears to have a record of high seas, and so forth, the inference which I draw is that the shaft was broken by an undue strain put upon it by the weather: that is to say, that the breakage was an extraordinary occurrence. Without referring to all the definitions that have been given of "perils of the sea," I may refer to Lord Bramwell's in the Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company v. Hamilton (ubi sup.), where he says, "Every accidental circumstance not the result of ordinary wear and tear, delay, or of the act of the assured, happening in the course of the navigation of the ship, and incidental to the navigation, and causing loss to the subject-matter of insurance," would be a peril of the sea, and he adopts the definition of Lopes, L.J., in Pandorf v. Hamilton (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499: 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 44; 17 Q. B. Div. 670), where he says, "In a seaworthy ship damage to goods caused by the action of the sea during transit, not attributable to the fault of anybody, is a damage from a peril of the sea." The inference of fact, therefore, which I draw is, that this was a breakage due to a peril of the sea, and therefore the clause in question was put into operation through the immediate perils insured against. The second question is that, although the hire was suspended by a breakdown of the machinery through a sea peril, yet there is no loss at all falling on the policy, because all that happened was to postpone the earning of the charterer's money to a later date, and that the shipowner ultimately got, under the charter, freight for the whole period except during the delay, just as if there had been no delay. I think that point is one which is extremely difficult to follow. As a matter of fact, the shipowner does not get his money at the time he ought to get it, and his ship takes longer to earn the amount of freight which she has to earn for him, therefore he does not get the freight during a particular period. It appears to me the loss occurs then and there, and is one which falls on the policy, which is an insurance against the freight during the time the policy runs. It is an ingenious point, started probably by the counsel who argued it, but I cannot help thinking that the real point intended to be raised was the important point of so-called concealment. That is a matter of some difficulty. According to the statement of facts, I think it must be taken to amount to a plea in the old form, that the defendants were induced to subscribe to the policy by concealment of a material fact by the plaintiffs or their agents. The material fact stated is that they were not told that they were being asked to insure a time charter, although the argument here has been that they were not told that they were to insure a time charter which had a clause in it which we have here called "the twenty-four hours clause." The question, then, is whether or not, under the circumstances, there has been a concealment of a material fact? Some evidence has been called on behalf of the defendants, and none has been called for the plaintiffs—they have relied on the legal position of the matter. I think, after hearing the evidence on the part of the defendants, and after looking at the documents, especially referring to the clause "one-third diminishing each month," which is in connection with a risk described as "freight chartered or as if chartered," there can be no doubt that the underwriters were well aware that at the time when this policy was being put forward they were liable to insure a time charter risk, and I find that the underwriters who gave evidence have said they did not care whether it was a time charter or a voyage charter; but they say we did not know, and you did not tell us, that in insuring a time charter we were taking upon ourselves the responsibility of a clause in that time charter which was put upon us, a loss of hire, when that clause came into operation. If the clause had been one that was not a known clause, or had been an unusual clause, it seems to me that there would have been a good deal of substance in that contention, but it has been proved by the witnesses, and has been practically admitted throughout the argument, that this is a universal clause in a time charter, and it seems to me that when an underwriter takes upon himself the insurance of a time charter with that clause in it he takes upon himself the risk of insuring whatever responsibility is cast upon him by the insurance included in that charter, in accordance with what is said in the judgment in Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 581; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 6; 7 App. Cas. 670), and I think Mr. Walton's argument is sound here when he says that what the underwriters complain was concealed is not a fact, but a view of the law, and that can hardly be stated as a matter of concealment. To put the case in a short form, it appears to me that where the underwriter insures and has notice that he is insuring chartered freight which will cover time charter freight by such a slip and policy as this, and knows that a time charter has a universal or common clause in it which will impose a liability upon him, he takes his chance of what that liability is. I think that this case is not analogous to Tate v. Hyslop (ubi sup.), where, upon the peculiar facts of the case, having regard to the practice of the underwriters and the reasoning of the judges, there was no doubt a concealment of what the jury found to be a material fact, and I do not think that any evidence has been given in this case to show that the plaintiffs had any knowledge that a different rate had been asked if they had called attention specifically to this clause in this particular case. For these reasons I think the plaintiffs' claim should stand, and I must therefore give judgment for them with costs.

The defendant appealed.

Cohen, Q.C. and Hurst for the appellant.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. for the respondents.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action on a policy of insurance on freight. What is the freight in this case which is said to be the subject-matter of this insurance? It is not denied that it was chartered freight, and what was the charter? It was a charter of the ship on a voyage from Liverpool to the West Coast of South America, and back to Europe. That is a long voyage, but the freight was payable a month in advance; that is, the freight by this charter-party was payable before it would otherwise be payable. If goods are shipped on board a vessel without any such terms no freight whatever is due until the arrival of the ship at the port of discharge, and till the goods are delivered. Therefore freight in advance can only be by means of contract, which is by the charter-party. It is advance freight, and it is payable monthly. If that remains so, and the ship comes into a port of distress by reason of the perils of the sea, the shipowner is not liable for injury done to the charterer by perils of the sea, and therefore the charterer would be bound, if the ship was kept for a month in the port of distress, to pay for that month. But the charterer who takes out a ship on those terms wishes to throw off that liability, which is to pay a very large sum indeed for the ship at a time when, by perils of the sea, he cannot have the use of the ship, and the ship is in the hands of the shipowner, for the shipowner is bound to repair the ship. Therefore he desires to get rid of that, and he does so by what is called the twenty-four hours clause. If it were not for that clause the charterer would have to be paying freight for a time when he could not get any benefit from the use of the ship, that benefit being taken from him by a peril of the sea. To my mind, if it were so, he could insure that freight; that is, insure against the loss of freight which he is bound to pay for. But he has shifted it on to the shipowner, who by the clause in the charter-party would lose that freight to which, but for the peril of the sea, if it can be held to be the proximate cause of the loss, he would have been entitled. The case of The Alps (ubi sup.) really decided that such a loss of freight by the shipowner in consequence of such a twenty-four hours clause in the charter-party could be recovered from the underwriters where it was brought about by the direct peril of the sea; that is, where it is sufficiently proximate. To my mind that case is right. If it is not a proximate cause neither party could insure it, and there would be this state of things, that either the charterer must lose a large sum of money or the shipowner must lose it, really in consequence of a peril of the sea. It seems to me in the case of The Alps that that was sufficiently proximate, and therefore the loss of the shipowner by reason of the twenty-four hours clause being brought into play by the peril of the sea as the proximate cause is an insurable interest. That being so, in what terms must a policy of insurance cover such a loss? It may cover it by saying that it is an insurance on freight. That is the second point decided in the case of The Alps. It is a loss of freight caused immediately by the peril of the sea, and therefore insurance of freight is sufficient to cover it. The case of The Alps was really decided upon the dicta of Lord Selborne and Lord Watson, in the House of Lords, which described the very case which occurred afterwards in the case of the Alps, and said in such a case it was an insurable interest, and so coverable by a policy of insurance. If that be so, you have here a charter-party; you have the twenty-four hours clause in it; you have the loss brought about by the peril of the sea acting immediately upon that clause. Here was an insurable interest, an insurable loss, and the words of the policy are large enough to cover it. That drives Mr. Cohen down to say that there is no defence on the part of these underwriters unless there was the concealment of a material fact. The assured is not bound to tell the underwriter what the law is. He is bound to tell him, not every fact, but the material facts; and his other obligation is this, that if he is asked a question—whether a material fact or not—by the underwriters, he must answer it truly. If he answers it falsely, though it may not be a material fact, it will vitiate the policy. The underwriter has his right to have his questions truly answered; but that does not arise in this case. The only question is, whether those who effected this insurance concealed a material fact from the underwriters at the time the policy was effected. It is clear that the duty of those who effected the insurance for the assured was to lay this slip before the underwriters. They said nothing. That induces the question, does the slip conceal a material fact? In other words, is there a material fact which ought to have been in this slip and which is not?

Now, what is a material fact here? It is a material fact for the underwriter to know whether he is insuring against a loss by the twenty-four hours clause, but it does not follow from that that it is a fact which the assured is bound to tell him. But let us see what this slip does tell him. Does it or does it not tell him first of all that he is asked to effect a policy on chartered freight? He is asked to insure for three months after sailing "freight chartered, and (or) as if chartered, on board or not on board." It cannot mean freight on board or not on board, because freight is never on board. Freight is the charge made by the shipowner for the carriage of goods on board his ship, and therefore these words "on board or not on board" are a short way of saying you are asked to insure chartered freight, or as if chartered, on goods on board or not on board. But if there were any difficulty at all in construing the words "and (or) as if chartered," it seems to me that these words "on board or not on board" do conclusively show it must be chartered freight, because if there is no charter or no contract equivalent to a charter there cannot be freight payable on goods not on board. If there is no contract making the freight payable with goods not on board, there is no freight due unless goods are on board and are carried to their destination. It follows, therefore, that these words informed him that he was asked to insure chartered freight? What chartered freight? You have it now on goods whether on board or not, "one-third diminishing each month." That is, in other words, to tell him it is chartered freight payable for each month, diminishing in amount one-third each month. Therefore it tells him it is freight payable per month. Is that a time charter on freight? Is it a charter on freight payable according to time, and not according to voyage or delivery? To my mind, it is quite clear that it is. It follows, then, from the first part of the slip, that it is chartered freight; from the second part, that it is freight payable per month, whether the goods are on board or not, and that it is freight payable according to the month, one-third diminishing each month. Therefore it told him it was a time policy with regard to the freight. Then what is the evidence? That in these days, wherever there is a charter-party which is a time charter with regard to the freight, the difficulty has been seen about these perils of the sea and the ship putting into a port of distress; and therefore in every such charter-party, or in next to every one, there is the twenty-four hours clause. When those who effected the insurance, therefore, told him that this was to be a policy on chartered freight, on freight payable per month, they told him in effect further, that it was a policy with the twenty-four hours clause in it. Therefore, so far from concealing anything from him which they were bound to tell him, they told him in fact, by the slip, the exact state of things. In these circumstances it cannot possibly be said that there was any concealment of a material fact. There was no defence to the action; and, so far as this can be said to be a decision based upon The Alps (ubi sup.), I agree with the decision in that case, and with all parts of it. This is a stronger case, and goes beyond it. I see no ground for the appeal, and therefore it must be dismissed with costs.

Lopes, L.J.—Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff (ubi sup.) and The Alps (ubi sup.) established that loss of freight, such as the freight in the present case, if brought about by perils of the sea, is an insurable interest, and is covered by a policy of insurance on freight such as the policy in the present case. That being so, what is the defendant's defence to this action? His defence is that a material fact known to the plaintiffs has not been communicated to him. The proof rests on him. It is a question which he has to establish, and the point we have to consider is whether that is made out. The learned judge has come to the conclusion that it was not made out, and I entirely agree with him. The slip conveys to the mind of the defendant in the first place that the freight to be insured is chartered freight. But there are other material words on the slip, "one-third diminishing each month." That ought to convey to the mind of the defendant that it is not only chartered freight, but time charter freight. Now we come to the evidence given by the defendant. There was none given by the plaintiffs. What the defendant and his witnesses said in point of fact was, that in all cases where it was chartered freight and time charter freight it was the invariable practice for charter-parties to contain this twenty-four hours clause. If that was so, so far from there being any concealment of a material fact, it was exactly the contrary. Therefore the learned judge was right, and this appeal fails.

KAY, L.J.—I agree. Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Pritchard and Sons.

Solicitors for the respondents, Field, Roscoe, and Co., for Bateson, Warr, and Bateson, Liverpool.

Nov. 24 and 25, 1893.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LOPES and KAY, L.JJ.)

THE GLENLIVET. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Injury by fire—Memorandum in Lloyd's policy—Meaning of word "burnt."

A ship is not "burnt" within the meaning of the memorandum in a Lloyd's policy of insurance, "warranted free from average under 3 per cent., unless the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt," unless the injury by fire is of so substantial a character that the ship, as a whole, can be said to be "burnt" in the popular sense of the term.

Decision of Barnes, J. affirmed.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Barnes, J., reported ante, p. 342; (1893) P. 164; 68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 860.

Aspinall, Q.C. for the appellants.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. for the respondents.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case we have an appeal from a decision of Barnes, J., the action being brought by a shipowner against the insurer upon a Lloyd's policy, with one or more verbal alterations. The policy is on ship or goods; the perils insured against are the ordinary perils, including fire. There is the ordinary memorandum about corn, fish, and so on, and all other goods; also ship and freight are warranted free from average under 3 per cent., unless general, or the ship is stranded. That is printed; then there is added "sunk or burnt," so that it runs thus:—"All other goods, also ship and freight, are warranted free from average under 3 per cent., unless general, or the ship is stranded, sunk, or burnt;" and we have to consider whether this ship has been "burnt" within the meaning of the expression there used. Now, the facts so far as they are material, are not in dispute at all. There was a fire on board this ship in one of the coal bunkers, and the fire was so severe that some damage was done to the structure of the ship; it is unnecessary to particularise it, but a plate got cracked and some angle irons got burnt. The ship was an iron ship; how much wood was on board I do not know, but it is sufficient to say that the fire clearly injured the ship. Now comes the question whether this ship was "burnt" within the meaning of that expression. Barnes, J. has held not, and, in my opinion, that is obviously right. I say "obviously," because we must look at this word "burnt" in reference to the context, it is part of a phrase "unless the ship is stranded, sunk, or burnt." What does that mean? I take it the context shows that what is meant is that the ship as a whole must be stranded, sunk, or burnt, and I cannot accept Mr. Aspinall's construction or suggestion that any fire on board a ship, doing a little structural damage to the ship itself, is a burning in ordinary language. It appears to me it is not so. In the course of the argument cases have been put of a fire on board the ship put out; can you say the ship is burnt? Of course, in one sense it is burnt. Anything that burns any part of a ship is a burning of the ship, but I cannot think that is the meaning of it here; and if this case had been tried before a special jury, I should have thought the duty of the judge would have been to give the jury a direction to this effect, "Although there is a fire on board the ship, and the ship is injured, that is not necessarily enough; you must ask yourselves whether the ship was in fact burnt." Although it is extremely difficult to draw the line, I am very seldom embarrassed by that difficulty, because we know, however difficult it is to draw the line, 99 times out of 100 you can see on which side the line is. If you ask anybody to draw the line between light and shade when they run off and fade off from one to the other, they cannot do it, but with the eye one can see it plainly enough, and many cases may be practically dealt with in that way. I do not pretend to draw the line, but I can see as plainly as any juryman, and as any ordinary man would see, that this ship has not been burnt. There has been some damage done, but she has not been burnt. That appears to me the true construction of this policy. The point is new; I agree it is very important, not only to persons interested in policies on ships, but particularly to those interested in policies on goods. The difficulty arises from the course of business amongst business men of putting in a few words to express what they mean. The instrument as a whole is not re-cast as a conveyancer's draft is. That is not in accordance with the habits of business men, and I daresay Mr. Walton is quite right in saying they cannot do it. They put in a word. We have to make out what the word is. Difficulties have been suggested on both sides; I think there are difficulties; but, on the whole, I think the difficulties are fewer on one side than the other, and the fewest appear to me to be met by that which I think is the true construction. If the ship is so burnt, that in popular language the ship is burnt, one sees the consequence. It is said the words would have operation as regards goods, but would have no operation as regards ship. Mr. Walton has answered that. But be that as it may, what I have said is, to my mind, the clear meaning of the expression, when you take the word "burnt" in connection with "stranding." I think any jury would find the same, and therefore this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Smith, L.J. — I think the judgment of my brother Barnes was correct; but, whether the direction which he gave himself was accurate, is a question of some difficulty, which I will deal with. Now, the action is brought by the assured upon a policy insuring his ship upon an old form of Lloyd's policy, which has been in vogue for 150 years or more, with some additions. There is this —"And all such goods and ship are warranted free from damage under 3 per cent., unless general" —that is general average—"or the ship is stranded, sunk, or burnt." "Sunk or burnt" have been added more recently, my brother Barnes says about thirty years ago. Carrying my memory back, I cannot say whether in my beginning the memorandum stopped at "stranded," but during the greater part of my time it has been "stranded, sunk, or burnt." Now comes the question, What is the meaning of a ship burnt? There have been numerous decisions as to what is the meaning of a ship stranded, there have been no decisions as to the meaning of a ship sunk or a ship burnt, and I believe this is the first time that has come up for decision. As regards the burning which did take place upon this ship, as very shortly stated by Mr. Aspinall in his able argument, it appears to be as follows: Upon the first voyage the forward coal bunker got on fire, on the second voyage the starboard coal bunker got on fire, and then, thirdly, an angle iron buckled down, and the wood casing was destroyed. So that in some of these voyages there was damage by fire more or less, rather less than more, but the question is, what is the meaning of a ship "burnt" within the memorandum upon the policy. Now, it is said that any small burning (cabin curtains for instance) of the ship itself was sufficient to vacate this warranty of limitation under 3 per cent.—damage under 3 per cent. I do not think that that is right, and I agree that if this case had been tried in the ordinary way (although I quite agree this is the proper way to try this case), the learned judge would have had to have directed the jury, considering the controversy that would have arisen between the learned counsel on both sides, as to what was or was not a burning so as to constitute a burnt ship; and I think he would have had to tell the jury that a partial burning of the ship does not necessarily constitute a burnt ship. He would also say that it might, but it would depend upon the character and nature of the partial burning of the ship. Let me put what I mean. Suppose the cabin curtains were burnt, I should think he would tell the jury that did not constitute a partial burning, but suppose the after part of the ship was burnt altogether, and the fore part was not burnt at all, I should think the jury might find that was a burnt ship, although there was only a partial burning. Therefore, it seems to me it is impossible to decide absolutely in the affirmative or the negative as to whether a partial burning does constitute a burning or not within this policy; it may, or may not, according to the actual facts appertaining to the partial burning.

Now I come to the suggestion of Mr. Aspinall, that it means the initiation of such a fire that, unless it were put out, it would consume the ship. I cannot think that can be the meaning of this, for there never could be a fire which, if not put out, might not consume a ship. If the cabin curtain caught fire and was not put out, that might end in the destruction of the ship. Therefore that will not do. Then I come to the suggestion of my brother Barnes, which is, that it must be a burning such as to render the ship temporarily unnavigable. I do not think that is right, if I may say so, because, supposing there was such a burning as only to stop the ship half an hour—suppose a ship was steered by rudder-cords instead of by chains; suppose the rudder-band was burnt, and stopped the ship for half an hour—would you call that a burnt ship? I should not; but that would come within my brother Barnes's definition if she was temporarily unnavigable whilst the rudder-band was being adjusted. I do not think that is right. My own view is you would have to tell the jury what I have already said about partial burning (that the other was not the correct direction), and then you would have to tell the jury that a partial burning may, under some circumstances, constitute a burning ship, and may not under other circumstances, and having given that direction you would have to ask them, Has the fire been such as to bring the ship to such a condition that you consider the ship a burnt ship? Then the jury would decide whether the facts brought it up to what you had laid down as the question for them to decide. I think my brother Barnes put too narrow a construction upon the words "burnt ship," but otherwise I agree with his judgment.

Davey, L.J.—I approach the consideration of this question with an entirely open mind, and the question I ask myself is whether upon the facts the ship has been burnt within the meaning of the policy. I can find nothing in the policy to satisfy me that the words are intended to be used otherwise than in accordance with the ordinary use of language. Mr. Aspinall says that the clause applies if a fire breaks out in any part of a ship or stores, although it is got under before any great amount of damage is done to the ship. I cannot bring myself to think that any person would, either in the accurate use of language, or in ordinary parlance, say that in such a case as that the ship has been burnt. Mr. Aspinall further says that the clause, or rather the exception, would have no meaning as applied to the ship unless you adopt the construction which he invites us to put upon the words, but, in my opinion, that suggestion or argument has been answered by Mr. Walton, that it would have the effect of bringing within the ambit of the policy, or taking out of the exception in the memorandum small damage not amounting to 3 per cent., which had been previously done to the ship. Remembering, therefore, that this clause had been considered as a condition, and that it is not for the mere purpose of excepting from the memorandum damage by fire, I answer the question by saying that the condition has not, in my opinion, arisen, because the ship has not been burnt within the meaning of the policy. I agree with Smith, L.J. that it may be exceedingly difficult to put, and I do not know that it is very useful to attempt to put, into a definition every case in which a ship could be "burnt." I agree that Barnes, J.'s definition is open to criticism, but I think that it is really a question to be answered by the jury — Has the ship in the circumstances of this case been burnt? I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Botterell and Roche.

Solicitors for the respondents, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Tuesday, Feb. 14, 1893.

(Before BARNES, J. and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE SPREE. (a)

Salvage—Apportionment—Members of crew.

Where a large steamer carrying a doctor, stewardess, baker, and other persons of an analogous description, who took no part in navigating the ship, was awarded 12,000*l. for salvage services, the Court, in apportioning it, ordered that the above-mentioned members of the crew should only have a half share according to their rating.*

THIS was a motion by salvors in a salvage action for apportionment of salvage.

The services in question were rendered by the steamship Lake Huron in the North Atlantic to the North German Lloyd's steamship the Spree.

The Lake Huron was a Beaver Line steamship of 4040 tons gross, and at the time of the said services she was on a voyage from Montreal to Liverpool laden with a general cargo, manned by a crew of fifty-nine hands all told and carrying thirty-three passengers.

The Spree was a steamship of 6963 tons gross, and at the time of the said services she was on a voyage from Bremen to New York laden with a general cargo, and carried passengers and mails.

The Spree having broken her propeller shaft was taken in tow by the Lake Huron on the 28th Nov. 1892 and towed into Queenstown harbour. The services lasted about 137 hours and the distance towed was about 760 miles. During the services the wind varied from a fresh to a moderate gale. The Spree had water in her two after compartments and was down by the stern.

In rendering the said services the owners of the Lake Huron incurred loss and expenses amounting to 1189*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*

The salvors instituted an action for salvage, which was settled by the defendants paying 12,000*l.*

The value of the Lake Huron was 60,000*l.*; of her cargo 30,000*l.*, and freight at risk 4000*l.*

Feb. 7.—Butler Aspinall, on behalf of all the plaintiffs, moved for an apportionment of the salvage, and pointed out the fact that there were several members of the Lake Huron's crew who, from the nature of their duties, such as the surgeon, stewardess, baker, &c., took no part in the services.

BARNES, J. thereupon stated that he wished such persons to be separately represented and also asked to be supplied with a list of the crew showing their duties and rate of pay.

Feb. 14.—The motion again came on for hearing. During the interval a list of the crew had been supplied, from which it appeared that the following were the persons whose duties were such as to prevent them taking part in the salvage services: The doctor, 8*l.* per month; the chief steward, 9*l.* per month; the second steward, 4*l.* 10*s.* per month; the intermediate and steerage stewards, 4*l.* a month; the stewardess, 2*l.* 10*s.* a month; the chief cook, 7*l.* 10*s.* a month; the ship's cook, 4*l.* a month; the baker 6*l.* 10*s.* a month; two boys, 1*l.* a month.

F. W. Raikes on behalf of the above-mentioned plaintiffs.—According to the practice of the court all members of the crew are treated alike according to their ratings. It would be inconvenient to apportion the salvage on any other principle, as in every case it would involve a minute inquiry into what each member of the crew had done. As a matter of fact where salvage services are rendered the whole work of the salvage crew is disorganised, and each member does have extra work to perform. Added to this, if the salving ship be in danger, every member of the crew is exposed to risk. According to the practice in the navy, members of the civil branch of the service share both in salvage and in prize; for instance, a chaplain ranks with a commander.

Butler Aspinall concurred in Dr. Raikes' observations, but asked the court to take into consideration the value of the Lake Huron and the heavy expenses her owners had incurred.

BARNES, J.—The services in this case substantially consisted in towing the Spree into Queenstown, for which the salvors have accepted in settlement the sum of 12,000*l.*, which I am now asked to apportion between the various salvors. The first point to consider is, what sum, having regard to the facts of the case, and the risk and expenses to which the owners of the Lake Huron were put, they should receive. Bearing in mind those expenses, I think the proper sum to allot to the owners is 9200*l.* That leaves the sum of 2800*l.* to apportion among the master and crew. What is the master entitled to? He was in charge during an anxious time while communication was being made between the two ships, and appears to have conducted the manœuvres with great skill, in which he was ably assisted by his experienced officers. I think that, having regard to his services, he ought to receive the sum of 800*l.* That leaves 2000*l.* to divide among the crew, and I see no reason, after hearing the arguments in this case, to make any special distinction between the various navigating members of the crew—that is to say, the officers, seamen, engineers, firemen, donkey-men, the storekeeper, greaser, trimmer, and others belonging to what I may call the active navigating part of the ship's crew. A question, however, arises which it is important to consider having regard to the fact that salvage services are now rendered, and may in future be often rendered, by large steamers carrying a number of non-navigating persons; that is to say, persons who are simply there for the purpose of attending on the passengers, such as stewards, cooks, and others, or whose principal duties, at any rate, are of that character. I have not been referred to any authority by counsel, but I have taken the opportunity of looking through a number of cases, and I think that in this class of case no refined distinctions should be introduced between classes of service on board ship, because to do so would render it extremely difficult to arrive at the right amount in each case. It has therefore been the practice to take a broad view, and to say that the crew are properly rewarded if their portion of the salvage is in accordance with their rating. There are many cases, however, in which a departure from that rule has been acted upon in this court where special danger has been incurred; for instance, in cases where the boat service has been performed at great risk, the court has very commonly given the men in the boat a double portion. That possibly is not commensurate with the risk they run as compared with those who remain on board the ship, but it affords a sufficiently fair rough-and-ready mode of dealing with the matter without too great nicety or refinement. I am not at all prepared to say that stewards and others of that class ought to be looked upon with a discriminating eye, for the simple reason that, although their duties are not such as to ordinarily bring them in contact with the work of navigating the ship, they may at any moment be called upon to assist in the salvage operations, as happened in the recent case of The Noordland (not reported), where all available hands on board the ship were ordered by the master to assist in carrying the hawser, and the stewards, and possibly the stewardess, in that case did everything that was required. In this particular case, however according to the admission of their counsel, the non-navigating members of the crew did not take any part in rendering assistance to the other ship; but it must not be forgotten that they were there ready to do anything that might be required, and incurred any risk which might endanger the ship herself. At the same time it is perfectly obvious that they did not run any real risk beyond what was run by the ship herself, nor did they perform any other duties at all except being a little longer on their passage and making some preparation for receiving the crew of the other vessel in case anything happened to her. Acting on the principle the court has always been guided by, viz., to try to apportion the salvage award in such a way as to do what is right between the salvors, it will be well in this particular case, without laying it down as a rule (as one must judge of each case as it arises), to say that these people whom I have mentioned to the number of eleven ought to receive a half share. That will not, I think, present serious difficulty in working out. The decree I make will be, that the crew, other than the captain, shall receive salvage in the usual way according to their ratings, but these eleven persons shall only have a half share in accordance with their ratings. I should add that, looking at the ratings of these men, many of them will, with the reduced apportionment, get nearly as much as the others, and some of them certainly as much as the able seamen. The costs of this application will come out of the salvage fund.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors for the salvors, Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill.

Tuesday Feb. 21, 1893.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. Jeune.)

THE WALTER D. WALLET. (a)

Wrongful arrest—Mala fides—Damages—Right of action.

Where a ship is wrongfully arrested by Admiralty process, an action will lie in Admiralty without proof of actual damage, if the arrest was made mala fide or crassa negligentia so as to imply malice.

Semble, an action lies at common law for the malicious arrest of a ship by Admiralty process.

THIS was an action instituted by Messrs. Compton, Ullstrom, and Co. against Messrs. Ross and Co., claiming damages for breach of contract to transfer the ship Walter D. Wallet in accordance with an agreement of sale, for trespass upon and wrongful arrest of the said ship.

The defendants, by a contract dated Aug. 25, 1892, agreed to sell the Walter D. Wallet to the plaintiffs, upon terms set out in the judgment, one of which was that the plaintiffs should insure the said ship by policies covering all risks on the basis of 3500*l.* value, and that such policies were to be approved by and indorsed over to the defendants, the vendors of the said ship. The plaintiffs failed to insure the said ship as agreed, and thereupon, after the said ship had been handed over to the plaintiffs, and was loading at Barry, an agent of the defendants who had been a part owner in the said ship, upon the authority of the defendants, issued a writ in an action of restraint as a co-owner, and the ship was arrested by Admiralty process, but was not detained, nor was her loading delayed.

The facts and arguments fully appear in the judgment.

The case came on for hearing before Sir F. Jeune and a special jury, which was by consent discharged.

Dickens, Q.C. and Boyd for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Maurice Hill for the defendants.

The following cases were cited:

Churchill v. Siggers, 3 E. & B. 929;
Emblem v. Myers. 6 H. & N. 54;
Hocking v. Matthews, 1 Ventris, 86;
Ashby v. White, 1 Smith's L. Cas. 9th ed. p. 268;
The Evangelismos, Swa. 378;
The Strathnaver, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 148: 1 App. Cas 58; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 113;
Reed v. Taylor, 4 Taunt. 616;
Ellis v. Abrahams, 8 Q. B. 709;
Wicks v. Fentham, 4 T. R. 247;
The Keroula, 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 61; 11 P. Div. 92; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 23;
The Argentino, 61 L. T. Rep N. S. 706; 14 App. Cas. 519; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 433; Jenings v. Florence, 2 C B. N. S. 467;
The Newport, 5 B. & Ad. 588;
The Nautilus, Swa. 105;
Chandler v. Doulton, 3 H. & C. 553;
Whalley v. Pepper, 7 C. & P. 506;
Bullen and Leake's Pleadings, 3rd edit. p. 350

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 21.—The PRESIDENT.—This action was brought by Messrs. Compton, Ullstrom, and Co. against Messrs. Ross and Co. Three causes of action were put forward in the statement of claim. First, the plaintiffs alleged a breach of contract by the defendants in respect of a failure by the defendants to transfer the Walter D. Wallet to them in accordance with an agreement of sale. Secondly, the plaintiffs alleged a trespass by the defendants on the Walter D. Wallet. Thirdly, the plaintiffs alleged a wrongful arrest of the Walter D. Wallet caused by the defendants. The first of these causes of action was given up at the hearing. Clearly the second cannot be maintained. It is with the third that I have to deal. In the view I take of the case the facts to be stated are few and not in dispute. By a contract made on Aug. 25. 1892, the defendants agreed to sell the Walter D. Wallet to the plaintiffs on the following terms (inter alia): (1) 500*l.* was to be paid on signature of the contract; 1000*l.* further was to be paid, and acceptances of the purchasers for 1915*l.* 15*s.* were to be given before the vessel sailed from Liverpool where she then was for Barry. (2) Policies of insurance approved by and indorsed over to the sellers covering the whole vessel to her full value on her voyage from Liverpool to Barry, were to be given before the vessel sailed from Liverpool, and similar policies on the voyage outwards from Barry, and so long as she should lie at Barry, were to be given before the vessel left Barry. (3) On receipt of the acceptances and the policies covering the voyage to Barry, the sellers were to transfer the vessel into the name of Alfred Henry Compton, a member of the plaintiff firm, and the purchasers were to give the sellers a mortgage covering the whole vessel for the unpaid balance of purchase money to be registered with the bill of sale. The 500*l.* was duly paid and the acceptances were given. Thereupon a bill of sale was executed on Aug. 25, and also a mortgage. On Aug. 25, however, Wm. Ross, by whom the bill of sale was executed, had only sixteen sixty-fourths of the vessel. By Sept. 20 he acquired in all sixty-two sixty-fourths, it being impossible for him to obtain the remainder till a certain will was proved. No difficulty, however, material in this case arose on this score, and though the 1000*l.* was not in fact paid when the vessel was arrested, there was no immediate difficulty on that point. But difficulty had arisen with regard to the policies of insurance. It was by agreement surmounted as regards the voyage from Liverpool to Barry, and the vessel proceeded to the latter place; but while the vessel was at Barry the plaintiffs were unable to obtain policies to the satisfaction of the defendants. They made great efforts to obtain policies covering all risks on the basis of 3500*l.* value which the sellers required, but they were unable to obtain such policies on such a value. Much correspondence took place between the parties, and it was contended before me that the purchasers did obtain and tender policies which under the terms of the contract the seller was bound to accept. I doubt if the policies did satisfy the contract; but I do not think it necessary to decide the point. On Sept. 28, while the controversy about the policies was going on, and while the vessel had been for some days in course of loading at Barry, the defendants telegraphed to their agent, Mr. Hamilton, at Cardiff, that he was not to interfere with the loading, but must arrange to stop the vessel sailing without their authority. Mr. Hamilton had been a part owner of the vessel, but had transferred his shares to Ross, "forgetting," as counsel for the defendants put it, "or forgetting the importance of this fact," he issued a writ in an action of restraint as a co-owner, and on Oct. 3 arrested the ship in the usual way. The loading of the vessel, which then, I think, required about three days more for its completion, was not interfered with, nor was it shown that the vessel was detained by the arrest, or that any specific pecuniary loss was sustained by the plaintiffs.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Under these circumstances it is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs, first, that an action lies at common law for this arrest, with exemplary or, at any rate, nominal damages in respect of the infringement of the plaintiffs' right of possession; secondly, that an application can be made on the same ground in an Admiralty proceeding for similar damages. It is contended on behalf of the defendants, first, that no action lies at common law for abuse of an Admiralty process of arrest; secondly, that no such action lies without proof of actual damage; thirdly, in an Admiralty proceeding in such a case there can be no damage other than compensation to the plaintiffs for actual loss sustained. No precedent, as far as I know, can be found in the books of an action at common law for the malicious arrest of a ship by means of Admiralty process. But it appears to me that the onus lies on those who dispute the right to bring such an action of producing authority against it. As Lord Campbell said, in Churchill v. Siggers (3 E. & B. 937): "To put into force the process of law maliciously or without any reasonable or probable cause is wrongful; and if thereby another is prejudiced in property or person, there is that conjunction of injury and loss which is the foundation of an action on the case." Why is the process of law in Admiralty proceedings to be excepted from this principle? It was long ago held that an action on the case would lie for malicious prosecution ending in imprisonment under the writ De excommunicato capiendo in the Spiritual Court: (Hocking v. Matthews, 1 Ventris, 86.) It can therefore hardly be denied that it would have lain for malicious arrest of a person by Admiralty process in the days when Admiralty suits so commenced, just as for malicious arrest on mesne process at common law. But if for arrest of a person by Admiralty process why not for arrest of a person's property? I can imagine no answer, and the language of the reasons of the Privy Council in the case of The Evangelismos (Swa. 378), quoted with approval in the late case of The Strathnaver (ubi sup.), appears to me to treat the existence of such an action at common law as indisputable. The words to which I refer were employed by their Lordships in speaking of the arrest of a ship in a salvage suit. Their Lordships say: "Undoubtedly there may be cases in which there is either mala fides or that crassa negligentia which implies negligence, which would justify a Court of Admiralty giving damages, as in an action brought at common law damages may be obtained. In the Court of Admiralty the proceedings are, however, more convenient, because in the action in which the main question is disposed of damages may be awarded." Probably the reason why no example of such an action at common law is to be found is that superior convenience, though not exclusive jurisdiction, to which the above words refer. As the Court of Admiralty when setting aside the arrest (which would be the preliminary to a common law action) could do full justice to the injured person, he would not, and probably could not, subsequently resort to a common law tribunal. It was indeed contended by counsel for the defendants that the measure of damages for malicious arrest in the Court of Admiralty was not the same as in the courts of common law, and excluded, as I understood him, a demand for anything but actual pecuniary damages capable of being estimated in exact figures. It is not perhaps necessary to decide this point, though, if the measure be the same, this action might be treated as an application to the Admiralty Division, and if it be not the same the argument for a right of action at common law is strengthened; but I cannot think that the measure of damages in the courts of common law and that of Admiralty is in law different, though possibly the different mode of determining the damages might lead in practice to different results. I know of no authority for any such contention. In general the measure of damages for tort in the Admiralty and in the common law courts is the same. The Argentino (ubi sup.) and the words above quoted from The Evangelismos (ubi sup.) appear to treat it as being so. But it was further contended that, assuming the action at common law to lie, special or actual damage must be alleged and proved. No doubt in an action on the case for commencing or prosecuting an action, civil or criminal, maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause, damage must be shown: (Cotterell v. Jones, 21 L. J. 2, C. P.) But when a malicious action terminates in an arrest of a person, that wrongful detention must of necessity cause some damage to the person who loses for the time his complete liberty. There can hardly be a better example of this than is afforded by the case of Whalley v. Pepper (7 C. & P. 586), where the plaintiff, an attorney, was arrested for a few minutes, and the jury gave him a farthing damages. Yet the action lay, and Littledale, J., who tried the case, refused to certify to deprive the plaintiff of his costs. It appears to me that detention of a man's goods stands in this respect on the same footing as detention of his person. It cannot be supposed that no damage results to him from it. I think that the case of Chandler v. Doulton (3 H. & C. 553) is an authority for this view. That was an action for excessive distress, and though the plaintiff failed to prove any actual damage, he was held entitled to a verdict with nominal damages, which were fixed at 1*l.*, a sum which, as Martin, B. said, before whom the case was tried, was probably too much, but which was named by him as he did not wish to throw discredit on the plaintiff's case. It would appear from that case that the proper direction in an action for an excessive distress is to tell the jury that they must find a verdict for the plaintiff with some damages. In the present case I think that there was no actual damage. I doubt if, as was urged before me, the ship could have been arrested when she was by any proper process, though perhaps an injunction might have been granted to prevent her leaving port until the stipulated policies were given and the stipulated sums were paid. But she was not detained in port by arrest, nor was her loading interfered with. Still the action of the defendant was, I think, clearly in common law phrase without reasonable or probable cause, or in equivalent Admiralty language the result of crassa negligentia, and in a sufficient sense mala fides, and the plaintiffs' ship was in fact seized. Therefore I think the plaintiffs must be supposed to have suffered some damage, and I fix that damage at 1*l.* They are not, I think, entitled to their full costs, because the alternative claims which were abandoned, and the unsuccessful attempt to prove substantial damage, considerably enhanced the expense of the proceedings. I give them half their costs.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Robert Greening.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Co., Liverpool.

Thursday, Nov. 2, 1893.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. Jeune), assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE MAASDAM. (a)

Salvage — Uncompleted services — Surrender at desire of salved ship to other salvors—Readiness to proceed with services—Compensation for loss sustained by not completing services.

Where a ship, after having rendered salvage service to another ship in distress, is in a position to render further valuable service but is superseded, at the desire of the ship in distress, by another ship which is chosen to complete the service, the Court, in estimating the amount of remuneration to which the first salvors are entitled, will take into consideration not only the services which they actually effected, but also those which they were ready and able to perform.

THIS was an action instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Winchester to recover salvage remuneration for services rendered to the steamship Maasdam, her cargo and freight.

On the 14th Sept. the Winchester, a steamer of 2198 tons gross and 1431 tons net register, whilst on a voyage in ballast from Rotterdam to New York, and when some 1000 miles from Queenstown, fell in with the Maasdam, which, being a steamship of 2577 tons net and 3990 tons gross register, was on a voyage from Rotterdam to New York, laden with a general cargo and carrying 450 passengers. Her engines had broken down two days previously, and, although repaired, had again broken down, and the engineers were trying to repair them when the Winchester came up. When the lights of the Winchester were seen, rockets were sent up from the Maasdam, and the Winchester stood by her till daylight, when, at the request of the Maasdam to tow her should it become necessary, the Winchester decided to remain by her. In the meantime repairs were effected to the Maasdam's engines, after which she went easy ahead, the Winchester keeping near her. In the afternoon the engines of the Maasdam had again to be stopped, and the Winchester then got a rope on board her. The Winchester was proceeding to tow, when the rope parted. The next morning, whilst the vessels were making fast again with a wire hawser, the P. Caland, a steamer belonging to the same company as the Maasdam, hove in sight. According to the plaintiffs' case, the master of the Maasdam, having come to an arrangement with the P. Caland to tow his vessel to Queenstown or Plymouth, requested the master of the Winchester to let go his tow-rope. This the latter, after some demur, agreed to do, he being of opinion, according to his evidence in the witness-box and to a letter written by him to his owners, that the Winchester would not be able to tow the Maasdam. He thereupon consented to surrender the Maasdam to the P. Caland, if the master of the Maasdam would agree to a payment of 1500*l.* in addition to what might be recovered for the services already rendered, but the master of the Maasdam would not agree to this, and the Winchester thereupon surrendered the Maasdam to the P. Caland. By noon the Winchester proceeded on her voyage to New York. The plaintiffs alleged that when the Winchester fell in with the Maasdam she was to the northward of the usual track of steamers, and in a position of considerable danger, and when the Winchester left her she had been brought to a position some eighty miles to the southward and eastward of the place where she was first sighted.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants, with regard to what passed after the P. Caland came up were as follows: The Winchester was very light, and was not in good trim for towing a vessel of the size of the Maasdam, and, as the P. Caland, a larger and more powerful steamer than the Winchester, was prepared to take the Maasdam in tow, the master of the latter vessel informed the master of the Winchester that he thought it better that he should take the assistance of the P. Caland. To this the master of the Winchester agreed, and also said that in rough weather the Winchester, owing to her trim, would not be manageable with another vessel in tow. It was then mutually agreed between the two masters that the P. Caland should take the Maasdam in tow, and, the master of the Winchester having asked for and obtained a written statement detailing his services, of which the master of the Winchester approved. The wire hawser of the Maasdam was then let go on board the Winchester and hauled in on board the Maasdam; and, with the acquiescence, consent, and approval of the master of the Winchester, and in beautiful weather, the Maasdam at noon proceeded in tow of the P. Caland for Plymouth, where she arrived on the 21st Sept.

The engineers succeeded in repairing the crank pin of the Maasdam sufficiently to enable her engines to be worked from the 16th until her arrival at Plymouth.

The defendants denied that the Winchester was ever exposed to risk of collision or any other danger whatsoever, and alleged that the Maasdam was throughout in the regular track of steamers, that she had sighted several vessels, and was never in any danger. The Winchester stood by the Maasdam for thirty-four hours, but rendered her no further assistance.

The defendants also alleged that in the circumstances the master was justified in taking the assistance of the P. Caland.

It was proved that the master of the Winchester had, on his arrival in New York, written a letter to his owners in which he stated that he doubted whether the Winchester could ever have towed the Maasdam into port.

The value of the Maasdam was 40,000*l.*; of the cargo 20,000*l.*; and of the freight 750*l.* The value of the Winchester was 20,000*l.*; of the cargo 4000*l.*, and of the freight 250*l.*

Aspinall, Q.C. and T. F. Dawson Miller for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to recover salvage for the mere standing-by at the request of the defendants. The Maasdam was a passenger ship, which enhanced the value of this service. Secondly, as the plaintiffs had made fast to the vessel, and had attempted to and were ready and willing to tow her, they were entitled to compensation for the loss sustained by reason of their being deprived of the opportunity of completing the service; or, at any rate, were entitled to an enhanced rate of salvage by reason of their readiness and williness to complete:

The Maude, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 26; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 338.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Butler Aspinall for the defendants.—It is admitted that the plaintiffs are entitled to salvage for the time they stood by; but it is contended that they are not entitled to compensation for not being allowed to complete the services. According to the plaintiffs' own evidence, the master of the Winchester considered her to be unable to tow the Maasdam.

Aspinall, Q.C. in reply.

THE PRESIDENT.—In this case the remarkable feature is, that the actual services rendered are not very considerable. But there is another branch of the case, and that is the probability or possibility of other services being rendered of a valuable kind, if the services had not been altogether dispensed with. As to the principle upon which a claim of this kind ought to be estimated, I think there can be no serious doubt. There may be a question of language. It may be a question whether one ought to speak of compensation for services which might have been rendered and which were not, or it might be more proper to speak of remuneration for services rendered as a whole, treating as part of those services the readiness to give help which might be available. I do not think it very important to consider the exact language that ought to be used. Probably authority might be found for either view. But the principle appears to me to be clear, that if a vessel, after having rendered some service, is in a position to render further assistance of a valuable kind, then she is entitled, on her remuneration being estimated, to have taken into consideration, not only that which she did, but that which she was ready and able to do. I do not think that it is a very important circumstance whether the vessel which refused the continued services did so rightly or wrongly. Stress appeared to be put in one case mentioned to me as to the duty of the vessel which was being salved. I think it was said that she ought not to have discarded the services of her original salvors. I do not think that is a question of importance. If a vessel, which has been partially salved, for reasons of her own decides to have the salvage completed by another vessel, I do not know that she has not a right to do so, subject of course to this, that in that case remuneration will have to be paid for the second one probably, and certainly for the first.

Therefore, applying that principle to this case, even though one thought that the Winchester could have performed valuable services, and could even have completed the salvage, still I am very far indeed from saying that the Maasdam was not, from her point of view, perfectly right in availing herself of the services of the P. Caland, a vessel belonging to her own company. Whether the Winchester was in a position to render valuable service is a matter I have to consider. I will now consider both points of the case. First, what was the value of the services which were actually rendered? These, I think, cannot be placed very high. It is true that the service was rendered to a vessel of a very valuable kind. The value of the vessel salved is put at 40,000*l.*, that of her cargo at 20,000*l.*, and that of her freight at 750*l.* The vessel salving was also of considerable value—20,000*l.* Her cargo is said to have been 400 tons, worth about 4000*l.*, and her freight 250*l.*, and she was a vessel of not inconsiderable horse-power—something like 200, I think. These were the two vessels. But it has at once to be admitted that the actual service rendered was not great. No towage, practically was done at all, and although the vessel may have been to some extent out of the ordinary track of steamers, the Trinity Masters tell me, in their judgment, that she was not to any great extent out of it—even if that were so, the Winchester cannot to any great extent pray that in aid, because it is to be observed that the Maasdam regained her position and got herself into the track of vessels, and into the place where the P. Caland found her entirely by her own steam and sails, and with no assistance from the Winchester. So it comes to this, that the chief service which the Winchester rendered was standing by. I do not think that, however, is a service altogether to be minimised. The Maasdam was a passenger vessel; she had a large number of passengers on board, and it was no doubt important to have another vessel standing by her, ready to aid her in any eventuality that might occur. Her crank pin had broken some days before, and the weather was very bad, not so much at the time when the vessel was taken in tow, but two or three days before—and it may well be that the Maasdam exercised a very wise judgment in being anxious to have another vessel near, so that the passengers at any rate might feel that every care was being taken of them. I therefore think it is a service not to be altogether disregarded, and the Trinity Masters tell me there was some risk to the Winchester in what she did. I do not think much ought to be said as to the risk of collision, which arose from default in the steering gear, because it was the steering gear which should have been in a better condition; but there was risk in lying so close, and in the boating operations, and altogether there are circumstances which induce one to say that the Winchester performed that part of the service well, and herself encountered some risk in doing it. Therefore, though the actual service cannot be put very high, I think it was a service which was well rendered, and which was in itself valuable. Then comes the other part of the matter, the more difficult to deal with because it is more speculative. I was at once confronted by the very remarkable letter written by the captain of the Winchester, when he got to New York, stating what his view was of the circumstances and of the probabilities of his action. Of course, I have given due consideration to that letter, and to the circumstances of the case, as also have the Trinity Masters, whose advice on this matter I thought it right to take, and on which I intend to rely. In their view the Winchester was in a position to have rendered very valuable service indeed to the Maasdam, had her services not been superseded. They think that the master in writing that letter took the matter too much against himself. The motive perhaps was that he desired to exonerate himself from any imputation of having left a vessel to which he had rendered valuable service, and of having allowed a valuable prize in that sense to slip through his fingers. But, whatever the motive, the Trinity Masters think that, looking at the horse-power of the Winchester, the condition of the weather, and above all things to the fact that the wind was a favourable wind for towing homewards, the Winchester could, had she not been superseded, have been able to render very valuable service indeed, and they think that she would have been able to take that vessel safely into port. It is quite true that there were some stormy days, and that the P. Caland rolled a good deal, and that the Winchester was light; but it does not by any means follow that because the P. Caland rolled the Winchester would have rolled to a greater extent. The Trinity Masters tell me that the rolling of vessels is not always proportionate to that of others in that sense, and they think that, though the Winchester was light, she could, with her horse-power, have exercised a towing power which would have been valuable. The matter of the ropes is not one on which stress should be laid, because, though the manilla broke under circumstances which it is extremely difficult to understand, still there remained the ropes afterwards attached, though I do not know whether they would have been available for the whole time of the towing. So I think that the possibility of valuable service being rendered by the Winchester must be put a good deal higher than one would gather from the master's letter, when one comes to consider the circumstances of the case. I do not intend to dwell on any other aspect of the letters which have been produced, or the relations between the captain and his owners. I am sorry that the owners thought it right to dismiss their captain for having written a letter which I have no doubt he considered to be an honest letter; but that cannot affect, and I do not think I ought to allow it to affect, the question of what is the proper remuneration to be paid in this case. The only way in which it strikes me as relevant, and that perhaps hardly relevant to this particular case but to these cases in general, is, that if it was borne in upon one's mind that owners were so anxious for salvage that they were prepared to do a great deal in every case to obtain it, then I think it might be forced upon one's conviction that salvage awards which produced such strong feelings in the minds of owners in their desire to become salvors ought perhaps to be reconsidered as to their amount. But it is not one case that would induce one to come to that conclusion, or put aside the more general considerations which always lead this court to say that owners ought to be handsomely remunerated, so that they may be properly and not improperly anxious for their vessels to engage in salvage operations. I think that the proper award in this case will be the sum of 1250*l.*, of which I propose to give 800*l.* to the owners, leaving 450*l.*, of which the captain will receive one-third, and the rest to go to the crew according to their respective ratings.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, William A. Crump and Son.

Solicitors for the defendants, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Tuesday, April 18, 1893.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE BRIGELLA. (a)

Marine insurance—General average—Chartered freight—Foreign statement.

Where a British ship under charter outward bound in ballast to America to load for the homeward voyage put into an English port to repair damage caused by heavy weather, and incurred expenses for such repairs which were not incurred to avert a loss of the joint interest of ship and freight, and the shipowners sued the underwriters to recover an alleged general average loss on a policy on chartered homeward freight, providing that general average was payable "as per foreign statement if required," the underwriters were held not liable for a contribution to an alleged general average loss shown by an average statement prepared in London according to the alleged provisions of the American law, the expenses in question not being a general average loss, and the shipowners being alone interested in ship and freight, and as there was no necessity for any foreign adjustment, the foreign statement clause imposed no liability upon the underwriters.

THIS was a claim for 11*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* under a policy on chartered freight, by the owners of the British steamship Brigella, against an underwriter at Lloyds.

The policy was on "chartered homeward freight," and provided that general average charges should be payable "as per foreign statement if required." The Brigella was chartered to proceed from Liverpool to a port in the United States, and there load a cargo for the United Kingdom or continent. She left Liverpool in ballast, and in consequence of bad weather put into Holyhead for repairs, where certain expenses were incurred. She then returned to Liverpool, and incurred further expense in repairing, after which she proceeded to Baltimore, and brought back a cargo to Barrow.

An average statement was then prepared in London according to the alleged provisions of American law, showing general average charges amounting to 186*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.*, of which the proportion alleged to be payable under the policy signed by the defendant was 11*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* Amongst other items carried to general average in the statement was an item of 154*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* for wages and victualling of the crew, while the Brigella was being repaired at Liverpool. None of the expenses incurred at Holyhead or Liverpool were incurred for the joint preservation of ship and freight. The plaintiffs were alone interested in ship and freight.

The facts were agreed and set out in a statement signed by the parties, and are fully set out in the judgment.

F. Laing for the plaintiffs.

J. Hurst and Bingley for the defendants.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In addition to the cases and text-books referred to in the judgment, the following were cited:

Williams v. London Assurance Company, 1 M. & S 318;
Hill v. Wilson, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 412; 4 C. P. Div. 329; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 198;
Fletcher v. Alexander, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 432; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 375; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 69;
Potter v. Rankin, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 347; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 562; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 374;
Lowndes on General Average, 4th edit., p. 310;
Arnould on Marine Insurance, 6th edit., vol. 2, p. 906;
Abbott on Shipping, 13th edit., p. 658;
Parsons on Shipping, edit. of 1869, vol. 1, p. 452.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 18.—BARNES, J.—The plaintiffs are the owners of the steamship Brigella. The defendant is an underwriter at Lloyds. The action is brought to recover for an alleged general average loss upon a policy of marine insurance on chartered freight of the said steamship, and although the amount in dispute is small, the question raised is of considerable importance in insurance law, and has not hitherto been decided. After hearing the arguments in the case I took time to consider, not because my opinion was unformed, but because it is desirable in cases of this kind to express with accuracy the reasons upon which the judgment is founded. The facts are as follows: On the 22nd Aug. 1891 the plaintiffs entered into a charter-party with Messrs. Parr and Son, under which the steamship Brigella described as then trading being tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted for the voyage with liberty to take outward cargo to a port or ports in the United States for owners benefit (a provision of which the owners did not avail themselves), was with all convenient speed to sail and proceed to Baltimore or some one other port only as therein mentioned as ordered by the charterers, upon arrival in the United States, at port of call if in ballast, or prior to discharge of inward cargo if with cargo; and there load from the charterers or their agents a full and complete cargo of wheat or Indian corn for the United Kingdom or continent as ordered, and deliver the same on being paid freight at certain rates specified in the said charter-party; and the charter provided that freight as per bill of lading should be taken without deduction in payment of the charter any deficiency to be paid at port of loading in cash, less insurance, and any surplus over and above estimated charter freight to be settled there at the Custom House, before the vessel cleared, by captain's draft in charterer's favour upon consignee, payable five days after arrival at port of discharge, and that charterer's liability under the charter should cease on cargo being shipped, but the vessel to have a lien thereon for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, or average, so that upon completion of the loading and adjustment of the freight in accordance with the above provisions, the charterer ceased to have any practical concern in the voyage. On the 24th Aug. 1891 the plaintiff insured with the defendant and other underwriters 1180*l.* on "chartered homeward freight" valued at 2180*l.*, the voyage being described in the policy as "At and from Liverpool to Delaware Breakwater, and at and thence to New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Newport News, and at and thence to any port or ports of call, and or discharge in any order in the United Kingdom, and or on the continent," within certain limits which were the same as those in the charter. The policy contained the usual sue and labour clause, and provided that general average salvage charges should be payable as per foreign statement as required, or as per York-Antwerp rules if in accordance with the contract of affreightment. The charter-party did not refer to these rules. The vessel was at Liverpool at the time of the making of the said charter-party, and she left that port for Delaware Breakwater, her port of call for orders in the United States, in ballast, on the 24th Aug. 1891, and meeting with some bad weather her ballast tanks began to leak, and she put into Holyhead on the 26th Aug. On the 29th Aug. she left Holyhead for Liverpool, in order to effect repairs to her tanks, and arrived at Liverpool the same day, and after repairs to the tanks had been completed she sailed again on the 10th Sept. She afterwards loaded under the charter at Baltimore, and proceeded to Barrow, where the cargo was delivered. An average statement was afterwards prepared in London by Messrs. Manley, Hopkins, Son, and Cookes, the well known average adjusters. It is stated in paragraph C of the admission of facts before me that the statement was "prepared according to the alleged provisions of American law, showing general average charges amounting to 186*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.*, of which the proportion payable under the policy signed by the defendant if the underwriters are liable is 11*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* It appears from the average statement that the whole of the expenses at Holyhead amount to 33*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*, of which 10*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.* is carried into the general average column. The vessel appears to have been taken to a place of safety in the port of Holyhead, without incurring any expense in so doing. The only other items in the statement carried to general average are 1*l.* 1*s.* for petty expenses and telegrams at Liverpool, 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* agency at Liverpool, 154*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* for wages and victualling of the crew while the vessel was under repairs at Liverpool for twenty-two days, and 7*l.* for expenses of Mr. Temperley (who acted as I gather for the owners), attending the vessel while under repairs at Liverpool, and lastly 1*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* for telegrams. The items to which I have referred in the general average column make up the said sum of 186*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.* The value of the chartered freight for the purposes of contribution is taken at 1526*l.*, being the gross freight less contingent expenses, which I presume means the cost of earning it which would have been saved if the vessel had been lost. This sum of 1526*l.* is made to bear 21*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.* of the alleged general average, and the ship is made to bear 1649*l.* 10*s.* Of the 21*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.* the Lloyds underwriters under the policy in question bear 11*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* the sum claimed in this action. It will be seen that none of the items of expenditure at Holyhead or Liverpool appear to have been incurred for the preservation of the ship and freight. They all relate to matters occurring after the risk to the vessel had ceased, and to have been incurred to repair the vessel, or owing to the delay during repairs.

It was practically conceded in argument that they were not of the nature of general average sacrifice or expenditure according to English law, and the vessel having put into port to repair particular average loss only, it was not contended that according to that law the wages and provisions of the crew at Liverpool would be treated as a general average loss, or be in any way borne by the underwriters. But the following points were taken by the plaintiffs before me—namely, first, that a general average loss had arisen, which ought to be contributed to by the chartered freight; secondly, that, although the plaintiffs alone were interested in ship and freight, their claim on the underwriters on freight was to be treated as if the plaintiffs had contributed in general average to the losses in question; thirdly, that the place of adjustment was America, and that the contract being to pay general average as per foreign statement if required, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on the basis of the statement above mentioned. In the course of argument counsel referred to a number of cases and passages from text writers; but when they are examined there is, with two exceptions, not much to be found in them bearing directly upon the real question in this case; and in order to arrive at a decision thereon it is necessary to consider the principles to be applied in solving it, and several important cases in addition to those referred to in argument which indirectly assist in doing so. I understand the plaintiffs' point to be intended to establish that a general average loss has arisen; that it has been properly adjusted according to American law by a statement which satisfies the term "a foreign statement" in the policy; and that the plaintiffs must be treated as having contributed to the loss on the basis of that statement. Some of the authorities cited bear upon the general question of the liability of chartered freight to contribute in general average where there are really different contributory interests in respect of ship and cargo; but it is unnecessary, in my opinion, to embark upon this general question. The real question in the case is, whether or not, where a ship is proceeding in ballast to her loading port under or in pursuance of her charter, and the only persons interested in the ship and chartered freight are the shipowners, there can be any general average loss for which the underwriters are liable under a policy on chartered freight containing the foreign statement clause. I will first consider the matter apart from that clause. Numerous definitions of a general average loss have been given, but I need only refer to that of Lawrance, J. in his often-quoted judgment of Birkley v. Presgrave (1 East, 228), where he says, "All loss which arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made or expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo comes within general average and must be borne proportionately by all who are interested." The matter is also discussed in Svendsen v. Wallace (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 901; 5 Asp. Mar. Law 453; 10 App. Cas. 404). There is involved in this statement the loss sustained by one or some for the benefit of all, and the liability of all to contribute thereto. This liability to contribute is as old as the Rhodian law, the text of which as given in the Digest of Justinian (Dig. xiv., ii.), is so well known. The rule of English law is stated by Lord Tenterden (then Abbott, C.J.) in Simonds v. White (2 B. & C. 811), in the following terms: "The principle of general average, namely, that all whose property has been saved by the sacrifice of the property of another shall contribute to make good his loss, is of very ancient date, and of universal reception among commercial nations.

The obligation to contribute depends therefore not so much upon the terms of any particular instrument as upon a general rule of maritime law. The obligation may be limited, qualified, or even excluded by the special terms of a contract as between the parties to the contract; but there is nothing of that kind in any contract between the parties to this case. There are, however, many variations in the laws and usages of different nations as to the losses that are considered to fall within this principle." Bramwell, L.J., in Wright v. Marwood (45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 297; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 451; 7 Q. B. Div. 62), seemed to think that the liability to contribute arose from an implied contract inter se to contribute by those interested. But the Master of the Rolls thought, in Burton v. English (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 768; 12 Q. B. Div. 218; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187), that it did not arise from any contract at all, but from the old Rhodian laws, and had become incorporated into the laws of England as the law of the ocean. He says: "It is not as a matter of contract, but in consequence of a common danger where natural justice requires that all should contribute to indemnify for the loss of property which is sacrificed by one in order that the whole adventure may be saved." Bowen, L.J., in the same case, says, that although legally it may be a sound way of looking at it as arising out of implied contract, he considers nevertheless this is technical, and that the claim for average contribution at all events is part of the law of the sea. Whichever way it is looked at, the obligation to contribute in general average exists between the parties to the adventure, whether they are insured or not. The circumstance of a party being insured can have no influence upon the adjustment of general average, the rules of which, as I have in effect shown above, are entirely independent of insurance. If a contracting party is insured he can claim an indemnity against his underwriter in respect of the contribution which he has been compelled to pay in general average, but that is all. I do not forget that in some cases an assured may have a right to recover in full for the loss of sacrificed property, but the underwriters have the right to recover contribution from the various contributories, and subject to certain differences of values the result to the underwriter should be practically the same as if the assured had only claimed his contribution from them: (Dickenson v. Jardine, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 717; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 639; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 126.) But this exception does not affect the question I am considering. The contribution is based on the benefit derived from the sacrifice by each interest; in other words, on the values saved, and in the case of freight, this is the amount of freight at risk, minus the expenses of earning it which would have been saved if the ship had been lost. This net amount of freight is not the amount of freight which underwriters on freight would have to pay if the ship had been lost, because they would have to pay the gross amoun insured without deducting any cost of earning it, which would have been saved if the ship had been lost.

Now the interests at risk in the present case are the ship and the chartered freight. These interests belong to the plaintiffs. All that is said in the cases that I have referred to, and that I have said about general average and contribution, seems utterly inapplicable to such a case. There is no contract to contribute, and no law of the sea affecting the matter. If the plaintiffs were not insured they would have to bear their own loss. No adjustment would be required, nor would any question of contribution arise, and there would be no general average properly speaking. If, however, the plaintiffs had insured all their interests in one policy, expenses properly incurred in averting a loss of those interests imperilled by a peril insured against would fail to be borne by the underwriters under the sue and labour clause. If they had insured the ship in one policy and the freight in another, it follows that the underwriters on the respective policies should bear expenses of averting a loss of those interests in proportion not to the actual values saved, but to the benefits derived by the underwriters from the averting of the loss, that is to say, in proportion to the amounts insured by them respectively: (Benecke on Marine Insurance, pp. 322 and 323.) I have already pointed out that in the present case there were no expenses incurred to avert a loss of the joint interests, but only certain expenses incurred in order to repair the ship, or owing to the delay in effecting those repairs. There was no general average loss, or even any loss or expenditure common to both interests. There was no necessity for any general average adjustment, and no question as to any place of adjustment. The plaintiffs' proposition involves the suggestion that, when one person only is interested in the subject-matters at risk and insures them separately, the underwriters on each interest separately insured must be considered as consenting to deal with the assured as if the other interests belong to different persons. But I can see no foundation for this in an ordinary policy such as that before me, or in fact. It is inconsistent with the notion of a contract of indemnity, and with the principles which I have considered above. The plaintiffs, however, supported this suggestion by the two cases of Moran v. Jones (7 E. & B. 523), and Oppenheim v. Fry (5 B. & S. 348). The actual decision in Moran v. Jones was, that the expenses there in question were general average, to which ship, freight, and cargo were to contribute. There are some expressions in Lord Campbell's judgment from which it might be inferred that he thought that where there was no cargo on board, and the ship and freight belonged to the same person, there might be a general average loss; but I doubt whether he really meant to say more than that the underwriters on ship and freight would have to contribute to a sacrifice incurred to avert a total loss of ship and freight in proportion to the benefit they derived from the sacrifice. In Oppenheim v. Fry (ubi sup.) there was a policy on a steamer, the hull and machinery being separately valued, with a clause "average payable on the whole or on each as if separately insured." The steamer had discharged her cargo at Constantinople, and while she lay there without any cargo on board her hull was damaged by fire, but not her machinery. The cost of repairs did not amount to 3 per cent. on the insured value of the hull, but an additional sum of 55*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* was expended in extinguishing the fire to preserve the hull from total destruction. It was proposed to add the whole of this to the cost of repairs, so as to take the case out of the common 3 per cent. memorandum. The action was for a particular average loss on hull, and the decision was that, however the expenses were considered, the plaintiffs could not add the whole of them to the cost of repairs to make up a sum exceeding 3 per cent. of the insured value of the hull, but that they must be apportioned between the hull and the machinery. All that was held in both courts was, that the expenses ought to be apportioned partly to the hull and partly to the machinery; and as when this was done the cost of repairs plus the portion of the said expenses apportioned to hull did not come to 3 per cent. on the insured value of the hull, the verdict for the defendant was allowed to stand. The judges in the Queen's Bench did not consider it necessary to decide whether the expenses of extinguishing the fire amounting to 55*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* were general average; and in the Exchequer Chamber no reference to general average appears in the judgment. Moreover, I do not find that the attention of the courts was directed to the sue and labour clause. The judgment of Blackburn, J. was especially relied on by the plaintiffs' counsel; but the learned judge said it was not necessary for the decision of the case to say whether the expenditure was general average or not, and in the rest of his remarks I do not think the distinction between general average properly speaking and an apportionment of expenses on the insured values as between an assured who owned all the interests and insured them separately and his different underwriters was present to the learned judge's mind, nor is the sue and labour clause referred to by him. The case was an attempt to treat the whole expense of saving both interests from loss as particular average on one alone, namely, the ship, whereas the expenses were sue and labour charges, properly apportionable as between the shipowners and their underwriters over the interests benefited: (Kidston v. Empire Marine Insurance Company, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 357.) In the American case of Potter v. Ocean Insurance Company (3 Sumner, 27), Story, J. considered the underwriters who insured different interests belonging to one person as being in the same position with regard to general average as if they had really been different contributories; but I notice that he speaks of the loss as being "in the nature of general average," and he illustrates his argument by the case of an empty ship which is dismasted in a storm and compelled to put into port to repair, or otherwise she must be abandoned at sea, and he asks, "Are not the expenses of the voyage in such a case to the port of necessity of the nature of a general average? Are they not incurred as much for the benefit of the underwriters as for the shipowner?" These expenses, for the reasons I have given above, are not, in my opinion, general average; but the underwriters on ship may be made liable for such of them as are incurred to avert loss on the grounds I have before stated.

Unless, therefore, the clause "general average payable as per foreign statement, if required," alters the case, there was no loss on the freight policy. The object of this clause was fully considered in Harris v. Scaramanga (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 339), where it was held, upon a policy on goods which contained the clause, "to pay general average as per foreign statement if so made up," that English underwriters are bound by the foreign adjustment as an adjustment, if made according to the law of the country in which it was made, and that they are so bound although the contributions are apportioned between the different interests in a manner different from the English mode, or although matters are brought into or omitted from general average which would not be so treated in England. The present Master of the Rolls in the course of his judgment refers to the diversities which may arise if this clause be not inserted as pointed out in 2 Phillips on Insurance, sect. 1414, and says: "It seems to me that the only way to give effect to the marginal provision in this case, and an effect as against the underwriter who has by it taken upon himself some real substantial obligation different from his ordinary obligation, is to say that it was intended to meet this recognised diversity, and to oblige the underwriter to indemnify the assured against a loss which should fall upon him by compulsion in the port of Bremen, and which should be there treated as against him as a general average loss or contribution." This clause then makes the underwriter liable to pay on the same basis as that on which the contributories have been compelled to pay under an adjustment made up at a foreign port in accordance with the law of that port, and the statement referred to in the clause is a foreign statement which has been necessarily and properly prepared in order to adjust the rights and liabilities of contributories; that is, the amounts to be contributed by the various parties interested in an adventure for the purpose of enabling those parties to settle with each other at the foreign port at which the adjustment should be made, although possibly it is immaterial whether that statement is in fact made up by an adjuster residing at the foreign port or in England, provided it is in accordance with the law of the foreign port, where the adjustment ought according to the circumstances of the case to be made. But in my opinion the clause has no relation to a case like the present, where there has been no necessity for any foreign adjustment, nor any compulsion to pay general average according to foreign law, nor any contribution in fact in general average. The statement before me was merely prepared in order that the plaintiffs might claim upon their underwriters, and it is not based upon the true benefit derived by the underwriters from the alleged losses, for it is based on actual values, and not on insured values. It is based on a supposed contribution which has no foundation in fact, and which the plaintiffs' counsel admitted was a fiction. Adjustments are made at the port of destination, or where the voyage is broken up, because of the necessity for an adjustment at the place where the interests separate, and at a time when the master can compel the contributories to pay, or secure the amounts to be contributed, before he parts with the goods and gives up his lien on them. There is no reason in principle, nor of necessity, nor even of convenience, why the claim on the underwriters in this case should be made up upon an American rather than upon an English basis. The claim is in respect of expenditure made in England, and not in respect of any sacrifice of subject-matters of insurance. The reason why the plaintiffs prefer the American basis is that, if it can be supported, they will recover from their underwriters for the wages and provisions of the crew, which it was admitted would not be allowed in this case in England. I notice that the statement is only alleged to be made up according to American law, and, after referring to the American works on general average. I doubt whether according to that law the expenses in question would in the present case be adjusted as a general average loss. I think the admission in this case means little if anything more than that, according to American law, wages and provisions of the crew from the time a vessel bears away for a port of repairs are allowed in general average, provided that it is necessary for the safety of the ship, cargo, and freight alike, that the repairs should be made, whether the injury which created the necessity for them was itself caused by a general average act, or by a peril excepted in the contract of carriage. I am therefore of opinion that the plaintiffs' claim fails, and that the defendant is entitled to judgment with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche.
Solicitors for the defendants, Pritchard and Sons.

Tuesday, June 20, 1893.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE MUNROE. (a)

Marine insurance — Collision clause — Sunken wreck.

Where a steamship ran aground and rested on an old sunken wreck, and then moved forward on to iron ore, which had some years before formed part of a cargo of another vessel, and sustained damage by the contact with the wreck and ore, the underwriters were held liable for such damage under a policy covering "loss or damage through collision with any sunken wreck."

THIS was a claim by the International Marine Insurance Company against an underwriter under a policy of re-insurance.

The plaintiffs had re-insured with the defendant and other underwriters the screw-steamship Munroe for 2000*l*., by a policy which so far as is material was as follows:

Being a re-insurance of the International Marine Insurance Company Limited, and (or) on account of whom it may concern, against the risk of loss or damage through collision with any other ship or vessels, or ice, sunken or floating wreck or other floating substance, or harbours, wharves, piers, stages, and similar structures, and including the R. D. C. as in original and all special clauses such as Allans, Cunards, &c, so far as regards collision.

It was agreed between the parties that the action should be tried upon the facts appearing in a memorandum of the master of the Munroe, the protest, policy of re-insurance, two surveyors' reports, a survey report on behalf of cargo, and a joint certificate of two surveyors' opinions.

The claim was in respect of damage sustained by the steamship Munroe taking the ground while entering Port Talbot, and resting on and coming in contact with an old wreck and cargo out of another ship.

In the master's memorandum it was stated,

With reference to the accident to my steamer the Munroe, in which she was ashore at the entrance to Port Talbot, I beg to confirm the statement that during the time she was lying there she was lying partly on the wreck of the Salado, and partly on the remnants of the wreckage of a cargo of iron ore; that whilst lying there the greater part, if not all, the damage sustained by her was caused by the obstructions and abnormal state of the shore in consequence of the wreckage. This is borne out by the state of the bottom of the ship, which clearly shows that she was subjected to a strain which could not have been put upon her had she lain on the strand in a way which might be expected in a sandy bottom.

According to the protest, the Munroe in the course of a voyage from Huelva to Port Talbot laden with a cargo of ore and precipitate on the 7th Feb. 1893 while attempting to enter Port Talbot ran on to the beach, and on the tide falling she was found to be lying on an old wreck. She bumped heavily, and subsequently moved forward and struck on some iron ore which had formed part of the cargo of another vessel. She was ultimately got off on the 13th, and sold for 910*l*.

According to one survey report it was alleged that the "Munroe first struck the projecting wreck of the Salado with her starboard bow, passed over same until she rested amidships and remained, and that the damages sustained were caused through her striking and grounding on the said wreckage."

According to another report she was found "lying fore and aft on the wreck of a vessel, the frames of which were from a foot to eighteen inches above the sand. During the next two or three tides the Munroe moved about her own length further forward off the Salado, and on to a bank of iron ore, which was a cargo of another vessel which had been lying there some two or three years. It is my opinion that the damage to plates of bottom was caused by the frames of Salado holing and the iron ore indenting them," and that the further damage was "principally caused by the excessive strain the vessel sustained lying on the wreck of the Salado and the bank of iron ore."

Pickford and Bateson for the plaintiffs.—The vessel became a constructive total loss by damage caused by a collision with a sunken wreck. If so, the defendants are liable under the policy. [They were stopped.]

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the defendants.—The vessel merely ran on the beach or stranded. There was no collision, so as to satisfy the terms of the policy. Iron ore cannot be said to be sunken wreck.

BARNES, J.—The question in this case is, whether or not, under the circumstances which have happened, there has been loss or damage through collision with the matters described in the clause in the policy which would enable the plaintiffs to recover from the defendants. The facts are stated in the protest, in a memorandum of the master, and in several surveys which have been placed before me, and it seems that on the 7th Feb. 1893 the Munroe was entering Port Talbot, and in coming in, as she neared the pier, she took a sheer which those on board of her were unable to counteract, and she ran on what they thought was the beach; but when the water left her they found she was in fact lying on the top of an old wreck of a vessel called the Salado. She struck there very nearly amidships, and after an interval came further forward until she struck on some wreckage described as iron ore from some other ship which was lying there, and by both those strikings she was damaged. To what extent the latter was of serious import I do not know. It seems to me that practically no distinction can be drawn in substance between the two cases; but the question is, whether this is loss or damage through collision with a sunken wreck or wrecks. It is said, on behalf of the defendants, that it is nothing more than a taking of the ground, and that the ground was unfortunately harder underneath than it ought to be, owing to some submerged wreckage. I do not so regard the facts. The Munroe seems to me to have run on to a sunken wreck and there remained fast until the damage was done by the wreck, and afterwards by the iron ore. The surveyors are of opinion that the Munroe first struck the projecting wreck of the Salado with her starboard bow, passed over the same until she rested amidships and remained, and that the damages sustained were caused through her striking and grounding on the wreckage. The other documents are very much to the same effect, and the conclusion to which I have come is, that this was "loss or damage through collision with sunken wreck" or wrecks within the meaning of the clause which affects this insurance; and that the whole of the damage is covered thereby. Therefore my judgment will be for the plaintiffs, for an amount to be ascertained in the way agreed upon; or, in the event of any difficulty, the matter can be referred to me. The plaintiffs will have a certificate for their costs.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Field, Roscoe, and Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Saturday, June 24, 1893.

(Present: The Right Hons. Lord WATSON, Sir RICHARD COUCH, Sir FRANCIS JEUNE, and GEORGE DENMAN.)

THE UTOPIA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT OF GIBRALTAR

Collision — Sunken wreck — Lights — Harbour authority — Maritime lien — Wrecks Removal Act 1877.

Where the harbour authority of the port of G. undertook and paid for the lighting of a sunken wreck, of which her owners continued in possession and eventually raised, and in consequence of the lighting being inefficient another vessel collided with the wreck, her owners were held not liable for the collision, the control and management of the lighting of the wreck having been undertaken by the harbour authority, and the owners having been guilty of no negligence:

Held further, that in the circumstances no maritime lien attached to the wreck so as to render it liable to make good the damage done to the other ship.

The Bywell Castle (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 747; 4 P. Div. 219; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207) approved.

THESE were cross-appeals from the decision of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Gibraltar in two consolidated collision actions by which the Chief Justice held both ships to blame.

The collision occurred in Gibraltar Bay on the 31st March 1891 between the s.s. Primula and the wreck of the s.s. Utopia.

At the time of the collision the screw-steamship Primula was entering Gibraltar Bay at about 8 p.m. when the look-out suddenly saw and reported the mast and funnel of a sunken wreck on the starboard bow and about fifty yards away. The Primula was at this time drifting, but her engines were at once put full speed ahead and her helm was hard-a-starboarded, but before she had time to answer she struck the wreck, which proved to be the s.s. Utopia sunk on the 17th March.

The witnesses on behalf of the Primula alleged that the wreck was not lighted, and that there were no lights in the vicinity to indicate the position of the wreck. They also alleged that they executed the best manœuvre by putting their engines ahead, and that they could not go astern, as there was a steamer close behind following them in.

It appeared that after the Utopia was wrecked on the 17th March 1891 her owners continued to light and watch her until the 21st, when the captain of the port, thinking that she was not properly lighted, assumed the task and hired a hulk and the necessary lights for this purpose. On the 23rd March the hulk was moored in position on the port side of the wreck, and men were placed in charge of her to see that the necessary lights were duly exhibited. The port authorities paid for the hulk and the lighting.

Evidence was called at the trial on behalf of the Utopia to prove that the lights required by the Board of Trade Regulations were exhibited and burning on the hulk at the time of and before the collision, and that proper indications were given to the Primula of the position of the wreck. The owners of the Utopia continued in possession of her while she was lying sunk, and eventually raised her.

The Chief Justice tried the case with the assistance of assessors, and found both ships to blame; the Utopia because her lighting was deficient and improper, and that her owners were responsible therefor; the Primula because on seeing the wreck she had set her engines ahead and not reversed them.

By Order in Council dated the 2nd Feb. 1884:

Except in respect of matters which now are or hereafter may be provided for by any Order in Council or local ordinance for the time being in force in Gibraltar, or by any Act of Parliament expressly or by necessary inference extending to Gibraltar, or by any proclamation, or by any instrument issued under the authority of such Order in Council, local ordinance, or Act of Parliament, the law of England as it existed on the 31st day of Dec. 1883 shall be hereafter in force in Gibraltar so far as it may be applicable to the circumstances thereof.

By the Port Order in Council, Gibraltar, the 3rd April 1886:

12. It shall be lawful for the captain of the port from time to time to make, and when made to alter and revoke, all such regulations in writing as he may deem expedient for the government and use of the port and harbour of Gibraltar, and of all ships, hulks, and boats being therein.

23. If any ship, hulk, or boat shall from any cause be sunk in the port or harbour of Gibraltar, and the owner or master thereof shall fail to remove the same within fourteen days or within such further notice as the captain of the port may fix after such owner or master shall have been required in writing by the captain of the port so to do, it shall be lawful for the captain of the port to remove such ship, hulk, or boat, and the expense of such removal shall be repaid to the owner or master thereof, and in default of payment the captain of the port may recover the same as a penalty under this order; or the captain of the port may sell such ship, hulk, or boat, and out of the proceeds of the sale pay such expenses, rendering the overplus, if any, to the owner or master on demand.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Wrecks Removal Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16):

Sect. 4. Where any vessel is sunk, stranded, or abandoned in any harbour or tidal water under the jurisdiction of a harbour or conservancy authority, or in or near any approach thereto, in such position as in the opinion of the authority to be, or be likely to become, an obstruction or danger to navigation in that harbour or water, or in any approach thereto, the authority may take possession of and raise, remove, or destroy the whole or any part of the vessel, and may light or buoy any such vessel or part until the raising, removal, or destruction thereof, and may sell in such manner as they think fit any vessel or part so raised or removed, and also any other property recovered in the exercise of their powers under this Act, and may out of the proceeds of such sale reimburse themselves for the expenses incurred by them under this Act, and shall hold the surplus, if any, of such proceeds in trust for the persons entitled thereto.

Finlay, Q.C. and Aspinall, Q.C. (with them Butler Aspinall), for the owners of the Utopia, in support of their appeal.—The judge in the court below was wrong in holding the owners of the Utopia in fault. After the port authority had taken the lighting out of their hands, their responsibility was at an end. The lighting was in fact efficient; but, even assuming it to be otherwise, the owners of the wreck could not interfere with the manner in which the port authority discharged its duties:

Brown v. Mallett, 5 C.B. 599;
White v. Crisp, 10 Ex. 312;
The Douglas, 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 502; 7 P. D. 151; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 15.

The captain of the port had authority to undertake the lighting of the wreck. The fact of a collision does not necessarily give rise to a maritime lien, and as in the present case the owners of the wreck were guilty of no negligence, the ship is not liable to answer the claim of the owners of the Primula:

The Castlegate, (1893) App. Cas. 52; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 284; 68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 99.

The Primula was alone to blame. A cardinal rule of navigation is, that where there is risk of collision a vessel should stop her way. The Primula in fact increased her speed and so caused the collision.

Cohen, Q.C. and Raikes, for the owners of the Primula, contrâ.—The Utopia is alone to blame. At the time of the collision the Utopia had not been abandoned by her owners. She was still their property, and was under their control. It was their duty to see that the persons who were lighting her did so efficiently. A maritime lien attached to the Utopia in respect of this collision, and if so, she is answerable to make good the damage done to the Primula:

The Ticonderoga, Swa. 215;
Fletcher v. Braddick, 2 B & P. 182;
Hodgkinson v. Fernie, 2 C. B. N. S. 415.

The judge was wrong in holding the Primula to blame for her action with her engines. In fact she did the best and only thing she could, having regard to the fact there was a vessel close astern of her. Even assuming the court should think her action was wrong, the fault was excusable. Her master had not sufficient time to determine on the best course, and had to act on the spur of the moment:

The Bywell Castle, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 747; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; 4 P. D. 219.

Aspinall, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 24.—Judgment was delivered by Sir FRANCIS JEUNE.—These are appeals from the decisions of the Chief Justice of Gibraltar, in two consolidated actions, the first being brought by the owners of the steamship Utopia, against the owners of the steamship Primula and freight; the second being brought by the master of the Primula, against the Utopia. The case arose out of a collision occurring between the Utopia, which was lying sunk in Gibraltar Bay, and the Primula entering that bay at about 8 p.m. on the 31st March 1891. The Utopia had been sunk by the collision with Her Majesty's ship Anson, on the 17th March, at a spot about a quarter of a mile N.-by-E. of the extremity of the New Mole, and thereafter lay with her hull submerged, but her two masts, her yards, and her funnel above water, the masts being immersed only to the extent of about fifteen feet, and the funnel proper not at all. From the 17th to the 23rd March the wreck was lighted by her owners, a light being hoisted at each masthead. The acting captain of the port of Gibraltar then complained to the managers for the owners of the Utopia that the lights were not sufficient and were not properly looked after, and gave an order to William Adair, a boarding officer, to have a hulk moored in the vicinity of the wreck, in order to warn vessels in accordance with the Board of Trade Regulations. These instructions are in No. 28 of the Board of Trade Regulations, and are as follows: "In England and Ireland, wherever a light vessel or other craft is anchored, to mark the position of a wreck, the top sides will be coloured green, and she will be further distinguished by day by three balls placed on a yard twenty feet above the sea, two balls (vertically) on the side on which navigating vessels may safely pass, and one on the other by night by three fixed white lights similarly arranged and with the same meaning. These marking vessels, when so employed and fitted, will not show the ordinary riding light." Mr. Adair, in pursuance of this order, agreed with the owner of a hulk that she should be placed near the wreck in the position, and exhibiting the lights, described in these instructions. On the 23rd March the hulk was accordingly anchored on the port side of the wreck, with four shackles to S.W., and four to N.E., by the bows on a swivel. In this position the hulk swung with the tide, and when swung stern on was about thirty fathoms from the wreck. It was the duty of those employed to see that, when the vessel swung, the yard was braced round, so as to preserve the position of the lights relatively to the wreck. The expense of this hulk was defrayed by the port authorities. It is not necessary to refer at any length to the mode of lighting the wreck, or to the way in which the instructions to the owners of the hulk were carried out by the men employed by them for the purpose. Evidence was given on behalf of the Primula, that only two lights were visible on board of the hulk before the collision, for which some time afterwards three lights were seen to be substituted, and that in consequence those on board of the Primula were ignorant that they were approaching the Utopia till they saw her masts and funnel, and so came into collision with her. On the other side was called Manuel Cruz, one of the men on board the hulk, who said that the lamps were of the proper number, and in the proper position. It is clear, however, that the evidence of this witness was not accepted by the learned judge in the court below, for he has found that it probably was the case that on the night of the collision the duties of the light-keepers on board of the hulk were very inefficiently performed. Their Lordships see no reason to doubt the correctness of this opinion, and they think it must be taken to be the case that, owing to the neglect on the part of those employed by the acting captain of the port, that is to say, the port authority, the position of the wreck was insufficiently indicated, and that in consequence those in charge of the Primula were misled, and had no notice from lights of the position or existence of the wreck.

The first question which is raised in this appeal is, whether the owners of the Utopia are liable to the owners of the Primula for the damage sustained by the Primula in the collision, by reason of this insufficient lighting of the Utopia. The learned judge in the court below has held that the owners of the Utopia are liable, because they remained in possession of the wreck, and on them alone rested the responsibility of taking every means in their power to secure ships entering the harbour from the danger of collision with her. Their Lordships think that the law applicable to this case may be gathered from three authorities, which their Lordships do not regard as being in conflict. The first of these cases is that of Brown v. Mallett (ubi sup.), which was decided on demurrer, and in which the question being whether in the absence of an allegation that the possession and control of a vessel, after she had foundered, was in the defendants, an obligation to protect other vessels against injury was imposed on them. That question was answered in the negative. It is to be observed that what was laid down was, and was only, that "this duty of using reasonable skill and care for the safety of other vessels is incident to the possession and control of the vessel." The case does not define exactly what is meant by possession and control, nor does it throw light on what constitutes reasonable skill and care in circumstances such as those of this case. In the case of White v. Crisp (ubi sup.), also decided on demurrer, the pleader alleged a transfer of the vessel, and that the transferees had and exercised, at the time of the happening of the injury, possession, control, management, and direction of the vessel. It was held that they were liable. But the Court, in giving judgment, defined their understanding of the allegation that the defendants had and exercised possession, control, management, and direction of the vessel, to be that "the defendants had it in their power, by due care and exertion, to have altogether removed this vessel, or to have shifted at least its position, and so might reasonably have been able to have prevented the injury," and added that, "if these words do not mean this, we think there was no liability on the part of the defendants." It is clear, therefore, from this case that, to the extent to which the owners have properly parted with the control and management of their vessel, their liability ceases. The case of the Douglas (ubi sup.), decided in the Court of Appeal, is very similar to the present. There the steamship Douglas was by the fault of those on board of her sunk in the Thames. The vessel was never abandoned, but the master and mate took steps to inform the harbour master, and the mate was told that the harbour master undertook to light the wreck. The steamship Mary Nixon collided with the Douglas six hours after she sank, and it appears to have been assumed, and indeed would seem clear (although it was suggested before their Lordships that there was no negligence in anyone), that the harbour master might have taken, but did not take, steps to light the wreck. It was held by Sir Robert Phillimore, on the authority of White v. Crisp (ubi sup.) and Brown v. Mallett (ubi sup.), that the "possession, management, and control of the Douglas was not abandoned by her master aud crew," and that the owners were therefore liable. On appeal this decision was reversed, on the ground that, inasmuch as notice was given to the harbour master, the defendants were not guilty of negligence. It may be observed also that, in the opinion of Cotton, L.J., the defendants had in fact for the time abandoned the control of the wreck. The result of these authorities may be thus expressed: The owner of a ship, sunk whether by his default or not (wilful misconduct probably giving rise to different considerations), has not, if he abandon the possession and control of her, any responsibility either to remove her, or to protect other vessels from coming into collision with her. It is equally true that, so long as, and so far as, possession, management, and control of the wreck be not abandoned, or properly transferred, there remains on the owners an obligation in regard to the protection of other vessels from receiving injury from her. But, in order to fix the owners of a wreck with liability, two things must be shown: first, that in regard to the particular matters in respect of which default is alleged, the control of the vessel is in them, that is to say, has not been abandoned or legitimately transferred; and secondly, that they have, in the discharge of their legal duty, been guilty of wilful misconduct or neglect. In the present case the Utopia was certainly not abandoned by her owners, in the sense that they gave up all rights of property and possession in her. On the contrary, they no doubt always intended to raise her if they could, and in fact, either before or soon after the collision with the Primula, they commenced the construction of a coffer dam, and by its means eventually recovered the vessel. It is clear, however, that before the collision with the Primula the port authority of Gibraltar, represented by the acting captain of the port, took from the owners, and itself assumed the task, of protecting other vessels from the wreck, by means of the signals which it directed to be employed for the purpose. The owners of the Utopia yielded to the action of the port authority, and thenceforward stood aloof from the operation of lighting the wreck. In these circumstances it appears to their Lordships that the control and management of the wreck so far as related to the protection of other vessels from her, and of her from them, was properly transferred to the port authority. Further, their Lordships are unable to see how any part of the conduct of the owners of the Utopia can lay them open to a charge of negligence. Neither in allowing the port authority to take on itself the control of the lighting, nor in abstaining from interfering with the subsequent action of the port authority in the matter, do their Lordships think that any default can be imputed to them. It would be dangerous if an owner of a wreck were compelled, in order to avoid a personal responsibility, to interfere with the action taken by a public authority, constituted for such purposes, to ensure the safety of other vessels navigating those waters. Their Lordships do not desire to indicate any doubt whether the port authority of Gibraltar had legally power to deal with the protection of sunken vessels; but they do not think it necessary to inquire into the precise legal foundation of such power. The action taken by the port authority was certainly within the apparent scope of its powers, and it would be impossible to hold that the captain or owners of a vessel entering port were bound, under pain of being held liable for the acts of the port authority, to inquire into the sources of its legal power before rendering obedience or deference to it.

It was suggested in argument that, as the action against the Utopia is an action in rem, the ship may be held liable, though there be no liability in the owners. Such contention appears to their Lordships to be contrary to principles of maritime law, now well recognised. No doubt at the time of action brought, a ship may be made liable in an action in rem, though its then owners are not, because, by reason of the negligence of the owners or their servants causing a collision, a maritime lien on their vessel may have been established, and that lien binds the vessel in the hands of subsequent owners. But the foundation of the lien is the negligence of the owners or their servants at the time of the collision, and if that be not proved, no lien comes into existence, and the ship is no more liable than any other property which the owners at the time of the collision may have possessed. In the recent case of The Castlegate (ubi sup.), in the House of Lords, language used by the present Master of the Rolls, in the case of The Parlement Belge (5 P. D. 197; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 273), which expresses the above view, was quoted with an approval which their Lordships desire to repeat.

The second question in this case relates to the conduct of the Primula. The learned judge in the court below, guided in part by the expert evidence called before him, has held that the captain of the Primula, by putting his engines full speed ahead, and his helm hard-a-starboard, contributed to the collision. The account given by the master of the Primula of the circumstances, and of his action, is as follows: "Passing New Mole Head, saw vessel with two lights on our port bow, nearly ahead; took them for ship's anchor lights; took it to be one on each masthead; came on, sometimes stopped, and sometimes moving engines to steer; nothing reported to me passing New Mole Head; look-out man hailed there was something on starboard bow about five minutes before collision; engines not moving then; ship drifting; I observed funnel, mast, and yard above water on starboard bow about fifty yards away; no lights on them, two points on starboard bow (funnel); put engines full speed ahead for five or six turns, and put helm hard-a-starboard; if I had ported, I should have gone amidships; should not have cleared her; after the turns I stopped engines; if I had gone astern, I should have struck steamer amidships just the same; could not go astern, as there was another steamer astern of me also coming in; I think stem of the Utopia was visible above water, but that night could see nothing but masts, and funnel; there was nothing whatever to indicate her position." The accuracy of this statement appears to have been doubted by the learned Chief Justice on one point only, that relating to the ship alleged to be following the Primula. Having regard to the fact that the express statement of the master of the Primula on this point is corroborated by his crew, is contradicted only by the occupant of the hulk, whose statement as to the lights cannot be accepted, and was not challenged in cross-examination at a time when it would have been possible to have sought for further corroborative evidence, their Lordships are not prepared to reject the assertion of the master of the Primula that there was a vessel close astern of him which impeded his going astern. It may be added, that the learned judge has found, in their Lordships' opinion correctly, that the tide was half ebb and the wind northerly. The question is one of seamanship, and it is in their Lordships' opinion a question of seamanship in circumstances of instant peril. They think that the master of the Primula is entitled to pray in aid this latter circumstance in the consideration of his conduct, on the principles approved by the Court of Appeal in the case of The Bywell Castle (ubi sup.). Their Lordships do not think it necessary to examine the expert evidence in the court below, inasmuch as they have the assistance of skill assessors. Taking the facts and circumstances to be as above stated, they have requested their assessors to advise them whether the captain of the Primula, in pursuing the course he adopted, acted with that care and skill which might reasonably be expected of a competent navigator, and they are advised without hesitation that he did so act. This advice their Lordships think it right to adopt. Their Lordships therefore think that the appeal of both parties should be allowed, that the decree of the court below should be reversed, and both actions dismissed, and that each party should bear their own costs of this appeal and in the court below. They will humbly advise Her Majesty accordingly.

Solicitors for the appellants, Clarkson, Greenwells, and Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Clarkson, Damant, and Toovey.

Jan. 19 and Feb. 3.

(Present: The Right Hons. Lords WATSON, HALSBURY, MACNAGHTEN, and MORRIS, Sir R. COUCH, and DAVEY, L.J.)

UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. CLARIDGE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL OF NEW ZEALAND.

Injury to workman—Common employment—Negligence of seaman employed to assist in unloading ship—Liability of owner.

The appellants contracted with a stevedore to unload their ship, and the contract provided that the owners should "provide for each hatch being discharged, one winch-driver, and one hatchman." The respondent, who was one of the stevedore's labourers, was injured during the unloading by the negligence of one of the winchmen, who was one of the crew of the ship.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the winchman and the respondent were not in a common employment, and that the appellants were liable for the negligence of the winchman.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand (Richmond, Williams, and Connolly, JJ.), who had reversed a judgment of Denniston, J. in an action brought by the respondent against the appellants to recover damages for injuries sustained by the negligence of one of their servants.

The facts appear sufficiently from the judgment of their Lordships.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. and Brooke Little appeared for the appellants, and argued that the case could not be distinguished from Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Company (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 49; 2 C. P. Div. 205), where the contract was precisely the same, and was held to create a common employment. That case followed Murray v. Currie (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 557; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 24), which followed the earlier case of Murphy v. Caralli (3 H. & C. 462); and it has been followed lately in Donovan v. Laing and Co. (68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 512; (1893) 1 Q. B. 629). The case of Johnson v. Lindsay (65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; (1891) A. C. 371) lays down the same principle, but is distinguishable. They also referred to

Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499;
Manning v. Adams, 32 W. R. 430;
Moore v. Palmer, 2 Times L. Rep. 781.

Finlay, Q.C. and Corner, who appeared for the respondent, were not called upon to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellants, their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Feb. 3.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Lord WATSON.—The appellant company are owners of the steamship Orowaiti, which arrived at Lyttleton Harbour, in Aug. 1891, with a cargo of coal. They contracted with the Canterbury Stevedoring Association Limited for the discharge of the cargo into a hulk; and, in the course of that operation, the respondent, whilst working as a lumper in the employment of the association, was severely injured by the fall of a basket of coal. He thereupon instituted this suit for damages against the company, upon the allegation that his injuries were occasioned by the negligence of one or more of the crew of the Orowaiti. The case went to trial before Denniston, J. and a special jury of twelve. It appears from the evidence then led, that the Orowaiti had four hatches, at all of which the process of unloading was carried on simultaneously, and in the same way. There were, at each hatch, four labourers, servants of the stevedores, in the hold, their duty being simply to fill the coal baskets and hook them on to the rope by which they were lifted, and to unhook the empty baskets as they were let down. The lifting tackle was actuated by steam from the ship's boilers, and was attended to by two men, who were members of her crew, and received their wages from the appellants. One of these men worked the winch. The other was stationed beside the hatch; and it was his business to give the winchman notice whenever a loaded basket was ready for raising, and also to steady and guide the basket in its ascent by means of a rope called a bullrope. A man named John Eames acted as foreman or ganger on board the Orowaiti, in the interests of the stevedores. By the witnesses for the respondent his injuries were attributed to the negligent conduct of the winchman in first raising a loaded basket without notice from the bullrope man, and before the latter was ready, and in then letting go the winch, and allowing the load to fall back into the hold, where it struck the respondent. At the close of the evidence, the jury were asked to determine the quantum of damage, which they assessed at 1600*l.*

With the exception of that point the case was withdrawn from the jury, under an arrangement, which was thus noted by the presiding judge. "Negligence admitted. Agreed to leave question of common employment to court." It must therefore be taken against the appellants that the mishap which befell the respondent was due to the winchman, for whose negligence they are responsible if, at the time when it occurred, he was employed by them, and was acting within the scope of his employment. They maintain, however, that the winchman, and the bullrope man also, in assisting to unload the vessel, were not employed in their behalf, but were engaged in doing work which the stevedores had contracted for, subject to the orders and control of the foreman appointed by the contractors. Whether that was the case or not is a question of fact, upon which the parties prefer the verdict of the court to that of a jury. That the servant of A. may, on a particular occasion, and for a particular purpose, become the servant of B., notwithstanding that he continues in A.'s service and is paid by him, is a rule recognised by a series of decisions. Their Lordships do not find it necessary, for the purposes of this appeal, to examine these authorities. It is possible that, in some cases, questions of nicety might arise in the application of the rule to the facts, and that the opinions expressed by learned judges in these authorities might aid in their solution. But no such questions appear to their Lordships to arise upon the evidence in this case. The contract under which the cargo of the Orowaiti was discharged did not provide that the whole work was to be done by the stevedore. On the contrary, whilst the contractor was bound "to supply all labour for filling buckets or baskets, working tramways, &c," the company expressly undertook to provide one winch-driver and one hatchman for each hatch being discharged, the hatchman to attend yard-arm tackle, bullrope, or tramway, according to the method of working adopted by the contractor. There is nothing to suggest that the contractor was to have any control over the men discharging the duties of winchman and bullrope man. The inference which their Lordships would naturally derive from the terms of the contract is, that, as they admittedly did in the case of their engineer who supplied the motive power, the shipowners desired to retain control over those members of their crew who worked the tackle of the ship used for the purpose of discharging her cargo. That inference is certainly not displaced by the evidence led before the jury, which shows that, in point of fact, the stevedores and their foreman never gave any orders to the men at the winch or the bullrope men, or attempted to exercise any control over them. In these circumstances, their Lordships have had no hesitation in preferring the view taken by the Court of Appeal to that which commended itself to the learned judge who presided at the trial; and they will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment appealed from. The costs of this appeal must be paid by the appellants.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors for the appellants, A. R. and H. Steele.

Solicitors for the respondent, Wilkins, Blyth, Dutton, and Hartley.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Monday, Nov. 27, 1893.

(Before LINDLEY, SMITH, and DAVEY, L.JJ.)

ROBERTS AND SON v. OCEAN MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

THE NORTH BRITAIN. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BARNES, J.

Marine insurance—Policy—Collision clause—Proviso—Removal of obstructions under statutory powers—Expenses of removing wreck—Both ships to blame—Liability of insurers.

At the time of a collision in foreign waters, between the ships N. and P., the plaintiffs, the owners of the N., were insured in the defendant company by a policy of insurance which contained a collision clause, to which the following proviso was attached: "Provided always, that this clause shall in no case extend to any sum which the assured may become liable to pay, or shall pay for removal of obstructions under statutory powers, for injury to harbours, wharves, piers, stages, and similar structures, consequent on such collision, or in respect of the cargo or engagements of the insured vessel, or for loss of life or personal injury." In consequence of the collision the P. sank, and was ultimately removed by the local authorities acting under statutory powers. The expenses of such removal were directed to be paid by the P. to the local authority, and were so paid. In cross-actions for damages in respect of the said collision both ships admitted liability, and, on the damages being referred to the registrar and merchants for assessment, the registrar, by agreement and consent of the parties, allowed as part of the claim on behalf of the owners of the P. the sum so paid by the owners of the P. whereby the owners of the N. became liable to pay as part of the damages, to the owners of the P., a moiety of such sum. In an action by the owners of the N., against the underwriters of the N., to recover moneys alleged to be due under the said policy, in respect of the removal of the P.:

Held (reversing Barnes, J.), that the assured could not recover, as the underwriters were exempted from liability by the terms of the proviso to the collision clause.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of Barnes, J. on a question submitted for the opinion of the court on a joint admission of facts.

It appeared that on the 10th Feb. 1891 the plaintiffs' steamship North Britain came into collision in the river Scheldt, in the kingdom of Belgium, with the British steamship Paraguay, in consequence whereof the Paraguay sank in the said river. The Governor of the province of West Flanders, acting in the exercise of the powers conferred on him by a royal decree of the 6th Dec. 1858, issued, and on the 21st Feb. 1891 caused the master of the Paraguay to be notified of, an order directing him to commence the work of the removal of the vessel within six days from the date of notification, and to proceed with the work expeditiously. The order further provided that, in the event of non-execution by the interested party, the raising or the destruction of the wreck would be proceeded with by the official authorities at his expense. The owners and master of the Paraguay not having raised and removed the vessel within the specified period, she was thereupon raised and removed by the authorities in virtue of the order and decree aforementioned. The Government of the province of West Flanders subsequently served on the agents at Antwerp of the owners of the Paraguay an order, dated the 26th Sept. 1891, directing them to pay to the cashier of the State within fifteen days the sum of 26,390 francs, the expenditure incurred by the Government in dealing with the wreck. The owners of the Paraguay paid the said sum—equivalent to 1047*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*—as directed.

On the 13th March 1891 the owners of the North Britain commenced an action in the Admiralty Division of the High Court against the owners of the Paraguay for damages in respect of the collision and the defendants in the action admitted liability. On the 1st April 1891 the owners of the Paraguay commenced an action in the same Division, against the owners of the North Britain for damages in respect of the collision, and the defendants admitted liability. The damages in both actions were referred to the assessment of the registrar and merchants. At the assessment the registrar, by agreement and consent of the parties, allowed as part of the claim on behalf of the owners of the Paraguay the sum of 950*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* (being the sum of 1047*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*, paid by the owners of the Paraguay to the Belgian State authorities, less 96*l.* 5*s.* proceeds of wreck), whereby the owners of the

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

North Britain became liable to pay, as part of the damages to the owners of the Paraguay, the sum of 475*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.*, being a moiety of the aforesaid sum.

At the time of the collision the owners of the North Britain were, by a policy of insurance dated the 12th Feb. 1890, insured by the defendants for a certain sum upon the said ship. The policy contained (inter alia) the following clause:

> And it is further agreed that, if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay, and shall pay by way of damages, to any other person or persons, any sum or sums not exceeding in respect of any such collision the value of the ship hereby insured, we will severally pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of such sum or sums so paid as our subscriptions hereto bear to the value of the ship hereby insured.
>
> In cases in which the liability of the ship has been contested, with the consent, in writing, of two-thirds of the subscribers to this policy in amount, we will also pay a like proportion of three-fourths of the costs which the assured shall thereby incur, or be compelled to pay; but when both vessels are to blame, then, unless the liability of the owners of one or both of such vessels becomes limited by law, claims under this clause shall be settled on the principle of cross liabilities, as if the owners of each vessel had been compelled to pay to the owners of the other of such vessels such one-half or other proportion of the latter's damages as may have been properly allowed in ascertaining the balance or sum payable by or to the assured in consequence of such collision.
>
> Provided always, that this clause shall in no case extend to any sum which the assured may become liable to pay, or shall pay, for removal of obstructions under statutory powers, for injury to harbours, wharves, piers, stages, and similar structures, consequent on such collision, or in respect of the cargo or engagements of the insured vessel, or for loss of life or personal injury.

At the trial, upon the joint admission of facts, Barnes, J., after stating the facts, continued:—The plaintiffs now claim to recover from the defendants their proper proportion of three-fourths of the said sum of 475*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* The defendants dispute their liability, on the ground that they were exempted from responsibility for the claim in question under the proviso at the end of the collision clause. It was not contended before me that the words "statutory powers" did not cover the powers acted upon in Belgium, or that the plaintiffs were not liable to the owners of the Paraguay for the said sum of 475*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* The point raised by the defendants was, that the plaintiffs were claiming to recover for a sum which they had become liable to pay, and had paid, for removal of obstructions under statutory powers, but to which the defendants allege that the collision clause does not extend. The argument for the plaintiffs was, that the proviso was not intended to cut down the defendants' liability for the damages recoverable by the owners of the Paraguay against the owners of the North Britain, but was intended as a definition or explanation introduced to guard against the clause being construed to include claims not within its real scope, which they contended was, according to the case of Taylor v. Dewar (33 L. J. 141, Q. B.; 5 B. & S. 58), to provide for an indemnity for damages paid to those interested in the vessel collided with, her freight and cargo. In the case referred to, an attempt was made to extend a somewhat similar clause to damages recovered for personal injuries sustained by persons on board the ship with which the insured ship had come into collision. This attempt failed for the reasons given in Mellor, J.'s judgment, though, in the Scotch case of Coey v. Smith (22 Court of Sess. Cas. N. S. 955), referred to in his judgment, a similar attempt made under a slightly different clause was successful. In the present case the first part of the clause is somewhat similar to the clauses in the said two cases, its precise language being as I have already stated it. The second part of the clause deals with the costs of cases disputed with the underwriters' consent, and with the liability of the underwriters being settled as if an adjustment had been made between the two colliding vessels on the principle of cross liabilities, instead of on the principle of a judgment for a balance only. Then comes the proviso. The clause forms part of a policy upon ship, and is inserted in order to protect the owners of the insured ship for damage done by her in a collision which, according to the decision in De Vaux v. Salvador (4 Ad. & Ell. 420), is not recoverable from the underwriters on the insured ship under the ordinary terms of the policy which insure the owners against loss or damage to the ship insured. I think the clause in this case should be construed in the same manner as that in Taylor v. Dewar, and, though it is slightly different from the clause in that case, the greater part of the reasoning in Mellor, J.'s judgment applies. The second part of the clause is a further ground for adopting this construction. These considerations seem to me to show that the proviso is not to be construed strictly as an exception, but, as its terms show, the object is to make it clear that the clause is not to extend to the claims mentioned in the proviso. It does not clearly express that the damage properly paid by the assured to the owners of a vessel with which the insured vessel has come into collision are in any way to be limited, and it seems to me to be intended to exclude the possibility of claiming against the underwriters in respect of losses arising from claims which might be made directly against the assured by persons other than those interested in the other vessel, her cargo and freight. Claims against the underwriters for expenses of removal which the assured became liable to pay by the enforcement against them of statutory powers of removal of an obstruction caused by them appear to be what the proviso deals with, under that part which affects this question. In my opinion, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in this action; and my judgment must be for them, for a sum which has not been exactly furnished to me, such proportion of three-fourths of the sum of 475*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* as the defendants' subscription bore to the value of the ship, with costs.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

Nov. 27.—Joseph Walton, Q.C., for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—By the proviso the defendants are exempted from liability on the ground that the proviso applies to money paid for the removal of obstructions under statutory powers, whether such sums are paid directly by the assured ship to the authorities, or indirectly by way of damages to the sunk ship:

> Taylor v. Dewar, 33 L. J. 141, Q B.; 5 B. & S. 58
> Coey v. Smith, 22 Court Sess. Cas. N. S. 955; > De Vaux v. Salvador, 4 Ad. & Ell. 420.

Robson, Q.C. and R. Temperley for the respondents.—The proviso does not protect the defendants in this cause; it is only explanatory of the collision clause. The money claimed is damages paid to the owners of the Paraguay. The proviso only applies to sums paid directly by the assured for removal of obstructions.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of Barnes, J., and the question raised by the appeal turns upon the construction of an addition made to an ordinary Lloyd's policy on ship. The policy itself contains nothing which requires comment, but in the margin of it we find printed certain special clauses, and one relating to collision which I will read. Before I read it, I will state that there was a collision between the North Britain, the ship assured, and a ship called the Paraguay in the Scheldt, and the Paraguay sank, and being an obstruction in the river the Belgian authorities removed her, or ordered her to be removed, and that put the owners of the Paraguay to considerable expense. Both vessels were to blame. The Paraguay sought to recover, and did recover, half the expense of the removal against the North Britain, and the North Britain seeks to be indemnified for that expense under the policy. The question is, whether the clause I am about to read covers that item of damage. The clause runs thus: "And it is further agreed that, if the ship hereby insured"—that is the North Britain—"shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel"—which happened—"and the assured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay, and shall pay by way of damages, to any person or persons, any sum or sums not exceeding in respect of any one such collision the value of the ship hereby insured, we will severally pay the assured such proportion," and so on. Then there comes a clause for ascertaining the amount. Nothing turns upon that, because in this particular case the amount is not in dispute. Then comes this: "Provided always, that this clause shall in no case extend to any sum which the assured may become liable to pay, or shall pay, for the removal of obstructions under statutory powers, for injury to harbours, wharves, piers, stages, and similar structures, consequent on such collision, or in respect of the cargo or engagements of the insured vessel, or for loss of life or personal injury." Now, upon that two views are presented to the court. One is, that this proviso only applies to sums which the underwriters, or rather which the ship, may become liable to pay directly for removal of obstructions caused by itself. The other is, that it covers whatever the plaintiffs may be called upon to pay, even to the other ship with which the collision has taken place, if that other ship has been ordered to pay for the removal of the obstruction. The case is one of some little difficulty; but when one looks at it and looks at the object of it, it appears to me, I confess, that the construction which is put upon the clause by the underwriters is the correct one. Now what is the clause? The first part of the clause is by no means easy to construe. I am warranted in saying that, because it is construed one way in England and another way in Scotland. There is an ambiguity in the first clause when you come to look at it. The ambiguity arises in respect of the expression "in consequence thereof." The first is a damage clause; it is a clause under which the ship insured, the North Britain, may have to pay damages, and "in consequence thereof," namely, in consequence of the collision, is ambiguous, because it is doubtful what sort of consequences are included in that expression. The proviso which I have read is a proviso to this clause. It begins, "Provided always that this clause." It is impossible to read that proviso as applying to that part of the clause which immediately precedes, and which relates only to the mode of ascertaining the liability. That would not make sense. The proviso is a proviso to the first part of the clause, and that is agreed upon all hands. Now, when we come to read the first part of the clause with the proviso, it appears to me the object of the proviso is to remove the ambiguity to which the general language of the first part of the clause gives rise; and I cannot, for the life of me, see how it is possible to construe, or cut down, this proviso so as to effectuate the intention of the parties, and so as to read it in the very narrow view which has been adopted by Barnes, J. He says the proviso is not, technically speaking, an exception. I do not think it is. He says it is put by way of precaution. I think it is. I regard the proviso as a warning that you are not to read the clause so as to include these things. I think that is most plainly the language. It means, this clause shall in no case extend to any sum which the assured shall have to pay for removal of obstruction consequent on such collision. I know it says in terms "shall pay by way of damages to the other ship;" but I do not think the construction which I am adopting involves the insertion of any words at all. It is, "in no case shall extend to the sum the assured shall become liable to pay," that is, pay on any ship, by way of damages or otherwise. I think the other side seek to restrict the expression, by inserting "by way of damages or otherwise." I say the clause admits of two constructions, but one construction appears to me, with great deference to Barnes, J., to be rather hypercritical, and does not give effect to what appears to me to be the true meaning of this policy. I think, therefore, the appeal must be allowed.

SMITH, L.J.—The question in this case is as to the true construction of a collision clause attached to a marine policy of insurance upon ship. To bring out the point clearly, I will take it that the North Britain steamship, which was covered by the policy in question, by reason of the sole negligence of those on board came into collision with and sunk the steamship Paraguay in the river Scheldt in Belgium, and that the owners of the Paraguay, therefore, brought an action in this country against the owners of the steamship North Britain, and recovered 1000*l.* damages, of which 500*l.* were for damages occasioned to the ship run down, and 500*l.* were for expenses the owners of that ship had become liable to pay, and had paid for, the raising of their ship, and which amount they were compelled to pay by reason of statutory powers conferred upon the authorities of the river Scheldt. The question which arises is, are both these amounts covered by the collision clause in the policy sued on, or only the first, as held by Barnes, J.? The first limb of the collision clause has been already read by Lindley, L.J., and so I will not read it again. Now, pausing here (which is at the words "to the value of the ship hereby insured"), I should have thought that, so far, this clause bound the underwriters to pay the plaintiffs three-fourths of the 1000*l.* which they became liable to pay, and had paid, in this case to the owners of the Paraguay. The case of Taylor v. Dewar, (33 L. J. 141, Q. B.; 5 B. & S. 58) had held that under a clause very similar to this, the first limb of this clause, the underwriters were not liable for those damages which the assured had had to pay, for personal injuries occasioned to those on board the ship run down, and that the proper construction of it was, that the underwriters had only to pay to the assured such damages as he had to pay in respect of the loss, or damage done to the ship run down, or possibly to her freight or cargo, which for the purpose might be treated as part of herself. The Queen's Bench differed from the Scotch case of Coey v. Smith, in 22 Court of Sess. Cas. N. S. 955, which held that the clause covered damage, which the assured had to pay, for personal damages done to those on board the ship run down, as well as the other damage done to the ship itself. This case, in my judgment, instead of assisting the plaintiffs (the assured), as far as it goes, assists the defendants (the underwriters); for it might be argued from it, that the expenses incurred in raising a ship were not expenses incurred in respect of the loss or damage done to the ship run down. But I agree with Barnes, J., that this first limb of the clause, standing alone, does cover both sums of 500*l.*, which the plaintiffs have had to pay to the owners of the Paraguay, and if this case had rested here I should have held for the plaintiffs. But this limb of the clause does not stand alone, for, after some intermediate provisions, not material to the present point, it proceeds as follows: "Provided always that this clause" (that is, that this collision clause) "shall in no case extend to any sum which the assured may become liable to pay, or shall pay for the removal of obstructions under statutory powers, for injury to harbours, wharves, piers, stages and similar structures, consequent on such collision, or in respect of the cargo or engagements of the insured vessel, or for loss of life or personal injury."

Now, what is the meaning of this proviso? It is said by the plaintiffs that this is only a warning (whatever that may mean) to shipowners about to insure, that the underwriters will not be responsible under this collision clause for what insuring shipowners may have themselves to pay in respect of the enumerated matters, and that it does not cut down the general undertaking contained in the first limb of the clause to pay all damages (perhaps except for personal injuries) which the assured might be called upon to pay. This appears to me to be a novel way of getting rid of one part—and it is an inconvenient part—of a contract which must be read as a whole. By its very first terms the second limb is stated to be a proviso upon the first. It stipulates that this clause (that is, the collision clause, the whole clause) shall in no case extend to any sum which the assured may become liable to pay, or shall pay for the removal of obstructions and injury to harbours, &c., consequent upon a collision, or in respect of the cargo or engagements of the insured vessel, or for loss of life or personal injury. I ask this question: Have or have not the plaintiffs, when they paid the 500*l.* to the owners of the Paraguay for raising their vessel, paid the sum for removal of obstructions under statutory powers consequent upon the collision? The words are, "that the assured may become liable to pay or shall pay"—that is, however paid; they are not limited as contended for by the plaintiffs—"shall pay otherwise than in the shape of damages." I can only give one answer to this question, and that is to say that they have. With great respect I cannot agree with Barnes, J. when he held "that the proviso was not to be construed strictly as an exception" to the first limb, but was only inserted "to make it clear that the collision clause was not to extend to the claims mentioned in the proviso." But this I am unable to follow. Barnes, J. also held that this proviso did not extend to damages the plaintiffs might have to pay, but only to what liabilities they might incur themselves, in respect of the matters enumerated therein. But I would point out that this proviso deals with three different classes of matters. The first includes payments made in respect of the removal of obstructions consequent upon collision. I can find nothing in this part of the proviso to limit it to payments made in respect of removal of obstructions otherwise than by way of damage. The second class refers to losses sustained in respect of cargo and engagements of the insured vessel, which necessarily do not include payments by way of damages, for, as regards this, no damages could be recovered against the plaintiffs. And the third class refers to claims in respect of loss of life or personal injury, which appears to me to include not only loss of life and personal injuries upon the vessel in default, but also upon the vessel insured. There are no words limiting these classes to loss of life, or personal injuries upon the defaulting vessel. This last clause might well have been inserted, because of the existing conflict between the law of this country and the law of Scotland. In my judgment, it is inaccurate to say that these three classes refer to payments otherwise than to payments made by way of damages, for, in my judgment, the first class clearly does not. Moreover, this remarkable result would follow if the plaintiffs' contention be correct: If the ship of an insured is sunk consequent upon the negligence of those on board, and the assured has to pay for its removal, he cannot recover under the policy; whereas if consequent upon the same negligence the other colliding ship is sunk, and the assured has to pay by process of law for its removal, he can. This cannot, in my view, be the true construction of this clause. In my judgment the proviso exempts the underwriters from the payment in dispute, and therefore I think that this appeal must be allowed.

Davey, L.J.—I should feel extreme diffidence in differing from a judgment of a judge of great experience in these matters, were it not that my learned brethren think that the learned judge's construction is erroneous. If I am to decide the construction of this clause exclusively upon technical grounds, which appeal to a lawyer's mind, I observe, in the first place, that the North Britain is not, strictly speaking, seeking payment from the underwriters of any sum paid by them for the removal of obstructions as such; but what they are seeking is the reimbursement of damages paid, or payable, by the North Britain to the Paraguay. On the other hand, I observe that the whole clause deals only with the question of damages and the proviso is a proviso upon a clause which provides for the payment of damages, and it must, in my opinion, receive a meaning bearing some relation to the principal clause. No lawyer would say that the payment of expenses for the removal of an obstruction by the underwriters would be a payment of damages to the North Britain. Upon this point of view the considerations in favour of either construction seem to me to be very evenly balanced; but I am told that this is a clause in a business document, prepared by men of business for their own use, and to be construed as men of business would understand it. Endeavouring to the best of my ability to read the proviso in this mental attitude, and with a due sense of humility, I am of opinion that any layman of business would understand this clause to mean something of this kind: "I will reimburse you, the injuring vessel, the bill which you have to pay to the injured vessel for damages; but, mind, I am not to be called upon to pay directly or indirectly for the removal of obstructions under statutory powers." It would be, in my opinion, a strange result, and one that would startle most business people, if we were to hold that the underwriters of the Paraguay, for example, could not be called upon to pay the Paraguay for the expenses that the owners of that ship were put to for the removal of obstructions by the Antwerp authorities; but that they might be called upon, as underwriters of the North Britain, to pay indirectly exactly the same expenses through the medium of the liability of the North Britain to reimburse the Paraguay. I think, with Smith, L.J., that the case which was referred to in the Queen's Bench is rather in favour of the appellants than against them, and I agree that the judgment appealed from should be reversed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche, agents for Botterell, Roche, and Temperley, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Wednesday, Nov. 29, 1893.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.)

Smith and Service v. The Rosario Nitrate Company Limited. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Restraints of princes and rulers—Demurrage—Customary mode of loading.

The defendants chartered the plaintiffs' vessel to proceed to Iquique, in Chili, and there to load for the United Kingdom a cargo of 3000 tons of nitrate of soda at the rate of 200 tons per working lay day, and after provisions as to the lay days came the usual clause mutually excepting restraints of princes and rulers, political disturbances or impediments during the said voyage.

At the trial of the action the learned judge found as a fact that the ordinary and recognised mode of loading nitrate at Iquique was to send the required amount of nitrate down by railway from the mines direct to the ship at the quay when she was ready for loading.

When the ship arrived at Iquique considerable delay was caused in the loading by reason of a civil war having broken out and the mines and the railway being for a time in possession of the troops, so that no nitrate could be sent down by railway to the ship. She was also further delayed by putting into another Chilian port for coal, where the authorities demanded export duties already paid at Iquique. In an action for demurrage:

Held, that the delay was within the exception in the charter-party.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Pollock, B. at the trial of the action without a jury at the Guildhall.

The action was for demurrage, and was brought by the owners of the steamship Mount Tabor against the charterers.

The Mount Tabor was chartered to proceed to Iquique in Chili, and there to load a cargo of 3000 tons of nitrate of soda in bags, and thence to proceed to ports in the United Kingdom or on the Continent as ordered.

The charter-party provided for the loading of the cargo at the rate of 200 tons per working lay day from the day when the ship was ready to receive cargo, demurrage at an agreed rate per day, restraint of princes and rulers, political disturbances, or impediments during the said voyage always mutually excepted.

When the ship arrived at Iquique a civil war had broken out, and the nitrate mines and the railway from the mines to the port being in the hands of troops, the ship's loading was delayed for a considerable time until it became possible to send down nitrate by railway from the mines to the ship. As coal was very dear at Iquique, the ship having left Iquique put into another Chilian port for coal. The Government authorities there demanded payment of export duties, which the ship had already paid at Iquique, and on refusal to pay again the ship was detained ten days.

At the trial of the action the learned judge found that the customary mode of loading nitrate at Iquique is by sending the nitrate down direct by rail from the mines to the port and the quay and putting it on board the vessel as it is acquired at the mine.

The plaintiffs then brought this action for demurrage in respect of the delay at Iquique, and also in respect of a subsequent delay at another port in Chili.

At the trial of the action, before Pollock, B. without a jury, the learned judge held that both the delays came within the exception clause in the charter-party, the case as to the delay at Iquique being governed by the decision in Hudson v. Ede (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 764; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 114; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 412); and he gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Philipson for the plaintiffs.—The loading of the ship was not delayed by any restraints or impediments within the exception clause, and the defendants are not protected by that clause. The question here is, at what moment did the loading of the ship commence? There was nothing at the port of Iquique which delayed the loading. The loading of a ship consists in putting the goods into the vessel, or transferring them from the land to the vessel. The loading of the ship cannot be said to commence with putting the goods into trucks on a railway many miles away from the sea or the ship. It is the duty of a charterer to have the goods ready for loading at the port when the ship arrives. Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.) is a strong decision, and the decision of Pollock, B. goes even further. They cited

(a) Reported by E. Manley Smith, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Grant v. Coverdale, Todd, and Co., 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 353; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 472; 9 App. Cas. 470;

The Alne Holme, 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 344; 68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 862; (1893) P. 173.

The second delay was solely due to the refusal to pay export duties.

R. T. Reid, Q.C. and J. W. Mansfield, for the defendants, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—It seems to me that, upon the facts as found by the learned judge at the trial, his decision was right. His finding was that the ordinary mode of loading nitrate at Iquique was, that the nitrate was not taken away from the mines until it was wanted to put on board ship. When the ship was ready a message was sent to the mines to send the required nitrate down in trucks. The nitrate was then sent down and unloaded from the trucks and put into a warehouse, not for the purpose of being stored in warehouses, but for putting on to the ship. The whole matter was a single transaction, and was treated by everyone at Iquique as the ordinary, proper, and usual mode of loading nitrate. When the contract now sued upon was made, it must be taken to have been made with reference to the recognised custom of the port as to what is there considered to be loading. If so, the case comes exactly within the decision of Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.). Then, if the ship could not be loaded in the recognised manner by reason of "restraints of princes and rulers, political disturbances or impediments," the charterers are not liable. The decision of the learned judge was right, and this appeal must be dismissed. The case is governed by Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.), which is a well-recognised decision and is binding on this court. I think that Pollock, B. was right on both points.

Lopes, L.J.—Having regard to the finding of fact by the learned judge at the trial, I can only say that this case is governed by the decision in Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.).

Kay, L.J.—I agree. The question raised in Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.) seems to me to be a very arguable one, but it has now been decided in the Exchequer Chamber, and that decision has been recognised in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599) in the House of Lords, where Lord Blackburn cited it approvingly, and also in Grant v. Coverdale, Todd, and Co. (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 472; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 353; 9 App. Cas. 470) by Lord Selborne. The only question now, therefore, is whether this case is within the decision of Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.). An attempt was made on behalf of the plaintiffs to distinguish the two cases, on the ground that in Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.) the goods were brought down the river to the ship in lighters, and the loading began when the goods were put into the lighters, whereas in this case the nitrate was brought down by rail to the port. But here the learned judge has found as a fact that the nitrate was brought directly from the mines to the ship, without being kept at all stored up in warehouses, and that this was the ordinary and recognised mode of loading at the port in question. The case is, therefore, undistinguishable from Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.), and I agree that the appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Hollams, Sons, Coward, and Hawkesley.

Solicitors for the defendants, Norton, Rose, Norton, and Co.

Jan. 29 and Feb. 2, 1894.

(Before Lord Halsbury, Lopes and Davey, L.JJ.)

Re An Arbitration between Keighley, Maxted, and Co. and Bryan, Durant, and Co. (No. 2). (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Sale of goods—Sale of wheat to be shipped—"3000 tons, 10 per cent. more or less"—Option of vendors to ship more or less—Payment by cash against bill of lading—Tender of bill of lading for 3800 tons—Refusal to accept.

By a contract in writing K. bought from B. "about 3000 tons of wheat (10 per cent. more or less) to be shipped by steamer" from India, payment to be made by cash in London within seven days from delivery of invoice in exchange for bill or bills of lading. In the contract there was the following clause: "Sellers have option of shipping less than the minimum quantity, in which case the price of the quantity short shipped of the medium quantity will be settled at the value of the day of the appropriation. Sellers can also exceed the maximum quantity, in which case the excess over the medium quantity will remain for their account."

B. informed K. that 3800 tons had been shipped on the Bombay, and that he appropriated 3000 tons of that shipment to the contract with K., and he subsequently sent K. an invoice for 3000 tons ex Bombay. The bills of lading of the 3800 tons were two for 1750 tons each and two for 250 tons each. K. offered to deliver to B. either all the bills of lading or two for 1750 tons each, but B. refused to accept the tender or to pay any part of the price.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that the buyers were entitled to delivery of a bill or bills of lading for the amount of wheat which they had bought, and were entitled to refuse the tender made by the sellers.

This was an appeal by Bryan, Durant, and Co. from an order of the Divisional Court (Wills and Wright, JJ.) upon a special case stated by arbitrators.

The appellants, Messrs. Bryan, Durant, and Co. sold to the respondents, Messrs. Keighley, Maxted, and Co., a quantity of East Indian wheat under a written contract.

By the contract Keighley, Maxted, and Co. bought of Bryan, Durant, and Co., on the printed rules indorsed on the back of this contract, about 3000 tons Karachi wheat (10 per cent. more or less), to be shipped per first-class steamer from Karachi, shipment to be made, and bill or bills of lading to be dated, during July or August. Payment, cash in London, within seven days from the day on which invoice is handed, in exchange for bill or bills of lading and policies of insurance.

(a) Reported by J. H. Williams, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the margin of the contract was indorsed a clause as follows:

Sellers have option of shipping less than the minimum quantity, in which case the price of the quantity short shipped of the medium quantity will be settled at the value of the day of the appropriation. Sellers can also exceed the maximum quantity, in which case the excess over the medium quantity will remain for their account.

The appellants wrote to the respondents saying that 3800 tons of wheat had been shipped on the s.s. Bombay, "3000 tons of which we beg to appropriate against our contract with you." No reply was made to that letter.

On the 23rd Aug. the appellants wrote to the respondents with provisional invoice for 3000 tons of wheat ex Bombay.

On the 23rd Aug. the respondents inspected the documents, including four bills of lading, two for 1750 tons each, and two for 250 tons each.

The appellants were willing to deliver to the respondents either all the bills of lading, or the two for 1750 tons each, against payment of the amount of the invoice, leaving 800 tons, or 500 tons, as the case might be, balance of the cargo in the buyer's possession, but the property of the sellers.

The respondents rejected this tender, and refused to pay the amount of the invoice or any part thereof, or to make any deposit.

The question whether the buyers were bound to accept the shipment was referred to arbitration under the provisions of the contract, and an award was made in favour of the buyers, and this award was confirmed by the appeal committee of the London Corn Trade Association.

The sellers, the appellants, applied to the Queen's Bench Division to have the award remitted, and obtained an order remitting the award.

This order was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 61; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 268).

The appeal committee reheard the matter and made an award in favour of the sellers, Bryan, Durant, and Co. This award was made in the form of a special case.

The Divisional Court (Wills and Wright, JJ.) held that the arbitrators were wrong, and set aside the award in favour of Bryan, Durant, and Co.

Bryan, Durant, and Co. appealed.

Finlay, Q.C. and Pollard for the appellants.—Assuming that in an ordinary case of the sale of a definite amount the buyers would be entitled to a bill of lading for the amount which they had bought, yet, in a case of this kind, where the amount is not definite, but there is a special clause providing that the sellers may ship less than the minimum or more than the maximum amount which the purchasers are to take, the case is different. Such a clause as this contemplates that the cargo may exceed the maximum amount and provides that, if it does, the excess shall remain for the account of the sellers; and, therefore, this contract in effect provides that the buyers may have to take a bill of lading for a larger amount than they have purchased, and that in such case the buyers are to hold the excess for the sellers. The case of Tanvaco v. Lucas (28 L. J. 150, 301, Q. B.) upon which the respondents may rely, is clearly distinguishable from this case, because in that case there was not a "maximum" and "minimum" clause such as there is in this contract.

Cohen, Q.C. and Carver, for the respondents.—The special clause upon which the appellants rely has nothing to do with the tender of shipping documents to the purchasers: it does not say anything about the bill of lading. It would be necessary to read into this clause words giving the sellers power to tender a bill of lading for an amount larger than that purchased. This clause is inserted for the purpose of giving the buyer the advantage of a rising market up to a certain limit, and the sellers the advantage of a falling market up to a certain limit. [They were stopped by the Court.]

Finlay, Q.C. replied.

Lord Halsbury.—I am of opinion that the decision of the arbitrators was wrong, and that the order of the Divisional Court was right. I feel compelled to say that the arbitrators were wrong because of the observations which have been made during the argument that these arbitrators were commercial men familiar with contracts of this kind. Parties ought either to be content with their decisions and not come to a court of law, or else be satisfied with a decision according to law in a court of law. In this case the arbitrators did not act upon any fixed principles of law. As to the question which arises for our decision here, whether there was a good tender by the sellers, when the facts are properly understood and made plain, it is not at all difficult to see what our decision must be. The contract is for the sale and delivery of wheat, the amount of which is to be ascertained thus: there is in the contract what is called a "maximum" and "minimum" clause, which provides that the sellers may ship less than the minimum quantity, in which case the price of the quantity short shipped of the medium quantity is to be settled at the value of the day of the appropriation; or that the sellers may ship more than the maximum quantity in which case the excess over the medium amount will remain for their account. The only question really is, whether there were shipping documents corresponding to the amount bought which the purchasers could have to deal with as they pleased. It has been argued that the seller could give a bill of lading for as much wheat as he liked under this contract. That, however, can only be so if contradictory words are added to the contract. It seems to me, therefore, that the purchasers had a right to have a bill of lading for the amount which they bought, 3000 tons. Such a bill of lading was not offered to them, and the tender by the sellers was therefore bad, and the purchasers are not liable. The appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is conceded that, if the contract had been for 3000 tons, and there had been no maximum and minimum clause, the purchasers would have been entitled to a bill of lading for that amount, and that no other bill of lading would have been a good tender. It seems to me that the true construction of this contract was determined upon shipment of the wheat, and that the contract there became one for 3000 tons. A bill of lading was tendered to the purchasers for 3800 tons, and consequently the shipping documents tendered by the sellers were not in conformity with the contract. The purchasers were entitled to have a bill of lading which would, if they so desired, transfer the whole thing bought to anyone else, and were not bound to take a bill of lading for a larger amount which would make them trustees of a part of the cargo which they had not contracted to buy or to be trustees of. The tender by the sellers was therefore bad and the purchasers were not bound to accept it. This appeal must be dismissed.

Davey, L.J.—I agree. The case is perfectly clear when the facts are once understood. It is conceded that purchasers in an ordinary case are entitled to a bill of lading for the amount which they have purchased. The question is, whether the clause which has been indorsed upon this contract amounts to a special contract that that right of the purchasers shall be altered. It has been argued that this special clause will have no effect unless it is so construed. I think that is not so, and that the clause has another effect. I am not disposed in this case to alter the rule of law and of common sense that a purchaser of 3000 tons of wheat is entitled to a bill of lading for 3000 tons, unless there is a very express contract otherwise. This clause in this contract says nothing at all about a bill of lading, and to support the argument of the appellant it would be necessary to read in words to the effect that the sellers should be at liberty to give the purchasers a bill of lading for more than the amount purchased. I cannot think that it was intended to insert such an important stipulation into this contract by such a clause as this framed in such words. This appeal entirely fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Freshfields and Williams.

Solicitors for the respondents, Simpson and Cullingford.

Friday, Feb. 9, 1894.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Davey, L.JJ.)

The Glendarroch. (a)

Bill of lading—Loss by perils of the sea—Negligence—Burden of proof.

Where a bill of lading contains the customary exception of loss by perils of sea, and an action is brought by the shipper against the shipowner for damage to goods shipped thereunder, if the shipowner pleads perils of the sea, the burden is upon the plaintiff of proving that the damage was caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants.

The Xantho (ubi inf.) considered.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Sir Francis Jeune.

The plaintiffs, Messrs. J. C. Johnson and Co. and H. F. Currie and Co., sought to recover from the defendants, Messrs Wainwright Brothers and Co., the sum of 387*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.*, being the value of 2100 sacks of cement damaged by water while being conveyed by the steamship Glendarroch from London to Liverpool in March 1893.

The defendants had, it appeared, contracted to take the Glendarroch from London to Liverpool at their own risk, for repairs, and the plaintiffs' cement was taken on board as cargo, but primarily for purposes of ballast.

In the course of her voyage the Glendarroch stranded in Cardigan Bay, and the plaintiffs' cement was damaged by water, and rendered useless.

The plaintiffs sued the defendants as common carriers, but the defendants, while admitting that the goods were lost before the bills of lading were completed, contended that they were received on terms that it was agreed should be embodied in the bills of lading, which included the usual exceptions with regard to perils of the sea and a negligence clause.

The plaintiffs did not allege negligence in their pleadings, but they were taken by the President as amended in that respect. He found that the goods were carried under the bills of lading alleged by the defendants, but that the alleged negligence clause had not been made out. He considered himself bound by the dictum of Lord Herschell in The Xantho (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 701; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8, 207; 12 App. Cas. 503), and laid it down that the defendant has to show not only a peril of the sea, but a peril of the sea such as would exempt him under the bill of lading; that is, a peril not occasioned by the negligence of the defendant.

Counsel for the defendants then declined to carry the case any further, contending that it would shift a burden on the defendants which really rested on the plaintiffs, and judgment was accordingly entered for an agreed sum of 335*l.*

On appeal,

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and W. F. Taylor for the appellants.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. A. Hamilton for the respondents.

The Master of the Rolls.—The contract being one on the ordinary terms of a bill of lading, the facts suggested are these, that the goods are shipped on these terms, and that the defendant undertakes to deliver the goods at the end of the voyage unless the loss of the goods during the voyage comes within one of the exceptions in the bill of lading. The exception relied upon by the defendant is that the goods were lost or damaged by the peril of the sea, and upon that it is alleged—I care not by whom—that even though that be true, yet that peril of the sea and that loss by peril of the sea was the result of negligent navigation on the part of the defendants' sailors. It is the law that if that be made out the defendant has no defence, and the plaintiff is entitled to succeed, and the real question is—how is that to be made out, if it can be made out? It is to be decided according to the practice of the law courts, and the question is, how is that result to be arrived at? The terms of the bill of lading as they stand on paper are, "except the loss be from perils of the sea." But then it is said that, nevertheless, if the perils of the sea are produced by the negligence of the defendants' seamen, then that loss cannot be relied on by the defendants. How can that be unless there be an irresistible inference that such exception does exist in the contract, though it is not written in it? Therefore it must be read into it as if it were in it.

(a) Reported by Basil Crump, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

Hence we must try and see whether this stipulation as to negligence must be written in, or be considered as written in. The liabilities of shipowners under a bill of lading are in that part which precedes the exceptions. Is this stipulation about the loss being the result of the negligence of the shipowners' servants, although within the terms of the exception—is that to be written in before the exceptions or not? The first thing that strikes one is that in that part of the contract it is not wanted. It is immaterial. Before you come to the exceptions the liability of the shipowner is absolute. He has contracted that he will deliver the goods at the end of the voyage. If there were no exceptions it would be utterly immaterial whether the loss was caused by his servants or not. Even if there were no negligence whatever he would be liable. It cannot be, therefore, that you ought to write in this irresistible inference in that part of the contract. It is not wanted there; therefore you must write it into that part which contains the exceptions. When you come to the exceptions, among others there is that one, perils of the sea. There are no words which say perils of the sea not caused by the negligence of the captain or crew. You have got to read those words in by a necessary inference. How can you read them in? You have got the plain words, in their ordinary sense, that the shipowner is relieved if the loss is a loss by perils of the sea in the ordinary sense of the word. But then you have to read in the other. You can only read it in, in my opinion, as an exception upon the exceptions. You must read in "Except the loss is by perils of the sea, unless or except that loss is the result of the negligence of the captain or sailors of the owner." That being so, I think that, according to the ordinary course of practice, each party would have to prove the part of the matter which lies upon him. The plaintiff would have to prove the contract and the non-delivery. If he leaves that in doubt, of course he fails. The defendant's answer is, "Yes, but my case was brought within the exception, within its ordinary meaning." That lies upon him. Then the plaintiff has a right to say there are exceptional circumstances—viz., that the damage was brought about by the negligence of the defendants' servants, and it seems to me that it is for the plaintiff to make out that second exception.

Let us see whether that seems to have been the view of the older lawyers who had to deal with these disputes as to bills of lading. The old system of pleading, so far as it is a logical exercise carried into practice, was this, that the pleading should follow the burden of proof, so as to show distinctly which part of the transaction lay upon each person to prove. There was a declaration, which showed what the plaintiff had to prove in the first instance. There was the plea, which was prepared to show what the defendant was prepared to prove in answer to that; there was the replication, which admitted the plea was sufficient answer to the plaintiff unless he could answer it. But the replication might answer the plea so as to reinforce the declaration, and show that, by reason of what was in the replication, the plea had become, although primâ facie an answer, not a sufficient one, and that the declaration was restored. That was the system and the logical system of the old pleading, for the purpose of the conduct of the trial, to show how the evidence and the proof was to be regulated. In my opinion you find in all the books, down to the most modern times, that the pleading followed that view of the burden of proof. The declaration stated the bill of lading, and relying on the first and substantive part of the bill of lading alleged non-delivery. That was all the declaration came to state, and strictly speaking, I am of opinion that the declaration could not properly have stated anything about negligence, because negligence was immaterial. It was what the old pleaders called "leaping before you came to the stile," and a pleader was not called upon to answer that which at that time and at that moment was an immaterial allegation. Therefore the declaration was as I say. That showed what the plaintiff had to prove in the first instance, and the moment he did prove what was in his declaration, that was his case. Then came the defendant, and he had to answer that case. Then the plea is stated: "It is true that that is the contract, but the non-delivery was the result of a peril of the sea." He followed, therefore, the terms of the exception construed in their ordinary sense, that is, that the loss was a loss by perils of the sea. No plea that can be found in the books ever went on to say that the loss by perils of the sea was not caused by negligence. Yet, if the contention be true that the burden of proof to that extent lies on the defendant, every one of those pleas without that allegation was no answer to the declaration, and was open to demurrer. There is no such case in which a demurrer was brought forward and supported. As that was so, it showed it was no part of the proof which the defendant was bound to give. Then you have a long succession of cases, all setting out a replication, and that replication in the given case is: "Yes, it is true there was a loss by perils of the sea within the primâ facie exception, but that was brought about by the negligence of your servants, i.e., by your captain and crew." The replication was there for the purpose of showing what the plaintiff had to prove. He could not depart from his declaration, but if he could support it by showing that the exception was not satisfied because there had been this negligence, then the case in the end was for the plaintiff. That being so, it seems to me that the course of pleading is as strong as it could be in favour of, what I think, the true construction of the contract shows, and the principles upon which such a construction was to be acted upon in the trial of the case when it came to be tried. That being the state of things, is there any case to the contrary of that constant course of pleading, and of that result of the principle of construction of a bill of lading? I know of none, but I think there are cases which distinctly show that the course of pleading did give the right view of the different shiftings of the burden of proof. I think that the case of Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Company Limited (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 77; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 476) is distinct on the point, and so also is the case of Czech v. General Steam Navigation Company (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 5; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 14). I think that the two Scotch cases (Craig v. Rose, 16 Scot. L. R. 750, and Dobbie v. Williams, 21 Scot. L. R. 667) are as distinct and clear to the very point as cases can be. I therefore think that, unless there is something which will justify us in setting aside what I think is the principle of conduct arising from the true construction of the contract, and the universal mode of treating trials up to this time, that which is said in Mr. Carver's book, which is the result of a very careful consideration of the cases, is correct, viz., that, if the loss apparently falls within the exception, the burden of showing that the shipowner is not entitled to the benefit of the exception on the ground of negligence is upon the person so contending. Mr. Carver cites those cases in support of the proposition. Of course the proposition in his book is not to be treated as authority, but I adopt that statement of the law, and I think it is right. But it is said that a suggestion on a decision or an opinion of the greatest weight has been given to the contrary of what I think is the principle of conduct, and has been the universal practice in the conduct of trials for years and years. That is the opinion which is said to have been given by Lord Herschell in the case of The Xantho (ubi sup.). I need hardly say that I have the greatest respect and regard for the legal opinion of Lord Herschell in any mercantile case. I have reason to have that great respect, but reading what he said in the case of The Xantho, I am of opinion that he positively declined to give an opinion. People may say that, looking through or into his words, they may see a tendency of his mind, but that is not an opinion. The tendency of his mind when he refuses to give an opinion is not in my judgment any opinion at all. I therefore do not for the time feel hampered by a supposed view of Lord Herschell, which I feel, if the case ever goes before him for decision, and if he had that idea passing through his mind, he will not act upon. I think, therefore, that the law is clear that the burden of proving this negligence lies upon the plaintiff.

If that be true, what is the result of this case? When the first part of the trial was over, Sir Walter Phillimore proceeded to open his case. Naturally he opened with, "The goods were put on board the ship," which really was not a subject of dispute, and "The goods were not delivered." That was not a subject in dispute. There he might have stopped. He had proved his primâ facie case, but knowing that the ship had really been stranded on the rocks and broken into, and the cargo destroyed, he naturally saw that there was a loss by perils of the sea in the ordinary sense of the term, and he therefore began to prepare the mind of the judge before the time, doing that which, if he had been an old pleader, would have been jumping before he came to the stile. He began to open that which he would have to prove on a replication that the perils of the sea had been caused by the negligence of the defendants' sailors. He might have taken that to be the real issue of the case, and then have opened the negligence which he alleged, and if he had evidence of it put in his evidence. But it is too soon; it is meeting the defendant before the defendant has made any case. He puts in the answers to the interrogatories, which immediately show that there has been a loss by perils of the sea in the ordinary sense, and I think that showed evidence, perhaps strong evidence, that that was the result of negligent navigation. But he was not content. I know what the refinement of his mind is, and he seems not to have been content to rely on that, because he would not risk his client's case upon that, and he endeavoured to get from the judge a ruling which made the whole of that immaterial. He endeavoured to get from the judge a ruling before the judge was bound to give it, on what would be the ultimate question in the trial. He quoted The Xantho (ubi sup.), and endeavoured to get from the judge a ruling that the burden of proof which lay upon the defendant was that he must not only prove loss by perils of the sea, but must prove that that was not the result of the negligence of his captain and crew. He obtained that ruling of the judge at that time. Mr. Walton at that time had not said he had nothing to answer. He had not said he would not call evidence. It is after Sir Walter Phillimore has obtained that ruling of the judge, which to my mind would increase the obligation on Mr. Walton, and put upon him the necessity of far stronger evidence than if that ruling did not exist, that Mr. Walton said: "After that ruling it is of no use for me to answer this specific allegation which you have made that my going out of my course and being out of my course was negligence." If Mr. Walton had shown that his being in Cardigan Bay was not the result of careless navigation and not keeping his course outside of Cardigan Bay, but that he had sufficient reason for going into Cardigan Bay, which would take away any real suggestion of its being carelessness to be in Cardigan Bay, that would not do. He must go on to prove that if he was in Cardigan Bay there was no negligence which conduced to the running on the rocks. It seems to me that the burden of proof thus laid upon him was greater than the law justified. Mr. Walton said, "No, I cannot undertake that burden. That is your ruling, and I must go to the Court of Appeal as you have made that ruling, and ask whether it is right or whether it is wrong, so as to enable me to continue my part of the trial, if there is to be a new trial." In my opinion Mr. Walton was bound to come here in order to get that view of the court, and he has succeeded in convincing me that the learned judge has misconstrued that which was suggested to him as the authority of Lord Herschell, and that he has given a ruling which was not according to law. I think, therefore, that as upon the point of the appeal Mr. Walton has succeeded, he ought to have the costs of the appeal; but I also think that there seems to have been considerable misfortune in the mode in which the trial was conducted, and as the result, about which I give no opinion, is yet to be determined, I think there must be a new trial, and that under the circumstances the costs of the first trial must abide the event of the second.

Lopes, L.J.—The question raised in this case is a somewhat difficult one, and the question is a question of onus of proof. As a general rule it may be said that the burden of proof lies on the person who affirms a particular thing. It appears to me in this case that the burden of proving that a loss which has happened is attributable to an excepted cause lies on the person who is setting it up. That in this case would be the defendants, the shipowners. If, however, the excepted cause by itself is sufficient to account for the loss, it appears to me that the burden of showing that there is something else which deprives the party of relying on the excepted cause lies on the person who set up that contention. That, in this case, would be the plaintiff, who is the shipper. I think that is not only the result of the authorities, but of the pleadings before the Judicature Acts. The cases which have been referred to are: Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Company Limited (ubi sup.); Czech v. General Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.); Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 714; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 275; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 546); The P. and O. Steamship Company v. Shand (12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808; 2 Mar. Law Cas. 244; 3 Moore P. C. C. N. S. 272); and Wyld v. Pickford (8 M. & W. 461). These cases make good what I have stated with regard to the onus of proof, namely, that where peril of the sea is set up it is sufficient for the defendant to prove the peril relied on, and he need not go on to show that that was really not caused by him, but if the plaintiff says that it was, then he must set it up in his replication and must prove it. I have not heard a single case except one which I think is not an authority at all, which in any way negatives that proposition. But it is said there is a contrary opinion expressed by Lord Herschell in the case of The Xantho (ubi sup.). The particular passage I will read is at p. 512 (App. Cas.): "Much argument was addressed to your Lordships on the question whether, when the plaintiffs had proved that the goods had not been delivered, thus throwing the onus on the defendants of excusing their non-delivery, proof by them that the vessel had been sunk in a collision would be sufficient to shift the onus, and render it incumbent on the plaintiffs to establish that the collision was due to the defendants' negligence, or whether the defendants, to bring themselves within the exception, must show that the loss was not due to a cause induced by their own negligence. I do not think that this point is now before your Lordships for decision. Arguments of weight have been adduced in support of either view." It is perfectly clear, therefore, that he does not intend to decide that point. He goes on to say: "I certainly must not be understood as deciding that the mere proof of loss by collision, under circumstances as consistent with its resulting from the negligence of the carrying ship as from any other cause, would exonerate the defendants." That is the passage which is relied upon. Probably I think, reading it strictly, it might be said that if the learned lord had an inclination of opinion at all it was in favour of that opinion which is put forward by Sir Walter Phillimore; but the materiality of the whole passage is that it is not decided at all, and is left for further decision. Therefore, to put an extra-judicial dictum of that kind against a practice which has existed for a vast number of years would be most undesirable, and would be contrary to all precedents. In the result, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the learned President was misdirecting himself. The President says: "I think Lord Herschell was rather inclined to the view that the defendant has to show not only a peril of the sea, but a peril of the sea such as would exempt him under the bill of lading, that is, a peril of the sea not occasioned by the negligence of the defendant." The learned judge so ruled, and was invited so to rule by Sir Walter Phillimore. Mr. Walton then said he left the case as it was. I think that is a clear misdirection by the learned judge, and such a misdirection as before the Judicature Acts would have necessitated a new trial. But under Order XXXIX., r. 6, new trials are not granted unless there is some substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice. Speaking for myself, I do not hesitate to say that this is the matter in the case which has given me considerable trouble, but I am not prepared to say that a miscarriage of justice may not have occurred, for it makes all the difference where the onus of proof is held to be. I cannot, therefore, say that some injustice, or at any rate some substantial wrong, may not have been occasioned to Mr. Walton's clients by the erroneous action which I consider the learned judge took in regard to this case.

DAVEY, L.J.—I am of opinion that Mr. Walton has successfully shown what the form of pleading was when there were pleadings in matters of this description, namely, that negligence must either be alleged in the declaration or else be specially replied. It may be doubted whether it would require to be set out in the declaration, but in either case it was a matter which must be alleged and proved by the plaintiffs. The forms of pleading were not a mere technicality, but were framed in the manner in which they were so as to carry out what is really a matter of substance, and show, as the Master of the Rolls has clearly explained, that the burden of proof shifted from time to time, according to the matters alleged to have been pleaded. Nobody ever heard of a plea such as that in Phillips v. Clark (2 C. B. N. S. 156) being demurred on, but if Sir Walter Phillimore was right in saying that the burden of proof was on the defendant, then he ought to have alleged it in his plea, and a plea merely stating one of the excepted perils which did not go on to negative any suggestion of negligence would have been insufficient. I think the point is clearly put by Parke, B. in the case of Wyld v. Pickford (8 M. & W. 461). That seems to me to bear out exactly what has been said, as also do the subsequent cases of Grill v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company Limited (ubi sup.) and the P. and O. Company v. Shand (ubi sup.). [The learned Judge then proceeded to cite the judgment of Willes, J. in Grill v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company, and proceeded:] This appears to show that perils of the sea are excepted, but that there is an implied contract by the shipowner that he will carry with care and caution, and his breach of that contract prevents him availing himself of the perils of the sea. As to the case of Taylor v. The Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (ubi sup.) the present case is distinguished from that case, which turned entirely upon the construction of the word "thieves" in the exception in the bill of lading, and the court came to the conclusion that the word "thieves" meant only as a matter of construction persons outside the vessel. That being so, of course the defendant had to bring himself within the excepted perils, and if that was not one of the excepted perils properly considered by the court, he did not bring himself within the excepted perils. Therefore, I think that case cannot be relied upon. I confess I have great doubt whether Mr. Walton had anything in substance to complain of, because there was evidence raising a primâ facie case of negligence, and the learned judge might, it is admitted, have said to Mr. Walton, "There is a primâ facie case of negligence raised by the plaintiff for you to answer," and Mr. Walton would have put in his evidence in answer to that. If the learned judge had taken that course, there could not have been, so far as I can see, anything to complain of. There are some subsequent words by Sir W. Phillimore, after the learned judge decided the point—words which warn Mr. Walton about the interrogatories and the evidence produced from the light-house; but these words were subsequent to the very clear judgment delivered by the learned President, and Mr. Walton had announced the course which on that judgment he intended to take. I think that observation of Sir Walter Phillimore, though perhaps kindly meant, is not sufficient to alter or qualify the effect of the finding of the learned judge. It is to be further observed that the learned judge seems never to have found as the basis of his judgment that there was negligence in fact, but to have given judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that it was the defendants' business to negative negligence, and that he had not done so. On consideration it seems to me difficult to say that Mr. Walton might not be prejudiced by the way in which the case was decided, because the evidence might have been so evenly balanced, or the witnesses on one side or the other might not have been thoroughly believed, that the ultimate decision might finally turn on the question on whom the burden of proof lay. On these grounds I agree with the judgment which the Master of the Rolls has given.

Solicitors: for the appellants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton; for the respondents, Norris, Allens, and Chapman, for J. M. Quiggin, Liverpool.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Saturday, Feb. 3, 1894.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE MAIN. (a)

Marine insurance—Freight—Valued policy.

Plaintiffs, owners of a steamship, then on an outward voyage, took out a policy of insurance on freight, at an agreed valuation, in the said vessel on her homeward voyage, the insurance to commence from the loading of the cargo.

The vessel met with an accident on her outward voyage, and was detained at the port of discharge for repairs.

Some cargo was engaged, before the date of the policy, for the homeward voyage, of which part was loaded at the original rate of freight, and the remainder cancelled. More cargo was from time to time shipped at much lower rates than were current at the time the policy was effected, and the vessel eventually sailed with a full cargo. She was destroyed by fire in the course of the voyage, and whatever freight was at risk was consequently entirely lost.

Held, that the policy covered the freight at risk, and that the valuation was binding upon both parties with regard to what actually came at risk under the policy.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THIS was an action on a policy of insurance on freight. The plaintiffs were the Anglo-American Steamship Company (Limited), and the National Marine Assurance Company were the defendants.

In the month of November 1891 the plaintiffs, who were the owners of the steamship Main, then on a voyage from Hamburg to New Orleans, proposed to the defendants that they should insure 1500*l.* upon the homeward freight of the said vessel from New Orleans to Liverpool. This they agreed to do, and it was further agreed that the freight should be valued at 5500*l.* The policy was dated 18th Nov. 1891, and was stated to be "on freight, valued at 5500*l.* in the good ship or vessel called the Main, from New Orleans to Liverpool," and the insurance was to commence "on the freight, goods, and merchandise aforesaid from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel."

Before this policy was effected, and while the Main was on her voyage from Hamburg to New Orleans, a cargo had been engaged from New Orleans to Bremen. None of this cargo was ever shipped, and the voyage to Bremen was given up before the policy was made, and the cargo intended for it was cancelled.

At the time the policy was effected the valuation of 5500*l.* was, according to the agreed facts, a reasonable and proper valuation of the expected freight upon a full cargo, having regard to the rates of freight then current at New Orleans for a voyage from New Orleans to Liverpool.

On the 9th Oct. 1891 the Main sailed from Hamburg to New Orleans, and on the 28th Oct. she grounded on the coast of Florida. After salvage operations she was towed into New Orleans on the 1st Dec. On the 7th Dec. the discharge of her inward cargo was commenced, and it was completed on the 21st Dec., when she was shifted to a loading berth. But considerable repairs had to be done upon her, and she was not ready to sail upon her homeward voyage until the 1st March 1892.

Prior to the date of the policy some cargo (not amounting to a full cargo) had been engaged for the intended voyage to Liverpool. The plaintiffs contended that part of such cargo, consisting of 12,042 bushels of grain, 700 parcels of molasses, and 7080 staves, was loaded at the original rates of freight, but this was not admitted by the defendants. It was mutually admitted that the remainder of such cargo was cancelled. More cargo was from time to time engaged, and the Main eventually sailed for Liverpool with a full cargo, and with respect to the cargo other than that particularly mentioned above, at rates of freight which were much lower than those current when the policy was effected.

In the course of her voyage the Main was totally lost by fire, one of the perils insured against.

The total actual freight payable to the plaintiffs in respect of the said cargo was 3250*l.* 7*s.*, and of this freight a sum of 952*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* was payable, and was paid at New Orleans in advance, leaving a sum of 2298*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* as the actual freight at risk.

The plaintiffs were also insured upon the freight for the homeward voyage by a policy for 2500*l.* granted by the German Marine Insurance Company, and they had received thereunder 2250*l.* in respect of the said loss. They were also insured by a policy for 1000*l.*, granted by the Tokio Insurance Company, and had received 1000*l.*

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Taylor were for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Carver were for the defendants.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the judgment. In addition to the cases there cited the following were referred to:

Ionides v. Pender, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 547; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 531; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 266; Arnould on Marine Insurance, 6th ed., p 308.

BARNES, J., having reviewed the facts, continued:—The questions raised before me involved chiefly this—whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover on the footing of the valuation in the policy effected by them with the defendants, or whether it can be open so as to entitle the plaintiffs to recover upon the footing of what actually was at risk only, and that in consequence of the payments made to the defendants by the plaintiffs, that which was at risk has been fully indemnified for, and therefore nothing is recoverable on the policy. I have to consider, first, whether or not the policy attached to and covered the freight on this voyage. The plaintiffs say it did, and that that being so, the valuation applied to the risk on that voyage, and is binding on the parties. I do not think it was really contested, though it is in the defence, that the policy in fact attached upon this voyage to this freight which was at risk, and the real contention of the defendants was that this valuation must be open. It seems to me necessary to decide, first, what was valued. The valuation, by agreement, is on freight of a ship valued at 5500*l.* on a voyage from New Orleans to Liverpool. I think this freight, when it was agreed to, meant the gross freight of the ship. The underwriters do not seem to have been told that some might be paid in advance, and although there was a letter from New Orleans, from which it might, perhaps, have been inferred that the assured in taking out a policy meant to exclude the advanced freight, I do not think, looking at the facts, that they intended when they took the policy out, or that the underwriters assented to or agreed, that what was valued was other than the gross freight for the voyage. The defendants say that valuation was made upon the basis of the current rates at which the ship was expected to sail, and that as much less was ultimately engaged the valuation should be open and be treated as being at a reduced rate. The plaintiffs say the value agreed in the policy is the value agreed by both parties to represent the value of what actually was at risk on the voyage. To support that they rely upon Everth v. Smith (2 Maule & Selwyn, 278) as showing that, although the assured may take out a policy with regard to what they then think will be the engagement of the ship, that they, in terms similar to those on freight generally, will cover and attach to whatever freight in fact is loaded on the voyage on which the ship sails. Lord Ellenborough, in his judgment in Everth v. Smith, said: "This was an insurance on freight generally, not on any specific freight; the charter-party is only material to show that upon the ship's arrival at Riga there was an inchoation of the risk. The underwriter did not insure that any particular freight should be brought home, but if any 'freight' is brought home a loss has not happened for which he undertook to indemnify the assured." In that case freight had been earned, and accordingly there had been no loss. At the close of his judgment he says: "On the authority of the above cases, as well as upon general principles of law, it appears to us that the mere retardation of the adventure, and the consequent inconvenience and expense arising from it, are not a substantive cause of loss where the particular thing insured has not received damage; and whether the freight earned be the particular freight contracted for or is posterior freight makes no difference: if freight has been fully earned there can be no loss properly demandable of the underwriters." They held, therefore, that in a policy in similar terms the freight which was actually earned on a voyage would be covered, although the assured in taking out his policy contemplated having a specific freight, but when he went to the underwriters he insured the freight in general terms. I think, therefore, in this case, the policy attached to the subject-matter at risk, and I do not think that point was really contested.

The defendants contended, upon Forbes v. Aspinall (13 East, 328), that the policy should be open, and, consequently, there ought to be a reduction based upon what was in fact at risk. That case is an authority for the well-known proposition that where parties contemplate the freight insured to be on a full and complete cargo, and where in fact part of the cargo is only shipped, therefore the latter was all that was at risk, and there must be, therefore, what is called an opening of the valuation. This is not in strictness an opening, but is merely a reduction in proportion to the amount of cargo shipped, the valuation still being held binding on what is in fact shipped. I think that judgment is based on the principle that both parties had agreed that the freight valued was the freight on a full cargo, and as this full cargo was not shipped the value of what was at risk only must be taken. It is no authority for the contention that if the value on the freight on what is about to be shipped is estimated too highly originally, and the assured is mistaken in his valuation, the valuation ought to be reduced. The truth seems to me to be, that the freight upon what is not shipped is never at risk, and therefore to that extent the underwriters cannot be made responsible. There are several other cases (they were not referred to by either counsel) which seem to me to be in point. For instance, one of the points put in argument was, that if a cargo was about to be shipped under a policy in general terms on produce, and the assured could not ship as valuable a cargo as he at first intended, and shipped a cargo of much less value, then the valuation would not be binding. The plaintiffs contended that it still would be binding. There is a case cited by the text-writers on this point, but I have not, up to the present, been able to verify their statement about it. It is referred to by Lowndes in his book on Insurance, sect. 48, thus: "But excluding fraud and mistake a valuation may be greatly in excess of the real worth of the thing insured, and yet hold good. In a case, not reported, where an African merchant, expecting that his ship would be loaded on the coast with palm oil and ivory, insured the cargo, valuing it at 11,000*l.*, and by chance she was loaded with palm kernels, worth only some 3000*l* which were totally lost on the way home, he was allowed to recover the whole of the 11,000*l*." The reference he gives is Company of African Merchants v. Liverpool Marine Insurance Company, in Mitchell's Maritime Register, vol. 15, p. 914, and vol. 16, p. 145. I have had a transcript made, not being able to procure the book of the case there cited, and I am not quite sure that it quite bears out the statement made by the learned author; but the case I think he refers to is referred to by Mr. M'Arthur in his book on Insurance as being the Company of African Merchants v. Harker in 1872, and he gives the same reference. He gives the statement that it is not reported, and then says, "see Mitchell's Maritime Register" at the pages I have referred to. That, I think, is another case which is mentioned in the Shipping Gazette of 2nd Dec. 1872: but he cites it for the same proposition as Mr. Lowndes. I have not been able to procure a copy of that report, but there are two other cases which seem in point. The first is Lidgett v. Secretan (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 942; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 365; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 615), where a ship was insured, valued at 20,000*l*, from Liverpool to Calcutta, and for thirty days after arrival, and then another policy was taken out for 10,000*l* from Calcutta to London. The ship was considerably damaged on the outward voyage, and was put into a dry dock for repair. While being repaired, the outward policy expired, and she was afterwards destroyed totally by fire, and it was held there that under the first policy the assured was entitled to recover the amount of the depreciation at the expiration of the risk without reference to the sum actually expended on her repairs, and under the second policy the assured was entitled to recover as for a total loss; so that, although the valuation had been made on the basis of her being a sound ship under the second policy, and in fact she was a damaged ship worth much less, the assured recovered the full amount under the second policy. Willes, J. said (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 627): "The second point arises upon the second policy, and is one of great importance, and one which has been the subject of much discussion and criticism both by lawyers and legislators, and yet nobody has been able to improve upon the practice as to valued policies, which has been recognised and adopted by shipowners and underwriters, and has, at least amongst honest men, the advantage of giving the assured the full value of the thing insured and of enabling the underwriters to obtain a larger amount of profit. It saves them both the necessity of going into an expensive and intricate question as to the value in each particular case, and its abandonment would, in the end, as it seems to me, prove highly detrimental to the interests of the underwriters. . . . It is manifestly important that the owner should be able to insert a fair sum as the value of the vessel, treating her as sound, though she may at the time have sustained damage even to the extent of what may ultimately turn out to be a total loss, that being, in fact, one of the perils insured against." Then he refers to the case of Barker v. Janson (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 473; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 28; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 803): "The result of the decisions in this country as well as in the United States, and I believe in North Germany, is that the value mentioned in the policy is a conventional sum not representing the real value of the vessel, but the sum to be paid by the underwriters in the event of a loss." Then he says: "No authority has been cited for limiting the value to that extent. In the absence of fraud or wagering, it seems to me that the value is to be taken to be the conventional sum to be paid in the event of a loss, whatever the actual value of the vessel might be at the time." And Montague Smith, J. says: "If the repairs had been completed before the second policy attached the vessel would have been of the value mentioned in that policy; but that is a fact with which the underwriters on that policy are not concerned, because value is a matter which the parties have liquidated and ascertained at the time of entering into the contract, and which neither can open. It cannot depend on the actual value at the time of the loss, or at the time the risk attaches." Then the case of Barker v. Janson (ubi sup.), which he refers to, is still more striking. There the ship was insured on a value policy on time—in the last case I mentioned it was on a voyage policy homeward—and its value stated in the policy was 8000*l*. at the time the policy was made; but, unknown to the parties, the ship had been injured by a storm, so that the expense of the repairs would have exceeded its value when repaired; so the ship was worth nothing, though valued at 8000*l*. at the time. During the continuance of the risk the ship was totally lost. It was held that the policy attached, notwithstanding the previous injury to the ship, and, there being no fraud, the value of the ship stated in it was still binding. Willes, J. in that case says: "No authority has been cited for it, and I never heard of underwriters claiming such a deduction, nor can I see that it would be equitable, because it would be contrary to the contract. It is said that there was a mistake as to the state of the ship; but a mistake to entitle the parties to reopen a contract of valuation must be such as would entitle the parties to proceed in equity for relief. It must have been a mistake of both parties in respect of something which was material to the contract." And in conclusion he says: "In fine, as pointed out by Patteson, J., in Irving v. Manning (1 H. L. Cas. 287), so long as underwriters are willing to adhere to the system of valued policies, they must, where there has been no fraud, pay the stipulated amount. Those cases seem to me to be authorities for the proposition that, though the assured may value that which he intended should be at risk upon the basis of a value which ultimately turns out to be erroneous because of facts of which he had no knowledge when he took out the policy, yet still, if the policy attaches, the amount which he has valued as that which is to be at risk is to be taken as conclusive and binding, although the amount which actually is at risk turns out to be very much less than was actually intended at the time of making the policy." Therefore, I hold that the plaintiffs are right in saying the policy covered the freight at risk on the voyage in question, and that the valuation is binding with regard to what actually came at risk under the policy, and that amount is 5500*l*.

The subordinate question in the case is, what amount the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. A sum of 932*l*. odd shillings was paid for freight before the ship sailed. It was paid, according to the admission of the parties, on the shipment of the goods to which the policy related, and therefore that 932*l.* never came at risk. The result is, that 932*l.* out of the sum of 3250*l.* 7*s.* was not at risk, and therefore the valuation of 5500*l.* must be reduced in proportion to the rule-of-three sum arrived at by the relationship of 932*l.* to 3250*l.* as stated in the case of Williams v. The North China Insurance Company (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 884; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 342; 1 C. P. Div. 757) and other cases that were cited. That would leave the sum of 3889*l.* as being the value of what was at risk, taking the valuation in the policy, during this voyage, and as 3250*l.* have already been paid by other underwriters, that reduces the amount which is recoverable from the present defendants to the sum of 639*l.*, and that figure, if my view of this case is correct, is to be the amount which the parties are agreed that the judgment must be for.

Judgment for 643*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, plus a sum of 4*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* for the return of a proportionate part of the premium.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche.
Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Jan. 23, 24, and Feb. 5, 1894.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir Francis Jeune.)

THE AFRICANO. (a)

Necessaries—Priority—Practice.

Where a vessel has been sold in an action in rem and the proceeds brought into court, and the judgment is, in the usual form, expressed to be without prejudice to other claims against the vessel, and reserving all questions of priority of such claims, the court will order a pro ratâ distribution among claimants for necessaries, irrespective of the dates of the institution of their suits, as the court holds the property not only for the first plaintiff, but at least for all creditors of the same class who assert their claims before an unconditional decree is pronounced.

Semble: So long as the proceeds of the vessel remain in the hands of the court, an unconditional decree can be modified so as to let in others who, without laches, put forward claims of a like character.

Quære: Whether if a judgment has been obtained in the County Court, and the action is afterwards transferred to the High Court, such a judgment would give priority over claimants in suits pending in the High Court, or whether the plaintiff in the County Court action should only be admitted to share in the proceeds in the High Court on terms of equality with the suitors in that court.

OBJECTION to Registrar's report, adjourned into court.

The plaintiffs, Messrs. Fry and Co., who are coal merchants at Cardiff, during 1892 and 1893 supplied necessaries in the shape of coal to the steamship Africano, which is a Portuguese vessel belonging to Lisbon. Messrs. Fry and Co. brought an action in rem against the Africano, and on the 30th Oct. 1893 the action came before Jeune, J., and a decree was made pronouncing the sum of 854*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.* to be due to the plaintiffs, together with interest from the date of decree and costs. The decree was expressed to be without prejudice to other claims against the vessel, and reserved all questions as to priorities of such claims. In addition to this action there was one by the crew for wages, and others for alleged necessaries.

The ship was first arrested in the action by Messrs. Fry and Co., and warrants were issued in two actions in the County Court. The ship remained under arrest, but could not be sold, as the time allowed in a default action had not elapsed. Meanwhile the plaintiffs in the wages action got an admission of liability, and assessment of their claim. They then applied to the vacation judge (Kennedy, J.) and got an order for the sale of the Africano.

The plaintiffs in the wages action then moved to have the question of the priorities of the several claims settled by the Liverpool District Registrar, and the President directed the transfer of the actions pending in the Liverpool Registry to the Principal Registry. The matter accordingly came before the registrar, who decided that all the claimants for necessaries were entitled to share pro ratâ.

Messrs. Fry and Co. filed a notice of objection to the registrar's report, and a summons was taken out asking for the judge's directions (1) with regard to the payment of the amounts due to the crew of the Africano; (2) as to the method in which the question of the priorities was to be determined by the court. By consent of the parties the summons was adjourned into court, and was heard on an admitted statement of facts.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Laing for the plaintiffs.—There is no principle in law or equity justifying a pro ratâ distribution. Up to the time of The Heinrich Bjorn (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391; 11 App. Cas. 279) it was always thought that there was a maritime lien for necessaries, and hence that such claims were equal and co-ordinate:

The Saracen, 2 Wm. Rob. 457; 6 Moo. P. C. 56;
The Clara, Swabey, 1.

The Desdemona (Swabey, 158) is the only case where pro ratâ distribution was ordered. [The PRESIDENT.—That case does not seem to fit in with The Saracen, which decided that there was no power to order pro ratâ distribution in any case.] On the question of lien, see Maclachlan on Shipping, vol. 2, p. 51. The plaintiffs are entitled to priorities above all others of equal rate by being vigilant and first in point of time:

The William F. Safford, 1 Lush. 69;
The Cella, 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 125; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 293; 13 P. Div. 82.

[The PRESIDENT.—It comes to this, that it must be either writ or judgment if there be a priority.] Where all the suits are in the same court priority of judgment means priority of diligence, but that disappears when you have different courts for different procedure. Then it is either priority of writ or pari passu.

Pickford, Q.C. and Bateson, for the master and crew of the Africano and other necessaries claimants, in support of the registrar's report.—The principle underlying all the cases is that of diligence or remissness, and not of attachment or lien. In The Saracen, at p. 507, Dr. Lushington states how the law stood originally. He says: "Where the owners were responsible for damage done by collision, they were bound to pay the whole amount, whatever might be the value of the ship which did the damage or the amount of damage received . . . Everyone had his remedy, except where the defendant was bankrupt, or insolvent, or abroad. The only preference in all these cases was the preference of prior petens—he who first obtained judgment. Why should he who was so vigilant, and availed himself of the remedy the law gave him, be compelled to surrender the benefit of his diligence to another who was less active? Where all were equally active, or so as to bring their suits before decree, it is possible that this court might so have regulated its proceedings as to distribute the fund rateably to all having similar claims, but not after decree, which in itself confers a preferable title." [JEUNE, J. referred to The Bold Buccleuch, 7 Moo. P. C. 267, and The Saracen, on app. 6 Moo. P. C. 56.] In the Irish case of The Queen, No. 2 (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 189) they ranked in priority of judgments:

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Markland, 3 Adm. & Eccl. 343.

The Turliani (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 841; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 603) shows what the practice in the registry was considered to be. [JEUNE, J.—All this points rather to priority of judgments.] The court has to consider whether there has been diligence or remissness after reviewing all the circumstances. The Cella (ubi sup.) decides that, as soon as judgment has been pronounced, it relates back to the date of the writ, and the creditor is a secured creditor.

Holman, for other necessaries claimants, also appeared in support of the registrar's report.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

The PRESIDENT.—In this case the one point actually raised for decision is perhaps a novel but certainly a narrow one. It is whether, where a vessel has been sold and the proceeds brought into court, claims for necessaries, in respect of which actions have been brought, take priority inter se in the order of the institution of the actions. The question arises on a report from Mr. Registrar Smith with regard to the distribution of the proceeds of the ship Africano, which was sold by order of Kennedy, J. on the 4th Oct. 1893, and the proceeds, amounting to 1215*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.* net, brought into this court. An action for necessaries had been instituted against the vessel in the High Court on the 10th Aug. 1893, another such action in the Liverpool District Registry on the 17th Aug., and three such actions in the Liverpool County Court on the 11th Aug., 12th Aug., and 15th Sept. respectively. On the 13th Nov. 1893 all these proceedings were transferred by order to the High Court. It was contended by one set of claimants before the registrar that priority of distribution followed priority of writ; by the other that it followed priority of judgment. The Registrar, in an excellent report, decided that neither contention was correct, and that the fund should be distributed as between these claimants pro ratâ. The only appeal brought before me is by those who, before the registrar, contended in favour of priority of writ, and for whom Sir Walter Phillimore appeared. His view, as I understand it, was based mainly on one argument of principle and one authority. He said that before the judgment in The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.) it was supposed that a claim for necessaries conferred a maritime lien, but that now the law is that the only lien for necessaries arises on the institution of the action, that a security is obtained in such institution, and that, accordingly, securities so created rank, like mortgages, in the order of their dates. The case of The Cella (ubi sup.), he contended, was decided according to this principle. But I cannot agree with this argument. There seems to me to be an obvious link wanting. If priority in distribution follows the attachment of lien or security, and if a sounder view of the law has transferred that attachment from the date of supply of necessaries to the date of action brought in respect of it, we should expect to find it held in the less enlightened period before The Heinrich Bjorn that funds in court should be distributed among material men according to the priority of their acts of service. But such was not the view of the judges from some of whose decisions a belief is said to have arisen that the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, conferred a maritime lien on claims for necessaries. In The Desdemona (ubi sup.), decided in 1856 (Swabey, 158), Dr. Lushington said in a suit for necessaries that the court would give priority to any party first obtaining a judgment. In The William F. Safford (ubi sup.), (1 Lush. 69), decided in 1860, Dr. Lushington said: "The court encourages suitors in actively enforcing their remedy, and gives preference to a party who is first in possession of a decree of the court." It is not, perhaps, easy to understand why Dr. Lushington limited, as he appears to have done in that case, the advantages of priority to the earliest decree; but it is clear that he contemplated a decree as alone capable of conferring priority. The same view was taken in an Irish case, decided in 1869 (The Queen, ubi sup.). Nor in the instances of claims arising from collision was preference ever given to the claimant who first became a suitor. It is probable that before the case of The Bold Buccleuch in 1847 (ubi sup.), the view accepted in this court was that the lien came into existence only with the suit. If so, the authorities which show that in cases of collision a decree, and not the issue of the writ, gave priority, are also authorities against Sir Walter Phillimore's argument: see The Saracen (ubi sup.), and The Clara (ubi sup.).

It appears to me that the case of The Cella (ubi sup.) has no real bearing on this point. The question there was, whether when a ship had been arrested in an action for necessaries, and the company to whom she belonged was subsequently wound-up, the official liquidator had a claim on the sum representing the value of the ship in the hands of the court as against the plaintiff. It is true that it was held in that case by the President that the plaintiff had a security arising at the commencement of the action in rem. But it is quite a different thing to say that such a security takes priority over securities of the same kind arising subsequently in a similar manner. The rationale of the decision in that case appears to me to be explained by Fry, L.J., in approving in this case, as he had previously done in The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.), the dictum of Dr. Lushington in The Volante (1 W. Rob. 383): "An arrest offers the greatest security for obtaining substantial justice, as furnishing a security for prompt and immediate payment," and adding, "The arrest enables the court to keep the property as security to answer the judgment." This does not at all imply that the court only holds the property for the plaintiff, or for that plaintiff in priority to others of the same class. The true view is, I think, that the court holds the property not only for the first plaintiff, but also for at least all creditors of the same class who assert their claims before an unconditional decree is pronounced. The language of Dr. Lushington in The Clara, indicating that the court would have power to delay pronouncing a decree in the first till it could also be pronounced in a subsequent action, "so that both parties might share proportionately," is an authority for this proposition. It is not necessary in this case to decide whether priority in distribution follows priority in judgment. I think it is clear that in the cases to which I have already referred, and especially in the decision of the Privy Council in the case of The Saracen, it was held that a creditor who had obtained a final decree held its fruits against another creditor of the same class who commenced his action subsequent to such decree. The learned registrar suggests, no doubt on the authority of the language employed by Sir Robert Phillimore in The Markland (ubi sup.), that all that this means is that a plaintiff who is guilty of laches loses his right of equality. I am not sure, however, that this sufficiently explains the case in question or the practice formerly recognised. But what I think is to be observed in all these cases is, that the decree was apparently an unconditional decree. I have looked at the original decree pronounced in the case of The Saracen, on 6th May 1845, in favour of the claimants then before the court, and find it was an unconditional decree. The decree of 2nd Feb. 1860, in The William F. Safford, was also unconditional. At the present time the decree in this court in an action for necessaries is either conditional in any case, or certainly if there is any reason to suppose there may be other claims of equal rank; and even if the decree were in any instance made in unconditional terms I am inclined to think that, so long as the funds remained in the hands of the court, it could and should be modified so as to let in other persons who, without laches, put forward claims of a like character. In this instance the judgment given on the 30th Oct. in this court, following the usual form, was expressly "without prejudice to other claims against the said vessel, and reserving all questions of priority of such claims;" and, no doubt, by reason of such judgments being usually, if not always, in similar terms, there exists, as there did not at the date of The Saracen, a practice of proportionate division. As far, therefore, as the High Court is concerned, this question of priority of judgments has ceased to be a practical one. There may, however, remain a question whether, when, as in the present case, a judgment has been obtained in a County Court, and the action is subsequently transferred to this court, such a judgment gives any priority. It is not now necessary to adjudicate upon that question, but should it arise for decision it would be worth while to consider whether the plaintiff in the County Court action could be admitted to share in the proceeds in the High Court except on terms of equality with the suitors in that court. The report of the registrar will therefore be confirmed.

Solicitors: for the plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche, for Vaughan and Hornby, Cardiff; for the master and crew of the Africano and others, Bateson, Warr, and Bateson; for other necessary men, Downing, Holman, and Co.; Pritchard and Sons; Mandes and Tunnicliffe; for the defendants, owners of the Africano, Sampson, Williamson, and Inglis.

Tuesday, Feb. 6, 1894.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE PRIMULA. (a)

Charter-party—Clause as to advance of freight—Construction of—Liability of shipowner.

Where a clause in a charter-party provides for "cash for steamer's ordinary disbursements at port or ports of loading . . . to be advanced . . . on account of freight (captain's receipts to be conclusive evidence of the amount of such advances, and of their having been properly made), and balance of freight on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash"; the fair meaning is, that the shipowners are to be in a position to ask through their master for sufficient to pay the disbursements if they require it, but not otherwise.

MOTION for judgment.

This was an action to recover the sum of 48*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.*, balance of freight for the conveyance of the defendants' goods in the plaintiffs' steamship Primula. The plaintiffs were Messrs. John Blumer and Co., and the defendants were Messrs. J. A. Finzi and Co.

The Primula was on two occasions chartered for a voyage from certain ports between Tarragona and Gibraltar to Liverpool. These charters provided (inter alia) for the payment of certain lump sum freights for the chartered voyages, and the clause numbered 6 in each of the charters provided as follows:

> Cash for steamer's ordinary disbursements at port or ports of loading, not exceeding 150*l.* in all, to be advanced at exchange of 50*d.* to the dollar on account of freight, subject to 3 per cent. to cover cost of insurance, &c. (captain's receipts to be conclusive evidence of the amount of such advances, and of their having been properly made), and the balance of freight on right and true delivery of cargo in cash.

On the first voyage the captain of the steamer, having part of his outward freight in hand, expended it in partly disbursing his vessel, and the defendants advanced cash for the balance, amounting, at the stipulated rate of exchange, to 90*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*, and this sum was indorsed on the bills of lading. The defendants charged the stipulated 3 per cent. on the amount—viz., 2*l.* 14*s.* 5*d.* The defendants deducted these two sums from the balance of freight due to the plaintiffs on the delivery of the cargo on the voyage, and also the sum of 14*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.*, which last-named sum represents the profit which the defendants would have made by the difference of exchange on 59*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.*, the sum required to make up the advance of 150*l.*

On the second voyage the captain of the steamer had a sufficient balance of his outward freight to fully disburse the vessel at her loading ports, and therefore did not ask for or obtain any advance of freight under the chartered clause above set out.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants deducted from the plaintiffs' freight on the delivery of the cargo the sum of 34*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, being the profit which they would have made by the difference in exchange on the sum of 150*l.* if they had advanced that sum on account of freight at the loading ports.

Neither the plaintiffs nor the master of the Primula obtained any loan or advance from any persons other than the defendants on account of the ship's disbursements upon either of the voyages in question. The defendants were ready and willing to have advanced the full sum of 150*l.* on each of the voyages if the master had requested them to do so, and the ship's ordinary disbursements on each voyage actually exceeded such amount.

It was agreed that, if the defendants were entitled under the circumstances above stated to the said deductions, then judgment should be entered for the defendants without the necessity for their formally pleading a set-off or counter-claim. If they were not so entitled, then judgment should be for the plaintiffs for 48*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.*

J. Strachan, for the plaintiffs, referred to

Dahl v. Nelson, 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 381; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 6 App. Cas. 38;

Cross v. Pagliano, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 420; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 492; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 9.

Boyd, for the defendants, referred to

De Silvale v. Kendall, 4 M. & S. 37;

Smith v. Pyman, 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 436; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 7; (1891) 1 Q.B. 742.

The arguments of counsel fully appear in the judgment.

BARNES, J.—In this case the parties have agreed upon the facts. The claim is for the sum of 48*l* 18*s.* 5*d.*, balance of freight for the conveyance of the defendants' goods in the steamship Primula. There is no question as to the plaintiffs' right to recover this small balance of freight if there were not an answer to it suggested on the part of the defendants, which has been argued before me as being a right on the part of the defendants to rely on a counter-claim against the plaintiffs for damages sustained by the defendants, amounting to the same sum as is claimed by the plaintiffs. [The learned Judge then dealt with the facts, and continued:] The question, as argued before me, has really been whether or not the defendants are entitled to recover the amount, and therefore, by agreement between the parties, to deduct it from the freight. That depends upon the meaning of this clause. On the plaintiffs' side it is contended that that clause is introduced for the benefit of the shipowner, in order to provide his master with the means of liquidating the disbursements at ports of loading up to the limit of 150*l.*; that the master is at liberty to use that credit, if I may term it so; and that, if he uses it, the moneys advanced under it are to be treated as part of the freight, and if he does not choose to use it, and does not require to use it because he has money in hand, he is not obliged to use it. On the other hand, the defendants say that the clause makes it obligatory on the master, after he has paid the various disbursements of the ship at the port or ports of loading which are necessary for her voyage, to come to the charterers and ask for the amount, and that if he fails to do so the shipowner is liable for the breach of contract, and for the damages which flow from that breach, and for the loss of profit which the charterers could make if they had made the advance. So the question really comes to this, whether the master is obliged to put the clause in force and ask for the money, or whether he is only to use it if he finds it necessary to do so. It is said by Mr. Boyd for the defendants that the charterers would be liable for the amount of disbursements in this sense, that, if the disbursements are made, the master would have to come and ask for them, and they would then be bound to advance them under the clause, and they would then have an insurable interest in the amount they had advanced; and even if he had failed to do so, still they would be liable to make the advance, and have the advance at risk. I cannot, I confess, follow that argument, because it seems to me that, until the master states what the amount of the disbursement is, and asks the charterers to make the advance, they would not be under the obligation to pay him the amount of the disbursements and advance it to him, and that their liability to make the advance would only arise when he states show much he wants.

But I do not think that quite disposes of the arguments for the defendants. Even if that were so, and the freight were not at their risk till they had advanced it, or were liable to advance it, still they may, from the defendants' view of the clause, be entitled to say, "You are bound to come and ask for an advance, and therefore we have lost the profit we should have made if you had done so." That drives one to consider really what was the object of the introduction of this clause, and what is a reasonable meaning to give to it as a matter of business between these parties. Now, I have no doubt whatever that the object of this clause was to enable the shipowner to send his ship to the port or ports of loading with a provision that when she got there the charterers should be bound to pay the master if he wanted it, as part of the freight, sufficient money to disburse the ship so as to enable her to perform her voyage—that is to say, to anticipate part payment of the freight, the shipowner being desirous of having the credit, so to speak, at the loading port which his master could use if he wanted to. Looking to that as the object of the clause, it is fairly clear that one must read various words into it in order to give it clear expression. It is clear that what it means is, that the charterers have to make the advance to the captain. Then the question is, whether the captain is bound to use the clause, and bound to ask for the money from the defendants; and the conclusion to which I have come, as a matter of the fair meaning of the clause, especially having regard to its origin, is that the captain is at liberty to take advantage of the clause or not, as he in fact finds it necessary. If, therefore, he has money provided for him by the owners with which to pay the disbursements of the ship, it is unnecessary for him to go to the charterers and ask for any money as an advance, and I cannot think it was ever intended that the owners of a ship should be responsible in damages if their master was put in a position by themselves to advance the money for disbursements, or chose to advance it out of his own money, and that they should be held liable for a breach of contract for not going to the charterers, through their master, and asking for an amount for paying bills in port. It involves, possibly, the introduction of some words to make that plain, though I am not quite clear that it really does so, because it has been urged that the ordinary disbursements referred to mean the ordinary disbursements which the master finds it necessary to make, and for which he has to get credit or funds. However that may be, I think the fair meaning of the clause is, that the shipowners are to be in a position to ask through their master for sufficient to pay the disbursements at the port if they require it, but not otherwise, and that being so, the amount which the plaintiffs seek to recover is due for freight, and the defendants are not entitled to make a cross-claim for the amount, and are not entitled to deduct it from the freight. Judgment must therefore be for the plaintiffs for 48*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.*, which is the agreed amount, with costs.

Solicitors: for the plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche; for the defendants, Lowless and Co.

April 3 and 4, 1894.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE HUNTSMAN. (a)

Principal and agent—Managing owner—Authority to order repairs—Liability of co-owners.

Where the co-owners of a vessel depute the managing owner or ship's husband to employ the vessel for their benefit he has authority to give orders for the necessary repair, fitting and outfit of the vessel, and the fact that the vessel is insured does not limit such authority.

Semble, those who execute the repairs to the vessel do not discharge any claim they may have against the co-owners by reason of the fact that, they being unable to get cash, have taken and renewed bills on account in their dealings with the managing owner in respect of such repairs.

ACTION to recover the balance of an account for repairs.

The plaintiffs were the Smith's Dock Company Limited, and they made a claim against Messrs. J. H. W. Culliford, J. L. Clark, and T. E. Jobling, part owners of the steamship Huntsman for repairs executed in the early part of 1892.

In January 1892 the vessel got on the south pier of the Tyne, and the plaintiffs undertook salvage operations for an agreed amount of 2000*l.*, with an extra 200*l.* for despatch on the principle of "no cure no pay."

They got her off on the 30th Jan., and brought her into their own dry dock, and they were duly paid the agreed sum.

The vessel had sustained injuries to her bottom, engine-room, and elsewhere, and on the 9th Feb. W. J. Jobling, the managing owner, gave the plaintiffs instructions for the necessary repairs to put the vessel in a seaworthy condition. She was taken out of dock on the 9th March, and the repairs were completed outside by the 20th March.

On the 14th April the plaintiffs delivered a detailed bill to W. J. Jobling, amounting to 4516*l.* 6*s.* 11*d.* The plaintiffs took on account from W. J. Jobling four bills for 1000*l.*, dated the 20th July 1892, at three, four, six, and six months respectively, and later on a bill for 185*l.* at three months, which made up the balance of the account, which had been somewhat reduced.

It appeared that the first bill was borrowed, the second partially paid and partially renewed, the third and fourth renewed, and the 185*l.* dishonoured. There was a further renewal of the balance of the second renewed bill, which was dishonoured, as also were the renewals of the third and fourth. In the result the amounts paid on the bills, together with the allowances, reduced the plaintiffs' account to 2534*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.*, which was the amount now claimed.

On the 15th March 1893 W. J. Jobling became insolvent, and consequently failed to meet the renewed bills, the last of which fell due on the 28th May 1893.

The plaintiffs therefore issued their writ on the 14th June against the three owners above mentioned, who together owned three sixty-fourths of the vessel.

Moulton, Q.C. and Boyd, for the plaintiffs, referred to

Davidson v. Donaldson, 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 564; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 601; 9 Q. B. Div. 623;
Robinson v. Read, 9 B. & C. 449;
Bottomley v. Nuttall, 28 L. J. 110, C. P.;
Whittwell v. Perrin, 4 C. B. N. S. 412.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Laing, for the defendants, referred to Mitcheson v. Oliver, 5 E. & B. 419; 25 L. J. 39, Q. B.;

Brodie v. Howard, 17 C. B. O. S. 109;
Chappell v. Bray, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 278; 30 L. J. 24, Ex.;
Frazer v. Cuthbertson, 6 Q. B. Div. 93; 50 L. J. 277 Q. B.;
Steele v. Dickson, Scotch Sess. Cas. 4th series, vol. 3, p. 1003.

BARNES, J., having dealt with the facts as above set out, continued:—The points taken on behalf of the defendants are these: The first is, that although Mr. W. J. Jobling was the managing owner, or in other words the ship's husband, of the Huntsman, he had no authority to order these repairs upon the credit of the co-owners. When Sir Walter Phillimore argued this point it was put, not on any cases which have really decided it at all in his favour, but principally in this way, that a managing owner or ship's husband has no authority to order repairs for a ship, although they are absolutely necessary for her proper employment as a seaworthy ship, if that ship is insured, and if in the ordinary course the managing owner would be able to collect from the underwriters enough to pay the amount of the repairs ordered, and by those monies so received discharge the bills. Dealing first with the suggestion as to the authority, it seems to me that, so far as they have been referred to before me, the authorities and the language of the text writers are entirely in favour of the proposition maintained by the plaintiff's counsel, that the managing owner has authority to give orders for the necessary repairing of the vessel. It seems to me that Mr. Moulton's contention on this point is correct if it is looked at by the light of the manner in which the question arises. The managing owner is deputed by the co-owners to employ the vessel for their benefit, and that can only be done by employing her in the ordinary course of trade suitable for such a vessel. It must follow as a necessary consequence that he has authority to conduct and manage on shore whatever concerns the employment of the ship, and for that purpose has authority to give orders for the necessary repair, fitting, and outfit of the vessel, in addition to seeing that she is properly manned, properly sent to sea, and properly chartered for a voyage. Without that power he would be unable to send the ship to sea, even if there were trifling repairs rendered necessary for that purpose, without again obtaining a fresh mandate from the various co-owners, and I cannot see that there is any authority for the proposition that the managing owner's authority is limited in cases where the ship is insured. No case or even dictum has been cited to that effect, and the true relationship seems to me to be that the co-owners, in deputing to the managing owner the power to manage the vessel on their behalf, depute to him power to do what is necessary to repair her for the proper purpose of performing her engagements in the ordinary course of her employ. Of course, if the vessel is insured, they will afterwards get the benefit of any money paid by the underwriters, collected by the managing owner, and applied by him, if so applied, to discharge the accounts for repairs. But then it is said that the plaintiffs looked to Mr. W. J. Jobling in this case as the channel through whom the money would come from the underwriters; in other words, I take it that means that they acted in this case only on the credit of Mr. W. J. Jobling. I see no ground for that contention. On the contrary, I think that the plaintiffs acted in the ordinary way by treating Mr. Jobling as managing owner, acting on behalf of the various co-owners. The plaintiffs' representative, Mr. Eustace Smith, said, "I believed he was solvent, and I knew we were safe in any case, because we had the co-owners; Culliford and Clark we knew were good enough." They sent in their bill to the managing owner and owners of the steamship Huntsman in the ordinary course.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

But then comes the point that has been very fully argued before me, that the plaintiffs so dealt with Mr. W. J. Jobling by taking and renewing the bills as to discharge any claim they may have had on the co-owners. If it could be shown that the plaintiffs could have had cash from Mr. Jobling, and, instead of taking it, elected to take bills from him, they would then be in a position of practically having had, so far as the other owners are concerned, not what is really payment, but what is tantamount to it. But where they have not had the power to get cash, but have tried to get it and failed, and have merely taken bills on account, it seems to me there is no election whatever on their part to renounce any right they had which would in any way discharge the claim made upon the present defendants. I think that is in accordance with the views expressed in the cases of Robinson v. Reed (ubi sup.) and Davison v. Donaldson (ubi sup.) which have been cited to me. The further point which was taken by the defendants was that the plaintiffs have so acted as to mislead the co-owners and raise an equity against themselves. I understand that to be based upon this contention, that as the vessel was supposed by the plaintiffs to be insured, and as they might suppose that the money from the underwriters was paid to Mr. Jobling, if they renewed the bills, or allowed the time to go by for payment, without finding out why he did not pay them, and if he had got the money, then they cannot look to the defendants for payment. I understand that is the way it is put on behalf of the defendants. But the answer again seems to be, that the plaintiffs did what they could to get the cash, and were told, as I have already said, by Mr. Jobling that he had not got it, and that he had not received the money from the underwriters. I cannot see any ground on which it can be said that the plaintiffs have so acted as to mislead the defendants, and thereby prejudice them, as is suggested on the part of the defendants. If one turns to the form of pleading in this case, which raises that, and probably also the point which I mentioned before it, it will be seen, I think, that the allegations contained in the defence on these points are not established. For those reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to make their present claim against the defendants, to be assessed by the registrar and merchants.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, King, Wigg, and Co., for Clayton and Gibson, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Solicitors for the defendants, Botterell and Roche.

April 9 and 10, 1894.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir Francis Jeune.)

THE PRINCESS. (a)

Charter-party—Construction—Captain's signature to bills of lading—Penalty.

A charter-party entered into between plaintiffs and defendants contained a clause in the following terms: "Captain to sign bills of lading (at plaintiffs' office) without responsibility as to weight, and as presented to him, without prejudice to the tenor of this charter-party, within twenty-four hours after the cargo is on board, or pay 4d. per register ton per day (the first day's payment being due on the expiration of the said twenty-four hours) for each day's delay."

The captain refused to sign for seventeen days, but the owners offered to sign on his behalf within twenty-four hours.

In an action by the charterers against the owners:

Held, that the signature of the owners was not sufficient to satisfy the provision in the charter-party.

Also (following Jones v. Hough, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 248; 5 Ex. Div. 115), that the clause was one for a penalty, and not for liquidated damages.

ACTION to recover damages for alleged breach of a charter-party.

The plaintiffs in this case were Messrs. Bryant and Co., of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and the defendants were Messrs. Taylor and Sanderson, of Sunderland.

The plaintiffs alleged that they had suffered damage by breach of a charter-party, dated the 25th Jan. 1893, between the plaintiffs and defendants, whereby it was agreed that the defendants' steamer Princess should load a full and complete cargo of coals and coke in the South Dock, Sunderland, and therewith proceed to Barcelona and deliver the same at the freights therein mentioned, and that the captain of the said vessel should sign bills of lading at the plaintiffs' office without responsibility as to the weight and as presented to him without prejudice to the tenor of the said charter-party within twenty-four hours after the cargo was on board, or pay 4*d.* per ton per day (the first day's payment being due on the expiration of the twenty-four hours) for each day's delay. The captain refused to sign the bills of lading for seventeen days after the cargo was on board.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The registered tonnage of the Princess being 1370 tons, the plaintiffs claimed 22*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* per day for the seventeen days, making a total of 388*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* with interest.

The defendants alleged that the clause in the charter-party referring to the captain signing bills of lading is a printed form, which, by the well-known custom of merchants and shipowners, was only to become operative if and when the charterers used the vessel as a general ship. They maintained that the vessel was not so used, but if the clause did become operative, then the plaintiffs waived a compliance therewith by tendering what purported to be bills of lading at a place other than their office, and waived any right to insist upon the captain attending at their office; and the plaintiffs agreed with the defendants on the 28th Jan. 1893 that the captain need not attend at their office to sign any bills of lading, but should sail with all despatch as soon as the loading of the cargo had been completed, and they thereby relieved the captain of that duty.

On the 27th Jan., prior to the agreement, and before the vessel had finished loading, the plaintiffs, it was alleged, presented inaccurate bills of lading for the captain's signature, and he therefore refused to sign them. The defendants then offered to hold the captain's signed bills of lading in blank until the amount of cargo could be ascertained and inserted, and then hand them to the plaintiffs, but this was refused.

On the 28th Jan. the plaintiffs agreed that the captain need not attend at their office but should sail with all despatch, and also agreed that they would accept bills of lading prepared by them and signed by the defendants' authorised agents and to be exchanged on the 30th Jan. for duplicates signed by the captain, but the plaintiffs without notice to the defendants left their office and prevented the defendants' agents from signing the bills of lading or obtaining the captain's signature to duplicates, and did not present such bills of lading or duplicates for signature, and the captain sailed on the 28th Jan. in accordance with the plaintiffs' request.

On the 30th Jan. the defendants' agents offered to sign bills of lading as agents for the captain and (or) owners, but the plaintiffs refused. The managing owner of the vesssel, a member of the defendants' firm, thereupon prepared and signed a set of bills of lading which were tendered to the plaintiffs but were refused.

The defendants denied that the captain did not sign bills of lading in accordance with the charter-party, or that, save as aforesaid, he refused to sign the same for the seventeen days after the cargo was on board. They paid 5*l.* into court.

By way of counter-claim they alleged, that by the above charter-party it was agreed, that the plaintiffs were empowered to draw on the captain on demand for their commission and certain charges and deduct from freight at port of discharge. On the arrival of the steamer at port of discharge the amount due to the plaintiffs in this respect was 37*l.* 3*s.*, but the plaintiffs drew on the captain for 39*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* and the amount was deducted from the freight, whereby the plaintiffs had 2*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* to the use of the defendants which they had not paid. They therefore counter-claimed for the latter sum.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Hollams for the plaintiffs.

Aspinall, Q.C. and J. Strachan for the defendants.—We have complied with the terms of the charter-party within its meaning as a mercantile document. The words "captain to sign bills of lading" mean that he is to sign as owners' agent. He must sign or pay unless he is acting as agent. In Jones v. Hough (ubi sup.) it was the same kind of charter-party and in the same terms. This is a penalty and not liquidated damages. In Jones v. Hough, where the bill of lading was not signed at all, it was held that, whereas there was a technical breach of the charter-party and the plaintiffs were entitled to nominal damages, it was not liquidated damages. There is a strong distinction to be drawn between signing after delay and not signing at all. The offer of the owners' signature was equivalent to an offer of the captain's signature within the charter-party, and such signature would make them liable for everything in the charter-party, the captain being only an agent:

Hermann v. Royal Exchange Company, 1 C. & E. 413.

Hollams in reply.—There was a clear contract for the captain's signature, and we are therefore entitled to have it. As to the question of penalty, there are some very strong cases where penal damages were held to be liquidated:

Sparrow v. Paris, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 799; 7 H. & N. 594.

I have some difficulty in following the decision in Jones v. Hough (ubi sup.). Bramwell, L.J. limits his judgment to the particular case before him in which there were no termini. In the present case he would have held that where bills of lading have been signed penalties would accrue. Delay would continue until the actual signature by the captain of the bills of lading, or the cargo delivered.

THE PRESIDENT.—The first point raised is as to the construction of the contract. It is said that the provision that the captain is to sign the bills of lading is satisfied by the owners being willing to do so. There is no doubt that the owners were willing, but I confess I cannot bring myself to think that the contract would be satisfied by the owners signing, or being willing to sign, the bills of lading. It is impossible, it seems to me, to maintain as a broad proposition that when a person stipulates that a named agent of his is to do a particular thing, that is satisfied by his doing it himself; and, although I quite agree that it is difficult in most cases to see why the signature of the owner will not do as well as that of the captain, I do not think that exhausts the matter, because there may be cases, and I am inclined to think this is one, where the signature of the captain was more convenient in the course of business than the signature of the owner would be if there was a provision in the charter-party that the captain should sign. In this particular case it seems clear that, after this charter-party had been entered into, the bankers in London, acting no doubt according to the wishes of their correspondent in Spain, refused to allow the signature of the owners to be taken as the signature of the captain. I dare say it may be that in some branches of business it would not matter, but in the Spanish trade, it is suggested, there is a reason why the captain's name should be put in the bills of lading, and it seems to me if it is so put in, it is impossible to say that the provision is satisfied by the signature of the owners. The second question is one of fact, and that is whether there was a waiver. [The learned President, having dealt with the facts on this point, decided that there was no waiver, and continued:]

Then there comes the last point, as to whether this is a penalty or liquidated damages. That appears to me to be not a very easy question, but it is a very narrow question, as to which there is no clearer authority than the case of Jones v. Hough (ubi sup.). I think I am bound by that decision because I cannot see any real distinction between that case and the present. The terms of the charter-party are the same. The only suggestion that can be made is that there was a distinct refusal to give bills of lading, and the whole thing went off, and no bills of lading ever were given, because the captain refused to give them. But I cannot help thinking that that cannot be the ratio decidendi in that case, I think the judges who decided it must have looked at the matter according to what the true view of the contract was at the time it was made. What one has to consider is, whether the contract is one for liquidated damages or one for a penalty. I think that is the view of Bramwell, L.J., for he says: "One reason might be that the penalty clause does not apply. One reason might be that there is no basis on which the amount of the penalty might be measured." I think what that means is this, that when one looks at the nature of the transaction, and the nature of the contract, it is obvious that it is one in which, in many cases, it would be very difficult, perhaps impossible, to fix the time up to which the penalty should run, and also that it is a clause which might work very great hardship indeed if it was pushed to its extreme limits. In these circumstances I think that the view of the judges must have been that this was a penalty clause, because that must be understood to have been the intention of the parties. I therefore feel bound to hold that this is not a clause for liquidated damages, but is a clause for a penalty. If that is so the result follows easily enough. There have been no damages proved in the case, and that being so I shall follow the case of Jones v. Hough (ubi sup.), and say that 1*s.* nominal damages should be given.

Aspinall, Q.C. urged that, as the defendants had paid 5*l.* into court, and their counter-claim for 2*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* had been admitted, they were entitled to costs.

THE PRESIDENT.—I think one ought to look at this question of costs a little more broadly than by the light of the question of 5*l.* or 2*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* Substantially this question was fought on a good deal more than a mere point of law, and I think the observation in Jones v. Hough (ubi sup.), which governs the decision of the case, that there were faults on both sides, applies equally to this case. Therefore I shall make no order as to costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Hollams, Sons, Coward, and Hawksley.

Solicitors for the defendants, Botterell and Roche.

Monday, July 3, 1893.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir Francis Jeune.)

THE PETREL. (a)

Collision—Common employment—Limitation of liability—Gross tonnage—Crew space—Merchant Shipping Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124), s. 9—Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 43), s. 1.

Where a collision occurred in Sea Reach of the river Thames between two steamers owned by the same owners, it was held that the masters and crews of such steamers were not in common employment, and hence the master and crew of one ship were allowed to prove for their lost effects against the fund which represented the limit of liability of the owners for the negligence of the other ship.

If the requirements of sect. 9 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867 are complied with, shipowners in limiting their liability are entitled to deduct crew space from the gross tonnage, notwithstanding the repeal of sect. 21, sub-sect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, by sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889.

THIS was an action by the General Steam Navigation Company, the owners of the s.s. Petrel, to limit their liability in respect of a collision between her and the s.s. Cormorant.

The collision occurred in Sea Reach of the river Thames on the 5th Jan. 1893. The Cormorant, which was sunk, was also owned by the General Steam Navigation Company.

Owners of cargo laden on the Cormorant sued the owners of the Petrel, and the Admiralty Court gave judgment on behalf of the plaintiffs therein, and found the Petrel alone to blame for the collision. Other claims having been made against the General Steam Navigation Company in respect of the collision, they instituted the present action to limit their liability.

The plaintiffs herein instituted their action against themselves as owners of the Cormorant, and against the owners of her cargo and freight, and her master, officers, and crew. The defendants, the owners of cargo, by their defence alleged:

2. The plaintiffs described in the writ and statement of claim as the owners of the steamship Petrel are the General Steam Navigation Company, being the same company as are made defendants to the said writ and statement of claim. The plaintiffs were at the time of the said collision the owners of the steamship Cormorant, and her freight, and the master, officers, and crew of the steamship Cormorant were at the said time the servants of the plaintiffs, and in the same employment as the master and crew of the steamship Petrel, by whose negligence the said collision was caused.

3. These defendants will contend that neither the General Steam Navigation Company, as owners of the Cormorant and her freight, nor the master, or officers, and crew of the Cormorant, have any claim against the fund proposed to be paid into court by the plaintiffs.

4. The gross tonnage of the steamship Petrel is 739·08 tons, and the amount which the plaintiffs offer to pay into court is not sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' liability.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs offered to pay into court 8*l.* per ton upon the gross tonnage of the Petrel less the space reserved for the berthing of the crew, and upon this basis calculated their liability upon 707·28 tons. The defendants disputed their right to deduct crew space.

The following Acts of Parliament are material to the decision:—

The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54:

The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say, (4) where any loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat, be answerable in damages . . . in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury or not, to an aggregate amount exceeding eight pounds for each ton of the ship's tonnage; such tonnage to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships the gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine-room.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 21:

The tonnage of every ship to be registered, with the exceptions mentioned in the next section, shall, previously to her being registered, be ascertained by the following rule . . . (4) If there be a break, a poop, or any other permanent closed-in space on the upper deck available for cargo or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew, the tonnage of such space shall be ascertained as follows . . . subject to the following provisoes: first, that nothing shall be added for a closed-in space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew unless such space exceeds one-twentieth of the remaining tonnage of the ship; and in case of such excess, the excess only shall be added.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124), s. 9:

The following rules shall be observed with respect to accommodation on board British ships; that is to say, every place in any ship occupied by seamen or apprentices, and appropriated to their use, shall have for every such seaman or apprentice a space of not less than seventy-two cubic feet and of not less than twelve superficial feet measured on the deck or floor of such place. (3.) No such place as aforesaid shall be deemed to be such as to authorise a deduction from registered tonnage under the provisions hereinafter contained, unless there is in use in the ship one or more properly-constructed privy or privies for the use of the crew.

The Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 43):

1. (1.) In the measurement of a ship for the purpose of ascertaining her register tonnage, no deduction shall be allowed in respect of any space which has not been first included in the measurement of her tonnage. (2.) In sect. 21, par. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 the words "First, that nothing shall be added for a closed-in space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew unless such space exceeds one-twentieth of the remaining tonnage of the ship, and in case of such excess, the excess only shall be added" . . . shall be repealed.

Butler Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—We abandon the contention raised in the pleadings that as owners of the Cormorant we are entitled to claim against the fund in court. The crew of the Cormorant are entitled to claim against the fund in court. The doctrine of common employment does not apply to them. The mere fact that they were employed by the same owners as the officers and crew of the negligent ship is not sufficient. They must have been engaged in a common employment. When they contracted to serve on board the Cormorant they never contracted to take the risk of the negligence of persons serving on board another ship owned by the same owners:

Hutchinson v. The York, Newcastle, and Berwick Railway Company, 5 Ex. 343;
Charles v. Taylor, 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 773; 3 C. P. Div. 492.

The plaintiffs are entitled to deduct crew space. It has been the continuous practice to do so since 1867. The cases of The Franconia (39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 57; 3 P. Div. 164; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1), and The Umbilo (64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 328; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 26; (1891) P. 118) have recognised the propriety of so doing. The gross tonnage upon which liability is to be calculated means register tonnage plus engine-room space. In order to arrive at register tonnage crew space must be deducted. If so, a shipowner, in calculating his liability on gross tonnage, is entitled to deduct crew space:

Burrell v. Simpson, 4 Ct. Sess. Cas. (4th series) 177.

T. E. Scrutton for defendants, owners of cargo.—The two crews of those two vessels were in common employment. It is a question of fact. These ships travel certain well-recognised tracks up and down the Thames. The case is analogous to that of servants of tramways owned by the same company which travel on parallel and opposite lines:

Charles v. Taylor (ubi sup.).

The plaintiffs cannot deduct crew space. The provision in sect. 21, sub-sect. 4 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which exempted crew space from being included in gross tonnage, has been repealed by sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889:

The Franconia (ubi sup.);
The Umbilo (ubi sup.);
The Palermo (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 390; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 369; 10 P. Div. 21.

H. Stokes for other owners of cargo.—Although it has been the practice to allow crew space to be deducted from gross tonnage, the point has never yet been decided. Sect. 9 of the Act of 1867, on which the plaintiffs rely, is confined to register tonnage, whereas their liability is to be calculated on gross tonnage.

Butler Aspinall in reply.—If the defendants' contention is to prevail, crew space would be deducted in the case of sailing ships and not in the case of steamers.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 3.—THE PRESIDENT.—In this case two questions of a wholly different nature arise. On the 5th Jan. 1893 the Petrel came into collision with the Cormorant, and the Cormorant was sunk. The owners of both vessels are the General Steam Navigation Company. It is admitted that the collision was caused by the negligence of those navigating the Petrel, and it is proposed to pay into court the sum for which the owners of the Petrel are liable. The first question is, whether the master, officers, and crew of the Cormorant can claim against this fund in respect of their effects lost in that vessel. It is said that they cannot by reason of their common employment with the master, officers, and crew of the Petrel. No doubt the captain and crew of the Cormorant had a common master with the captain and crew of the Petrel; but were they in common employment with each other? It is remarkable that, although propositions of law defining common employment and recognising its limitations have more than once been laid down, and have been illustrated by instances in which common employment has been held to exist, there appears to be no decided case in the English courts (there are several in the Scotch courts) in which, upon consideration of the tests of it, common employment has been negatived. The general principles of the law of common employment were fully laid down in the first case on the subject, viz., Priestley v. Fowler (3 M. & W. 1) in 1837. But I think that the most complete exposition of what constitutes common employment is to be found in the great judgment of Shaw, C.J., of Massachusetts, in Farwell v. Boston Railroad Corporation (4 Metcalf, 49), which no doubt materially influenced the House of Lords in the case of Bartonshill Coal Company v. Reid (3 Mac. H. L. C. 266), in which, reversing the decision of the Court of Session, their Lordships held that a miner labouring in a mine was in common employment with the engine driver by whom the cage was worked. Two phrases of Shaw, C.J. indicate his view of the test of common employment. One lays down that he who engages in the employment of another for the performance of specified services "takes upon himself the natural risks and perils incident to the performance of such services;" and the other refers to the condition of the safety of each servant depending much on the care and skill with which each other shall perform his appropriate duty. This view was adopted by Blackburn, J. in a judgment affirmed by the Exchequer Chamber in the case of Morgan v. Vale of Heath Railway Company (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 564; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 149). He says: "I quite agree that it is necessary that the employment must be common in this sense, that the safety of the one servant must in the ordinary and natural course of things depend on the care and skill of the others. This includes almost, if not every, case in which the servants are employed to do joint work, but I do not think it is limited to such cases. There are many cases where the immediate object on which the one servant is employed is very dissimilar from that on which the other is employed, and yet the risk of injury from the negligence of the one is so much a natural and necessary consequence of the employment which the other accepts, that it must be included in the risks which are to be considered in his wages." On this principle, it having been previously decided in Hutchinson v. York and Newcastle Railway Company (5 Ex. 343) that the engine driver of a train and a servant of the company carried in the train were in common employment, it was held that a carpenter repairing a turn-table was in common employment with shunters working traffic in connection with it. The view of Shaw, C.J. appears to have been followed in Lovell v. Howell (1 C. P. Div. 161), in which the principle approved was that the servant accepts the ordinary risks incident to his service. The principle of safety being dependent "in the ordinary and natural course of things" on the skill and care of the fellow-servant and "of risk of injury being a natural and necessary consequence" of his want of skill and care is consistent with, though perhaps more exact than, the test suggested by Lord Chelmsford in the case of Bartonshill Coal Company v. McGuire (3 Mac. H. L. C. 300) from the negative point of view that common employment does not exist when injury happens to the servant "on occasions foreign to his employment" or to servants engaged in "different departments of duty." It was suggested in argument before me, with reference to the case of Charles v. Taylor (38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 773; 3 C. P. Div. 492), that the physical contiguity of the employment constitutes a test. But, as Shaw, C.J. points out, this does not afford a distinction on which a practical rule can be established. In all cases the immediate instrument of physical injury must be contiguous to the person injured, and in most cases the person who causes physical injury is not far from the person to whom it results. But I suppose that the signalman at one end of a rifle range is clearly in common employment with the marker at the other when the two have a common master; and, to give a stronger instance, a servant who unskilfully packs dynamite in a factory and another who in unpacking it at a distant warehouse is injured by its explosion are clearly in common employment. On the other hand, mere contiguity, if unusual or accidental, would not be consistent with the common employment. I doubt also if "one common object"—the phrase emphasised by Bramwell, B. in Waller v. South-Eastern Railway Company (2 H. & C. 102)—supplies an exact criterion. As Blackburn, J. points out, there may be common employment though the immediate object of the labour of the two servants be very different, and if the common object be remote, such as that of making money for the employer (the sole nexus of employment suggested as existing between the two captains in this case), there may be no common employment. If a person carried on the occupation of a banker and brewer in different localities, and his bill clerk was run over by his drayman, it would be strange to say that the two were servants in common employment. I think, therefore, that probably no more complete definition can be formulated than is afforded by the language of Blackburn, J. The consideration that the risk of injury to the one servant is the natural and necessary consequence of misconduct in the other implies that the skill and care of the one is of special importance to the other by reason of the relations between their services. Tried by this principle, can it be said that the safety of the captain of one ship of a company is in the ordinary and natural course of things dependent on the skill and care of the captain of another ship of the same company, or that injury by the negligence of one is an ordinary risk of the service of the other? In some cases it might perhaps; for example, it might if all the ships of the company were in the habit of meeting in the same dock, and the safety of each thus became in the ordinary course of things dependent on the skill with which the other was navigated. But, in regard to navigation on the high seas, or in the estuary of the Thames, would a captain of one ship of the General Steam Navigation Company have more reason to be interested in the skill of a captain of another ship of the company than in that of the captains of the myriad other craft in whose vicinity he might happen to navigate? By no reasonable supposition can it be imagined that he would. I think therefore that these two captains were not in common employment.

The second question relates to the amount of the tonnage by reference to which the measure of liability of the Petrel is to be fixed, and to the right to deduct from the gross tonnage for this purpose 31·80 tons representing the berthing accommodation of the crew. This question turns on the effect to be given to the 9th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867. It is clear that the measure of liability is, under sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, fixed as regards steamers by reference to the gross tonnage as determined by the 20th, 21st, and 22nd sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854; that, by virtue of sect. 21, sub-sect. 4, of that Act, in calculating gross tonnage no account subject to a condition mentioned is to be taken of closed-in space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew on the upper deck; and that the words embodying this last provision are repealed by sect. 1, sub-sect. 2, of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889, subject to the provisoes in that section contained. It is therefore argued that, as the provision by which berthing space on the upper deck was excluded from the sum of gross tonnage is repealed, such berthing space is to be included in the gross tonnage; but the reply is, that the 9th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867 gives the right to deduct from the register tonnage places appropriated for seamen, if certain conditions are complied with, which I understand to have been complied with in this case. The only difficulty in the way of this reply is that the section speaks of register tonnage and not of gross tonnage. But I do not think that this difficulty is insuperable. "Register tonnage," in sub-sect. 4 of sect. 9 of the Act of 1867 is clearly the same thing as "registered tonnage" in sub-sect. 3, and I think that those words refer to the total gross tonnage as registered, and not to the register tonnage as mentioned in sect. 23 of the Act of 1854, as distinguished from the gross tonnage calculated under sect. 22 of that Act. If this be not the effect of sect. 9, the result would be, that it would apply to sailing vessels but not to steamers, with the consequence that sailing vessels and steamers, which, as regards the inclusion of berthing accommodation in their tonnage for the purpose of limiting liability, stood on the same footing under the Act of 1854, would be placed in a different position. There is no apparent reason for this, and it cannot be supposed to have been intended. The intention of the Acts of 1867 and 1889 in this respect seems to be clear. By the Act of 1854 berthing space below the upper deck was not exempted; berthing space above the upper deck, subject to a condition, was exempted. The Act of 1867 gave an exemption to all berthing space if certain sanitary conditions were complied with. As became clear from the case of The Palermo (ubi sup.) berthing space above the upper deck retained its exemption under the Act of 1854, though the sanitary conditions of the Act of 1867 were disregarded. By repealing the favour shown to berth space above the upper deck by the Act of 1854, the Act of 1889 placed all berthing space in the same position if the requirements of the Act of 1867 were complied with. Except for such a reason it is difficult to see why the words in the Act of 1854 should have been repealed. There is no decision that the 9th section of the Act of 1867 has the effect which I have ascribed to it; but the uniform course of practice has certainly been in harmony with such a view, and there are two cases which appear to assume the correctness of such a construction. In The Franconia (ubi sup.), decided in 1878, it was discussed whether the berthing space below the upper deck in a foreign vessel could, for the purpose of limiting her liability, be excluded under sect. 9 of the Act of 1867. If the contention in the present case be sound, that question could not have arisen. But no such contention was then put forward, and the court decided that the foreign steamer could not claim the deduction, not because the Act of 1867 never gave it, but because it gave it only when its requirements were observed. Again, in the case of The Umbilo (ubi sup.), before Sir James Hannen in 1890, it was not disputed that the plaintiffs were entitled, in computing the gross tonnage of their vessel, to deduct the space solely appropriated for the berthing of the crew; in other words, it was admitted that the 9th section of the Act of 1867 had not the effect now sought to be given to it. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to deduct the 31·80 tons.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, William Batham.

Solicitors for the defendants, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Tuesday, July 25, 1893.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE ROUGEMONT. (a)

Collision—Actions in rem and in personam—Cross-cause—Bail—Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 10.

Where a collision action in personam and one in rem were consolidated and the conduct given to the plaintiff in the action in personam who had brought his action in personam because the other ship had been sunk, the Court held that it had no power under sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 to stay the defendant's proceedings until he had given security to answer the plaintiff's claim.

THIS was a summons adjourned into court by the plaintiffs in a collision action asking for an order staying the defendants continuing their counter-claim until they had given security to answer the plaintiffs' claim.

The collision occurred on the 10th June 1893 between the steamships John Readhead and the Rougemont, causing the Rougemont to sink.

The plaintiffs, who were the owners of the John Readhead, then issued a writ in personam in the Admiralty Division against Cory and Sons, the owners of the Rougemont, to recover the damage caused by the collision. The owners of the Rougemont subsequently issued a writ in rem in the same division against the John Readhead, and the defendants therein gave bail to the sum of 13,000*l.*

The owners of the John Readhead then asked the owners of the Rougemont to give bail to secure their claim. The owners of the Rougemont refused to do so.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The two actions were consolidated, and the owners of the John Readhead were given the conduct. In these circumstances they issued the present summons, which was dismissed by the registrar, and they now appealed to the judge.

The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 10), s. 34:

The High Court of Admiralty may, on the application of the defendant in any cause of damage and on his instituting a cross cause for the damage sustained by him in respect of the same collision, direct that the principal cause and the cross cause be heard at the same time and upon the same evidence; and, if in the principal cause the ship of the defendant has been arrested or security given by him to answer judgment, and in the cross cause the ship of the plaintiff cannot be arrested and security has not been given to answer judgment therein, the court may, if it think fit, suspend the proceedings in the principal cause until security has been given to answer judgment in the cross cause.

Arthur Pritchard, for the owners of the John Readhead, in support of the summons. — The defendants ought, in the circumstances of this case, to give security to answer the plaintiffs' claim. The case is well within the intention of the Legislature when it enacted sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. The object was to enable the court to see that both parties were properly secured in respect of their respective claims. The Admiralty Court acted on this principle prior to the Admiralty Court Act 1861:

The Seringapatam, 3 W. Rob. 41, n.;
The Johann Friederich, 1 W. Rob. 35;
The Heart of Oak, 29 L. J. 78, Ad.

The statute ought to be construed liberally:

The Newbattle, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 15; 10 P. Div. 33; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 356.

The defendants' action is in substance the principal cause.

Sir Walter Phillimore, for the defendants, contrà.—The Act of Parliament does not apply to the circumstances of this case, and hence the court has no jurisdiction to make the order. The plaintiffs can, if they like, abandon the conduct of the action and become defendants, when they would be entitled to ask the court to make my clients give security.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 25.—BARNES, J.—The cause of this application is, that Messrs. Cory and Sons, who are defendants sued in personam, have nothing which the plaintiffs can arrest, because their ship was lost; but the defendants, who are the counter-claimants, are able to arrest, and have arrested, or accepted bail for, the ship of the plaintiffs. The object of the application is to enable the plaintiffs to get security from the defendants for the plaintiffs' claim in the same way as the defendants have security by the arrest of the plaintiffs' ship for their counter-claim. The question whether this application can succeed depends simply upon the construction of sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. The case was extremely well argued by counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs, and a number of authorities were cited, but in the course of his argument he was compelled to admit that there was no case which really governed the present, or in fact directly touched upon it, although the Act has been in force for the last thirty-two years; and, so far as I have been informed by counsel, there is no case in which a similar application has been made during the whole of that period. The 34th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 is as follows: "The High Court of Admiralty may on the application of the defendant in any cause of damage, and on his instituting a cross-cause for the damage sustained by him in respect of the same collision, direct that the principal cause and the cross-cause be heard at the same time and upon the same evidence; and if in the principal cause the ship of the defendant has been arrested, or security given by him to answer judgment, and in the cross-cause the ship of the plaintiff cannot be arrested, and security has not been given to answer judgment therein, the court may, if it thinks fit, suspend the proceedings in the principal cause until security has been given to answer judgment in the cross-cause." If this case had been under the old practice before the Judicature Act, the plaintiffs' case of the John Readhead v. Cory and Sons, the defendants in personam, would undoubtedly be the principal cause, and the case instituted afterwards by the defendants against the plaintiffs would undoubtedly be the cross-cause, and I do not think that it would be possible to construe the Act of Parliament in favour of this application if the matter remained under the old practice. But it is contended that, in the present day, where the parties are in the position of claimant and counter-claimant in one action, the counter-claimant's counter-claim may be treated as the principal cause, and the plaintiff's as the cross-cause. It is difficult to see how it is possible to arrive at that result, at any rate in a case in which the plaintiffs commence their action in personam and afterwards are sued by arrest of their ship in rem, whatever might be the result if a different state of proceedings had taken place. In dealing with this case it will be seen that the words of the section are not applicable because they are, "If in the principal cause the ship of the defendant has been arrested." The principal cause here, I think, is the cause instituted by the plaintiffs in personam, in which of course the defendants' ship could not be arrested. The section then goes on, "and in the cross-cause the ship of the plaintiff cannot be arrested"—but in the cross-cause here the plaintiffs' ship is arrested or can be arrested—"the court may, if it think fit, suspend the proceedings in the principal cause until security has been given to answer judgment in the cross-cause." I think, therefore, although I regret it, that I must construe the Act so as to hold that it does not meet the present state of things. The object of the Act was to enable a defendant to ask the court to stay the plaintiff's proceedings until the plaintiff has secured the defendant as he has secured the plaintiff. The section does not go so far as to cover the case of the plaintiff commencing the attack in personam, the defendant then arresting the plaintiff's ship, and the plaintiff then applying to stay the defendant's cross-action until the defendant has given security for the plaintiff's claim. For these reasons I think that, having regard to the way in which these actions are instituted, and without thinking it necessary to decide what might be the case under other circumstances, this application must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Pritchard and Sons.
Solicitors for the defendants, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Tuesday, Aug. 1, 1893.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. H. Jeune) and BARNES, J.)

THE GLENDEVON. (a)

Charter-party — Discharge of cargo — Despatch money—Sundays and fête days.

Where a charter-party provided that a steamer was to be "discharged at the rate of 200 tons per day, weather permitting (Sundays and fête days excepted), according to the custom of the port of discharge, and if sooner discharged to pay at the rate of 8s. 4d. per hour for every hour saved," it was held that Sundays and fête days were not to be taken into account in computing the number of hours saved in discharging, and hence despatch money was payable on the difference between the number of hours actually taken to discharge the ship and the total number of hours allowed by the charter-party.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants, in an action for balance of freight, from a decision of the County Court judge of Newcastle-on-Tyne.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Glendevon, and at the time material to this action she, under a charter-party dated the 17th Nov. 1892, carried a cargo of coals, belonging to the defendants, from Newcastle to Lisbon.

By the terms of the charter-party it was agreed (inter alia):

The steamer to be discharged at the rate of 200 tons per day, weather permitting (Sundays and fête days excepted), according to the custom of the port of discharge, and if sooner discharged to pay at the rate of 8*s.* 4*d.* per hour for every hour saved . . . Demurrage 20*l.* for every day's detention in discharging, and in same proportion for any part of such day over and above the days allowed as aforesaid, except in case of riot or any hands striking work, frost, snow, or floods or other accidents, which may prevent the discharging of such steamer.

The Glendevon having arrived at Lisbon commenced discharging at 7 a.m. on the 2nd Dec., which was Friday, and finished at 5 p.m. on the 7th Dec.

According to the time allowed by the charter-party, the charterers had 252 hours to discharge, which, excluding a fête day and a Sunday as per charter-party, brought the time up to 7 p.m. on the 15th Dec.

The Glendevon was in fact discharged in 106 hours, and the plaintiffs credited the defendants with 146 hours despatch, being the difference between 106 and 252 hours. The defendants, however, claimed to include the fête day and Sunday which intervened between the 2nd Dec., the date when the discharge was finished, and the 15th Dec., the date up to which the time allowed for discharging extended, and sought to set off against the plaintiffs' claim for freight a sum of 20*l.* in respect of despatch money for those two days.

The County Court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

R. H. Forster, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The test to be applied in computing the number of hours despatch money is the number of hours actually saved to the ship. The charterers, according to the charter-party, had up to 7 p.m. on Dec. 15 to discharge. By reason of their despatch, the discharge was finished at 5 p.m. on Dec. 7. If so, the defendants have earned despatch money for every hour between those two dates. In other words, if the shipowner is to take Sundays and fête days into account in reckoning the time allowed him to discharge, the charterers should also be entitled to take them into account in reckoning the time saved:

Laing v. Hollway, 3 Q. B. Div. 437;
Niemann v. Moss, 29 L. J. N. S. 206, Q. B.

Demurrage and despatch money stand on the same footing,

Aspinall. Q.C. and E. de Hart, for the plaintiffs, contrâ.—If the defendants' contention is right, they would be entitled to include in time saved any bad weather intervening between the time when the discharge was finished and the full time allowed for discharge. Niemann v. Moss (ubi sup.) is not in point. The words "Sundays and fête days excepted" apply to the whole clause.

Forster in reply.—"Weather permitting" only applies to bad weather during the discharge.

THE PRESIDENT.—The question for our decision is, whether despatch is to be counted in respect of Dec. 8, which was a fête day, and Dec. 11, which was a Sunday, making in all forty-eight hours, and whether the defendants are entitled to set off such despatch money against the freight. Reliance was placed by the defendants on the case of Laing v. Hollway (ubi sup.), but it was conceded in argument and could not be denied, that the actual decision is not one that bears on the present case, because there the only question really decided was, that the length of the day was to be taken at its real and actual length of twenty-four hours. There were, however, two expressions in the judgment on both of which reliance was placed, and which might at first sight seem to have a bearing on the question. Bramwell, L.J. said, "The owner would sail away by what has happened 216 hours sooner than he would have done but for the defendants' despatch," and "it was admitted by the plaintiff that the demurrage would be payable on this footing; then why not the despatch money?" I do not think that either of these phrases really lend themselves to the appellants' argument in this case. I am by no means sure, even by the test of the time saved to the steamer, that Sundays or fête days should be taken in, because, though in some cases they might be days available for the steamer's purposes, in other cases they would only be so partly, and possibly not at all. But the argument which the counsel for the respondents has put forward, as regards the other exception in the clause, appears to me to be unanswerable. They point out that days during which the weather does not permit discharge stand on the same footing as regards the charterer's rights as Sundays and fête days; that is to say, the charterer need not discharge on Sundays and fête days and need not discharge on other days if the weather does not permit, but if Sundays and fête days are to be reckoned in as time saved for the purpose of despatch money, then the days during which the weather does not permit discharge ought to stand on the same footing. I confess I am unable to see any answer to that argument, and the results would be so extraordinary as to be unintelligible. It would come to this, that after the ship was discharged the charterer would have the right to say that on a large number of days, it might be even weeks or months, the weather was such as would have prevented discharging, and therefore he was entitled to add them in as days of twenty-four hours, for each hour of which he was entitled to have 8*s.* 4*d.* That is an absurdity. Then there is the other contention, that demurrage and despatch stand on the same footing; but that is not so. In the first place, demurrage is governed by a separate clause from that governing despatch money, and the demurrage clause contains no exception of Sundays and fête days. One would not expect it to do so, because it has been pointed out demurrage is fixing damages for breach of contract when time is lost to the steamer. The result, therefore, to which I come is that, on the true construction of this charter-party, the 8*s.* 4*d.* per hour is to be paid for the time saved out of the discharging hours, and that discharging hours are to be taken with the exceptions in the clause. The result is, that the judgment appealed from is right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

BARNES, J. — We have to consider whether the plaintiffs' method of calculating the number of hours saved is correct. According to the charter-party the total time allowed for the discharge of the Glendevon is 252 hours, and out of that number of hours only is any saving of time to be reckoned. That is neatly put in the judgment of the learned County Court judge, where he says, "The rate of 200 tons per day means for working days, and every hour saved means every hour saved out of a fixed or ascertainable number of working days, viz., 252 hours, which exclude Sundays and fête days." Any other construction would lead to difficulty, and I agree in thinking that the judgment should be affirmed.

Solicitors: for the plaintiffs, Botterell, Roche, and Temperley; for the defendants, King, Wigg, and Co., for Clayton and Gibson, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Jan. 16, 20, 22, and 23, 1894.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE CELTIC KING. (a)

Mortgage—Prior charter—Sale by mortgagees—Right of purchaser with notice of ship's engagements—Delivery up of certificate of registry—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 50.

A shipowner agreed with the defendants to provide a ship (then building) which should be run and worked by them in their line under their control and discretion. The agreement was to continue in force for five years, and was to be binding on the owner's executors and administrators. The ship was completed and registered on the 3rd Jan. 1891. On the 5th Jan. in the same year she was mortgaged by the owner to a company to secure an account current. The mortgagees had no notice of the engagements subsisting with the defendants. On the 30th Nov. 1892 the owner gave a second mortgage on the ship to the plaintiff to secure an account current. The plaintiff was aware of the existence of the contract with the defendants, and inferred that the terms were onerous.

On the 17th Oct. 1893 the owner died, and the first mortgagees took possession of the ship, and transferred her by a bill of sale to the plaintiff. At the time of the sale the plaintiff knew the terms of the agreement under which the ship was being worked in the defendants' line. Subsequently the plaintiff entered into a contract to sell the ship to a firm which knew the nature of the contract with the defendants.

The plaintiff moved for an order that the defendants should deliver up to him the certificate of registry of the ship. It was agreed to turn the motion into the trial of the action without pleadings, and that the defendants should be taken to have applied for an injunction restraining the plaintiff from dealing with the ship in a manner contrary to the provisions of the agreement.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to have the certificate of registry delivered up to him.

The defendants' application for an injunction was refused upon the ground that the first mortgagees, who had no notice of the ship's engagements, were entitled to realise their security by selling the ship free of her engagements, and that the plaintiff, although he had notice of her engagements, was entitled to the same rights as were possessed by his vendors, the first mortgagees.

THIS was a motion that the defendants, who were the charterers of the steamship Celtic King, should forthwith deliver up to the plaintiff, Mr. Frank Ross, the registered owner of the Celtic King, her certificate of registry, and in the alternative for an injunction against the further detention of the certificate by the defendants.

It was agreed at the hearing that the defendants should be taken to have moved for an injunction restraining the plaintiff from dealing with the ship in derogation of certain agreements entered into with the defendants by William Ross, the deceased brother of the plaintiff, whilst the ship was building. In the year 1889 Mr. William Ross entered into an agreement with the defendants to provide them with two steamers to be run in their line. One of these steamers was the Celtic King. She was to be fitted up for the frozen meat trade, and the defendants were to have all the powers of a charterer of a vessel chartered on time charter. The agreement was to remain in force for five years.

The Celtic King was completed and registered in Jan. 1891, and was within two days of registration mortgaged by Mr. William Ross to the Marine Securities Corporation Limited, who had no notice of the arrangement with the defendants. The plaintiff, Mr. Frank Ross, in 1892, became the second mortgagee of the Celtic King, he at that time knowing that she was being employed by the defendants under some agreement with Mr. William Ross, the terms of which he inferred to be onerous.

Mr. William Ross died in Oct. 1893, and a few days after his death the Marine Securities Corporation, the first mortgagees, took possession of the ship. In December of the same year the corporation transferred her by bill of sale to the plaintiff, who at this time was fully aware of the terms of the agreement with the defendants.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In Dec. 1893 the plaintiff entered into a contract to sell the Celtic King to Messrs. Allport and Hughes, who were also aware of the terms of the agreement under which she was employed in the defendants' line, and applied for the certificate of registry. The defendants refused to part with the certificate, alleging that they required it for the purpose of the vessel being navigated in their line.

The plaintiff now moved for an order that the defendants should deliver up to him the certificate of registry of the ship. At the suggestion of the learned judge it was agreed that the defendants should be taken to have applied for an injunction restraining the plaintiff from dealing with the ship in derogation of the agreement between Mr. William Ross and the defendants, and further, to turn the motion into the trial of the action without pleadings.

An application on behalf of Messrs. Allport and Hughes to be made parties with a view to determining their rights was opposed by the defendants, and the learned judge declined to make an order.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Lauriston Batten for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiff is entitled to the original object of the motion, namely, the certificate. He is the owner, and no one can hold it as against him. Sects. 43 and 50 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 support this contention. The certificate is subject to no lien:

Gibson v. Ingo, 6 Hare, 112.

Secondly, the plaintiff or his vendee is entitled to navigate and work this ship as he pleases, because he derives his title from the original mortgagees, who had no notice of the contract. Thirdly, the decision in De Mattos v. Gibson (28 L. J. 165, 498, Ch.) goes too far.

Bigham, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the defendants.—The rule in Collins v. Lamport (34 L. J. Ch. 196) applies to the case of a contract entered into before the mortgage as well as to a contract entered into after it. On this point the question of notice is immaterial. It is also contended that a person who stands in the position of a mortgagee—having the equitable right—affected with notice of a condition of things which makes it inequitable for him to avail himself of his security, cannot improve his position by buying up the title of the first mortgagee. Further, the court will not order the delivery up of the certificate where it appears that it is to be used for an illegitimate purpose, as in this case to defeat the agreement:

Collins v. Lamport, 11 Jur. N. S. 1; 34 L. J. 196, Ch.;
The Vindobala, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 657; 13 P. D. 42; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 376; De Mattos v. Gibson, 28 L. J. 165, 498, Ch.;
Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 604; 21 L. J. 898, Ch.

Assuming the plaintiff not to be bound by the contract, he is not entitled to interfere with its performance unless he can show that his security is prejudiced by the contract:

The Fanchon, 5 P. Div. 173.

With respect to the second point, there are no cases to be found in which second mortgagees with notice have bought the first mortgagee's title in the case of ships. They referred to

Fisher on Mortgages, 4th edit., p. 611;
Hiles v. Moore, 15 Beav. 175;
Willoughby v. Willoughby, 1 T. R. 763.

[BARNES, J.—But those are all cases of tacking.] We submit that the first mortgagees, though they could transfer to anyone else, cannot do so to the plaintiff. We ask for an injunction restraining the plaintiff or his agents from sailing or permitting the sailing of the ship contrary to the provisions of the agreement.

Sir Walter Phillimore, in reply, cited

37 & 38 Vict. c. 78, s. 7, as repealed by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 87, s. 129;
White and Tudor, Leading Cases in Equity, 6th edit., vol. 2, p. 43.

This is a case of sale by the first mortgagee, and is not tacking at all. The rule in Tulk v. Moxhay (2 Ph. 774; 18 L. J. 83, Ch.) is applied to persons by Lumley v. Wagner (21 L. J. 898, Ch.), and to things by De Mattos v. Gibson (28 L. J. 165, 498, Ch.). In the present case the mortgagee would not necessarily know that the ship had engagements, as the agreement was entered into before the ship was registered, or had a name. Without notice no one would expect that a ship was running in a particular line for three years. Assuming the plaintiff to be bound by the contract, such a contract does prejudicially affect the mortgagee's security. [BARNES, J.—What is the position of a mortgagee taking a mortgage of a vessel under charter?] There is no privity of contract between himself and the charterer. If, however, the vessel is at sea with goods on board, he may become bailee of such goods; and if the vessel is in port ready to load, he may be taken to be fixed with constructive notice of the contract, and thus brought within the rule in Collins v. Lamport. So far from a purchaser being necessarily subject to the engagements of the ship, he cannot sue on the charter-party:

Splidt v. Bowles, 10 East, 279.

Even if De Mattos v. Gibson is good law this case is wider, and no injunction should be granted:

Whitwood Chemical Company v. Hardman, (1891) 2 Ch. 416.

[BARNES, J.—In all the cases the person by whom the contract could be performed was in existence; here William Ross is dead, and his estate is being administered in Chancery. This might have considerable weight in my judgment.] There is no such equity as suggested by the defendants. The only equity is that defined in

Braudlyn v. Ord, 1 Atk. 571;
Lowther v. Carlton, 2 Atk. 241;
Sweet v. Southeste, 2 Bro. C. Cas. 66;
M'Queen v. Farquhar, 11 Ves. 467.

The injunction sought for is in any case too wide. The only order that could be made would have to be limited by Collins v. Lamport. The present plaintiff has sold disclosing these contracts to his vendee, and there is nothing from which he can be restrained.

BARNES, J.—This action was commenced on the 12th inst., and by the arrangement made between the parties—an arrangement which is, I think, to be regarded as most businesslike—I have been enabled in a very short time after the writ was issued to hear the whole case as between these two parties, and to dispose of all the questions which are raised between them. It seems to me that the case, even confined to the two parties who are actually before me, raises some rather important questions, and I think that these questions have been extremely ably argued. The plaintiff's case is that he desires delivery up of the certificate of registry of the steamship Celtic King, of which he is the registered owner, which certificate is in the possession of the defendants and held by them. The matter of that claim having been brought before me on motion, it appeared that the real question it was intended to raise in substance was whether or not this vessel was still bound by arrangements made between her former owner and the Tyser Line, so that the plaintiff should not be able to have the certificate without seeing that those arrangements were carried out. It was thereupon agreed to turn the motion into the trial of the action without pleadings, and that all questions between the parties should be disposed of as if the plaintiff had made whatever claim he was entitled to make, and as if the defendants had made any claim they were entitled to make. Their claim, according to the argument of Mr. Bigham, partly consisted of an answer to the application for the delivery of the certificate by suggesting that it ought not to be delivered under the circumstances; and that if it were delivered there ought to be an injunction against Mr. Frank Ross, the plaintiff, to the effect that he and his agents should be restrained from sailing, or permitting the sailing, of the ship, contrary to the provisions of the agreement which I have referred to. Therefore, whatever the precise form in which it is asked, it means that Mr. Frank Ross shall be restrained from in any way dealing with or disposing of this ship without seeing and arranging that she shall not be used outside and independently of the agreement with the Tyser Line. The facts which give rise to the question are these: Mr. William Ross was about to build two steamers, and, on the 19th Aug. 1889, he entered into an agreement with Mr. W. H. Tyser, on behalf of a company about to be formed, with the object of establishing a line of steamships to be called the Tyser Line. That agreement recites that Mr. William Ross had agreed to provide at least two steamers to be run by the company, as part of their line, on the terms mentioned; and the two steamers were referred to as being in course of building. One of them was the Celtic King. The agreement provided that Ross and Co., which I suppose is the firm of Mr. William Ross, should at their own expense cause and procure both steamers to be duly completed and ready for sea, and fitted with refrigerating machinery, and insulating chambers (which should not be removed from the vessel during the currency of the agreement except by mutual consent) provided by the company, and capable of carrying about 900 or 1000 tons weight of frozen meat each. Then there are various provisions, including one by which Ross and Co. are to have the right to substitute vessels of equal size and power for those specified. It is provided that the steamers should be run and worked by the company, and for that purpose they are to be under the control and direction of the company, who are to have all such powers and discretion as a charterer would have if the steamers had on time charter been chartered to the company. Nevertheless the agreement was not to be deemed to constitute the company the charterers of the steamers, or as incurring any liabilities as such, but the position was to be that the steamers were being worked on account and at the cost and risk in all respects of Ross and Co., as owners, as if on each voyage the vessel were laid on the berth for loading on owner's account, the company occupying the position of oading brokers or agents, with the additional control provided for. Nothing in the agreement was to interfere with the rights reserved to Ross and Co. in the agreement of same date between themselves and the Tyser Line. The latter agreement, it is stated, is not material. In the next clause the company are to use their best possible endeavours to secure profitable employment for the vessels, and for that purpose they have power to charter the vessels, and to make arrangements for loading or for pooling the earnings. There are a great many provisions about accounts and agents, and Ross and Co. appear to have the power of appointing the captains, though there is a provision that if there is any objection on the part of the company they can remove them. Then there is a provision for the amount of commission to be paid by Ross and Co. to the company, and the agreement is to continue in force as regards each of the steamers for five years. The agreement is to continue, notwithstanding changes in the firm of Ross and Co., and is to be binding on Mr. Ross' executors and administrators. This agreement was adopted by the company on the 10th Sept. 1889, and it was provided that it should be binding upon Ross and Co. and the company, the company being in existence at this date. Athough these agreements were made in 1889, the Celtic King was not completed and registered until the 3rd Jan. 1891, and on the 5th Jan. of that year she was mortgaged by Mr. William Ross to the Marine Securities Corporation Limited, to secure an account current. That mortgage was registered on the 6th Jan. 1891. The agreement for that mortgage was, I think, to secure the sum of 30,000*l*. It appeared from the evidence that that arrangement was made in Dec. 1890, some time prior to the register of the ship, though the actual mortgage was not completed until the ship had been registered. I think it is clear that at that time the mortgagees had no notice of the contracts of 1889 with the Tyser Line. The secretary of the corporation has been called, and the effect of his evidence is that there was no notice of these contracts by the mortgagees, and that the mortgage was taken because the board thought it was a fair ship and the advance a very good one, and there was nothing in the discussion except as to what sort of a ship she was. The next transaction was a mortgage, dated the 30th Nov. 1892, which was a mortgage from William Ross to Frank Ross, the present plaintiff, to secure an account current, so that Frank Ross became the second mortgagee of the ship. It is important to notice that at the time when he took the second mortgage, according to the admissions contained in a letter by the solicitors of the 17th Jan., the plaintiff was aware that the vessels were being employed by the defendants under some agreement between them and Mr. William Ross, and that the plaintiff, though he did not know the terms of the agreement, had inferred that they were onerous. The vessel seems to have been employed in the Tyser Line from shortly after her completion until the month of October in last year, and Mr. Tyser stated that at the present time there were no subsisting agreements specifically relating to this ship for the carriage of goods out or home by her, but that she formed one, I think, of six ships which ran in the line, and that having made general agreements for the carriage of goods they expected him to carry out those engagements, partly by the use of this ship, as well as by the others. That is the state of affairs when Mr. William Ross died on the 17th Oct. 1893. On the 24th Oct. the Marine Securities Corporation took possession of the ship, and I understand from the evidence that then, or at any rate before the sale to Frank Ross, which occurred later on, Mr. William Ross was in default under his mortgage to them. Mr. William Ross' will appears to have been proved by one executor, and it is stated that an action has been brought in the Chancery Division by Mr. Frank Ross, for the administration of his estate. Sometime between the death of Mr. William Ross and the end of the year negotiations took place between Mr. Frank Ross and the representatives of the Tyser Line with a view to the future employment of this ship on terms which appear to be, and I think Mr. Tyser stated they were, somewhat more favourable to the shipowners than the arrangements embodied in the original agreement. These negotiations seem to have resulted in nothing, but on the 4th Nov. there is a letter from the Tyser Line to the Marine Securities Corporation, in which they refer to the agreement with them, which it is said in that letter the Marine Securities Corporation were familiar with. But the corporation on the 6th Nov. disclaim any familiarity with the terms of the agreement, and say it cannot in any way affect or prejudice their rights as first mortgagees, and that if the Tyser Line entertain a contrary opinion they are referred to their solicitors. Mr. Frank Ross seems to have entered into negotiations with the Marine Securities Corporation for the purchase of the ship and one or two others, and on the 6th Dec. 1893 she was transferred by bill of sale from the corporation, acting as mortgagees under their power of sale on the default of the original owner, to Mr. Frank Ross, and mortgaged by Mr. Frank Ross on the same day to the corporation to secure a current account. That transaction was the result of two agreements of the 6th Dec., by which Mr. Frank Ross bought this ship and two others, and as part of the transaction granted a mortgage upon the Celtic King for, I think, 22,000*l*. The transaction appears to have been a bonâ fide one, and I cannot help thinking that the Marine Securities Corporation, on the death of Mr. William Ross, required a proper mortgagor to deal with in the future navigation of the ship. The net result was that Mr. Frank Ross became the owner of the Celtic King, with a mortgage upon her to the corporation, which has now, I think, been brought down to the extent of having only 750*l*. due upon it. The vessel herself lay here from October until now, and then this dispute is brought to a crisis. I have pointed out what the plaintiff's knowledge was at the time he took his mortgage, and it is admitted that before he purchased from the Marine Securities Corporation he knew all about these agreements with the Tyser Line, and appears to have had them before him. On the 20th Dec. 1893, Mr. Frank Ross, having become the owner of the ship, entered into a contract to sell her to Messrs. Allport and Hughes, and Mr. Hughes has to-day stated that before he entered into the contract he had before him the contracts with the Tyser Line, and submitted them to his solicitor, so that he had notice of them. Then the Tyser Line, seeing that the vessel is practically being taken out of their line, communicate with both Mr. Frank Ross and Messrs. Allport and Hughes, and the plaintiff, Mr. Frank Ross, applies for the certificate of registry. The substance of the defendant's contention is stated in a letter of the 22nd Dec. in answer to an application of that kind. "Under the agreement with the late Mr. William Ross," write the defendants' solicitor, "our clients are entitled to have the steamer run in their line, and are entitled to the document which they require for the purpose of the vessel being thus navigated." Mr. Frank Ross still insists through his solicitors on having the certificate, and no doubt wants it for the purpose of complying with his contract of sale to Messrs. Allport and Hughes. The latter say in answer to communications from the Tyser Line, that "Your relations with William Ross, and your communications with Frank Ross, do not appear to concern us." They add that they have bought the ship free from all cumbrances, and do not hold themselves bound by any engagements of William Ross, or any other owner of the ship. The result of all that is the writ to which I have referred, and the application on the part of the plaintiff to deliver up.

Application seems to have been made before the magistrate under the 50th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, but the magistrate, thinking there were reasonable grounds for withholding the certificate, seems not to have interfered, leaving the parties to fight out their rights elsewhere. The plaintiff now asks for the certificate, and says he is entitled to it, independently of any question raised as to the rights of the parties to the user of the ship, under the 50th section, which says: "The certificate of registry shall be used only for the lawful navigation of the ship, and shall not be subject to detention by reason of any title, lien, charge, or interest whatsoever, which any owner, mortgagee, or other person may have or claim to have on or in the ship described in the certificate." I think that the plaintiff's contention on this point of the case is correct, both having regard to the terms of the Act and the decision in the case of Gibson v. Ingo (6 Hare, 112). Therefore I think he is entitled to succeed in obtaining an order against the defendants for the delivery up of the certificate, which is really being asked for for the purposes of the navigation of the ship, being wanted by the plaintiff to hand over to those who are about to navigate her. The question is what navigation she ought really to be engaged in. The delivery up of the certificate is not the real point, though, of course, as a matter of form, it ought to be handed over to those who are entitled to it, and I think that must be my order so far as the certificate is concerned. The defendants contend that it ought not to be handed over, because the question is as to how the ship is to be employed. I have said that I think it should be handed over, but that the proper form for the defendants' application, if they can maintain it, is for an injunction to restrain the plaintiff from dealing with the ship in derogation of the agreements. That raises the serious question in this case. The parties before me are only Frank Ross and the Tyser Line, and though the purchasers of the ship, Messrs. Allport and Hughes—the purchasers in the sense that they have made their contract, though, as I understand, they have not got their transfer—have asked to be made parties with a view of determining their rights, and the plaintiff desired that that should be done, the defendants have refused to accede to that suggestion, and only wish the matter decided between them and Mr. Frank Ross. With that refusal on their part, I do not feel that I could make an order that they should have someone as defendants to their counter-claim whom they did not wish to sue, though I think it extremely advisable that the rights of all parties should have been determined once for all. However, there it is, and I have only to consider the defendants' application for an injunction against the plaintiff. Mr. Bigham takes two points. First, that the mortgagee is bound by the contract made before his mortgage, although he had no notice of that contract. I think there is little or no authority for that general proposition, but I do not think it is necessary in this case to express with any definiteness what is the general rule upon that point, because there may be cases in which, although there is no actual notice, the mortgagee ought to assume that the ship is occupied in some ordinary employment. Without further consideration I should not like to express myself too positively upon that general proposition. But the facts here are very different indeed from the case of the ordinary employment of a vessel under ordinary loading or ordinary charters. The mortgagees, as I pointed out, took their mortgage almost immediately the ship was registered, under an arrangement made actually before she was registered, and under these circumstances I do not see how the mortgagees could in any way assume or be bound to assume that there was a contract of this particular character, affecting the ship for the next five years. In fact, they knew nothing whatever about it. I do not think that, having regard to the dates and facts, the first mortgagees when they took their mortgage would be bound by the terms of this particular contract, bound in the sense that they could not sell the ship free of it if they chose to enforce their security. There is a further point which it is important to bear in mind. It is said on the defendants' side that the contracts would not very appreciably affect the security of the mortgagees. I confess I cannot take that view. It seems to me that the matter speaks for itself; that where there is a contract of this particular character it would be, and is, prejudicial to the security if the mortgagee were to be obliged to admit that he could not sell the ship, or realise his security in the open market free from that restrictive contract. It is not like an ordinary contract for the ordinary employment of a ship which is made from time to time, as things are good or as things are bad. It is a contract which binds the vessel for a very long period, and has various clauses in it which might make it extremely difficult for anybody to purchase a ship of this kind if they were tied down by the terms of that bargain. It follows that if the vessel were put up for sale without being freed from these arrangements, the mortgagees would not be able adequately to realise their security. Therefore I think that with regard to that first proposition the first mortgagees really were in this case entitled to realise their security upon the default of their mortgagor by selling the ship without being hampered by the engagements made under the contracts with the Tyser Line.

But Mr. Bigham says that it is not so with regard to this particular purchaser, because he took his mortgage with notice of the position of the ship, as stated in that letter of the solicitors to which I have referred, and of course had full notice of the agreements before he completed his purchase, and therefore that he ought not to be allowed to deal with the ship in any way in derogation of the agreements. But there again cases have been cited to me which show that a purchaser with notice from a purchaser without notice is entitled to rely on the title of his vendor, because otherwise that vendor would be restricted in his powers of sale, and that is exactly the position in which these mortgagees would be. If they could not sell to a person in the position of Mr. Frank Ross, then, even if he offered a higher price than anybody else, they could not avail themselves of that offer, because he would have notice of the terms on which the ship was previously engaged. There are two other points taken as an answer to this application for an injunction. The first is that there is really nothing to restrain the plaintiff from doing so, because the case is analogous to that of De Mattos v. Gibson (ubi sup.), where the position of the mortgagor was such that practically the contract with him was at an end. This case, I confess, seems in one sense very near to that, because of the position in which the death of Mr. William Ross has placed his estate, but that point has not been dealt with so far as showing what the executors propose to do about these vessels. I cannot help thinking that they did not intend to go on, but I am not going to dispose of this case on that particular point. There is another point, namely, that the motion really ought to be against Messrs. Allport and Hughes; that they have had notice of the agreement, and therefore Mr. Frank Ross has done all that he need do, because, it is said, he is entitled to sell the ship, and if he sells it to a person who has notice of the contract he has not done anything to defeat or in derogation of the agreements. I think there is a good deal in that point, and I cannot help thinking that as a matter of business the defendants were not wise in not disposing of that matter once for all in this case. But, after all, that is putting the case on a somewhat narrow ground, and though I think it is possible that that contention may be correct, having regard to the form of application which was put forward in Collins v. Lamport (34 L. J. Ch. Div. 196), I prefer to put it on the broader ground I have taken, that I do not think, in the circumstances of this particular case, the mortgagees were disentitled to sell the vessel free of these engagements, and that Mr. Frank Ross was entitled to take up the position which they themselves had. Although one can see quite well that the Tyser Line may feel a certain hardship in having made this particular contract, and in not being able to strictly insist upon it, they have their remedy, if it is open, against the estate of Mr. William Ross. I think myself that while on the one hand it is important that you should be able to charter vessels in the ordinary way without interference by mortgagees other than is necessary to protect their security, yet, on the other hand, a mortgagee who takes his rights without notice of any particular contract affecting the ship in this way, ought not to be prevented from realising his security. Therefore, the conclusion I have come to is, that the plaintiff must have an order in his favour for the delivery up of the certificate, and that the defendants' counterclaim must be decided against them. The plaintiff must have the costs of the suit.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Solicitors for the defendants, Clarke, Rawlins, and Co.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Feb. 27, March 1, 2, and 20, 1894.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords WATSON, HALSBURY, and MORRIS.)

ROSE AND OTHERS v. BANK OF AUSTRALASIA.(a) ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Salvage — Duty of shipowner — Expenditure for benefit of all concerned — General average— Brokerage.

Reasonable expenditure incurred by a shipowner in salvage operations may be distributed over the interests protected and benefited, and need not fall upon the ship alone.

A ship of the appellants containing a valuable cargo of a perishable nature was stranded on the coast of France, while on a voyage to the United Kingdom, and eventually became a total loss. The owners incurred expenditure in removing the cargo from the ship, drying it, and carting it to a port from which it could be shipped to the port of destination. For these purposes they employed persons who were skilled in salvage operations, and also a French agent on the spot. Some of the cargo could not be identified, and was sold by auction, and a brokerage commission was paid. In an action brought by the shipowners against consignees of cargo to recover general average, particular average, salvage, and other charges:

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the expenditure above mentioned, which was of an extraordinary character, was reasonably incurred for the benefit of all parties, and that the consignees were liable for their proportion of it.

Schuster v. Fletcher (38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 605; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 577; 3 Q. B. Div. 418) discussed, and disapproved.

Per Lord Herschell, L.C.: Semble, where cargo has been removed from a stranded ship, and is by a continuous operation carried to a place of safety, expenditure incurred after all hope of saving the ship has been abandoned may still be treated as general average expenditure.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Fry and Lopes, L.JJ.), delivered in March 1892, who had reversed a judgment of Lawrance, J., in an action by shipowners to recover general average, which was tried before him without a jury in May 1891.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lawrance, J. decided in favour of the plaintiffs' claim, but his decision was varied by the Court of Appeal in regard to several items. The appellants then brought the present appeal.

Cohen, Q.C. and Scrutton, for the appellants, argued that there were now three points only in dispute: (1) the charge for cartage from the place where the cargo was landed to Boulogne; (2) the charges for the services of Mr. Anderson, who took charge of the salvage operations; (3) the brokerage commission paid on the sale by auction of that portion of the cargo which could not be identified owing to the obliteration of the marks. The charge for cartage is either a general average charge, as being part of a continuous act from the commencement of the salvage for the benefit of all concerned; or, secondly, it was done on behalf of cargo which was perishable, and would have deteriorated if not dealt with; or, thirdly, it was for the benefit of cargo and freight, and in any case ought not to fall upon the ship alone. The point was virtually decided in Notara v. Henderson (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 225), which was very nearly this case. The Court of Appeal were in error in saying that all hope of saving the ship was abandoned on the 1st Feb., and that there could be no general average after that date. The adventure may continue though the ship is lost. See

Birkley v. Presgrave, 1 East, 220;
Kemp v. Halliday, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 256; 34 L. J. 233, Q. B. (per Blackburn, J.).

As to the charge for the employment of an agent to superintend the salvage, this is an attempt to extend the principle of Schuster v. Fletcher (38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 605; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 577; 3 Q. B. Div. 418), which is not good law, or, at best, only applied to the circumstances of the particular case. No doubt an owner cannot charge for his own services, but he may incur reasonable expenses in the employment of agents on the principle laid down in Speight v. Gaunt (50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 330; 9 App. Cas. 1). The commission on the sale is also a reasonable charge. See Keay v. Fenwick, 1 C. P. Div. 745.

[Lord HALSBURY referred to Mordy v. Jones, 4 B. & C. 394.]

J. Walton, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton, for the respondents, contended that all charges incurred after cargo got to the top of the cliff must fall upon the shipowner. It was then in a place of safety, and all that was done after that was to forward it to the port of destination in order that the shipowner might earn his freight. General average ceases when the common adventure breaks up and the hope of prosecuting it successfully ends; i.e., when the cargo is removed from the wrecked ship to a place of safety. The shipowner has no right to charge for the services of his own agent or the brokerage which he had to pay. Such charges must fall on freight. No doubt Schuster v. Fletcher is difficult to understand on the facts, but it lays down a sound principle.

Cohen, Q.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

March 20.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell). — My Lords: On the 29th Jan. 1889 a vessel called the

Sir Walter Raleigh took the ground near Cape Grisnez; she was laden with a valuable cargo of wool and other merchandise. The appellants are the owners of that vessel. As soon as they heard of the disaster they communicated with a firm carrying on business in the city of London, Messrs. Anderson, Anderson, and Co., who they knew had had experience in salvage operations and in dealing with disasters of this description. Accordingly they instructed Messrs. Anderson, Anderson, and Co. to take the necessary steps in their interest and in the interest of the others concerned in the adventure. Messrs. Anderson, Anderson, and Co. proceded at once to do what they could to save both the ship and cargo. They sent Mr. Gavin Anderson, who, though of the same name, was not a member of their firm, to the site of the disaster, and they also made an arrangement with a local firm, Messrs. Adam and Co., bankers, of Boulogne, to do the best they could to save the cargo. In the result, it was arranged that Messrs. Anderson, Anderson, and Co. should receive 750*l.* for their services. One half of this sum by arrangement between them and Mr. Gavin Anderson was to be his, the other half was to be theirs. An arrangement was entered into with the firm of Adam and Co., of Boulogne, that they should receive a percentage upon the cargo salved, and this percentage proved to amount to a sum of 1500*l.* The cargo was all saved, but considerable portions of it, for the cargo consisted of wool—were in a damaged condition. The cargo was taken from the ship, carried up to the top of the cliff, and there placed for a time until it was conveyed by carts to Boulogne. A good deal of it was wetted by sea water, and had to be attended to, to prevent the deterioration and the destruction of the wetted cargo and the cargo which had been in contact with it. The cargo was taken in carts from Andresselles, where it had been stored merely in an open field, to Boulogne, where it was placed upon the quay. Steps were then taken to spread it out and protect it from deterioration and destruction, and ultimately it was forwarded from there to its destination in London. It is obvious that the transactions to which I have referred gave rise to a claim for general average, and a general average bond was entered into by the respondents, who were owners of a portion of the cargo, by which they agreed to pay their "proper and respective proportion of all general or particular average salvage or special or other charges which may be found to be chargeable upon their respective consignments or to which the shippers or owners of consignments may be liable to contribute in respect thereof." The matter was put into the hands of an eminent firm of average adjusters to make out the average statement, and they made out a statement allotting as they thought right to the various interests the expenses that had been paid or incurred. The result of that average statement was to show a sum due from the present respondents, as owners of a portion of the cargo to the appellants the shipowners. A dispute having arisen as to whether certain items had been taken into account which ought not to have been taken into account, an action was brought by the present appellants to recover the sum which appeared to be due to them according to the average statement. The defendants resisted this claim, and the matter came to trial before Lawrance, J. Only two questions were dealt with in the judgment of the learned judge; he treated those as the only questions in dispute before him; the one related to the payment of 750*l.* to Messrs. Anderson, Anderson, and Co., which it was contended ought not—or, at all events, the greater part of it ought not—to be charged; the other related to a sum of 2½ per cent. commission in respect of the sale of wool, which, owing to the destruction of marks and other causes, could not be identified as belonging to particular consignees. These questions Lawrance, J. decided in favour of the present appellants. When his judgment was concluded I observe that Mr. Barnes, who was counsel for the present respondents, said that the learned judge had not dealt with another question, viz., the payment of 1500*l.* to Messrs. Adam, and that it was contended that that was an excessive and unreasonable payment, and also that it had not been properly distributed by the average adjuster. Lawrance, J. said that if called upon he was prepared to decide, as he thought he was bound to do on the evidence before him, that the payment was a reasonable one. The case then went to the Court of Appeal, and the Court of Appeal made an order declaring "that only so much of the 1500*l.* paid to Messrs. Adam as is due in respect of work done up to the end of the 1st Feb. 1889 and superintending the extra work done in saving the goods from deterioration at the top of the cliff up to the same date should be allowed as general average, and only to the extent of a reasonable remuneration to Messrs. Adam; that only so much of the sum of 375*l.* paid to Mr. Gavin Anderson should be brought into general average account as represents the fair and reasonable remuneration of Mr. Gavin Anderson at the end of the 1st Feb. 1889; that no part of the further sum of 375*l.* retained by Messrs. Anderson should be charged as general average in any way against the cargo; that no part of the 2½ per cent. commission charged for the sale of the unidentified portions of the cargo should be brought into general average account or charged against the defendants." Then there was a declaration with regard to the sums paid for tugs and pumps, and as to wages, with which I need not trouble your Lordships, because no question arises with regard to them now—there was no contest at the bar relating to that part of the case. Your Lordships will observe that the foundation of the order made by the Court of Appeal is this, that there could be no general average charges in respect of anything that was done after the 1st Feb., and that therefore, whether the expenses incurred after that date related to the actual dealing with the cargo or were charges for the superintendence of the salvage operations, it was equally improper to make any general average charge in respect of them. In the Court of Appeal the learned judges took the view that by the 1st Feb. the conclusion had been arrived at that it was impossible to save the ship, and that therefore no expenditure after that date was incurred for the general good of the ship and cargo, but only for the benefit of the cargo or for the benefit of the freight. It is stated in one of the judgments that it appeared to be admitted that that was the case. As far as one can discover, that was a misapprehension on the part of the learned judges. The learned counsel who appeared at the bar for the respondents conceded, when the case was argued here, that it was impossible for them to maintain that position; and indeed, when the correspondence and the evidence are looked at, it is obvious that he was right in making that concession. It is quite true that on the 1st Feb.., bad weather having set in, the tugs were sent away, but the letter which refers to the sending away of the tugs says that if the weather improved the tugs could be recalled; and much later than that, as late as the 14th Feb., there is a letter which distinctly shows that the hope of saving the ship had not even then been abandoned, and it was certainly not till a later date than that that all hope of saving the ship was abandoned. Therefore it is quite clear that the foundation of the judgment in the Court of Appeal fails in point of fact. It is impossible to draw a line at the 1st Feb., and to say that nothing after that date can be general average. Indeed I come to the conclusion that the whole of the cargo was discharged, as far as appears upon the correspondence and evidence, before it can be said that all hope of saving the ship was abandoned. If not all, at all events so nearly all that it is not worth while attempting to make the distinction. Therefore it was really admitted by the learned counsel for the respondents that the order of the Court of Appeal as it stood could not be supported I may add that I should not myself be altogether prepared to admit that, even if you were to draw the line at the 1st Feb., and if before that date the cargo had been taken out of the ship for the purpose of saving it, and by a continuous operation the cargo was put in a place of safety, although some of that expenditure might have been incurred after the 1st Feb., it might not be perfectly, fitly, and properly treated as general average expenditure. The learned counsel for the respondents contended before your Lordships that the sum which was paid to Messrs. Adam was not properly distributed, and that it ought in the main, if it was payable at all, to be treated as a payment made on account of the freight. No great stress was laid at the bar upon the amount. The learned counsel did not seek to ask your Lordships to disturb the finding of Lawrance, J. that whatever portions of the adventure it ought to be attributed to it was not an unreasonable sum in itself, having regard to all the circumstances. But the learned counsel also argued that the sum of 750*l*., which was paid to Messrs. Anderson, Anderson, and Co., in so far as it represented work done by Messrs. Anderson, Anderson, and Co., on behalf of the shipowner, which the shipowner might have performed under circumstances to which I will call your Lordships' attention presently, could not be treated as payable at all by any of the other interests to the shipowner, that it was a matter for the shipowner himself, that it merely represented the discharge of a duty incumbent upon the shipowner himself, and ought not to be brought into the general average account at all. He also contended that, so far as it was properly brought into the average account, in regard, for example, to the services rendered by Mr. Gavin Anderson in France, it had not been properly distributed, that it ought to fall substantially on freight, and not to be charged, as it had been, to other interests. The third point which he raised was, that the 2½ per cent. commission, which was charged in connection with the sale of the unidentified wool, was an amount which the shipowner must himself bear, and could not charge to any of the other interests.

Those were the points which were argued before this House, and I think it was clear, in the course of the argument, that the main contest was whether the charges by Messrs. Anderson, Anderson, and Co. were such as could be made against other interests at all—whether they did not merely represent work of the shipowner which he ought to have done himself, or, if he chose to employ others to do, must treat as if he had done it himself, and therefore could not charge to anybody else the expense of doing it. The same with regard to the 2½ per cent. There was no attempt or desire to re-open the whole of the average statement, and therefore I do not propose to deal with the average statement except so far as it relates to the particular items to which I have called attention. Of course, so far as regards so much of the 1500*l*. as was to be charged, the same question would arise as arises with regard to the apportionment of the 750*l*. The cargo, as I have said, was brought up to the top of the cliff at Andresselles. The case on behalf of the respondents was this, that it was then saved; that it had been rescued from sea peril, and was no longer in any such peril; that all the expenditure after that date, except such expenditure as might relate to the mere drying of the wool, or putting it into a position to dry, was expenditure by the shipowner on his own account, in order to earn his freight, and that consequently it could be charged only against freight, not general average: that it could not be charged against the cargo, and it could not be charged against the cargo and freight. I think the learned counsel were right in saying that the money paid for superintendence, whether to Messrs Adam or to Mr. Gavin Anderson, must be dealt with in the same way as the expenditure on work to which the superintendence was applied, Therefore, the question which arises is, whether the contention of the respondents is well founded with regard to the expenditure incurred in the carriage of this wool from Andresselles to Boulogne, a distance, I believe, of twelve miles, where it was taken in carts. Their argument is this: the owner of the ship was at liberty to carry it on in order to earn his freight. In being taken from Andresselles to Boulogne it was in transit on this journey, which was ultimately completed in its being reshipped at Boulogne and brought over to London, and therefore all the expenditure, whether as cost of carriage, or as cost of superintendence, must be regarded as expenditure by the shipowner on his own account for the purpose of earning his freight. I do not suppose that it can be doubted that, if it were the true view of the facts that the expenditure was, and could only be regarded as, expenditure incurred for that purpose it was expenditure which the shipowner must himself bear. But then, it is said on behalf of the appellants that that is an erroneous view, that the cargo, which was a perishable cargo, had been wetted by sea water, and it would have been absolutely impossible, with any regard to the interests of the owners of the cargo, to leave the wool where it had first been put, namely, in a field just above the scene of the disaster at Andresselles, that, if the interests of the cargo alone had been regarded, any prudent person would have taken the wool to Boulogne, where it could have been properly dealt with on the quay or put into a fit and proper warehouse. And therefore, it is said, either in the first place this was general average because it was a continuous act from the time of the commencement of the salvage for the benefit of the ship and cargo (when you have begun thus to discharge the cargo, you at the same time lighten the ship and save the cargo for the common benefit), that that continuous operation having been commenced, until the cargo can be placed in a position of safety it is all general average; or, in the second place it is said, if all that is not to be regarded as general average, still it may be regarded as having been done on behalf of the cargo, even more than done with the view of earning freight, and for this reason the shipowner, acting on behalf of the cargo owner was obviously, under the circumstances of such a disaster as this, bound to take all reasonable means to place the cargo in a position of safety. If the cargo had not been of a perishable description probably his duty would have terminated at Andresselles as soon as the wool had been got out of reach of the sea; but with a cargo which might deteriorate from exposure to the weather and become entirely destroyed, if further steps were not taken to protect it, he would have been bound, it is said, even if he had made up his mind not to carry it on to its destination in his own interest, to take it on to Boulogne just as he did, and therefore, as he was not bound at any particular time to make his election, but might make it at any reasonable time, he cannot be said to have been doing this on behalf of the freight, inasmuch as, if he had determined when it came to Boulogne not to carry it on, he must equally have incurred the expenditure, and the expenditure must then clearly have fallen upon the cargo, and could not be said in any respect to have had reference to freight. Then the third alternative which was put was this: It may be regarded, it is said, as expenditure on account both of cargo and freight which ought to be charged to both. It was incurred, on the one hand, for the purpose of placing the cargo in a position of safety; and, on the other hand, for the purpose of enabling the shipowner to earn his freight, and therefore it is properly chargeable to both. Those three alternatives were presented to your Lordships by the learned counsel who argued the case for the appellants at your Lordships' bar. It is obvious that the respondents can only succeed in their contention if they can establish that this expenditure must be regarded as having been made on behalf of freight only. Either of the other alternatives is fatal to them. If it was general average, if it was to be charged against cargo, or if it was to be charged against cargo and freight, they must equally fail. I cannot entertain any doubt that one or other of the three contentions on the part of the appellants must prevail. It seems to me that, when once the conclusion of fact which I have stated is arrived at, that the cargo was not safe where it was at Andresselles, and that if the safety of the cargo alone was regarded it ought to have been taken to Boulogne, it was impossible to say that this can be treated as an expenditure on account of freight. It is said that when the expenditure was incurred the shipowner had already determined and elected to carry it on, and that, therefore, as he had made that election, he may be regarded as doing it on account of his freight, even although incidentally it benefited the cargo. I can see no act of election such as is contended for. It is true that the shipowner had looked out for vessels, and had made certain arrangements with vessels, with a view to the carriage of this cargo; but, if those persons had refused to carry out their contracts, or if freights had gone up very much, he might have changed his mind and never have shipped this cargo at all. He had done no act which conclusively determined his election. Down to the time when this cargo arrived at Boulogne and all the expense arising thereupon was incurred, it was perfectly open to the shipowner to say, and he would have incurred no liability to anybody if he had said, "I shall not carry it on because it will not answer my purpose to do so." Under those circumstances it seems to me impossible to say that this expenditure can be treated as chargeable against the freight. It is not necessary to say whether it is to be treated as a charge upon general average, or whether it is to be treated as a charge against cargo, or whether it is to be treated as a charge against cargo and freight. One or other of those views, according to my judgment, must be the correct one, and it is not essential to determine which. That really disposes of the case, except so far as regards the question whether the charges by Messrs. Anderson, Anderson, and Co. could properly be made at all.

Now, the contention on behalf of the respondents was, that the matter was concluded by a decision in the Queen's Bench Division in the case of Schuster v. Fletcher (38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 605; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 577; 3 Q. B. Div. 418), and that the shipowner ought to have himself done all those things which Messrs. Anderson, Anderson, and Co. did, or that, if he chose not to do them himself, he could not make any charge in respect of them. I will deal presently somewhat in detail with the case of Schuster v. Fletcher, but I will deal first with the matter apart from authority. There is no doubt that when a disaster of this kind happens the shipowner is bound to use his best endeavours in the interest of all concerned; but whether he is to do anything himself, and what he ought to do himself without making a charge for it, must, it seems to me, depend upon the circumstances of the case; there can be no rigid rule of law laid down with regard to it. It would in some cases, as it strikes me, be most unreasonable not to allow the shipowner to employ others to do the work, whilst in other cases it would be most unreasonable that he should, or that if he did he should make any charge in respect of it. Now, what were the circumstances here? The shipowner was at Aberdeen; this disaster happened on the coast of France. In an emergency of this description time is of the utmost importance. It is quite true, as was said, that the shipowner might have come up to London, he might have looked about and made inquiries as to the tugs that would be available, and as to what would be the best steps to be taken. These are not matters within the every-day experience of every shipowner wherever a disaster may happen, and cannot be reasonably assumed to be so; and the disaster and damage occasioned by delay, under such circumstances, may very greatly counterbalance the expenditure which is incurred in employing a person who does know about such things, who is accustomed to deal with them, and will therefore be able promptly to send the requisite aid, or take the best steps so as to cause the disaster to be as small as possible. Now, in this case, the shipowner, who was in Aberdeen, employed a firm in London who had had experience in operations of this description, and what was the result? That steps were taken with the greatest promptitude; that tugs were on the spot very early, and an arrangement made with them; that an experienced man was sent over to look after the interests of those concerned; that very speedily an arrangement was made with a French firm accustomed to deal with such matters, whose influence and position in a foreign country no doubt greatly facilitated the proceedings. Under those circumstances, how can it be said that a shipowner who takes that course, and would really if he had attempted to do the thing himself have been acting most prejudicially for the interests of all concerned, ought himself to bear the expenditure, which is an extraordinary expenditure, incurred for the benefit of all concerned in the entire undertaking? I know of no principle of law which would prohibit a shipowner from acting in such a reasonable manner, or would prohibit him, if when he so acts, and the disaster leads to extraordinary expenditure, from seeking to distribute that extraordinary expenditure over the interests which he sought to protect, and did protect and benefit by it. So much with regard to the principle. I quite concede that a shipowner owes a duty to all interested; that he is bound to discharge that duty; that he cannot throw the expense of doing what he ought to do himself upon some other interests because he chooses to employ somebody else. Whilst conceding that, it appears to me clear that there are many cases where the employment of others is a reasonable and right course to take; and where by such employment extraordinary expenditure is incurred for the general benefit, I am at a loss to see why it may not be distributed over those who receive the benefit.

Then it is said that the contrary principle has been laid down in Schuster v. Fletcher. I am bound to admit that I have a good deal of difficulty in ascertaining what principle, if any, was laid down in Schuster v. Fletcher. With all respect to the learned judges who took part in it, I cannot call it a very satisfactory case. If it is supposed to have laid down that under no circumstances may a shipowner employ others to do work for him at a distance from the place where he carries on his business, which if the disaster had happened at the place where he carries on his business he would have been bound to do himself, then all I can say is that, if it is supposed to lay down any such general principle, I respectfully altogether dissent from it. If it does not lay down that general principle, it is difficult to see what principle it can be said to lay down that would be applicable to or govern this case. There the circumstances as regards the occurrences to the ship were very similar to the present: "A ship during her voyage from India to London was stranded on the coast of France. The shipowner despatched his manager and other persons to take part in the necessary salvage operations, and the whole of the cargo was saved, transshipped, and brought forward to London, and the freight earned. Part of the cargo which could not be identified was sold by the shipowner by arrangement with the consignee through a broker, who received his brokerage,"—that is the brokerage question with which I will deal in a moment. "In the average statement a remuneration to the shipowner for arranging for salvage operations, receiving cargo, meeting and arranging with consignees, and receiving and paying proceeds, and generally conducting the business, was charged partly to general average and partly as particular average on the several interests rateably, the average stater thinking that the amount was a reasonable remuneration to the shipowner for his services, and for commission on the sale of unidentified cargo, and on disbursements. Held, that under the circumstances the amount was improperly charged, and could not be recovered, there being no contract on the part of the owners of the cargo to remunerate the shipowner for his services, a great part of which had been rendered with the object of earning his freight." It will be observed that in the 14th paragraph of the case it was alleged that "The defendant incurred considerable trouble in chartering ships to carry on the cargo from Boulogne to London, and in sending out lighters and necessary appliances to Boulogne, and in the identification of so much of the cargo as was identified." The case was somewhat confused by reason of the introduction of the firm of Messrs. G. H. Fletcher and Co., who seem to have taken some part in these operations, G. H. Fletcher and Co. being a firm of which the defendant had formerly been, but was not then, a member, and some of his work appears to have been done by them. The charge made in respect of this work was a sum of 2500*l*. The case stated that "the sum of 2500*l*. does not represent any sum which the defendant has paid, or rendered himself liable to pay, to G. H. Fletcher and Co." The average stater thought that it "was a reasonable remuneration to the defendant as shipowner in respect of his services hereinbefore mentioned, and in respect of his advances for disbursements." Now, in the judgment of Cockburn, L.C.J. he says: "Our judgment must be against the shipowner, for the charge is one which cannot be supported. It divides itself into two heads: one for getting the ship away from the place where she stranded; and the other for trouble taken in transferring the cargo, identifying part of it, and arranging for the sale of another part which could not be identified. I think these services have nothing in common with general average. General average presupposes some sacrifice for the benefit of the whole adventure, which must be borne equally by all. Here the shipowner had an interest in getting the ship off, and bringing the cargo into port in order that he might earn his freight. He cannot be allowed to throw the whole cost of these proceedings upon those who to some extent share in the benefit from them." If he was attempting to do that, it would certainly be a most unreasonable thing. "A great deal of what he has done was in the performance of his own contract. He was bound to use every effort to convey the cargo safely to its destination, and could only give up the task when it was hopeless." I think that is an overstatement of the law. He might elect to carry it on after the ship had been lost, but he was not bound to do so. "It cannot be said that the task was hopeless, when he was able at the cost of some trouble to bring the cargo into port." That is all that was said upon that point. Mellor, J. says: "I am of the same opinion on both points. Mr. McLeod has argued that the consignees stood by while the shipowner was taking extraordinary trouble, and ought therefore to recompense him for it. But the defendant was really doing nothing more than his own interests required him to do." Now, in that case it may be that the defendant did nothing more as regards that part of the operation, than as a shipowner he was bound to do, and did not employ anybody or incur any liability or pay anything in respect of it; but, as I have said, I cannot see that it anywhere lays down the principle that, if a shipowner employs another firm reasonably and properly, and incurs extraordinary expenditure by so doing, if he so employs them and incurs that expenditure not only for his own benefit, but for the general benefit, and in the hope of averting further disaster, he cannot charge that expenditure against the interests concerned. In the present case I have given my reasons for thinking that the learned judge who tried this case was right in his conclusion that this was an expenditure properly and reasonably incurred by the shipowners, the appellants, and if so incurred I have stated that I think that it cannot be charged only to freight, and that therefore the contention of the respondents fails.

There remains only the question of the 2½ per cent. commission on the sale of the unidentified wool. That point also arose in Schuster v. Fletcher. It was said in paragraph 22: "Where unidentified goods have to be sold and the sale is managed, not by the shipowner himself, but by the shipbroker, or some third person, a commission to such person (in addition to the selling broker's brokerage) is charged and allowed." Therefore the practice had apparently been down to that time to charge and allow the brokerage. With regard to that point the Lord Chief Justice says: "As to the expense incurred in respect of the articles which were unidentified, he took no further trouble, but sold them through a broker, who received his brokerage." The point raised seems to me to be this, and it also strikes me as a question of fact and not of law: In putting the unidentified goods into the hands of a commission merchant for sale, would the shipowner be acting in a reasonable and proper manner, or ought he himself to have arranged with the selling broker, and therefore be entitled to charge no more than the selling broker's half per cent. brokerage? The learned judge who tried the case has found that this was reasonable, it has been allowed by the average stater, and unless in point of law it can be said to be a charge which, under no circumstances, can properly be made, it would be impossible for your Lordships, in the argument of this case, and at this stage, to enter upon such an inquiry and to determine whether the charge of 2½ per cent. made under such circumstances was a reasonable charge. A shipowner, of course, is not bound to sell himself; in selling he may do what is reasonable and fair and just under the circumstances. He has no business to incur expense unreasonably, to put money unnecessarily into other people's pockets, prejudicially to the cargo owner. Of that there cannot be the slightest doubt. But if it be an ordinary and reasonable course on the part of one who has goods to sell to put them into the hands of a firm, such as Anderson, Anderson, and Co., and to pay them this commission, then I can see nothing in point of law to prevent the commission being a proper charge as against the owners of the cargo of wool which had to be sold for their benefit, and being therefore a proper deduction from the proceeds to be divided among the parties interested. I desire to say upon both those last points that I should be very sorry to encourage any attempt on the part of a shipowner, on the happening of a disaster such as has occurred here, to refrain from personally using all reasonable exertions, and taking all reasonable steps, and to unnecessarily and unreasonably incur expenditure for work which he might equally well have done himself, and then to cast that expenditure upon others who are interested in the adventure. All that we have to do here, however, is to determine the question of law, and it appears to me that, if Schuster v. Fletcher has been supposed to lay down any such rigid rule as was insisted upon by the learned counsel for the respondents, then that decision cannot be regarded as good law. I doubt very much whether it was ever intended to lay down any such rigid rule at all. I think it must be looked upon in relation to the facts; and certainly, if it laid down any new principle, a less precise and satisfactory annunciation of a principle it is impossible to conceive. Whilst fully adhering to the view that the shipowner must discharge his own duties thoroughly and efficiently, I think that, where he acts reasonably in incurring extraordinary expenditure for the benefit of the adventure generally, there is nothing in point of law that prevents his charging that expenditure upon those who are interested. I therefore move your Lordships, that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and the judgment of Lawrance, J. restored, with the usual result as to costs.

Lords WATSON, HALSBURY, and MORRIS concurred.

Judgment appealed from reversed: Judgment of Lawrance, J., restored: Respondents to pay the costs in this House and below.

Solicitors for the appellants, Parker, Garrett, and Parker.

Solicitors for the respondents, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Dec. 1, 2, and 19, 1893.

(Before LINDLEY, SMITH, and DAVEY, L.JJ.)

FURNESS, WITHY, AND CO. v. WHITE AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Carriage of goods—Consignee for sale—Receipt of goods under bill of lading—Liability for freight—Deposit—Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), ss. 66-72.

A mere consignee for sale of a cargo slipped abroad and delivered to him in England out of a warehouse under a bill of lading, is liable to be sued for the bill of lading freight, although he has deposited the amount of such freight under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862, as the deposit is not equivalent to payment, but is only security for payment.

(a) Reported by W. C. BISS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Decision of Day, J. affirmed (Davey, L.J. dissenting).

THE plaintiffs were shipowners carrying on business in London, and the defendants were fruit and produce brokers and commission agents, also carrying on business in London. When foreign fruit was consigned to the defendants they acted for the shippers as agents to sell only, and remitted the proceeds of the sale of the goods, less commission and expenses, to the shippers abroad.

A consignment of apples in barrels was shipped in the plaintiffs' ship Inchulva, at Halifax, Nova Scotia, for conveyance to London, consigned to the defendants for sale.

The bill of lading stated the number of barrels

Marked and numbered as in the margin, and to be delivered from the ship's deck, where the ship's responsibility shall cease, in the like good order and condition, at the aforesaid port of London . . . unto W. N. White and Co. or to their assigns, freight and charges payable by consignees as per margin.

Appended to the bill of lading was a condition that

The property shall be discharged from the ship into transit sheds or otherwise, as soon as she is ready to unload, by the agents of the owners of the vessel, and is to be entered by the consignees at the Custom House within twenty-four hours after the ship is reported.

And also the following clause:

The shipowners shall be entitled to land these goods on the quay of the dock where the steamer discharges immediately on her arrival; and upon the goods being so landed the shipowners' responsibility shall cease. This is to form part of this bill of lading, and any words at variance with it are hereby cancelled.

The ship arrived at the Victoria Docks, London, on Saturday, the 10th Dec. 1892, but the defendants, not being aware of the consignment to them, were not at the discharging berth ready to take delivery of the cargo on its arrival. The captain therefore, under the provisions of sect. 67 of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862, and of the clause in the bill of lading, landed the cargo into a warehouse of the London and India Docks Joint Committee, the discharge being completed on Tuesday, the 13th Dec. 1892. On the landing of the apples the plaintiffs gave notice to the Docks Committee that they were to remain subject to a lien for freight.

On the 12th Dec. the defendants heard for the first time of the ship's arrival, and of the consignment to them, and on that day they sent to the Docks Committee the following letter:

Dear Sirs,—We herewith hand you cheque for freight under the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, ss. 68, 69, 70, 71, and 72, and request you to hold same pending the receipt of your landing account and our further instructions.—Yours truly, W. N. WHITE AND CO. Limited; WM. NICH. WHITE, managing director.

A cheque for 152*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* was inclosed, which was the amount due for freight as calculated by the defendants from the entries in the margin of the bill of lading; but there was a miscalculation, the proper amount being 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*

The cheque and letter were received by the Docks Committee on the 13th Dec., and the same day the following letter was sent by them to the plaintiffs:

London and India Docks Joint Committee, Royal Victoria Dock, 13th Dec. 1892.—Gentlemen,—I am instructed to inform you that Messrs. W. N. White and Co. Limited have deposited 152*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* with this committee for freight, &c., on apples, ex Inchulva, Captain ———, from Halifax, and have given notice to retain 152*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.*—I am, Gentlemen, your obedient servant, WOODWARD.

On the 13th Dec. the delivery of the apples to the defendants from the warehouse was commenced, and was completed on the following day.

In consequence of the defendants' notice to the Docks Committee, the plaintiffs were unable to obtain the 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* due to them for freight, and on the 13th Dec. they wrote to the defendants saying they declined to wait for the money until the expiration of the thirty days provided by sect. 72 of the Act, and that they would issue a writ for the amount unless it was paid on that day. The defendants contended that they were within their rights, and on the afternoon of the 13th Dec. the writ in this action was issued claiming 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* for freight, but it was not served on the defendants until the next day.

On the 14th Dec., before the writ had been served, the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs saying that, as the Docks Committee had received the goods, the defendants were entitled to have delivery of them under the Act of 1862; they denied that the freight would be locked up for thirty days, as upon the goods being delivered to the defendants in proper order the dock company would pay over the amount less any damage for which the ship was liable. They also said they had acted in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and that they should act in the same manner in future, in order to avoid delay in settling claims.

On the same day, and before the service of the writ, the defendants wrote to the Docks Committee directing them to pay the plaintiffs the sum of 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, the corrected amount of the freight, less the sum of 15*s.* for "three barrels broken and plundered at 5*s.* each." On the 15th the agents of the Docks Committee tendered the plaintiffs the sum of 148*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, but the plaintiffs refused to accept it as the action had been commenced, and they did not admit their liability for the 15*s.*, and afterwards the 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* was paid into court in the action.

The defendants contended that the plaintiffs could not maintain the action against them, as they were not parties to the bill of lading, and that the shipper of the goods was not their agent; that they were only agents for the sale of the apples, and were not indorsees of the bill of lading within the meaning of the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111); that there was no express or implied promise on their part to pay the freight; and that at the time the action was commenced the plaintiffs had not delivered the goods to the defendants, and had not withdrawn their notice that they claimed a lien on the goods for the freight.

After the statement of defence had been delivered, the plaintiffs amended their statement of claim by claiming, in the alternative, a lien on the money deposited with the Docks Committee.

The action was tried by Day, J., who held that, as the defendants had taken delivery of the goods, there was an implied contract on their part to pay the freight, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs for 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*

From this decision the defendants appealed.

Channell, Q.C. and Cranstoun for the appellants.—Apart from the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 the appellants are not liable. The acceptance of the goods by them did not amount to an implied promise to pay the charges for freight:

Sanders v. Vanzeller, 4 Q. B. 260;
Kemp v. Clark, 12 Q. B. 647.

Besides which, the defendants having deposited the amount of the freight in accordance with the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862 cannot be sued for it. The words at the end of sect. 70, "without prejudice to any other remedy which the shipowner may have for the recovery of the freight," only apply to cases where the shipowner has a remedy by action on the bill of lading itself, and they do not apply to a consignee for sale, whose liability depends on a contract to be inferred from the circumstances of each particular case, and no promise to pay can be inferred when he deposits the amount claimed. On making the deposit the defendants were entitled under the statute to receive the apples. There is no consideration for any promise to pay the freight on delivery, and they are under no personal liability to pay it.

Pickford, Q.C. and H. F. Boyd for the respondents.—A contract by the defendants to pay the freight must be inferred from the circumstances of this case. By sect. 72 a right of action is given to the shipowner against every person coming within the definition of "owner of the goods;" and by sect. 66 that expression includes "every person who is for the time being entitled, either as owner or agent for the owner, to the possession of the goods." The defendants are therefore liable as owners under this section.

Channell, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—Lindley, L.J.—The question raised by this appeal is new and important. It is whether a mere consignee for sale of a cargo shipped abroad and delivered to him here out of a warehouse under a bill of lading is liable to be sued for the bill of lading freight, although he has deposited the amount of such freight under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63). To decide this question it is necessary to consider, first, his liability apart from that statute; and, secondly, his liability since it passed. Apart from the statute, the liability of a consignee or indorsee of a bill of lading to pay the bill of lading freight on delivery of the goods to him was and is clear and undoubted. Such liability arises from a real though tacit contract—a contract not expressed in the bill of lading, to which he is no party, but to be inferred from the conduct and obvious intentions of the shipowner and himself. It would be unbusinesslike and highly improbable that a shipowner would give up his lien for freight and deliver the goods to the consignee or indorsee unless he undertook to pay the freight, and it would be equally unbusinesslike and improbable that the consignee or indorsee would expect to obtain possession of the goods except upon the terms of paying the freight for which the shipowner had a lien upon them. A promise to pay is inferred as a matter of course from delivery unless there are other circumstances to rebut the inference. But the promise so inferred is, as already stated, a promise in fact, and not one of those so-called implied promises in law which are imputed irrespective of intention. This was settled in Sanders v. Vanzeller (ubi sup.) and Kemp v. Clark (ubi sup.). The consideration for the promise to pay the freight is the delivery of the goods to the consignee or indorsee of the bill of lading. The consideration is not the mere abandonment of the lien, but the delivery of the goods. The lien may be waived or even released under seal, and yet if the consignee or endorsee does not get delivery of the goods he will not be liable to pay the freight unless a distinct promise to pay it in consideration of a release of the lien as distinguished from a delivery of the goods can be proved. Such a promise is no doubt theoretically possible, but I do not suppose it has ever been heard of in business. It is, however, important to bear in mind that it is the delivery of goods which is the consideration for the consignee's promise to pay the freight, and, apart from the statute, a consignee named in a bill of lading or an indorsee of a bill of lading had to pay the bill of lading freight on delivery of the goods to him, unless he could show circumstances relieving him from this obligation, as in Smidt v. Tiden (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 891; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 307; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 446). If the consignee or indorsee is also the owner of the goods, he is liable to pay the freight as if he had entered into the contract contained in the bill of lading. But this liability has been imposed by statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, and does not depend on a contract to be inferred from the mere delivery of the goods to him.

Such being the liability of a consignee or indorsee of a bill of lading apart from the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862, I pass to consider the effect of that part of the Act which bears upon this question, viz., sect. 66 and those following. The object of the Legislature in passing this part of the Act will be found explained in Meyerstein v. Barber (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 569; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 420; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 38) and Mors-le-Blanch v. Wilson (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 415; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 605; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 227), where the inconveniences of landing goods in warehouses and so creating another lien are illustrated. In reading the statute it must be borne in mind that it is the duty of the consignee or indorsee of a bill of lading to be ready to receive the goods as soon as the ship arrives and the master is ready to deliver them. It is only where there has been failure on the part of the consignee or indorsee to take delivery direct from the ship on arrival that the necessity for warehousing the goods arises. Now by the Act in question provision is made (1) for enabling the owner of any ship arriving from foreign parts to land the goods on a wharf or in a warehouse (sect. 67); (2) for preserving his lien for freight and other charges on the goods so landed (sect. 68); (3) for the discharge of this lien, either by the production of a receipt or release from the shipowner (sect. 69), or by a deposit by the owner of the goods of the amount claimed for freight and other charges (sect. 70); (4) for the payment by the warehouseman to the shipowner of the whole deposit in fifteen days if there is no dispute between the shipowner and the owner of the goods as to the amount properly payable for the freight, &c. (sect. 71); (5) for the payment by the warehouseman to the shipowner of so much of the deposit as is admitted by the owner of the goods and for returning the balance to the owner of the goods unless the shipowner shall within thirty days take proceedings to recover the amount in dispute from the owner of the goods (sect. 72). Throughout these sections the expression "owner of the goods" includes agents entitled to the possession of the goods—e.g., consignees for sale (sect. 66). Now, in providing this machinery I can discover no indication of any intention on the part of the Legislature to alter the consignee's liability to pay the freight on delivery to him. Nay, more, the Legislature has expressly negatived any such intention. See the words at the end of sect. 70. It is contended, however, that these words can only apply to cases where the shipowner has a remedy by action on the bill of lading itself, and that they do not apply to a mere consignee for sale, whose liability depends on a contract to be inferred in each particular case from the circumstances of that case, and that no promise by him to pay freight can be inferred when he deposits the amount claimed. It is, moreover, urged that, as on making the deposit he is entitled by the statute to receive the goods, there is no consideration for any promise to pay the freight on delivery. This argument is ingenious, but to my mind not convincing. The introduction of the machinery of a deposit was for the benefit both of the shipowner and the consignee. It enables the shipowner to discharge his ship without risking the loss of his lien, and it enables the consignee to obtain the goods without waiting to settle disputes. But the deposit is not equivalent to payment; it is only a security for payment; and it is clear to my mind that the deposit was never intended to deprive the shipowner of any right of action which, apart from the deposit, he would have had against a consignee obtaining the goods. This is, I think, made plain by the language of sect. 72, which clearly contemplates and expressly authorises legal proceedings by the shipowner against the goods-owner for the recovery of money from him. The legal proceedings here referred to are such as were usual in such cases—viz., an action for the freight—and the statute has always been so construed. I do not say that a suit in equity by the shipowner against the consignee making the deposit and the warehouseman to obtain payment out of the deposit might not be had recourse to; on the contrary, I have no doubt it might, and in some cases—e.g., if the consignee were insolvent, or in such cases as Smidt v. Tiden—such mode of proceeding would be best. But no legislative enactment is required to give the shipowner such a remedy as this. Some provision, however, was necessary to give the shipowner a remedy against the consignee personally, as the deposit discharged the lien. Such a provision is found in sect. 72, even if sect. 70 is insufficient for the purpose, as perhaps it is, or would be if its construction were not aided by sect. 72. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63 preserves the liability which, but for the deposit made under its provisions, would have been incurred before it passed by an agent for sale to pay the bill of lading freight upon delivery of the goods to him.

The application of this view of the Act to the facts of the present case is easy. A cargo of apples belonging to someone in Canada was shipped in the plaintiffs' ship for carriage from Halifax to London. The apples were consigned to the defendants for sale, and by the bill of lading were made deliverable to them or their assigns, "freight and charges payable by consignees as per margin." The ship arrived in the Victoria Docks on Saturday, the 10th Dec. 1892. On the 12th the defendants heard of her arrival, and they paid the sum of 152*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.*, being the amount calculated by the defendants from the margin of the bill of lading, to the dock company, and at the same time the defendants gave the company notice not to part with the money until further instructions. All this was done before the apples were landed. They were landed on the 13th, and the defendants, having deposited enough, became entitled to take them away, but owing to a letter of the defendants of the 12th, the plaintiffs could not get the freight. On the 15th the writ in this action was issued by the plaintiffs against the defendants for 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, the amount of freight claimed for the apples landed. The difference between this sum and the 152*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* was some miscalculation, and is immaterial. After the writ was issued the defendants released the sum deposited, but it has not, as I understand, been accepted by the plaintiffs in consequence of these proceedings. The money has since been paid into court in this action. If I am right in the construction of the statute, the defendants are personally liable for the freight. This was the view taken by Day, J. Whether the true view is that the old liability remains notwithstanding the deposit, or that the statute has substituted a fresh liability for the old one wherever it would have existed but for the deposit, admits of some doubt, which, however, is of no importance in this case. Whichever view is theoretically the more correct, the defendants are wrong. Their contention has been throughout that, having made a sufficient deposit, they were entitled to have the apples, and were under no personal liability to pay the freight. If this contention were correct, the defendants would get the apples and the plaintiffs would not get the freight, which might be detained from them for some time. The contention of the defendants is not in accordance with the usual course of business, and this action has been brought in order to have the question of their liability decided. The decision ought, in my opinion, to be against the defendants, and their appeal ought therefore to be dismissed with costs.

SMITH, L.J.—The main question in this case is whether a shipowner who has carried goods in his ship from a foreign port to this country, and has landed them into warehouse, pursuant to sect. 67 of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862, can maintain an action at law for freight against a consignee of the goods named in a bill of lading who is agent for sale in this country of a foreign shipper, and to whom no property in the goods has passed, when such consignee has taken delivery of the goods ex warehouse, and made the deposit prescribed by the Act. The amount in dispute is small, but the question is one of considerable practical importance, for the point raised by the defendants is, whether a shipowner in the circumstances of the case is obliged to have recourse to the goods owner for his freight, and, if necessary, sue him upon the other side of the Atlantic; or whether he can sue in an action at law the receiver of cargo here, and thus settle all matters in dispute regarding the freight with him. The facts are as follows: The plaintiffs carried a consignment of apples in their steamship from Halifax, Nova Scotia, to London under a bill of lading which made them deliverable to the defendants or their assigns, he or they paying freight for the same in cash upon delivery; and it was also therein provided that the shipowners should be entitled to land the goods on the quays of the dock where the steamer should discharge immediately on her arrival. No property in the apples passed to the defendants, and consequently they were not bound by the contract contained in the bill of lading between the shipowners and the foreign shipper. The ship arrived in London on the 10th Dec. 1892. The defendants had made no entry, and were not at the discharging berth ready to take delivery of the apples ex ship; and thereupon the captain under the provisions of the Act of 1862 and of the bill of lading, as he lawfully might do, proceeded to land them into a warehouse of the London and India Docks Joint Committee, which, as Day, J. found, was completed upon the 13th Dec., before the writ in this action was issued. Upon the 12th Dec., and before the discharge into warehouse was completed, the defendants sent the following notice to the warehouse owners. [His Lordship then read the letter of the 12th Dec. and continued:] The 152*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* arose from the miscalculation by the defendants of what the freight would come to, it should have been 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* The dock company (who were the warehouse owners), upon receipt of the notice from the defendants, wrote to the plaintiffs as follows: [His Lordship then read the letter from the dock company of the 13th Dec. 1892, and continued:] The plaintiffs thereupon in the afternoon of the 13th Dec. issued the writ in this action claiming the freight due, 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, which was served upon the defendants upon the 14th Dec. 1892. The defendants having deposited the 152*l* 17*s.* 1*d.* with the dock company, and given the notice of the 12th Dec. 1892 as above mentioned, took delivery of the apples ex warehouse. They now assert that in these circumstances they are not liable to be sued at law by the plaintiffs for freight. They also assert that there were three broken and plundered barrels of apples; or, in other words, that there was a short delivery of three barrels, and consequently 15*s.* 3*d.* should be deducted from the freight of 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* They say that, having deposited the amount of freight claimed with the warehouse owners pursuant to the provisions of sects. 70 and 71 of the Act, no further liability attaches to them. Now, it cannot be doubted, if the defendants were consignees of the goods mentioned in the bill of lading, to whom the property therein had passed, that in the circumstances which exist in this case they could be sued here at law by the plaintiffs for freight, and that this question of 15*s.* would be decided in that action, and the deposit with the warehouse owners by the defendants of the freight claimed would be no answer at all. They would be liable by reason of the Bill of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), which transferred the contract contained in the bill of lading to them, and there is no dispute as to this. In my judgment it is also clear that, if the defendants had made entry and had taken delivery of the goods ex ship, they could have been successfully sued at law for freight by the plaintiffs, not upon the contract contained in the bill of lading, but by reason of having accepted the goods under the bill of lading, for this would be good evidence of a new contract to pay freight according to its terms, and any jury or judge would so hold. To repeat an expression of the late Willes, J., there are a bushel of authorities to support this proposition. The consideration for this new contract would be the shipowner parting with the goods to the consignee, and thereby abandoning his lien. It was, however, argued for the defendants that they were not liable to be sued, for they were neither consignees named in the bill of lading, to whom the property in the goods had passed, nor had they taken delivery of the goods ex ship, and that the circumstances under which they did take delivery of the goods afforded no evidence of a new contract to pay freight; and moreover, if they did, there was no consideration for such a contract, the shipowners' lien having been lost by reason of the deposit of the freight claimed by the defendants under the Act of 1862. I would point out that, if no legal proceedings can be maintained against the defendants, the strange result will follow by reason of the provisions of the Act, viz., that a consignee, by neglecting to make entry and to be ready at the ship's side to receive the goods he is about to receive, can compel a shipowner to resort to the warehousing clauses of the Act, and then, having made the deposit and thus obtained possession of the goods, can force the shipowner to sue the goods owner for freight wherever he may happen to be; whereas, if the consignee took the goods as he should, ex ship, he would be liable to be sued for freight; or in other words, if a consignee does what he ought to do he can be sued personally for freight, if he does what he ought not he cannot be That it is the duty of a consignee to be ready to take delivery is clear: (see Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company, 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 413; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 118; 4 Ex. Div. 165; and Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599.) In Meyerstein v. Barber (ubi sup.) Willes, J. traced the history of the warehousing clauses of the Act of 1862, and it will be seen that they were passed for the benefit of shipowners, and not of consignees. It appears to me not necessary to decide the point which was so much argued at the bar for the defendants, whether by taking delivery of the goods ex warehouse under the circumstances existing in this case they have afforded good evidence of a new contract for good consideration to pay the bill of lading freight, for in my judgment, when shipowners land goods into warehouse pursuant to the Act of 1862, and a consignee makes deposit, and thus gets rid of the shipowners' lien, and obtains possession of the goods, and gives the prescribed notice, sect. 72 of the Act designates such consignee as the person against whom legal proceedings to recover the amount of freight not admitted to be due, or otherwise for the settlement of any disputes which may have arisen concerning the same, are to be taken, and that these legal proceedings include at any rate an action at law. Sect. 67 of the statute of 1862 provides that, if the owner of goods imported in any ship from foreign ports to the United Kingdom (and the term "owner of goods" by sect. 66 includes a person for the time being entitled to the possession of the goods as agent for the owner, and exactly describes the defendants' position) fails to make entry of the goods, or having made entry thereof fails to land and take delivery of them with all convenient speed, the shipowners may make entry, and land the same at the time and subject to the conditions of the section. This, it is admitted, is what the shipowners in the case have rightfully done. By sect. 68 the shipowner, by giving the prescribed notice to the warehouse owner, may preserve his lien for freight which by sect. 69 is to continue until the freight is paid. Sect. 70, however, provides that an owner, which, as stated before, includes an agent for the owner entitled to the possession of the goods, may deposit with the warehouse owner the amount of freight claimed, and thereupon the shipowner's lien is discharged without prejudice to any other remedy which the shipowners may have for the recovery of the freight. If the Act had stopped here, the point as to whether the shipowners had or had not any remedy against the defendants upon a new contract would have necessarily arisen; but it does not stop here. Sect. 71 enacts that, if such deposit be made, and the person making the same does not within fifteen days give to the warehouse owner notice in writing to retain it (stating in such notice the sum, if any, which he admits to be payable to the shipowner, or, as the case may be, that he does not admit any such sum to be payable), the warehouse owner may at the expiration of fifteen days pay the deposit over to the shipowner. Sect. 72 provides for the case where the deposit has been made and the notice is given by the person who made the deposit. The warehouse owner is then to immediately apprise the shipowner of such notice, and pay to him out of the sum deposited the sum, if any, admitted to be payable to him, and retain the remainder; or, if no sum is admitted to be payable, then the warehouse owner is to retain the whole sum deposited for thirty days from the date of the notice, and at the expiration of such days, unless legal proceedings have in the meantime been instituted by the shipowner against the owner of the goods (which includes, as before pointed out, the agent for the goods owner who has made the deposit) to recover the sum not admitted to be due, or otherwise for the settlement of any disputes which may have arisen between them concerning the freight, the warehouse owner is to pay back to the goods owner or the agent, as the case may be, the sum about which the controversy has arisen. It will be noticed that the words of sect. 72 are: "Unless legal proceedings have in the meantime been instituted by the shipowner against the owner of the goods to recover" what is alleged to be due—that looks to me like an action at law —" or otherwise for the settlement of any dispute which may have arisen between them concerning the freight or other charges as aforesaid"—that is, the charges which are referred to in sect. 68, and are such for which the shipowner had a lien. In my judgment the effect of this legislation is, that a consignee who makes deposit, gives the prescribed notice, and takes delivery of the goods ex warehouse, is placed in precisely the same position as regards being sued in an action at law as a consignee who takes delivery of the goods ex ship, or of a consignee to whom the property in the goods has passed, and who takes delivery of them ex warehouse, and I can find no indication in the statute of making any distinction as regards liability for freight between different sorts of consignees who become receivers of cargo. On the contrary, in my judgment the provision in sect. 72, which enacts that legal proceedings may be taken against the person who makes the deposit, was expressly inserted in order that there should be no distinction. In my opinion the deposit by the consignee is to be made for the purpose of enabling him to obtain the goods with quick despatch, and is not, as is suggested by the defendants, for the purpose of freeing him from all liability relating to freight to be paid for their carriage. I cannot myself doubt that the legal proceedings mentioned in sect. 72 include at any rate actions at law. Whether they also include a suit in the old Court of Chancery (for in 1862, if proceedings in equity were taken, they must have been in that court) against the consignee in the nature of a bill filed by a mortgagee to establish his security and take the accounts, to which the warehouse owner would have had to be a party, I need not, as it seems to me, determine, though I think it would have been open to a shipowner to have taken that course if he had been so advised. The Act of 1862 was passed at a time when the procedure of the courts of common law and the Court of Chancery was wholly distinct, and I would point out that, although actions at common law for freight against receivers of cargo ex warehouse have been of constant occurrence, I do not myself know of a bill filed in the Court of Chancery for that purpose, which must have been the case if these proceedings were resorted to prior to 1873. Upon judgment being given in a common law action in cases where deposit of freight has been made, the practice has been, when the matter in dispute has been determined, to order the deposit money to be paid out to whomsoever it has been found by the result of the action to belong. In my judgment, for the reasons above, the plaintiffs have a right of action at law against the defendants personally, the point they now take is not sustainable, and Day, J. was right in the conclusion at which he has arrived.

Mr. Channell, in his able argument for the defendants, then took the point that the writ in the action was issued too soon, and that it should not have been issued till after the defendants had given the second notice, which they did to the warehouse owner on the 14th Dec.—not a very worthy point considering what it was the parties desired to have settled, and have had settled in a Superior Court upon a 15*s.* dispute, and I have satisfaction in thinking that it is not well founded. Mr. Channell argued that the notice of the 12th Dec. 1892 by the defendants to the warehouse owner was not a notice as required by sect. 71 of the Act, and that no action could be maintained until the goods owner had stated how much he admitted and how much he disputed of the freight claimed, and that this was not such a notice. In my judgment business men might well read this notice of the 12th Dec., as in fact the warehouse owner did read it, viz., a notice to retain the whole of the deposit, and that the defendants admitted nothing to be then due to the plaintiffs for freight, and the plaintiffs were therefore within their rights in issuing the writ as they did upon receipt of the communication from the warehouse owner. I should notice that up to the present moment the defendants have not admitted that their claim to the 15*s.* rebate of freight was erroneous, and it is only by means of an action that the plaintiffs can recover it. As was stated by Lord Chelmsford in Ireland v. Livingston (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 79, 80; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 395, 416), if, when construing a mercantile document which is susceptible of two meanings, the one party has bonâ fide adopted one of those meanings and acted upon it, it is not competent for the other afterwards to say that he intended the document to be read in the other sense of which it was equally capable. The other should have stated in the document what he did mean in clear and unambiguous terms. In my opinion the point about the writ having been issued two days too soon does not avail the defendants. The real point the parties intended to raise and have determined, which Mr. Channell told us had for some time been mooted, was, whether a receiver of cargo in the position of the defendants could be sued at all by the shipowners for freight. I am of opinion that they can, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

DAVEY, L.J.—In this case I have the misfortune to differ, not only from the learned judge in the court below, but also from my learned brethren on this bench. Needless to say that, in differing from the judges of far greater experience than I have in cases of this kind, I am almost certainly wrong. But, as I have formed an opinion on the construction and effect of the Act, I feel bound to express it. The writ in this action was issued on the 13th Dec. 1892, for the recovery from the defendants of 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* for freight due from the defendants to the plaintiffs on apples, the particulars of which are given. The question we have to decide is, whether the plaintiffs had a right of action against the defendants for the freight. The defendants are the consignees named in the bill of lading of the goods, but they were not the owners of the goods, and had no property in them. It is admitted that they were not parties to the contract contained in the bill of lading, and could not be sued upon that contract or under the provisions of the Bills of Lading Act. It was decided in Sanders v. Vanzeller (ubi sup.), and is established law, that acceptance of goods under a bill of lading does not by implication of law constitute an agreement to pay freight according to the bill of lading, but such an acceptance may be evidence (stronger or weaker, according to other circumstances) of a new contract to make the payments stipulated in the bill of lading. It is, however, conceded by the defendants that, when a consignee takes delivery from the master, a jury ought to find such a contract. The contract in such a case would be that, in consideration of the shipowner's delivering the goods and thereby waiving his lien, the consignee agrees to pay (see per Parke, B. in Young v. Moeller, 5 E. & B. 755, 760). The plaintiffs contend that such a contract ought to be implied in the present case, and of that opinion was the learned judge in the court below, and they say alternatively that a new right of action is given by sect. 72 of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862. What happened in the present case was this: The defendants did not make entry of the goods, and were not ready to take delivery over the ship's side. On the 12th Dec. the master gave notice to the dock company to take the goods and hold them for the freight under sect. 68 of the Act. On the same day the defendants handed to the dock company a cheque for 152*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.*, being the full amount of freight claimable under the bill of lading, as calculated by them, accompanied by a letter, which has been already read. This was intended to be a deposit under sect. 70. It has been contended that this letter was not intended to operate as a notice to retain the whole amount under sect. 71, but was merely an intimation that further instructions would be given in due course. The dock company certainly understood it as a notice to retain the whole, as shown by their letter to the shipowners. The notice is at best ambiguous, and in accordance with the sound principle laid down by the House of Lords in Ireland v. Livingston (ubi sup.), the defendants, who were the authors of it, cannot complain of its being so understood. I shall assume, for the purpose of my judgment, that it was a retainer of the whole freight, but subject to be afterwards modified or qualified by another notice. The learned judge found that the goods were delivered by noon of the 13th Dec. to the dock company, and were afterwards delivered by the dock company to the defendants. Sect. 70 of the Act is as follows: [His Lordship read sect. 70, and continued:] The effect of the deposit made by the defendants, which was in excess of the sum actually claimed, was therefore to discharge the shipowners' lien on the goods, and the plaintiffs ceased from the time when the deposit was made and the goods delivered to the dock company to have any further interest in or control over the goods. They had no power to interfere with the delivery of the goods to the defendants by the dock company. In other words, I am of opinion that from the time of completion of the combined transactions of the deposit by the defendants and the delivery by the plaintiffs to the dock company, the plaintiffs exchanged their lien or right of retainer of the goods for an active lien or right to obtain payment out of the sum deposited, but they retained any other remedy which they had at that time for recovery of the freight. Had they at that time a right of action for the freight against the defendants, or was there any evidence of a contract by the defendants to pay the freight? I think not. I do not see any materials out of which such a contract could be implied. There was no consideration for such an implied contract. The lien was discharged by the statute, and if it be said the plaintiffs gave up their lien by delivery to the dock company to the order of the defendants, that may conceivably have been in consideration of the defendants having discharged the lien by making the deposit, but certainly was not in consideration of the defendants entering into a new contract to make themselves personally liable to pay over again. It may be further observed that the delivery to the order of the defendants when the lien was discharged (as it was by the statute) was in pursuance and performance of the original contract between the shipper and the shipowner. The shipowners retain all their existing remedies, but they do not so far acquire any new right of action under a new contract. But it is said that by sect. 66 the expression "owner of goods" includes every person who is for the time being entitled as owner or agent for the owner to the possession of the goods, subject in the case of a lien (if any) to such lien. This is true; but it does not, of course, make the person entitled as agent liable to whatever rights of action the real owner would be liable to. It was then contended that sect. 72 gives the same right of action against every person coming within the definition of owner, as the shipowner has against the owner, because (as I understand the argument) such a construction is necessary in order to work the machinery of the section. The section is an important one. The material words for the present purpose are, "at the expiration of such thirty days, unless legal proceedings have in the meantime been instituted by the shipowner against the owner of the goods to recover the said balance or sum, or otherwise for the settlement of any dispute which may have arisen between them concerning such freight." It is said that this contemplates that legal proceedings may be instituted by the shipowners against the persons included in the expression "the owner of the goods," in which I agree; but it is further said that no effectual proceedings can be had unless you imply a right of action for the freight against (among others) the consignee, and that it would be absurd in a case like the present to relegate the shipowner to his action against the foreign or (it may be) unknown principal. If I thought this the necessary result of not holding that the shipowner has a right of action for the freight against the consignee, I might yield to the argument, notwithstanding the difficulty which I felt in saying that a new right of action can be given by such words as I find in sect. 72. But I do not think it is, and, curiously enough, an illustration of what seems to me to be the true answer to the argument is to be found in an amendment made by the present plaintiffs in their statement of claim. I am of opinion that the effect of the group of clauses under consideration, and particularly sect. 72, is to give the shipowner a right to be paid his freight out of the sum deposited, which, subject to such payment, belongs to the person who made the deposit. Call it what you will, it is a security to him for his freight; and I think he has the same right as any other security holder to take legal proceedings against the person entitled to the subject-matter of the security subject to the charge, to have his right declared and the amount due to him ascertained and raised and paid out of the property charged. It will be observed that the words of the section are "legal proceedings" not only "to recover the balance or sum," but "or otherwise for the settlement of any disputes which may have arisen between them concerning such freight." These words seem to me to exactly describe such legal proceedings in the nature of a mortgagee's suit as I have mentioned above, and I have no doubt such an action could be maintained. Inasmuch, therefore, as it is not, in my opinion, necessary in order to work the machinery of sect. 72 to imply a right of action for freight against the consignee where it does not exist apart from the section, I do not think that such a right of action ought to be implied or is given by sect. 72. The plaintiffs' claim was, and is, for 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* The defendants, after action brought, direct the dock company to tender a sum less than that by 15*s.* only, which was refused. On the 3rd June 1893 the plaintiffs amended their claim by claiming a lien. No question is raised as to the propriety or regularity of this amendment, and, in my opinion, there being this dispute about 15*s.*, it was the proper course for the plaintiffs to take in order to settle the dispute which had arisen between them concerning the freight. The result is, in my opinion, that the action as originally framed was misconceived, and down to the amendment the plaintiffs were wrong; but I think the plaintiffs on their amended statement of claim are entitled to a judgment for payment to them of the amount of their claim, which is now admitted, out of the fund which has been brought into court, but not to a personal judgment against the defendants. As the appeal will, of course, be dismissed with costs, it is unnecessary for me to say how I think the costs of the action should be borne.

Solicitors for the appellants, Devereux and Heiron.

Solicitors for the respondents, Crump and Son.

Nov. 24 and 28, 1893.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.)

The Industrie. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Carriage of goods—Foreign ship—Construction of charter-party—Sale of part of cargo at port of distress—Right of shipowner to full freight—Conflict of English and foreign law—Law of the flag.

The plaintiffs, who were German subjects domiciled in Germany and owners of a German steamship, entered into a charter-party with the defendants, who were British subjects, through their (the plaintiffs') agent, a German subject, whereby the defendants chartered the steamship Industrie for the carriage of a cargo of rice in bags from abroad to a port in England for orders. The charter-party, which was made in London, and was in the English language, contained all the provisions usually found in English charter-parties; and also the following words, "freight being payable at and after the rate of 35s. sterling per ton of 20cwt. delivered . . . all freight to be paid on right delivery of the cargo if discharged in the United Kingdom in cash as customary, if on the Continent in cash at the exchange of the day of final discharge without discount."

The ship proceeded to her port of loading, and there took on board a cargo of rice belonging to the defendants, and on her homeward voyage, having encountered bad weather, put into a port of distress, when it was found that the cargo had sustained damage, and the master, acting under the advice of surveyors, sold part of the cargo as being unfit for reshipment.

In an action by the shipowner to recover full freight on the damaged cargo which was sold:

(a) Reported by Butler Aspinall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (reversing the decision of Barnes, J.), that the defendants were not liable, as the charter-party must be construed as an English contract according to English law, and that the law of the flag did not apply, and that the payment of freight being expressly dealt with in the charter-party, none was recoverable in respect of cargo not delivered at the port of destination.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Barnes, J. in favour of the plaintiffs' claim for 121*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.*, being the freight on 746 bags of rice belonging to the defendants, which were sold in consequence of their having sustained damage, by the master of the vessel the German ship Industrie, at a port of refuge. The charter-party was entered into on the 29th July 1891 by the defendants, merchants in London, as charterers, and by Lloyd Jones and Co., who also carry on business in London, acting as brokers for Carl Winters, one of the owners of the Industrie, a German subject domiciled in Germany, but who occasionally visited England on business. The charter-party was in English on one of the defendants' ordinary forms, and was signed in London. By it the Industrie, described as under German colours, with Kirchhoff as master, now at Rouen, was, after discharging outward cargo, to proceed to Diamond Island for Bassein, for orders . . . to load at . . . Bassein . . . from the agents of the freighters . . . a full and complete cargo of cargo rice and (or) cleaned rice and (or) broken rice in bags not exceeding 2250 tons net intake weight . . . and being so loaded . . . proceed to Scilly, Falmouth, Plymouth, or Cowes . . . for orders . . . to discharge . . . in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg . . . freight to be payable at and after the rate of 35*s.* sterling per ton of 20cwt. net delivered.

The charter-party then made provision for the payment of a reduced freight in the event of the vessel being ordered to a direct port, and then after the ordinary exceptions including the "act of God" proceeded:

The freight to be paid on right delivery of the cargo if discharged in the United Kingdom in cash as customary . . . and if on the Continent in cash at the exchange of the day of final discharge without discount . . . the liability of the charterers to cease as soon as the cargo is on board, provided the same is worth the freight at the port of discharge, but the owners of the ship to have an absolute lien for freight, dead freight, and demurrage, and any other claim they may have under the charter-party, which lien they should be bound to exercise.

On the 5th April 1892 bills of lading in English were signed by the master at Bassein, for a cargo of rice in bags deliverable to the order of the defendants, the freight and all other conditions to be in accordance with the charter-party, which was referred to in the bills of lading. On the 8th April the vessel sailed, and meeting with bad weather, the master for the safety of the ship and cargo put into Port Elizabeth, where part of the cargo was landed, and of this 746 bags were found on survey to be damaged to an extent rendering them unfit for reshipment. These were accordingly sold by the master, and the proceeds applied towards his expenses at Port Elizabeth. The vessel subsequently proceeded on her voyage and delivered her cargo at Liverpool. All the freight except that on the bags sold at Port Elizabeth was recovered from the consignees, and for this the present action was brought.

The case was argued on a written admission of facts, in which it was agreed that, for the purpose of showing what was the German law applicable (if any) to the case, either side might refer to the provisions of the German Code of Mercantile Law, and to the evidence given in the case of The August as reported in the law reports (66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 32; (1891) P. 328; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 110).

Joseph Walton, Q.C. for the plaintiffs, the shipowners.

Carver for the defendants, the owners of the cargo sold at Port Elizabeth.

July 11.—Barnes, J.—The first question to determine is whether the contract is English or German. The defendants say that the charter-party being made in England on an English form, was an English contract, and, as according to English law the freight on the 746 bags of rice, sold in the port of distress, would not be recoverable not even as pro ratâ freight, the case of the plaintiff fails. The plaintiff does not dispute that, if the contract is English, he is not entitled to sue; but he contends that, as this contract was made by a German shipowner domiciled in Germany (though made through his agent) for the employment of a German ship on an ocean voyage, the contract must be treated as a German contract in accordance with the decisions which have been given in the courts. I think it is unnecessary to deal with those decisions at any length, because they have been reviewed by Lord Hannen very fully in the case of The August (66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 32; (1891) P. 328; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 110). The cases referred to by him are Lloyd v. Guibert (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; Law Rep. 1 Q. B. 115), The Gaetano and Maria (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 835; 7 P. Div. 137; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 470, 535), and Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Company (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 10 Q. B. Div. 521; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65); and although the point in the case of The August (ubi sup.) was not distinctly whether or not the contract itself was a German contract, but whether or not the master of the August was entitled to act in conformity with the law of the flag of the ship, or only in conformity with the English law, the judgments to which Lord Hannen refers, I think, cover the point of the contract as well as the other point. The effect of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in The Gaetano and Maria (ubi sup.) and Lord Hannen's judgment is to confirm what was said by Willes, J. in Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.), and although I am correct, I think, in saying that in both these cases the contract was made by the master, Willes, J. in Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.) says in effect, as I read his language, that it make no difference whether the contract was made by the master himself or by the owner. I noticed that in the course of the argument it was stated that in Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.) the charter was on a French form; but I have been unable myself to find where that suggestion comes from, unless it be from the passage in the judgment of Lindley, L.J. in Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands, &c. (ubi sup.). The language used in the pleadings, I should have thought, rather led to the inference that the charter was in fact on an English form, because it expresses that it was for a voyage from St. Marc in Hayti to Havre, London, or Liverpool, at the charterers' option, and there is no indication given of that contract being in the French form. The effect of those cases, and especially of Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.), is, that in the charter of a foreign ship the convenience of commerce and the desirability of having a certain rule upon which to act require that, unless there is something in the contract to show the contrary, the law of the flag should prevail. No doubt it is a question of intention. Counsel for the defendants asks me to infer the intention that it was an English contract because it was made in England and made on an English form. The plaintiff, on the other hand, asks me to treat it as coming under the general rule and affirming an intention that it should be a German contract because it was in fact made by the German owners of a German ship, which must sail under a German master, and because, in the course of that voyage, a German master must have to act in accordance with the law of his flag in such circumstances as arose in the case of The August (ubi sup.), and therefore there was nothing to show that the intention of the parties was other than—and that I ought to infer that it was in fact—an intention to apply the law of the flag to this contract. In my judgment this view is correct, and the contract ought to be treated in this case as governed by the German law. The second point raised by the defendants is, that even if the contract is governed by German law, inasmuch as it only provides for the payment of freight on delivery, it is in its terms inconsistent with the application of any provision that freight should be payable in such a case as this, and that, as the contract itself provides for the cases in which payment is to be made, no other freight is properly to become payable under the circumstances. I do not think that is a true conclusion to arrive at. I have looked through the translation of the German Code in Dr. Wendt's book (papers on Maritime Legislation, by E. E. Wendt, 3rd edit. 1888), and it will be found there in numerous sections that the scheme of the code would seem to be to allow the parties to contract in such a way as they please, and then to provide for matters they have left undealt with. One meets with the term in the code, "When no agreement to the contrary has been made," then such and such consequences should follow. It seems to me, therefore, that it may well be that, if the contract deals with certain specific payments on delivery and so forth, it may be supplemented by the provisions of the code, where the parties themselves have not made any particular bargain on the subject. The third and last point raised before me was, whether or not full freight is payable by German law under such circumstances as these—namely, when cargo is discharged at the port of refuge into which the vessel puts for repairs, and is necessarily sold or justifiably sold because its condition requires it. I confess that unaided I should have felt very great doubt as to what was the German law upon this point. After reference to the articles of this code which relate to this subject—viz., articles 638 and 640 [the material parts of these sections are as follow:—Art 638: When the incident occurs after the commencement of the voyage the charterer shall pay the full freight for such portion of the cargo as is concerned therein, even when the master has been compelled to discharge such portion in a different port from the port of destination, and when he has subsequently continued the voyage with or without delay. Art. 640: In case the vessel must be repaired during the voyage the charterer may at his option either take delivery of the whole cargo at the place where the vessel is staying on paying the full freight and the other claims of the shipowner (art. 615), and on paying or securing the claims stated in art. 616, or he may wait until the repairs have been completed . . .] I should have felt some doubt as to the construction to be put upon them, though my inclination would have been in favour of the plaintiff's contention; but the parties have been good enough to relieve me from difficulty. In the case of The August (ubi sup.), in which I was engaged as counsel, Mr. Hermann Hildebrand, a German advocate practising at Bremen, was examined, and I am sure no one who was present in court when he was examined can fail to have been impressed by the extremely able manner in which he gave his evidence: and Lord Hannen, in referring to his evidence, says, "I may add that Mr. Hildebrand appeared to me to give his evidence with intelligence, and candour, and without bias in favour of the party by whom he was called;" and although the agreement between the parties in this case at first was that either side might refer to the provisions of the German Code of Mercantile Law, and to the evidence given in the case of The August (ubi sup.) as reported in the Law Reports, it will be found upon reference to that report that Mr. Hildebrand's evidence in connection with freight is not set out in consequence of the fact that, after hearing his evidence, I as counsel for the plaintiff thought I could not maintain the contrary of what he had said in connection with the subject of freight. Now I understand no shorthand note was preserved of his evidence; but I recollected that my junior at that time (Mr. Hollams) had taken a note of the evidence, and I have asked the parties to allow me to refer to those notes and they have been furnished to me by both parties, and Mr. Hildebrand's evidence on the second head, viz., whether a full freight would be payable is as follows—of course it is in the form of a note of the witnesses' evidence: "If condemnation justified, then full freight would be payable"—he refers to art. 504 (cf. Lord Hannen's judgment in The August, 66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 35)—"The master in selling is agent for cargo owner, and if owner had sold he would have had to pay full freight"; and he quotes the cases of Maurice and Co. v. Perger and Co. on behalf of the Helvetia Insurance Company (Kierulf's decisions in the Lübeck Court of Appeal (1870), vol. 6, p. 350); Lichtenberg v. Kormer (vol. 25 of decisions (1878) p. 6); Guiricke v. Nord Deutscher Lloyd (vol. 14 of decisions (1884), p. 34). That was the evidence, and according to the note. it appears that, after hearing it, I cross-examined him at length on the other parts of the case. The note proceeds thus: I said, "If German law applies and sale is justified, I do not dispute the payment of full freight." I therefore hold that in this case there is a contract according to the German law, that this law will allow of the supplementing of the terms of the charter where provision is not made in it as to what is to happen at the port of distress, and that according to that law freight under such circumstances as those in this case would be payable in full on the cargo which was sold at Port Elizabeth. My judgment must therefore be for the plaintiff with costs.

The defendants appealed.

Carver for the appellants.—The case of The August (ubi sup.) does not govern the present case. All that was there decided was, that the law of the flag was the law which the master of a foreign ship was entitled to follow, when the contract of affreightment does not provide otherwise. The intention of the parties must be looked to; the intention here was that this charter-party should be regarded as an English contract; it contains the terms and exceptions usually found in English contracts, e.g., "the act of God," which is not found in German charter-parties. The equivalent expression in a German charter-party would be vis major, which has not the same meaning as "act of God:"

Nugent v. Smith, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 827; 1 C. P. Div. 423; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. N. S. 198.

If this contract is to be governed by English law, it is clear no freight is payable except on cargo delivered at the port of destination. He also referred to

Lloyd v. Guibert, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115;

Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, &c. v Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 10 Q. B. Div. 521; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65;

Missouri Steamship Company, 58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 377; 42 Ch. Div. 321; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 423;

Vhirboom v. Chapman, 13 M. & W. 230;

The Gaetano and Maria, 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 835; 7 P. Div. 137; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 470, C. A. 535.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. for respondents.—The vessel being a German vessel the acts of the master are to be governed by the law of the flag:

The Gaetano and Maria (ubi sup.).

The fact that the exceptions are in the usual English form is not conclusive. In Russell v. Niemann (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786; 17 C. B. N. S. 163; 34 L. J. 10, C. P.), the expression "King's enemies" was held, in the case of a Mecklenburg ship, to mean the enemies of the Duke of Mecklenburg. The payment of freight is also to be determined by the law of the flag; by German law, when the contract is silent, it will be supplemented by the provisions of the code; according to the evidence of the expert in The August (ubi sup.) the shipowners would be able to recover full freight here. He also referred to Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands, &c. (ubi sup.);

Russell v. Niemann, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786; 17 C. B. N. S. 163; 34 L. J. 10, C. P.;

Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.).

Lord Esher, M.R.—This case turns entirely on the one question whether the defendants are liable to pay certain freight. The charter-party, which is the contract of carriage, is in writing, and therefore it is for the court to construe it; and the court under one set of circumstances must construe it according to one set of canons of construction, and in another set of circumstances according to another set. If a foreign contract is brought before an English court, the court has to construe that foreign contract; but it must be construed according to the canons of construction used in the country to which the contract belongs, or, as we say, according to the place where it is made. Therefore the first question is this: Is this contract as a matter of construction to be construed according to the canons of English construction, or according to the canons of German construction. It is a contract made for the carriage of goods on board a German ship. Is that conclusive to show that it is to be construed according to German canons of construction? It seems to me that it is not conclusive, and that you must look at a great many more circumstances to see what is the canon to be applied. The mere fact of its being written in English will not enable the court to say that it is not a German contract. It might be made with the master abroad for the use of his ship from one foreign country to another foreign country, so as to have nothing to do with England at all. If it were so, and the only fact to rely on was that the contract was written in the English language, I should think it would be construed according to the canons of the law of the country of the ship. It would be made under the flag just as if it were made in the country to which the ship belongs. But where you find a great many other matters come in, you have to consider them. This is no doubt a contract in regard to carriage on board a German ship, but it is made between a German owner and the proposing English shipper, and it is made by means of a charter-party in writing; the instrument being headed with the English words "Charter-party." It is made in London, the contract is negotiated between two English houses, the English brokers authorised by the German owner, and the defendants the shippers who are English merchants. It is made on an ordinary English form of charter-party. Whether an ordinary German charter-party is at all in the form of an English charter-party I do not know. But this is on an ordinary English form of charter-party, and every stipulation in it is an ordinary stipulation in an English charter-party. The words or phrases used are peculiar to England. One has been particularly noticed, namely, "the act of God." That is an English phrase and has an English meaning. I care not whether there are words in a German charter-party agreeing with that; but it seems almost agreed that there are not. In the same way there are the words "the Queen's enemies." If this was a German charter-party I do not doubt that "the Queen" would mean "the Emperor of Germany" in accordance with the decision in Russell and Niemann (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786; 17 C. B. N. S. 163). But it is a thing to be taken notice of when you are trying to determine whether the document is an English or a German document; and then when you find the terms used are applicable to England and not applicable to Germany, it goes a great way to show that the document is to be construed as English. It is not, therefore, on any one of the facts which I have stated that reliance is to be placed, but on all of them together. What is the true inference? In order to see that, you must make up your mind what must have been the intention of the parties. You cannot look into the minds of these people; but when you have two men of business dealing in that way, under such circumstances, with a contract made in London, between English brokers and an English firm, who are not supposed to know German law, but who are supposed to know English mercantile law; with a contract made in English form and on a printed form in common use; with a contract made with nothing but English phrases in it, and with a contract made with phrases peculiar to English contracts, what inference can be drawn but that these two people must have meant that this contract was to be construed according to English law? All the circumstances together show that the intention was to make an English contract, and that is all we want. It has been admitted, and I think, for the reasons I have given, rightly admitted, that this written contract must be judged by English canons.

Then, if it is to be construed according to English canons of construction, we have to construe the phrase which deals with the payment of freight. It is not as if the payment was not dealt with in the contract. It is dealt with, and we have to construe the meaning of the phrase in which it is dealt with, and that phrase is "freight to be paid on right delivery of cargo;" that is an ordinary English phrase in common use in contracts of affreightment, whether they be bills of lading or charter-parties. Counsel for the plaintiff wishes to read it thus: "Payment to be made on right delivery of cargo, if discharged in the United Kingdom;" in other words "if discharged nowhere else." I cannot read it so. I do not think that is the right construction. It is freight to be paid on right delivery of cargo, wherever the destination is. But as to the mode in which it is to be paid if discharged in the United Kingdom, it is to be paid in cash as customary, and if discharged elsewhere in cash at the exchange of the day. That is to say, the freight when due is to be paid in English money. If it is to be paid in England, it is to be paid of course in cash; and if it is to be paid abroad, the payment is to be equal to cash in England, by reason of its being at the exchange of the day. Therefore you have now, if that be the true construction, to construe according to the canons of English construction the phrase "freight to be paid on right delivery of cargo." For long years that common phrase in ordinary English charter-parties and bills of lading has been construed in but one way, viz., that it is an affirmative sentence which by implication contains the negative. It means payment of freight on right delivery of the cargo at the port of destination. That is the affirmative construction. The second is, that it contains this negative by necessary implication, viz., that no freight is to be paid if there is no delivery of cargo. If it is, then, by necessary implication, it is common knowledge that it is the same as if it was written there in terms. Therefore, you have the liability to pay freight, and the obligation to pay freight dealt with in a written contract, and you are to construe it in the way I state. There is to be no freight payable unless the cargo is delivered at the port of destination, and that that has been the common reading of charter-parties and bills of lading cannot be denied. The cargo may be lost by perils of the sea, part may be lost or the whole. It may be jettisoned rightly or justifiably; it may be sold justifiably or not, and it may be delivered in an intermediate port, whether a port of distress or not, if the skipper is there, and if the shipowner agrees to deliver it to him and he agrees to take it at an intermediate port. In all these cases when the ship arrives at her port of destination, there being by reason of any one of these things no cargo to deliver or a short cargo to deliver, on the true construction of the written contract no freight is payable in respect of that part of the cargo. or the whole which is not delivered. With regard to the payment of freight, therefore, it is immaterial how it is comes that the cargo is not there. The cargo is not there, and that is all. But if the cargo is dealt with by the shipowner or his captain before the ship arrives, it is lost to the consignees. If he brings an action for the loss of his cargo, he is met in the different cases I have described in different ways. If he brings an action for the non-delivery of cargo, the captain says: "I jettisoned your cargo for the safety of all concerned. There is an exception in the bill of lading which says, I am not to be liable for jettisoning cargo which is justifiably jettisoned. If I have jettisoned cargo without proper justification, my shipowner is liable to you for the loss of your cargo. If I jettisoned it justifiably he is not liable." If the master has put into a port of distress and rightly sold your cargo, you cannot sue him for the sale, loss, or non-delivery of it, because by the maritime law, if he is in a port of distress and the cargo is in a particular condition and must be sold, he has a right to sell. It is immaterial whether he sells as agent of the cargo owner or by reason of his right as captain. If it is a justifiable sale, the owner of the cargo cannot maintain an action against the shipowner for it. If the sale is justifiable under the circumstances, the owner of the cargo must settle with his underwriter on cargo, but he cannot sue the shipowner. Whether the captain at the port of distress is or is not justified must be determined as in the case of the Gaetano and Maria (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 835; 7 P. Div. 137; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 470, 535), not by reason of any words in the contract of affreightment, but by reason of the right which he has outside that contract altogether—in his right, as captain, to deal with damaged cargo in a port of distress. That case shows that his power and authority to sell must be determined by the law of his country, whether he has made an English contract or a contract under the flag. That does not interfere with the contract for the payment of freight, which is wholly independent of that and deals only with the state of things actually existing when the ship arrives at the port of destination; and the meaning of the words in the charter-party is that there and then, if you are ready and willing to deliver, you are entitled to your freight. If you are not ready and cannot deliver you are not entitled to it. It seems to me that that is the true construction of the charter-party with regard to the payment of freight, and therefore I cannot agree with the able and learned judge who decided this case. I felt some hesitation for a long time because he decided the matter; but I cannot agree with him. I think that this contract is to be determined according to the canons of construction always in use; therefore, that these defendants were not liable to pay freight in respect of the cargo not delivered, and that we must disagree with the judge below, and say that judgment ought to have been entered for the defendants.

Lopes and Kay, L.JJ. concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Solicitors for the respondent, Field, Roscoe, and Co.

Jan. 25, 26, and Feb. 7, 1894.

(Before Lindley, Kay, and Smith, L.JJ.)

Aitken, Lilburn, and Co. v. Ernsthausen and Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Full cargo not loaded—Damages—Freight on cargo loaded by shipowner

By a charter-party the defendants contracted, except prevented by fire, to load the plaintiffs' ship with a full cargo of jute at 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d. per ton, but the captain was to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charter-party or to the owners' lien, provided the bill of lading freight in the aggregate fully covered the freight due under the charter-party. The defendants had shipped* 7545 bales of jute, when a fire broke out and destroyed 5458 of the bales and delayed the sailing of the ship. The freight specified in the bills of lading for the goods burnt was 1*l.* 5*s. per ton. The defendants then refused to ship any more goods, and the plaintiffs filled the ship with cargo, some at* 1*l.* 5*s. per ton, and some at a lower rate. The plaintiffs having brought this action to recover damages for breach of the charter-party by the defendants in not having loaded a full cargo:*

Held (affirming the decision of Pollock, B.), that with regard to the bales burnt, each party had pro tanto fulfilled their respective obligations under the charter-party, and the defendants were under no liability to pay freight for the bales burnt, nor bound or entitled to reload cargo to take their place; and that the freight received by the plaintiffs for the cargo shipped by them in the space formerly occupied by the burnt bales ought not to go in reduction of any damages payable by the defendants.

Held also, that the fire only absolved the defendants from payment of so much of the freight as would have been actually received for the goods burnt, viz., 1*l.* 5*s. per ton, and not* 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d. per ton.*

This action was brought by shipowners to recover damages for a breach of charter-party by the defendants in not having loaded the plaintiffs' ship with a full and complete cargo in accordance therewith. The defendants by their pleadings traversed the breach, and also set up that by reason of a fire which had broken out on board the ship at the port of loading they were absolved from the performance of their contract. By way of amended defence they subsequently, whilst denying liability, paid 775*l.* into court.

The case came to trial before Pollock, B. at the Guildhall, when the breach was admitted, and the sole question which had then to be tried was the amount of damages, if any, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. Pollock, B. found that the amount paid into court was sufficient, and gave judgment for the defendants, and ordered the 775*l.* to be paid out to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs appealed, upon the ground that Pollock, B. should have held that the sum paid into court was not sufficient, and should have given judgment for them in excess of that amount. The defendants also appealed, upon the ground that the learned judge should have found that the plaintiffs had suffered no damage at all, and that the 775*l.* should have been ordered to be paid out to them, or, in the alternative, some portion of it.

By a charter-party dated 17th Nov. 1891, the plaintiffs and the defendants contracted that, except prevented by fire, the plaintiffs' ship, the Loch Broom, should receive from the defendants, and that the defendants should load at Calcutta, a full and complete cargo of jute in bales, each bale not exceeding 400lb. net weight, and not exceeding in measurement at the time of shipment an average of fifty-two cubic feet for five bales, and that the plaintiffs should deliver the same at Dundee. Freight was to be paid in cash at the rate of 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per ton on right delivery of the cargo, and the captain was to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charter-party or to the owners' lien, provided that the bill of lading freight in the aggregate should fully cover the freight due under the charter-party. A full and complete cargo of jute under this charter-party would have consisted of 15,061 bales, which at 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per ton would have earned a freight of 5647*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* The defendants commenced to load a cargo of jute in bales pursuant to the charter, when a fire broke out and destroyed 5458 of 7545 bales which had then been shipped by the defendants. They thereupon refused to continue loading the ship, asserting that, by reason of the fire which had taken place, they were absolved from further performance of their contract. This position, however, as before stated, the defendants abandoned at the trial, and admitted that they were bound to have loaded the residue of the cargo which they had not loaded when the fire broke out.

Bigham, Q.C. and Leck for the plaintiffs; Reid, Q.C. and A. T. Lawrence for the defendants.

Feb. 7.—Lindley, L.J.—The judgment which will be read by Smith, L.J. is to be taken as being also mine.

Kay, L.J.—Under the charter-party in this case the total freight which would have been due, if no accident had occurred, was 5647*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, being the freight of 15,061 bales of jute, at 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per ton; 7545 bales were supplied by the shippers. Of these 5458 were burnt. This accident was excepted by the charter-party, so that those bales were lost to the shippers, and the freight in respect of them was lost to the shipowners. The freight lost, at 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per ton, would be 2046*l.*, and, deducting this from the total freight 5647*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, there would remain 3601*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* as the total freight to which the shipowners were entitled under the charter-party. The owners have received on bills of lading for the shippers' cargo actually carried 725*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*, and also 343*l.* 15*s.* cash paid by the shippers, making together 1069*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.* Deduct this from the 3601*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* freight due under the charter-party, and there remains 2532*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* The charterers broke their contract by not shipping any more jute than the 7545 bales. The owners shipped cargo on their own behalf, for which they received freight amounting to 2862*l.* 7*s.* Upon the whole voyage, therefore, the owners suffered no damage, except that they lost part of the freight on the burnt goods. The general rule is, that when such a breach by non-delivery of cargo occurs, the owners are entitled to damages to the amount of the freight thereby lost. But if they fill up the ship on their own account the amount of freight so earned goes in reduction of such damages: (Smith v. M'Guire, 3 H. & N. 554, 565.) This general rule is not denied, but it is argued that it does not apply to the cargo put into the space left vacant by the burnt bales. The shippers were not bound to refill this space; and the owners, it is argued, might use it on their own account to recoup themselves the amount of freight which they would otherwise lose by the fire. That is, the charter-party should be treated as if, in the event which happened, it was for a portion of the ship only, excluding the part left vacant by the fire, and the shippers cannot claim that the freight for goods carried in that part of the ship should be deducted from the damages for which they are liable. The question is a nice one, and seems to be untouched by authority. Suppose the charter-party to have been for half the carrying capacity of the ship, the owners being at liberty to use the other half, and that the shippers only supplied goods enough for a quarter, so that half the freight was due as damages, and suppose that the owners could not obtain cargo for more than their own half of the ship, it would be manifestly unjust to deprive them of any part of the freight for that half in reduction of the damages payable by the shippers. I am inclined to think that is perfectly analogous to the position of affairs under this charter-party after the occurrence of the fire. The charter-party was, under the actual circumstances, for a portion of the ship only, excluding that portion which the fire rendered vacant. The space so left I think the owners might use in any way consistent with the voyage—that is, they might ship, as they did, cargo on their own behalf for the same voyage in that part of the ship, and the freight for that cargo ought not to go in reduction of the damages payable by the shippers. The damages, in this view, can only be reduced by the freight obtained by the shippers for that portion of the ship which the shippers ought to have filled. This, the owners say, was 1710*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.* They claim to deduct as commission for procuring the new freight 65*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* But the owners contend that the burnt goods must not be treated as though the freight for them was at the rate of 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per ton. In fact, it was less by about 128*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, as is shown by the bills of lading. The charter-party allowed the shippers to fill the ship at any rates they pleased, so that the whole freight reached 5647*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, and in fact the cargo put on board was shipped at a lower rate. I think the owners are right, and that the fire only absolved the shippers from so much of the freight as would have been actually received for the goods burnt, and that this 128*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* ought to be added to the damages in favour of the owners. Another question is, whether the owners can take the average freight per ton of what they themselves shipped, or whether they ought not to take 25*s.* per ton. This is the rate which in their own accounts they did credit the shippers with as against the damages claimed. Charging 25*s.* per ton, the sums to deduct from the 5647*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* are: Bill of lading, 2644*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*; cash, 343*l.* 15*s.*; 7516 bales at 25*s.*, 1879*l.*; total deduction, 4867*l.* 7*s.* 6d., leaving 780*l.* 10*s.* Add commission, 65*l.* 15*s.* 3*d.*—846*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* The sum paid into court was 775*l.*, which leaves 71*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* still due. In my opinion, the judgment should be for the amount paid into court plus 71*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*

(a) Reported by W. C. Biss, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Smith, L.J. (after stating the facts as above set out continued:)—In my judgment, the position of the plaintiffs and defendants under the charter-party after the fire was as follows: On the one hand the plaintiffs could not insist upon the defendants reloading cargo to take the place of that which was burnt, and, on the other hand, the defendants could not insist (if they had been so minded) on so doing. Each party, as regards those bales shipped and burnt, had pro tanto fulfilled their respective obligations under the charter-party—the defendants by loading them, and the plaintiffs being exempted from carrying them on the contracted voyage. The defendants were under no liability to pay freight for the bales burnt, and the plaintiffs had lost that freight. The space theretofore occupied by the burnt bales became vacant space in the plaintiffs' ship, and the only obligation then attaching to the defendants was to fill up the residue of the space in the plaintiffs' ship, and when this was done they would have loaded a full and complete cargo pursuant to the charter. This obligation the defendants refused to perform, and it is for breach of this that the present action is brought. It is not disputed that, when the defendants refused to perform this obligation, it was incumbent upon the plaintiffs to do what was reasonable to mitigate the damages which the defendants would have to pay by reason of their breach of contract, and that, if the plaintiffs could reasonably obtain other cargo to fill up the space which the defendants had wrongfully refused to fill up, they were bound to do so. The plaintiffs did find other cargo, and filled up that space, and they give credit, against the damages they seek to recover from the defendants in this action, for the freight earned by the carriage of such cargo. The defendants, however, insist that the plaintiffs were under obligation to do more—viz., to fill up, if they could, with other cargo for the defendants' benefit, the space left vacant by the burnt jute, and they assert that, as the plaintiffs did find other cargo with which to fill up this vacant space, the freight the plaintiffs have received for this cargo should also be credited against the damages the plaintiffs would otherwise recover from the defendants, and should not go to mitigate the loss the plaintiffs had incurred by losing their freight upon the burnt jute. In my judgment, this position taken up by the defendants is wholly untenable. No doubt, in ordinary cases, the measure of damages would be as stated by Watson, B. in Smith v. M'Guire (ubi sup.)—viz., the difference between the charter-party freight and the net freight actually earned, after deducting expenses. But the provision in this charter-party as to fire modifies the application of that rule to this case by, in effect, reducing as between the parties to the contract the capacity of the ship to the extent previously occupied by the burnt cargo. Under the charter-party the obligation of the shipowner was only, if he reasonably could, to find cargo to take the place of that cargo which the goods owner had made default in shipping, and for which default damages are, and can alone be, sought for in this action. As regards the jute burnt (i.e., the 5458 bales), the defendants have made no default, and for such no damages are, or could be, asked herein. For that jute the shipowner was under no obligation to try and find other cargo, for, as regards this, there were no damages to be mitigated. With the space left vacant in the ship by reason of the burnt jute the defendants had nothing whatever to do. All they had to do after the fire was to fill up the residue of the ship. If the defendants after the fire had had to fill up again the space left vacant by the burnt jute, and they wrongfully omitted to do so, I agree that then the shipowner should, if he could, have obtained other cargo for that space; but that is not the case. The shipowners might do with that vacant space what they liked so long as they did not delay the voyage upon which they had contracted to carry the defendants' goods. As before stated, the plaintiffs did fill up that space left vacant by the burnt jute so as to mitigate their own loss of freight, and now the defendants assert that they are entitled to that freight. Test it in this way: Suppose there had been no fire, and the defendants had loaded, as they did, the 5458 bales, and then refused to load any more (I leave out of consideration the difference between the 5458 burnt and the 7545 bales which were again reshipped, to keep this point clear), what would have been the plaintiffs' obligation? Clearly, only to load up the space wrongfully left unfilled by the defendants, so as to mitigate that damage. In the existing circumstances the space left vacant by the burnt jute stands, as regards the defendants, in the same position as if it were filled with jute, for they have performed their contract as regards that space, and have nothing more to do with it, and the only difference is that they have had to pay no freight for that jute, and the plaintiffs have lost it. All that the defendants can call upon the plaintiffs to do is to act reasonably in procuring cargo to take the place of that which they should have shipped, so as to mitigate their loss in respect of it, and this the plaintiffs have done. For the reasons above, in my judgment, this point fails the defendants.

The next question is this. The plaintiffs did find cargo to fill up the space which the defendants should have filled up after the fire, and for non-performance of which they are being sued in this action, and the point is, whether the defendants are to be credited with that freight which the plaintiffs did in fact earn upon goods so found and shipped, and which earned freight at 25*s.* a ton, or whether the average of the freight earned upon all goods brought home in the defendants' ship, which is less than 25*s.* a ton, is that which is to be credited to the defendants. Upon the evidence it appears that goods which carried freight at 25*s.* a ton were shipped by the plaintiffs at Calcutta, and allocated to the defendants' breach of contract, for the purpose of mitigating the damages they otherwise would have had to pay. In these circumstances I am of opinion that the defendants must be credited with this freight—viz., 25*s.* a ton—and not at the average rate of freight of the whole goods on board, which was considerably less. In this the defendants are right in their contention. Now, as to the last point, which is this. The plaintiffs say, and say truly, that by the charter-party the defendants were bound to load a full and complete cargo, so as to bring out a freight of 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per ton all round. They say that the bill of lading freight of the cargo which was shipped by the defendants before the fire was less than the charter freight of 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* for the same cargo by the amount of 128*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* To fulfil their contract the defendants were consequently bound to load the residue of the ship, which they had not loaded, with goods which would have earned a freight in excess of 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per ton by the amount of the 128*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, and that this would have been so, whether a fire had occurred or not. In my judgment this contention of the plaintiffs is correct, and I do not understand that, if the principle is right, the figure is disputed. This being so, the defendants have not paid into court enough by the difference between 846*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* and 775*l.*—viz., 71*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* I arrive at this in this way: I take the 718*l.* 4*s.*, which the defendants by their computation make out to be the damages payable by them, if their point about being liable to nothing is held, as it is, against them. I then add thereto the 128*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, which the defendants have left out of their computation. 718*l.* 4*s.* added to 128*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* makes 846*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*, and, deducting 775*l.* from that amount, that leaves 71*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* still due from the defendants to the plaintiffs. In my judgment, the plaintiffs' appeal should be allowed, with costs, and judgment should be entered for them for 71*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* in addition to the sum paid into court, with costs in the court below, and the defendants' cross appeal should be dismissed with costs. The money in court will be ordered to be paid out to the plaintiffs, if they have not yet obtained it.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lowless and Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hollams, Son, Coward, and Hawksley.

Thursday, March 1, 1894.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Davey, L.JJ.)

Hansen v. Harrold Brothers. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Chartered freight a lump sum—Sub-charter—Bill of lading freight less than chartered freight—Cesser clause, construction of—Liability of charterers.

Where, under the provisions of a charter-party, a ship was re-chartered, and the original charter-party contained a clause that the captain should sign bills of lading for the cargo at any rate of freight required without prejudice to the charter-party, and also a clause for the cesser of the charterer's liability, coupled with a stipulation, "the owner having a lien on the cargo for all freight and demurrage under this charter-party."

(a) Reported by E. Manley Smith, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that, there being no express agreement to the contrary, the cesser of liability only relieved the charterers from liability to pay so much of the chartered freight as was equivalent to the lien given to the shipowner, and therefore the charterers were liable to pay the difference between the chartered freight and the bill of lading freight, the bill of lading containing no provision as to lien.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of Day, J., at the trial of the action, without a jury.

The plaintiff was a shipowner, and he brought the present action against the charterers of his ship to recover the sum of 195*l.* 13*s.*, balance of the chartered freight.

By the charter-party the ship was chartered for a voyage from New Zealand to London, the freight being agreed to be "a lump sum of 4000*l.* sterling." The charter-party provided that the charterers were to have:—

> The privilege of re-chartering the vessel at any rate of freight without prejudice to this agreement, and the captain to sign bills of lading (Australian and New Zealand trade) for the cargo, according to the custom of the port, at the current or any rate of freight required without prejudice to this charter-party, for which purpose he is to attend daily at the charterers' or their agent's office during business hours, if so required, and should the freight list, according to the bills of lading, show a less sum in the aggregate than the chartered freight, the difference to be paid in cash prior to the ship's clearance at the custom house.

The charter-party also contained the following clause:—

> The liabilities of charterers to cease on the vessel being loaded, the master and owner having a lien on the cargo for all freight and demurrage under this charter-party.

The charterers, the defendants, re-chartered the vessel.

The sub-charterers loaded her with a cargo of oats, and presented to the captain a bill of lading by which freight was payable on the delivery of the cargo at the rate of 37*s.* 6*d.* per ton delivered, and the bill was signed by the captain.

As the freight list, according to the bill of lading, showed an aggregate of 3467*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*, the charterers paid to the plaintiff the sum of 532*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.* in cash prior to the ship's clearance at the custom house, as agreed by the charter-party, to make up the chartered freight of 4000*l.*

On the voyage the oats shrank, and upon their delivery in London the freight, which under the bill of lading was payable according to weight, only amounted to 3271*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.*, leaving a deficiency from the chartered freight of 195*l.* 13*s.*, for which sum the owner now sued the charterers.

At the trial of the action without a jury, Day, J. gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Bigham, Q.C. and Carver (Schjott with them) for the defendants.—By the cesser clause the charterer's liability ceased on the vessel being loaded, and after that moment the owner's remedy for obtaining freight was only his lien on the cargo:

> French v. Gerber, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 350; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; 2 C. P. Div. 247.

The cesser clause contains two independent clauses, one that the charterer's liability is to cease, the other being a statement that the owner has a lien. There is no condition as to the accrual of the lien being a condition precedent to the cesser of liability:

> Kish v. Cory, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 593; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 670; Law Rep. 10 Q. B. 553;
> Restitution Steamship Company v. Pirie, 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491, n.

The cesser clause provides for the cesser of all future liabilities, and of past liabilities so far as the lien is given. Here according to the judgment of Day, J., the charterers are in the position of absolute guarantors of the freight. The very object of the cesser clause is to prevent the charterers from being in that position. The meaning of the clause is to be decided by the clause itself, not by the lien which may be given by the bill of lading, or anything else that may happen after the making of the charter-party. The case of Clink v. Radford & Co. (64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 10; (1891) 1 Q. B. 625) is distinguishable, because the point of the decision was upon the meaning of demurrage, which was held not to include damages at the port of loading. Any loss which the plaintiff has suffered is due to the negligence of his captain in signing the bill of lading without insisting, as he should have done, on the addition to it of the words "all other conditions as per charter-party:"

> Arrospe v. Barr, 8 Court of Sess. Cas. 4th series, 602.

The captain had no authority to sign a bill of lading which contained any stipulation contrary to the terms of the charter-party:

> Rodocanachi v. Milburn, 56 L. T. Rep. 594; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 100; 18 Q. B. Div. 67.

There is nothing unfair in making the consignees liable for the sum which the plaintiff now claims, any more than making them liable for demurrage at the port of loading.

H. F. Boyd (Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Balloch with him) for the plaintiff.—The captain could not have insisted on the addition of any words to the bill of lading. He was bound to sign the bill as it was presented to him. Even if the words "all other conditions as per charter-party" had been added to the bill, they would not affect the meaning of the charter-party. The meaning of the words "without prejudice to this charter-party" has been clearly settled:

> Shand v. Sanderson 28 L. J. 278, Ex.;
> Gledstanes v. Allen, 12 C. B. 202.

As to the construction of the cesser clause, the two parts of it are dependent on each other, and their meaning is that the liability of the charterers is to cease, so far as the owner has an equivalent in the lien which he gets on the cargo, and no further. Clink v. Radford (ubi sup.) is the last case on the subject, and in earlier cases the law has been rather unsettled. Whatever may have been held in earlier cases, the court should now follow the latest decision of this court. The facts of French v. Gerber (ubi sup.) were of a very special kind, and the judgment turned entirely on the facts.

Carver replied.—Clink v. Radford did not summarize the cases on cesser clauses, but only cases as to demurrage at the port of loading. The whole object of the cesser clause is to free the charterers from liability for breaches occurring after the ship has left the port of loading.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff, a shipowner, is suing the charterers of his ship for breach of contract. The plaintiff claims to be entitled to be paid by the defendants the unpaid balance of a lump sum of 4000*l.* agreed upon as freight for a certain voyage. Now, in the charter-party is a stipulation that the charterers are to have the privilege of re-chartering the ship at any rate of freight, "without prejudice to this agreement," and the captain is "to sign bills of lading (Australian and New Zealand trade) for the cargo, according to the custom of the port, at the current or any rate of freight required, without prejudice to this charter-party." Then there is also this cesser clause, "the liabilites of charterers to cease on the vessel being loaded, the master and owners having a lien on the cargo for all freight and demurrage under this charter-party." We have now to construe these parts of the contract, having regard to other parts of the contract dealing with the same subject-matter. The first question arises as to the lump sum of 4000*l.* for freight. That sum would become due at the end of the voyage. But then there is a stipulation that part of that lump sum is to be paid at the port of loading, and the effect of that would be that so much as was not paid at the port of loading would have to be paid at the port of discharge. Now, looking at the cesser clause, we find that it begins, "the liabilities of charterers to cease on the vessel being loaded." If that stood alone, there is no doubt that the charterers would not be liable after the vessel had started. Those words contain a stipulation entirely in favour of the charterers, and it is obvious that the owner would not agree to such a stipulation standing alone. He therefore couples with it this clause: "The master and owners having a lien on the cargo for all freight and demurrage under this charter-party." What is the effect of construing those two parts of the clause together? They must be construed according to the rule laid down in Clink v. Radford (ubi sup.). There may be previous cases to that, containing observations or dicta, or even decisions which are not consistent with the decision in that case, but that case is the last one in this court upon this subject, and we cannot overrule it. Moreover, I think the decision in that case is a proper one, and is founded upon good mercantile reasons. Certain rules were laid down in that case. I used these words: "In my opinion the main rule to be derived from the cases as to the interpretation of the cesser clause in a charter-party is that the court will construe it as inapplicable to the particular breach complained of, if by construing it otherwise the shipowner would be left unprotected in respect of that particular breach, unless the cesser clause is expressed in terms that prohibit such a conclusion; in other words, it cannot be assumed that the shipowner, without any mercantile reason, would give up by the cesser clause rights which he had stipulated for in another part of the contract." That is, because there would be no mercantile reason for his doing so. Bowen, L.J., in the same case says: "There is no doubt that the parties may, if they choose, so frame the clause as to emancipate the charterer from any specified liability, without providing for any terms of compensation to the shipowner; but such a contract would not be one we should expect to see in a commercial transaction. The cesser clauses, as they generally come before the courts, are clauses which couple or link the provisions for the cesser of the charterer's liability, with a corresponding creation of a lien. There is a principle of reason which is obvious to commercial minds, and which should be borne in mind in considering a cesser clause so framed, namely, that reasonable persons would regard the lien given as an equivalent for the release of responsibility which the cesser clause in its earlier part creates, and one would expect to find the lien commensurate with the release of liability." That is what I said in other words. Then Fry, L.J., says: "The rule that we are primâ facie to apply to the construction of a cesser clause followed by" (I should say "coupled with") "a lien clause appears to me to be well ascertained. That rule seems a most rational one, and it is simply this: that the two are to be read, if possible, as co-extensive. If that were not so we should have this extraordinary result: there would be a clause in the charter-party the breach of which would create a legal liability; there would then be a cesser clause destroying that liability; and there would then come a lien clause which did not re-create that liability in anybody else." That is the cause of construction with a good mercantile reason for it, and that reason seems to me to be unanswerable. Therefore the proposition is true that when the clause providing for the cesser of liability is accompanied by a stipulation that the owner should have a lien, then the cesser of liability is not to apply so far as the lien created under the charter-party is not equivalent to the liability which ceases. It is not necessary that the lien should be expressed to be of an equivalent amount to what the owner gives up by the cesser clause. If, under the charter-party, the charterers can insist upon the owner relying upon his lien, then there is a cesser of the charterer's liability only so far as the lien, which the charterers have insisted on, is equivalent to it. What is the lien which the charterers in this case were able to insist on being taken by the owner? The charter party provides that the captain is "to sign bills of lading (Australian and New Zealand trade) for the cargo, according to the custom of the port at the current or any rate of freight required, without prejudice to this charter-party." It was contended that that enabled the captain to refuse to sign bills of lading unless in terms they gave him all the rights given in the charter-party, and to insist on having added to the bills the words "all other conditions as per charter-party," so that he might refuse to sign if those words were not added. There have been several decisions on the meaning of the words "without prejudice to this charter-party." The expression means that nothing in bills of lading signed by the captain shall affect the contract of the charter-party, and that is the recognised meaning which was settled in the cases of Shand v. Sanderson (ubi sup.) and Gledstanes v. Allen (ubi sup.). The captain in this case was bound to sign bills of lading presented to him, and the words "without prejudice to this charter-party" do not affect that duty to sign, but when he has signed the bills, they are not to have any effect on the charter-party. But for that stipulation the captain would not be bound to sign any bill of lading except such as his owner wished, but by this charter-party he is bound to sign other bills. Now this charter-party gave liberty to the charterers to sub-charter the ship, so that the sub-charterers became entitled to decide upon the form of the bills of lading, and, whatever conditions they wished to put in, the captain was bound to sign the bills as presented, though there was no contract between the owner and the sub-charterers. Power was therefore given to the sub-charterers to present bills of lading, under which the freight to be paid according to weight to the owner would not be equivalent to the chartered freight, the owner's right to which was given up by the cesser clause. By the decision of this court in Clink v. Radford (ubi sup.) we are obliged to say that upon the true construction of this charter-party the cesser clause only relieves the charterers from liability to pay so much of the chartered freight as is equivalent to the lien given to the shipowner. Here the bill of lading freight was not only less than the chartered freight, but was less than the amount of the chartered freight which remained unpaid after the ship had left the port of loading. The cesser clause does not relieve the charterers from the difference between those two sums, and they still remain liable to pay it to the owner. Under those circumstances the result of our decision is the same as that of the decision of Day, J., and this appeal must be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

Davey, L.J.—This case has been argued with great ability, but the argument has not carried conviction to my mind. I cannot say whether all the cases on the construction of charter-parties are reconcilable, but I think that we can decide the present one without infringing on the decisions in earlier authorities. The general rule for the construction of a cesser clause when it is joined to a clause providing for a lien has been laid down in Clink v. Radford (ubi sup.). The view there taken by Bowen, L.J. seems to me to be sound for logical as well as commercial reasons. The general principle laid down in that case is that when these two clauses, viz., that the liability of the charterer is to cease upon the vessel being loaded, and that the master and owner are to have a lien, are coupled and linked together, then, according to true construction and grammar, they are to be read together as forming relative obligations. The second clause does not actually create a lien, the lien is to be on goods to be subsequently shipped by an hypothetical shipper. At the time of this charter-party the charterers had no power to give a lien on actual goods. The words of the clause point to a lien to be created hereafter, and are, I think, a contract to give a lien. I myself should have thought it reasonable that the existence of the lien should be held to be a condition precedent to the cesser of liability, so that the liability of the charterers should only be discharged so far forth as it was satisfied by the lien. But I do not wish to put my decision on that ground, because in this case it is unnecessary to do so. I prefer to say that the two stipulations are connected together so as to form relative obligations. Whose fault is it if the owner has not got the lien for which he stipulated? The charterers say that it is the captain's fault, and cite the Scotch case of Arrospe v. Barr (ubi sup.). Notwithstanding some dicta in that case, I do not think it is an authority for the charterer's proposition that the master might have insisted on refusing to sign the bill of lading unless words were added to it which would incorporate the provisions of the charter-party. I do not think that that case is an authority for more than this, that the captain ought not to sign bills of lading which contain stipulations at variance with the charter-party. In the present case I think it was the fault of the charterers that the lien which they contracted to give to or procure for the shipowner was not given or procured. The charterers when they sub-chartered the ship might have made a stipulation with the sub-charterers for such a lien as was contemplated by the charter-party. In my opinion, the master was not guilty of any negligence in signing the bill of lading in the form in which it was presented to him, and, further than that, I think that the charterers were in default in not making arrangements with the sub-charterers so as to obtain the lien which they ought to have obtained for the owner. This seems a much more reasonable view to take than that which was suggested on behalf of the charterers. The result therefore is that, as the owner obtained no lien to cover so much of the chartered freight as remained unpaid at the port of shipment, because the bill of lading freight was smaller than the chartered freight, the defendants are not relieved by the cesser clause. Whether the case is put on the ground of condition precedent or on breach of contract, for which the damages would be the difference between the bill of lading freight and the chartered freight, the result is the same. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, W. A. Crump and Son.

Solicitors for the defendants. Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes.

Wednesday, July 25, 1894.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Kay and Smith, L.JJ.)

The Bassett Hound. (a)

Collision — Overtaking vessel — Flare-up light — Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 11.

A fishing smack on her way to her fishing ground in the North Sea, on a clear night, sighted the lights of an overtaking steamer on her port quarter. The smack exhibited one flare-up light, but the steamer, nevertheless, continued her course, and a collision occurred.

Held, that the smack was to blame for breach of art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, for not continuing to show flare-up lights at proper intervals as long as there was danger.

The Essequibo (58 L. T. Rep. 596; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 276; 13 P. Div. 51) followed.

Appeal from a decision of Barnes, J.

This was a collision action in rem, brought by Thomas Henry Greer, owner of the smack Sobriety, her master and crew, against the owners of the steam trawler Bassett Hound.

The collision occurred in the North Sea, about 120 miles E.N.E. of the Spurn.

(a) Reported by Basil Crump, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On 7th April 1894 the Sobriety, a wooden sailing smack of 75 tons register, belonging to the port of Grimsby, was in the North Sea, about 120 miles E.N.E. of Spurn Point, on her way to the fishing grounds, with her gear and a crew of five hands. The weather was fine and clear, with a light E.N.E. breeze and a smooth sea, and the tide was flood, setting to the eastward with a force of about two knots. The Sobriety was laid to on the starboard tack, heading about N.N.E., with her mainsail, mizzen, and second jib set, with her head to windward, at a speed of about one knot. About 2.15 a.m. the white light of the Bassett Hound was sighted about five miles away, and bearing off the port mizzen rigging of the Sobriety about W.S.W. Some time afterwards the green light of the Bassett Hound came in sight, and almost directly afterwards the red light, but only for a moment, and was then shut in. The green light was watched, and when it approached the plaintiffs alleged that a red flare was burnt on the lee quarter, and the Sobriety kept her course. The Bassett Hound continued to approach without altering her course, and with the bluff of her starboard bow struck the Sobriety on the port side, about abreast of the main rigging, doing her so much damage that she sank in ten minutes, and four of the crew were drowned. The Bassett Hound, an iron steam trawler of 57 tons register, with engines of forty-five horse power nominal, and a crew of nine hands, was also on her way to the fishing grounds, and was making about eight knots on an E. by N. course magnetic. Her story was that the sails of the Sobriety were suddenly seen about two to three points on her starboard bow, and quite close, and that no lights whatever were visible. Her helm was ordered to be starboarded, but too late to avoid collision. The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with breach of art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which is as follows:

> A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light.

The action was tried before Barnes, J. and Trinity Masters on the 7th and 8th June 1894. Barnes, J., in giving judgment, said that the whole question turned upon—(1) Whether or not there was a proper look-out on the Bassett Hound; and (2) whether or not the Sobriety showed the light or lights required by rule 11 sufficiently or at all. As to (1), he decided that those on board the Bassett Hound kept a proper look-out, and could not have seen the flare on the Sobriety because it was shown when the Bassett Hound was too far off; and, as to (2), that the smack did not comply with art. 11, because there was ample time to have shown more than one flare, and that the one flare was an insufficient warning. He therefore found that the smack Sobriety was alone to blame.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir W. Phillimore and G. G. Phillimore for the appellants.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Butler Aspinall for the respondents.

Esher, M.R.—I am not prepared to differ from the decision of the learned judge in this case. It seems to me that the law of the matter stands thus, that the burden of proof in the first place lies upon the smack. It is she who complains that she has been run down, and she has been run down at sea at night. At night it is the duty of any vessel moving on the sea to show lights. Why? It is their duty to show lights to enable other vessels which are moving on the sea to see them, so as to know where they are, and to act accordingly. If they show no lights they do not give to the other vessel that assistance to which that vessel is entitled. That is the reason of the rule. The reason why they are made to carry lights is in order that they may give assistance to other vessels to enable them to act according to other rules. If a vessel has a green light on one side and a red light on the other, then that enables the other vessel to see what are the other rules, as, for instance, passing port side to port side, which she is called upon to obey. Therefore the burden of proof that the vessel is carrying lights is the very first thing that she is bound to prove when she brings an action. If she does not carry proper lights it is almost, and I think it is quite, inevitable to say that she must be in the wrong. She can only escape by saying. "It is true I was in the wrong, but my wrong act did not at all conduce to the collision," which is a very difficult thing to say.

What is the duty of every other vessel? Every vessel is bound to keep a proper look-out, and the duty of giving affirmative evidence upon the point is upon the vessel herself. For that reason the burden of proof is laid upon each vessel, if there is any fair reason to challenge the matter. The burden lies upon each vessel to show that she has kept a proper look-out. The first evidence of that must always be evidence from on board the vessel herself. If that ship gives evidence that they were keeping a proper look-out, that evidence may be shown to be false by the circumstances. If two steamers are meeting nearly end on, and each of them is shown to be showing her proper lights—if they are meeting nearly end on, and come within a distance of half a mile of each other, and one of them says she was keeping a good look-out but never saw the other, although if she had lights she must have seen them all three within a mile or half a mile of her, what is the result? Although the people of the steamer have sworn that they were keeping a good look-out, you do not believe them. Circumstances show that they could not have been. But it is clear that though there is one way of testing their evidence, it is a wholly illogical and unreasonable way of dealing with the thing to say that they are to be found not to have kept a good look-out in every case in which they have not seen the lights. If they did not see them, it is not true and logical reasoning to say that that shows conclusively that they were not keeping a good look-out. That must depend upon circumstances. In this case, therefore, it lies upon the Sobriety to show that she gave proper assistance to the steamer with regard to her own lights. Rule 11, if you took it literally, according to its own words, would be satisfied by the smack showing a flash light at the most extreme distance within which a flash light could be seen. Nay, more, if you take the words of the rule, it would be satisfied if it was shown at a distance at which the other could not see it. But it is not merely a legal rule; it is a business rule, to be acted upon by people who are not lawyers, and a rule to be acted upon to bring about the result which it was intended to bring about. For that reason it has been held, and particularly in the case of The Essequibo (ubi sup.)—it has been held by the late Lord Hannen that you must not read it so as to say that she has satisfied the rule if she has shown one flash light. He says that upon the fair reading of that rule, to be applied in practice, it must be that she ought to continue to show a light from time to time. You cannot say how far distant each of those flares must be, but from time to time you must show flash lights to the vessel which is approaching. The reason consists in the difference between a flash light—or, if that is not the proper term for these particular lights, a light which is only an intermittent light—and a continuous light. A red light shown all the time must be seen by people coming near to it on the port side. It must be seen. It is in sight a very long time, continuously, or up to the time you come close to one another. But these intermittent lights are at intervals of time, and whether they are seen at all must depend upon whether you have your eyes upon them at the time they are being shown. It is not in every case and in every condition that you can say that the other vessel ought to have seen that light. Nor is it true to say that in every position of the vessels you need not take any notice of the light because it was not shown more than once. Vessels may be in such a position as regards it that if it is shown once it ought to be seen that once. If the vessels were near to each other, within a quarter of a mile we may say, and one of these lights was shown, and the one that has to show the flash light was ahead of the other, as a matter of truth and practice you would say it is impossible, but that if you had kept a proper look-out you must have seen it, and if you saw it once you have no right to disregard it because you do not see it again. Then, it must be observed, that it after all depends upon the position of the two vessels both as to bearing and distance.

Has this case, therefore, been brought within that rule which ought to have brought Barnes, J. to the conclusion that they ought to have seen that light, and that it is obvious and clear that if they did not see it there must have been a want of proper look-out? I cannot bring myself to that, and for the reason which I have suggested during the argument. If the vessel is at a very great distance, and the one that ought to show a flash light is at a very great distance and shows it in some part of the horizon, which, although ahead of the ship, may be at any part of that horizon, can it be true to say that, even though it could be seen, it ought to have been seen, and so clearly to have been seen that it must be negligence not to have seen it? It does not seem to be really true, and for that reason I could not accept that proposition so laid down. Here it lay upon the smack to show that she did show that flash light in such a position and at such a time that the others ought to have seen it, and seen it to this extent, that you must say that they did not keep a good look-out if they did not see it. [His Lordship dealt with the evidence, and continued:] I adopt, as absolutely good nautical law, the interpretation put upon the rule by Lord Hannen in The Essequibo (ubi sup.). Then it is said that, although that finding cannot be overruled, nevertheless the learned judge ought to have found that, although the smack was in the wrong, yet that before the collision those on board the steamer ought to have seen her, and that if they had seen her they would have been able to avoid the collision, although she was wrong in regard to her lights. That, again, depends upon the evidence as to the distances. That is upon the assumption that she did not give them proper information by her lights, but it is said that it was such a night that they ought to have seen her hull or her sails in time to enable them to avoid her. It is very difficult to say within what distance you could have seen such a vessel on such a night. It is put by the witness whose evidence the learned judge cannot rely upon, from the mode in which he gave his evidence—it is put by him at 100 yards. The learned judge cannot rely upon that man, and therefore he cannot say it was 100 yards. The others said thirty yards. I should say myself that very likely the learned judge could not safely act upon the supposition that it was thirty yards off. From that evidence on the one side and the evidence on the other, he cannot say clearly that she ought to have seen this small vessel. We do not know what sort of sails she had. We cannot come to the conclusion that she ought to have seen her. Upon the assumption that she did not give them any lights at all, we cannot say that they ought to have seen her hull in time to have been able to avoid her. There, again, the burden of proof, which charged that as negligence on the part of the steamer, lay upon the smack, and if she did not give the learned judge evidence upon which he could rely as to the distance at which they say the steamer ought to have seen her on that night, then they failed in their burden. I think, therefore, that on both the points which have been taken we cannot differ from the judgment of the learned judge, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Kay, L.J.—It seems clear that this smack was in fault. According to art. 11 a ship which is being overtaken by another is to show at her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light, or flare-up light; and in the case of The Essequibo (ubi sup.) Lord Hannen held that the ship which is being overtaken does not fulfil the duty cast upon her by this art. 11 by showing a flare-up light once only, but has to continue to show flare-up lights as long as there is any danger. I think it is quite clear that the Sobriety showed a flare-up light once only, and therefore did not fulfil the duty, according to the interpretation put upon that art. 11, devolving upon her. Then is she alone to blame? The learned judge found that she was alone to blame, and the difficulty I feel is to differ from the judge who has come to that conclusion, and who has had the advantage, that we cannot have here, of hearing the witnesses, and seeing how much of their evidence is to be believed and how much rejected. It is quite plain, according to the decision in The Essequibo, that the Sobriety was to blame for not repeating the flare. Therefore the Sobriety was in the wrong. It is not so clear, although upon the evidence I should have thought it was, to say the least, doubtful, that a proper look-out was not kept on board the Bassett Hound. The learned judge has come to the conclusion that a proper look-out was kept. That being so, I confess I am not able to dissent from the learned judge, and therefore I think the appeal has failed.

Smith, L.J. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Rollit and Sons, for Rollit and Sons, Hull; Deacon, Gibson and Medcalfe, for Grange and Wintringham, Grimsby.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

June 6 and 23, 1894.

(Before Wills, J.)

The Hydarnes Steamship Company Limited v. The Indemnity Mutual Marine Assurance Company Limited. (a)

Insurance—Marine—Policy on freight—Construction of policy—Commencement of risk.

By a policy of marine insurance the defendants agreed to make good to the plaintiffs all such losses thereinafter expressed as might happen to be the subject-matter of the policy and might attach to the policy in respect of the sum of 2000l. thereby assured, which assurance was thereby declared to be upon freight of meat valued at 3000l., warranted free from all claims, unless caused by stranding, sinking, burning, or collision, but to be liable for any loss occasioned by breaking down of machinery until the final sailing of the vessel, &c. The assurance to commence upon the freight from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said vessel at Monte Video, and to continue until the said goods or merchandise were discharged and safely landed at as aforesaid.

The freight insured arose under a contract between the plaintiffs and a firm of merchants who imported meat from South America to Europe, and it was thereby agreed that after the arrival of the vessel at the port of loading the refrigerating engine should be worked until the temperature in the chamber in which the meat was to be loaded was reduced to a specified temperature, and then, and not until then, the steamer's agents were to give notice that the steamer was ready to receive the meat. The merchants agreed to pay freight on the arrival of the vessel at the port of discharge.

After the arrival of the vessel at the port of loading, the refrigerating engine broke down and the cargo of meat was not taken on board the vessel, which was subsequently loaded with other goods.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the amount covered by the policy, as no meat was ever loaded, and the risk had never attached.

The plaintiffs in this case sought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a policy of marine insurance on freight of meat.

The defendants denied that the risk insured against ever attached according to the terms of the policy, or that there was any loss either actual or constructive.

Sir R. Webster, Q.C., Bigham, Q.C., and Horridge appeared for the plaintiffs.

(a) Reported by W. H. Horsfall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the defendants

The terms of the policy, the facts of the case, and arguments appear fully from the judgment of the court.

June 23.—Wills, J.—This is an action to recover 2000*l.* under a valued policy on freight. The policy, so far as is material, is in the following words: "This policy witnesseth that in consideration of the sum of 17*l.* 10*s.*, the Indemnity Mutual Assurance Company Limited doth agree that the said company will make good all such losses hereinafter expressed as may happen to be the subject-matter of this policy, and may attach to this policy in respect of the sum of 2000*l.* hereby assured, which assurance is hereby declared to be upon freight of meat valued at 3000*l.* warranted free from all claims (except general average and salvage charges) unless caused by stranding, sinking, burning, or collision, but to be liable for any loss occasioned by breaking down of machinery until final sailing of vessel, the ship or vessel called the Hydarnes (s.), lost or not lost, at and from Monte Video to any ports or places in any order, backwards and forwards in the river Plate (including the Boca), and (or) the rivers Parana and (or) Uruguay, or thence to any port or ports in the United Kingdom, and (or) continent of Europe not north of Hamburg, that port included in any order, and thence to any port or ports in the United Kingdom in any order with leave to call and wait at any ports, parts, and places for all purposes (especially in any order in the Brazils, either to discharge or take in cargo, or for any other purposes) with leave to tow and be towed and assist vessels in all situations. To return 2*s.* 4*d.* per cent. for no river Parana or Uruguay risk. . . . The assurance aforesaid shall commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise on board thereof from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel at Monte Video, and shall continue until the said goods or merchandise be discharged and safely landed at as aforesaid. . . . Dated the 23rd Jan. 1890." The freight insured arose under a contract of the 9th May 1889 between the plaintiffs' brokers of the one part and Sansinena and Co., merchants, of the other part. By clause 8 of that contract it was provided that, "as soon as possible after the arrival of a steamer at Boca, Buenos Ayres, and after the discharge of cargo, if any, stowed in the chambers, the refrigerating engine shall be worked until the temperature in the said chamber shall be reduced below 28 degrees Fahr., and then, and not till then, the steamer's agents shall give written notice that the steamer is lying ready to receive the meat." The lay days were, subject to certain exceptions, to commence twenty-four hours after the receipt of the notice by the agents of Sansinena and Co. By clause 13 "the charterers shall pay freight on the arrival of the steamer at the port of discharge of the meat intended for such port and such freight shall be payable on all carcases which may be shipped at the Boca, Buenos Ayres, for such port," at certain specified rates. The vessel arrived at Monte Video on the outward voyage and there discharged outward cargo. She then proceeded to the Boca, where she arrived on the 25th Jan. 1890. The refrigerating engine was started on the 27th Jan.

to cool down the brine which circulates in pipes through the chamber, and thus reduces it to the required temperature. On the 8th Feb. the brine was once reduced as low as 27½ degrees F., and on the 11th Feb. to 27 degrees, but this temperature was not maintained, and the temperature of the brine was generally above 28 degrees, and none of the meat chambers had got below 33 degrees, as appears from the engineer's log. The stipulated degree of cold in the chambers, therefore had not been reached. No notice, of course, had been given to the charterer's agents under clause 8 of the charter-party, and the vessel was not, in fact, ready to receive the meat. On the 11th Feb. the refrigerating engine broke down in a way and under circumstances which rendered repair in South America impossible, and the adventure so far as the carriage of meat was concerned was properly abandoned, and notice of abandonment, was duly given to the defendants. At the time this policy was entered into no meat ever was or could be loaded at Monte Video. There were no appliances for freezing meat at Monte Video. The Boca is a part of the port of Buenos Ayres, and the Parana is the main affluent of the river Plate, The Uruguay falls into the waters of the Parana some thirty or forty miles above Buenos Ayres. There were appliances for freezing meat at the Boca, and at places higher up, both on the Parana and the Uruguay, notably at San Nicolas on the Parana, and at Frey Bentos on the Uruguay. These facts were well known to shippers, shipowners, and underwriters, and I find that they were known to both plaintiffs and defendants when the policy was entered into. There is no doubt that the machinery spoken of in the policy is, or includes, the refrigerating machinery in question. There is no doubt that it broke down before the final sailing of the vessel, and, without going into details, there is no doubt that, if the risk ever attached, the money assured by the policy is due. The real, and indeed only question is, whether the assurance had commenced, a question which must be answered by a study of the policy itself. The words in the policy "the assurance shall commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise on board thereof (i.e., of the vessel) "from the loading of the said goods or merchandise at" are in print; The single word "Monte Video," completing the sentence is in writing. Two things therefore appear to be pretty plain; first, an assurance upon freight and an assurance upon goods (if effectual) were intended to commence simultaneously, and the event upon which either attached was the loading of goods, that is to say, an assurance upon goods would commence with the loading of the goods insured, an assurance upon freight with the loading of the goods in respect of which the freight would accrue; secondly, "Monte Video" was advisedly inserted. And yet a literal reading would reduce the clause to nonsense. Both parties knew that the freight insured could not accrue in respect of any goods that could be put on board at Monte Video; and if so, and if no other interpretation is possible, either the whole assurance must go as an absurd and impossible contract, or this clause must be rejected as nonsense. The latter view is that contended for by Sir R. Webster. The defendants say on the other hand that the words "at Monte Video" were intended to cover both Monte Video and any other loading port permitted by the policy, and that as no meat had been loaded at the Boca when the accident occurred the policy had never attached. It would certainly appear from the cases as to insurance upon goods that, with a policy so expressed, the phrase "at place A.," A being the first place mentioned in the description of the voyage contained in the policy, is sufficient to cover the other unnamed loading ports, and as in this policy freight is clearly intended to stand upon the same footing as goods in respect to this clause, my opinion is that the policy should be so read, and I see no reason for not giving this construction, because the first place named in the description of the voyage is one at which the particular class of goods in question could not be loaded. "Monte Video" stands in such a collocation simply to indicate that from one end of the series of lawful loading places to the other the policy should attach from the loading of the goods. I do not lose sight of the fact that, as a general rule, the principles which regulate the commencement of risk as regards goods and freight are far from identical. But how can such general principles apply when the clause, and the only clause which is intended to deal with and define the commencement of risk deals with freight in exactly the same words as apply to goods? The method of interpretation I have referred to, by which the mention of the first of the lawful loading ports in the clause defining the commencement of risk has been held to cover the whole series, though not named, and to make the risk attach at each of the lawful ports named in the description of the voyage, though not mentioned in the risk clause, is well established, and I can see no reason why when the same words are made to deal simultaneously with freight as well as goods the same principle of interpretation should not be adopted. This view is strengthened by the clause in the policy by which 2*s.* 4*d.* per cent. is to be returned if no river Parana or Uruguay risk be in fact incurred. The clause defining the commencement of risk appears to me therefore to make the policy attach to freight at each loading port as soon as the goods in respect of which the assured freight will accrue are put on board, and not before; and the clause is intelligible enough. It remains to be seen whether such an interpretation is contradicted by any other part of the policy, or leads to results absurd in themselves, or so unreasonable that it is impossible to suppose that the parties could have so intended. The freight in the present case was payable provided the vessel arrived at the port where the meat was to be discharged. The policy therefore, from any point of view, covered the loss of freight which would ensue if the vessel were lost by stranding, burning, collision, &c., after the meat was on board. But freight might be lost in another way. By the agreement between Sansinena and Co. and the plaintiffs the freight was payable on each carcase separately, and until the whole of the intended shipment was on board only so much freight would be in course of being earned as was applicable to the quantity actually shipped. If the machinery broke down during the loading of the meat, the freight would be only partially earned, though the ship came safely home. It would be practically earned, because so far as freight was concerned it would not matter whether the meat were spoiled or not, if the ship arrived, and the breaking down of the machinery, even though it involved the destruction of the meat, would cause no loss of freight on the carcases already shipped. On those remaining to be shipped, if it prevented their being shipped, there would be a loss of freight. That the freight was not dependent upon the efficiency of the machinery after the homeward voyage began is obvious from the terms of the policy, and must have been known to the defendants when the insurance was effected. It was equally obvious that the plaintiffs sought to insure against the breaking down of machinery after the loading began. There is, therefore, construing the policy as I have done, a risk to be insured against, and as twelve days are allowed for loading and unloading, at least half that time might very well be occupied in loading, so that there is a substantial risk in respect of breakdown of machinery undertaken by the underwriters. It is argued for the plaintiffs that it is so small a matter that the parties must have contemplated something beyond it, viz., the damage of loss of freight by reason of a breakdown before the ship was ready to receive the meat, or before the loading began. I do not see that I have any materials for measuring the value of the risk, nor do I think it would be consistent with sound principles of interpretation to enter upon so vague an inquiry. A policy of insurance can hardly receive one construction if the premium be 10*s.* per cent., and another if it be 15*s.* per cent. It is enough, as it seems to me, if there is, according to the construction adopted, a substantial risk of loss of freight by reason of breakdown in machinery after the loading has begun and the assurance has therefore attached.

The difficulty—I should rather say the impossibility—of adopting the view presented on behalf of the plaintiff seems to me to lie in the fact that it requires that the clause defining the commencement of the risk should be altogether rejected. So strong an expedient should not, as it seems to me, be resorted to unless it is reasonably possible to adopt a construction by which every part of the contract shall have its meaning. Perhaps no clause can be more important than that which defines the commencement of the risk. That it was intended to be more than formal, and to have a real application, is apparent from its being completed in writing. Other blanks in places not applicable to the insurance of freight are left unfilled. It points most clearly to loading of some sort, as preliminary to the attachment of risk. The contention of the plaintiffs would expunge it altogether. I cannot think this can be right. The risk of breakdown insured against continues until final sailing of vessel. This provision, however, does not seem to me to affect the present question. A breakdown, however disastrous to the meat between the completed loading and the final sailing would not affect the right to freight. And I think the expression merely meant that, so long as there was a port to be called at where freight on meat could be earned, the insurance against loss of freight by breakdown of machinery should be in force. In fact, it amounts to only an additional illustration of the necessity of reading "at Monte Video" in the clause defining the commencement of risk as equivalent to "at and from Monte Video." Sir R. Webster argued that it was abundantly evident that the underwriters meant to take the risk of what I may call preliminary breakdown. If I were at liberty to interpret the contract by the correspondence which took place when the breakdown was announced I should be of the same opinion. It is clear that the real objection then entertained by the defendants was that they thought the adventure had not been properly abandoned. But it does not need authority, though there is abundance of it, to show that a contract must be construed by its own language, and not by any views taken of the meaning of that language by the parties. I have not forgotten that there is strong authority for the general proposition that insurance on freight attaches when the ship is at her port of loading with cargo ready for her or contracted for, and herself ready to receive the cargo, and in many instances still earlier. But, as I have already pointed out, these general principles seem to me inapplicable in face of a specific and inconsistent provision as to the time when risk shall attach, and I have further shown that the ship was not, in fact, ready to receive the meat. The real question appears to me to be whether the clause as to the commencement of the risk is to be expunged as insensible or unintelligible, or whether it is possible to give to it a meaning that is not contradicted by any other part of the policy. For the reasons I have given I am of opinion that my judgment must be for the defendants.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors: for the plaintiffs, Pritchard and Englefield, for Simpson, North, Harley, and Birkett, Liverpool; for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

April 21, 25, and 26, 1894.

(Before the President (Sir Francis Jeune), assisted by Trinity Masters.)

THE GERTOR. (a)

Damage—Negligence—Natural and probable consequence—Remoteness of damage.

A steamship whilst getting up her anchors in a gale of wind to proceed to a safer anchorage, negligently failed to obtain the assistance of a tug so as to enable her to perform the manœuvre safely. She was in consequence driven against a pier, where she again negligently abstained for a considerable time from taking the assistance of a tug, which was offered to her. Having ultimately taken such assistance, she was towed in the only direction then possible, when, coming into a heavy seaway and the full force of a strong gale, the towing hawser parted, and she was driven ashore, doing damage to the plaintiffs' property. There was no negligence on the part of the ship after she took the assistance of the tug. The Trinity Masters having advised the court that the breaking of the tow rope was a thing that would "very probably" happen, considering the direction in which it was necessary to tow the ship after she had collided with the pier, and considering the wind and weather she would meet whilst being towed, it was Held, that the damage following upon such breaking of the tow rope was a natural consequence of the defendants' original negligence, and that the owners of the ship were liable for such damage.

(a) Reported by Butler Aspinall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THIS was an action by the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Dover, against the owners of the steamship Gertor, for damages occasioned by the Gertor coming into contact with and damaging two groynes and an outfall sewer, the property of the plaintiffs.

It appeared that the Gertor whilst on a voyage from Hamburg to Barry, in water ballast, came to an anchor off Dover, but, being in want of bunker coals, came in and anchored between the two buoys inside the Admiralty Pier. There was a strong gale with heavy squalls, and the Gertor, which was light, at once began to sheer and to drag, and, although she steamed up to her anchors, she kept dragging during the squalls for a period of between two and three hours, during which time she was making efforts to get her anchors, the chains of which had fouled, in order to go further out to a safer anchorage. Shortly after getting her port anchor she sheered and dragged, and then drove foul of the south pier of the harbour entrance. The tug Lady Vita then came out of the harbour, and offered assistance which it was alleged she refused to take, and she then drifted across to the north pier, and lay there, heading to the northward, between the end of the north pier and the Mole rocks, having broken her propellor against the south pier. The tug's assistance was then taken, and she towed her away to the northward, the only direction then possible. Soon afterwards when tow and tug got into the full force of wind and sea away from the lee of the Admiralty Pier, the hawser parted, and the Gertor was driven on to the beach below the castle, where she did the damage complained of.

The plaintiffs alleged unskilful and negligent navigation and management of the Gertor, and charged the defendants with want of reasonable care and skill in not preventing her from coming in contact with, and doing damage to, the plaintiffs' property. They alleged, in particular, that the Gertor was improperly anchored, that those in charged of the Gertor attempted in an improper manner to get up her anchors, and that they neglected to take the assistance of a tug, or take other precautions whilst the anchors of the Gertor were being weighed, so as to perform the manœuvre safely, and to keep her with her head seawards and clear of the harbour piers. The plaintiffs further charged the Gertor with failing to take any measures to procure the assistance of a tug both before and after colliding with the south pier, and with neglecting and refusing to take such assistance when offered. No negligence was alleged against the defendants after the tug had made fast to the Gertor.

The defendants by their defence denied that the Gertor was unskilfully and negligently navigated and managed, and said that all reasonable care and skill were used by those on board the Gertor, and that the collision with the piers and the subsequent stranding were attributable to the act of God, and could not have been avoided by any human judgment or foresight.

At the conclusion of the plaintiffs' evidence

Dr. Raikes, Q.C. (Sir W. Phillimore and Holman with him) for the defendants.—There is no evidence of any negligence causing the damage complained of. Assuming that there was negligence anterior to the breaking of the hawser, which is denied, such negligence was not the cause of the damage. The cause of such damage was the breaking of the hawser, and this was not due to any negligence on the part of the defendants. The injury must be the inevitable result of the negligence. The damage in the present case is too remote:

The Lords Bailiff; Jurats of Romney Marsh v. The Corporation of the Trinity House, L. Rep. 7 Ex. 247.

Aspinall, Q.C. (Butler Aspinall with him) for the plaintiffs.—To say that the damage must be the inevitable result of the negligence complained of is to put it too high. It is sufficient if it is the natural and probable consequence, or if it is not unlikely to happen as a consequence. For instance, where cattle, frightened by the negligence of a railway company's servants, break away from their drover and ultimately wander into a railway, where they get injured, into which they would not have got but for the improper act of a third person, the company is responsible for the damage to the cattle:

Sneesby v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 263;
The City of Lincoln, 62 L. T. Rep. N. S. 49; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 475; 15 P. Div. 15; Hill v. New River Company, 9 B. & S. 303.

In the present case, inasmuch as the tug was obliged to tow out to the northward and so get into the seaway, the wind and sea which she necessarily encountered were under the circumstances more than likely to cause the breaking of the hawser, and, if the Trinity Masters so advise, it follows that the breaking of the hawser and the consequent going ashore of the ship were probable consequences of the defendants' negligence.

The PRESIDENT, after consulting the Trinity Masters, stated that they were of opinion that the probabilities were very great that the hawser would break under the circumstances then existing, and that, consequently, the plaintiffs had made out a primâ facie case.

The defendants then called their witnesses, and after argument on the facts, judgment was given as follows:

The PRESIDENT.—A point for my consideration in this case is whether or no after the tug got hold of the Gertor, there being no negligence on the Gertor's part after that time, it could be said that her previous negligence, if any, was the cause of damage which resulted, so as to render her owners liable? The law is clear; the damage must be the natural consequence of the negligence to which it is ascribed, and, if there be any intervening cause which prevents the result being the natural result of the first negligence, of course the first negligence ceases to be the proximate cause. In every case it must be a question of fact, and in the cases which have been mentioned in the books, what the court in every instance considered was whether the first cause so far continued that it was the proximate and the natural cause of the eventual damage. That I thought was a doubtful point in this case, but it was one to be decided with regard to the particular facts; and, looking at where the vessel was, looking at the way she was towed off, looking at the very dangerous place from which it is proved she had to be towed, and having regard to the particular circumstances of the weather at the time, and the nature of the vessel being towed with so much freeboard as she had, the Trinity Masters think that there were great probabilities of an accident of that kind happening which did happen, viz., the hawser breaking, and the vessel going ashore. I think when it is found that there is a great probability of such a matter happening, that fact brings the case within the rule that the result, if it is the natural result, is caused by such negligence which, in this case, must be considered the proximate cause. When that is decided, the sole remaining question is, whether there was negligence before that time on the part of the Gertor. That has come down to two points: First, whether the vessel ought to have taken assistance to hold her head up during the time she was getting her anchor to shift, very properly, into a better position than she then occupied. It is clear that she neither sought nor desired assistance. The captain has said that even had he known there was a tug available he would not have taken that assistance. The propriety of his conduct is a question of nautical experience and skill, and the Trinity Masters think he ought to have obtained the assistance of a tug, and the last witness called on behalf the Gertor, who is a gentleman of vast experience, places it beyond all doubt when he says she was in a bad berth, and required assistance to get her anchors up properly. Under these circumstances I can have no doubt that there was negligence at that time. Again, I think that there was negligence later, when she got alongside the pier, in not utilising the services of the tug which were certainly then at her disposal. The mate has said that if she had had assistance then her head might not have got across the harbour as it did, and the Trinity Masters think it would not, and that if she had then got a tug she would have been taken out to the open sea in the direction in which she eventually tried to proceed. If it is the case that the tug Lady Vita offered her assistance, and it was refused, that makes it all the stronger. I cannot accept the view, especially after the evidence given by the boatman, that the captain did not perfectly well know what the tug was there for. I dare say he did, up to the last moment, abstain from taking the services of a tug for a reason which it is not hard to conjecture, but he abstained too long, and the Trinity Masters think he was negligent in so doing. Therefore, there was negligence on both those matters, and I think negligence which was the proximate cause of the damage. There will, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiffs, and the usual order for a reference to ascertain the damage, if any.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, and Barham, agents for E. W. Knocker. Dover.

Solicitors for the defendants, Downing, Holman, and Co.

Wednesday, June 20, 1894.

(Before BRUCE, J.)

THE SALTBURN. (a)

Salvage — Apportionment — Deductions — Interlineations and alterations in agreement—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 182—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 18—Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 41), s. 182.

An agreement by which a seaman stipulates that he shall be entitled to his proportion of a sum awarded for salvage services, calculated not upon the amount awarded but upon so much of that amount as remains after certain deductions have been made, is inoperative by virtue of sect. 182 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854.

Semble, clauses respecting deductions that are to be made inserted in such an agreement, without the consent of all the parties interested, are interlineations and alterations within the meaning of sect. 22 of the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883, and are therefore void.

MOTION for apportionment of salvage.

This was an application on behalf of Charles Ede and Stephen Green, the chief and second engineers of the steam trawler North Sea, to apportion the sum of 900*l.*, awarded by Barnes, J., on 30th May 1893, to the owners, master, and crew of that vessel for salvage services rendered to the steamship Saltburn in conjunction with the steam trawler Witham.

The North Sea, which belonged to the port of Hull, and was of 57 tons net register, with triple expansion engines of forty-five horse power nominal, and carried a crew of nine hands, was on a fishing voyage at the time the services were rendered. Her value was 5000*l.*, and she had full stores of coals, provisions, ice, and fishing gear to last fifteen days. The Witham, which was also engaged in trawling, was of 83 tons net register, with triple expansion engines of forty-five horse power nominal. Her value was 4000*l.* The Saltburn was a steamship of 837 tons net register, and was at the time in question on a voyage from Aarhuus to Bo'ness in ballast.

On the 17th March 1893 the Witham fell in with the Saltburn about 180 miles to the N.E. of Spurn Point. The latter had sprung a leak and was in a sinking condition, short of provisions and coal, with the fires put out by water and her crew exhausted with pumping. The Witham towed her for two days, when they came up with the North Sea, with whose assistance the vessel was towed to the Humber. On 20th March, with the assistance of a tug, she was placed on the mud, and eventually pumped out and docked. Her value was agreed at 7750*l.*

On the 30th May 1893, in consolidated actions brought by the owners of the two trawlers against the owners of the Saltburn, Barnes, J., assisted by Trinity Masters, awarded to the Witham the sum of 1350*l.*, and to the North Sea the sum of 900*l.* This latter sum the court was now moved to apportion so far as regarded only Charles Ede and Stephen Green, to whom the owners of the North Sea had, in making the apportionment, given the sums of 27*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* and 15*l.* 0*s.* 8½*d.* respectively. The facts respecting the agreement entered into by the two applicants appear in the judgment.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Sect. 182 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) provides that

No seaman shall by any agreement forfeit his lien upon the ship, or be deprived of any remedy for the recovery of his wages to which he would otherwise have been entitled; and every stipulation in any agreement inconsistent with any provision of this Act, and every stipulation by which any seaman consents to abandon his right to wages in the case of the loss of the ship, or to abandon any right which he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage, shall be wholly inoperative.

By sect. 18 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63)

It is hereby declared that the 182nd section of the principal Act does not apply to the case of any stipulation made by the seamen belonging to any ship, which, according to the terms of the agreement, is to be employed on salvage service, with respect to the remuneration to be paid to them for salvage services to be rendered by such ship to any other ship or ships.

Sect. 13 of the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 41) provides that

The skipper of every fishing boat shall enter into an agreement with every seaman (not being a boy under such an agreement as is by this Act required) whom he carries to sea from any port in the United Kingdom as one of his crew; and every such agreement shall be in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, and shall be dated on the date of the first signature thereof, and shall be signed by the skipper before any seaman signs the same, and shall contain the following particulars as terms thereof, that is to say: 1. The nature, and as far as practicable, the duration of the intended voyage or engagement. 2. The number and description of the crew. 3. The time at which each seaman is to be on board or to begin work. 4. The capacity in which each seaman is to serve. 5. The remuneration which each seaman is to receive, whether in wages or by a share in the catch, or in both ways, and the time from which each seaman's remuneration is to commence. 6. A scale of the provisions which are to be furnished to each seaman. 7. Any regulations as to conduct on board, and as to fines, short allowance of provisions, or other lawful punishments for misconduct which have been sanctioned by the Board of Trade as regulations proper to be adopted, and which the parties agree to adopt. And every such agreement shall be so framed as to admit of stipulations, to be adopted at the will of the skipper and seaman in each case, as to advance and allotment of wages, and may contain any other stipulations which are not contrary to law.

Gerard Ince supported the motion on behalf of the chief and second engineers of the North Sea.

Butler Aspinall represented the owners of the North Sea.

The arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment. In addition to the cases there cited the following were referred to:

The Wigtownshire, 36 L. J. Adm. 11;
The City of Chester, 51 L. T. Rep. 485; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 311; 9 P. Div. 182.

BRUCE, J.—This is an application made on behalf of two of the members of the crew of the steam trawler North Sea to apportion to each of them an equitable share of the sum of 900*l*., which has been awarded to the owners, master, and crew of their vessel for salvage services rendered to the Saltburn. The North Sea was at the time the services were rendered engaged on a fishing expedition in the North Sea. The crew, including the two men on behalf of whom the motion has been made, signed a running agreement for the fishing expedition, which was in a printed form issued by the Board of Trade, and expressed to be so issued in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act of 1883. The printed agreement contains a clause which states that every member of the crew shall be regarded as entitled to participate in any sums of money arising from salvage in the proportion set forth opposite to their names. The copy of the agreement produced in court contained, in a column headed "share of salvage," the proportions of salvage which each member of the crew was to be entitled to receive. The two applicants, who filled respectively the posts of first and second engineer, according to this scale would be entitled to 4½ and 2½ per cent. of the salvage awarded. But there was evidence produced on behalf of the applicants to prove that the column stating the proportion of salvage to which each member of the crew should be entitled was not filled in at the time when it was signed, and it was admitted by counsel for the owners that there was not sufficient proof to rebut that evidence. I cannot, therefore, regard the agreement as affording a binding rule for regulating the proportions of salvage to which the applicants are entitled. But the main dispute in the case has arisen upon clauses in the agreement respecting the deductions to be made from the salvage award before apportioning amongst the crew their share. At the end of the printed clause of the agreement the following words are added: "After first making the deductions hereinafter mentioned." There follows a little lower down a clause added to the printed form: "The deductions to be so made from any salvage moneys shall be loss of fishing, damage to vessel and gear, injury to crew." In the present case, the North Sea sustained damage in rendering the salvage services, and of course lost time which would otherwise have been spent in fishing. It is quite clear from the judgment of Barnes, J., that in awarding 900*l*. to the North Sea he took into consideration that the vessel had received damage, and had she not been engaged in salvage services might have been profitably employed in fishing. But although the learned judge took these matters into consideration in fixing the sum of 900*l*., he did not attempt to ascertain with exactness the amount of damage and loss incurred, and he made no special order respecting the payment of loss or damage to the owners, and I must therefore come to the conclusion that, although in consideration of the damage and loss a larger sum has been awarded than would otherwise have been, yet the whole of the 900*l*. must be regarded as salvage reward, and should be apportioned amongst the owners, master, and crew without any other deduction than costs in the salvage suit.

The question also then arises, Can the agreement in any way affect the right of the crew to the shares they would otherwise be entitled to? I think it cannot. An agreement to abandon a right in the nature of salvage is inoperative by virtue of sect. 182 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and the present case does not fall within the exception provided for in sect. 18 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862. An agreement by which a seaman stipulates that he shall be entitled to his proportion of the sum awarded as salvage, calculated not upon the amount awarded, but upon so much of that amount as remains after certain deductions have been made, is, I think, an agreement within the meaning of the clause. By such an agreement a seaman gives up his right to a share in a part of the amount awarded, and to which, but for the agreement, he would be entitled. Such a stipulation seems to me to be not only within the words of the section, but calculated to give rise to the very mischief which the section was intended to provide against. Sir James Hannen, in the case of The De Bay (49 L. T. Rep. 414; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 156; 8 App. Cas., at p. 563), says: "It is frequently difficult and expensive, and sometimes impossible, to ascertain with exactness the amount of such loss," referring to the damage and loss sustained by a salving vessel. If, then, the amount of such damage and loss is to be deducted from the amount of the salvage award, how is that amount to be ascertained? If the owners are themselves to be at liberty to assess the amount of the damage, as apparently the owners in this case claimed to have the right to do, there can be no security that the assessment would be fair and impartial. If, on the other hand, the damage is to be assessed by the registrar of this court, or by a referee to be agreed on by the parties, much expense and delay would be incurred in many cases of apportionment. I think the plain meaning of the statute and the interests of the seafaring community require that I should hold a clause providing that deductions should be made from the salvage remuneration to be inoperative. Apart from the reasons I have already stated, I should be prepared to hold that the clauses inserted in the agreement respecting deductions that are to be made are interlineations and alterations within the meaning of sect. 22 of the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883, and as it has not been proved to my satisfaction that these interlineations and alterations were made with the consent of all the persons interested, such interlineations and alterations in my opinion on that ground are void.

I have felt considerable difficulty in apportioning the amount. I think I cannot gain much assistance from the agreement; therefore I must endeavour as well as I can to apportion to the applicants the shares equitably due to them of the salvage money awarded. I have to deal with the sum of 900*l.* The services were rendered by a steam fishing boat, and undoubtedly, as I have already said, Barnes, J. took into consideration the damage sustained by the vessel, and the possible loss of profits from fishing. Therefore I think it is a case where the owners are entitled to a considerable proportion of the salvage award. I should first of all say, that from the 900*l.* I think there should be deducted the sum of 84*l.* 2s., which is the sum the owners claim for extra costs. That, I think, they are entitled to deduct from the amount awarded, according to the decision of Barnes, J. in The Wilhelm Tell (1892) P. 337; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 329). They are entitled to deduct those costs because they were expended in obtaining the salvage award. That leaves 815*l.* I think the owners are entitled to a considerable share, and I think I should not be awarding too much to them if—I mention the award because I must decide it—I give them three-quarters of the sum of 815*l.* That would leave a sum of about 204*l.* to be apportioned among the crew. Of that sum the master is entitled to a considerable proportion. The master in this case was not like the other members of the crew, because he had a share in the earnings of the vessel, and therefore in the event of the salvage services being unsuccessful, and he incurred the loss which might have been incurred in attempting to render salvage services, while other members of the crew would have received their wages he would have received no money at all. Therefore I think he is entitled to special consideration in this case, and I do not think I should be awarding him more than he is entitled to by saying he should receive one-third. That leaves a sum of about 136*l.* to be divided amongst the members of the crew according to their rating. I have to consider what sum the two applicants are entitled to, according to their rating. There is a little difficulty in fixing this sum, because the mate was not paid by wages but by a share in the vessel, and therefore I have been obliged, with the assistance of the registrar, to ascertain what his wages would have been if he were entered as entitled to wages. Giving the best consideration to the matter, I think, according to his rating, the first engineer is entitled to 27*l.*, and the second engineer to 20*l.* Therefore I apportion that amount to them. According to his rating, I think the share of the first engineer would be a little less than 27*l.*, but as the sum of 27*l.* has been offered him by the owners, I do not award him less. To the second engineer the owners offered a less sum than 20*l.*, but as the increase in the apportionment has been so slight upon the amount offered by the owners, I do not think I can allow costs. It will be judgment for the sums I have mentioned, without costs.

Solicitor for the chief and second engineers of the North Sea, W. H. Cowl, for E. and W. H Cowl, Great Yarmouth.

Solicitors for the owners of the North Sea, Pritchard and Sons, for A. M. Jackson and Co., Hull.

June 18 and 25, 1894.

(Before BRUCE, J.)

THE GEORG. (a)

Salvage — Appraisement — Mistake — Varying decree.

Where the defendants in a salvage action had allowed the court to proceed to award salvage upon the marshal's appraisement, the Court refused to vary the decree merely because, after the decree, for some reason unexplained, the property was sold at much less than the appraised value.

Semble: The court cannot entertain any suggestion that a salvage award should be reduced in proportion to the difference between the appraised value, and the value realised upon the sale, because the amount of salvage award does not bear any fixed proportion to the value of the property salved.

MOTION to vary salvage award.

The facts which gave rise to this application were as follows:

On the 1st Jan. 1894, the steamship Georg, of 1194 tons register, whilst on a voyage from

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bremen to New York, with a general cargo, came into collision with the Oberon, a screw steamship of 1763 tons net register, belonging to the port of London, about seven miles east of the North Sand Head lightship in the straits of Dover. The Georg lost her jibboom, and received serious damage to her starboard bow and anchor, and she engaged the paddle-wheel steam tug Granville, of Dover, to tow her to Dover, where she was brought up off Dover Castle by her port bower anchor.

On the 2nd Jan. the wind increased to a hurricane from the E. to E.N.E., with heavy snow squalls and a terrific sea, and at about 10.30 p.m. those on board the Granville, which was anchored on the west side of the Admiralty Pier, observed signals of distress, and found that the Georg had dragged her anchor, and was in imminent danger of striking the pier. The tug went to her assistance, and with great difficulty passed a hawser on board and drew her clear of the pier, but could not altogether prevent her from dragging, owing to the force of the wind and sea. The tug Challenge then came up, and also succeeded in passing her tow rope aboard, and the two tugs held the Georg off till daybreak. At about 9.30 a.m. the Georg slipped her anchors, and the tugs towed her to the Solent in terrific weather, and with the assistance of a pilot she was safely moored to the Government buoys at Southampton about noon on the 4th Jan. The appraised value of the Georg was 1250*l.*, and of her cargo 5004*l.*, total 6254*l.* The Dover Harbour Board, owners of the Granville, and Messrs. Dick and Page and others, owners of the tug Challenge, brought an action for the services rendered, and on the 3rd Feb. Barnes, J. awarded 1500*l.* to be divided equally between the two tugs. The Oberon also brought an action for damage against the Georg, and on 30th Jan. the latter vessel was found alone to blame. In addition to the award of 1500*l.* to the two tugs, the pilot was subsequently awarded 130*l.*, and judgment was also given in the County Court against the Georg for 100*l.* for other salvage services. The total salvage award obtained against the Georg was thus 1730*l.* The defendants being unable to give bail for that amount, the ship and her cargo were sold, and realised a net sum of 1624*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.* The whole of the proceeds were thus absorbed by the salvage awards, and there was nothing left to satisfy the claim of the Oberon. On 18th June the defendants applied to the court to vary the salvage award, on the ground that a mistakeh ad been made by the marshal in the appraisement.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Dr. Stubbs in support of the motion on behalf of the owners of the Georg. The court has power, if a mistake has been made in the values, to make the necessary alterations in the salvage award:

The James Armstrong, 33 L. T. Rep. 390; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 46; 4 Adm. & Eccles. 380.
The Markland, 24 L. T. Rep. 596; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 44; 3 Adm. & Eccles. 340.

Butler Aspinall supported the application on behalf of the owners of the Oberon.

Dr. Raikes, Q.C. for the owners, master, and crew of the tugs.—It is submitted that such an alteration as is here asked for has never been made by this court. In the Cargo ex Venus (L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Eccles. 50), Dr. Lushington said: "It would, in my opinion, unless under extraordinary circumstances, be imprudent on the part of the court to allow an appraisement, made under its authority, to be departed from. In the first place an appraisement made by the authority of this court is made with great care and perfect impartiality, and is always considered to be a fixed sum, unless it is objected to on particularly strong grounds at the moment it is brought in. But an appraisement might be attempted to be barred in two ways—by one it might be attempted to be said the appraisement is too high, and by the other it is too low, and great delay and expense would be incurred if the court encouraged proceedings of this kind." The question the court has to decide is the value of the cargo at the time the salvage services were rendered. [BRUCE, J.: Is the appraisement to be calculated upon what it would fetch at a sale, or what it is worth?] It is submitted it would be the actual value the thing possessed:

The Monarch, 1 W. Rob. 21.

There the court limits itself as to the conditions under which it will vary the decree. The error must be brought to the attention of the court with the utmost possible diligence. It has never been the practice for one judge to vary the decision of another when fairly tried out. [BRUCE, J.: No doubt, but Barnes, J. is not available at the present time (the learned judge was away on sick leave]. It could have been brought before his Lordship before he left the country. The Court has recently refused a similar application:

The Nymphen (not reported).

The John Bastian (5 Christ. Rob. 303) is another case bearing on the point.

Aspinall, Q.C. in reply.—Here the sale was by the officer of the court. In The Nymphen the whole question of the values was gone into before the President. A subsequent application was made to induce him to vary the award, and he very properly refused, as the value had been agreed by counsel in court. As to arriving at the value of the cargo, see Kennedy's Law of Civil Salvage, p. 190. The case of The George Dean (Swabey, 290) is there referred to. The price the cargo would fetch at the port to which it is carried is the test of its value. "The nearest and most convenient market" is the expression in Kennedy. Dr. Lushington, in The Cargo ex Venus (ubi sup.), says the circumstances must be extraordinary to induce the court to depart from an appraisement, and it is submitted that here there was an extraordinary state of things, and all possible expedition has been employed.

Judgment was reserved, and delivered on the 25th June as follows:

BRUCE, J.—This is an action of salvage in which Barnes, J. on 3rd Feb. awarded to the plaintiffs 1500*l.*, and taxed costs. I am now asked to vary this decree on the ground that it was made upon a mistaken appraisement of the values of the property by the marshal. There are authorities which establish the power of the court to rehear causes, and in its discretion to vary its decrees where it has proceeded upon a mistake. (The Monarch, ubi sup.; The Franconia, 39 L. T. Rep. 57; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 3 P. Div. 340; and The James Armstrong, ubi sup.). But this power ought to be exercised rarely and with great caution, for otherwise much inconvenience and uncertainty would ensue. In the present case the value of the ship was appraised by the marshal at 1250*l.*, and the value of the cargo at 5004*l.* After the judgment was delivered, viz., on 17th May, the ship was sold by the marshal for 713*l.* 10*s.*, and in March, April, and June the cargo was sold by the marshal in several parcels for 1649*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.*, making a total gross value of 2362*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* The ship and cargo having been for a long time under arrest—a portion of the cargo having been five months under arrest—the marshal's fees and disbursements were heavy, and amounted altogether to a sum of 737*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.*, thus reducing the net proceeds in court to a sum of 1624*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.* I should observe that of this sum of 737*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.* upwards of 167*l.* seems to be made up of dock charges and tonnage dues in respect of the ship, and upwards of 169*l.* is for warehouse rent in respect of the cargo. Beyond the discrepancy between the figures of the appraisement and the proceeds of the sale there is nothing before me to point to any mistake in the appraisement. The defendants allowed the court to proceed to judgment on the appraisement, without taking any exception to the appraisement, and without making any application to have the value of the property ascertained by sale. They filed affidavits of value in which the value of the ship was stated to be 1000*l.*, and the value of the cargo 4167*l.* 6*s.*, thus making a total value of 5167*l.* 6*s.*, which although less than the appraisement by the marshal, is yet very much greater than the amount which was realised by the sale. Beyond the statement made in the affidavit filed in support of the present motion that the affidavit of value was made upon the basis of the invoice value of the cargo, there is no suggestion that any mistake was made by the plaintiffs in estimating the value of the cargo, and there is nothing to indicate that the appraisement made by the marshal did not fairly represent the value of the cargo at the time and place when it was brought into safety. The cargo consisted chiefly of bags which had been shipped on board the defendant's vessel at Bremen for a port in the United States. The bags were of the kind commonly used for the stowage of grain, and no doubt if the vessel had arrived safely in the United States, or if the sale of the bags could have been effected at a port where grain is an article of export, they would have realised a comparatively high value; and if, in estimating the value of the bags to the defendants, the marshal took into consideration the opportunity the defendants had of disposing of the bags at a profit at the port of destination, and the cost to be incurred in carrying them to the port of destination, upon the principle indicated by Dr. Lushington, in the case of The George Dean (ubi sup.), I cannot say that he made any mistake in the appraisement. But it is enough that there is no evidence to show that there was any mistake or error in the appraisement. It is said that if the sale had taken place before the award of salvage, Barnes, J. would have taken the value realised by the sale as the value on which to base his award. But where the defendants have allowed the court to proceed to award salvage upon the appraisement I think they cannot call upon the court to vary the decree merely because since the decree it has been found, for some reason which is not explained, that the property has been sold at much less than the appraised value. In the case of The Cargo ex Venus (ubi sup.), Dr. Lushington held the appraisement to be conclusive, notwithstanding that the sum actually realised by the sale was less than the appraised value. If, after proceedings had been regularly taken, and judgment pronounced in the ordinary course, it would be open for parties, on facts happening after the judgment, to reopen the whole case, the greatest confusion and uncertainty would prevail. In a salvage suit, unless there had been an agreement as to the value, no judgment could ever be considered as final. In the present case, if I were to disregard the judgment founded on the appraisement, what judgment could I pronounce without a re-hearing of the case, and a re-hearing of the case would involve so much cost and inconvenience that it is practically out of the question. It has been suggested that the salvage award might be reduced in proportion to the difference between the appraised value and the value realised on the sale. But as the amount of salvage award does not bear any fixed proportion to the value of the property salved, such a method of proceeding could not lead to any satisfactory result. It is said there was a suit by other salvors against the same ship and cargo, heard by the President, after the judgment of Barnes, J., who made a salvage award based upon values less than the appraised value. No doubt the President acted upon the evidence of the value of the property then brought before him, but the circumstance that the evidence before the President in that case was not the same as the evidence before Barnes, J. in the other, seems to me to afford no reason why the award of Barnes, J. should be varied. I cannot see any sufficient reason why I should vary the decree. The defendants ask not only that the judgment should be varied, but they ask for an order that the plaintiffs should pay the costs of the first appraisement of the ship and cargo. But, as I have already said, I can find no fault with the appraisement. The circumstance that the property sold for a comparatively small sum is not, I think, proof that the defendants were correct in stating the value of the ship and cargo to be less than the values at which they were appraised by the marshal. I must therefore reject the motion, with costs. (a)

Solicitors: for the Georg, Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes; for the Oberon, Thomas Cooper and Co.; for the tug Granville, Clarkson, Greenwells, and Co., for Stillwell and Harby, Dover; for the tug Challenge, Lowless and Co.

June 18 and 25, 1894.

(Before BRUCE, J.)

THE MONA. (b)

Practice—Tender—Order XXII., rr. 1 and 5—Order LXXII., r. 2.

A tender, according to the old Admiralty practice, is nothing more than an offer, and it was not intended by Order XXII. to alter this practice, or to assimilate it to the technical rules regulating tender at common law; hence, where in a collision action the defendants having agreed to pay a percentage of the plaintiffs' damages, tendered a sum which the registrar found to be in excess of the sum due to the plaintiffs, the Court refused to order payment out of court to the plaintiffs of the whole of the tender, and only gave them the amount found due by the registrar.

(a) This decision was affirmed on appeal.—ED.

(b) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the absence of any express rule regulating in other respects the practice of tender in court in an Admiralty action, it may reasonably be concluded that, in accordance with the provisions of Order LXXII., r. 2, the old procedure and practice of tender in Admiralty actions should remain in force, except in so far as the rules affect the manner in which the money is to be lodged in court.

SUMMONS (adjourned into court) by the plaintiffs for payment of tender.

This was a plaintiffs' application arising out of an action for damage by collision brought by Messrs. Phillips and Graves and others, owners of the dumb barge Stockholm and cargo, against the owners of the steamship Mona.

On the 8th Jan. 1894 the parties agreed to settle the action on the terms that the defendants should pay 67½ per cent. of the damages, and they filed an agreement in court to that effect. They were, however, unable to agree as to the amount of the damages, and the assessment was accordingly referred to the registrar and merchants to report thereon.

On the 5th April the defendants filed a notice of tender of the sum of 700*l.* and taxed costs up to that date, and on the 7th May they filed a notice of tender of an additional sum of 50*l.*, with taxed costs up to the time of this further tender, thus making a sum of 750*l.* tendered in satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claim.

On the 24th May the reference was held, and the registrar found that the sum of 713*l.* 16*s.* was due to the plaintiffs in respect of their claim. He was further of opinion that as a more than sufficient tender of 750*l.* was duly offered to the plaintiffs, they must be condemned in costs subsequent thereto.

The plaintiffs now took out a summons to have the whole amount of 750*l.* paid out to them, and the matter was adjourned into court for argument upon the question of law.

F. Laing appeared for the plaintiffs.

Butler Aspinall for the defendants.

On the 25th June BRUCE, J. delivered the following judgment:

BRUCE, J.—(The learned judge shortly stated the facts and continued:) The plaintiffs contend that the tender in court amounts to an admission by the defendants that the amount tendered is due. The defendants contend that the tender was nothing more than an offer, and that when the offer was not accepted they were at liberty to establish, if they could, that a smaller sum was due. They ask that the balance remaining, after satisfying the amount found to be due, should be paid to them. The argument of the plaintiffs' counsel was based mainly upon Order XXII. of the Rules of the Supreme Court. The main question for consideration is, whether rules 1 and 5 of that order govern the practice of tender by act in court in the Admiralty Division in cases where the liability has been admitted prior to the tender, and the only question pending is as to the amount of the damages to be fixed by the registrar. Rule 1 in Order XXII. provides that a defendant, in actions of debt or damages, may before or at the time of delivering his defence, or at any later time by leave of the court or judge, pay into court a sum of money by way of satisfaction, which shall be taken to admit the claim or cause of action; or he may, with a defence denying liability, pay money into court which shall be subject to the provisions of rule 6. It seems to me to be doubtful whether this rule applies to salvage actions, which do not, I think, come under the category of actions brought to recover a debt or damages, and if it does not apply to one large class of actions in the Admiralty Division, it may be open to contend that it was not intended to apply to other actions in the Admiralty Division. But it is sufficient for the present purpose to observe that the provisions of this rule seem, when read in connection with rule 2, to be applicable to actions where the claim or cause of action in respect of which the money is paid in is admitted or denied by the defence. It does not seem to contemplate a payment into court in an Admiralty action after the question of liability has been determined by agreement between the parties, and the question of the amount of damages has been referred. The same may be said of rule 5, which provides for the case when payment into court is made, with a defence setting up a tender of the sum paid. That, I think, clearly applies to a tender before action as understood in the common law courts. The defence of tender at common law was highly technical, and did not apply to an action for unliquidated damages. If the debt or duty was of such a nature as to be discharged by a tender and refusal, the plea of tender was a plea in bar, but in other cases it was necessary in pleading tender to plead uncore prist—that is, to allege that the defendant was still ready and willing to pay, and so the plea amounted to an admission that the amount tendered was due, and the plaintiff was entitled to the amount tendered, though he should be nonsuited, or a verdict should be found against him: (see Bacon's Abridgment, "Tender.") The long-established practice in the Admiralty Court was altogether different from the rules which regulate tender at common law, and I do not think that it can be gathered from any reasonable construction of the provisions of Order XXII. that it was intended to abrogate the old practice which prevailed in Admiralty actions. According to the old practice in Admiralty, a tender was nothing more than an offer. If the offer was accepted there was an end of the action, and if it was not accepted, the fact that a tender had been made was a circumstance to be taken into consideration by the court in the exercise of its discretion in awarding costs. It seems, according to the old practice, that tenders were often made informally out of court, but disputes arising in many cases as to whether alleged tenders had really been made or not, the court, in order to prevent this inconvenience, required the tender to be made by act in court, and the money tendered to be brought into court, so that no doubt could arise as to the fact of tender or the amount of the tender: (see per Lord Stowell, The Vrouw Margaretha (4 Rob. 106.) And where a tender was made by act in court it was usual for the court to name a day on or before which the plaintiffs should declare whether they accepted or rejected the tender. In The General Palmer (2 Hagg. 180), Sir Christopher Robinson said that in future cases he should hold neither the court nor the owners bound in any manner by a tender not accepted in due time, and the learned reporter, in the marginal note to the case, interprets the words of the judge to mean that a tender not accepted in due time may be reduced by the court. In The Johannes (6 N. C. 296) a tender of fifteen guineas had been made by the defendants to the plaintiffs in a salvage suit. Sir John Nicholl pronounced against the claim, and directed the amount tendered in court to be paid out, not to the plaintiffs, but to the defendants, to go pro tanto in payment of their costs. I cannot find any case in which it has been held that a tender made in an Admiralty action, not accepted by the plaintiffs, has been held to operate as a binding admission to the amount due. In Coote's Admiralty Practice, at page 37 of the edition of 1860, it is stated: "If the tender be rejected the suit is prosecuted to a judicial determination. The money remains idle in the hands of the registrar until the end of the suit, when, after certain formalities, it is delivered over to the defendant who has paid it in, or to the plaintiff to whom it is awarded." I cannot think that it was intended by Order XXII. to alter the old practice in Admiralty actions respecting tender, or to assimilate it to the technical rules regulating tender at common law. With regard to the proceedings after admission of liability in the Admiralty Registry, I may observe that, although Order LVI. lays down rules to regulate the procedure in such cases, there are not among such rules any relating to a tender in a reference, and that, I think, affords some ground for holding that tenders in such references were intended to be left to be regulated by the old practice. Order XXII. no doubt provides the manner in which the money tendered is to be lodged in court, but rule 20 enacts an express provision with respect to the payment of money out of court in an Admiralty action; and in the absence of any express rule regulating in other respects the practice of tender in court in an Admiralty action, I think it is reasonable to conclude that it was intended, in accordance with the provisions of Order LXXII., r. 2, that the old procedure and practice of tender in Admiralty actions should remain in force, except in so far as the rules affect the manner in which the money is to be lodged in court.

But the matter seems to be concluded by authority. I do not rely upon the case of The Dunbeth, which was referred to in the argument, because the order made by Barnes, J. in that case was made by consent. But the case of The R. W. Boyd seems to be on all fours with the present case. It was a case of damage. There was an admission of liability by the defendants, and afterwards notice of tender by the defendants of 125*l.* The registrar, on the reference, found that less than 120*l.* was due. The plaintiffs moved that the amount of the tender should be paid out to them. That motion was argued before Butt, J. and rejected by him, and it was ordered that the 125*l.* should be paid out to the plaintiffs' solicitors, only on the terms of their undertaking to pay the balance to the solicitors of the defendants. That was a decision in June 1886, and is, I think, a decision binding upon me in this case. I must therefore reject the application of the plaintiffs, with costs.

F. Laing pointed out that in any event the plaintiffs would have had to apply for an order for the payment out of the sum found by the registrar to be due to them. He contended, therefore, that the plaintiffs were entitled to their costs.

Butler Aspinall submitted that the real matter at issue was the attempt by the plaintiffs to get the whole amount paid into court by the defendants. On that ground he contended the plaintiffs were not entitled to costs. He also applied for confirmation of the registrar's report.

BRUCE, J. allowed the plaintiffs the costs of the summons, and also made an order confirming the report of the registrar.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, J. A. and H. E. Farnfield.

Solicitor for the defendants, Charles E. Harvey.

July 2 and 3, 1894.

(Before BRUCE, J.)

THE THETA. (a)

Personal injury—Action in rem—Admiralty Court Jurisdiction Act (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 7—Meaning of word "damage."

The chief engineer of a steamship, while crossing the deck of another vessel moored between the quay and his own vessel, fell down a hatchway, which was covered with tarpaulin, and was injured.

Held, that the ship could not be said to be the active instrument of the damage done, that it was done on board the ship, and not by the ship, within the meaning of sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Jurisdiction Act; and hence the Court had no jurisdiction in rem to entertain an action by the injured man.

The word "damage" is as applicable to damage done to person as to damage done to property.

MOTION to set aside writ and dismiss action.

This was an action in rem brought by William Yule, chief engineer of the steamship Faithful, of the port of Liverpool, against the owners of the ship or vessel Theta, to recover damages for injuries sustained through falling down the hold of the Theta.

The Theta, a Norwegian barque, was on the 5th June 1894 lying moored to the quay in the Regent's Canal Dock. Work on her having been finished for the day, her hatches, which had been opened, were covered up with tarpaulins in the usual way, and she was left for the night with no one in charge except the dock officials.

About 9 p.m., according to the plaintiff's written statement, he being desirous of getting on board his vessel, the Faithful, which was lying outside the Theta, and moored alongside her, got on board the Theta, and in stepping from the gangway on to the hatch, which he supposed was safe, he stepped on to the tarpaulin covering, and fell down the hold, sustaining certain injuries.

The Admiralty Court Jurisdiction Act, s. 7, is as follows:

> The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship.

Parker Lowe in support of the motion.—It is submitted that there is no jurisdiction in the

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Admiralty Court to try an action in rem under these circumstances, whether there be negligence proved or not, as it was not an active commission of an injury on the part of the ship within the meaning of the Act:

The Sylph, 17 L. T. Rep. 519; L. Rep. 2 Adm. 24;
The Beta, 12 L. T. Rep. 1; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 447.

The word "damage" does not cover damage done to a person, even when done in a collision. In Smith v. Brown (24 L. T. Rep. 808; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 56; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 729), Cockburn, C.J. says (p. 732 L. Rep.): "The question is whether loss of life or personal injury occasioned by the collision of two vessels comes under the term 'damage' as used in this section" (Adm. Court Act, s. 7). "Now the words used are, undoubtedly, very extensive, but it is to be observed that neither in common parlance nor in legal phraseology is the word 'damage' used as applicable to injuries done to the person, but solely as applicable to mischief done to property. . . . We speak, indeed, of damages as compensation for injury done to the person; but the term 'damage' is not employed interchangeably with the word 'injury' with reference to mischief wrongfully occasioned to the person." And again, at p. 735 (L. Rep.): "It is true that in the case of The Uhla (L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 29, n.), Dr. Lushington held that, where a ship had driven against a breakwater, and had done damage to it, a suit in the Admiralty Court would lie; but there the damage had actually been done to the breakwater by the ship itself, and the case, therefore, came within the very words of the Act, nor was there the difficulty we have pointed out in the application of the term 'damage' to personal injury":

Simpson v. Blues, 26 L. T. Rep. 697; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 326; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290.

Lord Blackburn says in The Vera Cruz (51 L. T. Rep. 104; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 386; 10 App. Cas. at p. 72): "If the question now raised had been that which the Court of Queen's Bench, of which I was then a member, treated as raised in Smith v. Brown (ubi sup.) . . . whether personal damage to a man who lived was within that 7th section of the enactment, I should have had, as I then had, some doubt about the matter, and it would have carried me so far that, if that had been the question now raised, I certainly should have wished to hear the case argued out to the end before giving an opinion upon it one way or the other. But the question raised here being exclusively whether the liability of a shipowner as a person, under Lord Campbell's Act, to make good damages for the negligence of his servant, who happens to be the master of the ship, comes within the words 'damage done by any ship,' I decidedly say that I do not think it does." [BRUCE, J. referred to The Zeta, 33 L. T. Rep. 477; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 73; L. Rep. 4 Adm. 22.]

Sir Walter Phillimore for the plaintiffs.—In the Court of Appeal, in the case of The Vera Cruz No. 2 (9 P. Div. 96), Brett, M.R. says: "The section indeed seems to me to intend by the words, 'jurisdiction' over any claim in the nature of an action on the case for damage done by any ship, or, in other words, over a case in which a ship was the active cause, the damage being physically caused by the ship. I do not say that damage need be confined to damage to property, it may be damage to person, as if a man were injured by the bowsprit of a ship. But the section does not apply to a case where physical injury is not done by a ship." Further on he says: "The real cause of action is, in fact, pecuniary loss caused to these persons; it is not a cause of action for anything done by a ship, which is only one ingredient in the right of action." Then Bowen, L.J. says, "'Done by a ship' means done by those in charge of a ship, with the ship as the noxious instrument." Lord Selborne, in the House of Lords, draws exactly the same distinction. The line is drawn between injuries causing death on the one hand, and those not causing death on the other. If a ship coming into harbour, knocks down a man with her bowsprit, that is clearly within The Sylph (ubi sup.) and The Zeta (ubi sup.). There is no distinction between an act done in the course of navigation, and in the course of loading. There is a certain amount of analogy in The Clara Killam (23 L. T. Rep. 27; L. Rep. 3 Adm. 161). With regard to the question of jurisdiction, the defendants are Norwegian, and the object of this procedure is to secure to the plaintiff the fruits of a judgment for an injury done to him in his own country.

Parker Lowe in reply.—Lord Selborne says, in The Vera Cruz (10 App. Cas., at p. 67): "It is to my mind . . . a personal action given for a personal injury inflicted by a person who would have been liable to an action for damages manifestly in the common law courts, if death had not ensued." [BRUCE, J. referred to The George and Richard, 24 L. T. Rep. 717; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 50; L. Rep. 3 Adm. 466.]

The Max Morris, 30 Davies's Reports, 1.

Here the ship was merely an unsafe gangway.

Judgment was reserved and delivered on the following day as follows:

BRUCE, J.—In this case the defendants move to set aside the writ and to dismiss the action with costs, on the ground that this court has no jurisdiction. The question before me turns on the words in the Admiralty Court Act, "damage done by the ship." I see no reason to doubt that the word damage is as applicable to damage done to person as to damage done to property. It seems to me to be doing great violence to the ordinary meaning of the word "damage" to limit it to damage to property. I see that in the classics the word damage is used as applicable to mischief done to person. There is one passage from the authorised version of the New Testament, where in the 27th chapter of the Acts, Saint Paul says, "I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and much damage, not only of the lading and ship, but also of our lives." Not only does the word "damage" in the ordinary classics apply to mischief to person, but I think on the authorities that its meaning comes to much the same in our courts. Of course it is true that it is said in the case of The Zeta (ubi sup.), that "it is impossible to reconcile all the opinions which have proceeded from the bench from time to time." I am guided by the more recent opinion which has been expressed by judges of high authority in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords. I find in the recent case of The Vera Cruz (ubi sup.), the Master of the Rolls says, "I do not say that damage need be confined to damage to property; it may be damage to person." In the House of Lords, in the case of The Zeta, Lord Herschell, after mentioning cases which have been decided, says: "It is not necessary to trouble your Lordships with all the cases. It is enough to say that the proposition that the Act of 1861 applies to damage done by a ship to persons and things other than ships has been well established by many authorities, the correctness of which I see no reason to question." Therefore I have come to the conclusion that it is now decided by authority that the word "damage" by Act of Parliament has the ordinary meaning of the word—damage to property and damage to persons.

But another question arises, viz., whether in the present case the damage was done by the ship. I cannot think that the present case falls within the provisions of the Act of Parliament. Damage done by the ship is, I think, applicable only to those cases where, in the words of the Master of the Rolls in The Vera Cruz, "a ship was the active cause of damage," and, in the words of Bowen, L.J., "the damage done by a ship means damage done by those in charge of a ship with the ship as the noxious instrument." In this case those in charge of the ship so placed a tarpaulin over the hatches as to make a trap into which the plaintiff fell in passing to his own ship. The ship cannot be said to be the active instrument of the damage done. The damage was done on board the ship, and not, I think, in the meaning of the Act, by the ship. Therefore I must allow the motion, with costs, and dismiss the action with costs.

Solicitors: Robert Greening; Pritchard and Sons.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, March 2, 1894.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords WATSON, ASHBOURNE, and MORRIS.)

RICHARDSON, SPENCE, AND CO., AND OTHERS v. ROWNTREE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Passenger — Shipowner — Conditions on ticket limiting liability—Notice—Evidence

The respondent became a passenger by a steamship owned by the appellants, and received a ticket upon which were printed in small type certain conditions limiting the liability of the shipowners for loss or injury to the passengers or their luggage. This ticket was handed to the respondent folded up, so that the conditions were not visible, and her attention was not called to them.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that there was evidence upon which the jury might find that the appellants had not done what was reasonably necessary to give the appellant notice of the conditions, and that she was not bound by them.

Parker v. South-Eastern Railway Company (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 540; 2 C. P. Div. 416) approved.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.) delivered in Feb. 1893, affirming a judgment of Bruce, J. at the trial at the Liverpool Assizes in Dec. 1892.

The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the alleged negligence of the defendants' servants.

In Oct. 1889 the plaintiff, a lady's maid, took a steerage ticket at Philadelphia for Liverpool, by the defendants' steamship Lord Gough, and went on board the next day. During the voyage the plaintiff fell overboard, owing, as she alleged, to the defendants' servants not providing proper guard-rails to a gangway and not properly lighting it. Upon the upper part of the ticket, in large type, were these words:

Received in payment in full for steerage passage for one adult.

Lower down, after some small print, were certain terms, printed in small type, one of which was as follows:

It is mutually agreed for the consideration aforesaid that this ticket is issued and accepted under the following conditions: (d) The company is not under any circumstances liable to an amount exceeding 100 dollars for loss of or injury to the passenger or his luggage.

Across the conditions the name of the ship and other matters were printed in red ink, which partially obscured the printed conditions. The plaintiff having brought her action, the defendants pleaded that they were relieved from liability by the conditions.

The action was tried before Bruce, J. and a special jury, at Liverpool, when the jury found—(1) That there was negligence on the part of the defendants' servants, and no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff; (2) that the plaintiff knew that there was writing or printing on her ticket; (3) that she did not know that the writing or printing on the ticket contained conditions relating to the terms of the contract for her carriage; (4) that the defendants had not done what was reasonably sufficient to give the plaintiff notice of the conditions. The jury assessed the damages at 100*l.*, and the learned judge upon these findings entered judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants applied to the Court of Appeal for judgment, upon the ground that they were protected by the conditions.

The Court of Appeal upheld the judgment in favour of the plaintiff.

Pickford, Q.C. (Bigham, Q.C. with him), for the appellants, contended that, the negligence being admitted, the only question was as to the effect of the conditions on the ticket. We say that as a matter of law they were incorporated with the contract. The judge left the question to the jury in the terms of Parker v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 540; 2 C. P. Div. 416.

The ticket is not only a voucher; the contract is to carry on the terms of the ticket, and there was nothing of the nature of a trap. Henderson v. Stevenson (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 709; L. Rep. 2 H. of L. Sc. 470) is distinguishable upon the facts. In two very similar cases, namely, Burke v. South-Eastern Railway Company (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; 5 C. P. Div. 1) and Watkins v. Rymill (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 426; 10 Q. B. Div. 178), since the decision in Parker v. South-Eastern Railway Company verdicts for the plaintiffs have been set aside.

J. Walton. Q.C. and Collingwood Hope, who appeared for the respondent, were not called upon to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellants their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Herschell).—My Lords: The only question that arose on the trial of this action was, whether the plaintiff was bound by certain conditions limiting the liability of the defendants who had engaged to carry her on the steamer from Philadelphia to Liverpool. The plaintiff paid her passage money and received her ticket from the defendants. On that ticket undoubtedly there were a great number of conditions detailed. The ticket began by stating that each passenger would be required to provide bedding and eating utensils, and then it continued: "It is mutually agreed for the consideration aforesaid that this ticket is issued and accepted upon the following conditions." There are a number of conditions, beginning at the letter (a) and going down to the letter (i); the condition in question was one under letter (d): "The company is not under any circumstances liable to an amount exceeding 100 dollars for loss of or injury to the passenger or his luggage." These questions were left to the jury: (1) "Did the plaintiff know that there was writing or printing on the ticket?" That question they answered in the affirmative. (2) "Did she know that the writing or printing on the ticket contained conditions relating to the terms of the contract of carriage?" That they answered in the negative. (3) "Did the defendants do what was reasonably sufficient to give the plaintiff notice of the conditions?" That they answered in the negative also. Now, these are questions which the majority of the Court of Appeal in the case of Parker v. The South-Eastern Railway Company (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 540; 2 C. P. Div. 416) pointed out by their judgment ought to be left to the jury. That was a case in its broad features very similar to this, inasmuch as the plaintiff there had deposited some luggage at the luggage office of one of the railway companies, and received in return for the deposit of the luggage a ticket on which there was printed "See back," and on the back were certain conditions by which it was sought to limit the liability of the company. The majority of the Court of Appeal held that they could not say, as matter of law, that by reason of taking that ticket in exchange for the goods, the plaintiff was bound by the conditions; that those were questions to be determined by the jury, and that upon their determination would depend the liability of the defendants.

The only question which now comes before this House is, whether there was any evidence to go to the jury upon which they could properly find the answer which they gave to the last two questions. Now, what are the facts, and the only facts, bearing upon this question which were proved before the jury? That the plaintiff paid the money for her passage for the voyage in question, and that she received this ticket handed to her folded up by the ticket clerk, so that no writing was visible unless she opened and read it. There are no facts beyond those. Nothing was said to draw her attention to the fact that this ticket contained any conditions; and the argument of the appellants is and must be this, that where there are no facts beyond those which I have stated, the defendants are entitled, as matter of law, to say that the plaintiff is bound by those conditions. That seems to me to be absolutely in the teeth of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Parker v. South-Eastern Railway, with which I entirely agree, and it does not seem either to be consistent, when the case is carefully considered, with the case of Henderson v. Stevenson (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 709; L. Rep. 2 H. of L. Sc. 470) in your Lordships' house. I therefore move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: I concur. It appears to me that there was ample material for a finding by the jury on all these three issues, and I am at present inclined to think that they found rightly upon them all.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—My Lords: I also quite concur. The ticket in question in this case was for a steerage passenger, a class of people of the humblest description, many of whom have little education, and some of them none. I think, having regard to the facts here, the smallness of the type in which the alleged conditions were printed, the absence of any calling of attention to the alleged conditions, and the stamping in red ink across them, there was quite sufficient evidence to justify the learned judge in letting this case go to the jury.

Lord MORRIS.—My Lords: I concur.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., for Hill, Dickinson, and Co., Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondent, Field, Roscoe, and Co., for Bellringer and Cunliffe, Liverpool.

July 31, Aug. 1, 1893, and March 8, 1894.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords WATSON and MACNAGHTEN.)

HEDLEY v. PINKNEY AND SONS STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Master and seamen — Common employment — Negligence — Unseaworthiness — Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80) s. 5.

The captain and crew employed by a shipowner in the navigation of a ship are fellow-servants engaged in a common employment, and therefore the owner is not liable for negligence of the captain which causes injury or death to one of the crew.

A ship which is properly equipped for encountering the ordinary perils of the sea is not unseaworthy within sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80) because the captain negligently omits to make use of part of her equipment.

A ship was constructed with an opening in her bulwarks which could be readily closed by fixing a movable railing and stanchions. The ship sailed with the railing unfixed, and a storm came on, and one of the crew fell through and was drowned.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the owners were not liable for a breach of the obligation to keep the ship seaworthy during the voyage created by sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876.

Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72) approved.

THIS was an appeal in formâ pauperis from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes, and Kay, L.JJ.), reported in 66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 71, 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 135, and (1892) 1 Q. B. 58; who had set aside a verdict for the appellant, the plaintiff, below, and had entered judgment for the respondents.

The action was brought under Lord Campbell's Act by the widow and administratrix of a seaman who was lost at sea against the shipowners in whose employment he was at the time of his death.

The case was tried before Grantham, J. and a special jury at the Durham Assizes, when the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff with 175*l.* damages.

The facts appear in the reports in the court below and in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

Raikes, Q.C. for the appellant, argued that between the master and crew of a ship the doctrine of "common employment" did not apply. See Ramsay v. Quinn (8 Ir. Rep. C. L. 322), in which Wilson v. Merry (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 30; L. Rep. 1 H. L. Sc. 326), was distinguished. The disciplinary powers of the captain put him in a different position. See also Murphy v. Smith (19 C. B. N. S. 361). Further there was a breach of the obligation created by sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80) to keep the ship in a seaworthy condition during the voyage. Whilst the railing was unfixed, the ship was not seaworthy. The only decision on the section appears to be a Scotch case reported in the Shipping Gazette of 1890, and not elsewhere.

Finlay, Q.C. and Lennard (C. Dodd, Q.C. with them), who appeared for the respondents, were only called upon on the question of unseaworthiness. The intention of the section was that the ship should start on the voyage with all necessary equipment, not to deal with subsequent negligence of the master in making use of it. This ship was "seaworthy" in the ordinary sense of the word.

Raikes, Q.C. in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

March 8, 1894.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell).— My Lords: This action was brought against the respondents, who are the owners of the screw steamer Prodano, by the plaintiff, the widow and administratrix of a seaman who was drowned whilst serving on board that vessel. The deceased was one of a crew of six hands engaged to take the vessel from London to Cardiff. The bulwarks of the vessel generally were four feet to four feet six inches in height, but opposite to the hatchways the permanent bulwarks were only two feet to two feet six inches high, there being stanchions and rails to put into these apertures so as to make the bulwarks of the same height throughout when the hatchways were not in use. The vessel left London on the 8th March 1891. At that time these stanchions and rails had not been fixed, but they were on board, and might during fine weather have been fixed at any time within about twenty minutes. The next day after leaving London the vessel met with bad weather in the English Channel, and began to roll heavily. The deceased whilst engaged in endeavouring to secure a tarpaulin over one of the hatches, lost his hold and footing, owing to a violent lurch of the vessel, and fell overboard through an opening in the bulwarks across which the rails had not been fixed. It was not possible to fix the stanchions and rails after the storm began, but there would have been no difficulty in doing so prior to that time. The action was founded upon the alleged negligence of the master of the vessel in not seeing that the stanchions and rails were fixed in their places before the bad weather came on, and also upon an alleged breach of duty by the master to use all reasonable means to keep the vessel "in a seaworthy condition for the voyage during the same." The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for 175*l.*, for which sum judgment was entered by Grantham, J. before whom the case was tried. The Court of Appeal set aside this judgment, and entered judgment for the defendants, upon the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury of liability on their part. It cannot be doubted that there was evidence of negligence on the part of the master of the vessel, but it is equally free from doubt that if he is to be regarded as the servant of the owner engaged in a common employment with the seaman who lost his life, liability does not, in the existing state of the law, attach to the respondents. It was argued that the master of a vessel, although in some respects the servant of the shipowner, possesses in relation to the crew powers and duties independent of him, and that the law which exempts a master from liability to his servant for the negligence of another servant engaged in a common employment with him did not apply in such a case. The only authority cited for this proposition was a case of Ramsay v. Quinn, in the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland (8 Ir. Rep. C. L. 322). But in view of the judgment of this House in Wilson v. Merry (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 30; L. Rep. 1 H. L. Sc. 326), which was recently considered in the case of Johnson v. Lindsay (65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; (1891) A. C. 371), I do not think it possible to give effect to the contention of the appellant.

The question arising on the appellant's claim under sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, is one of greater difficulty. That section imports into every contract of service between the owner of a ship and the seamen thereof an implied obligation upon the owner of the ship "that the owner of the ship and the master, and every agent charged with the loading of the ship, or the preparing thereof for sea, or the sending thereof to sea, shall use all reasonable means to ensure the seaworthiness of the ship for the voyage at the time when the voyage commences, and to keep her in a seaworthy condition for the voyage during the same." The question is, was there evidence that this obligation had not been fulfilled? It is asserted on the part of the appellant that there was, on the ground that the apertures which should have been closed, by fixing the stanchions and rails, were left unclosed; that the vessel was consequently, at the time of the accident, unseaworthy; and that the master, having failed to see that the stanchions and rails were fixed, had not used all reasonable means to keep "her seaworthy for the voyage during the same." The case mainly turns, in my opinion, on the construction to be put upon the words "seaworthy for the voyage" in the connection in which they are found. The word "seaworthy" is a well-known term in shipping law, and has a perfectly definite and ascertained meaning. It is used to describe the condition in which a vessel insured under a voyage policy is bound to be on leaving port if the contract of insurance is to be effectual against the underwriter. Parke, B., in the case of Dixon v. Sadler (5 M. & W. 405), defined the seaworthiness of a vessel thus: "that she shall be in a fit state as to repairs, equipment, and crew, and in all other respects to encounter ordinary perils of the voyage." Other definitions which have been given do not, I think, substantially differ from this, and I think when so well-known a word is used in the statute of 1876 it must have its well established meaning attached to it. The question is, then, was the vessel unseaworthy in this sense at the time of the accident? It must be admitted that there was more danger to those engaged on board than if the movable bulwark had been in its place; but did this render the vessel unseaworthy? In the case of Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72), which came before your Lordships' House, the question arose whether a vessel which started on her voyage with an insufficiently fastened porthole, through which the sea burst, damaging the cargo, was in a seaworthy condition at the commencement of her voyage. Lord Blackburn expressed the opinion that, if the port was in a place where it would be in practice left open from time to time, but was capable of being speedily shut if occasion required, the vessel could not be said to be unfit to encounter the perils of the voyage: that if when bad weather threatened it was not shut, that would be negligence of the crew and not unseaworthiness of the ship. I entirely concur in this view. It is quite clear that, if this view be correct, the Prodano was not unseaworthy at the time she left the port of London. After she left that port her hull and equipment remained precisely what they were at the time of her departure. She was in all respects efficiently equipped. The fault was in not making use of the equipment with which she had been furnished. Under circumstances such as these I do not think it can be said that there has been a failure to keep her in a seaworthy condition for the voyage within the meaning of the enactment. Following, as it does, the obligation that the owner and the master, and every agent charged with the loading of the ship or the preparing thereof for sea, shall use all reasonable means to insure the seaworthiness of the ship for the voyage, I think the words "to keep her in a seaworthy condition for the voyage during the same" point to an obligation of the same character, and not to a neglect properly to use the appliances on board a vessel well equipped and furnished. There is ample scope for the operation of the words in question, even though this construction be put upon the enactment. If any of the necessary appliances were lost or destroyed in the course of the voyage, it would, no doubt, be the duty of the master to use all reasonable means to supply others in their place, just as it might be his duty during the voyage to restore the hull or machinery, if damaged, to a condition suited to the perils to be encountered. But if the appellant's argument were to prevail, it would have a much wider scope than I am able to gather from the words of the enactment was intended by the Legislature. The failure properly to secure many parts of the ship which are in ordinary practice open from time to time would no doubt diminish the safety of those serving on board her, and be a source of danger to them; but I do not think it could reasonably be said that, because in such a case a bolt was not securely fixed the vessel thereupon became unseaworthy. In truth, the point is only of importance because of the limitation which the law at present imposes upon the liability of an employer for accidents due to the negligence of his servants; but for this limitation I do not think it would have occurred to anyone to maintain that there had been, in the present case, a breach of the implied obligation created by sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: In this appeal I have come to the same conclusion on all points with the Lord Chancellor. I have only to add that I fully concur in all the reasons which have been assigned for his judgment by my noble and learned friend.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I also concur.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, S. Pilley, for James Storey, Sunderland.

Solicitors for the respondents, Downing, Holman, and Co., for Pinkney and Bolam, Sunderland.

June 21, 22, and Aug. 3, 1894.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords WATSON, ASHBOURNE, MACNAGHTEN, and RUSSELL.)

SMURTHWAITE AND OTHERS v. HANNAY AND OTHERS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Practice—Parties—Joinder of plaintiffs—Different causes of action—Order XVI., r. 1*—Order XVIII., rr.* 1 and 2.

Order XVI., r. 1, deals only with the parties to an action, and has no reference to the joinder of several causes of action.

The several shippers or consignees of different shipments of goods shipped on board the same ship for carriage from and to the same places, joined as plaintiffs in one action against the shipowners on the bills of lading claiming damages for short delivery.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that they were not entitled so to join under the Judicature Rules.

Booth v. Briscoe (2 Q. B. Div. 496) distinguished.

(a) Reported by C. E MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of a majority of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R. and Kay, L.J., Bowen, L.J. dissenting), reported in 69 L. T. Rep. 677, 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 380, and (1893) 2 Q. B. 412, who had reversed an order of the Divisional Court (Day and Collins, JJ.), who had reversed an order of Mathew, J., made at chambers, refusing to direct a stay of proceedings in an action brought by the respondents against the appellants under circumstances which appear in the head-note above, and are fully set out in the judgments of their Lordships.

Bigham, Q.C., J. Walton, Q.C., and Pickford, Q.C. appeared for the appellants and argued that, in order to join in one action, every plaintiff must have an interest in the right claimed. Order XVIII., r. 1, provides that different causes of action may be joined, subject to the restrictions therein laid down, but, if Order XVI., r. 1, has the construction put upon it by the respondents, Order XVIII., r. 1, is unnecessary. Order XVI., r. 1, must be confined to one cause of action. This is not "the same transaction," but many different transactions. There is no common ground of action; each plaintiff here has a separate ground of action, and the defendants may have separate defences to each one of them. Order XVI., r. 1, was intended to remove any difficulty arising from misjoinder, as Bowen, L.J. points out in his judgment. The rule ought not to be carried further than this: where a contract is made with several persons they may join as plaintiffs, though it may not be a joint contract. So also in tort where the tort is one affecting several persons. Burstall v. Beyfus (26 Ch. Div. 35) and Sandes v. Wildsmith (1893) 1 Q. B. 771), are authorities against the respondents' contention.

Finlay, Q.C. and T. G. Carver, for the respondents, contended that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right. Order XVIII., checks any possible abuse of Order XVI. The appellants' argument is, that Order XVI. does not extend urther than the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1860; but the true view is, that any number of plaintiffs may be joined subject to the power of the court under Order XVIII. to prevent any abuse of its process. The effect of the appellants' contention would be to increase greatly the costs of preparing for trial, and then in the end all the cases would eventually be tried together. [Lord HERSCHELL, L.C.—On your contention I do not see the object of Order XVI., r. 3.] Booth v. Briscoe (2 Q. B. Div. 496) and Gort v. Rowney (17 Q. B. Div. 625) support the view taken by the Court of Appeal.

Bigham, Q.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments, their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Aug. 3.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell).—My Lords: The appellants are the owners of a vessel called the Castleton. The respondents shipped certain cotton on board that vessel for carriage from a foreign port to Liverpool. On arrival at that port it was found that the marks of eighteen bales had been obliterated, and that, taking these into account, the total number which arrived was less by thirty-three than the number which, according to the bills of lading, had been shipped. Thereupon the present action was brought, the plaintiffs being the several holders of the bills of lading, either as shippers or as indorsees from shippers, who had not received delivery of the number of bales specified in their bills of lading respectively. Upon the question whether such an action can be maintained there has been a great difference of judicial opinion. Mathew, J. refused to stay the action. Day and Collins, JJ., in the Queen's Bench Division, took a different view, but their judgment was reversed by the Master of the Rolls and Kay, L.J., the late Lord Justice Bowen dissenting. It is admitted that the claims of the plaintiffs are several, that they have no joint cause of action or claim to relief, and that before the Judicature Act they could not have been joined as plaintiffs in such an action as the present; but it is contended that Order XVI., r. 1, justifies the course which has been pursued in making them co-plaintiffs. The argument of the learned counsel for the respondents went this length, that the rule sanctions the joinder of any number of plaintiffs, however distinct the causes of action in respect of which they are suing, subject only to this, that any defendant alleging that several causes of action have been united which cannot conveniently be disposed of together may, under Order XVIII., r. 8, apply for an order confining the action to such of the causes of action as can be conveniently disposed of together. If the argument be a sound one it cannot, in my opinion, stop short of the point to which the learned counsel pressed it. The Master of the Rolls thought a more limited construction might be put upon the rule, that, large as the words of the rule were, if the causes of action vested in the plaintiffs respectively were not merely separate causes of action, but were in respect of utterly distinct and different transactions then the plaintiffs could not join in one action in respect of them. I am unable, with all deference, to find anything in the language of the rule to justify drawing such a line, nor can I see how it could in practice be drawn. Take the facts of the present case as an illustration. In what sense can it be said with accuracy that the different causes of action all arise out of the same transaction? The claim is in each case in respect of a breach of a separate contract to deliver the goods shipped. Whether the goods, the non-delivery of which is complained of, were in fact shipped depends in each case upon a different set of circumstances. The several consignments may have been and probably were delivered to the shipowner by different persons, at different times, and under different circumstances. They were, it is true, delivered for carriage in the same ship and were goods of the same description. But I cannot see that this makes the transaction one any more than if goods consigned by different persons had been intended for carriage by different ships and had been of a different description. Precisely the same controversy, requiring just the same proof, might have arisen in the one case as in the other. And if the one case be within the rule I see nothing in its terms to exclude the other. Order XVI., r. 1, purports to deal merely with the parties to an action, and has, I think, no reference to the joinder of several causes of action. This subject is dealt with in Order XVIII. Yet, if I correctly understand the argument of the respondents, the construction they put upon Order XVI. necessarily deals with the joinder of several causes of action, and confers, without reference to any other order or rule, the right "to unite in the same action several causes of action." For, if it sanctions the joining of plaintiffs having separate and distinct causes of action, this involves of necessity the union in one action of several causes of action. The rule provides that "all persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative." This conveys to my mind the idea that the relief claimed by the plaintiffs who are joined is to be the same relief, especially when I consider that the rule only relates to the parties to an action, and that the right to join more than one cause of action is regulated by another rule. But for the use of the word "severally," I do not think any doubt would have been entertained that this was the true construction. There was naturally much discussion as to the meaning and effect of that word. In construing these rules it must always be borne in mind that before the passing of the Judicature Act the practice and procedure of the Court of Chancery and the courts of common law differed in many respects. It was a leading object of the rules framed under that Act to formulate a code of procedure which should in general be applicable to the Common Law and Chancery Divisions of the High Court alike. Now, there can be no doubt that in the Court of Chancery there were many cases in which co-plaintiffs might severally be entitled to the same relief, and might, before the Judicature Act, have been properly joined, although their claim was neither joint nor alternative. There is, therefore, no difficulty in satisfying every word of the rule by the construction which I have suggested, and it, I confess, appears to me the natural one. It cannot be doubted that, whatever construction is put upon the rule I have been considering, must be applied equally to rule 4 of the same order. The result of the respondents' contention would be that any number of plaintiffs might join together to sue any number of defendants in respect of causes of action not common to either plaintiffs or defendants. There are other rules of Order XVI. which seem to me to militate against this contention. It is difficult to understand how there could ever be a "misjoinder" if such a procedure were authorised. And what is the use of rule 6, which enables a plaintiff, "at his option, to join as parties to the same action all or any of the persons severally or jointly and severally liable on any one contract," if the previous rules have the effect contended for? I do not pause to discuss the question whether the construction contended for by the appellants or by the respondents would be found to provide the more convenient procedure. I have endeavoured to construe the rule apart from such considerations, but this much I may say, that I am far from satisfied that the balance of convenience is, as the respondents contend, on their side. I cannot accede to the argument urged for the respondents that, even if the joinder of the plaintiffs in one action was not warranted by the rule relied on, this was a mere irregularity of which the plaintiffs, by virtue of Order LXX., could not now take advantage. If unwarranted by any enactment or rule, it is, in my opinion, much more than an irregularity. Before concluding I ought to refer to the case of Booth v. Briscoe (2 Q. B. Div. 496) which was much relied on by the respondents. The plaintiffs who were joined in that action sued in respect of a libel impugning the management of an institution of which they were the trustees. No objection was taken to the constitution of the action. They recovered joint damages. In the Court of Appeal Bramwell, L.J. intimated an opinion that their causes of action were several, and that the damages should have been several also. But he thought that they might, nevertheless, under the circumstances, properly be joined. It is not necessary to determine whether that case was rightly decided. It is enough to say that it was a very different one from the present. I think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division restored, and that the respondents should pay the costs, here and below.

Lord ASHBOURNE concurred.

Lord RUSSELL.—My Lords: In this case the respondents, the plaintiffs below, sue the appellants, the defendants below, for non-delivery of certain bales of cotton shipped in the defendant's steamship Castleton at Galveston for carriage to Liverpool. The plaintiffs consists of sixteen firms or persons, nine of whom are alleged to have been shippers and seven consignees of the cotton in question. The defendants have pleaded several defences, the principal defence apparently being that the bales of cotton claimed were never shipped, or received for shipment, on board the defendants' ship. The facts alleged in the pleadings, so far as they are material, are as follows: Each of the nine shippers shipped bales of cotton, in varying quantities, on board the Castleton, receiving separate bills of lading therefor. The facts common to all the shipments were: that the shipments consisted of bales of cotton; that they were laden on board the same ship (which was a general ship); that they were consigned to the same port; and that the bills of lading were similar in all respects material in this case. When the ship arrived at Liverpool it was found that the total number of bales landed fell short of the total number in the bills of lading by eighteen. Further, it was found in the case of fifteen of the landed bales that their distinctive marks and numbers had been obliterated, and that they were not capable of being identified. Those fifteen bales had been sold, and it is stated that their proceeds have been distributed proportionately amongst the several consignees. In this state of things the plaintiffs joined in bringing the present action. The defendants objected to the joinder of the plaintiffs in one action, and contended that each plaintiff was bound to bring a separate action in respect of his shipment or consignment, as being a separate and distinct cause of action. On the 1st June 1893 Mathew, J. made an order refusing an application to stay the action; but on appeal from that refusal Day and Collins, JJ. on the 30th June 1893 made an order that all further proceedings should be stayed, or the action dismissed, on the ground that the plaintiffs should have brought separate actions in respect of their respective claims, and further ordered that the plaintiffs should elect as to the claim to be proceeded with. Upon appeal had from the last-mentioned order, the Master of the Rolls and Kay, L.J. (Bowen, L.J. dissenting) gave judgment reversing the order of the Divisional Court, and thereby allowed the action to proceed. From that judgment the present appeal is brought.

The question thus raised before your Lordships turns upon the proper construction of Order XVI., r. 1. That rule provides that: "All persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative. And judgment may be given for such one or more of the plaintiffs as may be found to be entitled to relief, for such relief as he or they may be entitled to, without any amendment. But the defendant, though unsuccessful, shall be entitled to his costs occasioned by so joining any person who shall not be found entitled to relief, unless the court or a judge in disposing of the costs shall otherwise direct." The Master of the Rolls thought that, grammatically construed, the order was wide enough in its terms to permit of the joining of any number of plaintiffs, although their causes of action related to entirely distinct and different transactions: but he thought that, in order to prevent the absurdity which he considered might arise from that wide construction, the rule ought to be construed with this limitation: namely, that although several plaintiffs with different and distinct causes of action might be joined together in one action, their causes of action must arise out of the same transaction. Further, he arrived at the conclusion that, although the plaintiffs in this case have different causes of action, they are causes of action which did arise out of the same transaction, and that therefore the plaintiffs were here properly joined. It seems to me that a serious ambiguity lies in the use of the words "same transaction" as here applied. I think that the causes of action here did not arise out of the same transaction. They arose out of similar but entirely distinct transactions, creating similar but entirely distinct legal liabilities. The goods of the several plaintiffs were, no doubt, sent in the same ship from the same port of shipment to the same port of discharge, and in that sense the plaintiffs may be said to have been parties to the same transaction, but in that sense only. The property in the goods was distinct in the case of each shipper, and the contracts of carriage were likewise distinct. There was no community of interest or of property as between the plaintiffs. In truth, the transaction was not one and the same. There were several transactions, similar indeed, but different and distinct from one another. Kay, L.J. was of opinion that if Order XVI., r. 1, stood alone, the joining under one writ here attempted of several plaintiffs with distinct and separate causes of action was not authorised by the rule; but he thought that Order XVIII., r. 1, did authorise such joining, subject to the power of the court or of a judge to intervene where considerations of convenience justified it. I cannot assent to this view. Order XVI. is conversant with a subject-matter different from that dealt with by Order XVIII. Order XVI. (principally in rules 1 and 4) deals with the parties to an action; but, in my judgment, Order XVIII. deals and deals only with the causes of action which may be joined together in an action properly constituted, as to parties, under Order XVI. Bowen, L.J. dissented from the view taken by the other members of the court, and I concur both in the reasons of that learned judge and in the conclusion at which he arrived. I cannot agree with the Master of the Rolls in the limitation which, to avoid an absurdity, he introduces in the construction of rule 1 of Order XVI.—namely, the limitation that the plaintiffs shall have been concerned in the same transaction. I find no such words of limitation either in rule 1 of Order XVI., dealing with plaintiffs, or in rule 4 of the same order, dealing with defendants; and, therefore, it seems to me that the only two possible constructions are those which were, in fact, the contentions of counsel at the bar for the appellants and for the respondents respectively. For the respondents it was broadly contended that any number of plaintiffs, with any number of distinct causes of action, might join in one action within the meaning of the rule, subject only to the control of the court or of a judge. I must dissent from this view. Indeed, if rule 1 is to have this wide construction, rule 4 must receive an equally wide construction. That rule provides as follows: "All persons may be joined as defendants against whom the right to any relief is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative. And judgment may be given against such one or more of the defendants as may be found liable, according to their respective liabilities, without any amendment." According to this broad contention, therefore, it would be possible to join any number of plaintiffs with distinct causes of action against any number of defendants charged on distinct grounds of liability. On the other hand, it was contended for the appellants that the plaintiffs, who alone can be joined in one action under Order XVI., r. 1, are plaintiffs in whom, or in some of whom, not any, but the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist. In my judgment, this is the true construction. In other words, the rule applies to cases where it is doubtful in which of the plaintiffs, or in what number of the plaintiffs, and whether jointly or severally, the legal right to relief exists, and also to cases (more frequent in the Chancery than in the common law courts) in which several plaintiffs having separate rights claim the same relief. This view is strengthened by the fact that several of the rules, following rules 1 and 4 of Order XVI. and rule 1 of Order XVIII., would have been unnecessary were the true construction the wide one contended for by the respondents. It is not unimportant to observe that rule 11 of Order XVI., which deals with misjoinder, only enables the court or a judge to deal with the names of parties "improperly joined"; but it is difficult to see, if the construction of rule 1 contended for by the respondents be right, how there could be a misjoinder of plaintiffs. On the other hand, Order XVIII., r. 11, dealing with joinder of causes of action, gives the court or a judge power to limit the joinder of causes upon considerations of convenience alone. It was suggested at the bar that, if this action were not allowed to proceed as now constituted, each plaintiff suing separately would be placed in a position of difficulty, because, it was urged, the defendants might attribute the unmarked bales, or a sufficient number of them, to the particular plaintiff suing, and so meet his claim. But this is not so. When the bales became unidentifiable, the several owners of cotton became, in point of law, owners in common of them in proportion to their respective interests, and the shipowner could only attribute such proportion in answer to any claim for non-delivery: (Spence v. The Union Marine Insurance Company Limited, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 82; 18 L. T. Rep. 632; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 427.)

The argument of convenience was strongly pressed upon your Lordships. I am by no means certain that that argument has, in the facts of this case, much weight; but whether it has or has not, it cannot be regarded if, as I think, the orders and rules do not authorise that joinder of plaintiffs which has been here attempted. A brief reference to the authorities is sufficient. As to the case of Booth v. Briscoe (2 Q. B. Div. 496), it is only necessary to say that, assuming that case to have been rightly decided, which it is not necessary to determine here, it differs widely from the present one, and it is no authority for the respondents' contention. That was a case in which the plaintiffs, managers of an asylum, brought an action in respect of a libel which did not reflect upon them individually or by name, but upon the management. They brought a joint action, and recovered joint damages. No objection was taken to the constitution of the action until the matter came before the Supreme Court after trial, and Lord Bramwell came to the conclusion, in the circumstances I have mentioned, that, as the complaint was of one and the same wrong, they might be joined as co-plaintiffs. In Gort v. Rowney (17 Q. B. Div. 625) two plaintiffs suing together claimed relief in respect of separate and distinct causes of action. No objection was taken to the constitution of the action, which was referred to arbitration upon the terms that the costs were to abide the event; and the sole point to be determined was the question what was the event upon which the costs depended. Certain dicta of the Master of the Rolls in that case were relied upon by the respondents before your Lordships. But those dicta were not assented to by Bowen, L.J., and were, in fact, not necessary for the decision of the question at issue. A further point was taken at the bar on the part of the respondents, namely, that the joinder of the plaintiffs in a way not authorised by Order XVI. was a mere irregularity, and that the appellants came too late to take advantage of it. This objection is not, in my judgment, well founded. In my judgment such joinder of plaintiffs is more than an irregularity; it is the constitution of a suit as to parties in a way not authorised by the law and the rules applicable to procedure; and, apart altogether from any express power given by the rules, it is fully within the competence of the court to restrain and to prevent an abuse of its process. On the whole, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and judgment entered for the appellants with costs.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords: I am requested to state that Lords Watson and Macnaghten, who were present during the argument of the case, but are not able to be here to-day, concur in the judgment which has been proposed.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed; judgment of the Queen's Bench Division restored; respondents to pay the costs in this House and below.

Solicitors for the appellants, Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondents, Wynne, Holme, and Wynne, for H. Forshaw and Hawkins, Liverpool.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

June 26, 27, and July 14, 1894.

(Present: Lords WATSON and MORRIS and Sir RICHARD COUCH (with Assessors.)

SBUTEGA v. ATTWOOL; THE CLIEVEDEN; THE DIANA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SUPREME CONSULAR COURT AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

Collision—River Danube—Ascending and descending ships—Art. 32 of the Regulations for the Navigation of the Lower Danube.

Under art. 32 of the Regulations applicable to the Navigation of the Lower Danube, directing that, "when a vessel ascending the river finds itself exposed to meeting a vessel descending at a point which does not afford sufficient breadth, she must stop below the passage till the other vessel has cleared it; and if the ascending vessel should be actually in the passage as the other approaches it the descending vessel must stop above until the passage is clear;" an ascending ship must stop below the passage until a descending ship has cleared it whenever the ascending ship has notice that if she proceeds she will be exposed to the risk of meeting the descending ship at or near that point; and the descending vessel must stop above the passage when the ascending ship has reached such point and has actually begun to navigate the contracted passage before notice is conveyed to her that if she proceeds she will be exposed to the risk of meeting the descending ship at or near the point.

Where the ascending ship neglects to stop below the passage it is the duty of the descending ship to refrain from any attempt to exercise her right of precedence when the intention of the ascending steamer to violate the regulations becomes reasonably apparent.

Semble: The channel at the lower part of the Sulina Cut is not within the scope of art. 32 of the Danube Regulations.

THIS was an appeal by the master of the Austrian steamship Diana from the decision of the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople (in Vice-Admiralty), holding the Diana alone to blame for a collision in the Danube with the English steamship Clieveden, and dismissing the petition of the appellants in the action; and, in a cross-action brought by the respondent, ordering judgment to be entered for the respondent.

The collision occurred at the entrance to the cut where the Sulina arm of the Danube diverges from the St. George's arm.

The case on behalf of the appellants was, that the Diana, a steamship of 1036 tons register, belonging to the Austrian Lloyd Company, left Galatz at 8 a.m. on the 19th Oct. 1892, and proceeded down the Danube with a general cargo for

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sulina and Constantinople. At about 12.20 p.m. the Diana reached the 46th mile post, and was on the south side of the channel when a steam-tug, towing some barges, was sighted about a mile and a half off in the Sulina arm of the river, coming up on the north side, the Clieveden being at the same time sighted following the tug, but about a mile behind her. The Diana reduced her speed as a measure of precaution and passed the tug port side to port side a little above the 45th mile post. The whistle of the Diana was then blown a single blast, which was answered by a single blast from the Clieveden, and the Diana slowly continued her course. The Clieveden advanced at a high rate of speed, and when at a short distance from the Diana suddenly starboarded and rendered a collision inevitable. The engines of the Diana were put full speed astern, but the Clieveden with her port bow struck the Diana, doing her considerable damage.

The case on behalf of the respondent was, that the Clieveden, a British steamer of 1038 tons net register, was on the day in question navigating up the Danube, laden with a cargo of coals from Cardiff for Galatz. When she had ascended to about the 43rd mile post she saw the Diana at about the 48th mile post, and shortly afterwards the Clieveden's engines were put at half-speed in order to avoid overtaking a tug and her tows in the narrow waters. When the Clieveden had got to about one-third of a mile from Tchatal Point, at the exit of the cut, the engines were put to slow, and the Clieveden approached the point, her speed being then about one knot over the ground, the helm was ported and kept a little to port to keep her in the channel, and one blast was blown on her whistle as a signal to the Diana. The Diana was at this time in the broad river, a short distance above the 45th mile post, and bore about ahead, but on the starboard bow withal of the Clieveden, and the Diana was approaching the Clieveden as if intending to pass between the Clieveden and the north bank of the river. Very shortly afterwards the Diana was observed to be approaching as if under a port helm, but it was then too late to safely execute that manœuvre, and notwithstanding that the engines of the Clieveden were at once reversed full speed astern, the Diana coming on at a high rate of speed with her port bow struck the port bow of the Clieveden a very heavy blow.

On the 4th Sept. 1893 the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople delivered judgment, finding the Diana alone to blame for negligent navigation, and also held the part of the cutting in question to be a place to which, with reference to the vessels concerned, art. 32 was applicable, and that the Diana had violated its provisions. Art. 32 of the Danube Regulations, so far as it is material to the case, is as follows:

> When a vessel ascending the river finds itself exposed to meeting a vessel descending at a point which does not afford sufficient breadth, she must stop below the passage till the other vessel has cleared it; and, if the ascending vessel should be actually in the passage as the other approaches it, the descending vessel must stop above until the passage is clear.

The Diana appealed from the above decision, and submitted that it should be reversed or varied, and the Clieveden should be pronounced alone to blame, for the following among other reasons: 1. Because the learned judge was wrong in law in his decision as to the regulation or regulations applicable to the navigation both of the Clieveden and the Diana in the circumstances. 2. Because the Clieveden should have been held in fault for not bearing towards her starboard side of the channel in obedience to art. 34 of the Danube Regulations. 3. Because, if art. 32 of the Danube Regulations applies, the Clieveden was in fault for not waiting below Tchatal Point until the Diana had cleared it. 4. Because art. 35 of the Danube Regulation applies. 5. Because the Clieveden was, in the circumstances, being navigated at an improper and excessive rate of speed. 6. Because the Clieveden neglected to slacken speed, or stop and reverse her engines in due time. 7. Because it appears by the evidence that the collision and damage consequent thereon are imputable solely to the negligent and improper navigation of the Clieveden.

The respondents submitted that the decision was in all respects correct, and ought to be affirmed for the following among other reasons: 1. Because the collision was not caused or contributed to by any act or omission of those on board the Clieveden. 2. Because, notwithstanding any act or omission of the Clieveden which may have contributed to the collision, the Diana might have avoided the accident by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence. 3. Because the collision was caused by the fault or default of the Diana: (1) in not keeping a proper look-out; (2) in not duly or in due time easing or stopping and reversing her engines; (3) in improperly neglecting to keep clear of and away from the entrance to the Bras de Sulina, whilst the Clieveden was coming up and out of the said narrow passage; (4) in improperly attempting to pass the Clieveden at a point where there was not sufficient breadth. 4. Because the evidence adduced by the appellant is unsatisfactory, and on material points is unreliable.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Stubbs for the appellants.—The ascending vessel must, rule or no rule, give way here as in other rivers. In the Thames and Tyne, for instance, this is provided for by the rules; in other rivers, such as the Elbe and Scheldt, it is the recognised practice of navigation. The failure on the part of the Clieveden to stop and reverse earlier was wrong, for those in charge of her were bound to know that the vessels would meet at a dangerous place, such as is contemplated by art. 32 of the Danube Regulations.

Bucknill, Q.C., Safford, and Holman for the respondent.—The place of collision was an unsafe place for the vessels to pass each other. The Clieveden being there properly she was entitled to be free from interference, and, in accordance with the latter half of art. 32, it was the duty of a descending vessel outside the passage to stop above. The Diana ought to have seen the Clieveden coming through the cut in plenty of time to have stopped above the cut.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 14.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Lord WATSON.—Shortly after mid-day on the 19th Oct. 1892, and in clear weather, the Austrian steamship Diana and the British steamship Clieveden met and collided in the river Danube, at or near the point where the Sulina arm diverges from the St. George's arm of the river. The Sulina arm, which runs a separate course eastward from that point until it reaches the Black Sea, branches off from the north side of the St. George's arm, and commences with an artificial cut more than three-quarters of a mile in length, and above 400 feet in width, measuring from bank to bank. Throughout the upper half of its length the water of the cut in question is much deeper to the south of mid-channel than to the north of that line, where it gradually shoals out until it reaches a mud bank; and the breadth of available waterway depends upon the draught of the vessels navigating it. The length of the Diana was 270 feet, and her breadth of beam 35 feet; whilst the Clieveden was 250 feet long, and 37 feet across her beam. Each vessel was a little over 1000 tons burthen, and was drawing 16½ feet of water. For ships of that draught, the waterway of the upper half of the cut, during average low water, did not exceed from 180 to 200 feet in width, and was confined to the south of the mid-channel line. At one point, about 250 feet below its divergence from the St. George's arm, the available waterway of the cut is, for a very short distance, greatly reduced in width by shoal water on the north. For vessels with a draught of 16½ feet it is not wider, during average low water, than 120 feet at that point. The evidence shows that on the day of the collision the water of the Danube was exceptionally low, and, although there are not sufficient data for a precise calculation, it must, in the opinion of their Lordships, be assumed that the width of the navigable channel at the point in question was, at that time, appreciably less than 120 feet. It is also established by the evidence that at the upper end of the cut, and for some distance above it, there is a cross current from north to south, which makes it impossible to keep the head of an ascending steamship steady without the aid of a port helm. The Diana was on her way down the river with a two-knot per hour current in her favour, and with the intention of descending the Sulina arm. The Clieveden was ascending that arm against the same current, on her way to a port above. The two ships appear to have first sighted each other, across the land, when they were about three miles apart; and, from that time until the collision occurred, they continued in sight, although, owing to a curve in the river, their hulls did not become mutually visible until the distance between them was considerably less than a mile. The proper course for two steamships approaching each other under such circumstances, in any part of the channel where there is room for them to pass, is to meet port to port, the descending vessel keeping on the south, and the ascending vessel on the north, of the channel. The evidence from both ships makes it apparent that, from the time when they first came in sight, it was the deliberate purpose of each to pursue her course without stopping until she met and passed the other. At the time when the Diana and the Clieveden first came in sight of each other a tug, with four craft in tow, was slowly ascending the Sulina arm about a mile ahead of the Clieveden. She moderated her speed in order to allow the tug and her tows to get clear of the cut before she overtook them. The Diana also saw the position of the tug, and slowed, so as to permit the tug to pass her before she entered the cut. The tug accordingly met and passed the Diana in the St. George's arm, at a point somewhat less than half a mile above the entrance to the cut; and at that moment, the evidence appears to their Lordships to show, the Clieveden must have reached a point somewhat more than one-third of a mile below the entrance to the cut. From these points the two vessels went on their way, with the result that they came into collision at the entrance to the cut, immediately after the stern of the Clieveden had cleared the narrow passage already described, her stem striking the port side of the Diana nearly at right angles. At the instant of collision the Diana was heading to the south-east, and somewhat across the stream, that position being apparently due to her having turned her engines astern.

Amid much uncertainty, two things appear to their Lordships to be tolerably certain. The first of these is, that at the time when the tug passed the Diana it must have been clear to both vessels that, if they both continued to advance, they would meet near or in the narrow passage; and the second, that, at the time when the Clieveden struck her, the Diana was on the south side of the channel, and in the water which she was entitled to occupy if she was justified in pursuing her course. The Clieveden maintains that the collision was wholly attributable to the fault of the Diana, upon these two grounds: In the first place, she contends that it was the duty of the Diana to stop and wait above the entrance to the Sulina cut until the Clieveden had passed through it. In the second place, she alleges that the Diana, when two or three ship's lengths above the entrance to the cut, executed a wrong manœuvre, by first starboarding her helm, and thereby opening her starboard bow to the Clieveden, so as to indicate that she meant to cross the bows of the Clieveden, and to pass down between that vessel and the north bank; and then suddenly changing her course, and sheering back to the south. The Diana, on the other hand, maintains that the Clieveden was solely to blame for the disaster. She attributes the collision (1) to the failure of the Clieveden to stop and wait below the narrow neck of navigable water near to the top of the cut until the Diana had cleared it; and (2) to the Clieveden having, just before the collision, rendered it inevitable by changing her course from the north to the south side of the channel. The case thus presented in argument involves two separate questions. The first of these is, whether it was the duty of one of these ships to stop and wait until the other passed; and, if so, upon which of them that duty was incumbent? The second relates to their mutual charges of faulty manœuvring at the time when they had come within a few ship's lengths of each other. In considering the first question, their Lordships enjoy the advantage of having the main facts necessary to its determination ascertained beyond reasonable dispute. But, in so far as it bears upon the second question, the evidence from the two ships is conflicting, and, if it be reconcilable at all, cannot be reconciled without giving the witnesses on either side credit for a considerable amount of exaggeration. In discussing the first of these questions, both parties relied, with equal confidence, upon art. 32 of the Regulations applicable to the Navigation of the Lower Danube, which contains (inter alia) this provision: "When a vessel ascending the river finds itself exposed to meeting a vessel descending at a point which does not afford sufficient breadth, she must stop below the passage till the other vessel has cleared it; and if the ascending vessel should be actually in the passage as the other approaches it, the descending vessel must stop above until the passage is clear." It is a comparatively easy matter for a ship steaming against a two-knot current to come to a dead halt, without stopping her engines and without losing her steerage way. But a ship descending with the current cannot, by stopping her engines, and without reversing, reduce her speed below two knots an hour; and, when her speed is reduced to that limit she drifts, and her helm practically loses all control over her movements. These considerations afford an obvious reason for requiring that, in the circumstances to which the first part of the rule refers, the ascending shall give way to the descending vessel. In their Lordships' opinion, that part of the rule becomes imperative whenever an ascending ship, approaching "a point which does not afford sufficient breadth," has notice that, if she proceeds, she will be exposed to the risk of meeting a descending ship at or near that point. The second part of the rule is not, in their opinion, meant to come into operation, except in cases where the ascending ship has reached the point of danger, and has actually begun to navigate the contracted passage before any such notice was conveyed to her. The Sulina arm may fairly be described, throughout its whole length, as a narrow channel, its waterway being more or less contracted at various points in its course. That a "narrow pass" is not, within the meaning of the Regulations, the same thing with a passage which does not "afford sufficient breadth" is evidenced by the terms of art. 36, which provides for one steam-vessel overtaking and passing another "in a narrow pass." But their Lordships entertain no doubt, and their view was confirmed by the opinion of their assessors, that the short neck of contracted waterway, just below the entrance to the Selina cut, did not, on the day of the collision, afford sufficient breadth to permit two vessels of the size and draught of the Diana and the Clieveden to navigate it at the same time with safety. They are not prepared to affirm that the channel below that point, though somewhat contracted, came within the scope of art. 32. They were advised by their assessors, in whose opinion they concur, that the Clieveden would have been justified in proceeding up the north side of that channel, if she had stopped short of the narrow neck leaving sufficient room for the Diana to pass her on the south. Their Lordships are of opinion that the Clieveden could not, except through negligence, have failed to observe that, by advancing as she did, she would probably, if not certainly, encounter the risk of meeting the Diana at or near the point of danger. It was therefore her plain duty to stop and wait before she reached that point. No doubt her master states that it would not have been "prudent" for the Clieveden to stop her engines. But the only reason which he assigns for that view is "because we intended to go out of the other channel before the other ship came in." That the Clieveden acted in gross violation of her duty in endeavouring to press through the narrow neck before the Diana could reach it does not appear to their Lordships to admit of reasonable doubt. That she was maintaining an undue rate of speed, for the purpose of attaining that object, is evidenced by the fact that, although she was going against the current with her engines reversed at the moment of contact, she, after collision, had still sufficient way on to push aside the stem of the Diana and proceed up stream. The Clieveden being clearly to blame, it remains for determination whether the other colliding vessel can be acquitted of contributory fault; and upon that point their Lordships have been unable, upon a careful consideration of the evidence, to come to the conclusion that the Diana was free from responsibility. Their Lordships attach no importance to the allegation of the Clieveden's witnesses to the effect that the Diana manœuvred so as to indicate that she meant to cross the bows of the Clieveden and go down the north side of the cut. In order to get into her proper position on the north side of the cut it was necessary for the Diana, whose course had been down the middle line of the St. George's arm, to make some use of her starboard helm; and the probable, if not the inevitable, result of her doing so, owing to the cross current which prevailed at that part of the river, would be to make her head unsteady, and at times to expose her starboard instead of her port bow to the Clieveden. That fact ought to have been known to those who were navigating the Clieveden. It is difficult to suppose that they really believed the Diana was crossing to the north side of the channel; and, if they did entertain the belief, it was in the circumstances without justification. It does not appear to their Lordships to be doubtful that, although the Clieveden was clearly wrong in forcing her way first through the narrow neck, it became the equally plain duty of the Diana to refrain from any attempt to exercise her right of precedence, whenever the intentions of the Clieveden to violate the regulations became reasonably apparent. And they cannot, taking into account the evidence given by witnesses from the Diana herself, come to the conclusion that she fulfilled her duty in that respect. According to these witnesses, they observed that the Clieveden was coming up the cut at a high speed, and that she maintained her speed up to and beyond the point where she ought to have stopped and waited. The Diana paid no heed to these indications. Her captain says, "Even if there had been another steamer alongside the Clieveden it would have been safe and practicable for them to come out, and a third to enter at the same time, with the precautions taken by the Diana to enter, to go slow with her engines." Accordingly she went on, intending to pass the Clieveden, port to port, whether the latter vessel had cleared the neck or not; and she did not stop and reverse until she saw that the Clieveden was coming straight into her. That, in the opinion of their Lordships, was an unseamanlike and an unwarrantable proceeding. The Clieveden could not, in the then state of the river, enter and pass upwards through the neck without coming so far towards the south side of the channel as necessarily to interfere with the course of a vessel of similar size going down that side. Being of opinion that both vessels were in fault, their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the orders appealed from; to pronounce a finding to that effect; to order that no costs be allowed to either party in the court below; and to remit the cause for further procedure in terms of the finding. There will be no costs of this appeal.

Solicitors for the appellants, Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes.

Solicitor for the respondents, T. Russel Kent.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

June 29 and July 2, 1894.

(Before LINDLEY, LOPES, and DAVEY, L.JJ.)

REISCHER v. BORWICK. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — Proximate cause of loss — "Damage received in collision" — Loss of vessel while being towed to place of repair after collision.

A tug was insured against "the risk of collision and damage received in collision with any object." The policy did not include the perils of the sea. The tug ran against a floating snag which did it considerable injury, including damage to the engine-room machinery, and amongst other things broke the cover of the condenser, leaving an opening about twenty square inches in area. The tug commenced leaking, and there being danger that the water would come into the ship through the ejection pipes and the hole in the condenser cover, the pipes were plugged from the outside.

While she was being towed to a place of repair, a plug came out and the water rushed into the engine-room through the ejection pipes and the hole in the condenser cover, and she began to fill rapidly. An attempt to again plug the ejection pipes failed, and the vessel sank.

Held, that the collision, and not the towing, was the proximate cause of the loss, and that the insurers were liable under the policy for a total loss.

Decision of Kennedy, J. affirmed.

THE action was brought upon a marine policy, by which the steam-tug Rosa was insured against "the risk of collision and damage received in collision with any object, including ice," whilst in the Danube or its tributaries. The policy did not include perils of the sea. During the currency of the policy, whilst the Rosa was engaged upon a trip in the Danube, she ran against a floating snag, which first struck the bottom of the ship and then fouled the port paddle-wheel and damaged the vessel. That damage included serious injury to the engine-room machinery, and among other things the breaking of the cover of the condenser, which left an opening some twenty square inches in area. In consequence of the damage received the vessel commenced leaking, and there was imminent danger of the entrance of water through the ejection pipes and the connection therefrom into the ship through the broken condenser cover. As speedily as possible those pipes were plugged from the outside. The collision occurred on the night of the 4th March 1892. The captain immediately sent for assistance to the owner, and assistance came in the shape of a tug called the Olga, which arrived on the 6th March, and on the night of the 6th commenced to tow the vessel to a place where she could be repaired and the damage made good. On the morning of the 7th, while she was being towed by the Olga, a large quantity of water poured into the engine-room through the hole in the condenser cover which had been made by the collision with the snag, and caused the vessel to fill rapidly. This inrush of water was caused by the plug which had been placed in the ejection pipe on the port side of the Rosa having suddenly fallen out. The towing was then stopped, and an attempt was made to stop up the aperture in the ejection pipe, through which the vessel was filling, but without success; and in order to prevent the Rosa from sinking in deep water, as otherwise she would have done, the Olga towed her towards the southern bank of the river, but whilst this was being done the Olga suddenly took the ground, and then the Rosa became stranded and partly submerged, and was abandoned.

The plaintiff claimed damages for the total loss of the vessel. The defendants paid into court a sum sufficient to satisfy their liability, if any, for the damage sustained by the collision with the snag up to the time when the vessel was taken in tow by the Olga, but with a denial of liability. With respect to the subsequent damage, they contended that they were under no liability, on the ground that the proximate cause of that damage was not the collision, but the towing to a port of repair. Kennedy, J. overruled this contention, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the full amount claimed.

Pickford, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the appellants.—The collision was not the proximate cause of the loss of the ship. The actual cause was the towing of the ship through the water, and the defendants are not liable:

Pink v. Fleming, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 554; 63 L. T. Rep. 413; 25 Q. B. Div. 396.

The ship was lost by perils of the sea:

Dudgeon v. Pembroke, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 393; 36 L. T. Rep. 382; 2 App. Cas. 284, 295;

Davidson v. Burnand, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 207; 19 L. T. Rep. 782; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 117.

The coming out of the plug was not a necessary consequence of the collision. The defendants are only liable for damage received in the collision, not for a loss which can be traced to the collision.

Cohen, Q.C. and C. C. Scott for the respondent.—This is an insurance against loss by collision and damage received in collision. If the water had immediately come in through the hole in the condenser cover and caused the ship to sink, the defendants would without doubt have been liable under the policy to pay the sum insured in case of such loss. The collision caused the hole, and before that hole could be repaired the ship was lost through the water coming in through it. Therefore the defendants are equally liable. The loss can be traced to the damage received in the collision. The last cause was the hole in the condenser cover caused by the collision.

Pickford in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

(a) Reported by W. C. BISS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

July 2.—Lindley, L.J.—There is no doubt that, in considering the liabilities of underwriters of marine insurance policies, it is a cardinal rule to regard "proximate" and not "remote" causes of loss. This rule is based on the intention of the parties as expressed in the contract into which they have entered: but the rule must be applied with good sense, so as to give effect to, and not to defeat, those intentions. The risks insured against in this policy are: "the risk of collision (as per clause attached), and damage received in collision with any object, including ice." The "risk of collision as per clause attached" refers to collisions with other ships, and may be disregarded. The other risk refers to and includes such a collision as took place in the present case, viz., a collision between the ship insured and a snag in the river which she was navigating. She was injured by a peril insured against, and liability to make good that injury has arisen, and is not denied. The extent of that liability is the matter in dispute. Is the liability confined to repairing the injured parts? If not, does the liability extend to making good all loss or damage which is, in fact, attributable to the injury occasioned by the collision? The liability of the underwriters cannot, I think, be restricted to repairing the injured parts, and, indeed, counsel for the underwriters did not seriously contend that it could. If the ship had sunk, and been lost under such circumstances as to render the inference unavoidable that the collision caused the loss, it is plain that the cost of repairing the damage would not be the measure of the liability of the underwriters. The moment, however, that this conclusion is arrived at, it is difficult to see on what principle liability for a loss occasioned by that injury can be excluded, except upon the ordinary principles applicable to remoteness of damage. The fact that some fresh cause arises, without which the injury would not have led to further loss, is, I think, in such a case far from conclusive. Assume that this ship would have floated in calm water notwithstanding the injury she had sustained by the collision, and suppose that, before such injury could be made good, the water became so rough as to get into her and sink her, by reason only of her injured condition, such loss would, in my opinion, be proximately, though not exclusively, caused by the collision, and would fall on the underwriters of a policy worded as this policy is. It may be that such a loss would also be covered by a policy against perils of the sea in the ordinary form; but this does not, in my opinion, show that no liability attaches under a policy such as the present. Policies may be so worded as to overlap and cover some risk common to them all. The sinking of this ship was proximately caused by the internal injuries produced by the collision, and by water reaching and getting through the injured parts whilst she was being towed to a place of repair. The sinking was due as much to one of these causes as to the other; each was as much a "proximate" cause of her sinking as the other, and it would, in my opinion, be contrary to good sense to hold that the damage by the sinking was not covered by this policy. Negligence or mismanagement on the part of those on board the ship is not suggested. To stop up the ejection pipes was right and proper, and, although one of them became unstopped, and water reached the injured parts through this unstopped pipe, this was not the result of negligence. All was done that could be done to save the ship and get her out of harm's way, and she sank because, notwithstanding all efforts to keep water out of her, water got into her through the hole in her condenser cover which had been caused by the collision. I feel the difficulty of expressing in precise language the distinction between causes which co-operate in producing a given result. When they succeed each other at intervals which can be observed, it is comparatively easy to distinguish them and to trace their respective effects, but under other circumstances it may be impossible to do so. It appears to me, however, that an injury to a ship may fairly be said to cause its loss if, before that injury is or can be repaired, the ship is lost by reason of the existence of that injury—i.e., under circumstances which, but for the injury, would not have affected her safety. It follows that if, as in this case, a policy is effected covering such an injury, it will in the circumstances supposed extend to the loss of the ship, for in the case supposed the injury will really be the cause of that loss—the causa causans and not merely the causa sine quâ non. I am not aware of any authority opposed to this view. It is consistent with the judgment in Pink v. Fleming (ubi sup.), which is more favourable to the appellants than any other authority cited or known to me. In my opinion the judgment appealed from is correct, and this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Lopes, L.J.—This is a policy indemnifying the insurers against "the risk of collision" (by which I understand collision with other ships) "and damage received in collision with any object, including ice." The question is, under the circumstances of this case, was the damage "received in collision" with a snag in the river Danube? It is admitted that damages for the injury sustained by the condenser are recoverable, but it is contended that what subsequently happened was not attributable to the collision as a proximate cause, but to some intervening and independent cause. [His Lordship then stated the facts set out above.] In cases of marine insurance it is well-settled law that it is only the proximate cause that is to be regarded and all others rejected, although the loss would not have happened without them. Damage received in collision must therefore in this case be the proximate cause of the loss to entitle the plaintiff to recover. The damage received in the collision was the breaking of the condenser, and it was the broken condenser which really caused the proximate loss. The tug was continuously in danger from the time the condenser was broken, and the broken condenser never ceased to be an imminent element of danger, though that danger was mitigated for a time by the insertion of the plug in the outside of this vessel. The cause of the damage to the condenser was the collision, and the consequences of the collision (that is, the broken condenser) never ceased to exist, but constantly remained the efficient and predominating peril to which the damage now sought to be recovered was attributable. It was contended that the towing the tug through the water after the collision was the proximate cause of the loss now sought to be recovered. It was, however, admitted that this was a reasonable and proper act in the circumstances. This may have been a concurrent cause, and one without which the loss would not have happened, but in my judgment it is not, but the broken condenser is, the proximate cause. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

DAVEY, L.J.—In this case the appellants admit that damage done by water coming through a hole caused by a collision with any object is damage against which the assurers are bound to indemnify the assured. What is the causa proxima of the damage caused in this case? The only answer seems to me to be the inroad of the water through the hole in the condenser. What made the hole in the condenser? The collision made the hole in the condenser, and the broken condenser was a continuing source of risk and danger. The failure of the attempt to mitigate or stop the damage arising from the breach in the condenser cannot, in my opinion, be justly described as the cause of the ultimate damage. I therefore agree in the judgments which have been given.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Vanderpump and Eve.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Nov. 29, Dec. 1 and 11, 1893.

(Before LINDLEY, SMITH, and DAVEY, L.JJ.)

THE MARY THOMAS. (a)

Marine insurance—"General average and salvage charges payable according to foreign statement"—Bills of lading—Exceptions—Effect of—Dutch law—Contribution by cargo owners—Liability of underwriters on ship—Particular average.

Plaintiff, a shipowner, effected with the defendants two policies of insurance on a ship and freight containing the words, "general average payable according to foreign statement," and the usual sue and labour clause. A loss occurred owing to the vessel stranding through the negligence of the master, and a general average statement was drawn up (at Rotterdam) in accordance with Dutch practice. Various charges which were incurred in getting the ship and cargo off were apportioned as general average, which, if the average statement had been made in England, might have been treated as particular average on ship and freight, or as charges under the sue and labour clause. The shipowner was unable to obtain contribution to general average from the cargo owners, because by Dutch law when a loss occurs through the negligence of the master, contribution to general average losses cannot be recovered from the cargo owners by the shipowner, even though (as in this case) the bills of lading contain the exception of "strandings, . . . even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment by the pilot, master, or other servants of the shipowner." The shipowner then brought this action on the policies on ship and freight to recover as particular average on ship and freight, or as charges under the sue and labour clause, what they were precluded by Dutch law from recovering as general average.

Held, that the plaintiff having agreed to be bound by a foreign average statement, could not now go behind the statement drawn up at Rotterdam, and could not recover as particular average charges which had been treated as general average in the foreign statement, and that the foreign statement governed as between the assured and the underwriters.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THIS was a claim by the owners of the steamship Mary Thomas, under policies of marine insurance on ship and freight. The ship in the course of a voyage stranded owing to the negligence of her master, and the plaintiff now sought to recover under the sue and labour clause certain sums of money which he had unsuccessfully sought to recover abroad in general average from the cargo owner.

July 25 and 26, 1893.—The case was argued on an agreed statement of facts with the documents attached there. The facts and arguments of counsel appear from the judgment of Barnes, J.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Holman, for plaintiffs, cited

Dickenson v. Jardine, 18 L. T. Rep. 717; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 639;

The Carron Park, 63 L. T. Rep. 356; 15 P. Div. 203; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543;

Dixon v. Whitworth, 40 L. T. Rep. 718; C. A. 43, p. 365; 4 C. P. Div. 371; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 138; C. A. 327; Lohre v. Aitchison, 38 L. T. Rep. 802; 3 Q. B. Div. 558; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 11; in the House of Lords, 41 L. T. Rep. 323; L. Rep. 4 App. Cas. 755; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 168.

Carver for the defendants.

BARNES, J.—This case raises some questions of complication and difficulty, I think partly owing to the form in which the case is stated for the opinion of the court. The action is brought by the plaintiffs, who are the owners of the steamship Mary Thomas, against the defendants, upon two policies of insurance, the one being for 1000*l.* upon the Mary Thomas, valued at 28,000*l.*, the other being for 1200*l.* on freight chartered or otherwise in the said vessel. I think both the policies contain a clause that general average is payable as per foreign custom and York Antwerp rules in accordance with the contract of affreightment, that on the ship having the words "also salvage charges." The policy upon the ship appears to form one of a number under which she was insured, so far as I gather from the average statement. It seems that the vessel was on a voyage from Nicolaieff to Rotterdam, with a cargo of grain, and it was on that freight she was insured. In the course of the voyage she stranded on a reef off the island of Malta. Thereupon the usual class of operations were entered upon by which the cargo was partially discharged and taken into Malta, and the ship was ultimately successfully got off and taken into Malta. Afterwards the cargo was completely discharged, the ship was repaired, and the cargo reloaded. Her voyage was continued, and ultimately her cargo was delivered at Rotterdam. That having taken place, a statement of general average was made up at Rotterdam, at the request of the plaintiffs, in accordance with the law and practice there prevailing. The result of that general average statement was that a sum of 3792*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.* was carried into the general average column, which then required to be apportioned amongst the various interests. Accordingly the statement proceeds to apportion it. The shipowner, in respect of his interest in the ship, is to contribute the sum of 1692*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.*, the cargo 2049*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.*, and the freight 230*l.* 16*s.* 2*d.* The statement was put before the underwriters, including the defendant, and in respect of the policy on ship the sum of 205*l.* 4*s.* is shown to be due from the underwriters on the ship in respect of a claim on that policy. In respect of the claim on the policy upon the freight, the defendants are shown to be liable for the sum of 163*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.* in the same manner. Thereupon the defendants, having that statement put before them by the plaintiffs, liquidated the demands made upon them in pursuance of it, and in fact discharged, unless something should alter it, their liability for all payments on the policy. But the plaintiffs had to demand from the cargo its proportion of the general average which was attributed to it in the statement, and thereupon they made their claim in Holland against the consignees of the cargo, and were met by this answer: "We, the consignees, are not responsible to you for any contribution in general average, because although the bills of lading under which the cargo was carried exempted the shipowners from responsibility, for, amongst other things, accidents of navigation, strandings, and damages caused thereby, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, or other servants of the shipowners, yet that while freeing the owners from the responsibility for the loss brought about by the stranding, which it is said was caused by negligence, does not affect the ordinary rules applicable to a claim for general average, and that as the general average loss was really brought about by the negligence of the plaintiffs or their officers in charge, the plaintiffs cannot claim from us (the consignees) any contribution in general average." That contest, so raised, came before the courts in Holland, and ended in a decision that the cargo owners were not in the circumstances liable to make a contribution in general average or otherwise to the shipowner. There was an appeal upon that matter, and the judgment was affirmed. I think that pending the appeal, on examination of the average statement, it appears that part of the final item for general average included the costs of certain repairs of the ship, and that I suppose had been so included in accordance with the law and practice at Rotterdam. But as that item, so far as it related to the cost of repairs, would not, according to the decision in this country of Dickenson v. Jardine (18 L. T. Rep. 717; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 639), be a matter for which the underwriters of the ship could be made primarily liable with a right to enforce a claim for it against the cargo owners, the underwriters on the ship appear to have assisted the plaintiffs in this appeal with the object of trying to force the liability on the cargo owners so far as it affected that item, the plaintiffs themselves endeavouring to establish that liability so far as it affected general contribution. A further statement was made up in this country by Messrs. Manley, Hopkins, Son, and Cookes, with a view of seeing how that particular matter stood, and that item which I have mentioned as the gross amount of the general average, namely, 3972*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.*, was found to be divided in the statement I have last referred to in this manner—806*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.* is treated as due to repairs, 3165*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* as due to the ordinary operations of salving ship and cargo. The item of 806*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.* is then apportioned between the steamer, the cargo, and the freight, and the amount which the cargo would have to bear of it is 416*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.* There is a note to the effect that the underwriters being primarily liable for that item for repairs, which so far as it related to the ship had been discharged, but so far as it related to the cargo was not yet payable, agreed to bear any cost which would be attributed to that pro rata with the other costs in order to endeavour to get a contribution from the cargo owner. The portion due from the defendants on that item is 14*l.* 7*s.* 2*d.*, and that was paid by the defendants to the plaintiff, but when the appeal came on, the plaintiffs being defeated by the cargo owners, the underwriters did not get any portion back of that payment. The position is such that they have discharged, in addition to the original contribution claimed from them by the first statement, that extra item which relates to the cost of repairs.

Having failed against the cargo owners to obtain any contribution from them, the plaintiffs originated what seems to me to be a remarkable idea. They turned round and said, "We have failed against the cargo owners to get any contribution from them, and now we will ask the underwriters on the ship to pay the whole expenses, which are not recoverable from the cargo owners." The proposition strikes one at the outset as a very remarkable one—that where there is an adjustment made by which so much is apportioned to the ship for saving it, and so much to the cargo for saving it, because you cannot get it from those responsible for the contribution of the cargo, therefore the underwriters on the ship are to pay the whole cost of saving ship and cargo. That is the broad way in which this case really comes before me, and the broad point which I cannot help thinking, notwithstanding the form of the case, was the real case to be put before me. But with considerable ingenuity the plaintiffs have seen no doubt the strange position which that would result in, and they have selected out of the average statement certain items the details of which are not before me, and have taken portions of those items which I suppose by some calculation on their part they are able to show have been debited against the cargo, and then have put forward these items and say that if you look at them by themselves they are items which, either partially or wholly, were moneys spent to save the ship alone. The items are these: There is first 799*l.* 12*s.*, "portion originally debited (as per foreign statement) to cargo, of share of expenses incurred in putting cargo outside into lighters, refloating the Mary Thomas, and towing her into Malta." That item seems as much attributable to saving cargo as ship. The second item is 150*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, "portion originally debited (as per foreign statement) to cargo of charges and expenses incurred with discharge of cargo at Malta." That they say is merely part of the costs of repairs, and therefore ought to be payable by the underwriters on the ship. It is not very clear in this particular case whether it really was part of the cost of repairs, because Mr. Carver has pointed out several reasons—one relating to the delay in connection with the pontoon, and the other that it was treated as a whole operation—why that should not be chargeable against the ship alone. The third item is 227*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*, "portion originally debited (as per foreign statement) to cargo of agency and incidental expenses." This would stand or fall to some extent by the others. The last two items are 69*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.*, "balance portion originally debited (as per foreign statement) to cargo of charges and expenses incurred in warehousing cargo," which they say ought to be borne by the ship, though I do not in the least know why; and 126*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*, "balance portion originally debited (as per foreign statement) to cargo of charges and expenses incurred in re-shipping cargo," which they says is an item spent merely in earning freight. No doubt that item, taken by itself, is one which speaking quite generally, and without intending to lay down a rule, would, ordinarily speaking, be dealt with as a charge incurred for the purpose of earning freight.

Those being the items picked out, the points which are taken seem to come in this way. There is no question whatever that the difficulty in this case has been created by the fact that the court in Holland has held that though the bills of lading contain the clauses to which I have referred, making the shipowner not responsible for loss or damage caused by stranding, when that stranding is brought about by negligence, it has further held that the owners cannot claim from the cargo owners any contribution for general average. That is the cause of this difficulty, and if it had arisen in this country the point would hardly have occurred as it has done, because it has already been decided by Lord Hannen, in the case of The Carron Park (63 L. T. Rep. 356; 15 P. Div. 203; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543), that the cargo owners would be liable for a contribution in general average under circumstances where the accident had occurred from negligence where by the bills of lading the shipowners were not responsible for that negligence. All I need say is that, so far as my own opinion is worth expressing after Lord Hannen's judgment, I entirely concur in the reasoning which he expressed in the report of that case. It seems to me quite obvious that when by the terms of the contract of carriage certain responsibilities are excepted, that is to say, in this particular case, the negligence of the master or officer which produces the stranding—the owners not being responsible for the consequences of that negligence—the position is this, that the shipowner, on the one hand, has the ship and the freight at risk, and on the other hand the cargo owner has the cargo at risk. It is obvious that if both of the parties were present there at the time, each responsible for the difficulty in which they found themselves, they would naturally say, "We have spent a sum of money to get out of this difficulty, and that we must share from the benefits we get out of it." That seems to be the decision in that case. Therefore indirectly the contract of carriage does vary the position of parties towards general average, because it varies the risk. But the plaintiffs' point, which was taken in reply in this case, was that when the salvage operations are both for ship and cargo, the owners of the ship can in the first instance recover the whole cost of salving ship and cargo from the underwriters on the ship, leaving them to get a contribution from the owners of the cargo. That seems to me entirely wrong in principle. It is perfectly true that in one instance there is by virtue of the operation of the policy itself, a case in which that can be done, namely, where part of the subject-matter of the insurance is sacrificed. As the underwriters have insured that particular thing, the assured can say, "Pay me for the loss of it, and then you can claim any benefits or rights I have against any other person as a contribution to that loss." But it seems to me that that proposition, which is found in Dickenson v. Jardine (ubi sup.), is wholly inapplicable to a case of accident, and I think it can almost be demonstrated to be wrong in such a case, because the operation of saving is taken for the benefit of both ship and cargo, leaving out freight for the moment, because it is in the same position as the ship; therefore the captain at that time, who in ordinary circumstances acts as agent for the person whose property is at risk, spends that money on behalf of all who are interested, and all who are interested must contribute to it. Therefore the shipowner ought only to contribute so much, and the underwriters then have to recoup him for what he has paid. If the terms of the sue and labour clause which were referred to by the plaintiffs on this point are looked at, it will be seen that they bear out that view. What the plaintiffs want to do so far as this clause is concerned—and they tried to treat the general average in the same way—is to say that it shall be lawful to sue and labour and travel for, in and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof, and all the other interests at stake, and then the company will bear their proportion of that. In support of that proposition counsel for the plaintiffs referred me to the case of Dixon v. Whitworth (40 L. T. Rep. 718, C. A.; 43 L. T. Rep. 365; 4 C. P. Div. 371; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 138; C. A. 327), which was the case in which Mr. Dixon had agreed with Mr. Erasmus Wilson for a sum of 10,000*l.* to transport the Cleopatra obelisk to this country; and, having made that arrangement, he put the obelisk in an iron case, and took out a policy with the defendants in that case upon goods and merchandise in the good ship or vessel called the Cleopatra, the iron vessel containing the obelisk, valued at 4000*l.* against the risk of total loss only, and then that policy contained the usual sea risk and the suing and labouring clause in the ordinary form; and the case coming on before Lindley, L.J. under the policy after an Admiralty suit had been instituted against the obelisk by salvors who had picked up the obelisk in its case at sea, and obtained 2000*l.* salvage, the owners then claimed on the underwriters for the repayment of that 2000*l.*; and Lindley, L.J. held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants their proper proportion in accordance with their insurance of the sum of 2000*l.* That decision was reversed on appeal (ubi sup.) owing to the decision in the case of Lohre v. Aitchison (38 L. T. Rep. 802; 3 Q. B. Div. 558; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 11; in the House of Lords, 41 L. T. Rep. 323; L. Rep. 4 App. Cas. 755; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 168), which decided that salvage by independent salvors could not be recovered under the suing and labouring clause, and as the policy in Dixon v. Whitworth was against total loss only, the plaintiffs could not recover for total loss, and could not recover under the suing and labouring clause. Now it is said, although the case was reversed, that the observations of Lindley, L.J. on the effect of the suing and labouring clause in his judgment, show that in the first instance the whole of that 2000*l.* could be recovered from the underwriters on the Cleopatra and the obelisk, and therefore it follows that the whole of the expenditure could be recovered in the first instance from the underwriters on the ship. If the judgment of Lindley, L.J. is taken as not affected by its reversal by the Court of Appeal, it will be found that his language when looked at is no authority for that proposition at all for this reason: after dealing with the language of the clauses, he says the agreement is to contribute (in proportion to the amount subscribed) to the charges of his services. In other words, the underwriters agree to pay him for his services; each underwriter agreeing to pay in proportion to the amount for which he insures. Moreover, the early part of the clause authorises the assured to endeavour to save, not his interest in the thing insured, but the thing itself; and the language of the clause is adapted to cases in which other persons besides himself are interested in that thing, and then he goes on to refer to one or two cases; but the language is wholly inapplicable to the interests of persons who are not interested in the thing, namely, the ship, but are interested in the cargo, a totally different thing from the subject-matter of insurance—another interest altogether; and in this particular case the underwriters had insured the obelisk itself and the entire vessel for the sum of 4000*l.*; and therefore by agreement between themselves and the plaintiffs they had valued the ship and obelisk at the 4000*l.*, and although there might be some interest on somebody's part in the obelisk itself behind the plaintiffs, yet the underwriters are liable to the plaintiffs for the costs of saving the iron ship and its cargo. But that has nothing to do really with a case where a ship is at risk, with somebody perhaps interested as well as the plaintiff who insured it in full; and another interest altogether, namely, the cargo, which belongs to somebody totally different, and is not insured or affected by the policy on the ship. I should like to say that if the cases to which Lindley, L.J. refers are examined, they certainly do not support the plaintiffs' proposition in this case. The case referred to by him, in which Chancellor Kent gave a decision, of Watson v. Marine Insurance Company (7 Johnson, N. Y. Rep. 57), and which seems in this judgment to have been taken as dealing with a case of different interests, and the owner's right to recover against his underwriters for all the expenses in that case, the evidence of the losses set out in that report shows that the whole of the expenses which were in dispute were incurred about the business of the ship only; and the learned chancellor in giving judgment says that the captain proved in that case that the expenditure, subject to the above exceptions, was necessarily incurred about the business of the ship, and of her only; and he expressly declines to decide the question of what would be the case if they had been partially incurred for the ship and partially for the cargo, for he says: "All these subjects of insurance were equally involved in the peril, and it would seem to be just that the ship and freight should bear these expenses in due proportions throughout; and the cargo should bear its proportion of the first part of the expenses until the captain ceased to have further concern with it. The labour and expense were incurred for the recovery of the ship, notwithstanding that other subjects might incidentally enjoy the result of the effort," and then he refers to what the captain had said in his evidence. There are two other cases referred to in that case, and in the report of another case in the same book (Jumel v. Marine Insurance Company, 7 Johnson, N. Y. Rep. 412), one of these cases being that of Maggrath v. Church (1 Caines Rep. 195), in which the same principle which is laid down in Dickenson v. Jardine (ubi sup.) will be found; but certainly it did not go further than that, and I think the observations of Mr. Loundes and of Mr. Phillips show that the rule which I am endeavouring to apply, and the way I am applying it, is the true one. Therefore I hold that the plaintiffs cannot, either by virtue of any principle or by virtue of any authority, claim to recover from the underwriters of the ship the whole amount of the expense incurred in saving the ship and the cargo, and can only recover the portion properly due to the ship.

Then the plaintiffs' next point is, that in this particular case the money was under the circumstances only spent to save the ship, because the shipowner has not been able to recover from the cargo owner the contribution which he claims. The answer to that seems to me to be this, that as a matter of fact at the time the expenditure was incurred, the captain was acting in the ordinary way as much in the interest of the ship as in the interest of the cargo, and that the expenditure was, in fact, incurred in the ordinary way for the purpose of saving the ship, freight, and cargo. Then the third point is with regard to these particular items, and that point is this:—Those items are really for saving the ship and freight, and should be so recoverable. Well, some of them may be if the matter stood alone on a criticism of those terms, though only some of them really seem capable of being brought into the category of expenses incurred only for the ship. But it seems to me that in this case you must take the matter as a whole. The parties made up an average statement, claimed on their underwriters upon the footing of it, and the underwriters paid the whole of the amount expended for saving the ship and freight upon the basis of an agreement of an average statement properly adjusted according to the law of the place where it ought to be adjusted, and it is impossible to pick out from that statement some items without taking the whole into account; and if you take the whole into account the owners of the ship have paid their various proportions of the matters, which might perhaps, if you analysed the statement in England, be attributed to the cargo; and it seems to me that you must take the whole of the adjustment in which all the items have been dealt with according to the law of the place of destination; and these having been settled and paid for, there is nothing whatever to show that the plaintiffs have not received from their underwriters here all that is properly attributable to the saving of the ship, and the saving of the freight. Upon these grounds therefore I have come to the conclusion that the questions which are put forward for my decision must, under the circumstance of this case, where the matters have really been settled between the parties in the way I have already indicated, be answered in favour of the defendants.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Nov. 29 and Dec. 1, 1893.—J. Walton, Q.C. and Holman, for the appellants, cited

Harris v. Scaramanga, 26 L. T. Rep. 797; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. N. S. 339;
Kidstone v. Empire Marine Insurance Company, 15 L. T. Rep. 12; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 535; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 397;
Lee v. Southern Insurance Company, 22 L. T. Rep. 443; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 397; Dickenson v. Jardine (ubi sup.);
Watson v. The Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.).

Carver, for the respondents, cited on the facts:

Kemp v. Halliday, 14 L. T. Rep. 762; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 520;
De Vaux v. Salvador, 4 A. & E. 420.

The arguments appear in the judgment of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 11.—LINDLEY, L.J.—The question in this case is, whether the underwriters of policies on ship and freight respectively are liable to pay certain proportions of certain expenses incurred by the assured, the shipowners, and said by them to have been incurred in saving the ship and freight respectively. These expenses have been treated as general average by a foreign adjuster, and have been apportioned by him between ship, freight, and cargo. The proportions allocated to ship and freight respectively have been paid by the underwriters, but the proportion allocated to cargo cannot be recovered by the shipowners from the cargo owners, and have been lost therefore by them. They now seek to recover them from their own underwriters. The question thus raised turns on the contract of insurance, and more particularly on that clause in which it is expressed thus: "General average and salvage charges payable according to foreign statement, or per York Antwerp rules, if in accordance with the contract of affreightment." Nothing turns on salvage or on the York Antwerp rules. For the purposes of this case the clause may be read short, thus: "General average payable according to foreign statement." The expenses referred to were incurred as stated in the agreed statement of facts, and it is obvious that most of the expenses at all events were incurred for the benefit, not only of the ship, but of the cargo also. None of them are on the footing of losses for which the underwriters were liable without any adjustment. The average adjustment was made at Rotterdam, and the adjuster, as already mentioned, treated these expenses as general average expenses. It is admitted that his adjustment is final and conclusive as an adjustment of general average. Harris v. Scaramanga (26 L. T. Rep. 797; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. N. S. 339) is conclusive on this point. But the shipowners contend that they are entitled to their expenses either as partial losses or under the suing and labouring clause; and that the adjustment has nothing to do with and in no way affects claims in respect of partial losses or claims under the suing and labouring clause. It is in my opinion true that a general average adjuster ought to exclude claims for partial losses not incurred for the benefit of more parties than one, and claims under the suing and labouring clause for saving the ship alone, but he must decide what expenses alleged to have been incurred for the benefit of both ship and cargo are to be treated as general average expenses and what are not, and expenses which are treated by him as general average expenses must be so treated not only as between the respective owners of ship and cargo, but also as between them and their respective underwriters. Expenses so treated cannot be treated as something else by those who have agreed to be bound by his decision. Some of these expenses incurred, according to the shipowners for the sole benefit of the ship, have been thrown on the freight and cargo by the average adjuster; others of these expenses, incurred solely for saving the freight, have been thrown on the ship and cargo, and now the assured contends that as between himself and his underwriters he is entitled to throw these expenses exclusively on the ship and freight respectively. This, in my opinion, is contrary to the contract, and cannot therefore be allowed. The assured is attempting by an ingenious process to convert his underwriters on ship and cargo into guarantors for the payment by the cargo owners of those portions of the expenses which the average adjuster has allocated to them, but which they will not pay. I am not at all prepared to say that the expenses in question were not general average expenses according to English law. Most, I think, were, but some may not have been. However this may be, they were all general average expenses by the law of Holland, and were so treated by the foreign average adjuster. Under those circumstances they cannot now be treated as something different. The principle contended for by the appellants is, in my opinion, unsound, and is opposed to and not in accordance with the contract entered into between the assured and the underwriters. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

SMITH, L.J.—The plaintiffs in this case are attempting to get the benefit of Dutch law as to general average, and the benefit of English law as to particular average, regardless of the fact that by so doing their underwriters may have to pay the same items of expenditure twice over. Can this be done? The plaintiffs insured their ship and freight with the defendants upon the terms that in case of a loss covered by the policy general average should be adjusted according to Dutch law. There is such a loss, and thereupon general average is so adjusted. By the Dutch law many items of expenditure are brought into general average which would have been charged to particular average against ship had the adjustment taken place in England. The general average contribution of ship and freight is consequently increased, and the plaintiffs have received the increased contribution, and have been paid by the defendants general average as per foreign statement. The plaintiffs nevertheless now resort to English law, and assert that some of the items of expenditure (which have been rightly treated by the Dutch adjuster according to Dutch law as general average charges) are particular average charges according to English law, and seek to single these items out of the foreign statement, and sue the defendants for them as being particular average on ship. This is a novel procedure. There is no authority that this can be done, and if it can, the result would obviously be most unjust to the underwriters. The case of Dickenson v. Jardine (18 L. T. Rep. 717; L. Rep. 3 C. P.

639), relied upon by counsel for the plaintiffs, is no authority for what his clients are seeking to do. What that case decided was that where goods are insured against jettison, and they are jettisoned, though under circumstances which give rise to general average, the goods owner can sue for a total loss without waiting for an adjustment, and suing for general average. It in no way decides that where general average has been duly adjusted as per foreign statement, and the assured has been paid thereon, he can afterwards single out from that statement any items of expenditure he desires, and sue for them as being due from the underwriters to him. I agree with the counsel for the defendants that the clause "general average as per foreign statement" means that in the case of a loss giving rise to general average items of expenditure are to contribute to general average according to Dutch law, and that this excludes the view that such items are to be particular average according to English law. I apply these remarks also to the suing and labouring clause. The circumstances under which the defendants did pay some particular average to the plaintiffs I have not before me. Counsel for the defendants says they did so to make themselves secure, but be this as it may, in my judgment it does not affect their position in the present case. I agree with the forcible judgment of Barnes, J., who has dealt in detail with the facts of the case. I have nothing to add thereto, and I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Davey, L.J.—The question is whether the defendants are liable to pay the sums mentioned in the statement of facts in respect of certain expenses either under the policy on the ship, or under that on the freight. The answer depends on the right construction of the policies. What is the effect of the clause "general average payable as per foreign custom?" The appellants admit that they are bound by it so far as the statement of the foreign average adjuster finds what can be recovered as general average against ship, freight, and cargo respectively, but they contend that they are not bound by the finding of what are general average expenses in a claim against the underwriters of the ship and freight on their policies. In my opinion this is not the true construction or effect of the clause in question. Such a construction counsel for the defendants says would on the one hand throw upon the underwriter on the ship a proportion of charges which would according to English law be borne exclusively by the cargo, and at the same time leave the shipowner free to claim from the underwriter everything which if the adjustment had been made in England would be claimable from him. In other words, the plaintiff claims the benefit of both the Dutch law and the English law. It is unnecessary to express any opinion whether that is the effect in the present case; it is sufficient for the argument of counsel for the defendants to say that it might be so. I am of opinion that it cannot be intended that the assured should be at liberty to approbate and reprobate, to take the benefit of the foreign law in claiming general average in accordance with it, and repudiate the foreign adjuster's award for the purpose of claiming particular average against his insurer upon an adjustment made by an English average stater. I am of opinion that according to the true construction of the policy the assured is bound by the foreign average adjuster's decision as to what expenses were incurred on behalf of ship and cargo, and would therefore be the subject of general average for all purposes. I was rather startled by the broad proposition put forward by counsel for the plaintiffs that the same matters might be subject of general average and of particular average. If you look into the case cited by him (Dickenson v. Jardine (ubi sup.), I think he laid down the proposition too widely. In that case jettison was one of the risks insured against in a policy on goods. The underwriter therefore had contracted to indemnify the assured against that particular risk, and it was held that the assured could recover according to the tenor of the policy, the insurer being subrogated to the assured's rights (if any) to contribution from ship and freight. That I understand. In the present case the assured can only recover under the suing and labouring clause the expenses incurred on behalf of the ship, and ex hypothesi the adjuster by bringing them into general average finds that they were incurred on behalf of ship, freight, and cargo. I am of opinion the plaintiff has agreed to be bound by that finding, and I agree with the decision of the learned judge in the court below, and with the reasons given for it.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellants, Donning, Holman, and Co.

Solicitors for respondents, Walton, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

June 19 and July 6, 1894.

(Before Bruce, J.)

Williams, Torrey, and Field Limited v. Knight.

The Lord of the Isles. (a)

Marine insurance—Hire of tug—Contract of indemnity—Collision—Running-down clause—Duty to enforce policy.

In an agreement by which a tug-owner agreed to let his tug, it was provided that the owner would fully insure and keep insured the tug against certain specified risks, including risk of collision causing damage to the tug or other craft; and, further, that if at any time during the continuance of the agreement any of the risks covered should happen, the tug-owner would indemnify the hirers in respect of all such damage to the extent of all moneys received by him under the insurance. The owner effected policies to cover the specified risk for 2000*l.*, leaving 800*l.*, the balance of the agreed value of the tug, uninsured. A barge employed by the hirers of the tug coming into collision, whilst in tow of the tug, with a steamship at anchor, an action was brought by the owners of the steamship against the hirers of the tug. The latter admitted liability, and the damages were assessed by the registrar. The tug-owner sent in a claim to the underwriters, who refused to pay. In an action by the hirers against the owner of the tug for repayment to them under the contract of the amount of damages paid and costs incurred by them in consequence of the proceedings by the owners of the colliding steamship, or, in the alternative, for such amount as damages for breach of the contract:

(a) Reported by Butler Aspinall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the defendant, the tug-owner, was only liable to indemnify the hirers to the extent of any moneys received by him under the policies, that he was under no obligation to sue the underwriters, and that as he had received no moneys he was under no liability to the hirers.

THIS was an action under an alleged contract of indemnity, or, in the alternative, for damages for breach of contract.

The plaintiffs were engaged in transport business on the Thames, and for this purpose owned and used barges and other craft. The defendant was a tug-owner carrying on business as the "Kaiser Steam Tug Company." On the 10th June 1892, the plaintiffs and defendant entered into a written agreement, by which the defendant, inter alia, agreed to let, and the plaintiffs agreed to hire, the steam tug Kaiser for four weeks from the 8th June 1892, and thence from week to week until the agreement should be determined in manner provided. The 6th clause of the agreement was as follows:

The said J. P. Knight (the defendant) will fully insure and keep fully insured the said tug against all risks (including collision risk and risk of damage to or by craft or vessels in tow of the said tug or such vessels or craft colliding with others) during the continuance of this agreement, and will forthwith furnish to the hirers an abstract of the policy or policies effected in respect of the said tug. Provided always, that if at any time during the continuance of this agreement the said tug shall be damaged by or shall occasion damage to craft or vessels in tow of the said tug, and that the said tug or any craft or vessels that she may be towing shall be damaged by or shall occasion damage to any craft or vessels or otherwise, which shall be covered by the insurance to be effected by the said J. P. Knight, as hereinbefore provided, then the said J. P. Knight will indemnify the hirers in respect of all such damage to the extent of all moneys received by him under such insurance.

The defendant, purporting to act under the agreement, effected a policy upon the tug for 2000*l.*, upon a valuation of 2800*l.*, but did not insure the balance. The defendant alleged that he was not able to induce the underwriters to fully insure the tug against the risks specified in the agreement, but this the plaintiffs refused to admit. To the extent that the defendant so failed to fully insure and keep insured the tug, he admitted that he became the insurer thereof, and brought into court the sum of 165*l.* in respect thereof. The abstract of the policy as provided by the above clause was not furnished to the plaintiffs, who did not, however, apply for it.

On the 26th June 1892, a barge employed by the plaintiffs, whilst in tow of the tug, collided with and damaged the passenger steamer Lord of the Isles, which was lying at anchor immediately above London Bridge. The owners of the steamer made a claim for the damage sustained, and on 11th April 1893 commenced an action against the plaintiffs. On the 28th June the liability of the plaintiffs to the owners of the Lord of the Isles was admitted by the plaintiffs, and the claim thereunder was referred to the registrar to assess the amount. Such claim amounted to 366*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, but on the 12th Aug. the registrar reported that 335*l.* 10*s.* was due from the plaintiffs to the owners of the steamer, with interest, and that the owners were entitled to the costs of the reference. The plaintiffs were liable to pay such sum of 335*l.* 10*s.*, and alleged, but this was not admitted by the defendant, that they had paid two further sums, being the amount of the taxed costs of the owners of the Lord of the Isles and the plaintiffs' costs of such action and reference. The defendant did not endeavour to collect, and did not receive any moneys under the insurances. Upon receipt of the plaintiffs' claim, the defendant sent in a claim to the underwriters under the policies, but the underwriters refused to make any payments, and the defendant received nothing from them.

The plaintiffs having called upon the defendant to indemnify them under clause 6 of the agreement, and to collect the insurance moneys payable under the policies, the defendant alleged that he had effected insurances, and contended that he had thereby fulfilled his obligations under the agreement, and that he was under no obligation to sue the underwriters. The defendant admitted that he was responsible to the plaintiffs in the above-mentioned sum of 165*l* 1*s.*, which he paid into court in full satisfaction of all claims made by the plaintiffs in the action.

The plaintiffs contended, and, save as aforesaid, the defendant denied, that under these circumstances they were entitled to recover from the defendant the amounts sued for in the action.

Pyke, Q.C. and Hurst for the plaintiffs, contended, first, on the construction of the agreement that the defendant had himself undertaken to indemnify the plaintiffs against the risk which had happened, and that he was therefore liable on his contract of indemnity; secondly, that he had undertaken to collect the moneys which might become payable under the insurances which he had contracted to effect, and that as it was admitted that he had not endeavoured to collect them he was liable for their amount as for breach of contract; and thirdly, that the policies taken out by the defendant in professed performance of his contract were not such as the plaintiffs themselves could have sued the underwriters upon, such policies being in a form in which the defendant only could sue, and being upon the tug in which he alone was interested. Further, if the defendant failed to insure in such a form that neither he nor the plaintiffs could sue on the policies, the defendant was liable for the whole amount, as he practically admitted by his payment into court in respect of the proportion which he did not insure. If he insured he was, under the contract, the person to collect. As to costs, the defendant was liable under his contract of indemnity:

Leake on Contracts, p. 1078;
Lindley on Partnership, 6th edit.;
Smith v. Howell, 6 Ex. 730; 20 L. J. 377, Ex.;
Blyth v. Smith, 5 M. & G. 405;
Garrard v. Cottrell, 10 Q. B. 679.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Butler Aspinall, for the defendant, contended that the plaintiffs were really seeking to make the defendant bring an action against the underwriters. There was no such obligation expressly provided for by the contract, and it ought not to be implied. Under clause 6 the defendant's obligation was completed upon proper insurances being made, and upon his handing over any insurance moneys which might come into his hands. There was no obligation to take steps to procure the insurance moneys. The policy was in such a form that the plaintiffs could recover directly from the underwriters for any loss in which they were interested. The letting of the tug to the plaintiffs under the contract was a demise, so that the crew of the tug were the servants of the plaintiffs; and, so far as any present action was concerned, the defendant could not have been made liable for any damage done to the Lord of the Isles. It was now clear that, in spite of The Lemington (32 L. T. Rep. 69, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 475), the liability in personam and in rem for negligence were convertible terms:

The Tasmania, 59 L. T. Rep. 263; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 305; 13 P. Div. 110; 57 L. J. 49, Ad.

By the 4th clause of the agreement the plaintiffs were bound to make good any damage done, and, as before stated, they were personally liable for any damage done by the negligence of their servants. Thus they had an insurable interest in the tug, and the policies effected were in such words that they covered the interest of all concerned, including the plaintiffs. And as they were effected for the express purpose of covering that interest, the plaintiffs had the requisite insurable interest to entitle them to sue under the policy. Their interest, being an interest for the time being in the tug itself, was sufficiently stated to enable them to sue:

Sutherland v. Pratt, 12 M. & W. 16;
Arnould on Marine Insurance, 6th ed., pp. 60, 61.

It might be that there was a concurrent interest so that the defendant could recover for whatever damage affected him, as, for instance, any damage to the hull of the tug itself, whilst the plaintiffs could recover for any damage which they might sustain personally whilst they had the tug. In this case the plaintiffs were sued in personam by the owners of the Lord of the Isles, and had paid because the negligence was the negligence of their servants. No damage had been occasioned by any person for whom the defendant was responsible, and hence he had no interest quâ the damage in the subject-matter of the insurance, and could not maintain an action against the underwriters. The words of the agreement implied no obligation to collect or even to receive, and if the plaintiffs could sue, no such obligation should be imposed upon the defendant. If there was any fear as to parties, there was no reason why the action should not be brought in the joint names of the plaintiffs and the defendant. As to costs, in any event these could not be recovered, because they were not damages, as being the natural and probable cause of the defendant's act. The only case in which costs could be recovered as damages was where there existed an express or implied undertaking to indemnify, and there was no such undertaking here.

Pyke, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 6.—BRUCE, J.—[Having stated the facts:] The question in dispute resolves itself practically into this: Upon whom does the burden rest of compelling the underwriters to pay the amount of the loss insured by the defendant? The defendant agreed to insure, and I think it must be taken that the insurance was entered into to cover the plaintiffs' interest. It may be that the policy covered the defendant's interest also, and that in the case of a total loss of the tug by perils of the sea, the defendant would, in certain events, be entitled to recover under the policy. But in the event which has happened, which has resulted in a loss to the plaintiffs, I do not doubt that the policy must be regarded as having been effected for the plaintiffs, and that any money recovered under the policy in respect of the loss now in question would enure for the benefit of the plaintiffs. It is contended that, as the policy was effected by the defendant for the plaintiffs' benefit, he was their agent to effect the policy on their behalf, and it was therefore his duty to enforce the policy and to take proceedings against the underwriters to recover the money due under the policy. It appears from the defendant's letter of the 26th April 1893, that he did apply to the underwriters to pay the claim, and that they referred him to their solicitors, and by letter dated the 3rd Jan. 1893, the defendant offered to hand over the policies to the plaintiffs. But the plaintiffs insist that the defendant must do more, and that he must, without an offer of indemnity from them, at his own cost and risk take legal proceedings against the underwriters. I can find no authority in favour of this contention. No doubt where an agent effects a policy on behalf of a principal, and retains the policy with the consent of the principal, it becomes his duty to use reasonable diligence to enforce the rights and protect the interests of his principal in all matters arising out of the contract. By his negligence in the discharge of these duties the agent may render himself personally liable: (Bousfield v. Cresswell, 2 Camp. 545.) But where he does all that is necessary to preserve the rights of his principal, and demands the amount claimed on the policy from the underwriters, I think he does all that he can be reasonably expected to do. He is not bound to indemnify his principal against the trouble or expense of proving the justice of his claim. It is the principal who can alone, in most cases, furnish the proofs and documents by which the claim can be sustained. In the present case I understand that the underwriters deny that the barge that did the damage was at the time in tow of the steam tug. That is a fact which the underwriters are entitled to have proved. It is not reasonable that an agent should be exposed to the hazard and expense of litigato which he is a stranger. These are the rules which are laid down in Duer on Insurance, in the 12th chapter "Of the extent of the liability of the agent." In the absence of judicial decision, I do not know of any higher authority. Even in the case of a del credere agent, that learned author observes: "Where the liability of the principal debtor, as in the case of the underwriter, is not absolute, but contingent; where it depends upon facts, the evidence of which it is the province and the duty of the assured to furnish, until that evidence has been given and has proved conclusive, it seems to be clear that the del credere agent ought not to be held responsible; for until then there is no certainty that a debt exists to which this guarantee was meant to apply" (Duer on Marine Insurance, ed. 1846, vol. 2, lecture 12, p. 333.) In the present case the defendant did not guarantee the solvency of the underwriters, and it seems to me to be unreasonable to fix upon him a higher obligation than would attach to him if he had given such a guarantee. These principles are, I think, in accordance with the general law. If an agent has, at the express or implied request of his principal, necessarily incurred expenses in carrying on litigation on behalf of his principal, these expenses must be borne by the principal, and the agent will be entitled to recover them from the principal: (see Howes v. Martin, 1 Esp. 161; and Curtis v. Barclay, 5 B. & C. 141.) I think it follows that the agent may, in cases where communication with the principal is possible, demand an indemnity before commencing litigation: (see Lacey v. Hill, L. Rep. 18 Eq. 182.) See also as to the liability of a trustee where there is a covenant to insure against fire, Tudball v. Meddlicott (36 W. R. 886).

For the reasons I have given I have come to the conclusion that the defendant has not been guilty of any breach of his contract. It does not appear that he has not been ready and willing to do everything that he was bound to do to enable the plaintiffs to obtain the benefit of the policies effected on their behalf. I have not thought it necessary to consider the question whether the action on the policy should be brought in the name of the plaintiffs or the defendant, because it has not been shown that the defendant has been unwilling to allow the plaintiffs to use his name on a proper indemnity being given: (see Ex parte Kearsley, 17 Q. B. Div. 1.) In the result, I must give judgment for the defendant. The plaintiffs are, I think, entitled to costs up to date of the payment into court, and the defendant is entitled to the costs since that date.

Solicitors: for the plaintiffs, Pritchard and Sons; for the defendant, Jennings and Sons.

July 17 and 30, 1894.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. Jeune.)

THE AUSTIN FRIARS. (a)

Charter-party—Arrived ship—"Ready to load"—Delay through sanitary regulations—Option of charterers to cancel — Damages for loss of charter—Collision.

A charter-party provided that the freighters were to have the option of cancelling the charter if the vessel failed to arrive at the port of loading and be ready to load on or before midnight on a certain date; also that detention by quarantine should not count as lay days.

The vessel arrived on the last day of the stipulated time, and was in herself ready to load, but was prohibited from communicating with the shore until the doctor had visited her and pronounced her free from infection. This was not done until the following day, and the charterers alleged that the vessel was not ready to load within the stipulated time and cancelled the charter.

The Assistant Registrar held, that the vessel was not too late and that the charterers were not justified in cancelling the charter; also that the visit of the doctor, although it prevented the charterers from putting cargo on board, did not constitute any unreadiness on the part of the ship to load.

On motion to vary the report:

Held, that the ship was not ready to load within the stipulated time, and that therefore the charterers were entitled to cancel the charter.

MOTION to vary a report of the assistant registrar.

This was an action arising out of a collision which occurred in the Bosphorus about 3 p.m. on the 27th Sept. 1893, between the steamship Albula and the steamship Austin Friars.

Messrs. Matthew Cay and others, owners of the Albula, brought an action for damages against the owners of the Austin Friars. The court found that the Albula was alone to blame for the collision, and the usual reference to the registrar and merchants was made to report as to the amount of damages sustained by the owners of the Austin Friars.

At the time of the collision the Austin Friars was proceeding up the Bosphorus in water ballast on her way to Sulina and Galatz for the purpose of loading at the latter port a cargo of wheat under a charter-party dated 25th Sept. 1893, and made between the owners of the Austin Friars and Messrs. J. Dreyfus and Co. of London.

The charter-party was the 1890 Danube charter-party, and the material clauses were as follows:

7. Eleven running days, Sundays, &c., excepted, are to be allowed the said freighters (if the steamer be not sooner despatched) for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days, at 4*d*. per ton on the steamer's gross registered tonnage per running day. Lay days at port of loading are not to count before the 26th Sept. next (new style), unless both steamers and cargo be ready earlier. The freighters have the option of cancelling this charter if the steamer does not arrive at port of loading, and be ready to load on or before midnight of 10th Oct. next (new style).

11. Except as herein provided, detention by frost or ice from Ibrail down to Sulina, also detention by quarantine, shall not count as lay days.

The registrar found, as a fact, that the Austin Friars put back to Constantinople in consequence of the collision, and was there temporarily repaired, that she sailed thence on the 7th Oct. and arrived off Sulina on the 9th, and on the following morning at 9.30 the clearance papers for Galatz were taken from the ship by a person from the firm who were agents both for the charterers and the shipowners.

On the 10th Oct., at 11 p.m., the Austin Friars arrived at Galatz, but no one could leave the ship or come on board until the doctor had visited her and pronounced her free from infection. On the following morning the doctor came on board, and the master then landed and gave notice to the charterers that he was ready to load; but the charterers stated that the vessel was too late, and they cancelled the charter in accordance with clause 7.

The Austin Friars was consequently placed on the berth, and after some delay obtained another cargo with which she proceeded to Antwerp, and after discharging there was taken to Shields, where she was permanently repaired.

The owners of the Austin Friars therefore claimed, as part of their damages arising out of the collision, (a) demurrage at Constantinople, (b) demurrage at Shields, and the loss of the time occupied in proceeding thither from Antwerp, and (c) demurrage at Galatz, and damages for the loss of the charter of the 25th Sept., such damages being the difference between the freight lost and the freight earned.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

As regards (a) and (b) the registrar stated that a reasonable allowance had been given, and as regards (c) he was of opinion that the charterers were not justified in exercising the option of cancelling the charter, and he consequently allowed the defendants, as against the owners of the Albula, nothing in respect of this amount. He expressed the opinion that from a business point of view the Austin Friars was not too late, loading was not done at Galatz by night, and for all practical purposes she was as much in time as if she had arrived several hours earlier. Further, it was clear that, as the charterers had already loaded part of the cargo destined for the Austin Friars in another vessel before she arrived, it was necessary for them to make out that she had not complied with the terms of the charter. But, in his opinion, she had arrived and was ready to load before midnight on the 10th Oct., and was, as regards holds, equipment, &c., in a position to take on board cargo. The visit of the doctor was a matter which prevented the charterers from placing the cargo on board, and not a matter which constituted any unreadiness on the part of the ship to load.

Dealing with the cases on the point the learned registrar thought that the case of Smith v. Dart (52 L. T. Rep. 218; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; 14 Q. B. Div. 105) seemed to show that, when the charterers intend to make the option of cancelling dependent not only on the arrival, and so to say physical fitness of the ship, but also on her having submitted to local regulations, words for that purpose are introduced into the charter-party. For in that case the words were "free of pratique and ready to load," and the vessel was not free of pratique by the agreed date. The intention of this clause is to place an obligation on the shipowner to use his best endeavours to bring his vessel to the port of loading by a fixed date and in a proper condition. These things he has within his own control. It does not intend him to be exposed to the loss of his charter from the acts of persons over whom he has not control. If this were so, a shipowner might have his vessel at a loading port several days before the appointed time, and yet through the negligence of some municipal officer he might lose his freight. This, he thought, was not the intention of the parties to this charter, and therefore that part of the claim could not be sustained.

J. E. Bankes, for the defendants, in objection to the report.—It is submitted in the first place that the ship as a fact was not ready to load on or before midnight on the 10th, because she was in quarantine. It was just as if it were the last day of a period of quarantine. It was therefore impossible, as a fact, to load the vessel because nobody could go on or off. Secondly, inasmuch as by reason of the quarantine she was unable to load, the risk falls on the charterer and not on the shipowner. In Smith v. Dart (ubi sup.) Smith, J. said: "The shipowner does not contract to get there by a certain day, but says, 'If I do not get there you may cancel.' It is an absolute engagement, that if he does not get there the charterers may cancel." The same point taken by the registrar was taken in the case of Oliver v. Fielden (4 Ex. 135). The case which seems to be exactly in point is White v. Steamship Winchester Company (13 Scotch Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 524). There the Turkish authorities wrongly placed the ship in quarantine. A vessel in quarantine is like a vessel without a crew, she is like a log on the water and is perfectly useless for purposes of loading:

Groves, Maclean, and Co. v. Volkart, 1 C. & E. 309.

Thirdly, with regard to the class of cases dealing with revolutions and other kinds of vis major, there is then some disqualification in the ship, and the courts have there held a joint disqualification which implies faults on both sides. [The PRESIDENT referred to Hudson v. Ede, 18 L. T. Rep. 764; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 114; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 412.]

Cunningham v. Dunn, 38 L. T. Rep. 631; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 595; 3 C. P. Div. 433.

Butler Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, contrà.—This vessel was never in quarantine at all. [The PRESIDENT.—She was in an intermediate condition, a kind of medical purgatory.] The ship was physically ready to load, but the effect of the local regulation was to prevent the cargo being put on board. The intention of the parties to the contract must be looked to, and in this charter, where it is intended that the risk of quarantine shall fall upon the ship, it is distinctly stated. Where the words "free of pratique" are absent it must be concluded that the parties did not intend to insert them. The cases which have been cited, particularly the Scotch case, deal with the rights of the parties after the ship has arrived, and not with the question as to whether the charter-party is to be enforced between the parties. In Smith v. Dart (ubi sup.) it was held that the excepted perils did not apply to the cancellation clause at all. [The PRESIDENT.—It really all comes back to what is the meaning of the words "ready to load."] There is a distinction between "ready to load," and "ready to load free of pratique:"

Hick v. Tweedy, 63 L. T. Rep. 765; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 599;
Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morel, (1891) 2 Q. B. 648.

Finally, it is submitted that, if the vessel is to get demurrage for the delay, she ought not to get damages in respect of this contract:

The Argentino, 61 L. T. Rep. 706; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 433; 14 App. Cas. 519.

Lord Herschell there held that the vessel should not have both.

Bankes in reply.—The ship could not be loaded in the condition she was in, and there is no practical difference between that and the condition of quarantine. As to the absence of the words "free of pratique," if Lord Shand is right (White v. Steamship Winchester Company (ubi sup.) it is not necessary to put them in, because "ready to load" means "ready to load in fact." [The PRESIDENT.—The question really is: Is a vessel ready to load when the quarantine regulations of the port prevent anyone from going on board?]

Judgment was reserved, and delivered on July 30.

The PRESIDENT.—The only question raised is, whether the claim for damages for the loss of the charter-party is well founded, and that turns on the point whether the steamer was ready to load before midnight on the 10th Oct., within the meaning of the 7th clause of the charter-party. It was not contested that but for the delay caused by the collision the ship would beyond question have been ready to load in due time; nor was any argument as to remoteness of the damages pressed. The learned registrar has reported that, in his judgment, the vessel had arrived, and was ready to load. "She was," he says, "as regards hold, equipment, &c., in a position to take on board cargo. The visit of the doctor was a matter which prevented the charterers from placing cargo on board, not a matter which constituted any unreadiness of the ship to load." And again: "The intention of the clause is to place an obligation on the shipowner to use his best endeavours to bring his vessel to the port of loading by a fixed date and in a proper condition. These things he has within his own control. It does not intend him to be exposed to the loss of his charter from the acts of parties over which he has no control." The latter of these arguments—namely, that the shipowner is not liable to have his charter cancelled for the acts of parties over whom he has not control—appears to me to be answered by reference to the words of the charter-party, and which is covered by authority. The provision is an absolute one for the benefit of the charterers. If the ship is not in fact ready to load by the specified time, they are to be entitled to cancel the charter-party. This was decided in Smith v. Dart and Son (ubi sup.). In that case the charter-party contained the words "should the steamer not have arrived at first loading port free of pratique and ready to load on the 15th Dec. next charterers have the option of cancelling or confirming this charter-party." The vessel was prevented from being ready to load as provided by dangers of the seas, and it was argued that the excepted dangers clause applied to the claim giving the option to cancel. It was, however, held that it did not apply, and that the stipulation in question was an absolute engagement that the ship should be ready to load by a given time. A fortiori, if the forms of vis major enumerated in the excepted perils clause do not, on that ground, apply to control this stipulation, neither they nor any other forms of vis major can on any ground be imported to effect this object.

The other point is, that the vessel was herself ready to load, but that the charterers were prevented by pratique regulations from loading her; in other words, that there was no incapacity attaching to the ship herself. It was argued that the action of the authorities constituted an impediment to the ship loading independent of her own ability to load. There does not appear to be any English authority decided with reference to a state of things similar to that presented in the present case. The case of Cunningham v. Dunn and another (ubi sup.) is, I think, an authority to show that the act of a superior power, in that case, as in this, a Government authority, which prohibited the loading of a vessel, is an impediment incumbent not only on the charterers, but also on the shipowners. There is, however, a decision in the Scotch Court of Session which is nearer to the present case. In the case of John and James White v. The Steamship Winchester Company (ubi sup.) it was held that where access to a ship was prevented by quarantine regulations, the lay days did not commence to run, and the shipowners could not charge the loss arising from such circumstance against the charterer, but must bear the loss themselves. The ground of this decision was that by reason of the quarantine regulations the ship was disqualified, and so not available, for taking in the cargo of the charterer. "The vessel," Lord Shand said, "would be an arrived ship in name only, but not in reality, so far as regarded the charterer, whose duty and obligation—the loading or unloading—should begin on arrival. The charterer might be quite ready to unload, or ready with a cargo waiting to load the vessel, but the disqualification of the ship would prevent this, and, indeed, would lead to the ship being sent away from the place of loading or discharge. She would thus never be at the disposal of the charterer so as to enable him to fulfil his obligation." I think that these words express the view which I ought to adopt; and I agree with Lord Shand that a quarantine regulation constitutes a disqualification of the ship to load. It was argued before me that the present is not a case of quarantine, nor in strictness is it. But there seems to me no distinction for this purpose between a medical officer in authority ordering a ship into quarantine, and his prohibiting access to her until he can examine into her condition. In both cases a superior authority, in pursuance of sanitary regulations, disqualifies a ship from taking cargo on board. It was also argued that some charter-parties (for example, that in Smith v. Dart) add "free of pratique" to the words "ready to load." This, of course, shows that those who framed the charter-party doubted if it were sufficiently clear that readiness to load included the absence of sanitary disqualifications; but I do not think that the practice of adding these words has been so usual or so authoritative as to show such a doubt is well founded. I think, therefore, that the damages in this case must include damages by reason of the loss of the charter-party.

Solicitors: Botterell and Roche; Thomas Cooper and Co.

Wednesday, July 4, 1894.

(Before BRUCE, J.)

THE TERESA. (a)

Jurisdiction—Prohibition—Injunction—Restraint of proceedings in inferior court—Salvage.

Salvage services were rendered by a Liverpool tug to a Spanish vessel of the value of 30,000*l.*, and a sum of 3500*l. was awarded.*

The mate of the tug brought an action in the Liverpool Court of Passage for apportionment of the salvage award.

On motion by the owners of the tug, who were plaintiffs in a salvage action in the High Court of Admiralty, to restrain the proceedings in the Court of Passage:

Held, that a judge of the Admiralty Division has power to grant a prohibition with reference to a matter pending before an inferior court, and that he has power to issue an injunction to a party proceeding in an inferior court to restrain him from going on with such proceedings, and that in the circumstances the motion ought to be granted.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hedley v. Bates (42 L. T. Rep. 41; 13 Ch. Div. 498) followed.

MOTION for an injunction.

This was an application arising out of a salvage action instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the steam-tug Brilliant Star, against the owners of the steamship Teresa, her cargo and freight, for salvage services.

The Brilliant Star was a paddle steam-tug, belonging to the port of Liverpool, and was built for salvage service. She was of fifty-two tons net register, with engines of 180 h.p. nom., working up to 1000 h.p. actual, and at the time of the services she had nine out of a crew of eleven hands on board.

On the 19th Nov. 1893, at 9.30 a.m., while sheltering from the severe weather at Holyhead, the Brilliant Star observed the vessel Teresa showing signals of distress about six miles N.N.W. of Holyhead. She went to her assistance with the lifeboat in tow, and after towing her from about 1 p.m. to 8.30 p.m. in a very heavy sea, brought her safely to anchor. Next morning she brought the Teresa into a place of greater safety close under the quay at Holyhead, and remained in attendance on her throughout the day.

The Teresa was a Spanish steamship belonging to the port of Bilbao, of 661 tons net register, with engines of 120 h.p. nom., and she was bound from Liverpool to Corunna with a general cargo.

The value of the Teresa was 5000*l.*, of her cargo 21,000*l.*, and her freight at risk 500*l.*

The value of the tug was 9000*l.*

The action was tried before Barnes, J. and Trinity Masters, on the 18th Jan. 1894, and judgment was given for the plaintiffs for 3500*l.* and costs. Of this only 2000*l.* and costs had been paid at the time of this motion. Those of the crew, however, who took part in the service, had been settled with excepting the master.

On the 27th June Edward Johnson, the mate of the Brilliant Star, commenced an action in the Liverpool Court of Passage, against the Brilliant Star, for apportionment of salvage, but the owners of the Brilliant Star denied his right to any share on the ground that he was not on board at the time the services were rendered.

The court was now moved to restrain the proceedings in the Court of Passage.

Butler Aspinall, for the owners of the Brilliant Star, in support of the motion.—According to the decision in The Glannibanta (36 L. T. Rep. 27; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 339; 2 P. Div. 45) the Court of Passage has no jurisdiction to entertain this case at all, as it has only power to apportion salvage where the amount does not exceed 300*l.* Hedley v. Bates (13 Ch. Div. 498; 42 L. T. Rep. 41) is sufficient authority to entitle this court to grant an injunction. Where the court had power to grant a prohibition, it can now grant an injunction:

The Recepta, 69 L. T. Rep. 252; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 359; (1893) P. 255.

These proceedings ought to be stopped.

BRUCE, J.—I think I ought to grant the order. I had some doubt about it, but I think Mr. Butler Aspinall has shown me that a judge of this division has power to grant a prohibition with reference to a matter pending before an inferior court, and I think the case of Hedley v. Bates (ubi sup.) establishes that he has power to issue an injunction to a party proceeding in an inferior court to prevent him going on with proceedings. Beyond all question it would be exceedingly inconvenient that proceedings should take place in the Court of Passage, because the substantial matter was determined in this court. It is obviously convenient that any question arising in reference to the distribution of the money awarded for salvage should be determined in this court, and not in the inferior court. But, apart from the question of convenience, the Court of Passage has no jurisdiction, because the amount of salvage award to be distributed exceeds the sum of 300*l.* The doubt I entertained about the matter was because the Act giving jurisdiction to County Courts and the Court of Passage provides powers by which the judge of the Court of Passage may send any case before him to this court, and the judge of this court has power to transfer any Admiralty action to the Court of Passage. But I yield to the argument of Mr. Butler Aspinall that an injunction would be the cheaper course, and I grant the application with costs.

Solicitors: Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., for Hill Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

July 18, 19, and 20, 1894.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir Francis Jeune), assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE JUNO. (a)

Collison—Steamship dredging up to dock entrance—Stern light—Look-out—Whistle—Thames Rules.

A steamer dropping up the Thames stern first on a dark night for the purpose of going into dock and exhibiting only her stern light to down-coming vessels is bound to keep a look out up river, and ought, when she sees a vessel coming down, to give such sufficient signal as will enable the down-coming steamer to avoid her.

Semble, a proper signal under such circumstances would be a prolonged blast of the steam-whistle of not less than five seconds' duration.

THIS was a collision action in rem brought by the owners of the steamship Stockholm against the owners of the steamship Juno to recover damages for a collision between the two vessels in the river Thames. The defendants counter-claimed.

The collision occurred about 8 p.m. on the 17th March 1894 off the Millwall Dock entrance in Limehouse Reach. At the time of the collision the Stockholm, a screw-steamship of 727 tons gross, was on a voyage from Stettin to London. Having shipped a pilot at Gravesend she proceeded up the river bound for the Millwall Docks. As she approached the entrance to the docks she gave four blasts with her whistle, swung round, and dredged up with the force of the tide with her stern light alone visible to vessels coming down the river. The Stockholm gave no further signal. About this time the Juno, a steamship of 1302 tons gross register, was coming down Limehouse Reach in the course of a voyage from London to Newcastle. There was a slight fog, but lights could be seen at a distance of 300 yards. Both vessels were well to the north of mid channel. In these circumstances those on the Juno saw a white light a little on her starboard bow and at a distance, as they alleged, of 300 or 400 yards. Shortly afterwards it was seen to be the stern light of a steamship, which proved to be the Stockholm, and, although the Juno's engines were reversed, she came into collision with the Stockholm, the stern of the former striking the Stockholm's port side. The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with not keeping a good look-out, and alleged that those on board the Stockholm improperly failed to sound her whistle for fog, or to ring her bell, or to take the requisite means to warn the Juno of her presence and manœuvres.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames provide:

Art. 18. When a vessel is turning round, or for any reason is not under command, and cannot get out of the way of an approaching vessel, or when it is unsafe or impracticable for a steam vessel to keep out of the way of a sailing vessel, she shall signify the same by four or more blasts of the steam whistle in rapid succession, the blasts to be of about three seconds' duration.

Art. 19. The signals by whistle mentioned in the preceding rules shall not be used on any occasion or for any purpose except those mentioned in the rules; and no other signal by whistle shall be made by any steam vessel, unless it be by a prolonged blast of not less than five seconds' duration.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Sims Williams) for the plaintiffs.—The Juno is alone to blame. The Stockholm did all that was required by the regulations. There was no fog, and therefore she was under no obligation to blow her whistle or sound a bell. She gave sufficient notice of her presence and manœuvres by the exhibition of a stern light. The steam-whistle signals referred to in art. 17 of the Thames Rules are optional. None of the rules as to whistle signals apply to the circumstances of this case.

J. P. Aspinall, Q.C. (with him Butler Aspinall), for the defendants, contrà.—The Stockholm is alone to blame. There was no look-out aft on her. She should have taken the requisite means to warn the Juno of her presence and her manœuvres. She was bound to give some notice:

The Queen Victoria, 64 L. T. Rep. 520; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 9.

A vessel in such a position should give such signal as will give due warning. The whistle signal to be blown seems to be indicated by art. 19 of the Thames Navigation Rules.

The PRESIDENT (Sir Francis Jeune), having found the Juno to blame for not keeping a proper look out, proceeded:—Then we come to the case of the Stockholm. That again, to my mind, rests upon a very narrow point. Mr. Aspinall has relied upon the case of The Queen Victoria (ubi sup.), but I agree with the criticisms of Sir Walter Phillimore as to that. That case does not carry us very much further than this, that, under the circumstances of the Queen Victoria, it becomes the duty of a vessel to give some signal to other vessels which are approaching her in a position which she sees, or ought to have seen, is one of difficulty for them. I quite agree also that you ought not to compare too closely the facts of one case with another. If you do, I think you are very liable to get hampered with a mass of decisions. The facts of this case appear to me to be certainly clear. The Stockholm undoubtedly gave a four-blast signal, if she never gave any other It is said that is enough. It certainly appears the case that the Juno never heard that four-blast signal, and I am not sure that she ought to have heard it. On the other hand, if the Juno was herself whistling, it does not appear that the Stockholm heard her. It may be the case that the Juno ought to have heard the four-blast signal, but I am not sure that she ought. If she had, I am not sure that it would clearly indicate what the circumstances of case the were. After the Stockholm began to drift up the river, perhaps angling across to some extent, although not so much as the angle of four points which has been suggested, and gradually straightening down as she came towards the dock, I cannot help thinking that it became her duty first to see under those circumstances whether there was any vessel coming down with whose course she might be in difficulty; and secondly, if there was, to give such a signal of some kind as would give notice to that approaching vessel. I think there was failure of duty on the part of the Stockholm in these respects. I am very anxious not to lay any unnecessary burden on vessels going into dock; but in this case, when the vessel turned round it was night—it was, I will not say foggy, but it was certainly night when you could not see at any great distance. The Stockholm was dropping up the river in a position in which she could be exhibiting only her stern light, and she was in a position where that stern light would sometimes be moving and sometimes almost stationary. Therefore it was a light which might not unnaturally be mistaken by vessels coming down. I think a vessel in that position ought to keep a look-out up the river as to what might be coming down upon her, and ought, if she sees anything coming down, to give a signal to her in order to avoid the possibility of her making a mistake. She certainly did not do so, and, what actually lies at the root of the thing, beyond all doubt she kept no look-out whatever. The man on the bows, I think, saw the light first, when it could only be just upon them, and it is not disputed that she was keeping no look-out whatever in that direction. If she had kept a look-out what would she have seen? She would have seen the Juno coming down in a way which, unless she altered her course, made a collision inevitable. She would have seen the Juno approaching not at all fast, but slowly coming on towards her, and I cannot help thinking in these circumstances that she ought to have given some signal to her to get out of the way. Sir Walter Phillimore has pressed very much the fact that there is no particular signal indicated. I am not quite so sure of that. The Trinity Masters tell me that they think it would have been the proper thing to have resorted to the five seconds' signal. I cannot help thinking that that would have been a very proper signal, but it is unnecessary to say what particular signal was requisite. Any signal would have done which was not misleading, but there ought to have been some signal and some indication to the Juno. Therefore I think the result must be held to blame.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Rehders and Higgs. Solicitors for the defendants, Thomas Cooper and Co.

July 9, 10, and 30, 1894.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. Jeune.)

THE ORIENTA. (a)

Necessaries—Master's liability—Maritime lien on ship—Merchant Shipping Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 46), s. 1.

Disbursements and liabilities of the master of a vessel which give rise to a maritime lien are those for which, by virtue of his general authority, a master can pledge his owners' credit; and a liability cannot be created in the master, within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1889, merely for the purpose of attaching a lien to the vessel in priority to existing mortgages.

ACTION in rem.

This was an action by the master of the s.s. Orienta, to recover 668*l.*, the amount of a bill of exchange given by him in part payment for 1215 tons of bunker coal, and also for costs which it was alleged had been incurred in another action brought in respect of the bill. The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

By sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1889:

Every master of a ship, and every person lawfully acting as master of a ship by reason of the decease or incapacity from illness of the master of the ship, shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of disbursements properly made by him on account of the ship, as a master of a ship now has for the recovery of his wages; and if in any proceeding in any court of Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty, or in any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction, touching the claim of a master or any person lawfully acting as master to wages or such disbursements or liabilities as aforesaid, any right of set-off or counter-claim is set up, it shall be lawful for the court to enter into and adjudicate upon all questions, and settle all accounts then arising or outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding, and to direct payment of any balance which is found to be due.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Dawson Miller for the plaintiff.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Laing for the interveners.

Judgment was reserved and delivered on July 30.

The PRESIDENT.—In this case the question raised is whether Messrs. Phillips and Walton, the vendors of certain coal to the Orienta Steam Yachting Association Limited, by whom the steamship Orienta is owned, are entitled to a maritime lien on the vessel in respect of such part of the price of the coal as is the subject of the action. The Yorkshire Trust Limited and the Securities Insurance Company Limited appear as interveners in order to assert the prior right of a mortgage on the ship in their favour. The question arises in the following way: Edmund Elliott, the plaintiff, is the master of the Orienta. By two letters, dated the 15th and 16th July respectively, which passed between Messrs. Phillips and Walton and the Orienta Company, after some negotiations conducted by a Mr. W. J. Adamson, Messrs. Phillips and Walton agreed to bunker the steamship Orienta (her name then being the La Plata) in the East India Dock, with 1200 tons of Cardiff steam coal. The terms of payment stipulated for by Messrs. Phillips and Walton, as expressed in their letter, and agreed to by the Orienta Company, are "payment by captain's draft in our favour upon you, and accepted by you, payable as to one half of the amount of invoice three days after sailing, and the other half at sixty days from date of shipment, these documents to be handed us when our steamer with the coal is just alongside of steamship La Plata." Accordingly for these coals two bills of exchange were given by E. Elliott, drawn upon the Orienta Company, of which one was favoured, and the other forms the subject of this action, having been accepted but not paid by the Orienta Company. Some question was raised at the trial whether the whole of the coals supplied were for the use of the ship, the fact being that after the lighter was alongside it was found that some ballast in one of the bunkers prevented that bunker being used for coal, and accordingly about 300 tons of coal were never taken by the Orienta. It is clear, however, that but for this circumstance the Orienta would have taken them, and that they were necessary for her voyage, as a further supply of coals to the extent of 500 tons had to be procured in the Mediterranean; and, further, the Orienta Company also may allocate the payment they have made to the coals not in fact shipped. This matter may therefore be put aside; as may also all question of liability of the company, who do not defend the action, to the plaintiff, including the question of such liability extending to the ship after satisfaction of the interveners' claim. It was stated with perfect candour on behalf of Messrs. Phillips and Walton, the real plaintiffs, that their object in stipulating for payment by master's draft was to entitle themselves to a maritime lien by virtue of sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1889, and there can be no doubt that the Orienta Company intended by agreeing, to confer such lien, if they could, and the master gave the bills by arrangement with his owners for that purpose. Mr. Phillips, a partner in the firm of Phillips and Walton, said that they were informed by Adamson, in answer to inquiry, that the company was entirely satisfactory; and that no further inquiry was made as to the solvency of the company, or as to any existing mortgage on the ship. In fact, the company, although considerable sums were due to it, had at the time only 30*l.* to their credit at their bankers, and they subsequently became insolvent.

It is clear that the owners could not directly have given to Messrs. Phillips and Walton a maritime lien for the price of the coals purchased from them, and the question is whether they can effect this object, and bring the matter within the words of sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1889, by employing the instrumentality of their master. There can be no doubt that the main object of that section was to give to the master a maritime lien for disbursements, and perhaps for liabilities, and it was no doubt in consequence of a series of decisions on the effect of the 10th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, before the case of The Sara (61 L. T. Rep. 26; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413;

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

14 App. Cas. 209), that the master believed that he had such a lien. The words of the section express the lien to be for "disbursements properly made by him on account of the ship, and for liabilities properly incurred by him on account of the ship." It appears to me further that the section was intended to give a lien only in such cases as before The Sara it was considered to exist. I should infer this from the history of the Act, which was referred to in The Castlegate (68 L. T. Rep. 99; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 284; (1893) App. Cas. 38), and I think that the use of the words "properly" and "on account of the ship," and perhaps also the previous words "so far as the case admits," is designed to confine the lien conferred within these limits. I can imagine no reason why Parliament should have thought it desirable, in prejudice of the rights of mortgagees, to permit the creation of a maritime lien, except in the cases where for many years it was believed to exist. What was held before the decision in The Sara was, that the master had a lien for his disbursements. I omit reference to his liabilities, as in that period it was not settled whether liabilities and disbursements stood on the same footing—(see The Feronia (17 L. T. Rep. 619; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 54; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 65)—a distinction now rendered immaterial by the words of the Act. But the question is, what were the disbursements for which it was believed the master could create a maritime lien? It appears to me impossible to believe that in all cases where a master expended money in a purchase for the ship, or pledged his liability for it, a maritime lien was, or could ever have been supposed to be, created. Such law would, I think, be inconsistent with the jurisprudence which recognised no maritime lien for necessaries, and no right in the owner to create such a lien in respect of his expenditure on his ship. It would also make the position of a mortgagee of a ship altogether different from that of any other mortgagee, and indeed render it almost illusory. But if all disbursements and liabilities of the master for the ship cannot be supposed to give rise to a maritime lien, what is the criterion of those which have this operation? The test suggestion by Sir Walter Phillimore in argument for the interveners is, that such disbursements were those for which by virtue of his general authority and without express authority a master could pledge his owner's credit, or, in other words, those which he made strictly as master, a test which probably expresses the same thing as was intended by Lord Macnaghten by the words at the commencement of his judgment in The Sara (ubi sup.), "disbursements made by the master of the ship in the ordinary course of his employment." I think that this test is correct. Of course, under what circumstances, in foreign or home ports, respectively, and for what purposes a captain may, without express authority, pledge his owner's credit, has been often considered. For example, in the cases of Mitcheson v. Oliver (5 E. & B. 419) and Gunn v. Roberts (30 L. T. Rep. 424; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 250; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 331). Of course, also, when there is express authority the owner is liable to the captain and to those with whom the captain dealt, and probably in some of such cases the ship may be made liable on the principles indicated by Fry, L.J., in The Heinrich Bjorn (52 L. T. Rep. 560; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391; 10 P. Div. 44). But I am not aware of any authority which shows that the captain was ever supposed to be able to create a maritime lien on the ship, except when within the general scope of his authority he could have pledged his owner's credit. The distinction between disbursements which were and were not believed to give rise to a maritime lien has not, so far as I know, been the subject of much authority; but it was clearly decided as long ago as 1726 by Sir Joseph Jekyll, in the case of Walkiner v. Bernardiston. In that case the master had disbursed moneys abroad for the use of the ship, and had also at the direction of the owners become liable for and paid sums of money for provisions and materials for the ship while lying in the Thames. He had also paid seamen's wages, and had a claim for wages due to himself. In a question between the respective rights of the master and of a mortgagee, it was held that for the demands of the master in respect of what was done for the ship in the Thames there was no lien, but that there was a lien for the sums disbursed abroad, as also for the wages. It is, I think, clear, when the words of the master's report, the declaration of the Master of the Rolls, and the words of the reporter of the case are read together, that what the learned judge held was that for disbursements in a home port, where recourse could be had to the owners, the master had no lien in priority to a mortgagee, but that he had such a lien in respect of his disbursements when on his voyage, made by reason of necessity. This decision was no doubt erroneous, according to subsequent decisions before the Merchant Shipping Act of 1861, and would have been erroneous, as we now know, if given after that Act, in holding that disbursements or liabilities of the master abroad (apart from bottomry), or a claim for his own wages, would create a lien; but I refer to it because it shows that it was not even at that time supposed that a master making disbursements for the ship by authority of the owners, and for which he could pledge their credit, as by such authority, could create a lien on the ship, and shows that the reason for this was that creditors could and should resort to the owners for payment. In the case of The Chieftain (Br. & L. 104) Dr. Lushington held that a maritime lien existed in respect of a small sum laid out apparently without express authority for the ship, by a person whom he held in fact was acting as master and receiving wages as such, but he declined to allow such a lien in respect of a large sum for necessaries for which the master rendered himself liable. It is true that Dr. Lushington appears to base his judgment on the distinction between disbursements and liabilities, but it is remarkable that, in a comment on that case in his report on The Red Rose (2 A. & E. 80), Mr. Rothery suggests that the real ground of the decision may have been that the transaction as to the purchase of these necessaries "had taken place in this country, with the cognisance, and, no doubt, under the directions of the owners, and the court may very well have thought that this was merely an attempt to shift the burden of these charges from the shoulders of the owners to those of the mortgagees." If Mr. Rothery's view of the case be correct, in a case very like the present, the claim for a lien was disallowed; and certainly, in his opinion—and no one probably was more cognisant of the current practice of the Admiralty Court—a purchase even of necessaries by a captain in this country, by express authority of his owners, did not create a maritime lien in the captain's favour. In the case of The Great Eastern (17 L. T. Rep. 667; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 58; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 88), it appears to me clear that Sir Robert Phillimore had the same distinction before his mind. That was an action for necessaries for the Great Eastern, ordered by the master, Sir James Anderson, in Liverpool. The learned judge held that the owners rendered themselves liable by holding out Sir James Anderson as their master to the vendors of the necessaries, but he abstained expressly from saying whether the master had authority to pledge the credit of his owners in a home port, or whether a maritime lien on the ship was created.

If the present case were treated as one of the purchase of coals by the master, I think it is one in which he could not, under the circumstances of the supply being in the place where the owners carried on business, and at the beginning of a new voyage, have made his owners liable to the vendor without express authority. There had been many decisions on the Admiralty Court Act of 1861 before the case of The Sara (ubi sup.), but I cannot find that in any of the cases a maritime lien has ever been held to be created where it appears that the captain pledged his owner's credit otherwise than by virtue of his general authority to do so. The only instance which counsel in argument could refer me to was The Feronia (ubi sup.), in which it was said that items 21 and 22 were items of expenditure in a home port, and therefore not within the general authority of the master to make. But apart from the questions whether such expenditure might not be within a master's general authority, even in a home port, it is I think clear that these items were treated as allowed deductions from freight, and as such sanctioned by the case of Bristowe v. Whitmore (4 L. T. Rep. 622; 1 Mar. Law Cas. 95; 9 H. of L. Cas. 391). But it is to be observed that the present case is not even that of a liability incurred by a master in a purchase by him, by express authority, for the ship. There was no purchase by the master at all. The owner made a contract himself with the vendors of the coals, and, as a term of it, agreed to his master's liability being pledged by his giving bills. Evidence was given before me that this was entirely unusual. But apart from such evidence, it seems to me impossible to say that the master in thus, at the request of his owner, lending his name was doing anything within the course of his employment as master. The whole proceeding was avowedly an ingenious device to create a liability in the master within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Act of 1889, for the purpose of attaching a lien to the vessel in priority to existing mortgages, but I think that it fails, because the Act did not mean, and does not say, that a lien can be so created. The interveners are entitled to their costs.

Laing.—If there is no maritime lien, as your Lordship has held, the master has no right of action, this being an action in rem.

The PRESIDENT.—What I will do is this: I give judgment for the interveners, with costs, and I leave the plaintiff to move for such judgment as he may be advised.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Bottcrell and Roche.
Solicitors for the interveners, Ince, Colt, and Ince.

July 26 and 30, 1894.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. H. Jeune.)

THE KATY. (a)

Charter-party—Running days—How computed.

The term "running days" in a charter-party must, in the absence of any indication to the contrary, be taken to mean calendar days and not periods of twenty-four hours.

ACTION for demurrage.

The plaintiffs, Messrs. R. Gordon and Co., were the owners of the steamship Katy and their claim was for 71*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.*, being two days' demurrage of that vessel—the claim for freight indorsed on the writ having been paid by the defendants.

By a charter-party, dated the 1st Feb. 1894, the Katy was chartered to Messrs. F. Menal and Co. Fourteen running days were allowed for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage at 4*d.* per ton. Seven days were occupied in loading, and accordingly the bill of lading was indorsed with the clause, "Seven lay days have been used at the port of loading."

The following are the material clauses of the charter-party:

2. Orders for the United Kingdom, Continent, or other stipulated port, unless given on signing bills of lading, are to be given at Gibraltar within twelve running hours of arrival, or lay days—Sundays only excepted—to count.

3. The charterer has the right to order the steamer from Gibraltar to Queenstown, Falmouth, or Plymouth (at master's option) for final orders to be given within twelve running hours (twenty-four hours at Queenstown) of arrival, or lay days—Sundays only excepted—to count, for the United Kingdom, Continent, or for other stipulated Continental port not west of Havre, paying 1*s.* per unit extra freight over and above the rates hereinafter stated.

7. Fourteen running days, Sundays, Good Friday, Easter Monday, Whit Monday, and Christmas-day excepted, are to be allowed the said freighters (if the steamer be not sooner despatched) for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days at 4*d.* per ton of the steamer's gross register tonnage per running day. Lay days at port of loading are not to count before the 23rd Feb. next (new style) unless both steamer and cargo be ready earlier. The freighters have the option of cancelling this charter if the steamer does not arrive at port of loading, and be ready to load on or before midnight of 10th March next (new style) unless the steamer has been detained waiting for orders as to loading port longer than six hours—in which case the date last mentioned shall be extended so far as to cover the time the vessel was detained for orders over and above the six hours, and if by reason of such detention the vessel is prevented reaching her loading port, the charterers shall pay demurrage for each day detained over the said hours, whether the vessel is ultimately loaded or not.

9. c. It is further agreed, that at Sulina the steamer is to load as much cargo inside the bar or harbour as she can safely proceed to the roads with, and the remainder is to be shipped in the roads at freighter's risk and expense, but in the latter case all days on which lighters are unable from bad weather to go outside are not to count as lay days.

12. Should the steamer be ordered to discharge at a place to which there is not sufficient water for her to get the first tide after arrival without lightening, and lie always afloat, lay days are to count from forty-eight hours after her arrival at a safe anchorage, for similar vessels bound for such place, and any lighterage incurred to enable her to reach the place of discharge is to be at the expense and risk of the receiver of the cargo, any custom of the port or place to the contrary notwithstanding, but time occupied in proceeding from the anchorage to the port of discharge is not to count.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The vessel was ordered to Barrow, where Messrs. Walmsley and Smith, the defendants, were consignees of her cargo and holders of the bill of lading. She arrived there on Saturday, the 31st March, was moored in berth, and, except that she had not cleared at the Custom-house, was in every respect ready to discharge at 8.30 a.m. The captain made her entries at the Custom-house at its opening at 10 a.m. on the same day. Until this was done the discharge could not commence.

At about 10.30 a.m. on the 31st March the defendants received the following notice from the captain: "Dear Sirs,—I beg to give you notice that the steamship Katy from Sulina is now in berth and ready to discharge.—Yours faithfully, E. G. LANGLEY." When handing such notice to the defendants the captain requested that the discharge should be commenced at once, but the defendants declined to do this. The discharge commenced about 1 p.m. on the same day, and was finished at 9 a.m. on Monday, the 9th April.

The usual working hours at Barrow are from 6.30 a.m. to 5 p.m., except Saturdays, when work ceases at 4 p.m., and the average daily quantity discharged by the Katy was 445 tons. When work was finished on the evening of Friday, the 6th April, there remained in the ship only some forty tons of cargo. The work was resumed on the following morning, but was stopped at 10 a.m. by the defendants, who declined to proceed with the work unless the plaintiffs would pay them the sum of 10*l.* if the discharge was completed that day.

Under these circumstances, the plaintiffs contended that the lay days expired on Saturday, the 7th April, whilst the defendants contended that the lay days did not expire until Monday, the 9th April, and that therefore there was no demurrage due from them.

T. E. Scrutton for the plaintiffs.—It is admitted that the vessel was discharging on parts of eight days. The defendants contend that the time is made up of seven periods of twenty-four hours; but it is submitted that in this charter-party it is clearly indicated that the days are to be taken as calendar days:

Nielsen v. Wait, 54 L. T. Rep. 344; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 553; 16 Q. B. Div. 67.

[THE PRESIDENT.—In that case Lord Esher practically means that "running days" and "days" are the same. Lay days begin at a place where she is able to deliver.] The only English case on the point is The Commercial Steamship Company v. Boulton (33 L. T. Rep. 707; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 346; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 111). There the jury found that the day on which the vessel was cleared about noon was a working day, and the court held that they could so find. The Osseo (Shipping Gazette, June 8, 1894) was a similar case to the present one. [THE PRESIDENT.—Barnes, J. and myself there decided that a working day could not be made up by taking parts of three or four days.]

Hough v. Athga, 6 Scotch Sess. Cas. 4th series, 961.

In Allen v. Johnston (19 Scotch Sess. Cas., 4th series, 364) Lord McLaren said: "When it is ascertained that the lay days have been exhausted, demurrage must, I think, be held to begin at the hour at which the lay days are exhausted, and the days of demurrage are reckoned as periods of twenty-four hours from that hour. Any surplus interval of time in excess of a number of full days is to be counted as an additional day. [THE PRESIDENT.—Does part of twenty-four hours reckon as a day whether it starts at a particular hour or whether it is running?] It is open to the parties to agree as to the day being any period of twenty-four hours; but, unless they so agree, then it must be the ordinary calendar day.

T. G. Carver for the defendants.—This charter cannot be read to mean calendar days in every instance. Clause 12 says: "Lay days are to count from forty-eight hours after her arrival at a safe anchorage." The charter-party says that lay days shall commence at an hour which may be any hour. The intention must have been to contract for periods of twenty-four hours. It is unreasonable to contend that Saturday, when work was only carried on from 1 to 4 p.m., should be counted as a lay day:

Brown v. Johnson, 10 M. & W. 331.

In The Commercial Steamship Company v. Boulton (ubi sup.) the broken Tuesday was not claimed. He also referred to Nelson v. Dahl, 41 L. T. Rep. 365; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 6 App. Cas. 38.

Scrutton in reply.

Judgment was reserved, and delivered on the 30th July.

THE PRESIDENT.—The questions which arise in this case are two: First, does the phrase "running days" in this charter-party mean calendar days or periods of twenty-four hours, beginning from the commencement of discharging? Secondly, if calendar days are intended, is Saturday, the 31st, to be included in the lay days? There does not seem to be any direct authority on the first of these questions, but it appears to me that it is only by the suggestion of inferences to be drawn from various parts of the charter-party that any doubt can be created. It is clear from the case of Nielsen v. Wait (ubi sup.) that "running days" means all days as opposed to "working days;" in fact, means "days." It cannot be disputed that the word "days," standing by itself, means calendar days, and, indeed, I think it would require a clear context to show it means periods of twenty-four hours, as, if a certain number of hours is intended, it is natural and ordinary to specify the time by hours. Is there anything, then, in this charter-party to show that the word days has not its natural meaning? It was argued on behalf of the defendants that clause 12 of the charter-party, providing that in a certain event lay days were to count from forty-eight hours after the arrival of the vessel, shows that the lay day must be reckoned from some point in the calendar day. This clause, however, hardly, I think, advances the question, because, apart from the consideration that the language of clauses 7 and 12 is different, it may be that all that is intended is, that the beginning of the lay day should be coincident either with the beginning of that calendar day in which the forty-eight hours end, or of the next calendar day, according as a part of a lay day is or is not considered to reckon as a whole day. Clause 9 C., providing that on all days on which lighters are unable to go outside the bar or harbour are not to count as lay days, appears to me consistent with either view, as also do clauses 2 and 3, which provide for orders to be given within twelve or twenty-four running hours of arrival, lay days, Sundays only excepted, to count, as in such cases the lay days begin to run twelve or twenty-four hours after arrival as they do in the ordinary cases from the time of arrival. But in these clauses it is to be observed that when running hours are intended running hours are specified. On the whole, I can see nothing in the charter-party to compel me to assign to "running days" in clause 7 anything but the natural interpretation of calendar days.

The balance of authority, I think, confirms what I take to be the natural sense of the words. The inference to be drawn from the case of Commercial Steamship Company v. Boulton (ubi sup.) on this point is not quite clear, but I think that it shows those days were understood to be calendar days, because the demurrage days were not reckoned as running from 5 p.m. on the Tuesday when the ship got into dock, but as commencing on the following morning; and the argument on the successful side in that case was that, though demurrage began to run from the time the ship was in dock, that is, 5 p.m. on Tuesday, the demurrage days began to run on the morning of Wednesday. This certainly was the view of the above case taken by the Court of Session in the case of Hough v. Athga (ubi sup.). In that case the Lord Ordinary considered that the Commercial Steamship Company case decided that the running days were to be counted by days and not by periods of twenty-four hours; and the same view was afterwards expressed by the Court of Session, the Lord President saying that he saw no distinction between lay days and days of demurrage in the matter of counting. A later case in the Court of Session, Allan v. Johnstone (ubi sup.), appears to me to have been in harmony with the above decision. I think that the judgments in that case, except perhaps some qualified expressions which fell from Lord Maclaren, proceed on the principle that, unless the words in the charter-party prescribing a certain number of running days are overridden, what must be taken to be intended are calendar days. In that particular case the learned judges thought that these words in the charter-party were controlled by an indorsement on a bill of lading, and by a special arrangement stated in a letter of the shipowner's agents. The words of Lord Kinnear are very explicit: "I take it that according to the general rule laying days mean whole days, but if the parties to a contract are so minded, it is quite within their power to stipulate that a day shall be divisible; and the question is whether they have so stipulated in the present case." It appears to me clear, therefore, that "running days" in this case mean calendar days, and, therefore, the case turns on the question whether Saturday the 31st is to be reckoned as a lay day. The discharge commenced in fact at 1 p.m., and at Barrow work usually commences on Saturday at 6.30 a.m. and ceases at 4 p.m. I do not think, as was contended before me, that the decision in the Commercial Steamship Company's case, as reported in the Law Reports, shows that for this purpose part of a day can be considered a whole day; indeed, I think the reverse inference is to be drawn from it. It was there held that, when a ship is on demurrage, a day broken into by the conclusion of her loading must be paid for as a demurrage day. The reason for this is, that the shipowner is entitled to the use of his ship for the whole of that day, and, as days cannot be split up, if he is deprived of the use of his ship for part of the day the whole must be paid for. But a charterer is entitled to the whole of each of the specified number of lay days for his loading and unloading if he needs it. Why is he to take a part, perhaps a small part, of a day for the whole? It appears to me that the same reasoning which gives the shipowner as against the charterer the whole of a demurrage day, should give the charterer as against the shipowner the whole of a lay day. I am strengthened in the belief that the above may well have been the view of the learned judges who decided the case of the Commercial Steamship Company v. Boulton, as reported in the Law Reports, by observing that the same tribunal had at the same time before them the case of the ship Boston, the decision in which is reported in 3 Asp. Maritime Law Cases, 111, though not in the Law Reports. Except that the case of The Boston is one of loading, and the present one of unloading, the question in that case was the same as in this. The Boston was cleared at Muhlgraben about noon on Monday, April 20, but was not ready to load till about 4 p.m. The cargo, which was timber, was floated down from Riga in rafts, and some of it came alongside on Monday, April 20, and was taken on board, part on that day after 4 p.m., and the rest the next morning. The question whether Monday, April 20, was a working day was left to the jury at the trial, who found that it was. When the matter came before the court the presiding judge said: "As to the Boston a more difficult question arises whether a working day can be counted when only part of a day has been used. I agree that the charterers are entitled to a fair working day, but if for the convenience of all parties a portion of the day is used it may be counted." This is, I think, tantamount to saying that as a rule part of a lay day cannot be reckoned as a lay day, but that it may be a question of fact in each case whether the parties have not expressly, or, by their conduct, impliedly, agreed that it shall be so treated. There remains, therefore, in the case the question of fact whether, as stated by Mellor, J., in the case of The Boston, the day in question was, by assent of the parties, treated as a lay, in that case a loading, day. I have said that I can see no distinction in law between days occupied in loading and unloading on the question whether a part is to be reckoned as the whole. But on the question of fact whether the parties agreed to treat the day as a lay day, there may be a great deal of difference between loading and unloading. In the particular case of The Boston the cargo was timber sent down the river, and Lush, J. observed that he could not suppose that the freighters intended it to remain in the river. In this case I do not see why the charterers should have desired the unloading to commence on Saturday, and in fact they did not, for they apparently declined to take part in the discharge from 10.30 to 1. I think that the three hours of Saturday occupied in discharging were so occupied by the wish and for the advantage of the shipowners, who probably thought that it would become practicable to get the ship discharged and free a considerable time before the expiration of the lay days. Indeed it so turned out, and, as the charter-party does not provide for payment of despatch money, the shipowner would have been clearly the gainer had the charterers not declined to concede this benefit for nothing. I come, therefore, to the conclusion on the facts that both parties did not assent to treating the Saturday as a lay day. The result is, that the lay days did not expire till Monday, April 9, and there must be judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors: Botterell and Roche; Field, Roscoe, and Co., for Batesons, Warr, and Wimshurst, Liverpool.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

March 19, 20, and June 22, 1894.

(Before the Lord Chancellor (Herschell), Lords Watson, Ashbourne, Macnaghten, and Morris.)

Arrow Shipping Company Limited v. Tyne Improvement Commissioners.

The Crystal. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Wreck — Obstruction to harbour — Owner — Harbours Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), s. 56— Removal of Wrecks Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16), s. 4—Liability for expenses of removal.

By sect. 56 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 "the harbour master may remove any wreck or other obstruction to the harbour . . . and the expense of removing any such wreck . . . shall be repaid by the owner of the same."

A ship of the appellants became a total loss, and was at once abandoned by the owners. There was no evidence that the loss was caused by their default. The wreck lay in such a position as to be an obstruction to the harbour of the respondents, and was removed by them. They then brought an action against the appellants to recover the expenses of such removal.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the appellants were not liable, for the reason that sect. 56 of the Act of 1847 applies to ownership at the time that the expense of removing the obstruction is incurred, not to ownership at the time that the obstruction is created.

Earl of Eglinton v. Norman (36 L. T. Rep. 888; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 471; 46 L. J. 557, Ex.) and The Edith (11 L. Rep. Ir. 270) disapproved.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lindley, Smith, and Davey, L.JJ.), who had affirmed a judgment of Barnes, J. in favour of the respondents, the plaintiffs below.

The action was brought to recover the sum of 796*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.*, the balance of the cost of removing the wreck of the steamship Crystal, which was formerly the property of the appellants, and was sunk by collision in such a position as to occasion a dangerous obstruction to the approaches to the river and harbour of the Tyne, of which the respondents were owners.

The respondents removed the wreck under the powers conferred by the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27) and the Removal of Wrecks Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16) and sought to recover the expenses of such removal from the owners under sect. 56 of the former Act, which was incorporated in their private Act.

The appellants, who had abandoned the wreck to the underwriters, disputed their liability.

The facts are more fully stated in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

The courts below held that the case was governed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Earl of Eglington v. Norman (36 L. T. Rep. 888; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 471; 46 L. J. 557, Ex.) and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Finlay, Q.C. and Scrutton, for the appellants, argued that sect. 56 of the Act of 1847 imposes no personal liability on the owner, and was not intended to alter the substantive law. The language of sect. 57 is in marked contrast to that of sect. 56, and gives an express power to recover from the owner, which the former section does not. It was not intended to impose such a serious liability upon an innocent owner who had abandoned the ship. If he continued his ownership after the wreck, the liability might continue, but not where he abandoned it. There are no facts in dispute in the case. The wreck was abandoned to the underwriters on the day after the loss, as soon as the news arrived. The principle which governs the case was laid down in this House by Lord Cairns, L.C. in River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (37 L. T. Rep. 543; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 521; 2 App. Cas. 743). In the courts below the case was held to be governed by The Earl of Eglinton v. Norman (36 L. T. 888; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 471; 46 L. J. 557, Ex.) which we contend is distinguishable, or, if not, was wrongly decided. In that case the owner had not abandoned. The Irish case The Edith (11 L. Rep. Ir. 270), raised the question whether the liability was personal or only against the ship, and we contend should be followed in the present case. The statute only imposes a liability where there was a common law liability before, and does not extend that liability. The judgment of Bramwell, L.J. in Eglinton v. Norman is in favour of our view where there has been an abandonment. The cases are summed up in The Utopia (70 L. T. Rep. 47; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 408; (1893) A. C. 492). The cases of White v. Crisp (10 Ex. 312), Brown v. Mallett (5 C. B. 599), and The Douglas (47 L. T. Rep. 502; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 15; 7 P. Div. 151), there cited, show that the only case in which an owner who has abandoned can be made liable is where he has abandoned under such circumstances as amount to negligence. The section only confers a lien, and the wording is not such as to lead to the conclusion contended for by the respondents. Their construction of the Act involves a change by the Act of 1847 of the existing common law liability of an owner who has abandoned, which was never intended. The contention of the respondents might involve very great hardship upon a perfectly innocent owner whose ship had been wrecked. Similar cases have arisen on questions of poor rates, which are collected in Maxwell on Statutes, 2nd edit. p. 496, showing that payment can only be enforced in the manner prescribed by the statute, not by action. Sects. 44 and 45 and 74 and 75 of the Act of 1847, when compared with sect. 56, show that there is no such remedy under that section as the respondents assert. The principle is illustrated by the cases of

(a) Reported by C. E. Malden, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Underhill v. Ellicombe, McClell. & Younge, 450;
Stevens v. Evans, 2 Burr. 1157;
Shepherd v. Hills, 11 Ex. 55.

Further, if the appellants are liable, the respondents, who claim an absolute discretion in disposing of the salvage, have not given credit for a sufficient amount in respect of it.

Sir W. Phillimore and Butler Aspinall, for the respondents, contended that the judgment of the court below was right. This is the third attack that has been made on the construction of sect. 56 of the Act of 1847, for which we contend. In Eglinton v. Norman (ubi sup.) it was argued that it did not extend the common law liability, but was a question of procedure only; but as to this, see the judgments of Lord Blackburn and Lord Gordon in River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (ubi sup.). In The Edith (ubi sup.) it was argued that the section was only intended to create an easily enforceable lien, which did not exist before. The appellants' construction virtually strikes the words "the expense of removing such wreck shall be repaid by the owner of the same" out of the section. The argument from hardship is based on a fallacy. Before the Act, if the "owner" could not be found nothing could be done, and, if the owner at the time of the removal and sale is intended, the respondents are no better off, as the difficulty of finding him would be insuperable; but the owner at the time of the loss can always be found. Work had actually begun on this ship before the abandonment to the underwriters, and there are cases which say that possession by salvors is possession by the owner. [The LORD CHANCELLOR referred to Randal v. Cockran 1 Ves. sen. 97.] At the most it can only be said that we are suing the wrong person; but an underwriter is not bound to take over a damnosa hereditas, and, having already paid as for a total loss, cannot be made liable for anything further. This case is provided for in policies of insurance. See

The North Britain, 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 70 L. T. Rep. 210; (1894) P. 77.

The Thames Conservancy have special provisions which came before the courts in Prehn v. Bailey; The Ettrick (45 L. T. Rep. 399; 4 Asp. Mar. Law 465; 6 P. Div. 127). though they were not necessary for the actual decision in that case.

Scrutton was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

June 22.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell). — My Lords: The question raised by this appeal is one of considerable importance. The facts are few and not in dispute. The vessel Crystal, of which the appellants were registered owners, was on the 7th Jan. 1892, sunk in the German Ocean below low-water mark, 400 yards east of the end of the South Pier at the mouth of the river Tyne. The disaster was the result of a collision, but there is no evidence how this was caused, or that any blame was to be attributed to the owners of the Crystal or their servants. On the morning of the 8th Jan. Mr. Dent, the managing owner of the Crystal, gave notice to Mr. Scorfield, the representative of an association in which the vessel was largely insured, that he would have to take possession of her as the ship was past redemption; to which Mr. Scorfield seems to have made no objection. The vessel, in the position in which she lay, was both an obstruction to the approaches to the port and harbour of Newcastle-upon-Tyne and a danger to the navigation thereof. The Tyne Commissioners accordingly gave notice to the appellants that they would remove the obstruction, destroying it if necessary, and in the meantime would buoy and light it. The Commissioners acted upon this notice and destroyed and dispersed the obstruction by means of explosives. The present action was then brought to recover the expenses thus incurred beyond what was recouped by the sale of the materials. The respondent's claim, in so far as it relates to the expense of removing the wreck, is based on sect. 56 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, which is in these terms: "The harbour master may remove any wreck or other obstruction to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the approaches to the same, and also any floating timber which impedes the navigation thereof, and the expense of removing any such wreck, obstruction, or floating timber shall be repaid by the owner of the same, and the harbour master may detain any such wreck or floating timber for securing the expenses, and on nonpayment of such expenses, on demand may sell such wreck or floating timber, and out of the proceeds of such sale pay such expenses, rendering the overplus, if any, to the owner on demand." The courts below have followed the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Earl of Eglinton v. Norman (36 L. T. Rep. 888; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 471; 46 L. J. 557, Ex.), where it was held that the section I have just quoted casts upon the persons who were the owners of the vessel at the time she became a wreck and impeded the navigation a personal liability to pay the costs of removing the obstruction. I quite agree with them that there is no substantial distinction between that case and the present. It is contended, however, on behalf of the appellants, that a judgment of this House in the case of the River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (37 L. T. Rep. 543; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 521; L. Rep. 2 App. Cas. 743) delivered after the date of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Earl of Eglinton v. Norman, has thrown doubt on that decision, and indicated that the section ought not to be so construed as to cast upon the owners of a vessel under such circumstances a liability unknown to the common law. The case of the River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson turned upon another section of the same Act, namely, sect. 74, which makes the owner of every vessel or float of timber answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier. In that case damage was done by the respondent's vessel to the appellants' pier without any fault upon the part of the respondent. The Court of Appeal had held that the respondent was not liable, mainly on the ground that the damage was caused by the act of God. Although the judgment was affirmed in this House, the noble and learned lords who heard the case did not rest their opinions on this ground. Lord Cairns, L. C. came to the conclusion that the section was not intended to create a right to recover damages in cases where before the Act there was not a right to recover damages from some one; that it was intended only to provide a ready and simple procedure for recovering damages where a right to damages existed at common law. He thought that the section relieved the undertakers from the investigation whether the fault had been the fault of the owner or of the charterers or of the persons in charge, and taking the owner as the person who is always discoverable by means of the register, declared that he should be the person answerable, leaving him to recover over against the person liable. Lord Hatherley, after expressing the very great doubt and difficulty which he had felt as to the proper interpretation of the clause, said that, as it was the opinion of the majority of their Lordships that the case was not one that could be regarded as struck at by this clause, whether the ground to be assigned for it was the view expressed by Lord Cairns, or whether any view might be adopted similar to that taken in the court below, he should not pause to inquire, but that he was unwilling to do anything further than to say that he could not concur in the opinion expressed by the Lord Chancellor otherwise than with extreme doubt and hesitation. Lord O'Hagan thought that the section pointed to something done by the act of man, or to the act of the person in charge. Lord Blackburn stated that he had very great doubt and hesitation in the case, that he could not see anything in the language of the Act to justify the view adopted by Lord O'Hagan that it was confined to cases in which some one was in charge of the ship; but that, after much hesitation and doubt, he was not prepared to say that the judgment should be reversed, and that the words "damage done by such ship" necessarily included all expenses occasioned by misfortunes in which the ship was involved in common with the piers. After referring to the fact that Mellish, L.J. in the court below seemed to have thought that the words might bear the more restricted sense of injuria cum damno he concluded thus: "The declared object of the enactment is the protection of the piers, &c., 'from injury,' which renders this construction a little less violent than if the object had been expressed to be to protect the harbour authorities from 'loss.' If they can bear that sense, we ought to construe them so; and though I have had and have great doubt whether this is not too violent a construction, I am not prepared to reverse the judgment based on it, and consequently I agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs." Lord Gordon dissented from the judgment pronounced, and thought that the appellants were entitled to succeed. I think a review of the opinions thus pronounced is sufficient to show that no principle can be extracted from the judgments in that case which can be applied to the construction of other sections of the Act. Although I am of opinion that in the present case, there being no evidence that the disaster was due to the negligence either of the appellants or their servants, they would be under no liability at common law for damage caused by the obstruction as for the expenses incurred in removing it, yet I am unable to find any valid ground on which the operation of sect. 56, which casts upon the owner the liability to pay for the expenses of removing the obstruction, can be limited to cases in which such liability would exist at common law. I am fully alive to the force of the argument, and feel much impressed by it, that the obstruction is removed for the benefit of the public at large, and that where the owner of the vessel which has met with a disaster has not been to blame, it is hard that the loss of his vessel should entail on him the further burden of bearing expenses incurred not for his benefit but for that of the public. But a sense of the possible injustice of legislation ought not to induce your Lordships to do violence to well settled rules of construction, though it may properly lead to the selection of one rather than the other of two possible interpretations of the enactment. In the present case, however, I am unable to see that there are two alternative constructions. The harbour master may remove "any wreck," and the expense of removing "any such wreck" is to be "repaid by the owner of the same." Where is there any ground for restricting this to cases where the owner of the wreck is himself, if not bound to remove it, at least subject to liability for damage caused by its presence, if he does not take that course? I can find none.

The appellants further contended that if a new statutory liability was imposed by the section, same enactment provided the remedy, and that those who desired to enforce the liability were limited to the remedy thus provided. It was urged that the section conferred the remedy of detaining and selling the wreck and satisfying the expenses out of the proceeds; that it did not provide any other mode of recovering the expenses, and that the harbour authority was therefore restricted to this remedy. This argument found favour with the Irish Court of Appeal in the case of The Edith (11 L. Rep. Ir. 270), and they gave effect to it by their judgment in that case, when the construction of a similar provision came before them for determination. I confess I have approached the consideration of the terms of the statute with no indisposition to arrive at the same conclusion, but I am unable to do so. In the first place, the terms are express that the expense of removing the wreck "shall be repaid by the owner of the same." The construction contended for appears to me to give no effect to these precise words. If all that was intended was that the expenses were to be paid out of the proceeds of the wreck, why were these words inserted, followed as they are by the words, "and the harbour master may detain and sell;" moreover, this power is expressed to be for "securing expenses," and the power to sell is on "nonpayment on demand." The truth is, that the contention of the appellants makes the latter words of the section alone operative, and gives no more effect to the words "shall be repaid by the owner" than if they had been omitted from the enactment. But this is not all; the latter part of the enactment, which it is said provides the only remedy, is not co-extensive with the earlier provisions. Authority is given to remove any wreck "or other obstruction," and also any floating timber which impedes the navigation. The expense of removing any such wreck, obstruction, or floating timber is to be repaid by the owner of the same; but power is only given to detain and sell such "wreck or floating timber." The word "obstruction" is omitted. Why the power was not extended to other obstructions than wrecks and floating timber is matter of speculation. It may have been a mere slip, but it would scarcely be legitimate to construe the enactment on the assumption that it was so. There can be no doubt that it is just as explicitly enacted in the case of any other obstruction as in the case of a wreck, that the expense shall be repaid by the owner, and yet if the construction contended for by the appellants were to prevail the conclusion must either be that no means were provided for enforcing the liability in terms imposed, or that because no remedy was provided a personal debt was created in the case of an obstruction other than a wreck, but not in the case of a wreck; although the language as to repayment is identical in the two cases. I do not say that this is conclusive, but it adds to the difficulty of acceding to the interpretation insisted upon by the appellants. For the reasons I have given I do not see any my to differ from the courts below in holding that the terms of sect. 56 do create a debt in respect of which an action may be maintained against the owner.

But then arises the question, who is the owner within the meaning of the statute? The Court of Appeal, in the case of The Earl of Eglinton v. Norman, held that it was the person who was the owner at the time the obstruction occurred, and the right of the harbour master, therefore, to remove it accrued. They considered that, although the right of the harbour master to remove it was only inchoate, the rights of all parties were then irrevocably fixed, and that it mattered not what change afterwards took place in the ownership of a wreck. The words of the section do not expressly point out who is the owner referred to, and if the section had been held to apply only to cases where the obstruction came about by the default of the owner there would be much to be said for the view thus adopted. But, inasmuch as the section ex hypothesi applies even where there is no such default, I do not see any à priori reason for holding that the rights of the parties are then fixed. It is obvious that some time might elapse before the removal of the wreck which became an obstruction was determined on by the harbour master, and that a change of ownership might occur in the interval. When I examine the language of the section it appears to me to point not to ownership at the time the obstruction is created but to ownership at the time the expense of removing it is incurred. The expenses are to be repaid by the owner. The harbour master may sell the wreck on nonpayment of such expenses on demand. And lastly, if the wreck is sold, and the proceeds exceeds the expenses, the overplus is to be returned to the owner on demand. This can scarcely mean the person who was the owner at the time the obstruction was caused, but must surely be intended to refer to the person whose wreck was disposed of and removed. In the present case it seems clear that before the time when the expenses were incurred by the respondents, the appellants had abandoned the vessel as derelict on the high seas, without any intention of resuming possession or ownership. They had also given notice of abandonment to the underwriters. It is unnecessary to determine whether the underwriters are to be treated as the owners within the meaning of the statute; it is enough to say that I do not think the appellants can on its true construction be regarded as having, at the time the expenses were incurred, been owners and liable to repay them. I have, like some of the noble and learned lords who took part in the decision of the case of The River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson, felt the greatest doubt and difficulty as to the proper mode of dealing with this case. The history of the statute (of which the section in question forms part) is pointed out by Lord Blackburn in that case. Many of the clauses probably had their origin in the desire of the authorities who promoted Harbour Acts to secure adequate protections for their undertakings, and may have been adopted by the Legislature without sufficiently careful consideration of the interests of other persons, and the liability which might with justice be imposed upon them. I cannot profess that the conclusion at which I have arrived is completely satisfactory to my own mind; but I think it is better to adhere in such a case as closely as one can to settled rules of construction, leaving any necessary changes in the law to be effected by the Legislature rather than to attempt by a strained and violent construction to arrive at what, after all, may be very halting justice.

A subordinate point was raised in this case. The respondents incurred certain expenses in lighting and watching the wreck under the Removal of Wrecks Act 1877. They applied the proceeds derived from the sale of the wreck towards the expenses incurred by them, both under the Act of 1847, and the later statute. They then sued for the balance of the expenses. It was contended that they were bound to apply the moneys received pro rata to the expenses incurred under the two statutes. This contention was repelled by the courts below, and I see no reason to differ from the views expressed on this point. For the reasons I have given, I think the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed, and judgment entered for the defendants, with costs. The respondents must pay the costs here and in the courts below.

Lord Watson.—My Lords: This appeal depends upon the construction of a single section in the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847. The respondents, in exercise of the powers conferred upon them by the Act of 1847 and by the Removal of Wrecks Act 1877, between the 15th Jan. and the 4th June 1892 spent 1128*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* in removing or dispersing the wreck of the steamship Crystal, which had been sunk by a collision on the 7th Jan. within the approaches to the river and harbour of Tyne, and constituted a dangerous obstruction to vessels using the port. Their outlay was recouped to the extent of 331*l.* 16*s.* 11*d.* by sales of cargo taken from the wreck, the amount of their expenditure being thus reduced to 796*l.* 6*s* 5*d.* The appellants were owners of the Crystal at the time when she was wrecked. On the 8th Jan. they gave notice of her abandonment as a total constructive loss to their underwriters, who subsequently paid them the full amount of their insurances upon that footing. On the 8th Jan. they received a notice that they would be held liable for the expenses which the respondents were about to incur, in reply to which they intimated that they had already abandoned the vessel as a wreck in the open sea. The respondents now claim payment of the balance of 796*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.* from the appellants as being the owners of the wreck of the Crystal, and they have obtained judgment in their favour both in the Admiralty Division and in the Court of Appeal. The claim thus made and sustained has admittedly no warrant in the Act of 1877. It is based exclusively upon sect. 56 of the Act of 1847, which provides that "the harbour master may remove any wreck or other obstruction to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the approaches to the same, and also any floating timber which impedes the navigation thereof; and the expense of removing any such wreck, obstruction, or floating timber shall be repaid by the owner of the same, and the harbour master may detain such wreck or floating timber for securing the expenses, and on nonpayment of such expenses on demand, may sell such wreck or floating timber, and out of the proceeds of such sale pay such expenses, rendering the overplus, if any, to the owner on demand." The argument of the appellants was directed to these two points only. They maintained, in the first place, that the clause does not attach to the owner any personal liability for expenses, and in the second place that, if it does, they neither are, nor were at any time, the owners of the wreck of the Crystal within the meaning of the clause. It does not admit of doubt that, if the appellants can establish either of these propositions, the judgments appealed from must be reversed. I do not find it necessary to enter upon the consideration of the first of these points, because I am satisfied that the argument of the appellants upon the second of them ought to prevail. Had it been necessary to decide the first point, I could not, as at present advised, have differed from the opinion expressed by the Lord Chancellor. I cannot agree with the able judgment of the Irish court in the case of The Edith (11 L. Rep. Ir. 270), and I am unable to appreciate the bearing of River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (2 App. Cas. 743) upon the facts of the present case. I agree with the Lord Chancellor in thinking that their abandonment of the sunken ship in the open sea sine animo recuperandi had divested the appellants of all proprietary interest in the wreck before the respondents commenced operations with a view to its removal. That state of the facts necessarily gives rise to the question, whether the expression "the owner" of the wreck, as it occurs in sect. 56, is meant to designate the owner of the ship at the time when she goes to the bottom of the sea or the owner of the wreck at and during the time of its removal. Barnes, J. and the learned judges of the Appeal Court accepted as binding upon this point the decision of the Court of Appeal in Earl of Eglinton v. Norman (ubi sup.). In that case it was laid down by the present Master of the Rolls, with the concurrence of Lord Coleridge, and a very hesitating assent by Lord Bramwell, that when a ship sinks in such a position as to cause obstruction to a harbour or its approaches, a right to remove it at the expense of the then owner at once accrues to the harbour authorities, and cannot be affected by any subsequent change or loss of ownership. I do not think it is reasonably possible to arrive at that conclusion except by holding that the Legislature, in using the words "owner of the wreck," meant thereby to designate the owner of the ship at the time when she became a wreck. If that had been the intention of the Legislature, nothing could have been easier than to give it expression. But the intention of the Legislature can only be gathered from the language actually employed, and I am of opinion that the construction adopted by the learned judges of the Appeal Court, in Earl of Eglinton v. Norman, is inadmissible. The only thing which the harbour master under the clause in question has authority to deal with is the wreck, and not the ship; and the only charges which, in any view, he can have a right to recover are those which may be duly incurred by him for the purpose and in the course of its removal. It is clear, to my mind, that primâ facie the owner of the wreck must be the person to whom the wreck belongs during the time when the harbour master chooses to exercise his statutory powers. That appears to me to be the primary and natural meaning of the words. It may, of course, be displaced by force of the context. But I can find nothing in the context to suggest that the words were intended to have any other than their natural meaning. On the contrary, the direction in the end of the clause to the effect that the harbour master, after selling the materials of the wreck in order to pay the expenses which he has incurred, shall account to the owner for any overplus, clearly indicates that the owner is the person to whom these materials belonged. Being of opinion that the respondents have failed to show that the appellants were owners of the wreck of the Crystal within the meaning of the clause, I concur in the judgment which has been proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—My Lords: The decision of this appeal depends on the construction to be given to the 56th section of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Act 1847, the terms of which have been stated by my noble and learned friends who have preceded me. The contention of the appellants substantially raises two questions upon this section. They insist (1) that no personal liability is cast upon "the owner" for the expenses claimed; and (2) that, no matter how that may be, they are not the "owners" who are chargeable. The statute above mentioned does not apply to all harbours, docks, and piers; for the first section enacts that it shall "extend only to such harbours, docks, and piers as shall be authorised by any Act of Parliament hereafter to be passed, which shall declare that this Act be incorporated therewith." The statute was so incorporated by the Tyne Improvement Acts, and thus the questions are raised. Had the wreck occurred in or near any harbour where such incorporation had not taken place, it is not suggested that the appellants could have been made liable. It is admitted that they could not be responsible at common law, and therefore the whole case turns upon the construction of this clause which creates this new responsibility. There should be clear words to create any such liability, and in construing the section the rule must be borne in mind that where the liability is a liability not existing at common law, but for the first time imposed by the statute, then if the remedy is also prescribed by the statute the party must pursue that remedy. Before taking the words of the section it is well to consider the nature and character of this personal liability sought under this section for the first time to be imputed to an "owner." It is asserted that, although he be not negligent, although his master and crew may have shown the most splendid seamanship and the most heroic courage, he is personally liable for the expense of the removal of the wreck of his ship, if it causes an obstruction to the harbour or navigation. The wreck may be caused by the act of God, by the default of the pilot he is compelled by law to employ, by the absence of the very buoys and lighthouses which the harbour authority is itself bound to provide, but no qualification of the owner's liability is suggested. Smugglers or mutineers may have wrecked the ship and made it an obstruction, but the possibility of an exception is not admitted. It is asserted that this personal liability is unlimited in amount, and that no matter how small the value of the vessel, or how worthless the cargo, the "owner" must answer to his last farthing for these expenses. The cost of removal might be twenty times the value of the ship, and the payment of that cost might drive the "owner" into bankruptcy; but that is not a consideration to be noted. It may be even asserted that the liability is not guarded by any limit of time or space, that the wreck might sink, causing no obstruction outside a harbour, yet years after it might by the action of storms, or wind, or tide be shifted to a position where it became an obstruction, when this liability would attach. In fact it is contended that under all circumstances, no matter what the conduct, or what the amount involved, "the owner" is personally liable, and that he is so made for the first time under this section. It is not too much to expect that a section imposing such a tremendous liability should be in clear terms. The section is not clear; its interpretation is difficult, its language is infelicitous, but it can be made to work smoothly and without difficulty if the contention of the respondents is rejected and that of the appellants adopted. In my opinion no personal liability is created by the section. The first object of the section was to give power to the harbour master to remove the wreck or obstruction. Then if the owner repays the expenses he may take away his property. If he does not repay the expenses the harbour master is given his remedy, the power of detaining the wreck with the further power of selling on non-payment of the expenses after demand. Then it is finally provided that, after payment of the expenses out of the proceeds, the surplus, if any, is to be rendered to the owner "on demand." The words "the expense . . . shall be repaid by the owner" cannot be taken alone. The whole section must be read together. The ship and its proceeds on sale were, as far as they went, to provide the fund for the expense; and accordingly whilst the section provides for handing over the surplus to the owner, there are no words saying that he is to make good the deficiency. It is not suggested that there is anything in the subsequent Removal of Wrecks Act 1877 to support the respondents' construction of this sect. 56. Yet if that construction is correct, we should expect to find the same liability in sect. 4 of the later Act. These Acts deal with the same subject-matter, and it may well be that the Act of 1877 may supply some interpretation of this earlier provision. It is at all events worthy of note that the common law antecedent to the Act of 1847, and the statute law subsequent to that date, impose no personal liability of any kind for this expense. The learned judges in the courts below followed the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Earl of Eglinton v. Norman. Only one of the judges of the Court of Appeal in this case said that he would have decided the same way, and Davey, L.J. said that, whenever the case was reconsidered, Mr. Finlay's argument was worthy of the greatest consideration. On this point, therefore, one cannot decide in favour of the appellants without impeaching the authority of The Earl of Eglinton v. Norman. I should infer from the report of that case that several of the arguments by which your Lordships have been aided had not been brought prominently before the court, and this is noted expressly in his judgment by Smith, L.J. That case, however, decides on this section that a personal liability was attached to the "owner," and for the reasons I have already stated, I have arrived at an opposite conclusion, and with great deference to the learned judges who took part in that decision, and to the Lord Chancellor, I do not think it can be supported. The case of The Edith (11 L. Rep. Ir. 272), decided on similar words in another statute, is entirely opposed to the construction which would impose any personal responsibility on the owner, and Palles, C.B. there strongly relied upon the argument that, when a new right is created by a section, and there is a remedy given in that section, that is the only remedy which is given at all. The case of the River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (37 L. T. Rep. 543; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 521; 2 App. Cas. 743) has also been relied upon by the appellants as shaking the authority of the case of The Earl of Eglinton v. Norman. It cannot be relied upon as a direct authority, being upon a different section of the statute; but I think it has a bearing upon the case, and can be usefully considered in connection with some of the arguments addressed to your Lordships. That case turns upon sect. 74 of the Act of 1874, which says that "the owner of every vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber to the harbour, dock or pier, or the quays or works connected therewith." These words would appear to be clear and unqualified, and are certainly far more clear and unqualified than those of sect. 56. But when an owner who had been in no default was sought to be made liable under its terms a large majority of this house declined to recognise his liability. I concur with the Lord Chancellor that no very clear principle can be extracted from the judgments, but I, at all events, gather this, that, although one noble and learned lord was unable to see any way of escape from the apparently clear words of the section, the other noble and learned lords decided that the clause must be held to refer to something in which man was concerned, and not the casualties brought about by the act of God. The judgment of Lord Blackburn shows in every word the doubt and difficulty he felt in arriving at this conclusion. He points out that "the shipowner, if liable at all under this statute, is liable to his last farthing for the whole damage, however great, and however small may be the value of the ship;" and, again, "before deciding that the construction of the statute is such as to work this hardship we ought to be sure that such is the construction, more particularly when the hardship affects not only one individual but a whole class;" and he adds, "after much hesitation and doubt I am not prepared to say that this judgment should be reversed." I am disposed to think that, if the noble and learned lords who decided the case of The River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson had also been called upon to decide the present case, they would have held that a shipowner was no more personally liable under sect. 56 than under sect. 74. It would have been difficult for them to hold an owner personally liable under the rather cumbrous words of sect. 56, when they had just exonerated him from such liability under the much clearer and more absolute words of sect. 74. In so holding, a consistent and workable construction is given to both sections, and none of the startling consequences, to which I have adverted at an earlier stage of my remarks, would have resulted.

On the second question, as to who is the owner under the statute, I might possibly have felt some difficulty if I had come to a different conclusion on the first point. If the owner was personally liable, an attempt might be made to argue against a construction under which he would be allowed to evade his liability, after the wreck and after the obstruction, by a mere assignment. The arguments and judgments in the case of The Earl of Eglinton v. Norman are largely conversant with this question of the owner, and I think there may have been possibly some difference of opinion as to the time when he was to be ascertained with a view to the suggested liability. Sir H. James, for the plaintiff, argued that the owner at the time of the casualty was the owner under the statute, and this view was accepted by Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Bramwell, L.J. and the Master of the Rolls held that the owner was the owner at the time the wreck became an obstruction; but it is not easy to know whether there was any real difference of opinion between them and the Chief Justice. I agree with my noble and learned friends who have preceded me that the owner referred to in the section is the owner at the time the harbour master incurred the expense; and, concurring as I do generally in the arguments they have expressed in support of this conclusion, I see no good purpose in repeating or attempting to add to them. In my opinion also the judgment should be reversed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: Apart from the provisions of sect. 56 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, it seems to be clear that, according to English law the owner of a shipwrecked and sunken vessel which has become an obstruction to navigation through no fault on the owner's part, and of which he has lost or relinquished the possession, management, and control, is not under any obligation to remove it, or under any liability to pay or contribute to the payment of the expenses of its removal. The subject was much discussed in an elaborate judgment by Maule, J. in the Common Pleas (Brown v. Mallett, 5 C. B. 599). The principles laid down in that judgment were approved in the Exchequer in White v. Crisp (10 Ex. 312), and those two authorities have been followed in a recent case in the Privy Council (The Utopia, 70 L. T. Rep. 47; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 408; (1893) A. C. 492). Maule, J. says: "Where the navigation . . . has become obstructed by a vessel which has sunk and been lost to the owner without any fault of his, the public inconvenience of the obstruction is one in respect of which the owner differs from the rest of the public only in having sustained a private calamity in addition to his share of a public inconvenience, and this difference does not appear to be any reason for throwing on him the cost of remedying or mitigating the evil. In the case of Rex v. Watts (2 Esp. N. P. C. 675) Lord Kenyon held that the owner of a ship sunk in the Thames by accident or misfortune, without his default or misconduct, was not liable to an indictment for not removing the obstruction. It was contended for the prosecution in that case, that although the defendant was not punishable for causing the nuisance, it having arisen from accident, it was his duty to remove it; but the learned judge answered that perhaps the expense of removal might have amounted to more than the whole value of the property. The same reason would apply in the case of an indictment for not giving notice by signal, or taking other means to prevent damage from a sunken vessel; the expense of doing so might, and probably would, be greater than any private benefit which the owner might derive from it; and whether it were greater or not, the reason seems to be the same for not throwing on the owner any special share in the consequence of a public misfortune with which he had no particular concern, except that it arose out of a private disaster which he had innocently suffered." Then he adds that, in the case of such impediments to navigation arising out of unavoidable accidents, "the proper rule seems to be that the expense of removing or diminishing the danger arising from them should be defrayed by those who would be benefited by such a measure." It seems to me that legislation contravening the principles and reversing the rule laid down by Maule, J. would be legislation that might be described, not inaptly, as barbarous. At the same time there would be nothing unreasonable in making the owner, whose private misfortune has caused a public nuisance pay or contribute to the expense of its removal, if and so far as he derives a benefit from the operation. With these general remarks I approach the consideration of sect. 56. The question seems to me to be this: Does that section throw upon the owner of a vessel which has become a wreck, and as such is an obstruction to navigation, the whole expense of its removal in every event and under all circumstances, or does it only throw the expense upon him if and so far as he is specially benefited by the removal? The result of the one construction, if it be admissible, would be fair and reasonable; the result of the other would be repugnant to justice, and in many cases, as Lord Ashbourne has pointed out, cruel and unreasonable in the extreme. The first observation that occurs to one is, that this section is found in a collection or group of clauses which are headed with the words: "And with respect to the appointment of harbour masters, dock masters, and pier masters, and their duties, be it enacted as follows:" "An Act so penned," says Lord Wensleydale, speaking of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, which is framed in a similar manner, "cannot be read as a continuous enactment would be: various clauses relating to each separate subject are collected under various heads with an appropriate heading to each class, which must apply to the whole of that class of which it is the heading;" and he adds that the effect is the same as if the heading had been repeated at the head of each section: (Eastern Counties, &c., Company v. Marriage, 9 H. L. Cas. 32, 69.) The section, therefore must be read in connection with the general heading. So read, it purports to be concerned primarily with the duties of harbour masters, dock masters, and pier masters. That is the scope of the section, and its proper province. The general heading supplies the key to the enactment. There is no indication that the enactment was intended to effect a serious alteration in the law to the prejudice and detriment of individuals. It rather seems to be indicated that nothing more was intended than to confer upon the harbour master, acting in the public interest, power to do on behalf of the owner that which might be done by the owner himself in his own interest, with less regard, perhaps, to the interest of the public. Then the section says that the expense of removing the wreck "shall be repaid by the owner of the same." The word "repaid" again rather looks as if the framers of the enactment had in their minds repayment by one on whose behalf the operation was conducted. But that is a very slight indication of intention, because it may perhaps point to the circumstance that in the majority of cases the work would be done, not by the harbour master himself and his servants, but by persons whose trade and business it is to do such work, whom he would have to pay in the first instance. The words "shall be repaid by the owner" are the great difficulty in the case. I am unable to construe the section as confining the right of the harbour master in respect of repayment to payment out of the proceeds of the wreck: (1) Because that construction in reality gives no effect whatever to the words, "shall be repaid by the owner;" and (2) because such a construction would give an unfair advantage to the owner. An owner with a keen eye to his own interest would never think of offering repayment unless the value of the wreck greatly exceeded the cost of removal. He would wait until the harbour master puts the wreck up for sale, and then he would probably have the opportunity of buying it for an old song; at the outside the only risk he would run would be the risk of having to bear the expenses of the sale. I do not question the rule that where a new right is created and a remedy given by one and the same enactment, that remedy is the only remedy to be pursued. But I do not see how that rule can be applied to sect. 56 so as to limit the reimbursement of the harbour master to the proceeds of the sale of the wreck, because it seems to me that according to the true construction of the section, the harbour master has two remedies — a personal remedy against the owner as well as a remedy against the proceeds of the sale. I am therefore of opinion that the section does impose upon the owner of a wreck removed by the harbour master under the powers thereby conferred, the duty of paying the expenses of removal.

But this does not settle the question between he parties to this litigation. In order to make anyone liable the wreck must be "removed" within the meaning of that word as used in the section; and after all the only person who can be made liable is the owner of the wreck. In the present case I do not think that there has been a removal for which anybody can be made liable; and I am further of opinion that the owners of the Crystal before she was wrecked are not the owners of the wreck within the meaning of sect. 56. It seems to me that the removal contemplated by sect. 56 is removal in the interest and on behalf of the owner as well as in the interest and for the benefit of the public. To entitle the harbour master to repayment under sect. 56, it is I think incumbent upon him to remove the obstruction in such a manner that at the conclusion of the operation it is substantially in the same plight and condition as it was at the commencement, or at any rate with some regard to the interest of the owner, whose interest I think the enactment meant to be regarded. What has the harbour master done here? He has "dispersed the wreck by explosives." That no doubt is a very complete and effectual sort of removal, but it is not, I think, the sort of removal which is contemplated by the section. It is to be observed that under this section the harbour master is not given power to destroy. Another statute was passed to give that power. Here there was not removal, but total destruction. Not one scrap or atom of the wreck was salved; not a single penny is brought into the account as the produce of the sale of any part of the wreck. It sounds to me like a grim joke to ask the owner, where there is an owner, to pay for the expense of annihilating his own property because he is chargeable by statute—and fairly chargeable, with the cost of its removal. Then comes the question: Are the persons who were the owners of the Crystal at the time of the accident which caused the wreck the owners of the wreck within the meaning of the section? I lay out of consideration what took place between the owners and the underwriters. I will deal only with what took place between the harbour authority and the owners. On the 8th Jan. 1892 the Tyne Improvement Commissioners gave notice to the owners of the Crystal that the vessel, which was then lying sunk at the harbour entrance, was an obstruction to navigation, and that if the obstruction was allowed to continue, they would on the expiration of seven days proceed to take possession of, remove, and, if necessary, destroy the whole of the vessel. On the 12th Jan., before the expiration of the seven days, the owners replied by letter that, the steamer being a wreck in the open sea, they had abandoned her as such, and the commissioners must look to the savings or the wreck for any outlay they might have. It appears to me, that by that letter the owners declared that they had abandoned all rights of property and given up all interest in the vessel. Thereupon I think they ceased to be owners within the meaning of sect. 56. They had lost possession of the vessel already; all that remained to them was the property in the vessel, that is to say, the right to retake or resume possession of her. This right they abandoned as plainly and unequivocally as it was possible for them to do, and they abandoned it before the commissioners began their operations or even took possession. They disowned the wreck. For the purposes of sect. 56 it is not, I think, necessary to inquire whether goods designedly abandoned by their owner under such circumstances that no wrong is done to anybody by the abandonment become thereupon bona vacantia and "derelict" in the proper sense of the word, or whether, as the author of Doctor and Student asserts, the property still remains in the owner notwithstanding the abandonment. The Commissioners appear to be in a dilemma. They have destroyed the wreck. Sect. 56 does not authorise destruction. If they take their stand on the Removal of Wrecks Act 1877, they cannot under it charge the owner with their expenses. If they do not rely on the powers of that Act their action must be attributed to the license or authority which the notice of abandonment conferred, and then their action would have the effect of divesting the owner of the Crystal of the property (if any) which still remained in them after their notice of abandonment. If the view which I venture to present be correct, sect. 56 is a reasonable enactment. Where the owner of the vessel which is wrecked gives the harbour authority to understand that he retains his right of property in the wreck, and they remove it so as to be in a position to return it to him substantially in the same condition in which it was when they commenced operations, they can charge him, I think, with the cost of removal, though the cost may exceed the value of the thing removed. Where he tells them plainly that he has abandoned the wreck, they may deal with it as they please, without regard to him; but they cannot make him liable for their expenditure. The defects, such as they were, in sect. 56 are remedied by the Removal of Wrecks Act 1877. Under that Act the harbour authorities may destroy the wreck if they think fit, although there be an owner claiming an interest in it, and they may do the work of destruction without regard to the owner's interest. I am unable to agree with the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Earl of Eglinton v. Norman, and I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal which is founded upon it should be reversed, and the action dismissed with costs.

Lord MORRIS,—My Lords: I concur in the judgment proposed. The facts of this case have been so fully stated by your Lordships who have preceded me, that it is quite unnecessary that I should repeat them. The defendants are under no common law liability of any kind. Their liability is the subject of express enactment: 10 & 11 Vic. c. 27, s. 56. enacts: [reads it:] Does that enactment make the defendants liable for the expenses of removing the wreck under the circumstances of this case? I am of opinion that it does not. It appears to me that it is only in the case of an owner—that is, of a person remaining in the position of owner, and in possession of the wreck—that any personal liability would attach to him; that if he abandon the wreck, or if the harbour authority take possession of the wreck and sell, the person who had been owner remains so no longer, except for the purpose of getting any surplus over the expenses out of the proceeds of the sale by the harbour authority, and incurs no personal liability. If the harbour authority did not arrest and detain the offending obstruction (in this case the wreck), and supposing that the owner remains owner, it may be that he would be liable, as he chooses to keep the offending obstruction; and consequently should be held liable to pay the expense of the removal of what he keeps as his property; but when he has informed the harbour authority that he disclaimed any property in the wreck, the only remedy for the harbour authority is to sell the wreck. The ordinary relation of debtor and creditor, from which an obligation to pay on request would be implied, is not created. The owner is in no default by himself or his servants; he abandons the property in the wreck, whereupon it becomes the subject which is to pay for the expense of its removal. The final clause of the section, while providing for the return of overplus, if any, does not proceed to say that any deficiency is to be made up by the owner. Where an action is intended, or distress intended to be empowered, the action or distress is directly given, as in sects. 43, 44, and 45.

Judgment appealed from reversed, and judgment entered for the defendants with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, T. Cooper and Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Maples, Teesdale, and Co., for Lietch, Dodd, Bramwell, and Bell, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL

July 26 and 27, 1894.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., KAY and SMITH, L.JJ.)

THE MINNIE. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Thames estuary—South-west Reach—Swin—Proper course of navigation—Narrow channel—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 21.

A collision between an outgoing and an incoming steamship occurred in the Swin to the westward of a line between the Maplin Spit Light and the Middle Lightship.

Held, that the outgoing steamer was to blame for breach of art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and that she ought to have kept to that side of the fairway which lay on her starboard hand.

The space between the Middle Lightship and the Middle Sands is a narrow channel, within the meaning of art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action in rem from a decision of Bruce, J., finding the defendants' vessel, the Minnie, alone to blame.

The collision occurred about 11.30 p.m., on the 10th May 1894, in South-west Reach, above the Swin Middle Lightship, between the plaintiffs' steamship the Freda and defendants' steamship the Minnie. The Freda was proceeding up the channel, and the Minnie was going down. The plaintiffs' case was, that the Freda was on a course of S.W. by W. ¾ W. magnetic below the Middle Lightship, when those on board of her saw the masthead light of the Minnie between two and three miles distant, and bearing about two points on the port bow, and that shortly afterwards the green light of the Minnie came into view. The Freda was kept on her course until she approached the Middle Lightship, when her helm was starboarded and steadied, and she passed the Lightship to the southward in the usual course. Meanwhile the Minnie had drawn ahead, and then across the bows of the Freda, and was well clear on the starboard bow of the Freda showing her green and masthead lights, and in a position to pass starboard side to starboard side. The Freda's helm was then starboarded to put her on a course for the West Swin, but directly afterwards the Minnie opened her red light, and although the Freda reversed her engines and steadied her helm, the collision occurred.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case of the Minnie was, that she was proceeding on her course for the Middle Lightship, about N.E. by N., and the Freda having passed on to the port bow of the Minnie, and got nearly two points on the bow, at a time when the vessels were in a position to pass clear port to port, suddenly starboarded across the course of the Minnie, and so caused the collision.

Bruce, J. found that at the collision the two vessels were a little to the westward of the direct course from the Middle Lightship to the East Maplin Buoy, that the Minnie was to the northward and westward of her course, and was coming down showing her green light to the Freda, and that the Freda was justified in following the course of the channel under the starboard helm, and shaping her course so that the vessels might pass starboard to starboard. His Lordship pronounced the Minnie alone to blame for the collision.

From this judgment the defendants appealed.

Sir R. Webster, Q.C. and Aspinall, Q.C. (A. Pritchard with them) in support of the appeal.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Butler Aspinall, contrà.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The question here must be what is the proper navigation for two steamships, one coming in from the sea, and the other going out to sea, when they are passing each other between the Middle Lightship and the North-east Maplin? It is an admitted part of that navigation that they are both to pass to the eastward of the Middle Lightship, but the space between the Middle Lightship and the Middle Sands is a very narrow passage. It is a narrow passage, not within the river Thames so as to make any legislation with regard to the river apply, but it is on the sea approaching a port through a narrow channel; and in my opinion, in those circumstances, the 21st rule applies. The 21st rule is this: "In narrow channels every steamship shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or midchannel which lies on the starboard side of such ship." If they do so pass, that is, if they keep to that side of the fairway or midchannel of the narrow channel which lies on the starboard side of the ship, then, of course, they are to pass each other port side to port side. That follows necessarily. Therefore ships which are to pass through this channel between the Middle Lightship and the Middle Sands ought each of them to pass through on the starboard side of the fairway which, I suppose, is the centre of the narrow channel, and so pass red to red, or port side to port side. The space is all clear, and the ships can see each other, as one is coming in and the other is going out, in plenty of time for both of them to judge whether they are likely to meet so as to pass each other somewhere between the Middle Lightship and the North-east Maplin Buoy. They cannot see the sands, which narrow the channel, but there is no promontory of land which prevents them from seeing each other. The question is, how ought they to navigate? Taking first the outward vessel. Before she gets up to the Middle Lightship, she is in a narrow channel. The narrow channel does not begin at the Lightship, which is at the narrowest part. We are advised by our nautical assessors that the outward vessel should steer to pass the East Maplin Buoy—I think by that is meant the Old Maplin Buoy, which had a light at that time, that is, the Maplin Spit Buoy —giving it about half a cable's length; then she should steer for the Middle Lightship, keeping it slightly on the port bow. But that does not mean that she is to steer for the Middle Lightship till she gets to it, because then, instead of being on the starboard side of that channel between the Middle Lightship and the Middle Sands, she would be as far as she possibly could be on the port side. Therefore before she gets there she must turn. In the daytime it would be perfectly easy for her to turn, because she would see the Bell Buoy; but at night, even if she does not hear the Bell Buoy, if she sees the light of the Middle Lightship, she would know that before she approaches it she must port her helm so as to get on the starboard side of the channel. She must port her helm gradually to go round, so as to keep on the east side of that middle channel. Therefore she has to steer for the Middle Lightship until, in the daytime, it is perfectly easy for her to see the Bell Buoy—and then she ought to round it as close as she can; or, at night, when she has gone so near to the Middle Light that a mariner who knows the chart must be aware that he is then safe with regard to the Bell Buoy, he ought to port his helm so as to keep on the starboard side of that narrow channel. That was the duty of the Minnie.

The inward vessel should pass the lightship close, and then steer the channel course, keeping the Maplin Spit Light a little on the starboard bow, so as to be safe from that; and though for her own safety she may keep the Maplin Spit Light a little on her starboard bow, so as to enable her to pass the North-east Maplin Buoy, she will be doing nothing wrong with regard to the other ship if she goes more to the westward than that line. She puts herself into a difficulty, but not the other vessel, by doing that. Therefore she ought to go close to the Middle Light, which is for the purpose of giving all possible room for the other vessel to pass her port side to port side. When she has passed the Middle Light she ought not to go to the eastward, but may go somewhat to the westward of the line of which I have spoken. That being the proper navigation, was the Minnie to the westward of that line? That is a matter of evidence and of fact, and is not a question for the nautical assessors. It is for us. Upon that we have the evidence of the man on the lightship, and if his evidence be correct, it is impossible for us to say that the learned judge in the court below, with the assistance of the Trinity Masters, came to a wrong conclusion when he found that the collision took place to the westward of that line. Arguments have been used to show that the vessels after the collision might have drifted one way or the other, but nobody can say for certain how they would drift, and Bruce, J., and the Trinity Masters, having come to the conclusion that the collision took place to the westward of that line, I can see nothing which enables us to say, or justifies us in saying, that it was wrong. I have asked the nautical assessors whether, if the collision took place to the westward of the line of the Maplin Spit Buoy gas light, was the Minnie on the wrong side of the channel with regard to the Freda; and we are advised that if it took place to the westward of that line, the nautical result is that the Minnie was on the wrong side of the channel at the time the collision took place. If she was on the wrong side, it is impossible to say that that did not conduce to the collision. Therefore that puts the Minnie in the wrong. If she got on the wrong side of the line it must have been by inadvertently starboarding her helm, or keeping it to starboard longer than she ought to have done. If she did, and turned too short into the bight, it seems to me clear that she would probably show her green light to the Freda, and the learned judge has found on the evidence that she did. I think she did, and if she did, and showed that green light on the starboard bow of the Freda, I cannot even bring myself to ask the question of the assessors, because I cannot doubt that the Freda was not wrong in starboarding her helm, and deciding to pass as she did. She blew two whistles to give notice of what she was doing, and I think she could not be wrong in starboarding her helm then, so as to go green light to green light. She gave notice that that was what, under the circumstances, and in consequence of the place where the Minnie was, she was going to do. That the Minnie was found too far to the westward seems to me to be fortified by the way in which another vessel passed her. That vessel passed the Minnie green to green, and that strongly fortifies the proposition that she was too far to the westward and out of the proper part of the channel, and makes me feel that that part of the evidence too, is almost conclusive against her. I do not think we can overrule the judgment of the court below, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Kay and Smith, L.JJ. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Pritchard and Sons.

Solicitors for the respondents, Thomas Cooper and Co.

July 13 and Nov. 8, 1894.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.)

Neptune Steam Navigation Company v. Sclater and Procter. The Delano. (a)

Admiralty—County Court—Right of appeal—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 26, 31—County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 48), s. 120—Bill of lading — "Ship may commence discharging immediately on arrival"—Custom of dock.

Under sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888 there is a right of appeal in an Admiralty cause or suit on a point of law, although the amount involved is under 50*l.*

Semble: There is a right of appeal on a question of fact, if the amount exceeds 50*l., under sects.* 26 and 31 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868.

Where a bill of lading for a grain cargo provided that the ship "may commence discharging immediately on arrival," and upon the ship's arrival the berth for grain cargoes was occupied, and the ship was not able to immediately commence discharging, but she was discharged as fast as she could be under the circumstances, the Court refused to give the shipowner damages for detention.

Appeal from the Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division.

The plaintiffs, who were the owners of the steamship Delano, claimed from the defendants, as consignees under certain bills of lading in respect of the vessel, the sum of 49*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* for one day's detention of the Delano in the river Tyne, at the rate of fourpence per ton per day on 2968 tons.

Clause 5 of the bill of lading provided that:

The ship may commence discharging immediately on arrival and discharge continuously, the collector of the port being hereby authorised to grant a general order for discharge immediately on arrival, and if the goods be not taken by the consignees within such time as is provided by the regulations of the port of discharge, they may be stored by the carrier at the expense and wish of their owners.

The Delano brought a cargo of grain from America and proceeded to Rotterdam, where she discharged a portion, and then came on to the Albert Edward Dock at Newcastle to discharge the remainder; and it was here that the alleged detention occurred.

The ship arrived at the port of discharge at 5 a.m. on Saturday, the 11th Nov. 1893. All discharging is done by the Tyne Commissioners, and the master delivered the manifest at 10 a.m. requesting them to unload the ship. Upon that manifest it appeared that the master was not allowed to hand over any portion of the cargo until such delivery was made. There is only one berth for grain cargoes, and it was then occupied until after 1 p.m. The Delano was hauled into the berth at 3 p.m., which was after working hours on Saturdays. She began discharging on Monday, the 13th, at 7 a.m., and thence proceeded continuously till 10 p.m. each day, the discharge being completed on the following Friday.

The owners of the Delano brought an action on the Admiralty side in the Sunderland County Court for damages for one day's detention of the vessel. The learned County Court judge, in giving judgment for the plaintiffs for one day's detention, said: "The cases cited by Mr. Bolam (for the plaintiffs), commencing with Randall v. Lynch (2 Camp. 352), clearly establish that in such a case as the present the owner is entitled to damages for demurrage or detention, although the delay may have been occasioned by the crowded state of the docks, or other causes not occasioned by default of the shipowner or his agents. The case of The Jaederen (68 L. T. Rep. 266; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 260; (1892) P. 351), relied on by Mr. Greenwell for the defendants, is distinguishable. In that case the ship was "to be discharged as fast as she could deliver," and the judgment appears to have turned upon those words. The ship was delayed, as in this case, by the crowded state of the quay, but she delivered as fast as she could under the circumstances. Barnes, J. said: "It rests upon the plaintiffs, when they assert that the vessel has been discharged as fast as she can deliver, to show that she has not been delivered as fast as she could deliver; in fact, that she could have been delivered under the circumstances in which she was placed at a greater rate than in fact was the case."

(a) Reported by Basil Crump, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants appealed.

The appeal was heard on the 3rd May 1894, before the President (Sir F. H. Jeune) and Barnes, J., sitting as a Divisional Court.

Chitty (Newbolt with him), for the respondents, submitted a preliminary objection that there was no right of appeal. [Barnes, J.—This court has decided that there is a right of appeal. The point was raised in The Eden, 66 L. T. Rep. 387; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 174; (1892) P. 67.]

The Cashmere, 62 L. T. Rep. 814; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 575; 15 P. Div. 121; Pole v. Bright, 65 L. T. Rep. 748; (1892) 1 Q. B. 603.

The appeal was heard.

Boyd, for the appellants, referred to the practice of the dock as to discharge. [Barnes, J.—I had a case before me from the Mersey in which the dock took entire charge.] That was The Jaederen (ubi sup.). The only point submitted is, that there are no fixed lay days; neither party is in default, and therefore the loss must remain where it is, with the plaintiffs. The County Court judge did not sufficiently appreciate the difference between Randall v. Lynch (ubi sup.) and cases where the custom of the dock has to be incorporated in the agreement. In Hick v. Raymond (68 L. T. Rep. 175; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1893) A. C. 22) we find the converse of the case of Budgett v. Binnington (25 Q. B. Div. 320). The construction of clause 5 of the bill of lading is that the ship is to be at liberty to discharge on arrival whether in or out of working hours; but the consignees are not bound to be there out of working hours:

Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 42 L. T. Rep. 845; 5 App. Cas. 599;
Rodgers v. Forresters, 2 Camp. 483;
Burmister v. Hodgson, 2 Camp. 488.

[He was stopped.]

Chitty.—If the County Court judge decided the question as one of fact there is no appeal. Smith v. Baker (65 L. T. Rep. 467; (1891) A. C. 325) is clear upon this point. As to the custom of the port there is no reference in the clause:

Hick v. Rodocanachi, 65 L. T. Rep. 300; (1891) 2 Q. B. 626.

If there is no time named the court infers a reasonable time; but if a time is named the consignees are liable if the discharging is not done within that time. Here the circumstances prevented immediate unloading. [Barnes, J.—The wording of the clause shows that it was contemplated that the discharging should be done under the regulations of the port.] The obligation on the consignees is that the ship shall be at liberty to discharge at once. As to the construction of the word "immediately" see Cockburn, C.J. in Reg. v. Berkshire Justices (4 Q. B. Div. 469). [The President. — "Immediately" is no doubt a stronger expression than "within a reasonable time." "Immediately" means "as soon as possible."] Clause 5 meant that the ship was to be discharged immediately, and in point of fact she was not so discharged.

The President.—The learned judge appears to me clearly to have come to a decision upon a point of fact, and to a decision upon a point of law. Now, the decision upon the point of fact is, that the vessel was delayed by reason of the crowded state of the dock, and from that finding of fact I deduce two things. The first is that, referring to a case of Randall v. Lynch, he says the owner is entitled to damages for demurrage or detention, though the delay may have been caused by the crowded state of the docks or other causes not occasioned by the default of the shipowner or his agents That is what I think he means to say in the present case; and then, what is stronger, he says, referring to another case: "The ship was delayed, as in this case, by the crowded state of the quay, but she delivered as fast as she could under the circumstances." That I take to be a finding of fact. Then it is equally clearly a finding upon a point of law. He says this case is governed, in his view, by Randall v. Lynch (ubi sup.) and the case following. In the case of Randall v. Lynch there were words which implied an obligation on the part of the consignees not to delay the ship beyond a certain time. The ship was to be unloaded in forty days, and there it was held there was an implied covenant that they would keep her no longer; and it was further held that, under those circumstances, he was responsible for the various vicissitudes which prevented the ship being restored to the owner at the end of that period. That shows that the learned judge meant to decide that this case presented features similar to that of Randall v. Lynch, and that there was a guarantee on the part of the consignees that the ship should be able to commence discharging immediately on her arrival, and should discharge continuously. I do not dispute what was said as to the meaning of the words "on her arrival." or "continuously," or "immediately," but I do not think those words import any guarantee of that kind. It appears to me the clear meaning of those words is, that the ship might, if she could, commence at once, and the consignees would be ready to take as soon as she did come. The latter words also, I think, are quite consistent with my view that it was an authorisation and not a guarantee.

Barnes, J.—I do not think there is any dispute as to the law applicable to this case. This case turns upon the question of whether, having regard to the whole of the contract, and the clause which has been so much discussed, the plaintiffs have made out a positive obligation on the part of the defendants that the discharge of the ship shall begin at the moment of her arrival, and run on continuously, so as to give rise to a liability for demurrage if it does not so begin and go on? It seems to me it would strain the language of that clause to an excessive extent if it were read as imposing such a stringent obligation upon the consignees, having regard to the form of the contract and the circumstances of the case, and having regard to the fact that the ship is to be discharged, to some extent at any rate, by the regulations of the port of discharge. Therefore, upon the words alone I should have thought the obligation was not carried to the extent contended for by the plaintiffs. But there are two other matters which strike me; one is that, if the clause is to be construed in the strict sense which Mr. Chitty has contended for, the discharge would go on continuously, and there is nothing to limit it to day or night, or one part of it from another; yet it can hardly be said that the regulations of the port did not come in at some time. Again, I notice that the learned judge appears to have given the first day's demurrage when nothing was done, though demurrage could only really be given for any time that was in excess of the time occupied in discharging in accordance with the terms of the contract. I do not see that the ship was, in fact, detained beyond the time she would have been kept if the regulations had been simply acted upon.

Appeal allowed.

The plaintiffs appealed.

The appeal came before Lord Esher, M.R., Kay and Smith, L.JJ., on the 13th July.

By sect. 26 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71):

An appeal may be made to the High Court of Admiralty of England from a final decree or order of a County Court in any Admiralty cause, and, by permission of the judge of the County Court, from any interlocutory decree or order therein, on security for costs being first given, and subject to such other provisions as general orders shall direct.

By sect. 31:

No appeal shall be allowed unless the amount decreed or ordered to be due exceeds the sum of 50*l.*

By sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43):

If any party in any action or matter shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction, decision, or order of the judge may appeal from the same to the High Court, in such manner and subject to such conditions as may be for the time being provided by the rules of the Supreme Court regulating the procedure on appeals from inferior courts to the High Court; provided always, that there shall be no appeal in any action of contract or tort, other than an action of ejectment or an action in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditament shall have come in question, where the debt or damage claimed does not exceed 20*l.*, nor in any action for the recovery of tenements where the yearly rent or value of the premises does not exceed 20*l.*, nor in proceedings in interpleader where the money claimed, or the value of the goods or chattels claimed, or of the proceeds thereof, does not exceed 20*l.*, unless the judge shall think it reasonable and proper that such appeal should be allowed, and shall grant leave to appeal. At the trial or hearing of any action or matter, in which there is a right of appeal, the judge, at the request of either party, shall make a note of any question of law raised at such trial or hearing, and of the facts in evidence in relation thereto, and of his decision thereon, and of his decision in the action or matter.

Newbolt (Chitty with him), for the appellants, again raised the question as to whether there was any right of appeal from the County Court, and the Court adjourned the case in order to give counsel time to look up the point.

Boyd for the respondents.

On Nov. 8, the appeal came on for hearing before Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.

Chitty (Newbolt with him) for the appellants.—There is no right of appeal unless the amount is over 50*l.* and security is given. The Divisional Court were bound by a previous decision of their own. The question turns on sects. 26, 31, and 34 of the Act of 1868. The appeal was heard, and no security given, and it was held that the Act of 1888 had repealed all those sections:

The Forest Queen, 23 L. T. Rep. 544; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 508; 3 Adm. & Eccl. 299;
The Falcon, 38 L. T. Rep. 294; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 566; 3 P. Div. 100; County Courts Act 1888, ss. 120, 125;
Thames Conservators v. Hall, 18 L. T. Rep. 361; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 73; 3 C. P. 415;
The Eden (ubi sup.).

[Lopes, L.J.—The Eden does not seem to be reconcilable with The Cashmere (62 L. T. Rep. 814; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; 15 P. Div. 121). He referred to Reg. v, Judge of the City of London Court, 66 L. T. Rep. 135; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 130; (1892) 1 Q. B. 273.] The Eden is apparently founded on The Hero (65 L. T. Rep. 499; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 86; (1891) P. 294). He also referred to

The Humber, 49 L. T. Rep. 604; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 181; 9 P. Div. 12;
The Dart, 69 L. T. Rep. 251; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 353; (1893) P. 33;
The Alne Holme, 68 L. T. Rep. 862; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 344; (1893) P. 173.

Boyd for the respondents.—It is not contended that there has been a repeal of any section of the Act of 1868, but it is suggested that in that Act the Legislature thought fit to give a full right of appeal, i.e., on fact as well as on law. It is submitted that under the Act of 1888 there is a right of appeal in an Admiralty cause on a point of law, even although the amount claimed is under 50*l.* If the appeal is on a point of law, and the amount is under 50*l.*, it must be brought under the Act of 1888, but if on law and fact, then the procedure is under the Act of 1868. [Lord Esher.—It would not be unwholesome for the Legislature to say that an appeal shall be allowed in Admiralty cases on a point of law, whatever the amount, and on a question of fact only in cases where the decree exceeds a certain amount.]

Rockett v. Chippendale, 64 L. T. Rep. 641; (1891) 2 Q. B. 293.

The Cashmere (ubi sup.) is strongly in my favour.

The Court then proceeded to give judgment on the question of jurisdiction.

Lord Esher, M.R.—Taking the Act of 1888 first, and the 120th section, it seems to me that the words at the beginning of that section are large enough to include all County Court actions, and I am of opinion that a cause on the Admiralty side of the County Court is a County Court action. Therefore, if you read the words of sect. 120 to the full extent of their ordinary meaning, the section says that if any party in any action—which I think must be in any action or suit in the County Court—shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge on a point of law, the party aggrieved by the judgment may appeal, and appeal without any restrictions. I think it is a rule of construction that you are bound to give to the words in an Act of Parliament which are in large terms the full meaning and largeness of those terms, unless you are prevented by something else. But then there is the Act of 1868, and the Act of 1868 deals with Admiralty actions also, and has large words. It says an appeal may be made to the High Court of Admiralty from a final decree or order of the County Court in an Admiralty cause, on security for costs being first given. That is the 26th section. The 31st section says no appeal shall be allowed unless the amount decreed or ordered to be due exceeds the sum of 50*l*. Through the 26th section, if you read it by itself, an appeal may be made from the final decree or order of the County Court in an Admiralty cause. That, by itself, would mean from any decree or order, but in the very same Act of Parliament you have another section which says no appeal shall be allowed unless the amount exceeds 50*l*. You have, therefore, to turn back from that section to sect. 26, to limit the largeness of the words in sect. 26, which says that there may be an appeal from any final decree, and say that there shall only be an appeal from a final decree where the amount decreed exceeds the sum of 50*l*. Upon that statute, therefore, there is no appeal if the amount is under 50*l*. But if the words of sect. 120 of the subsequent Act can fairly be made to apply to the Act of 1868, you have that section not dealing with the whole of the appeal which is dealt with in the Act of 1868, but dealing only with part of it, viz., where there is an appeal upon a matter of law. It does not deal with the part which says there is to be an appeal on a question of fact. It deals, therefore, with part of it. But if the Act of 1888 were inconsistent with the whole of the Act of 1868, it would repeal the whole of it. If it is inconsistent with only part of it, but is consistent with part of it, what is the rule? It repeals so much of the former Act as it is inconsistent with, but not the rest of it. If, therefore, it is inconsistent with that part of the 1868 Act which deals with the question of law, and only inconsistent with that, it repeals that part, but leaves standing the appeal on the question of fact, as that part is dealt with in the Act of 1868. If, therefore, the 120th section repeals so much of the Act of 1868 as deals with an appeal on a question of law, it repeals a part of sect. 31, and repeals that part of sect. 26 which applies to an appeal on a question of law. Where, then, an appeal in an Admiralty cause from the County Court is upon a question of law, there is an appeal without any condition or stipulation. There is a clear appeal. But where it is an appeal on a question of fact, then that question of fact remains under the Act of 1868, and there may be an appeal if the amount is above 50*l*. That appeal is to be subject to security for costs being given, and if it is upon a question of fact and the amount is under 50*l*., there is no appeal at all.

The whole question, therefore, seems to be whether you can say that the general words of sect. 120 of the Act of 1888 are applicable at all to an Admiralty action or suit in the County Court. There are strong reasons for saying that the section does not apply to Admiralty actions at all; but the words, in my opinion, are large enough to include them, and I think there is no law which prevents us from saying that the words of sect. 120 do apply to an appeal in a County Court cause on the Admiralty side of it as well as to others. I conclude, therefore, on the whole, that it does apply, and that the law now stands thus: On an Admiralty cause or suit being tried in the County Court, if the amount is under 50*l*. but the question to be appealed against is a question of law, the party aggrieved may appeal. Of course he may appeal if the amount is above 50*l*. On a question of law, therefore, he may appeal if the amount is under or over 50*l*., and under that statute. But on a question of fact he is confined to the appeal given in the statute of 1868. There is no appeal on a question of fact under 50*l*. There is an appeal on a question of fact above 50*l*., but that must be upon security for costs being given. I think as I have said, that sect. 120 of the later Act repeals part of sect. 31 of the Act of 1868, and also repeals a portion of sect. 26, so far as that deals with questions of law as distinguished from questions of fact.

Lopes, L.J.—The conclusion at which the Master of the Rolls has arrived in his judgment is beyond all question a very salutary one. I think it is a result at which in all probability the Legislature would have arrived if the matter had been brought to their notice—I mean if the Act of 1868 had been sufficiently brought to their notice at the time the Act of 1888 was passed. I do not propose to differ from that view, but I cannot help saying that I should have great difficulty in arriving at it unaided by the Master of the Rolls, and what I understand to be the opinion of my brother Rigby. I think, as I again say, that it is a salutary conclusion, and one at which I rejoice. But I also recollect that we are following the decision of The Eden (ubi sup.). I therefore do not dissent from the judgment which has been given, but I desire to say that I arrive at it with great hesitation.

Rigby, L.J.—Sect. 120, if it were considered apart from all other statutory provisions, would most plainly give this appeal in every action or matter which would come before a County Court judge. Why should we not give effect to the general words of that section? I have not forgotten that there are considerations which have passed through my mind, which are not without weight. I question whether we could cut down the words of sect. 120, but considering that this is intended to be a code—I will not say a complete code—as I gather, for procedure in the County Courts, except so far as the existing enactments were not inconsistent, I see no sufficiently valid reason why we should not give the larger interpretation, which is the natural interpretation, and which is the interpretation that is most consistent with the whole scheme. I do not say absolutely consistent, for I cannot disguise from my mind that in all probability the attention of the Legislature was not, when this sect. 120 was being dealt with, distinctly called to the matters to which it was to apply. But I think it is the duty of courts of jus ice, as far as they can without interfering with any principles of common sense, and without straining words beyond their customary and usual meaning, to consider the effect of the section, and to consider whether there was anything in the scheme of this Act that should have prevented the Legislature, if they had been so minded, from applying this particular provision to the case of Admiralty actions. I can find no reason satisfactory to myself for saying so, and though I do think that to a certain extent the proceedings in Admiralty actions had not been present to the minds of the Legislature, because otherwise they might have given an inferior limit, as they have done in the cases of actions of replevin and actions for the recovery of land, and probably would have done so, I take it altogether that the safer way is to abide by the natural construction of the words, and give them their natural and usual effect, unless you can be quite satisfied that they were intended, by implication, to be cut down. That is what I fail to satisfy myself of, and I therefore agree with the decision of my learned brethren.

The appeal was then heard on the point of law.

Newbolt.—The preliminary point submitted is that there can only be an appeal if a point of law was raised at the trial, and a note taken by the judge. The whole dispute in the Divisional Court was as to clause 5, and in the County Court it was assumed that we were right on that. The question as to the time when delivery should take place depends on that clause. [LOPES, L.J. referred to Lord Halsbury's judgment in Smith v. Baker (ubi sup.)] The judge has made no note of the point of law. It was contended in the County Court that "immediately" meant delivery within a reasonable time:

Reg. v. Berkshire Justices (ubi sup.).

Boyd was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It is a perfectly clear case, and ought never to have been appealed at all. The only question before the County Court was what was the proper construction of the bill of lading. You cannot construe a bill of lading by reading two lines and leaving out all the rest, but by reading the whole of it, and when you come to construe a bill of lading as to the obligation of the consignee to take delivery you must find out where the obligation is, and what is the right of the shipowner to require him to take delivery. Here the beginning of the bill of lading is, that the shipowner shall receive these goods on board and take them to this named dock on the Tyne, and there deliver them. If that stands alone he is bound to be ready to deliver them within a reasonable time after his arrival at the dock, and what is a reasonable time is generally determined when you come into dock, by the custom of the dock and by the habitual mode of discharge. The meaning of it would be that he is to be ready to deliver on arrival at that dock within a reasonable time according to the usual mode of giving delivery at that dock. Then there is clause 5. Does that alter his obligation to give delivery? It seems to me it only gives him the option to say that he will deliver before the lapse of that which would without that clause be a reasonable time. That is what Barnes, J. says. He may impose upon the consignee the obligation to take delivery, not where grain is delivered, but to take delivery sooner. Supposing the berth to be occupied for five days, the shipowner would have been entitled to say, "No! I don't intend to wait these five days; I will give you delivery over the side of my ship where she lies, here in the dock." The consignee would have been obliged to take delivery then, and if he declined he would have had to pay demurrage. But the clause did not oblige the shipowner to give delivery. On the other side it was said that, whether the master did or did not require the consignees to take delivery before what would otherwise be reasonable time, they were bound to take delivery before what would otherwise be reasonable time. That is a wrong construction. That is what they contended for in the County Court, and that is what they contended for in the Divisional Court. I am of opinion that Barnes, J.'s construction of this bill of lading was quite right, and that, therefore, this appeal must fail.

LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ. concurred.

Solicitors: Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., for Cooper and Goodger, Newcastle-on-Tyne; Downing, Holman, and Co., for Pinkney and Bolam Sunderland.

Thursday, Dec. 13, 1894.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ.)

THE KATY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Charter-party—Demurrage—"Running days"—How computed—When lay days to commence.

A charter-party provided that lay-days were to count from forty-eight hours after the arrival of the vessel at a safe anchorage. Fourteen running days were allowed for loading and unloading. Seven of the lay-days were used at the port of loading. The vessel arrived at the port of discharge on a Saturday, and was ready to discharge at 8.30 a.m. The defendants, the consignees, allowed the discharge to commence at 1 p.m., and it went on continuously till 10 a.m. on the following Saturday when the defendants refused to proceed unless the plaintiffs would pay them a certain sum if the discharge was completed on that day. The ship was not discharged till the Monday. The plaintiffs contended that the lay days expired on the Saturday, and claimed two days' demurrage.

Held (affirming the President), that "running days" meant calendar days, and not any period of twenty-four hours;

Also (reversing the President), that, as the discharge, by consent of the defendants, had commenced on the Saturday, that day counted as a lay day, and therefore the defendants were liable for two days' demurrage.

APPEAL from a decision of the President (Sir F. H. Jeune) in an action by shipowners claiming two days' demurrage, reported 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 510; 71 L. T. Rep. 60.

The following are the material clauses of the charter-party:

2. Orders for the United Kingdom, Continent, or other stipulated port, unless given on signing bills of lading, are to be given at Gibraltar within twelve running hours of arrival, or lay days—Sundays only excepted—to count.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

3. The charterer has the right to order the steamer from Gibraltar to Queenstown, Falmouth, or Plymouth (at master's option) for final orders to be given within twelve running hours (twenty-four hours at Queenstown) of arrival, or lay days—Sundays only excepted—to count, for the United Kingdom, Continent, or for other stipulated Continental ports not west of Havre, paying 1*s.* per unit extra freight over and above the rates hereinafter stated.

7. Fourteen running days, Sundays, Good Friday, Easter Monday, Whit Monday, and Christmas-day excepted, are to be allowed the said freighters (if the steamer be not sooner despatched) for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days at 4*d.* per ton of the steamer's gross register tonnage per running day. Lay days at port of loading are not to count before the 23rd Feb. next (new style) unless both steamer and cargo be ready earlier. The freighters have the option of cancelling this charter if the steamer does not arrive at port of loading, and be ready to load on or before midnight of 10th March next (new style) unless the steamer has been detained waiting for orders as to loading port longer than six hours—in which case the date last mentioned shall be extended so far as to cover the time the vessel was detained for orders over and above the six hours, and if by reason of such detention the vessel is prevented reaching her loading port, the charterers shall pay demurrage for each day detained over the said hours, whether the vessel is ultimately loaded or not.

9. c. It is further agreed, that at Sulina the steamer is to load as much cargo inside the bar or harbour as she can safely proceed to the roads with, and the remainder is to be shipped in the roads at freighter's risk and expense, but in the latter case all days on which lighters are unable from bad weather to go outside are not to count as lay days.

12. Should the steamer be ordered to discharge at a place to which there is not sufficient water for her to get the first tide after arrival without lightening, and lie always afloat, lay days are to count from forty-eight hours after her arrival at a safe anchorage, for similar vessels bound for such place, and any lighterage incurred to enable her to reach the place of discharge is to be at the expense and risk of the receiver of the cargo, any custom of the port or place to the contrary notwithstanding, but time occupied in proceeding from the anchorage to the port of discharge is not to count.

T. E. Scrutton and Lowe for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.

T. G. Carver, contrà.

Lord Esher, M.R.—This charter-party, like most of them, is not very easy to construe when it comes into the critical hands of critical lawyers, but I think we ought to construe it according to a business view. The charter-party does not fix specifically any time when the unloading is to begin. It is not as if they were to take delivery immediately on the ship being anchored or immediately on the ship being in an unloading berth, or anything of that sort. There is no express moment stated in which the unloading is to begin. Then it is to begin reasonably; a reasonable time after the ship has arrived. Now in this case, when you begin to think what is reasonable, there comes in the observation of the learned judge in Commercial Steamship Company v. Boulton (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 111), that charterers are entitled to a fair working day. Apply that to the question as to when it was reasonable to begin. He says seven lay days mean seven whole lay days. I agree with him. I think, therefore, that if nothing else had happened here the charterers were not bound to take delivery when the captain asked them to take delivery, because they would not have the whole of the Saturday, which they were entitled to have, and they might have said, "No, we will not count a part of the day; it is not reasonable that we should. The lay days, therefore, will begin on Monday." When the days did begin I cannot entertain any doubt that the days were days, and that to go into the superfine criticism that in one part of the charter-party they have talked of forty-eight hours cannot alter the plain stipulation that they are to have seven days, and that means seven whole days—days in the ordinary sense. If you expand it that would be, if nothing else had happened, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Monday. That is what it would be. Seven days means those seven days, and when you talk of Monday, I cannot think that you are carrying into Monday half of Tuesday. Here, although they were not obliged to treat Saturday as a lay day, let us see how they did treat it. The captain went to them not very late, I think early in the morning, and asked them to come and take delivery. They said "No." They were right. They were not bound, I think, but then they changed their minds, and at 1 o'clock they do go and take delivery. What is the meaning of that? The captain said, "Come, agree with me to take delivery," and they did agree to take delivery, and they did it. Is that, or is that not, agreeing to treat the Saturday as one of the lay days? The lay days for this purpose I may call unloading days. They agree to treat it in that way. I think the meaning of the proposition was, "Now come here and treat this as a lay day;" they say "No" at first, but afterwards they agree to treat it as a lay day, and if it once is a lay day, to my mind it does not signify how much of it was left. The whole of that day is a lay day, and if they neither did nor could take delivery during half of it, it is only one time—it is a lay day. I say it is only one time because if, for instance, on the Monday or Tuesday something happens, such as a storm of rain, so that it would have been extremely dangerous to a cargo of maize or wheat in bulk to be landed over the side of the ship in the pouring rain, because it would have to be dried afterwards or it would be spoilt; therefore they might have been prevented upon the Tuesday from taking delivery, but that is their misfortune. It is the charterer who must pay for anything of that kind; therefore on the Saturday, if they chose to take it as a lay day, they must take the whole of it, and the fact that they did not take delivery until 1 o'clock does not prevent them from having to treat the Saturday as a lay day. There was an advantage to themselves to be taken into account, it seems to me. Being a cargo of wheat or maize in bulk, it was for the advantage of the consignee to get such a cargo as that out of the ship as soon as possible; first of all because it is a cargo extremely likely to heat of itself, and secondly because it is a cargo that will easily damage if wet comes upon it, if the hatches are open. I should say also, as regards that, if the consignees or the charterers had a cargo coming to them at that time, and in that position, it would be an advantage to them to have the delivery as soon as possible, and I cannot help thinking that if shipowners are to use their crew, and their materials and implements on a day when they are not obliged to, it is a burden upon them. It certainly is a burden upon their crew. So that I cannot think, with great deference to those who suggest it, that you can say that this matter makes no difference to the ship or the consignee, and is to be treated as if it was a mere matter of courtesy. I cannot help thinking that the proper inference to be drawn is that both sides agree to treat that Saturday as one of the lay days, and if so it did not signify how much of that lay day was or could be employed by the consignees for the discharge of the cargo. I, therefore, am obliged to disagree with the judgment given by the President, and to say that here the lay days began on the Saturday, so that there must be two demurrage days, and the shipowner was entitled so to treat it, and to have judgment entered for him for the amount claimed.

LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ. concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Botterell and Roche; Field, Roscoe, and Co., for Batesons, Warr, and Wimshurst, Liverpool.

Thursday, Dec. 13, 1894.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ.)

THE ORIENTA. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Necessaries — Master's liability — Maritime lien —Merchant Shipping Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 46), s. 1.

Disbursements and liabilities of the master of a ship which give rise to a maritime lien are those for which, by virtue of his general authority, and without express authority, he can pledge his owners' credit; and hence where the shipowner orders goods a liability cannot be created in the master, as drawer of a bill of exchange in respect of necessaries, within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1889, merely for the purpose of attaching a lien to the ship.

APPEAL from a decision of the President (Sir F. H. Jeune), in an action for master's disbursements, reported 7 Mar. Law Cas. 508; (1894) P. 271; 71 L. T. Rep. 343.

Pickford, Q.C. and Dawson Miller, for the plaintiff, in support of the appeal, referred to the following cases in addition to those dealt with by the President (ubi sup.):

The Ocean, 2 W. Rob. 368; 9 Jur. 381;
The Caledonia, Swabey, 17;
The Mary Ann, 13 L. T. Rep. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. 294; L. Rep. 1 Adm. 8;
The Glentana, Swabey, 415;
Webster v. Seekamp, 4 B. & Ald. 352.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Laing, for the interveners, were stopped.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is a perfectly easy case. I apprehend it has been common knowledge for nearly 200 years that the captain is only authorised to pledge his owners' credit for what may be called "things necessary" for the ship He is only authorised to pledge his owner's credit for them if he is in a position where it is necessary for the purposes of his duty that these things should be supplied, and he cannot have recourse to his owners before ordering them. In respect of what disbursements can he have a lien upon the ship? He can have no lien upon his ship here. He can only give a bottomry bond on the ship where the necessity arises in the sense which I have just stated. But then there came these Acts of Parliament, which say he should have a lien for disbursements. Now, if he should have a lien upon the ship, then the ship is bound to him, and it seems intolerable to suppose that the captain can bind the ship to himself by ordering goods which he was not authorised to order at all, so as to pledge his owners' credit for them. The real meaning of the word "disbursements" in Admiralty jurisdiction is disbursements by the captain which he makes himself liable for in respect of necessary things for the ship, for the purposes of navigation, which he as master of the ship is there to carry out—necessary in the sense that they must be had immediately—and when the owner is not there, able to give the order, and he is not so near to the captain that the captain can ask for his authority, and the captain is therefore obliged, necessarily, to disburse in order to carry out his duty as master. Here we have no disbursements made by the master; we have no goods ordered by the master at all; we have no liability of the master in respect of these goods at all from beginning to end. He is not liable for the price of the coals. It may be that the bill is drawn for the exact price, but he has no liability for the coals. What he has done is at the request of his owners, to make himself drawer of the bill of exchange which the owners were to accept, but it does not make the master liable to anybody unless the owners dishonour it when it becomes due, and the proper notices have been given. That is not a liability in respect of the coals, that is a liability in respect of the bill of exchange. It is not a liability incurred by him in his office as master, but by his being the drawer at the request of his owners. The appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Botterell and Roche; Ince, Colt, and Ince.

Nov. 30 and Dec. 18, 1894.

(Before Lord HALSBURY, LINDLEY and SMITH, L.JJ.)

THE MECCA. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Necessaries—Jurisdiction—Foreign ship—Foreign port—High seas — Admiralty Court Act 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65), s. 6.—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 10), s. 5.

The High Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction over a claim in respect of necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in a foreign port, even although that port be not upon the high seas.

The India (9 L. T. Rep. 234; 1 Mar. Law Cas. 390; 33 L. J. 234, Adm.) overruled.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a decision of Bruce, J.

The plaintiffs were respectively Messrs. Cory Brothers and Co. Limited, coal merchants, carrying on business in London, and having depôts at Alexandria and Port Said; and Antonio Legembre, also a coal merchant, of Algiers. The defendants were the Hamidieh Steamship Company Limited, owners of the Turkish steamship Mecca.

In March 1894 the Mecca was supplied by Messrs. Cory Brothers, at Alexandria and Port Said, with coals, and they also advanced her Suez Canal dues at the latter place. The master of the Mecca, W. G. Crockhart, gave a bill of exchange, dated Alexandria, March 6, for 176*l.* 5*s.* for the coals there supplied, and another, dated March 10, for 194*l.* 8*s.* for the coals and dues at Port Said. The bills were payable thirty days after sight, and the first was drawn on C. A. Theodoridi, and the second on the owners of the Mecca, both at Constantinople.

In Aug. 1894 the Mecca was supplied with coals at Algiers by the plaintiff, Antonio Legembre, and he received from the master a bill drawn upon his owners, and dated Aug. 28, for the sum of 101*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*, payable at thirty days sight. All these bills were dishonoured on presentation, and notarial charges were incurred amounting to 3*l.* 7*s.* At all three ports the coaling was done by means of lighters. At Port Said the vessels lie in the Ismail Basin, which is practically part of the Canal; at Algiers and Alexandria the vessels lie in an open roadstead slightly protected by breakwaters.

The plaintiffs brought an action against the master of the Mecca, in the Queen's Bench Division, to recover the amount of the bills, and the master in chambers allowed him to defend on payment of 400*l.* into court. This was paid with a denial of liability as regarded the claim of Messrs. Cory Brothers, on the ground that they had been paid by the Turkish owners of the Mecca, but admitting the claim of Legembre.

The plaintiffs also instituted an action in rem in the Admiralty Division, and the defendants moved that the proceedings be set aside or stayed pending the determination of the common law action.

Sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65) provides that:

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvages for services rendered to or damage received by any ship or seagoing vessel, or in the nature of towage, or for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or seagoing vessel, and to enforce payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county, or upon the high seas, at the time when the services were rendered or the damage received, or necessaries furnished, in respect of which such claim is made.

Sect. 5 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 10) provides that:

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales. Provided always, that if in any such cause the plaintiff do not recover 20*l.* he shall not be entitled to any costs, charges, or expenses incurred by him therein, unless the judge shall certify that the cause was a fit one to be tried in the said court.

The motion was heard before Bruce, J. on the 5th Nov.

Pyke, Q. C. and Nelson supported the motion on behalf of the defendants.

Bucknill, Q.C. and Gerard Ince for the plaintiffs.

Bruce, J., in granting the motion, said that so long ago as the India (ubi sup.) Dr. Lushington had certainly intimated an opinion that the 3rd & 4th Vict. did not give this court jurisdiction in a case where necessaries were furnished to a foreign ship in a foreign port. That authority had never been questioned since, nor had this court ever entertained a suit for necessaries so furnished. With regard to the Act of 1861 he felt himself bound by a long series of decisions which held that it applied only to British and Colonial ships. Then it was intimated by council for the plaintiffs that evidence might be adduced to show that Port Said was not in territorial waters, but he thought it would require a strong affidavit to satisfy the court that it was on the high seas. If any doubt arose on that point and the case went to the Court of Appeal, that court would exercise its discretion to allow affidavits to be filed to show that Port Said was not in territorial waters.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Nov. 30.—Bucknill, Q.C. and Gerard Ince, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—A series of cases have decided that before 1840 the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction with respect to necessaries, supplied to a ship under any circumstances:

The Heinrich Bjorn, 52 L. T. Rep. 560; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391; 11 App. Cas. 270.

It is now settled beyond power of appeal that supply of necessaries does not give a maritime lien. The second point is that these ports were on the high seas. [Lord Halsbury referred to Reg. v. Cunningham, 32 L. T. Rep. O. S. 287; 8 Cox C. C. 104.] See the old statutes of Richard in Reg. v. Keyn (13 Cox C. C. 403; L. Rep. 2 Exch. Div. 63):

The Neptune, 3 Hagg. 129; 3 Knapp, 94;
The Pacific, Br. & Lush. 243;
The India (ubi sup.).

Sect. 6 of the Act of 1840 seems to draw a distinction between things done within the realm and things done on the seas; it was not intended to rob the Admiralty Court of its jurisdiction over things done on the seas:

The Courier, Lush. 541;
The Diana, Lush. 539;
Kennedy on Salvage, p. 45.

In The Wataga (Swabey, 165) Dr. Lushington held that the Act of 1840 covered the case of goods supplied at the Cape of Good Hope. [Lord Halsbury.—That would seem, if correct, to carry you all the way. Lindley, L.J.—The Anna (34 L. T. Rep. 898; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 237; 1 P. Div. 253) follows The Wataga, and supports your contention]:

The Flecha, 1 Spink, 438;
The West Friesland, Swabey, 454.

"High seas" means all that body of water surrounding the coast which is without the body of the county, i.e., below high-water mark:

General Iron Screw Collier Company v. Schurmanns, 29 L. J. 877, Ch.;
The Mali Ivo, 20 L. T. Rep. 681; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 244; L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Eccl. 356;
Reg. v. Anderson, L. Rep. 1 Cr. Cas. Res. 161;
The Franconia, 35 L. T. Rep. 721; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 2 P. Div. 8.

As to what is a port, see Coke's Institutes, Part iv. p. 134. The India (ubi sup.) was not properly decided, and this motion should have been dismissed.

Pyke, Q.C. and Nelson for the defendants.—The proviso in the Act of 1861 does not seem to apply to foreign ships. The decision in The Ella A. Clarke (8 L. T. Rep 119; Br. & Lush. 36) has never been questioned. Sect. 5 refers to British ships. [Lord HALSBURY.—You wish to introduce by construction the word "British" in every case where it does not occur.] Not where collision is referred to. The coals were certainly not supplied on the high seas at Port Said. The Mecca was loaded in the Ismail basin, which is an artificial body of water. [Lord HALSBURY referred to the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 73).] The Wataga and The Anna are not in point:

The Sara, 61 L. T. Rep. 26; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 14 A. C. 209.

Bucknill, Q.C., in reply, referred to

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 476, 529;
Reg. v. Carr, 47 L. T. Rep. 450; 10 Q. B. Div. 76;
The Saxonia, Lush. 417.

Judgment was reserved and delivered on the 18th Dec.

Lord HALSBURY.—The question in this case arises, as to coal supplied in foreign ports to a ship now here, whether the Admiralty Division has jurisdiction to detain the ship for the price of the coals so supplied. Practically it resolves itself into the question whether Dr. Lushington's decision in the case of The India (ubi sup.), is to be followed in this court. In the view I take of that question I think it unnecessary to enter into the cases which have arisen between the Common Law Courts and the Admiralty, and, indeed, I will assume that up to the year 1861 the Court of Admiralty would have had no jurisdiction in this case, though, as applicable to the supply at Alexandria and Algiers, I am by no means prepared to say that the high seas do not include those places of supply; but, as the Act of 1861 appears to me conclusively to dispose of the question, I would rather rest my judgment upon the language of that statute. Now the 5th section of that statute provides that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs. Then follow qualifications which are immaterial in respect of this case, and which seem to me to give no materials for qualifying or cutting down the generality of the language I have quoted. The learned judge who decided The India held the words I have quoted to apply to a colonial ship in a foreign port, and I search in vain throughout the whole statute for anything which can justify the construction that you must imply the words British or colonial ship in the 5th section. The language of the 7th section, "any ship," is admitted to apply to any ship all over the world, and I am wholly unable to see why the same words employed in sect. 5 ought not to receive an equally extended application. It cannot be alleged that the statute is only intended to apply to British ships, inasmuch as it is admitted that some of its provisions apply to all ships anywhere. Where the Legislature intended to exclude foreign ships and to apply its provisions solely to British ships or ships in British waters it has been careful to say so in terms (see sects. 8, 9, and 11), and, upon ordinary principles of construction, where the Legislature has enacted something in respect to any ship and something else as to any British ship it would be improper to assume there was no intentional distinction. Neither is it possible to suggest any reasonable ground for the supposed limitation. Dr. Lushington seems himself to have been unable to suggest any reason for it. The Act itself professes to be an Act for the extending of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty, and the nature of the thing dealt with seems to me to point in the direction of extension rather than restriction. I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision in the case of The India was wrong. The authority of Dr. Lushington treating of such a subject makes one hesitate to overrule a decision of his, particularly when it has remained unchallenged for so many years; but, on the other hand, the case turns upon the construction of a statute only thirty-three years old. Reluctant as one may be to disturb a decision acquiesced in so long, yet that decision involves principles of construction so serious that I think it is the duty of the court to pronounce its disagreement with them. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal should be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised by this appeal is whether a foreign steamship supplied with coal in foreign ports, but which ship was in this country when this action was commenced, can be proceeded against in the Admiralty Division of the High Court for the price of such coals. Without investigating the early history of the Admiralty jurisdiction in civil cases, it is sufficient to start from the doctrine well settled in the time of Blackstone, viz.: (1) That the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction to entertain any causes of action arising within the precincts or body of a county; (2) that the court had jurisdiction over some causes of action arising on the high seas. (3 Bl. Com., 106). I say "some" because their number was limited to what are commonly called maritime causes. It must also be borne in mind that the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction over any causes of action arising in foreign countries beyond the seas, but not on the high seas. (Com. Dig. Admiralty, F 3). In 1840 an Act was passed to extend the jurisdiction in certain causes of action (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, sect. 6). The causes of action enumerated are salvage, damage to ships, towage, and necessaries supplied to foreign ships. Necessaries supplied to English ships are not within the section, and the jurisdiction of the court as to them was not extended. In fact, it had none: (see The Two Ellens, 26 L. T. Rep. 1; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208; L. Rep. 4 Prob. Cas. 161.) In The Robert Pow (Br. & Lush. 99) Dr. Lushington said that the object of this enactment was to give the Court of Admiralty jurisdiction over certain causes of action, although they might arise within the body of a county, and in cases of damage he confined the jurisdiction to collisions between ships. There is no doubt that one of the main objects of the Act was to extend the jurisdiction as above stated. But this was not all, for, as pointed out in The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.), the jurisdiction to entertain a suit for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship was conferred for the first time, and it was confined to them. The limited construction put by Dr. Lushington on the jurisdiction of the court in cases of damage was not adopted by the House of Lords: (see The Zeta, 68 L. T. Rep. 40; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 237; (1893) A. C., 468.) The statute was held to apply to other cases of damage; and, what is more important on the present occasion, the Act was held to define the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty on the high seas as well as within the body of a county. The expression "high seas" when used with reference to the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty included all oceans, seas, bays, channels, rivers, creeks, and waters below low water-mark and where great ships could go, with the exception only of such parts of such oceans, &c., as were within the body of some county: (see as to this 28 Hen. 8, c. 15; 4 Inst., 134; Com. Dig. Admlty., E 7 (1) (7) (14); Reg. v. Anderson (ubi sup.); Reg. v. Carr (ubi sup.). A foreign or colonial port, if it was part of the high seas in the above sense, would be as much within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty as any other port of the high seas. The jurisdiction, however, is necessarily limited in its application. It can only be exercised over persons or ships when they come to this country. An artificial basin or dock excavated out of land, but into which water from the high seas could be made to flow would not, I apprehend, be in any sense part of the high seas, whether such basin or dock was in this country or in any other.

Apart, then, from authority and on general principles of law, I should arrive at the conclusion that in this case the Court of Admiralty had under the Act of 1840 jurisdiction to proceed against the Mecca when in this country for the coals supplied to her in Alexandria and Algiers, she being supplied on the high seas at those places, although they are also ports. But the basin at Port Said, not being part of the high seas, the Court of Admiralty would have no jurisdiction under the Act of 1840 if it stood alone. The subsequent Act of 1861 has again, however, extended the jurisdiction of the court. This statute was passed expressly for that very purpose. Nothing can be wider than the language of sects. 4, 5, 6, 7, and 10. The expression used in them is "any ship," and when this language is contrasted with the language used in sects. 8, 9, and 11, in which British ships are expressly mentioned, the inference is very strong that "any ship" means any ship, whether British, colonial, or foreign. Sects. 4, 5, 6, 7, and 10 do not refer to the high seas, and I see no justification for limiting the jurisdiction conferred on the court by these sections to ships on the high seas. I read the sections as applying to any ships anywhere, although, until they come to this country, they cannot be proceeded against here. Sect. 5, which deals with necessaries, is only applicable, it is true, to some ships—viz., to those supplied elsewhere than in the ports to which they belong; but even then they are not excepted if any of their owners or part owners are domiciled in England or Wales when proceedings in the Admiralty are instituted. This limitation, however, points not to the nationality of the ship nor to any distinction between high seas and other places not on the high seas, but to the port of supply. The exception includes English ships supplied at the ports to which they belong, but the larger class of ships from which the exception is taken is not confined to other English ships, but extends to all ships. If the ship, whether English, colonial, or foreign, is supplied with necessaries in her own port the probability is that there are persons there to whom credit is given and who can be sued there. But if, as in the present case, the ship is supplied in some other place, the supplier of necessaries (if he does not obtain cash on delivery, which may be impossible) is very likely never to get paid at all. There is good reason therefore, both in the interest of the supplier and in the interest of the shipowner, for giving the supplier a remedy against the ship if she comes to this country. If there were no such remedy supplies would often be refused, however urgently required. Apart, then, from authority, I am of opinion that under this statute of 1861 the court would have jurisdiction to entertain this action for the coals supplied to the Mecca in the basin of Port Said as well as for those supplied in the ports of Alexandria and Algiers. Even if these two ports are not parts of the high seas, as I think they are, still the Act of 1861 goes further than the Act of 1840, and is wide enough to give the court jurisdiction to arrest the ship for the price of the coals supplied at all three places.

I turn now to the authorities, and I find that in The India (ubi sup.), Dr. Lushington held that even under the Act of 1861 the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction to entertain a suit for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in a foreign port. The same learned judge had expressed an opinion to the same effect in The Ocean (ubi sup.), decided in 1845. Dr. Lushington, however, decided in 1856 that the court had jurisdiction under the Act of 1840 to entertain a suit for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in a colonial port, The Wataga (ubi sup.), and this case was approved and followed by this court in The Anna (ubi sup.). The same point had been decided in the same way in 1854 as regards necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in the Thames—The Flecha (ubi sup.). Sect. 6 of the Act of 1840 and sect. 5 of the Act of 1861 and these decisions show that it is not the nationality of the ships which is important, but the place of supply. Unless, however, the place of supply is the port to which the ship belongs, the place of supply is not made material. But the authority of Dr. Lushington on all Admiralty matters is deservedly so high that I should hesitate long in differing from him on the construction of the statutes in question if the House of Lords had not held that he construed the Acts of 1840 and 1861 erroneously in other cases. It was, however, so held in The Zeta (ubi sup.), The Sara (ubi sub.), and in The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.). These decisions, it is true, do not overrule The India, they relate to other matters—viz., damage and lien for necessaries, but they show that the construction put on the statutes of 1840 and 1861 by Dr. Lushington was in some respects incorrect. Guided by these decisions and applying my own mind to the statutes in question I have arrived at the conclusion that the decision in The India was erroneous and ought no longer to be followed. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed.

SMITH, L.J. concurred.

Solicitors for the appellants, Ince, Colt, and Ince.

Solicitors for the respondents, Lowless and Co.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Nov. 8 and 12, 1894.

(Before BRUCE, J.)

BROWN v. LAW. (a)

Warranty—Warranty given in error to another's agent—Damage —Right of principal to sue the warrantor.

The plaintiffs entered into a contract with the defendant to supply the defendant's ship, then at Newcastle, New South Wales, with coal. The plaintiffs sent a telegram from London to their house in Newcastle, New South Wales, with instructions as to drawing upon the defendant for the price of the coal. The telegram contained a code word "journee" which meant "after this vessel is loaded owners order her to proceed to R." By a mistake in the transmission of the telegram, the code word "jounce" was substituted for "journee." "Jounce" meant an order to proceed to C. The plaintiffs' house in Newcastle informed the master of the ship of the instructions they had received. The master doubted the accuracy of the instructions, and the plaintiffs' house gave him a letter confirming the contents of the telegram. The master accordingly proceeded with the ship to C. The result of the ship's going to C. instead of to R. was a loss to the defendant, for which the defendant counter-claimed against the plaintiffs in an action by the plaintiffs for the price of the coal. The jury found that the master acted reasonably under the circumstances.

Held, that the letter given by the plaintiffs to the master, though a warranty to the master was not a warranty on which the defendant could sue the plaintiffs; that on the finding of the jury the defendant had no right of action against the master, and could not therefore claim to sue the plaintiffs in order to avoid a multiplicity of actions; that the plaintiffs had not by the giving of the letter constituted the master their agent.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION of an action tried before Bruce, J. and a special jury.

The plaintiffs' claim was for 490*l.* 10*s* for the price of coal supplied to the defendant's ship Dumbartonshire.

By his defence the defendant admitted the plaintiffs' claim subject to his counter-claim. The defendant counter-claimed for 325*l.* 12*d.* 4*d.* being the amount of damages after giving credit for the amount claimed, incurred by him through certain instructions alleged to have been given by the plaintiffs to the master of the defendant's ship, negligently, and wrongfully, and without any authority or request from the defendant.

The facts of the case and the arguments of counsel are fully set out in the judgment.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. and Hollams for the plaintiffs.

Bigham, Q.C. and Leck for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 12.—BRUCE, J. read the following judgment:—In this action the plaintiffs sue for 490*l* 10*s*., the price of 1000 tons of coal supplied to the defendant's ship Dumbartonshire. The defendant admitted this claim, but he set up in answer a counter-claim in which it was alleged that the plaintiffs wrongfully and negligently, and without the authority of the defendant, informed the captain of the Dumbartonshire that they had his master's instructions to order him to proceed to Callao, and the master of the ship in consequence sailed to Callao instead of to Rangoon, and the defendant alleges that by reason of the ship sailing to Calloa instead of to Rangoon he has incurred a loss of 816*l.* The question to be determined is whether the facts proved are such as to entitle the defendant to sustain his counter-claim. The defendant's ship was at Newcastle, New South Wales, in November 1892. The plaintiffs are merchants carrying on business in London and at Newcastle, New South Wales. The defendant entered into a contract with the plaintiffs in London for the supply by them to his ship at Newcastle of 1000 tons of coal at 10*s.* per ton. It was a term of the contract that the expense of cable instructions should be paid by the plaintiffs. The defendant had arranged for the ship to proceed to Rangoon to take in there a cargo of rice. On the 8th Nov. the defendant telegraphed to the ship's agent at Newcastle telling him to take on board 1000 tons of coal from the plaintiffs, and to despatch the ship when coaled to Rangoon. On the same day the plaintiffs telegraphed to their Newcastle house telling them to supply the coal to the ship. On the 12th Nov. the plaintiffs sent to their Newcastle house another telegram telling them to draw upon the owners, at sixty days, for the price of the coal. This telegram was a code telegram, and as despatched it contained the code word "journee" which meant, "after this vessel is loaded owners or charterers order her to proceed to Rangoon." In transmission the code word "jounce," by some unexplained mistake, was substituted for "journee," and "jounce" meant, "owners order vessel to proceed to Callao." On the 14th Nov. the plaintiffs' house at Newcastle informed the master that they had received orders from his owners through their London house requesting them to order him to proceed to Callao when loaded. The master was somewhat incredulous, and a discussion took place between the ship's agent, the master, and the plaintiffs' representative at Newcastle. In the result, on the 18th Nov., the plaintiffs gave the master the following letter: "For your satisfaction we beg to confirm our verbal instructions respecting draft against your cargo and destination. They came from your owners, and were conveyed to us in a cablegram, which arrived on the 13th inst., from our London house. In it we were instructed to limit the quantity supplied your ship to 1000 tons, and, after loading, to despatch you for Callao, we taking your draft for cost on your owners, Messrs. T. Law and Co. This letter will be a sufficient guarantee for your proceeding on your voyage, as we understand your only difficulty lies in absence of any direct communication on the point from Messrs. Law and Co. We wish you a pleasant voyage. (Signed by the plaintiffs.)" The giving of this letter satisfied the master, and, in reliance upon it, he was induced to sail, and did sail when loaded from Newcastle to Callao. The jury, in answer to the questions put to them by me, have found that the plaintiffs warranted to the master that they had received orders from the defendant that the ship should proceed to Callao, that the master was induced by such warranty to go to Callao, and that the master acted reasonably in going to Callao without further communication with the defendant. No doubt the defendant has suffered considerable loss by the mistake in the telegram, and the question I am to decide is whether in the circumstances the plaintiffs can be made liable for the loss. There is no evidence of any negligence on the part of the plaintiffs. Had the telegram been delivered as they despatched it no difficulty would have arisen, but it is sought to make the plaintiffs liable on the ground that the letter of the 18th Nov. amounts to a warranty, on which the defendant can sue. It amounted to a warranty to the master of the ship, but what privity of contract is there between the plaintiffs and defendant? Counsel for the defendant contended that the letter was given to the master as the agent for the owner of the ship, and was intended to operate, and did operate, as a warranty to the owners. But I cannot put that construction upon it. I think that, on the face of it, it appears clearly to be nothing more than a warranty to the master to protect him against his owners, in case it should turn out that the order to go to Callao did not come from his owners. The letter, I think, only amounts to this: You, the master, entertain a doubt whether the orders we, the merchants, have received came from your owners, we warrant that they do; if you act upon these orders, we agree to protect you against any loss you may sustain by so doing. I am of opinion that the master is the only person who can sue upon that letter.

(a) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Then it was said, but if the master could sue, why are the owners to go through the idle form of bringing an action against him, and then leaving him to sue the plaintiffs? But, on the facts, I am not satisfied that the defendant could recover against the master the loss caused by reason of the vessel being taken to Callao instead of Rangoon. The duty of a master of a ship is to use all reasonable diligence in the management of the ship under his charge. In a foreign port he must often be placed in circumstances of difficulty, and all that can be required of him is that he should act with reasonable care and prudence. The jury have found that the master in the emergency in which he was placed acted as a reasonable man would have acted. I cannot, therefore, see that any action for breach of duty can be maintained against him, and therefore the argument founded upon the inconvenience arising from multiplicity of actions does not arise. There was another point raised by Mr. Bigham which demands consideration. He said that the plaintiffs had undertaken, without any authority from the defendant, the owner, to give orders as to the destination of the ship. That, he said, amounted to an exercise of dominion over the ship, and that the plaintiffs, by giving orders, had made the master their agent, and so have become answerable for his acts. I cannot assent to the proposition that the plaintiffs exercised any dominion over the ship, or made the master their agent. They gave him a message which turned out to be a mistaken message, but he was free to act upon it or not. The whole conduct of the parties shows that the plaintiffs considered the master as the ship owner's agent, and intended that he should act only upon orders given by the owner. It may be, on the authority of Firbank's Executors v. Humphreys (56 L. T. Rep. 36; 18 Q. B. Div. 54), which was cited by Mr. Bigham, that, even if the plaintiffs had not given any express warranty to the master, an implied warranty would have arisen from the circumstance that they induced him to act upon an assertion which is not true in fact. But the defendant was not induced to do anything by reason of the representation made by the plaintiffs, and I do not think that any implied warranty to defendant can be said to arise from the statement made in good faith by the plaintiffs to the defendant's master. I must hold that the counter-claim cannot be maintained. I give judgment for the plaintiffs on the claim and counter-claim.

Judgment for the plaintiffs on the claim and counter-claim.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Hollams, Son, Coward, and Hawskley.

Solicitors for the defendant, Lowless and Co.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Nov. 6 and 7, 1894.

(Before the President (Sir Francis Jeune) and Bruce, J.)

THE ARGO. (a)

Practice—Salvage—Affidavit of value—Admission of evidence as to value—County Court Rules 1892 (Order XXXIX. b.), rr. 95, 96, 97.

Where in an action for salvage in the County Court the plaintiff, having failed to demand an appraisement, disputes the value of the res as stated in the defendant's affidavit of value, and tenders evidence as to the value, it is for the judge to exercise his discretion as to the admission or non-admission of such evidence.

By rules 96 and 97 of the County Court Rules the value of the res in a salvage action ought, as a general rule, to be proved by affidavit or appraisement, and not by evidence at the trial, though, semble, there may be exceptions to this rule.

This was an appeal by the defendants in a salvage action from a decision of the judge of the Hull County Court. The plaintiffs, the owners, master and crew of the steam trawler Retriever, claimed 150*l.* for salvage services performed by them to the smack Argo, her cargo and freight. The Argo was not arrested. The defendants paid 75*l.* into court in settlement of the claim, and filed an affidavit stating the value of the Argo in her damaged condition at not exceeding 140*l.*, and the price realised by the sale of her cargo of fish at 42*l.* 15*s.* The plaintiffs wrote declining to accept the affidavit as to value, and the defendants thereupon wrote asking them to give notice if there was any intention to dispute the estimate at the trial. At the trial the plaintiffs tendered evidence as to the value of the Argo. The defendants objected, but the judge held that, subject to granting an adjournment if required, he was bound to let in the evidence, on the ground that the jurisdiction of the County Courts was a mere creation of Acts of Parliament and orders, and had no inherent rights of its own as to procedure like those attaching to the proceedings in the High Court, and the words of rule 96 of the County Court Rules 1892 (Order XXXIX. b) were in his opinion solely connected with the question of arrest, and as the rule did not say in positive words that the County Court judge was not to let in further evidence at the hearing, he felt bound to admit it. The judge decided that the value of the vessel and the fish salved was 320*l.*, and awarded the plaintiffs an eighth for salvage services, and added 40*l.* for loss of fish through absence from the fishing ground, making 80*l.* in all; the 80*l.* to include the 75*l.* in court, and allowed costs.

(a) Reported by Butler Aspinall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants appealed.

The County Court Rules 1892 provide:

Rule 95. Where in an Admiralty action the amount sued for is paid into court, together with costs, or the security completed, or the plaintiff requires it, the registrar shall deliver to the party applying for the same an order directed to the high bailiff of the court, authorising and directing him, upon payment of all costs, charges, and expenses, attending the custody of the property, to release it forthwith.

Rule 96. Notwithstanding the last preceding rule, the property in an Admiralty action for salvage shall not be released, except with the consent of the plaintiff, until its value has been agreed or an affidavit of value filed on behalf of the party seeking the release, unless the court or the judge shall otherwise order.

Rule 97. If the plaintiff is dissatisfied with the value mentioned in the affidavit filed under the preceding rule he shall be entitled to have the value ascertained by appraisement, and for such purpose shall file a præcipe. The costs of such appraisement shall be in the discretion of the court.

Sir Walter Phillimore (Nelson with him), for the defendant, in support of the appeal.—No appraisement was sought for, and it was not competent for the judge to receive evidence as to value in the face of the affidavit. The doctrine of appraisement has latterly been most strictly adhered to, and we submit the rule now is that a salvor dissatisfied with the affidavit must in all cases seek for an appraisement. The new rules of 1892 were intended to meet the case, which the old rules did not do. The tender was adequate, the judge should not have awarded costs:

The Lotus, 47 L. T. Rep. 447; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 595; 7 P. Div. 199;
The Emu, 1 W. Rob. 15.

Butler Aspinall for the respondents.—The County Court Rules do not apply to the question of how the value of the salved property is to be determined for the purpose of estimating the mount of the award. Order XXXIX. b, is confined to cases of arrest, and release upon adequate bail being given. The rules under consideration are grouped together under the heading of "Release of Property," and rule 96 in express terms refers to release. This ship never was arrested. The mere fact that the High Court sees fit to adopt a practice of proving values by affidavit or appraisement, is no ground for saying that the County Court must follow the same practice. The value is an important issue in the action, and the court may inform itself how it pleases. The ordinary way of proving facts is by vivâ voce evidence. Even assuming the court should think the rules to apply, all that is said is that a plaintiff may ask for appraisement. It merely gives him a right, and if he does not avail himself of it, the court is not fettered as to how it shall be informed of the value of the salved property. In this particular case no injustice was done the defendants. They were offered an adjournment, but elected to go on and offer evidence. The judge, having heard their evidence, has not believed it.

The PRESIDENT.—In this case the sum of 75*l.* was tendered and paid into court, and there was an affidavit as to the value of the vessel, fixing her value at 140*l.* No agreement was come to as to the value, and no appraisement was asked for by the plaintiffs; but it would seem from the notes of the learned judge that after a time, on the 22nd Nov., the solicitors for the plaintiffs wrote to say that the defendants could not expect them to accept the affidavit of value. To this the defendants replied, "If you intend to dispute the affidavit of value we must ask you to give notice, so that we may be ready at the trial." I think the result really was that no formal notice, at any rate, was given; but, when the trial came on, evidence was tendered to show a value greater than the value in the affidavit. The learned judge considered whether or not he ought to receive the evidence, and he held undoubtedly that he was bound to receive it. He heard it, and came to a conclusion which put the value of the vessel considerably higher than 140*l.* The rules which apply to this case are 95, 96, and 97, of the County Court Rules 1892. [The learned Judge read these rules and proceeded:] I do not think it necessary to compare these rules with the earlier rules. I agree that the main difference is the addition of rule 97, which made it absolutely clear that the plaintiff had the right of appraisement if he was dissatisfied with the value in the affidavit. Nor do I think it necessary to compare these rules with the rules of the High Court, because the rule of the High Court is not a perfect expression of the law on the subject, since it is intended to apply to the well-known practice of the High Court. These rules stand as the code under which the County Court is to be governed. It is contended by Mr. Butler Aspinall—and in doing so he followed the view which presented itself favourably to the learned judge—that those words of rule 96 were connected solely with the subject of arrest. I am unable to agree with that view. They refer to arrest in a certain sense, that is to say, that notwithstanding the release as provided for under rule 95, in one case the release is not to take place until the value has been agreed upon, or an affidavit of values filed. In that sense the rule is connected with release, but it appears to me clear that the power and effect of the rule is not exhausted, or intended to be exhausted, merely in reference to the release. To my mind it points clearly to another effect of the rule, viz., its effect in providing something which shall be of value at a subsequent period, namely, at the trial. It is quite clear that in one case, salvage, which is the one case where it is very important to have the value, notwithstanding that the full amount may be paid into court and security for costs given, it is provided that release shall not be allowed until the value has been determined by affidavit, by agreement, or by appraisement. Now why is that provision made? Clearly, it seems to me, for the purpose of determining what the value of the res is to be taken to be at the trial. Having got so far, it appears to me clear that a plaintiff who is dissatisfied with the affidavit, ought to demand an appraisement. It appears to me clear that in every ordinary case—I do not quite like to go so far as to say in every case—the judge ought to insist upon the value being determined either by affidavit if uncontested, or by appraisement if contested. I do not go so far as to say that the judge is bound, because there may be circumstances in which the court has power to go beyond an appraisement, or even where there is no appraisement, to try the value of the res. I am not saying that no such case is possible, but the rules appear clearly to me to point to a regular course to be pursued, and it appears to me a very wise provision which insists as a regular practice that there shall be in case of dispute an appraisement. It is obvious that not only is that following as closely as possible what is the practice in the High Court, but I think it is extremely important that the value of the res shall be determined at the moment when it may best be determined, and in a way which is economical, rather than be left to the disputed evidence of experts at the trial. I think, therefore, that the rules point to the course which ought to be followed in, I think I may say, practically every case.

Now what has happened in this case? The learned judge's view, as expressed in the judgment he has delivered, clearly was that he was bound to take the evidence; and, as I have said before, his reason was that he thought rule 96 was solely connected with release. I am bound to say that the learned judge was mistaken in that course. So far from being bound to accept the evidence, it is a question whether or no, in the circumstances, he ought not to have refused the evidence. For this purpose I think it is sufficient to say that the learned judge clearly did not exercise the discretion which he ought to have exercised as to whether, in the particular case, he ought not to have held the plaintiff by the affidavit. The learned judge did not exercise that discretion, and therefore I think we are bound to consider the matter, and to exercise the discretion which he should have exercised. Exercising that discretion in all the circumstances of the case, it seems to me clear that the evidence ought not to have been gone into. The learned judge ought to have said that the rules gave ample opportunity to the plaintiff of challenging the affidavit if he chose; that he had not chosen to avail himself of those rules; that, under the circumstances, no injustice would be done by holding him bound by the affidavit; and that, on the contrary, injustice would be done to the defendant by taking the evidence. Therefore, I think, he ought to have held the affidavit conclusive evidence. The learned judge did not do so. He went into the evidence. That raises another question. Assuming that the judge was right in going into that evidence, ought one to say that his conclusion was not right? I would observe that the only evidence given by the plaintiff was the evidence of a person interested; and the evidence on the other side was the evidence of several witnesses, one at least of whom was disinterested, and another connected with the insurance. I am quite unable to come to the conclusion that the learned judge was right in taking the higher value, and if it were necessary, I shou'd be prepared to say that the value of the affidavit was really the value. On that ground, therefore, I should be prepared to say that the value taken by the learned judge was too high. There are thus two grounds: first, that the learned judge ought to have held the plaintiff bound by the affidavit; and, secondly, that on the evidence taken, the value was put too high by the learned judge. I think the proper value on which the salvage award should be based ought to be taken to be about that given in the affidavit. The result obviously is, that inasmuch as the learned judge, in taking the higher value, thought that 80*l.* was the proper amount to be awarded, if he had considered that the true value of the vessel was only 140*l.* he would, beyond all question, have deemed 75*l.* sufficient. Therefore I think that was sufficient, and under those circumstances the decision of the learned judge must be varied by declaring that the amount of the salvage award does not exceed the amount tendered.

BRUCE, J. concurred.

Sir Walter Phillimore applied for costs.

The PRESIDENT.—I think you should have all costs after the date of tender.

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal refused.

Solicitors for the appellants, Pritchard and Son, for A. M. Jackson and Co., Hull.

Solicitor for the respondents, F. W. Hill, for Laverack and Son, Hull.

Oct. 30 and Nov. 13, 1894.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. Jeune.)

THE BONA. (a)

Marine insurance — General average — Stranded vessel—Extraordinary use of engines—Contribution for extra coal consumed.

A steamship, whose hull and machinery were insured by a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiffs, her owners, with the defendants, ran aground, and was eventually got off by means of her engines and by lightening the ship. On the question as to whether the defendants were liable to contribute pro rata in general average in respect of the coal so consumed:

Held, that, as there had been an abnormal use of the engines which constituted a general average act, there must be contribution for the coal used.

HEARING of a point of law on an agreed statement of facts.

The plaintiffs were the English and American Shipping Company Limited, owners of the steamship Bona, and the defendants were the Indemnity Mutual Marine Insurance Company Limited.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By a policy of insurance, dated the 4th March 1892, effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants, the latter insured the hull and machinery, &c., of the Bona, valued at 25,000*l.*, in the sum of 3000*l.* against the ordinary marine risks for twelve months from the 9th March 1892.

On the 11th Jan. 1893, whilst the Bona was on a voyage from Galveston to Liverpool with a cargo of cotton and flour in bags, under a bill of lading dated the 7th Jan. 1893, she stranded upon Galveston Bar, from no fault of those on board, and so remained until the 14th Jan., exposed to the action of strong currents. Owing to the state of the wind and sea she strained, vibrated heavily from time to time, and repeatedly struck the ground with great force, causing her iron decks to work and undulate. During the worst of the weather, between the 11th and 14th Jan., seas swept right over the decks, so that the vessel was in a position of considerable risk and danger.

While the Bona lay stranded on the Bar her engines were from time to time properly employed in the attempt to get her off into deeper water. With this end in view the engines were worked ahead and astern as required, steam being constantly maintained, and in consequence the engines were put to unusual strain, and a considerable amount of damage was sustained. By means of the engines and by means of a considerable lightening of the vessel she came off about mid-day on the 14th Jan., and was subsequently anchored in Bolmer Roads, Galveston, and there surveyed. She afterwards proceeded to Liverpool and was there repaired.

The repairs to the Bona's hull were effected at a cost of 2878*l.* 8*s* .3*d.*, and the repairs to the engines and machinery at a cost of 356*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.*, as appeared in an average statement by Mr. F. C. Danson, dated the 7th July 1893. The defendants paid their proportions of these amounts in particular and general average as assessed in that statement. The damage sustained by the engines and machinery was apportioned as follows: General average 273*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*, and ship 82*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.*, and the defendants paid their proportions of these several amounts. They did not, however, admit that the working of the engines under the circumstances above stated was a general average act.

About fifty-two tons of coal were burnt in working the engines during the time they were being used in getting the vessel off the ground, and the value of the coal was agreed at 390 dollars.

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that the damage sustained by the engines was a general average loss, and that the value of the coal burnt as above mentioned should on the same principle be contributed to in general average. The defendants contended that the value of the coal was not a subject for general average contribution.

The case now came before the court on the above agreed facts for determination as to whether the defendants were liable to contribute pro ratâ in general average in respect of the value of the fifty-two tons of coal. The policy of insurance, the bill of lading, and the average statement formed part of the case. A copy of the York Antwerp Rules 1890 was also included, but the plaintiffs did not admit that they were either relevant or material.

Rules 7, 8, and 9 are as follows:—

Damage caused to machinery and boilers of a ship, which is ashore and in a position of peril, endeavouring to refloat, shall be allowed in general average, when shown to have arisen from an actual intention to float the ship for the common safety at the risk of such damage.

When a ship is ashore and, in order to float her, cargo, bunker coals, and ship's stores, or any of them, are discharged, the extra cost of lightening, lighter hire, and reshipping (if incurred), and the loss or damage sustained thereby, shall be admitted as general average.

Cargo, ship's material, and stores, or any of them, necessarily burnt for fuel for the common safety at a time of peril, shall be admitted as general average, when, and only when, an ample supply of fuel has been provided: but the estimated quantity of coals that would have been consumed, calculated at the price current at the ship's last port of departure at the date of her leaving, shall be charged to the shipowner and credited to the general average.

Sir Richard Webster and Holman for the plaintiffs.—The damage to the engines is a general average loss. On the same principle the extra coal burnt should be contributed to in general average. The peril was not an ordinary detention, but a serious danger. Coals put on board to take the vessel to her destination in the ordinary course of navigation are not to be spent in unusual efforts to rescue in a common peril.

Birkley v. Presgrave, 1 East, 220; 6 Rev. Rep. 256.

It is not possible to distinguish between coals put on board for driving at peril and for tackling the ship: (see per Kenyon, C.J., p. 227 East.) [THE PRESIDENT.—Is it using the engines in a way in which it is not intended that they should be used, or using them to an extent and subject to a strain, which is unusual?] It is the first. The engines are meant to be used while the ship is afloat, and not in a place where the propeller might be broken. It is the exact parallel of the hawser in Birkley v. Presgrave (ubi sup.). Lord Blackburn's judgment in Wilson v. The Bank of Victoria (16 L. T. Rep. 9; L. Rep. 2 Q.B. 203) recognises the principle in that case. In Harrison v. The Bank of Australasia (25 L. T. Rep. 944; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 198; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 79), although the judges differed, the grounds on which they differed in no way affect our contention. If we are not right the shipowner would be bound to provide enough coal to drive the ship if she runs aground. They also referred to

Robinson v. Price, 36 L. T. Rep. 354; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 407; 2 Q.B. Div. 295;
Lowndes on General Average, 5th edit. p. 95;
Parsons' Marine Insurance, 1868, p. 318.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Carver for the defendants.—The price of these coals should not be allowed as general average. The case is not governed by any authority, and so first principles must be relied on. It is submitted that in a case of general average there must be peril, an intentional sacrifice, and that sacrifice must be extraordinary in kind and for the benefit of all interests. If the damage to the engines is not a general average sacrifice, then the cost of the coals cannot be. Mere exposure of ship's materials to danger has never been held to be a general average sacrifice. They are intended to be exposed to extraordinary risks at sea. We do not mean an actual and direct sacrifice. [THE PRESIDENT.—

That is rather a fine distinction, and is not really the test. There is, however, a distinction between using a thing in a natural and in an unnatural way.] The sacrifice must be extraordinary: (see Birkley v. Presgrave (ubi sup.) and Lord Blackburn in Wilson v. The Bank of Victoria, at p. 213 Q. B.) In the former case the cutting of the cable was in itself an extraordinary thing. [The PRESIDENT.—The distinction there is between natural and unnatural use.] If a vessel was driving on to a lee shore and a sail was exposed to almost certain destruction in order to get her off, that would not be a general average loss:

Covington v. Roberts, 2 Bos. & Pull. N. R. 378; Power v. Whitmore, 4 M. & S. 341.

Then as to the engines, there was no extraordinary use. If the vessel strands the master is entitled to use them to get her off. If the engines were not damaged in getting her off, then the cost of the coals is not general average. [The PRESIDENT.—The use of the coal is inevitable, and is part of the sacrifice if there was one.] They also referred to Taylor v. Curtis, 6 Taunt. 608.

Sir Richard Webster in reply.—The master is not bound to work the engines at the expense of the ship. It is not because the accident occurs in the course of ordinary user that general average arises. In Covington v. Roberts (ubi sup.) the press of sail was a common sea risk. The coals are à fortiori. They might have been jettisoned to lighten the vessel. They cannot be employed in this way without the sacrifice. It is the voluntary act of using part of the equipment of the ship, and consequently the coal, in an extraordinary way which differentiates this case:

Attwood v. Sellar, 42 L. T. Rep. 644; 4 ASP. Mar. Law Cas. 283; 5 Q. B. Div. 286.

Judgment was reserved and delivered on the 13th Nov.

The PRESIDENT.—In this case the question which I have to decide is whether the coal consumed to work the engines which were used while the Bona was on Galveston Bar is the subject of general average contribution. The cost of repairs to the engines rendered necessary by their being strained by such use has been allowed in the average statement; and, having regard to the express provision of the York-Antwerp rules of 1890 on this subject, and to the reference made to such rules in the policy and bills of lading, probably the cost of these repairs could not be excluded from general average in the present instance. But I understand that the parties do not desire that this inclusion of the expenditure on the engines should be held to conclude the question of the coal; and, in any case, it seems to me that the question whether the cost of the coal is to be treated as general average depends on the principles on which the cost of repairs to the engines is held, if it be held, to be the subject of general average. It is necessary, therefore, to consider the principle by which a claim to treat damage to engines caused by their use in the attempt to relieve the position of a stranded vessel as general average is to be tested. The question as one of English law appears to me to be governed by decided cases, and therefore it is not necessary to refer to the earlier authorities, to foreign law, or to the views of text writers. Two of the elements of general average, a common peril and an act done for the common advantage of the adventure, were beyond question present in this case. The third element which is necessary is that of sacrifice—a term which implies that voluntary, or intentional, character in the act which has been held to be essential. Where it is part of the cargo which has been dealt with while a vessel is at sea for the general advantage, no question is likely to arise on the point of sacrifice. The destruction, or abandonment, or employment for some purpose connected with the navigation of the ship, or any part of the cargo at once impresses the act with the needful characteristic of a sacrifice. But where the subject is part of the ship's equipment it is more difficult to determine whether the act does or does not give rise to general average. There are cases, such as the cutting away of a mast, where it is clear that there is a destruction of part of the ship's equipment for the common advantage. The question in such a case is, whether the loss incurred was unavoidable, then or soon thereafter; or whether it was so far avoidable that it was accepted in order to save the ship and cargo, and so became a sacrifice. (See Shepherd v. Kottgen, 37 L. T. Rep. 618; 3 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 544; 2 C. P. Div., 585.) But there are cases when the advantage is gained, not by destruction or abandonment, but by the employment of part of the ship's material. What is the test in that case? It is, I think, whether the employment is in its nature of an ordinary or extraordinary kind; and we must observe that, though that course will be a use of the ship's equipment extraordinary in its nature under ordinary circumstances, there may be a use ordinary in its nature under extraordinary circumstances. The terms use or misuse of the ship's equipment have been employed to express such an abnormal or unnatural use as gives rise to an average act. In the well-known instance quoted by Abbott from Emerigon, of a boat sent adrift with a lantern on a mast in order to mislead a pursuing enemy, we have a simple case of misuse of part of the equipment of a ship, which gave rise to general contribution. In Birkley v. Presgrave (ubi sup.) we find the same principles applied in circumstances more nearly akin to the present. There, in order to secure a ship to a pier when it was all important to do so instantly, not only were the ship's hawser and towing line employed, but the cable on the lower anchors was cut and used for the purpose. It was held that a claim for contribution did not arise in respect of the hawser and towing line, because they were used only for the ordinary purposes of such articles, but did arise in respect of the anchor cable, because it was cut from its anchor and employed for a purpose for which it was not intended. "All these articles," Lord Kenyon said (1 East. 227) "which are made use of by the master and crew upon the particular emergency and are by the ordinary course for the benefit of the whole concern, must be paid proportionally as general average." It is clear that by the words out of "the" ordinary course Lord Kenyon meant out of "their" ordinary course—that is to say, in a manner unnatural for them, and, so read, the words of his Lordship appear to me to express the test necessary for the decision of the question which I am now considering. I think that Mansfield, C.J. in Covington v.

Roberts (ubi sup.), summed up the view taken in Birkley v. Presgrave by saying that in that case the cable was sacrificed. The case of Harrison v. Bank of Australasia (ubi sup.) and that of Robinson v. Price (ubi sup.) afford illustrations of the above principle. In the former of these cases ship spars and wood, part of the ship's stores, were used as fuel for the donkey engine engaged in pumping the ship. The court was equally divided on the question at issue, because, while it appeared to Kelly, C.B., and Bramwell, B., that the fact showed an imminent peril requiring the sacrifice of the spars and wood, Martin and Cleasby, BB., were of a different opinion on this point. I think it must be admitted that the reasoning of Cleasby, B., negatives the right to general contribution, even if a reasonable supply of coals for the donkey engine had been provided; but the judgments, not only of Kelly, C.B. and Bramwell, B., but also, apart from the question of imminency of the peril, I think that of Martin, B., admits the right to general average contribution. In Robinson v. Price ship's spars and wood, part of the cargo, were used for the donkey engine in circumstances of imminent peril, and, when it was made clear that there had been a reasonable supply of coal for the donkey engine on board, the Court (Mellor and Lush, JJ.) held that the consumption both of ship spars and the part of the cargo was to be contributed for as general average. The diversion of the ship's spars from their proper object would appear to have constituted the sacrifice in both these cases. On the other hand, the authorities are clear that when the equipment of the ship is employed for its ordinary purposes, though it may be under circumstances imposing unusual demands upon it, there is no sacrifice and no right to general contribution. In Covington v. Roberts (ubi sup.) injury done to a ship and her mainmast in carrying press of sale to escape from a privateer was held not to be a subject of general average, on the ground that there was no sacrifice, but only a common sea risk. The circumstances were extraordinary, but the use of ship and mast was not. In Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141), on a similar principle, a claim of general average was refused in respect of damage to the ship and tackle caused by standing out to sea in tempestuous weather, when press of sale was necessary in order to avoid an impending peril of being driven on shore. Lord Ellenborough distinguished the case from that of Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482), where a master cut away his rigging to preserve the ship, and, on the ground that "general average must lay its foundation in a sacrifice of part for the sake of the rest," said that the damage incurred while standing out to sea was not an object of contribution. Taylor v. Curtis (ubi sup.), where a claim for contribution in respect of ammunition expended and wounds of seamen incurred in a conflict was rejected, is another illustration of the same principle. The Court held that "no particular part of the property was voluntarily sacrificed for the protection of the rest." The consumption of ammunition is the result of the natural use of guns, and wounds to combatants are the natural result of a combat.

In the present case I think that there was a sacrifice of the engines within the principles above indicated. In the framing of the York-Antwerp rules of 1890. it was made a condition that the damage to them must be shown to have arisen from an actual intention to float the ship for the common safety at the risk of such damage. The engines were worked ahead and astern—no doubt to prevent the vessel from settling in the sand—and were used when the vessel was stranded in order to force her off. This was not an ordinary or natural use of the engines. I do not, of course, say that using the engines of a vessel when just touching ground would lay the foundation for a claim for general average. That would not be an abnormal employment of the vessel's steam powers: but that is not the present case. In the above view, it seems to me to follow that the coal consumed in working the engines while the vessel was stranded should be the subject of contribution. Such a use of the coal was abnormal, just as the working of the engines was abnormal. If the claim for damage to the engines were based on their being used with a pressure of steam, or a number of revolutions unusual in character, it might be that such claim could extend only to a portion of the coal expended. But then the use of the engines at all was, under the circumstances in which they were used, extraordinary, and constituted a general average act; and, if that be so, it is, I think, clear, and indeed was conceded in argument, that there must be contribution for the coal consumed. The case of Wilson v. Bank of Australasia (ubi sup.) may be referred to as showing that the cost of coal consumed depends on the nature of the use to which the engines driven by its consumption are applied. In that case it was held that the freighters had a right, without contribution, to the services of the auxiliary screw, and therefore to disbursements required to provide the necessary fuel, on the ground that the expenditure in respect of which contribution is claimable must not "only be extraordinary in amount, but incurred to procure some service extraordinary in its nature." Here the service which the coal was expended to provide was extraordinary in its nature. I am of opinion, therefore, that there must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors: for the plaintiffs, Downing, Holman, and Co.; for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Nov. 10 and Dec. 4, 1894.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir Francis Jeune) and BRUCE, J.)

KELLY AND HARDY v. THE ISLE OF MAN STEAM PACKET COMPANY LIMITED. THE TYNWALD. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE LIVERPOOL COUNTY COURT.

Practice — County Court — Collision — Mode of trial—Jury or assessors—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, ss. 10, 11, 34—County Courts Act 1888, s. 101.

In an Admiralty cause of collision in a County Court, where one party asks for a jury and the other demands assessors, the trial must be by judge and assessors.

Semble, in salvage and towage causes the same rule applies.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Per Bruce, J.: Semble, sect. 101 of the County Courts Act 1888 does not apply to Admiralty causes.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action in personam on the Admiralty side of the County Court, from an order of the judge of the Liverpool County Court, on an application to him for directions.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for injuries to their flat Gibson by a collision with the screw-steamer Tynwald on the river Mersey on the 16th Aug. 1894.

The plaintiffs demanded a jury, and the registrar of the court issued a notice of jury. The defendants filed a request that nautical assessors should be summoned.

On an application to the judge for directions as to the mode of trial, the judge said that it appeared to him that, under the Acts, he had no choice in the matter; if a jury was asked for, he was obliged to allow the case to be tried by a jury. The fact that nautical assessors had been summoned did not exclude a jury. He made no order except that the costs of the application should be costs in the action, and gave leave to the defendants to appeal.

The defendants appealed.

The following Acts of Parliament were referred to in argument: County Courts Act 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), s. 70; County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 99), ss. 2 and 7; County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 10, 11, 34, and 35; County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 101, 186, and 188, sub-sect. 3.

Sir Walter Phillimore and A. G. Steel for the appellants.—The County Courts Act 1888 repeals all County Courts Acts except those dealing with Admiralty. They are neither incorporated nor in the schedule of repeal. Therefore the provisions as to assessors in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts are in force. There are two questions in this case. Do assessors exclude juries? If not, which prevails? The first part of sect. 101 of the County Courts Act 1888 is the same as in sect. 70 of the County Courts Act 1846. The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act incorporated the Act of 1846. If there is a right to a jury now, there has been since 1868. In the general orders issued under the Acts of 1868 and 1888 there is no mention of a jury in Admiralty. The words "ordinary civil causes" in sect. 10 of the Act of 1868 would include equity, as County Courts then had equity jurisdiction, and this is why in sect. 101 of the Act of 1888 equity causes or matters are specifically excepted. [BRUCE, J. refers to sects. 2 and 7 of the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act 1865.] At common law there was a jury as of right; at equity only of discretion. The Act of 1868 gives an absolute right to assessors, and the presence of assessors excludes that of a jury. [The PRESIDENT.—By sect. 10 assessors are to assist the judge in the same way as they do the judge in the High Court; how can they do this with a jury? BRUCE, J.—The jury having by their oath to give their verdict according to evidence, would be found to disregard the opinion of the assessors.] The other side will object that the words "all actions" cover this one. But see definition of "action" in sect. 186 of the Act. "Prescribed" there means prescribed by the County Court Rules. Admiralty causes, unlike every other case, begin with a præcipe, then a plaint note, then a summons. Common law actions begin with a plaint:

The Princess Royal, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 27.

There are various County Court Rules all pointing to the tribunal which is to try Admiralty causes being either a judge alone or a judge assisted by assessors.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Horridge for respondents.—The Court of Appeal has just decided that the Act of 1888 applies to Admiralty causes:

The Delano, 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 523; 71 L. T. Rep. 544.

This supports

The Eden, 66 L. T. Rep. 387; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 174; (1892) P. 67;

The Hero, 65 L. T. Rep. 499; 7 Asp. Mar. Law 81; (1891) P. 294.

Where the Act of 1888 does not alter the Act of 1868 the latter stands. [The PRESIDENT.—Is there anything in the County Courts Acts which shows that a judge ever sits with a jury and assessors? The Employers' Liability Act 1880 gives you assessors or jury, but not both. BRUCE, J.—Your argument is that, though there are two kinds of procedure available, still the provision for a jury is to prevail?] Yes. As to the point of convenience, why should not a judge sit with both? The judge in the Admiralty Court finds facts, and has skilled opinion to help him; why cannot the jury find facts? Assesors are merely impartial experts to help the court. By sect. 10 of the Act of 1868 Admiralty causes are to be heard and determined as ordinary civil causes are. Rule 77 of the Rules of 1869 is headed "Common Law Rules." The other side would say that all common law rules apply to Admiralty except this one—of a jury by right. The option of a party asking for a jury must prevail over a party demanding assessors even under the Act of 1868. [BRUCE, J.—Was not the procedure of judge and assessors as opposed to judge and jury a fundamental distinction of Admiralty and common law?] What are regarded as fundamental matters in Admiralty in the High Court are not so in County Courts. Take the case of the arrest of a ship. Again the County Court has no preliminary act and no pleadings. [BRUCE, J.—The reason for limiting the arrest of a ship in County Courts was inconvenience and the absence of necessity for detaining a ship for small claims.] The County Courts and Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, sect. 2, sub-sect. (1) gave County Courts a jurisdiction as to charter-parties and bills of lading, which the Admiralty Court did not possess. The provision for mercantile assessors was meant to give jurisdiction to try business other than that given by the 1868 Act on the Admiralty side. The fact that the court may, at the discretion of the judge, appoint assessors on the application of either party does not take away the right to a jury. If under the Act of 1868 a party's right to a jury is doubtful, under the Act of 1888 it is clear.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 4.—The PRESIDENT.—In this case a question arises as to the mode of trial, in a County Court, of a cause of collision, within the Admiralty jurisdiction of the court. It is whether, where one party asks for a jury and one party asks for assessors, the trial should be by a judge and jury, by a judge and assessors, or by a judge, jury, and assessors. The learned judge of the County Court has decided in favour of the third of these modes of trial, and, accordingly, he has expressed no opinion as between the other two. The question turns on the construction of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act of 1868 and the County Courts Act of 1888. By the former of these Acts jurisdiction was given to the County Courts to try Admiralty causes, and by the 3rd section of the Act claims relating to salvage, towage, necessaries, wages, damage, and collision were enumerated as Admiralty causes. The effects of sects. 10 and 11 of the Act appears to me to be clear, so far as is necessary for the decision of this case. With regard to Admiralty causes other than causes of salvage, towage, or collision, the cause is to be heard and determined in the same manner as ordinary civil causes are heard and determined in County Courts. I do not think it necessary to decide what the phrase "ordinary civil causes" imports. We are dealing with an Admiralty cause of collision, and with regard to Admiralty causes of salvage, towage, or collision the rule appears to me to be clearly laid down by the words of the exception. In these causes, the trial is to be by the judge, unless either party, or the judge, desire there should be assessors, and then it is to be by a judge and assessors. It is clear that the exception in sect. 10 modified any right to a jury which the previous words may be supposed to have given. It could modify such right only in one of two ways—that is to say, by allowing assessors either as an addition to, or in substitution for, a jury. Now, I confess it seems impossible to suppose that it was intended by the words of this exception to introduce into our judicial system trial by a judge plus assessors plus a jury. The words do not appear to be apt for the purpose, because it is the judge who is to be assisted by assessors, and he is to be assisted by them in the same way as the judge of the High Court of Admiralty is assisted by them. But I cannot for a moment suppose that it was intended by this provision to create so novel a tribunal as a judge, jury, and assessors. I am not sure that a jury and assessors are not inconsistent in principle, because assessors exclude expert evidence, at least in the Courts of Admiralty, and a jury is bound to decide according to the evidence, so that they must give a verdict without any evidence on the most material points. The only answer suggested to this is that the advice of the assessors, which the judge would, I suppose, convey to the jury, is evidence; but it is not; it is a substitute for evidence. I am sure, however, that the practical difficulties in trying a cause of collision or salvage with a jury, the sole judge of fact, would be great. I do not say the thing would be impossible, but it implies a novel system of procedure in the conduct of such a trial on which the Act is wholly silent. Trial by assessors has, I think, always been regarded by the Legislature as an alternative of trial by jury. It is so, I think, under sect. 5 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 and under sect. 103 of the County Courts Act of 1888, and it is so, in terms, under the 6th section of the Employers' Liability Act 1880 and the Rules of the Supreme Court: (Order XXXVI., r. 7 (a). It is not worth while to further elaborate this point, because it does not appear that a construction compelling a County Court judge to sit with a jury and assessors in Admiralty causes has ever till this case been placed on the Act of 1868, and, indeed, it was only faintly, if at all, suggested before us that such a construction could be maintained. I think, therefore, that it follows that the exception in sect. 10 enables any party, or the judge, in cases of collision, towage, or salvage, to say that the trial shall be by a judge and assessors; and so the law stood from 1868 to 1888.

But it is said that the language of sect. 101 of the County Courts Act of 1888 gives to either party an absolute right to a jury in all actions other than the Chancery cases, which are specially excepted, and that, therefore, if, on the view above taken, trial by judge, jury, and assessors cannot be supposed to be intended, there must at the demand of a party be trial by judge and jury. I do not think it is possible to say that the term actions, as defined by sect. 186—that is to say, "actions shall include suits, and shall mean every proceeding in the court which may be commenced by plaint"—does not include Admiralty causes. Nor does it appear to me that there are any inferences to be drawn from the rules which really throw light on the matter. It is also an argument of force that the single exception of certain Chancery actions appears to show that the section was intended otherwise to be exhaustive. It is further clear, from the decision of this court in The Eden (ubi sup.) and The Hero (ubi sup.), and from the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in The Delano (ubi sup.), that as regards Admiralty causes the Act of 1868, which is not one of those expressly repealed by the Act of 1888, must be read with it. Must, then, sect. 101 of the Act of 1888 be construed to repeal sect. 10 of the Act of 1868 and to establish a new rule for the trial of Admiralty causes of collision, towage, and salvage? I do not think that it need be so read, and I think that the exception in sect. 10 of the former Act may stand as an exception to the general provision of sect. 101. I agree that this takes from sect. 101 the general application of which the words in themselves are capable. But I think that, on principles similar to those approved by a majority of their Lordships in the House of Lords, in the case of Cox v. Hakes (63 L. T. Rep. 392; 15 App. Cas. 506), especially as stated by Lord Halsbury, a limitation ought to be placed on the generality of the language of sect. 101. In that case, although the words of sect. 19 of the Judicature Act 1873 gave in terms jurisdiction to hear appeals from any judgment or order of the High Court, and also made an exception in certain cases afterwards mentioned, it was held that no appeal lay from an order of the Queen's Bench Division in a matter of habeas corpus. The decision may be stated generally to have proceeded on the nature and history of the writ of habeas corpus, and on this ground, that it could not be supposed that the Legislature intended by general words to alter the previous procedure without more specific provision than is to be found in the Act. On similar principles it appears to me impossible to suppose that the Legislature intended that, whenever any parties so desired, Admiralty causes of collision and salvage in County Courts should be tried by a jury. Such an enactment would have worked a change more complete than I can believe would have been so carried out. It is true that cases of collision between ships have in some cases been tried at common law by juries, and it is also true that there was a power under the Act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65 (though I believe only once employed), to send an issue from the Admiralty Court for trial by a jury, and quite recently my learned brother Barnes, J. tried an Admiralty cause of collision—in which no scientific question was involved, but the whole matter turned on an alleged conspiracy—with a jury. But in the Admiralty Court collision cases have, with this exception, been invariably tried by a judge, and almost invariably by a judge with assessors. It cannot, I think, have been intended at the option of any party to a cause, not only to bring in a jury, but also (if I am right in thinking assessors and jury incompatible) to oust the assessors, and thus provide for trial of Admiralty collision cases in the County Court in a manner wholly different from that in force in the High Court of Justice. The difficulty appears to me to be greater still as regards salvage cases. An action for salvage services at common law proceeds on a quantum meruit, and I should suppose the compensation would be assessed on the same principles as in any other case of implied contract. But in the Admiralty court salvage services are remunerated on principles of a very special kind, into which considerations of public policy largely enter, and which do not proceed on any such basis as that of contract between the parties. Such principles have never yet, so far as I know, been submitted to a jury, and it would be extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to submit them to that tribunal. It is, perhaps, only another way of expressing the views I have just indicated to say there is something in the subject of certain Admiralty causes within the meaning of the definition clause of the Act of 1888 (sect. 186) repugnant to the inclusion of such causes in the "actions" referred to in sect. 101 of that Act. For these reasons I think that in an Admiralty cause of collision in a County Court, if one party asks for a jury and the other for assessors, the trial must be by judge and assessors. The judgment of the County Court must accordingly be reversed.

BRUCE, J.—I agree with the President, and perhaps I might be content to add nothing to the judgment he has delivered; but, as I have arrived at the same conclusion by a somewhat different method, it is, I think, right that I should state my reasons for concurring in his judgment. In order to arrive at a right conclusion as to the construction of the County Courts Act 1888 we must consider the earlier statutes. The Act of 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) conferring Admiralty jurisdiction on the County Courts enacts, by sect. 10, that "in an Admiralty cause in a County. Court the cause shall be heard and determined in like manner as ordinary civil causes are now heard and determined in County Courts; save and except in any Admiralty cause of salvage, towage, or collision, the County Court judge shall, if he think fit, or on the request of either party to such cause, be assisted by two nautical assessors in the same way as the judge of the High Court of Admiralty is now assisted by nautical assessors." By sect. 34 of the same Act it is enacted that the Act "shall be read as one with so much of the County Courts Act 1846, and the Acts amending or extending the same, as is now in force." Sect. 69 of the County Courts Act 1846 enacts "that the judge of the County Court shall be the sole judge in all actions brought in the said court, and shall determine all questions as well of fact as of law, unless a jury shall be summoned as hereinafter-mentioned." Sect. 70 of the last-mentioned Act enacts "that in all actions where the amount claimed shall exceed five pounds it shall be lawful for the plaintiff or defendant to require a jury to be summoned to try the said action; and in all actions where the amount claimed shall not exceed five pounds it shall be lawful for the judge, in his discretion, on the application of either of the parties, to order that such action be tried by a jury." The County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 99) conferred on the County Courts a limited equitable jurisdiction, and by that Act the County Courts were given all the powers and authority of the High Court of Chancery in the suits or matters which fell within the equitable jurisdiction so conferred. It followed, therefore, that, as the Court of Chancery had in certain cases the power to summon a jury for the trial of certain matters, the County Court, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, had a similar power; but, as in the Court of Chancery, the usual mode of trial was by the judge alone, so also in equity proceedings in the County Court the usual mode of trial was by the judge alone; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. which in 1868 regulated the proceedings in bankruptcy, conferred by sect. 3 upon the judge of every County Court other than the Metropolitan County Courts the jurisdiction in bankruptcy previously vested in the Commissioners of the District Courts of Bankruptcy, And I cannot find that any provision was in force at the time for the trial of bankruptcy matters by a judge and jury. There was, therefore, vested in the County Courts, at the time of the passing of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, jurisdiction to hear and determine civil causes of various kinds. There can, I think, be no doubt that the phrase "civil causes" is wide enough to comprehend all the various matters included in the jurisdiction of the County Courts. Lord Selborne, C.J., in the case of Green v. Lord Penzance (45 L. T. Rep. at p. 357; 16 App. Cas. at p. 671), says of the word "cause": "It is not a technical word signifying one kind or another; it is causa jurisdictionis, any suit, action, matter, or other similar proceeding competently brought before and litigated in a particular court." What then is the meaning of the provision of sect. 10 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, which enacts that Admiralty causes shall be tried in like manner as ordinary civil causes? It would be, I think, to put a very narrow and strained construction upon the words "ordinary civil causes" to hold that they applied only to common law causes; they obviously, as it seems to me, apply to all the causes or matters over which the judge ordinarily exercised jurisdiction. Then, if these words apply to all classes of causes, in what manner were such causes heard and determined? The "manner" no doubt refers to the procedure of hearing causes in a summary way without pleadings; but I think it also refers to the mode of trial, and, as the mode of trial is now the matter to be determined, we must consider what was the mode of trial common to all classes of cases. The only mode of hearing and determining common to all classes of cases was the hearing and determining by the judge alone. In some common law actions a jury might be demanded by either of the parties, and, in some causes on the equity side, the court in its discretion might order a trial by judge and jury. But, unless special application was made by either party, the judge himself determined all matters brought in the court, and many of the matters brought in the court could not in any case be determined save by the judge alone. I think, therefore, that where in the first part of the section the Legislature referred to the manner in which ordinary civil causes were then heard and determined in County Courts, it meant to refer to the hearing and determining of causes by the judge alone. That was the ordinary manner of trial; it was the method by which many causes could alone be tried, and by which all causes were tried in the absence of any special application by one of the parties.

But, for the purpose of the question now before the court, it is not, I think, necessary to rest alone upon the earlier words of the section. The provision for the judge being assisted by nautical assessors is, as it seems to me, absolutely inconsistent with trial by jury. The section provides that the judge shall, if he think fit, or on the request of either party, be assisted by nautical assessors "in the same way as the judge of the High Court of Admiralty is now assisted by nautical assessors." But, if the judge is not to determine the facts, it is difficult to understand how assessors could assist him; certainly they could not assist him in the same way as assessors assist the judge of the Court of Admiralty. Assessors could not assist him in charging the jury, because the jury can only give their verdict in accordance with the evidence before them, and I apprehend it would be in contravention of their oaths if the jury were to be guided in their verdict by the opinion of the assessors on matters of nautical skill. Questions of nautical skill are matters of fact, not of law, and, if they are to be determined by a jury, are matters upon which the evidence of experts should be received; but, if these questions are to be determined by a jury on the evidence of experts, there can be no advantage in having assessors. According to the practice of the Admiralty Court, where the judge is assisted by assessors, evidence is not admissible on points in which it is the province of the assessors to advise the court: (The Kirby Hall, 48 L. T. Rep. 797; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 90; 8 P. Div. at p. 75.) One of the great advantages of the presence of assessors is the saving of expense and difficulties which almost always arise upon the reception of the conflicting evidence of experts on technical questions. For these reasons I cannot resist the conclusion that the Legislature, when it conferred the right to have in certain Admiralty causes nautical assessors to assist the judge, intended the mode of trial by judge and assessors to exclude the mode of trial by judge and jury. But, apart from these reasons, some of the matters to be tried are from their very nature unsuitable for trial by judge and jury. It is impossible to suppose that the Legislature could have contemplated the trial of a cause of salvage by a judge and jury. What directions would it be possible for the judge to give to the jury as to the principles to guide them in the assessment of the amount of the salvage award? It cannot, I think, be said that the salvage award is to be assessed upon the principle of a quantum meruit, because the causes mentioned in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 are spoken of as "Admiralty causes," and the very title of the Act is "An Act for conferring Admiralty Jurisdiction." The value of the property salved, the nature of the risk incurred, and all the various elements which have been recognised as fit for the consideration of the court in awarding salvage, must be dealt with by the tribunal which is charged with the fixing of the amount of salvage award, and it seems to me to be incredible to suppose that Parliament could have intended to remit such a question to be determined by a jury. The County Courts Jurisdiction Act 1868, s. 26, provided that "an appeal may be made to the High Court of Admiralty of England from a final decree or order of a County Court in an Admiralty cause." This right of appeal, which still exists, is not limited to matters of law, but includes matters of fact. But it would be contrary to all experience and principle to allow an appeal from a finding of a jury on matters of fact. From 1860 down to the passing of the County Courts Act 1888, the practice, so far as I can ascertain, was universal to have Admiralty causes in the County Courts tried before a judge alone, or before a judge assisted by nautical assessors.

The question to be decided is whether the County Courts Act 1888, which is entitled "An Act to consolidate and amend the County Courts Act," operates to abrogate the practice which, founded upon the Act of 1868, regulated up to 1888 the procedure in Admiralty causes. I may observe in passing that I am not prepared to expect in an Act which is substantially a consolidation Act a change of so vital a character as that involved in the substitution of trial by jury in the place of trial by a judge with or without assessors. But the particular provisions of the statute of 1888 demand consideration. The 101st section provides that in all actions where the amount claimed shall exceed 5*l.* it shall be lawful for the plaintiff or defendant to require a jury, unless the action is of the nature of the causes or matters assigned to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice. The word "action" is, by the interpretation or supplementary section (186), to mean "every proceeding in the court which may be commenced as prescribed by plaint." This is, I think, wide enough to include an Admiralty cause. But the supplementary section is introduced by a provision that the words used in the statute shall have the prescribed meaning, unless there is anything in the subject or context repugnant thereto. Is, then, the application of the word "actions" to Admiralty causes in the 101st section repugnant to the subject or context? For the reasons I have already given I think it is. I think, therefore, that the interpretation clause does not apply to extend the word "actions" to Admiralty causes, and that the words in the 101st section of the Act of 1888 have no more application to Admiralty causes than had the same words in the 70th section of the earlier Act of 1846, which has already been referred to. But the same result may, I think, be arrived at in another way. The Act of 1888, by sect. 188, sub-sect. 3, enacts that "any enactment or document referring to any Act or enactment hereby repealed shall be construed to refer to this Act, or to the corresponding enactment to this Act." The 34th section of the Act of 1868 enacts, as before stated, that the Act of 1868 shall be read as one Act with so much of the County Courts Act 1846, and the Acts amending or extending the same. The Act of 1846 and all the Acts amending or extending the same referred to in the Act of 1868, sect. 34, are repealed by the Act of 1888. The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 is therefore to be read as one with the Act of of 1888, and as if the Act of 1888 were referred to in the 34th section of the former Act. We therefore find in the earlier of the two Acts one special provision giving a complete rule as to the manner of hearing and determining "Admiralty causes," and in the later of the two Acts, which is to be read as part of the earlier Act, a general provision as to the mode of trial of "actions." It would, I think, be contrary to all the recognised principles of interpretation to treat the special provisions of the earlier Act as repealed by the general provisions of the later Act incorporated with it. It is to be observed that it is not merely that the two Acts are to be read as one; but the earlier Act, the Act of 1868, is to be read as if it incorporated the later Act of 1888. It would be doing violence to the rules of construction to hold that the provisions of an Act which specially provides for the trial of Admiralty causes by a judge, or by a judge assisted by assessors, are to be overruled, and, in many cases, rendered nugatory, by a general enactment, contained in the same Act, providing for the trial of "actions" by a judge and jury (see the observations of Lord Selborne, L.C. in Seward v. The Vera Cruz, 52 L. T. Rep. at p. 476; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 389; 10 App. Cas. at p. 68; 54 L. J. Adm. at p. 13), and the remarks of Lord Westbury in Ex parte St. Sepulchre (33 L. J. 372, Ch.) The conclusion at which I have arrived is, I think, not in conflict with the decision of this court and the Court of Appeal in The Delano (ubi sup.). That decision was on sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888. That section took the place of sect. 6 of the County Courts Act 1875. The section was held to apply to appeals in Admiralty: (The Humber, 49 L. T. Rep. 604; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 181; 9 P. Div. 12; 53 L. J. 7, Adm.). It was held that the appeal given by the County Courts Act 1875 might well co-exist with the mode of appeal provided by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, ss. 26 and 27. There was nothing, therefore, inconsistent in holding that the word "actions" in sect. 120 of the Act of 1888 included all those proceedings which were included in the Act of 1875. The decision was in accordance with the established practice and the previous course of legislation.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Pritchard and Sons, agents for Bateson, Warr, and Wimshurst.
Solicitor for the respondents. J. W. Thompson.

Tuesday, Dec. 4, 1894.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. H. Jeune) and BRUCE, J.)

THE ALERT. (a)

County Court — Right of appeal — Collision — Amendment of claim—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 26, 31—County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 87, 120.

There is a right of appeal from a County Court in an interlocutory matter by permission of the County Court judge, although the amount decreed or ordered to be due is under 50*l.*

A County Court judge has power, under sect. 87 of the County Courts Act 1888, to amend a claim in an Admiralty action of collision after the question of liability has been decided, and before the reference.

APPEAL from the Liverpool Court of Passage.

The plaintiffs were the United Steam Tug Company, and the defendants were the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants in the Liverpool Court of Passage for damage sustained by their steam-tug United States by reason of a collision with the defendants' steam tender Alert, on the 13th March 1894, in the river Mersey. The damage was at first supposed to be small, and the plaintiffs claimed 25*l.* The Court found the Alert alone to blame, and referred the question of damages to the registrar.

The United States was afterwards put into dry dock, and further damage was then discovered, which was estimated at 184*l.* The plaintiffs then applied to amend their claim under sect. 87 of the County Courts Act 1888, by substituting 184*l.* for the 25*l.* originally claimed. The County Court judge refused the application on the ground that, granting that he had power to amend the claim, of which he was doubtful, the defendants would be prejudiced by the lapse of time during which the vessel had been running since the collision, and the difficulty of ascertaining whether the damage now discovered was the result of the collision.

Sects. 26 and 31 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 are as follows:

26. An appeal may be made to the High Court of Admiralty of England from a final decree or order of a County Court in any Admiralty cause, and, by permission of the judge of the County Court, from any interlocutory decree or order therein, on security for costs being first given, and subject to such other provisions as general orders shall direct.

31. No appeal shall be allowed unless the amount decreed or ordered to be due exceeds the sum of 50*l.*

Sect. 87 of the County Courts Act 1888 provides that,

The judge may at all times amend all defects and errors in any proceeding in the court, whether there is anything in writing to amend by or not, and whether the defect or error be that of the party applying to amend or not; and all such amendments may be made with or without costs, and upon such terms as the judge may think just; and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made if duly applied for.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By sect. 120:

If any party in any action or matter shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction, decision, or order of the judge may appeal from the same to the High Court, in such manner and subject to such conditions as may be for the time being provided by the rules of the Supreme Court regulating the procedure on appeals from the inferior courts to the High Court; provided always, that there shall be no appeal in any action of contract or tort, other than an action of ejectment or an action in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditament shall have come in question, where the debt or damage claimed does not exceed 20*l.*, nor in any action for the recovery of tenements where the yearly rent or value of the premises does not exceed 20*l.*, nor in proceedings in interpleader where the money claimed or the value of the goods or chattels claimed, or of the proceeds thereof, does not exceed 20*l.*, unless the judge shall think it reasonable and proper that such appeal should be allowed, and shall grant leave to appeal. At the trial or hearing of any action or matter, in which there is a right of appeal, the judge, at the request of either party, shall make a note of any question of law raised at such trial or hearing, and of the facts in evidence in relation thereto, and of his decision thereon, and of his decision in the action or matter.

The plaintiffs appealed by leave of the judge.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Maxwell for the plaintiffs.

Pyke, Q.C. and Squarey, for the defendants, raised a preliminary objection, that since the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Delano (71 L. T. Rep. 544; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 523; (1895) P. 40), there was no appeal, there being no point of law, and the original claim being under 50*l.*:

The Eden, 66 L. T. Rep. 387; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 174; (1892) P. 67;
The Cashmere, 62 L. T. Rep. 814; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; 51 Prob. Div. 121;
The Falcon, 38 L. T. Rep. 294; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 566; 3 Prob. Div. 100.

[The PRESIDENT referred to The Doctor van Thunnen Tellow (20 L. T. Rep. 960; 3 Mar. Law Cas. (O. S.) 244), and The Elizabeth (21 L. T. Rep. 729; 3 Mar. Law Cas. (O. S.) 320; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 33).]

Walton, Q.C.—By sect. 26 of the Act of 1868 there is a right of appeal in interlocutory matters by permission of the judge, and there is nothing in sect. 31 to limit such a right Sect. 31 does not apply to interlocutory appeals. This is a question of law, and therefore there is an appeal under sect. 120 of the Act of 1888:

Annual County Courts Practice, 1894, vol. 1, p. 400;
Meek v. Witherington, 67 L. T. Rep. 122;
Vallentin v. Woodley, 5 T. L. Rep. 462.

The PRESIDENT.—The question appears to me to turn upon the language of sect. 26 of the Act of 1868, which, to use general words, says that in Admiralty causes, and by permission of the judge, there may be an appeal from an interlocutory decree or order. Then, sect. 31 says that no appeal shall be allowed unless the decree or order exceeds the sum of 50*l.* The question is, whether the words of sect. 31 apply to interlocutory appeals. It appears to me that they do not. The Act, as Sir Robert Phillimore says, is not a well-drawn Act. It appears to me impossible to suppose that it was intended that sect. 31 should apply to interlocutory appeals, because it follows that, unless the amount of the decree or order exceeds the sum of 50*l.*, not even by permission of the judge could there be an appeal, and the number of cases in which the interlocutory decree or order would exceed 50*l.* would be exceedingly small. In this view it is not necessary to refer to the Act of 1888. It appears to me clear that, if the view I have taken is right, there is nothing in the Act of 1888 which repeals that power of appeal. I do not wish to say whether the Act of 1888 may not have increased the power of appeal in interlocutory orders, but what appears to me clear is that the Act of 1888 does not limit the right of appeal in interlocutory orders where the permission of the judge has been given.

BRUCE, J.—I concur.

The appeal was then heard.

Walton, Q.C.—In Clarapede and Co. v. Commercial Union Association (32 W. R. 262) Lord Esher laid it down that lapse of time was no reason for not allowing an amendment of particulars:

The Duke of Buccleuch, 67 L. T. Rep. 739; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 294; (1892) P. 201;
The Johannes, 23 L. T. Rep. 26; 3 Mar. Law Cas. (O. S.) 462;
The Dictator, 67 L. T. Rep. 563; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 175; (1892) P. 64.

[He was stopped.]

Pyke, Q.C.—The discretion of the judge was properly exercised:

Reg. v. Judge of the Greenwich County Court, 36 W. R. 668;
Byrd v. Nunn, 37 L. T. Rep. 585; 7 Ch. Div. 284;
Laird v. Briggs, 44 L. T. Rep. 361; 19 Ch. Div. 22;
Edevain v. Cohen, 62 L. T. Rep. 17; 43 Ch. Div. 187;
Steward v. North Metropolitan Tramways Company, 54 L. T. Rep. 35; 16 Q. B. Div. 556; Tildesley v. Harper, 38 L. T. Rep. 60; 10 Ch. Div. 393.

The PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is whether or not an amendment that has the effect of increasing the claim ought to be allowed. The learned judge has decided the matter not on any ground of want of power on his part to make the amendment, but for certain reasons which he has given. At the same time the learned judge seems to hesitate as to whether he had that power. It appears to me absolutely clear that he had. The 87th section of the County Courts Act of 1888 provides that the judge may at all times amend all defects or errors in any proceedings in the courts. It seems to me clear, after the decision in The Dictator (ubi sup.) and other cases that have been cited, that after judgment—that is to say, after the decision of liability, but before the amount of the damages has been assessed—it is not too late to make an amendment in the amount claimed. Then comes the question whether it ought to be allowed or not. The principle upon which amendments of this kind ought or ought not to be allowed seems to me clear from the authorities that have been brought before us. Two propositions appear to me to be well established: First, that although it may be that the plaintiff was lax or forgetful in not putting his pleading in the form in which it should have been originally, if any harm arising from that can be compensated for by costs, there is no reason for not allowing him to repair the error. The second proposition appears to me to be equally clear—viz., that if the judge finds that owing to the mistake, or whatever it may have been, of the plaintiff, in not having put his pleadings right originally, there has been such an injury to the defendant, or such a change in the position of the defendant that he cannot get justice done, then, of course, it is equally clear that such an amendment ought not to be allowed. The cases of Tildesley v. Harper (ubi sup.) and Steward v. North Metropolitan Tramways Company (ubi sup.) appear to me to illustrate those propositions. The question, therefore, in this case is, would the defendant be so prejudiced by this amendment that he would not have justice done? I think the real substance of the objection is that owing to the delay it would become difficult to ascertain fairly what was the amount of damage done to the plaintiffs by the collision; that it would be impossible now to ascertain whether the damage was caused at the time of the collision or not. That is the ground which the learned judge has taken, and which has been argued here. I confess, I think there is no danger of injury to the defendants. It is, I think, quite worth observing that, under Order XIX., which was quoted to us, it is apparently considered sufficient if the details of the claim are filed within seven days after the decision of the liability, or admission of liability, and before the reference. I think that rule shows that it is sufficient if the details are given shortly after the decision of liability. Then, again, as Mr. Walton has pointed out, this action might originally have been brought on the 27th June, when it would seem that these injuries were brought to light. There is only one other observation which I think it necessary to make. Of course I agree that the discretion of the learned judge ought not to be interfered with, except in special circumstances. From the facts the learned judge assumed that it is difficult or impossible to say what the original injuries were. As he had before him no detailed facts whatever, it appears to me impossible to assume one way or another whether there is difficulty in ascertaining the original injuries. I assume that there are cases in which it might be difficult; but it seems to me to be going a great deal too far to say that by reason of a lapse of three months, or something of that sort, there is any such reason to suppose that the defendants would be so prejudiced as to bring the case within the rule which says that if the defendants would be prejudiced the amendment ought not to be allowed. On these grounds, I think, the discretion of the learned judge may in this case be not unfairly dealt with. My feeling about a matter of this kind is very strong, that where you can see your way, without risk of failure of justice, to allow the case to be decided on its full merits, every court of justice is bound to do so. I see no reason why this case should not be heard, and the real merits of it adjudicated upon.

BRUCE, J.—The learned judge, in the first part of his judgment, says he thinks the plaintiffs are not entitled to the consideration of the court. I do not think that the plaintiffs are either entitled or disentitled to the consideration of the court. The plaintiffs, when the damage first occurred, had their vessel surveyed. It does not appear to me that there was anything in the appearance of the vessel to make them suppose that it was necessary that she should be put into dry dock. They made a claim, which seems to have been a moderate claim, for the exact amount of damage that they thought their vessel had sustained. In the old days it was a very common thing to exaggerate the damage and put in a figure very largely in excess of the damage actually sustained, in order to cover contingencies. But because a plaintiff in an Admiralty action does not draw his claim very wide, I do not think that that circumstance ought to disentitle him to the consideration of the court. Then I come to the real ground on which the learned judge seems to have based his decision. He seems to have been of opinion that because of the delay there would be a difficulty in ascertaining the amount of the damage. I cannot myself arrive at that conclusion. If the plaintiffs have sustained damage they ought to be allowed to prove that damage unless some injustice would be done to the defendants. It seems to me that if a difficulty arises in consequence of the delay it would fall on the plaintiffs. It would be more difficult for them to prove their damage if a delay occurred than if the case had been heard immediately after the collision. It is nearly always possible to find out how the damage has been caused. At all events, in a case of this kind proof would rest with the plaintiffs, and any difficulty that might arise in consequence of delay would be on the plaintiffs. I think there would be no difficulty in dealing with the damage, and the plaintiffs therefore should have leave to amend their claim.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Day, Russell, and Co., for C. A. M. Lightbound, Liverpool; Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., for A. T. Squarey, Liverpool.

Dec. 13 and 14, 1894.

(Before BRUCE, J., assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE CITY OF NEWCASTLE. (a)

Salvage—Fire—Services rendered by steamship to vessel lying alongside jetty—Amount of award.

A fire broke out on board a vessel which was lying alongside a jetty at the entrance to a dock. The vessel was under repairs, with no steam up, and had no one but her master and a watchman on board. At the request of the master a steamship, which had just arrived, hove alongside, and, getting her hose on board the burning vessel, extinguished the fire which, if it had remained unchecked, would have caused very serious damage. The services were such as might have been rendered by a fire engine on shore. The value of the salved vessel was 9500*l. The defendants tendered* 200*l.*

The Court upheld the tender, being of opinion that the services were not of such a character as to require that the award should be assessed upon the same liberal principles as obtain in the ordinary cases of sea salvage rendered by one ship to another.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THIS was an action instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Blue Cross, to recover salvage remuneration for services rendered to the steamship City of Newcastle.

On the 5th Aug. 1894 the City of Newcastle, an iron screw-steamship of 1973 tons gross register, was lying in the cutway of the Mount Stuart Dry Dock at Cardiff under repairs. The only persons on board of her were her master and a watchman. At about eight o'clock in the morning the carpenter's shop, in one of the alley-ways on deck, was found to be on fire. The master and the watchman at once commenced to draw water in buckets over the ship's side and pour it on the fire, but their efforts were insufficient to master the flames. A steamship called the Elsie was lying alongside of the City of Newcastle, but she had not got her steam up, and was not able to render any assistance. At this time the Blue Cross, a steamship of 3028 tons gross register, arrived in ballast from Rotterdam and began to heave alongside the Elsie for the purpose of entering the dock. On being hailed by the master of the City of Newcastle to assist, the master of the Blue Cross having hove his vessel alongside the Elsie, set his donkey-engine and pump to work, and attached a hose of about sixty feet in length, which was carried by the third mate and boatswain across the Elsie, and through the ports leading to the part of the City of Newcastle from which smoke was issuing. In about an hour and a half the water from the hose extinguished the fire. The third mate and boatswain of the Blue Cross, who had the management of the hose, got their clothes wet and dirty, and were placed in an uncomfortable position, but the learned judge found that they incurred no risk and no danger.

The plaintiffs alleged that by reason of their services the destruction of, or great loss and damage to, the City of Newcastle were averted, and that, but for the prompt assistance rendered, the fire would have spread, and would probably have burnt out the City of Newcastle and have extended to the Elsie, as there was no other apparatus for extinguishing fire near at hand.

The defendants denied that the fire was a serious one, or that any great damage to the City of Newcastle was averted by the services rendered, and stated that they had communicated by telephone with the chief fire office, and that, in the absence of the Blue Cross, assistance could easily have been procured from there or elsewhere.

The value of the Blue Cross was 30,000*l.*, and that of the City of Newcastle 9500*l.*

The defendants tendered 200*l.* in settlement of the claim.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Temperley for the plaintiffs.—We were practically the only available salvors. The amount tendered is altogether insufficient.

Butler Aspinall for the defendants.—The court ought not in a case like the present to award salvage with the same liberality that obtains in cases of sea salvage, where the property of the salvors is exposed to serious maritime risk. In the present case the services were very analogous to those rendered on land by the fire brigade. The Blue Cross was not only in no danger, but was in no sense used as an instrument to render the services, which in fact consisted only in three men playing a hose on a fire.

BRUCE, J. (having stated the facts) proceeded:—There can be no doubt that the service rendered was an effectual service. If the fire had been unchecked very serious damage would have ensued to the City of Newcastle. The Blue Cross was enabled, by the appliances at her disposal, to render at a critical moment the very service which was wanted. The case does not seem to me to be one of that class in which public policy demands that a most liberal award should be given. The services were such as might well have been rendered by any person on land with a steam fire engine and hose ready at hand; they were such as might have been rendered by a fire brigade. But, at the same time, services were rendered, and for these no doubt an award ought to be made. The sum of 200*l.* has been tendered, and the question for the court to consider is whether that sum is a sufficient reward for the services. Having given the case full consideration, and having had the advantage of considering other cases in this court where similar services have been rendered, and, particularly, having considered the case of the Ethiopia, decided by Butt, J. in May 1883, I come to the conclusion that the tender of 200*l.* is sufficient. The plaintiffs will have their costs up to the date of the tender, and the defendants will have their costs after that date.

Butler Aspinall for the defendants.—We submit that this is a case which should have been brought elsewhere than in the High Court, and in which only costs on the County Court scale should be allowed.

Temperley, contrâ.—In view of the circumstances of the case, and the value of the vessels concerned, the salvors were justified in proceeding in this court. He cited

The Saltburn, 69 L. T. Rep. 88; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 325; (1892) P. 333.

BRUCE.—J.—I think this is a case in which costs should be allowed on the higher scale.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche.
Solicitors for the defendant, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Jan. 26 and Feb. 4, 1895.

(Before BRUCE, J.)

THE WINESTEAD. (a)

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Ship employed in the coasting trade—Port or place in Europe north and east of Brest—Foreign-going ship—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 379—Order in Council, 21*st Dec.* 1871.

A vessel whilst carrying cargo for delivery at a foreign port is not a ship employed in the coasting trade, even though in the course of her voyage to the foreign port she proceeds from one port in the United Kingdom to another to complete her cargo, and is therefore not exempt from compulsory pilotage under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 379, sub-sect. 1.

The word "Europe" in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 379. sub-sect. 3, and in the Order in Council of the 21*st Dec.* 1871, is used in contradistinction to the "United Kingdom," and therefore a vessel trading from London to Cardiff is not a vessel trading to a place in Europe north and east of Brest, and is not exempt from compulsory pilotage under those enactments.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THIS was a collision action in rem, brought by the owners of the barge Annie and her cargo against the owners of the steamship Winestead to recover compensation for damage occasioned by a collision between the two vessels on the 24th June 1894, in Limehouse Reach of the river Thames.

At the time of the collision the Winestead, laden with a part cargo and partly in ballast, was on a voyage from London to Venice viâ Cardiff, where she was going to complete her cargo. The Winestead had paid the light dues payable on a voyage from London to Venice viâ Cardiff, her victualling bill had been examined, and she had cleared foreign for renewal at port of call. No cargo book was kept, and no transire had been obtained as required in the case of vessels engaged in the coasting trade. She was in charge of a duly licensed Trinity House pilot.

The defendants denied that the collision was caused or contributed to by the negligent navigation of the Winestead, but pleaded that, if it was so caused, the Winestead at the time in question was in charge of a duly qualified pilot by compulsion of law, and that the negligence was that of the pilot.

There was no counter-claim.

The case was tried on the 11th, 12th, and 13th Dec. 1894, before Bruce, J., sitting with assessors, when the learned judge found both vessels to blame, and held that the negligence on the Winestead was that of the pilot alone. He reserved the question of compulsory pilotage.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) provides:

Sect. 379. (a) The following ships, when not carrying passengers, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district and in the Trinity House outport districts; (that is to say,) (1) Ships employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom; . . . (3) Ships trading to Boulogne or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne.

By an Order in Council of the 21st Dec. 1871 the following bye-law was approved:

That all ships trading from any port or place in Great Britain, within the London District, or any of the Trinity House Outport Districts to the port of Brest, in France, or any port or place in Europe north and east of Brest, or to the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, or from Brest, or any port or place in Europe north and east of Brest, or from the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, to any port or place in Great Britain within either of the said districts, when not carrying passengers, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage within such districts.

Jan. 26.—Aspinall, Q.C. and Butler Aspinall for the defendants.—The exemption, if any, would be under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 129), ss. 376, 379. The Winestead was not exempt from compulsory pilotage:

The Agricola, 2 W. Rob. 10;
The Lloyds, or Sea Queen, 9 L. T. Rep. 236; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391; 32 L. J. 197, Ad.; Br. & L. 359.

The plaintiffs will rely on Courtney v. Cole (57 L. T. Rep. 409; 6 Asp. Mar. Cas. 169; 19 Q. B. Div. 447) as upsetting The Lloyds: but Courtney v. Cole was a decision of the Divisional Court in a criminal matter, from which there could be no appeal, and, if in conflict with the two cases mentioned, ought not to prevail. Courtney v. Cole is also distinguishable, because it is a decision upon sub-sect. 3 of sect. 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and that sub-section relates only to vessels trading from or to Great Britain from or to ports on the continent of Europe. If it is contended that that case covers vessels trading from one British port to another, it would be in effect a useless repetition of sub-sect. 1 of the same section as to the coasting trade. Nearly all ports in Great Britain are north and east of Brest. "Coasting trade" must be interpreted to mean in the Act either proceeding from one port in Great Britain to another with cargo for delivery at such port, or proceeding from one such port to another such port in ballast for the purpose of loading up for delivery at another port in Great Britain. "Trading" to a port, as illustrated in Lord Esher's judgment in Henderson Brothers v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board (57 L. T. Rep. 173; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 156; 19 Q. B. Div. 123), which judgment was upheld on appeal (59 L. T. L. T. Rep. 697; 6 Asp. Mar Law Cas. 338; 13 App. Cas. 595), implies the delivery of cargo at that port. The use of the word "employed" contemplates a regularity of trade.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Laing for the plaintiffs.—The Winestead on this occasion was engaged in the coasting trade. Secondly, she was a ship trading to a place in Europe north of Boulogne. An order in council must not be used to put a restrictive construction on a statute. In considering the "trading" of a vessel regard must be had to the port whither she is immediately bound, not that of her ultimate destination. In this case the Winestead was trading from London to Cardiff. The decision in Courtney v. Cole (ubi sup.) governs this case. The Winestead was in fact trading to a port in Europe north of Boulogne. If so, she was not compelled to take a pilot. As this vessel was trading from one port of the United Kingdom to another she was in the coasting trade within the meaning of the Customs Laws Consolidation Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36), s. 140. England is in Europe, the word "continent" cannot be read in.

Aspinall in reply.—The Act cited is a Customs Act, and does not apply to pilotage. Under sects. 142-148 regulations are made for the carriage of goods in the coasting trade. None of these regulations were complied with by the Winestead, because she was a foreign-going ship. "Europe" is used in contradistinction to "Great Britain."

Feb. 4.—BRUCE, J.—The Winestead has been held to blame for a collision which occurred in Limehouse Reach, in the river Thames. The court, assisted by Trinity Masters, came to the conclusion that so far as the negligent navigation of the Winestead was concerned the whole blame lay with the pilot, who was a duly qualified pilot and was in charge of the ship at the time of the collision. The question now arises whether the owners of the Winestead are to be relieved of their liability by reason of the employment of the pilot being compulsory upon them. The Winestead is a screw-steamship, of 1673 tons gross register, belonging to the port of Hull, and at the time of the collision she was in the course of a voyage from London to Venice, viâ Cardiff, laden with a general cargo and ballast. For some twelve months before the collision the Winestead had been engaged in trading between London, the Bristol Channel, and Venice. In the ordinary course of her trade she took in a general cargo at London for Venice, and such ballast as was necessary to put her into good trim; she then sailed to Cardiff or some other port in the Bristol Channel, there discharged her ballast only and completed her cargo, and then sailed for Venice. At Venice she discharged her cargo and then returned to London. The Winestead was in the prosecution of a voyage of this character at the time of the collision. Before sailing from London, the vessel paid the light dues payable on a voyage from London to Venice viâ Cardiff, had her victualling bill examined, and obtained a clearance label in London, although in accordance with the terms of the 129th section of the Customs Laws Consolidation Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36), a final clearance label was obtained at Cardiff. The master of the vessel kept no cargo book, and obtained no transire, as required in the case of vessels engaged in the coasting trade, in accordance with the provisions of the last-mentioned statute, sect. 140 and the following sections, as amended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 21), s. 9. The master of the vessel was compelled to employ a pilot by virtue of the 376th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, unless his ship falls within the exemptions contained in sect. 379 of the same statute or of the Order in Council of the 21st Dec. 1871.

(a) Cf. Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 625.

It was contended by Sir Walter Phillimore, who argued the case on behalf of the Winestead, that the ship was a ship employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom and so fell within the first exemption contained in the 379th section above referred to. I think that the ship was employed in trading between London, Cardiff, and Venice, and that she was a foreign-going ship, within the meaning of the interpretation clause (sect. 2) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854; and I do not think that a ship, while she is engaged in foreign trade, in carrying goods which are destined for a foreign port, can be treated as employed in the coasting trade within the meaning of clause 1 of the 379th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The Customs Laws Consolidation Act 1876, s. 142, enacts that no goods shall be carried in any coasting ship, except such as shall be laden to be carried coastwise at some port or place in the United Kingdom, and if any coasting ship shall touch at any place over the sea, unless forced by unavoidable circumstances, the master of such ship shall forfeit 100*l*. It may be said that the Customs Consolidation Acts are not part of the Merchant Shipping Act; that the two series of Acts relate, to a large extent, to the same subject-matter, and I do not think that the Legislature can have contemplated that the phrase "coasting ship" in the Customs Consolidation Act should have had a different meaning from the words "ships employed in the coasting trade," as used in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. I think the words "ships employed in the coasting trade" are used in contradistinction to ships employed in foreign trade; employed in the coasting trade means, I think, employed for the time, at least, only in the coasting trade, and not in foreign trade, and I do not think that a ship which loads cargo at a port in England for a foreign port, and sails with that cargo to a foreign port, can be said to become a coaster during the first stage of her voyage, merely because, in the course of her voyage to a foreign port, she touches at another English port to discharge ballast and take in more cargo for her ultimate destination. But, apart from my own view of the meaning of the statute, I consider I am bound by the decision of Dr. Lushington in The Agricola (ubi sup.) and The Lloyds or Sea Queen (ubi sup.). Those decisions go much beyond the present case. In The Agricola, the ship had made a voyage from Calcutta to London, and she had discharged all her cargo there, and then proceeded from London to Liverpool in ballast. There were, therefore, some grounds for contending that the voyage from London to Liverpool was a new and distinct voyage; yet Dr. Lushington held that the ship, when in the prosecution of the voyage from London to Liverpool was not employed in a coasting voyage, because, in the ordinary course of her trade, she was engaged in trading from Rio de Janeiro and Calcutta and other foreign ports to London and Liverpool. In The Lloyds, the ship was at the time in question, in the course of a voyage from Liverpool to London with a cargo shipped at Liverpool to be delivered in London. Yet, because the ship was ordinarily engaged in foreign trade, Dr. Lushington held that the ship was not employed in the coasting trade. These decisions, one given in the year 1843 and the other in 1863, have never been overruled, and they lay down a principle which far more than covers my decision in the present case. In the present case it is not necessary for me to decide more than this—that a vessel while engaged in carrying cargo destined to a foreign port is not within the words of the exception, "ships employed in the coasting trade," even though she may, in the course of her voyage to the foreign port, proceed from one English port to another. It was said in argument that the decisions of Dr. Lushington in the cases mentioned had been impugned by the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Courtney v. Cole (ubi sup.). But that case was decided upon another exemption, viz., the third exemption contained in the 379th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, as extended by the Order in Council to which I have referred. And both the judges who decided that case are careful to point out that their decision is not in conflict with the decisions of Dr. Lushington in The Agricola and The Lloyds.

Then it was contended that the Winestead, if not within the first exemption, was within the third, and that she was a ship trading to Cardiff, and that Cardiff was a place in Europe north and east of Brest. But, in my opinion, "Europe" is used in the exception in the Merchant Shipping Act in contradistinction to the "United Kingdom." If Europe were used in the third exception as including Great Britain, there would be little meaning in the first exception, because there are few ports in England that are not north and east of Brest. The Order in Council of the 21st Dec. 1871 clearly puts this interpretation upon the statute, because it exempts ships trading from any port in Great Britain to any port in Europe north and east of Brest, and from any port in Europe to any port or place in Great Britain. It may be said that the Order in Council, although it may extend the exemptions in the Merchant Shipping Act, cannot limit them, and that it ought not to be referred to as an authority for placing a limitation upon the words of the exemption in the statute. But, in my view, the Order in Council does not limit the meaning of the words in the Act; I only refer to it as confirming the interpretation which, without the Order in Council, I should have put upon the words of the Act. I have come to the conclusion, for the reasons I have given, that the Winestead was not within any of the exemptions in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and that the employment of a pilot was compulsory upon her master.

Judgment for the defendants without costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Keene, Marsland, Bryden, and Besant.

Solicitors for the defendants, Rollit and Sons.

Tuesday, Feb. 5, 1895.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir Francis Jeune) and BRUCE, J., with TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE FRED. (a)

Practice—Function of assessors—Judgment against opinion of judge—Appeal from County Court—Power of Divisional Court to alter judgment.

In a collision action brought in the County Court the judge formed an opinion on the evidence in favour of the plaintiffs, but the nautical assessors took the view that the plaintiffs' vessel was to blame for a wrong manœuvre. The judge said that he felt bound to act upon the assessors' advice, and gave judgment for the defendants, expressing at the same time his dissent therefrom. The plaintiffs appealed.

Held, that, on these facts, the court had no power to alter the decision of the learned judge.

Semble, the High Court has power in such circumstances to order a new trial.

APPEAL from a decision of the judge of the City of London Court.

The action was brought by Messrs. A. H. Morrison and Co., owners of the dumb barges Eight Brothers and Agnes, for damages arising out of a collision with the sailing barge Fred, belonging to Messrs. Smeed, Dean, and Co. Messrs. Phillips and Graves, owners of the tug Ellen which was towing the Fred, were also added as co-defendants. The damages claimed were less than 50*l.*

The collision occurred on the morning of the 22nd Dec. 1894, off the Victoria Dock entrance, in the river Thames. The barges were being towed up stream by the steam-tug Lion, and the Fred was coming out of the dock entrance in tow of the Ellen.

The action was heard on the 31st Oct. Judgment was reserved, and delivered on the 7th Nov.

Mr. Commissioner KERR.—I took time to consider what should be done in this case of the Fred, because I differed—or rather I cannot say I differed, but I did not form the same opinion upon hearing the case as that which was formed by the nautical assessors. I consider that the tug Lion was not doing anything wrong in rounding under the stern of the vessel which was moored opposite the entrance to the Victoria Dock, and that she adopted a proper course in sailing up, and not only that, but the Fred might have avoided the accident. I thought the evidence was all one way on that point, because the cross-examination of the defendant's witnesses practically confirmed the plaintiffs' case; but, when I consulted the nautical assessors, they advised me that the tug was wrong in rounding under the stern of the steamer which was moored, and that she ought to have gone further out into the river, and have satisfied herself that the way was clear before she went in. Fortunately for the ends of justice I was supplied with nautical assessors, because certainly, if I had heard the case alone, I should have found for the plaintiffs; but the nautical assessors having given me that opinion on a pure question of navigation, so to speak, upon a question which was exclusively for them, I do not see how I can allow any opinion I may have formed upon the evidence to influence me in the judgment. The nautical assessors are given me to advise me on a question of that kind. They have advised me, and I must act upon it. All I can do is to find for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Divisional Court.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Laing, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The judge was bound to give effect to his own view of the facts. If so, the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment. The function of the assessors is limited to advice upon matters of nautical skill:

The Beryl (the Viatka in footnote), 51 L. T. Rep. 554; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 321; 9 P. Div. 137.

Dr. Raikes, Q.C. and Crawford, for the defendants, contrà.—There is no appeal here, the question being one of fact and not of law, and the amount being under 50*l.* The judge has done no more than he was entitled to do. He not only adopted, but acquiesced in the assessors' view. In The Beryl (ubi sup.), the Master of the Rolls said, "The judge is bound to give great weight to the opinion of his assessors."

L. Batten for the Ellen.

The COURT intimated its willingness, if it had the power, to grant a new trial, but this was declined by counsel for the plaintiffs on account of the expense and the small amount in dispute.

The PRESIDENT.—This case is not very easy to deal with. I am afraid that one must deal with it with a feeling that it is impossible that justice can be done, because I confess, I think it is doubtful—even more than doubtful—whether the parties really have had what they were undoubtedly entitled to have, a clear decision of the judge on the points before him, with his mind directed to the material facts. The true way, I think, to obtain justice in this case would have been to have sent it back for reconsideration, that is to say, for a new trial. I think probably, there would have been power for this court to have adopted that course, and I should have been prepared to have adopted it, but for reasons which I can easily appreciate the appellants do not desire that course to be adopted. It is obvious that the expense which might be involved would be altogether incomparable with the comparatively small amount that is depending upon this trial. Under those circumstances one must deal with the matter as it stands. I am afraid there is only one course that it is in our power to take. The learned judge undoubtedly in his form of judgment has given a decision in favour simply of the defendants. He has never been asked to say that the form of judgment was not the judgment that he intended to give, and so it comes to this, that the learned judge did intend to give a judgment simpliciter in favour of the defendants. What does that necessarily involve? One must, of course, give the learned judge credit for finding first that the plaintiffs were to blame; and, secondly, that the defendants were not to blame. Is it possible for us, on the materials before us, and dealing with the matter solely as a question of law, to alter that judgment? One point was suggested, although not, I think, much pressed, which would undoubtedly, if it could have been established, have been a point of law. If it could have been shown that the learned judge took the advice of his assessors, and regarded himself as bound to follow it—I mean bound in law to follow it—although his judgment was the other way—if the learned judge had taken that view with regard to the advice of his assessors, I should have said without hesitation that that was wrong in point of law, because nothing is clearer on the authorities cited than that although a judge, sitting with assessors, is bound to pay the greatest deference to their opinion, he is not necessarily bound to follow their decision. The learned judge in the court below knew that as well as anybody. Not once, but more than once in the course of the case, he says that he was not legally bound to follow their decision. Therefore I have come to the conclusion that the learned judge, knowing that he was not so bound, nevertheless thought the weight of their opinion was so great that he was bound to follow it.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Therefore no point of law arises on that ground. What other point of law is there? It is said that on the findings of fact by the learned judge, the decision ought to have been different from what it was, and if it could be shown that on the findings of fact the decision was not correct, no doubt it would be a question of law. But it is impossible in this case to say that. The view of the learned judge has to be picked up from observations during the trial, and after the judgment had been given. I confess I despair of drawing from these disjecta membra of the decision any clear view as to what the learned judge's decisions on points of fact really were. It has been put from various points of view, but the most striking suggestion was, I thought, that put by Mr. Aspinall and Mr. Laing, that the view of the nautical assessors was really immaterial, because, on the findings of fact, as the judge found them, it was not a question of nautical skill at all, and that even if the Lion was wrong in running under the stern of the steamer as she did, that really had no effect on the collision, because the position of the Ellen was such that she could and ought to have avoided the collision. All that comes back to a question of fact, and I cannot myself suppose—I think I have no right to suppose—that when the learned judge gives a decision in favour of the defendants he does not do it with a consciousness in his mind that he is coming to a certain conclusion on a question of fact. I cannot help thinking that he must have come in his own mind to conclusions on the points of fact which rendered the view of the nautical assessors crucial. It appears to me that there were ample materials of fact on which the learned judge could come to the conclusion to which he did come, and I cannot see anything to show me that there was such a mistake in the law as to say that, on the learned judge's own finding of fact, the judgment should be altered. Therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I consider that trial by judge and assessors is a most valuable and useful mode of trial, but it is important for the maintenance of its usefulness that the decisions of the assessors should be limited. It was never intended that the judge should surrender his judicial decision to the assessors. That has been so clearly laid down in a number of cases that it would seem invidious to refer to them, yet I cannot help referring to some of the cases. In the case of The Alfred (7 Notes of Cases, 354), Dr. Lushington said, "I never yet pronounced a single decree, when I was assisted by Trinity Masters, in which I was not perfectly convinced that the advice they gave me was correct, and if I had entertained a contrary opinion, notwithstanding all their nautical skill and experience, I am clearly of opinion, having deliberated much on that question, that it would be my duty to pronounce such contrary opinion." And again in The Swanland (2 Spink. 107), he said, in his address to the Trinity Masters, "I have not only to state the evidence to you, but whatever decision or opinion you may give to me, to that opinion I must be an assenting party, in order to found a judicial decision thereon." If higher authority were wanted there is the authority of the Privy Council in The Magna Charta (25 L. T. Rep. 512; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 153), in which Sir Joseph Napier, in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "It has been said that there was a difference of opinion between those gentlemen by whom the learned judge of the Admiralty Court was assisted; that they took a different view of the case, and that, when the case was referred to the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, a difference of opinion existed there. It was, however, the duty of the learned judge to decide the case upon his own responsibility. The learned judge has got the responsibility cast upon him of arriving at a judicial conclusion; he is advised and assisted by persons experienced in nautical matters, but that is only for the purpose of giving him the information he desires upon questions of professional skill, and having got that information from those who advise him, he is bound in duty to exercise his own judgment, and it would be an abandonment of his duty if he delegated that duty to the persons who assisted him. The assessors merely furnish the materials for the court to act upon, and, for convenience sake, they are allowed to hear all the evidence. If the learned judge is unable to see what are the grounds upon which they give their opinion and draw their inferences, or assume facts, and if they are other than those to which he gives his assent, he is not at liberty to act upon any inferences which they draw from the evidence, except they accord with those of which he himself approves." The learned judge was bound to exercise his own judgment, and decide the case according to his own view of the facts. The parties were entitled to have his judgment. I doubt very much whether they have got what in the due administration of justice they were entitled to. The learned judge seems to me to have abdicated his position. Nevertheless we cannot, I think, having regard to the limited power which the Legislature has placed in our hands as a Court of Appeal, alter the judgment of the learned judge. He has pronounced judgment for the defendants, and I cannot take upon myself the responsibility of saying that he pronounced judgment the very reverse of what he intended. Therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Devereux and Heiron.

Solicitors for the respondents, owners of the Fred, Farlow and Jackson.

Solicitors for the owners of the Ellen, Pritchard and Sons.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Wednesday, Oct. 31, 1894.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ.)

LYSAGHT v. COLEMAN AND OTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — Cargo — Damage to some of goods insured—Examination of all the goods—Expenses of examining such of the goods as were undamaged—Actual damage—Liability of underwriters.

The plaintiff shipped a number of cases of galvanised iron for carriage from Bristol to London, there to be transshipped by barges to another vessel for export to Australia. The goods were insured for the voyage from Bristol up to and including the transshipment, and by the policy average was agreed to be recoverable on each package separately or on the whole. In a storm upon the insured voyage most of the cases were wetted by salt water, and in London the plaintiff had them all landed and examined. All the cases were unpacked; and those in which the iron was found to be undamaged were repacked and exported, while those in which the iron was damaged were sold by auction.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to be reimbursed by the underwriters only for the loss upon the cases in which the iron had been damaged, and was, therefore, not entitled to the expenses incurred by him in the examination of those cases of iron to which no damage had in fact occurred.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of Wills, J. upon further consideration after the trial of the action with a jury at Bristol.

The action was brought by the assured under a policy of marine insurance to recover from the underwriters the expenses incurred by him in the examination of 391 cases of galvanised iron, part of the cargo of 497 cases, which was the subject-matter of the policy.

The plaintiff shipped the 497 cases on a vessel to be carried from Bristol to London, there to be transshipped by barges into another vessel for export to Australia. The cases were insured for the voyage from Bristol up to and including the transshipment, and by the policy average was "recoverable on each package separately or on the whole." The policy also contained the usual suing and labouring clause.

The ship met with bad weather on the voyage, and most of the cases were wetted with sea water.

The plaintiff, therefore, had all the 497 cases landed at the West India Docks in London for the purpose of examination. He gave notice of this to the underwriters, and they appointed a surveyor to attend it.

The cases were then all unpacked and examined, and it was found that in 106 the iron was damaged, the remaining 391 being undamaged. The examination lasted for two months. Finally the 391 undamaged cases were repacked and exported to Australia, while the 106 damaged cases were sold by auction.

The plaintiff's claim in respect of the 106 damaged cases, namely, the difference between the invoice price and the sale price of this number of cases together with the costs of their sale and a proportion of the expenses of the examination, was paid by the underwriters. The plaintiff now sued for the remaining expenses of the examination, namely a proportionate part of the whole in respect of the 397 undamaged cases.

Wills, J., upon further consideration after the trial, gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Pyke, Q.C. and E. U. Bullen for the plaintiff.—A partial loss has been incurred within the terms of the policy, and the only question is who is to pay for the expenses of finding out what was the partial loss. In Phillips on Insurance, Art. 1791, it is stated that "the charges for ascertaining the amount of the loss should fall upon the party who must have sustained the loss had its amount been ascertained without any expense." By the terms of the policy average is recoverable on the whole, and this distinguishes the case of Cator and others v. The Great Western Insurance Company of New York (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 90; 29 L. T. Rep. 136; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 552), which was decided on the special nature of the policy then in question, which was on each specific parcel. The plaintiff is also entitled to his claim under the suing and labouring clause, because, if the packages had not been opened, they would have deteriorated through being allowed to remain wet with sea water.

Bucknill, Q.C. and English Harrison for the defendants.—The plaintiff has chosen to claim average on each particular package, and therefore cannot claim on packages to which no damage happened. Underwriters are only liable to pay for actual loss on damaged goods. [They were stopped.]

Pyke, Q.C. replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the assured shipped a cargo of cases of galvanised sheet iron to be carried by sea from Bristol to the Thames, where it was to be transshipped by barges from the ship it arrived in into another ship lying in the river for carriage to Australia. He then effected an insurance on the iron for the voyage commencing at Bristol and terminating upon the completion of the transshipment into the ship that was going to carry it to Australia. The ship which carried the iron from Bristol arrived in the Thames; but on her voyage she met with heavy weather so that some at all events of the goods insured suffered damage by sea-water. The assured thereupon became entitled to claim against the underwriters. Now he had insured all the cargo of galvanised iron that was put on to the ship; but the policy contained a provision that average should be recoverable on each package separately or on the whole. The first question that arose was whether the insurance was an insurance of the cargo as a whole or of each package separately. I am inclined to think, though the matter is not material, that it was an insurance on the whole cargo, and not on each package separately. The provision in the policy which I have referred to gives the assured the right of taking the loss on each package without reference to the whole cargo, or on the whole cargo, whichever he liked. Now a loss did in fact take place, and on the arrival of the ship in the Thames, the assured, having taken the goods out of her and put them into barges, thought it right that he should have them examined before being put into the other ship for export. He therefore had them landed at the West India Docks for the sole purpose of having them examined with the view of finding out which of them was damaged and to what extent. He gave notice to the underwriters of what he was doing, and they appointed a surveyor and told the assured he was to do the best he could with the goods. Each separate package was then examined in order to see whether it had been damaged by sea-water and to decide what had better be done with it, if it was damaged. In 106 packages it was found that the iron had been damaged, in the other 391 it was found to be uninjured. The 391 uninjured packages were forwarded to Australia, the 106 damaged ones were sold by auction. The assured then claimed from the underwriters the difference between the original value of the 106 injured packages and the price obtained at the auction, together with the expenses of examining them, and the underwriters paid him this sum.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

But besides this he now claims to be paid the expenses incurred by him in having the undamaged packages examined. That claim must be put forward either in respect of the damaged goods or else of the undamaged goods. It cannot be put forward in respect of the damaged goods, because he cannot have suffered any loss in respect of them further than that which the underwriters have paid for. But if the claim was made in respect of damage to the undamaged goods, the assured can only mean that their market value was injured by reason of the damage to the other goods. Although the assured acted in a very reasonable way it seems clear to me that he cannot claim these expenses from the underwriters. It is said that there is authority in favour of the plaintiff's contention; there is certainly very strong authority directly opposed to it. In the fifth edition (1835) of Stevens on Average, at pages 157 and 158, he says the most satisfactory reason why the underwriter is not liable, is, "because he is accountable only for the actual damage done to the thing insured. He engages to guarantee the assured against the direct operation of sea damage, but not against the consequential results." The same view is taken in Phillips on Insurance. Then again it is entirely contrary to the practice of average adjusters to allow to an assured that which the plaintiff now claims. The result therefore is that principle, authority, and the practice of average adjusters are all opposed to allowing the plaintiff's claim. I think that the judgment of Wills, J. was right and this appeal must be dismissed. I will only add this, that the argument on the suing and labouring clause seems to me perfectly idle; and that what was insured was the iron in the cases, not the cases themselves, though the cases may have added to the value of what was insured.

Lopes, L.J.—The matter has been so fully treated by the Master of the Rolls that I will say very few words. The insurance was effected on 497 cases of sheets of galvanised iron, and on the ship's arrival in London it was found that the iron in 106 cases had been damaged by sea-water on the voyage. With regard to these cases the plaintiff has been paid what he was entitled to, and no question about them is raised here. What the plaintiff is now asking for is repayment of expenses incurred by him in examining the 391 cases which were not damaged. A policy of marine insurance is an insurance against actual damage, and there has been no actual damage to the 391 cases. The most that could be said is that there was a suspicion that they might have been damaged, but a suspicion is not enough. I quite agree with everything that the Master of the Rolls has said. As for the suing and labouring clause it is clear that no part of the expenses incurred about the examination of the 391 cases was incurred in diminishing any loss suffered through perils of the sea.

Rigby, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, It seems to me that this claim is an attempt to extend the law of marine insurance. It cannot be said that a mere suspicion of damage to the goods, entitled the plaintiff to incur costs and claim them afterwards from the defendants when in fact no damage had taken place.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Whites and Co., for Press and Inskip, Bristol.

Solicitors for the defendants, Lowless and Co.

Wednesday, Jan. 16, 1895.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.)

The Hydarnes Steamship Company v. The Indemnity Mutual Marine Assurance Company. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Policy on freight—Attachment of risk—Policy partly written and partly printed—Construction.

By a policy of marine insurance "upon freight of meat valued at 3000l.," the underwriters were "to be liable for any loss occasioned by breaking down of machinery until final sailing of vessel, the ship called Hydarnes, lost or not lost, at and from Monte Video to any ports or places in any order in the River Plate . . . and thence to the United Kingdom . . .” This part of the policy was written. Then followed a clause to the effect that the assurance should commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise from the loading of the said goods on board the ship at Monte Video. With the exception of the words “Monte Video” this clause was in print, being part of the form of policy generally used by the defendants, an insurance company. After discharging her outward cargo at Monte Video, the ship proceeded to the River Plate to obtain a cargo of frozen meat, but her refrigerating machinery broke down under such circumstances that she was unable to take any frozen meat on board, so that the adventure, so far as the carriage of meat was concerned, had to be abandoned. By the contract under which she was to have taken a cargo of frozen meat, the shipowners, the assured, became entitled to freight on all carcases shipped. At the date of the policy it was known to both assured and underwriters that there were no proper appliances at Monte Video for loading frozen meat, so that the ship could not possibly take any frozen meat on board at that port. In an action by the assured upon the policy:

(a) Reported by E. Manley Smith, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that, in construing the policy, so much of the printed clause in the document as defined the commencement of the risk to be from the loading of the goods at Monte Video was in the circumstances insensible and should be rejected, and that the risk attached at Monte Video and did not depend upon the loading of the cargo.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Wills, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover a sum of 2000*l.* under a policy of marine insurance upon freight.

The policy, so far as is material, was in the following words:

This policy witnesseth that in consideration of the sum of [17*l.* 10*s.*] the Indemnity Mutual Marine Insurance Company Limited doth agree that the said company will make good all such losses hereinafter expressed as may happen to be the subject-matter of this policy, and may attach to this policy in respect of the sum of [2000*l.*] hereby assured, which assurance is hereby declared to be upon [freight of meat valued at 3000*l.* warranted free from all claims (except general average and salvage charges) unless caused by stranding, sinking, burning, or collision, but to be liable for any loss occasioned by breaking down of machinery until final sailing of vessel] the ship or vessel called the [Hydarnes (s.)], lost or not lost, at and from [Monte Video to any ports or places in any order, backwards and forwards in the River Plate (including the Boca and (or) the rivers Parana and (or) Uruguay, or thence to any port or ports in the United Kingdom, and (or) continent of Europe not north of Hamburg, that port included in any order, and thence to any port or ports in the United Kingdom in any order, with leave to call and wait at any ports, parts, and places for all purposes (especially in any order in the Brazils, either to discharge or take in cargo, or for any other purpose), with leave to tow and be towed and assist vessels in all situations. To return 2*s.* 4*d.* per cent. for no river Parana or Uruguay risk.] , . . The assurance aforesaid shall commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise on board thereof from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel at [Monte Video], and shall continue until the said goods or merchandise be discharged and safely landed at [as aforesaid]. . . . Dated the [23rd Jan. 1890].

The words within square brackets were in writing, the rest of the policy was in print.

The freight insured arose under a contract of the 9th May 1889, made between the plaintiffs and a firm of Sansinena and Co., importers of frozen meat from South America to Europe.

By that contract it was provided that,

As soon as possible after the arrival of the steamer at Boca, Buenos Ayres, and after the discharge of cargo, if any, stowed in the refrigerating chambers, the refrigerating engine shall be worked until the temperature in the said chambers shall be reduced below 28° Fahr., and then and not till then, the steamer's agents shall give written notice that the steamer is lying ready to receive the meat.

By another clause in this contract it was agreed that “freight shall be payable on all carcases which may be shipped at the Boca, Buenos Ayres” at certain specified rates.

The vessel arrived at Monte Video on the outward voyage, and there discharged outward cargo. She then proceeded to the Boca, where she arrived on the 25th Jan. 1890.

On the 27th Jan. the refrigerating engine was set to work to reduce the temperature in the refrigerating chambers, but it broke down in a way which, as was found by the learned judge at the trial, necessitated the abandonment of the adventure so far as the carriage of meat was concerned, and notice of the abandonment was given to the defendants.

At the time the policy was entered into no meat ever was, or could be, loaded at Monte Video, because there were no appliances at that place for freezing meat. This fact was well known to both plaintiffs and defendants when the policy was entered into.

At the trial the learned judge held that, under the printed clause in the policy above set out, the risk had not attached, and he gave judgment for the defendants.

The case is reported below in 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 470; 71 L. T. Rep. 193; (1894) 2 Q. B. 590.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir Richard E. Webster, Q.C. and Bigham, Q.C. (Horridge with them) for the plaintiffs.—The risk of the refrigerating machinery breaking down, which is covered by this policy, commenced, it is submitted, at Monte Video, and was to last until the final sailing of the vessel. That is admittedly the meaning of the written words in the policy, and this meaning is not altered by the words of the printed clause later on in the policy, referring to the commencement of the risk. When the ship had discharged her outward cargo at Monte Video, and emptied the refrigerating chamber, the plaintiffs began to perform their part of the contract for the carriage of frozen meat—they did something under it which, if matured, would have entitled them to freight. The breakdown of the machinery occurred in the course of the earning of the freight:

Thompson v. Taylor, 6 T. R. 478;
Davidson v. Willasey, 1 M. & S. 313.

As under their agreement they would have earned the freight as soon as they sailed with a cargo, the interval between Monte Video and the final sailing of the ship was the only time during which the plaintiffs wished to be protected from danger of being prevented from earning freight through a breakdown of the refrigerating machinery. That being their object, and the course of business being well known to the underwriters, the parties arrived at the special agreement contained in the written words of the policy. That special agreement cannot be controlled by the printed words of a form which is applicable to many kinds of insurance. The whole contract should be looked at to see what the parties really intended, and if any words in it can have no possible application they should be rejected. The reference in the printed clause as to the loading of the goods at Monte Video cannot possibly have any meaning, because as both parties knew, frozen meat cannot be loaded at Monte Video, and they should, therefore, be rejected. The general rule is stated in Arnould on Marine Insurance, 6th edit. at p. 434, as follows: "Where a cargo has been contracted for, and is ready to be shipped on board at the time of the loss, and the ship being otherwise in a condition to receive the cargo, is only prevented from doing so by the intervention of the perils insured against, the policy on freight has attached, and the underwriters are liable for the loss of the whole freight that would have been earned on the voyage, even though no part of the cargo has ever been shipped on board at all." In the two cases above referred to the ships were never ready to receive the cargo, yet the risk was held to have attached.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the defendants.—None of the words contained in this agreement ought to be rejected. The words which the court is asked to reject have a perfectly sensible operation. Monte Video is named in that clause merely as the first of several places where goods might be loaded, and as representative or a symbol of all those places. The risk, as the printed clause provides, is to attach only from the loading of the goods. If the words are struck out, as is proposed, the clause is ungrammatical and has no meaning. The words here in dispute have been already construed in two cases:

Beckett v. The West of England Insurance Company, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 185; 25 L. T. Rep. 739; Hopper v. The Wear Marine Insurance Company, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 482; 46 L. T. Rep. 107.

[Lord ESHER, M.R.—In those cases the goods could be loaded at the first-named port; in this case, as the underwriters knew, no frozen meat could be loaded at Monte Video.] The clause must have been intended to have some effect, or the two blanks in it would not have been filled up in writing with the words "Monte Video" and "as aforesaid." They cited also Arnould on Marine Insurance, 6th edit., at p. 384.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case we have to construe a policy of marine insurance, and we must try and do it in a business-like way so as to give the document a sensible meaning. Now, the first thing is to look at the state of facts existing at the time when the policy was made. A contract had been entered into by the shipowners with a firm of merchants to carry cargoes of frozen meat on the ship from South America to Europe. The underwriters, the defendants, must have known of this contract, and upon that footing they bound themselves by this policy. Since the ship was to be used for the carriage of frozen meat from the Plate to Liverpool, the freight which is the subject-matter of this policy, is the freight to be earned by the carriage of frozen meat. There was this further fact also known to the underwriters, that frozen meat never was, and never could be, loaded on ships at Monte Video. Then it must further have been understood by them, that in the carriage of frozen meat, freezing machinery must of necessity be used, and they must have known that machinery is always liable to break down, and that, if that should happen on board this ship, the freight to be earned would be in danger. Under those circumstances the plaintiffs and defendants entered into the agreement contained in this policy, the subject-matter of which is freight of frozen meat valued at 3000*l*. Now, the assured wanted to be insured against something more than the ordinary risks to which such a policy as this refers, and so a provision was put in by which the underwriters were "to be liable for any loss occasioned by breaking down of machinery until final sailing of vessel . . . at and from Monte Video." The final sailing of the ship from South America to England was to be from some port in the River Plate, but then it is provided that the risk is to commence at Monte Video, where the ship would be at some time previous to her final sailing from the Plate. But then there is this clause in the policy: "the assurance aforesaid shall commence upon the freight and goods and merchandise on board thereof from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel at Monte Video." As all the parties knew, it is impossible that the goods should be loaded on this ship at Monte Video, because there are no appliances there for the loading of frozen meat. So that if the clause be construed just as it is, it provides that the assurance shall commence upon the happening of an event which both parties knew never could happen. Such a provision seems to me insensible. Now, this policy is not in the ordinary form of a Lloyds' policy. It is a form used by the defendant company, who are in the habit of insuring both freight and goods, and for the sake probably of saving trouble they have this printed general form. It is clear, therefore, that when this form of policy is used for an insurance of only one of these things, some part of it ought to be struck out. In the present case the form has been used for an insurance of freight; therefore anything in it applicable to an insurance of goods and not applicable to an insurance of freight must be struck out. If freight could have been earned by this ship in respect of goods or merchandise to be loaded at Monte Video, I should say that the case of Beckett v. The West of England Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.) might be an authority for leaving the words in. But Monte Video is not a port at which this ship could load any frozen meat. The argument is that the policy depends upon loading taking place at a port where the parties well knew that it never could take place. It seems to me under these circumstances that the reference to a possible loading at Monte Video must be struck out of the clause altogether. The clause will then read thus: "The assurance shall commence upon the freight at Monte Video." That is not, as Wills, J. called it, an expunging of the clause; it is only an expunging of those words in it which have no application. Construing the policy in that way it covers the very risk against which the assured wished principally to be insured. The policy is thus a sensible and substantial insurance against the risk which was obviously in view, and the way we are dealing with it seems to me the proper and businesslike way. I think the appeal ought to be allowed.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question for our determination is, When did the risk attach under this policy? It has been urged on behalf of the defendants that it did not attach at all, because no frozen meat was taken on board the vessel. On the other hand, the plaintiffs contend that it attached when the ship left Monte Video, between which date and the loading, which would have taken place at Buenos Ayres, the refrigerating machinery broke down. Now, in interpreting this policy of insurance we must treat it as we should treat any other document, and look at it as a whole, not taking each clause to be considered merely by itself. We must also have regard to the surrounding circumstances. In construing the policy we must, therefore, bear in mind these important facts. First, no frozen meat is ever loaded at Monte Video, as both plaintiffs and defendants well knew. Secondly, the freight was protected as soon as the vessel finally sailed, because, under their contract with Sansinena the plaintiffs earned their freight independently of their delivering their cargo. The result of that provision in the contract is that what the plaintiffs wished to be protected against by a policy of insurance was one special thing, not a peril of the sea, but the chance of a breakdown of the refrigerating machinery between the discharge of the outward cargo at Monte Video and the loading of the frozen meat at Buenos Ayres or some other port in the Plate. That seems to me the danger which above all others the plaintiffs wished to be protected against. Now the policy is "upon freight of meat valued at 3000*l.*, warranted free from all claims (except general average and salvage charges), unless caused by stranding, sinking, burning, or collision, but to be liable for any loss occasioned by breaking down of machinery until final sailing of vessel, the ship or vessel called the Hydarnes, lost or not lost, at and from Monte Video." Those words are clear enough, and if that were all, there would be no difficulty in construing them. The difficulty arises from a subsequent clause printed in the policy, which provides that the assurance shall commence "upon the freight and goods or merchandise on board thereof from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel at Monte Video." It is argued that the assurance was not to commence until the frozen meat was taken on board; but, as I have said, both parties knew perfectly well that no frozen meat could be taken on board at Monte Video. The two clauses I have read are, therefore, inconsistent with each other. It seems to me that, under these circumstances, we must give effect to the earlier clause, and must therefore reject so much of the printed clause as relates to goods and merchandise. The clause then provides that the assurance is to commence upon the freight at Monte Video. By thus rejecting that part of the clause which is inapplicable, all difficulty in construing the policy disappears. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Rigby, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The document which we have to construe here is partly written and partly printed, and it appears to me that, in construing it, we ought first to look at the written part. The words there written were very carefully considered, and great pains were taken to define the time during which the risk was to last. [His Lordship read the written clause.] After that comes the printed clause, which, it is said, provides that until the frozen meat is on board the risk is not to commence. Now, I agree that in the case of an agreement where there are general words applicable to a state of things not existing but which may come into existence, the court should be careful not to reject any of those words, if it can possibly avoid doing so. But in this case no frozen meat could have been taken on board at Monte Video, and at first I should, therefore, have had no doubt in saying that so much of the printed clause as refers to goods and merchandise ought to be struck out of this policy. The case was argued upon the footing that "goods or merchandise" in that clause referred to frozen meat; but I understand that other cargo besides frozen meat was actually loaded on this ship, and the phrase "goods or merchandise" might apply to that cargo as much as to frozen meat. But I am of opinion that, as the frozen meat was carried in a part of the vessel entirely separate from that where other cargo might be, the policy had no reference to anything except frozen meat. The part of the clause referring to "goods or merchandise" is therefore quite inapplicable to this case, and I agree that it must be omitted, and the clause read as providing for the commencement of risk at Monte Video. I should have had no difficulty in deciding this case but for the decision in Beckett v. The West of England Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), which is the only thing that during the argument raised any doubt in my mind. I should have felt some hesitation if any canon of construction had really been laid down in that case; but as none was laid down, and the facts were not identically the same as here, the decision can have no application to this case. I may add that I do not quite understand the case; but it is sufficient now to say that no attempt was made to lay down any canon of construction. It is merely a decision on the particular words of the contract then in question. It was also argued here that Monte Video must be taken as standing shortly for all ports of loading in South America which the vessel might call at after leaving Monte Video. I cannot agree with that contention. This is not a case where there are several possible ports of loading. and one is mentioned as representative of the others, because no loading of frozen meat is possible at Monte Video. There are no decided cases which hamper our coming to the conclusion we have arrived at, and I think the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Pritchard, Englefield, and Co., agents for Simpson, North, Harley, and Birkett, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Tuesday, Feb. 1, 1895.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LINDLEY and RIGBY, L.JJ.)

THE BONA. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Marine insurance—General average—Stranded vessel—Extraordinary use of engines—Contribution for extra coal consumed.

By a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants, the former insured the hull and machinery of their steamship against ordinary marine risks. In the course of her voyage the vessel stranded, and was eventually got off by means of her engines and by lightening the ship. On the question as to whether the defendants were liable to contribute pro rata in general average in respect of the coal so consumed:

Held (affirming the President (Sir F. Jeune), that, as there had been an abnormal use of the engines which constituted a general average act, there must also have been an abnormal consumption of coal, and the shipowners were therefore entitled to general average contribution in respect thereof.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the President (Sir F. H. Jeune), reported 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 536; 71 L. T. Rep. 551.

The defendants appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Carver for the appellants.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C. and Holman for the respondents.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question here, as I understand it, is confined to the matter of the coals. I agree that the point as to whether these coals were used under circumstances which enable the shipmaster to demand an average contribution must depend upon what they were used for, and how they were used. I think if they were used for the purpose of moving the engines in such a way and under such conditions that any damage to the engines would be the subject matter of general contribution, that then the coals used as a part of the manœuvre would be in the same position as the engines. The case, therefore, depends, as has been admitted on both sides, upon whether the use of the engines in this case was the normal or ordinary mode of using them under usual circumstances, or whether the engines were used not only under unusual circumstances, but in an unusual and abnormal manner. Here we must first consider what are the conditions under which either the ship-owner or the cargo-owner can demand a general average contribution. It is better to confine oneself to the case of the shipowner, because that is the case before us. The shipowner, if he insists that the cargo-owner is bound to contribute in general average, must show that the ship has been in some way injured, that the ship and cargo were both in danger, and that the injury to the ship happened in consequence of an intentional putting her into that danger—an intentional putting her into that danger for the purpose of attempting to save both ship and cargo. Here it is admitted that the ship and cargo were in danger, and it is of no use, therefore, to argue to us about a case where a ship may touch a sandbank or be on a sandbank without danger to ship or cargo. A ship may be in that condition, and then the main circumstance on which to raise a general average contribution does not exist; but here it is not only that the vessel was on the sand or bar, but she was so fixed on the sand that both ship and cargo were in imminent danger. Then the captain of the ship is there to do what he ought to do for the benefit of both shipowner and cargo-owner, and his duty is to do everything that he can do or think of to save both ship and cargo. That is undoubted. The ship was aground, and so far aground that she had been there for four days. She was so far aground that she could not be got off without some extraordinary effort. It is found here that what the captain did he did with the intent to endeavour to save both ship and cargo. It really is not disputed that he was intentionally running a great risk. He was attempting intentionally to do what he knew to be a dangerous operation. But it is said that he only used the ship and her powers, and that however much he did that, if he only used the ship and her powers in the ordinary way in which a ship and her powers are to be used, then it cannot be brought within the doctrine of general average. I agree to that. That doctrine will solve some of the cases which have been brought before us. I say clearly that I am not going to attempt to-day to over-rule anything. I am going to deal with the case of a ship being hard and fast on the ground. That is not the normal condition of the ship. The normal condition of the ship is to be—except in mud harbours—afloat in the water. She was hard and fast on the ground. The manœuvre which this captain determined to follow, knowing that it was a dangerous manœuvre to the property of his owners, was to use the engines so as to force the ship off the ground. Is that a normal way of using the steam engines on board the ship? Mr. Walton, with great ingenuity, as might be expected, said the screw was in the water. So it might have been, but the engines were not. It was not the screw which was strained, but the engines. The engines have got to force themselves round so as to turn this screw, whilst the ship, instead of being afloat, and therefore a moving mass, is hard and fast on the ground. The learned judge who tried this case has come to the conclusion that if you use engines to force a ship either one way or the other when she is hard and fast on the ground, that is not a way of using engines in the manner in which they were made to be used. They were made to be used to move the ship when afloat, and not when on the ground. He has come to the conclusion that to use the engines when the ship is hard aground is a very excessive and abnormal mode of using the engines, with a result of much greater danger to the engines than if they are used in the normal way. Therefore, that is not using the ship and her equipment in the ordinary way, It is putting them to an abnormal use, intentionally, knowing the risk, for the purpose of saving the ship and cargo from the imminent danger in which they were. It seems to me that state of things, taking them altogether, supplies all the conditions which would, if the engines were strained, entitle the owners of the ship to say that they intentionally put their engines to this abnormal risk for the purpose of attempting to save the ship and cargo, and that by doing so they had saved them. The coal was used for the purpose of working the engines in that abnormal way. Coals, in being so used to move engines in that abnormal way, were actually used in that abnormal way, and therefore I think in this case the shipowner was entitled, under the circumstances, to general average contribution. The shipowner is bound to show you that the ship was in danger of being lost, both ship and cargo, and bound to show you that what he did was an abnormal use of the means he had under his hands—an abnormal use of the ship and things belonging to the ship. I think he has done that, and I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed, and the judgment of the learned judge upheld.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lindley, L.J.—I think that this case is a somewhat difficult one, and I do not think it is covered by any authority. It is not like any case which is in the books, so far as I know, and is certainly not like any of those which are constantly being brought before us. The question is whether, in the circumstances of this case, the defendants are liable to contribute general average in respect of 52 tons of coal used in working the engines for the purpose of getting the ship off Galveston Bar? I look upon the coals as accessory to the engines, and it appears to me that the real question is whether there was an extraordinary sacrifice? I think there was, and that it comes within the principle laid down in the case of Birkley v. Presgrave (1 East, 220; 6 Rev. Rep. 256). The question is, what is an extraordinary sacrifice? It has been contended by Mr. Walton and Mr. Carver that as a matter of law you cannot sacrifice anything if you use it for the purpose for which it is intended. I doubt that. Let us consider the position of affairs. The printed case shows that this ship was hard and fast on this bar, and had been there for several days. Was there any sacrifice at all? Was there any intentional risk run in working these engines far beyond their power? Certainly there was. And for what purpose? For the purpose of assisting the ship off the bar where she was stuck. Are we then to say that in point of law that was not an extraordinary sacrifice? I cannot help thinking that when we look at the view taken by business men to ascertain whether this is an extraordinary sacrifice or not, it shows that this is a sacrifice, and I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

Rigby, L.J.—I concur.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton; Downing, Holman, and Co.

Thursday, Feb. 7, 1895.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.)

Hine Brothers v. The Steamship Insurance Syndicate Limited; The Netherholme, Glen Holme, and Rydal Holme. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Marine insurance — General average — Payment in cash to insurance broker—Bill of exchange—Custom.

(a) Reported by Basil Crump, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Policies of insurance upon certain of the plaintiffs' ships were effected with the defendants by a firm of insurance brokers on behalf of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs subsequently authorised the brokers to settle their claim against the defendants under these policies, and to receive payment in cash in accordance with the recognised custom. Instead of cash the brokers took a bill of exchange at three months in payment of a general account including the plaintiffs'. This bill they afterwards discounted, and it was eventually paid by the defendants. The brokers failed without having paid the plaintiffs. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the amount due to them from the defendants,

Held (affirming Bruce, J.), that the taking of the bill was not within the authority conferred upon the brokers by the plaintiffs, that it was contrary to the recognised business custom, and even when discounted it did not constitute a payment to the insured.

Appeal from a decision of Bruce, J., on the 28th Nov. 1894, giving judgment for the plaintiffs.

The facts are fully stated in the following judgment:

Bruce, J.—In this case the action is brought to recover a balance of 156*l.* 0*s.* 5*d.* alleged to be due from the defendant company to the plaintiffs. The defendants contend that nothing is due from them to the plaintiffs, that the balance is in their favour, and they set up a counter-claim for 154*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* The difference between the parties depends upon whether the defendants are still liable for a sum of 310*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, which they allege they have paid to Messrs. Rawle and Co., insurance brokers, who were employed by the plaintiffs to collect the whole amount due to the plaintiffs on a policy of insurance made with the defendant company on the plaintiffs' ship Glenholme. The plaintiffs, Messrs. Hine Brothers, are shipowners, carrying on business at Maryport, and they employed a Glasgow firm, Messrs. Lamont, Nesbit, and Co., in whose name the policy has been effected on behalf of the plaintiffs, to collect the money due to them on the policy. Lamont, Nesbit, and Co. advised the plaintiffs that they thought that the settlement might be expedited if the plaintiffs' London house were to take up the collection of the claim with Messrs. Rawle and Co. Accordingly the plaintiffs put the matter into the hands of their London firm, and their London firm instructed Messrs. Rawle and Co., who were insurance brokers in London, to collect the amount due on the policy. Messrs. Rawle and Co. put forward the claim, and the amount due on the policy was settled at 310*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.*, and a credit note was passed by Rawle and Co. to the London house, on the face of which it is stated the 310*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.* was "due on receipt from company." The credit note has been lost, but it appears from the correspondence to have been dated about the 13th Aug. 1891. On the 19th Aug. Rawle and Co. wrote to the defendant company stating that they were being daily pressed by the owners of the Glenholme for payment of their claim of 310*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.*, and in their letter they say, "If it would suit you we would try and arrange for them to accept a bill for this amount." No suggestion, however, seems even to have been made by Rawle and Co. to the plaintiffs or to their London house with reference to any acceptance, but on the 2nd Sept. 1891 a bill of exchange for 402*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*, at three months, was drawn by Rawle and Co. upon the defendant company and accepted by them. This sum of 452*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.* represented a balance of account due from the defendant company to Rawle and Co. in respect of various items, one of the items in the account being the sum due on the policy in question of 310*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.* On the 4th Sept. 1891, Rawle and Co. discounted this bill, paying in respect of the discount the sum of about 9*l.* A few days after this bill had been handed to Rawle it came to the knowledge of the defendant company that a sum was due to them from the plaintiffs in respect of the steamship Ovington. The defendant company had paid in respect of a total loss on the steamship Ovington, and a sum having been since received by the plaintiffs by way of "salvage," the defendant company were entitled to recover, as their proportion of that salvage, 209*l.* 2*s.* 1*d.* Rawle, who had been the moving spirit in the formation of the defendant company, suggested to their manager that he should write to him (Rawle) asking him to retain the claim, and accordingly on the 10th Sept. the manager wrote to Rawle to this effect: "Kindly retain the claim Re Glenholme, s., we have paid for until we get our cheque for our proportion of the salvage Re Ovington." And on the 15th Sept. Rawle and Co. write to the plaintiffs' London house as follows: "Re Glenholme, s.—We beg to inform you that the Steamship Insurance Association Syndicate have instructed us to retain the above claim until we have received their portion of the salvage per Ovington, s." On the 17th March, Messrs. Lamont and Co., the insurance brokers in Glasgow, who had, in the first instance, been instructed by the plaintiffs to collect the amount due in respect of the Glenholme, wrote to Messrs. Rawle as follows: "These underwriters have never yet paid us the claim per Glenholme, which itself amounts to 100*l.* more than the amount of salvage due to them per Ovington." On the 18th March, Rawle and Co. write to Lamont in answer: "Glenholme, s.—The Steamship Insurance Syndicate are quite prepared to pay this claim when they have received the salvage per Ovington, s." On the 23rd March 1892 Rawle and Co. wrote to Lamont and Co.: "We shall be pleased to help you in any way we can, but the Steamship Insurance Syndicate will do nothing until the Ovington's salvage is paid." Further correspondence follows, and on the 9th Dec. 1892, Lamont and Co. send to Rawle and Co. an account, in which, after giving credit to the defendants for 209*l.* 2*s.* 1*d.* in respect of the salvage per Ovington, a balance of 155*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.* appears to be due to the plaintiffs. Lamont and Co. ask Rawle and Co. to press for an early payment of the balance. A few days after this, on the 16th Dec., it was announced that Rawle and Co. were unable to meet their engagements. The plaintiffs have never received the balance due to them from the defendant company, and the question arises whether in the circumstances the transactions which took place between the defendant company and Rawle and Co. amount to payment to the plaintiffs.

On behalf of the defendants the case has been put in two ways. First, it is said there was a settlement of account between the defendant company and Rawle, and that according to the custom at Lloyd's, of which the plaintiffs had notice, a settlement in account between the underwriter and the insurance broker employed by the assured to collect the claim on the policy amounts to payment as against the assured. This point is, I think, disposed of by the evidence given in the case. Whatever the usage relied upon may be, I am satisfied upon the evidence that it does not extend to insurance companies. The practice is for insurance companies to pay the broker by cheque within a week of the settlement. It is not in accordance with the usage or practice for insurance companies to keep a running account. I am therefore of opinion that the defendants cannot succeed in their contention that there was any settlement in account which operated as payment to the assured. It is not, after the view I have expressed, necessary for me to consider whether the transactions which took place did operate as a settlement in account. I need only observe in passing that no receipt seems ever to have been delivered by Rawle and Co. to the defendant company, and the letters of the defendant company, written after the alleged settlement took place, are in terms quite inconsistent with the view that the transactions between themselves and Rawle and Co. operated as a final and conclusive settlement. The second point urged on behalf of the defendants is that there was, in fact, an actual payment to Rawle and Co. which operated as payment to the plaintiffs. The defendants do not contend, and, indeed they could not contend, that Rawle and Co. had any authority from the plaintiffs to accept payment by bill as a payment on their behalf. But it is said that because Rawle and Co. discounted the bill for 402*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*, they actually received from the defendants cash in respect of the plaintiffs' claim. The first observation I have to make with reference to this is that even if the 404*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.* had been paid in cash, I doubt whether any part of it could have been treated as a specific payment on account of the sum of 310*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.* In Duer on Insurance, vol. 2, p. 948, sect. 44, it is said: "Where the payment, although a cash payment, is made, generally, on an account between the underwriter and the agent, that embraces other items than the specific loss, and on which, after deducting the payment, a balance remains due to the agent exceeding or equal to the loss, the underwriter, as against the assured, is entitled to no credit for any portion of the amount." But it is not necessary for me to rest my decision upon this ground. I think if Rawle had no authority from the plaintiffs to take a bill in payment, and he certainly had not, he took the bill on his own account, and not on account of the plaintiffs, and if the bill was his bill and not the plaintiffs' bill, the money he obtained by discounting the bill was his money, and not the plaintiffs' money. The case of Bridges v. Garrett (22 L. T. Rep. 448; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 451) was relied upon by the defendants' counsel, and it was contended that that case established that a cheque given to an agent who had not authority to receive payment by cheque might yet, if duly honoured, operate as good payment against the principal. I think that that case, when carefully examined, is not an authority for any such proposition. The decision of the case is explained by Fry, J., in the case of Pearson v. Scott (38 L. T. Rep. 747; 9 Ch. Div., at p. 208). That learned judge says: "In that case the jury had found, as a matter of fact, that Craig, the deputy steward, had authority to receive the fine for the lord, and that the crossed cheque was a good payment to the lord within the authority to pay Craig. They found, therefore, that the payment was actually within the authority, and the short effect of the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber is that they thought there was evidence for the jury and refused to disturb their finding. They thought, moreover, that, seeing that the cheque given by the surrenderee was good, and that it was in the ordinary course of business to make payments by cheque, it might be considered that that cheque so given, when cashed, became a payment of cash to the agent." It will be seen from this that the very foundation of the decision, in the opinion of Fry. J., in the case of Bridges v. Garrett, was that the cheque was a good payment to the lord (the principal) within the authority to pay to Craig (the agent). These observations of Fry, J. are quoted with approval by the judges of the Court of Appeal in the recent case of Papé v. Westacott (70 L. T. Rep. 18; (1894) 1 Q. B. 272). In the present case it was contrary to the ordinary course of business to make payment by bill, and the taking of the bill by the agent was clearly not within the authority conferred upon him by his principal. If it were necessary to draw other distinctions I think there is a very wide difference between the discount of a bill and the payment of a cheque. If the bill was discounted on behalf of the plaintiffs I suppose that the plaintiffs would be liable to pay at least their share of the sum paid for discount. Yet it is, I think, impossible to contend that any such liability attached to them. The defendants relied upon the circumstance that when the bill became due, on the 5th Dec., it was presented by the holder and duly honoured. But that seems to me to be wholly immaterial. It could not matter to the plaintiffs whether the bill was paid at maturity. It was not paid to them or to anyone who represented them. I think that the circumstances of the case lead to the conclusion that Rawle took the bill without any authority to take it as payment on behalf of the plaintiffs, that he discounted it for his own purposes, that the cash he obtained by means of the discount was cash to which the plaintiff could not make any claim, and was not received by Rawle on behalf of the plaintiffs. I give judgment for the plaintiffs for 156*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.* with costs.

The defendants appealed.

Feb. 7.—Sir Walter Phillimore and J. E. Bankes, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.

Bucknill, Q.C. and Holman, contrà, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs are the owners of several ships. They entrusted their insurance to brokers in Glasgow, and they authorised these brokers in Glasgow to act through and by another firm of brokers—Messrs. Rawle and Co., of London. They had four ships insured, and they came at last to have claims on the insurance company in respect of all four of the ships. The claims in respect of three of them were in respect of average losses, and their claim on the last ship—the Ovington—was for a total loss. Before the Ovington was lost Rawle and Co., who may be taken to have been acting for the plaintiffs, though it was through the agency of the brokers in Glasgow, had the insurance documents and the ship's documents placed in their hands in order to settle with the insurance company the claims for the three losses. That is the ordinary practice. The insurance company does not at once pay the sum demanded by the assured, but they have to agree with them what is the proper amount to pay for the alleged loss. That is done by settling, after dispute or after discussion, with the brokers who have the documents in their hands. The brokers are authorised by the assured, the principal, and that authority is shown by their having the insurance documents and the ship's documents in their hands. They are authorised to settle the amount which will be due and payable by the insurance company. That was done in regard to the three ships by Rawle and Co., who were authorised not in specific terms, but authorised by the fact that the plaintiffs had allowed the ships' documents to go into their hands. In everything they did afterwards they were acting according to the well-known customs of the law as between assured and underwriters; that is that the amount should be settled between the broker and the insurer, the underwriter, and when that amount is settled, unless the authority to act further is taken away from the brokers, there is by custom an authority from the assured to the brokers to receive payment of the settled amount. But that is not to receive payment in any way. It is to receive payment in one way, and that is payment in cash. That being so, they are authorised to receive payment on behalf of the assured in cash. The moment the underwriter pays that agent so authorised to receive payment, and pays him in cash, that, according to common views of business and of law, is payment to the principal. The thing for the agent to do is to settle the amount, and to receive the money in cash, and the plaintiff says, "If you do it, the moment you have received it that is payment to me." Then the broker has received payment according to his authority, and the assured has only to look to the broker for the amount payable to him as money received by the broker for and on account of the assured. But if the broker does not receive the payment according to his authority, if he receive payment in some other way, he was not authorised to receive payment in that way, and unless the assured after he has received that payment in an unauthorised way agrees to adopt it, and to look only to the broker, then there is no payment whatever to the assured. Here the brokers, Rawle and Co., were authorised to settle the amount due on these three ships. They did settle it, and that amount became, therefore, the money due from the underwriters to the assured in respect of those three ships. The custom then goes on that the broker has authority to receive payment in cash in a week or a fortnight. If the underwriter pays in any other way at any later time to the broker that is not a payment to the assured. It is an unauthorised payment, not authorised by him, and a payment not to himself, but to somebody who is not authorised to take it. If within the proper time the broker was to receive a cheque upon a banker, payable on demand by his taking it to a banker, and if he takes it to a banker and gets paid in cash, according to the custom, not of brokers alone, but of all people of business, and even those who are not in business, it is accounted as cash. Where a cheque, therefore, is paid to the broker, upon which he immediately gets cash from the banker, the principal cannot say "You were not paid in cash," because you were paid money—coin of the realm—through the machinery of a cheque on the banker. Supposing a cheque were given after the week or the fortnight, or say three months after, then the assured would have a right to say he was not authorised to take that cheque, and even if it were cash he would not be authorised to take it.

The case here is that, with authority given to the brokers to receive payment in cash within a fortnight, they with no authority from their principal take a bill at three months. Now, that bill as between them and the persons who gave it does not become an absolute payment for three months. How can it be said that the giving of that bill, even if it were for the actual amount of the settlement, would be a payment authorised by the plaintiffs? It was no more a payment authorised by him than, as it has been put by one of my lords, if he had given a horse. This case is worse than if the payment had been by a bill for the settled amount at three months. It is worse, because in this case, whatever may be the general practice of underwriters and brokers, it is clear, and the judge has found it, that these brokers kept an account with these underwriters; not an account on behalf of one principal, but an account which included the claims of all their principals. They therefore kept an account in which they assumed to deal with the underwriters as principals, having claims against the underwriters for all their customers, and the underwriters must have had their cross-claims against them. So there was a debtor and creditor account, obviously between these underwriters and these brokers. Then the brokers draw a bill upon the underwriters. What for? For the balance of that account. No doubt on one side of that account are these three claims of the plaintiffs for the balance of their account, and in that account are the claims which they are making in their own names, but for and on behalf of other of their clients besides the plaintiffs. Then they draw a bill for that amount, including amounts in respect of other clients and not the plaintiffs. How that can be said to be done under the authority of the plaintiffs is past comprehension. The plaintiffs could not authorise them to go and collect money for a party who has no relation to them. That bill, therefore, so drawn, is accepted by the defendants. Could the brokers have handed that bill over to the plaintiffs, having indorsed it to them, and say, "We have received this acceptance for you, and we indorse it, so that you may have a full right to claim it?" They did no such thing. Could the plaintiffs claim to have that bill indorsed to them? No such thing. Therefore the bill is not intended for them. It is drawn in a way which the plaintiffs could not insist upon as against the brokers, and in which the brokers were not obliged in any way to hand it over to the plaintiffs. Yet it is said that that could be a payment to the plaintiffs when the bill is discounted. The plaintiffs are not able to say what discount should be taken, and are not able to prevent the negotiation of the bill, and yet it is said that that bill, being discounted, is a payment to the broker for the plaintiffs. It is not a payment which, if it had been meant for them, was an authorised payment, but it never was meant for them, and still less was it a payment to them. There is something worse in this case, which is that these brokers—who are now, I suppose, assisting the defendants by saying "You paid us, and therefore when the bill was cashed it was payment to our principals"—whilst the bill is running, and after they have taken the acceptance, as they now say, on behalf of the plaintiffs, write to the defendants and suggest to them something to enable the brokers to tell a falsehood. The defendants, unfortunately, and I think wrongly—for nothing to my mind is so detestable as any underhand dealing in business—agreed to do it. They therefore write a letter to the brokers, which is dictated by the brokers, which says that they have instructed the brokers to retain the claim, in order that the brokers may carry on that letter to the plaintiffs. The defendants must have yielded to the desire of the brokers to make the plaintiffs believe something which was not the truth, and then we are told that they were doing that on behalf of the plaintiffs. The moment one finds that they are saying that which is a falsehood, one knows they are doing it not for the benefit of the plaintiffs. We do not know what particular mode they meant to adopt to benefit themselves. It perhaps was that they might get the bill discounted and use it for their own purposes, and put off the plaintiffs from getting their money until a future time, or never getting the money in respect of the ships, which was actually due to them, and which they were pressing to be paid. The defendants now set up the defence that this was a payment to the brokers, which became a payment to the plaintiffs, while the defendants were assisting the brokers to cheat the plaintiffs. That is the simple truth of the case, in my opinion. It is idle in any view of this case, from beginning to end, to say that the payment was a payment authorised by the plaintiffs to be made to the brokers, and if the bill was given not for the plaintiffs at all, but for the brokers, and in settlement of some claim that they were making, if the bill was given in an unauthorised way, it cannot be relied upon by the defendants as a payment of the plaintiffs' claim. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lopes, L.J.—The defendants in this case say that they have paid the claim. What they say is that the brokers were the authorised agents to receive payment of this money, and that they paid them. In the ordinary course the payment would have to be made in cash, and directly money is paid to the brokers the principle is that the payment is a good discharge for the defendants. The payment in this case is somewhat remarkable. The payment which is set up is a payment by bill of exchange, drawn by the brokers and accepted by the defendants, and it is admitted and cannot be denied that that was an unauthorised mode of payment. Another thing to be said about the bill is that it was taken by the brokers not in payment of any money due from the underwriters to the plaintiffs only, but it was taken in a general account in respect of moneys owing from the underwriters not only to the plaintiffs, who were the principals of the brokers, but also in respect of money due from the underwriters to other principals. It was a bill of exchange given on a general account. In those circumstances it appears to me that it is impossible to contend that such a payment to an agent is a payment as and for the principal. It appears to me, so far from being that, to be a payment to the broker for his own purposes. So far as that part of the case is concerned, it is perfectly clear that the payment entirely fails. But then it is said that this bill was discounted and cash paid into the hands of the brokers, and that therefore, although the bill of exchange might be an unauthorised payment, directly it was realised it became money paid to the brokers as and for the principal, even though the bill of exchange was not given to the brokers as and for the principal. It appears to me that that is a contention which is absolutely indefensible. I think the judgment of the learned judge below was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Rigby, L.J.—The action here was brought for a balance due to the plaintiffs on certain transactions with a syndicate who are the defendants. The one side claim for average losses in respect of three policies, the principal of them relating to an amount of 310*l.* in respect of the Glenholme, and the other side say that an allowance should be made in respect of certain salvage which had been recovered from a ship which the syndicate had paid for as a total loss. The balance was about 150*l.*, and the defendants say that the money has been already paid. Had the 310*l.* on the Glenholme been paid, or had it not? I am of opinion that it never had been paid. The plaintiffs wrote to Rawle and Co. pressing for the payment. The amount had been settled, and it ought to have been paid forthwith, but Rawle and Co. suggested to the defendants that they might get their principals to take a bill. The syndicate knew that a claim which already existed and which would have to be liquidated would accrue in respect of the Ovington, and they wanted to have the opportunity of dealing with the transaction as one, though as far as I can see they had no right at all to have the transaction treated as one. They wanted to have that opportunity, and not to pay cash down. What happened? Their object was manifestly not to pay the plaintiffs at that time, but I daresay they were unable to resist the claim of Rawle and Co. for the amount settled between them for payment, and accordingly they gave Rawle and Co. a bill. Of course, the giving of that bill would not be payment to the plaintiffs. Then it is suggested that the discounting was. Of course, if it were discounted by the authority of the plaintiffs, it would be another thing, but there is no evidence of the sort. The bill was discounted for the benefit of Rawle and Co. They got the money and applied it to their own purposes, and did not even go so far as to tell the plaintiffs that they had received the money from the syndicate. In fact they do what appears to me to be a keeping back from the plaintiffs that there had been any payment. Probably in point of law they were right, but at any rate there was no suggestion that they had received any payment, for on the 15th Sept. they write: "We beg to inform you that the Steamship Insurance Syndicate have instructed us to retain the above claim until we have received their portion of the salvage per Ovington (s)." That must be taken as meaning that the claim was not for the present to be further proceeded with. I think that Rawle and Co. had authority from the syndicate to pass on such a statement to the plaintiffs, and that during the depending of that bill representations were made to the plaintiffs that the money had not been paid, and that the payment of it must be suspended and kept back till the claim in respect of the Ovington had been settled. It is impossible to make out that the giving to the brokers of a three months' bill—a bill not paid to the brokers but to the holders—was a payment to the plaintiffs. The whole doctrine depends upon this, that you trust that when money has got into the hands of the agents they will hand it to their principals, but here when the bill was taken up there was no payment of money to Rawle and Co. at all. The plaintiffs' letters do not show, as suggested, that they acknowledged that there had been a payment, though I do not think that the mere fact of their knowing of the bill having been taken and discounted would have availed in any way unless adopted by some positive act of theirs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Deacon, Gibson, and Medcalf; Downing, Holman, and Co.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Saturday, Jan. 26, 1895.

(Before Charles and Kennedy, JJ.)

Jamieson v. The Newcastle Steamship Freight Insurance Association. (a)

Marine insurance—Total frustration of voyage—Loss of chartered freight—No claim from "cancelling" of charter to be allowed—Whether frustration of voyage is a "cancellation" of charter.

The total frustration of a voyage contemplated in a charter-party and the fact that such voyage has become, in a commercial sense, impossible amount to a "cancellation" of the charter within the meaning of a clause in a policy of marine insurance that "no claim arising from the cancelling of any charter" shall be allowed.

A shipowner entered into a policy of marine insurance in which the risks insured against included perils of the sea, and in which there was a clause that "no claim arising from the cancelling of a charter" should be allowed, and during the continuance of such policy he entered into a charter-party whereby the ship was to proceed to the port of K., to load for the contemplated voyage. The ship stranded before arriving at the port of loading, and the delay caused by the repairing of the damage was so great that the voyage became commercially impossible owing to the port having become blocked for the winter by ice. The charterers annulled the charter, and forwarded their cargo by another ship. In a claim by the shipowner against the insurance company for the freight so lost:

Held, that what took place amounted to a "cancellation" of the charter-party within the meaning of the clause, and that though the chartered freight was lost through the perils of the sea, and the risk insured against had arisen,

(a) Reported by W. W. Orr, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

the shipowner was prevented by such clause from recovering the freight which but for such clause he would have been entitled to recover.

Award stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court.

By an agreement of reference between George Jamieson and the Newcastle Steamship Freight Insurance Association it was agreed that certain matters in dispute between the parties should be referred to Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C. as arbitrator.

The claim in respect of which the dispute arose was a claim by Mr. Jamieson, who was the owner of the steamship Abrota, against the Newcastle Steamship Freight Insurance Association, for 762*l*., alleged to be due under a marine policy of insurance for 800*l*. upon the freight of the Abrota, which policy was dated the 23rd Feb. 1893, and was executed by the association. It was a time policy, the insurance being from the 20th Feb. 1893 to the 20th Feb. 1894, and the rules of the association formed part of the policy. The risks insured against included perils of the sea (rule 6), and by rule 8 it was provided that "no claim arising from the cancelling of any charter, nor for loss of time under a time charter, should be allowed."

On the 10th Oct. 1893, whilst the policy was in force, a charter-party was entered into between the owners of the Abrota and Messrs. Math. Ullern & Cie., of Honfleur, by which the Abrota was chartered by Messrs. Ullern to proceed to Kotka, and there load a cargo for Honfleur.

On the 4th Oct. 1893, the Abrota left St. Petersburg for Kotka, and on the same day stranded. On the 15th Oct. she was got off, and soon afterwards it was found that she had sustained considerable damage. The repair of the damage was commenced on the 31st Oct., and was completed on the 11th Dec. In the meantime about the 4th Dec., the port of Kotka had become closed for the winter by ice.

On the 26th Oct. 1893, the charterers sent a telegram to Mr. Jamieson, inquiring whether the Abrota would load at once, or he would cancel the charter-party. The telegram was in French as follows:

Télégraphiez si Abrota chargera immédiatement ou si vous résiliez.

On the 27th Oct. Mr. Jamieson wrote to his brokers, asking them to reply to the charterer's telegram, and stating as follows:

The position is if we cancel the charter we void our insurance. Now it is for the cargo owner to act, that is to say, charter another steamer and bring the cargo away, giving us notice of their intention of doing so, and for them to run the risk of cancelling the charter, as we cannot take this responsibility on our shoulders.

The brokers accordingly wrote to the charterers in accordance with Mr. Jamieson's instructions, and the charterers, on the 31st Oct., sent to Mr. Jamieson this telegram:

Your agents have declared the Abrota is unable to fulfil the charter, inviting us to charter another ship, the charter of the Abrota is therefore annulled.

On the same day Mr. Jamieson replied by a telegram:

Abrota cannot agree cancel charter; if you forward by another steamer, you must take all responsibility.

The charterers being unwilling to wait for the Abrota, refused to load her under the charter-party, and forwarded their cargo by another steamer.

The arbitrator found as a fact that on the 14th Oct. 1893 the vessel was damaged by perils of the sea, and that the time necessary for repairing such damage was so long that the voyage contemplated in the charter-party became in a commercial sense impossible. He found that on the 31st Oct. 1893 there was no probability that the vessel could be loaded at Kotka within a reasonable time, and that the charterers were therefore entitled then to give, and did give, notice to the shipowners that they would not load the vessel under the charter-party. He also found that there was under these circumstances a loss of freight by perils insured against in respect of which Mr. Jamieson would be entitled to recover 762*l*. from the assurance association if his claim was not a claim arising from the cancelling of any charter-party within the meaning of rule 8.

Construing the words of rule 8 in the sense in which they would be ordinarily understood by men of business, especially having regard to the object of the words in question, the arbitrator found that under the circumstances set forth the charter-party was cancelled within the meaning of the rule, and he found that Mr. Jamieson's claim was a claim arising from the cancelling of a charter-party.

Subject to the opinion of the court on the question stated, he awarded that Mr. Jamieson was not entitled to recover anything from the association in respect of the matters in dispute, and he awarded that Mr. Jamieson should pay to the association the taxed costs of the reference and award.

No witnesses were called before the arbitrator to prove that the word "cancelled" had any technical or peculiar meaning in shipping or insurance business, and it was not contended that the word had acquired any such technical or peculiar meaning.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, under the circumstances, the claim of Mr. Jamieson was a claim arising from the cancelling of a charter-party within the meaning of rule 8.

Bigham, Q.C. and H. F. Boyd for the plaintiff. —The question is whether there was a cancellation of the charter-party within the meaning of the rule, and upon this point we submit that the arbitrator was wrong in holding that there was a cancelling of the charter-party, and that therefore the plaintiff is entitled to recover, as his claim is not a claim arising from the cancelling of a charter-party. No doubt it had become impossible to repair the vessel in time for the voyage, but that is not a cancellation of the charter. A cancellation must be an act done by both parties, just as the rescinding of a contract, but at the same time there may be a provision in the contract giving an option to cancel, in which case it may be done by one party. But if there be no such power or option, it can only be done by both parties. In Jackson v. The Union Marine Insurance Company Limited (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 31 L. T. Rep. 789; L Rep. 10 C. P. 125), the facts were very similar to those in the present case, and it was there found as a fact that the time necessary for getting the stranded ship off and repairing her was so long as to put an end, in a commercial sense, to the speculation between the shipowners and the charterers, and upon that the Exchequer Chamber held that there was a loss of the chartered freight through perils of the sea, and that the shipowner could therefore recover. The finding of fact there was exactly the same as the finding of fact here. Where there is a cancelling date, such as a day fixed for loading, then, if the ship does not arrive on that day, the party who is to load may refuse to load, and may treat the charter as cancelled. [Charles, J.—The arbitrator has found that the voyage had become in a commercial sense impossible, and the question now is whether that amounts to a cancellation.] Cancellation can only be effected by the act of both parties. [Charles, J.—That is the very question here.] In the telegram of the 26th Oct. the word "resiliez" is used; that is equivalent to the word "cancel," and our contention is that, unless there is a cancelling date or a cancelling option—which there was not here—cancellation can only be done by both parties. On the 14th Oct. when the vessel was incapable of performing the voyage, the contract came to an end, but was not "cancelled." In the case of The Mercantile Steamship Company Limited v. Tyser (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 6; 7 Q. B. Div. 73), where the judgment was for the defendant, the charterers had under the charter the option of cancelling the charter-party. That case, therefore, is different from this case, as here there is no such option.

Finlay, Q.B. (Scrutton with him) for the defendant association.—The finding of the arbitrator here was perfectly correct, and the defendants ought to succeed. For the plaintiff to succeed it is necessary for him to make out as a matter of law that the word "cancelled" has not the meaning in that rule that the arbitrator has found. We submit that the meaning the arbitrator has found is the true legal meaning of the word "cancellation." In Adamson v. The Newcastle Steamship Freight Insurance Association (the same association as in this case, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 41 L. T. Rep. 160; 4 Q. B. Div. 462), the word "cancelled" was used, and the question was whether the words "cancellation of the charter-party" applied to such a case as the stopping of ports by the breaking out of war, and whether such words gave an option to either party to cancel the charter-party, or whether they put an end to the charter. That case is an authority for showing that whether we regard the circumstances here as putting an end to the charter-party, or as giving the option to put an end to it, in either event the charter-party came to an end by cancellation, and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. The contention for the plaintiff here has been that to produce cancellation you must have the exercise of the volition of both parties, and that the consenting minds of both may cancel. But suppose that the charterers and shipowner had met and agreed that the voyage was impossible, and that the adventure was at an end, that would undoubtedly be a cancellation. What difference, then, can it make if the adventure be really at an end, though they may not formally agree that it is so? It would be utterly unreasonable to suppose (as the plaintiff's contention requires) that, if the parties had met and agreed that the charter-party had come to an end then, there should be no claim and no liability, but that if there was no such agreement there would be liability on the part of the defendants. Here it was not the perils of the sea that caused the freight to be lost, but the exercise of the right to cancel owing to the impossibility of the voyage, and that brings the case within the principle laid down in

The Mercantile Steamship Company Limited v. Tyser, 7 Q. B. Div. 73; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 6.

In Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, for the meaning of the words "cancelled," and charter-party "to be cancelled," reference is made to the case of Adamson v. The Newcastle Steamship Freight Insurance Association (ubi sup.), and in the Imperial Dictionary "cancel" is said to be derived from "cancellare," and means "to furnish with lattice work, to cancel by drawing lines across in the form of lattice work; to annul or destroy," &c.; and as to the meaning of the word "résiliez" in the telegram, Littré in his dictionary gives it as equivalent to "annul." He also referred to the cases of

The Inman Steamship Company Limited v. Bischoff, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 6; 47 L. T. Rep. 581; 7 App. Cas. 670;

The Bedouin, 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391; 69 L. T. Rep. 782; (1894) P. 1.

Boyd in reply.—"Cancellation" is a word used actively, and it implies some act of the parties done by agreement. It is derived from the verb "cancellare," which is an active verb, and means inclosing with lattice work, or drawing lines across, such as crossing a stamp or bill. What has taken place here has been a loss of the voyage by the perils insured against, and not a cancellation of the charter-party.

Charles, J.—The arbitrator finds as a fact that upon the 14th Oct. the vessel was damaged by perils of the sea; that the time necessary for repairing the damage was so long that the voyage contemplated in the charter-party became in a commercial sense impossible, and that (construing rule 8 in the sense in which he considers them to be ordinarily understood by men of business) under the circumstances the charter-party was cancelled within the meaning of the rule, and that Mr. Jamieson's claim was a claim arising out of that cancellation, and therefore falls within the terms of clause 8. That being so, the whole question we have to determine is whether total frustration of the adventure by reason of the vessel stranding on the 4th Oct. does or does not amount to a cancellation of the charter within the meaning of that clause. There can be no doubt, having regard to the finding of the arbitrator, that it must be taken that this adventure was absolutely frustrated. That is especially found in the case, and therefore, had there been no special words in clause 8, the case would have been similar to the case of Jackson v. The Union Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), where the effect of a total frustration of the adventure was fully considered by the court of the Exchequer Chamber, and where the court were of opinion that the adventure had been totally frustrated, and that the charterer could no longer have been forced to load the cargo which he undertook to load on board the ship, and for which the freight was to be paid. The court having arrived at the conclusion that the adventure was totally frustrated, went on to arrive at the further conclusion that the freight had been lost, and lost by the perils of the sea, and therefore, that the risk attached which was provided for by the policy of insurance, and that the insurance company were liable to pay. The court came to the conclusion that, the charterer being no longer bound to load, the chartered freight had been lost, and lost in consequence of the stranding of the ship. That case undoubtedly would apply here were it not for this restrictive clause, because here the arbitrator has found what the Court of Exchequer Chamber found in that case, that the adventure being totally frustrated, the charterer was not bound to load, and if he had chosen to load for a summer voyage instead of the voyage he intended, an autumn voyage, it would have been under a new contract, and not under the charter-party at all. In other words, as I understand the judgment of Bramwell, B., in the Exchequer Chamber, the court came to the conclusion that the charter-party was at an end as a contract between the parties. Bramwell, B. says (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 443; 31 L. T. Rep. at p. 793; L. Rep. 10 C. P. at p. 145): "There is, then, a condition precedent that the vessel shall arrive in a reasonable time. On failure of this the contract is at an end and the charterers discharged, though they have no cause of action, as the failure arose from an excepted peril. The same result follows, then, whether the implied condition is treated as one that the vessel shall arrive in time for that adventure, or one that it shall arrive in a reasonable time, that time being, in time for the adventure contemplated. And in either case . . . non-arrival and incapacity by that time ends the contract; the principle being, that, though non-performance of a condition may be excused, it does not take away the right to rescind from him for whose benefit the condition was introduced." Then the learned judge goes through the authorities, and proceeds: "Then, there are the cases which hold that, where the shipowner has not merely broken his contract, but so broken it that the condition precedent is not performed, the charterer is discharged. Why? Not merely because the contract is broken. If it is not a condition precedent, what matters it whether it is unperformed with or without excuse? Not arriving with due diligence, or at a day named, is the subject of a cross action only. But not arriving in time for the voyage contemplated, but at such a time that it is frustrated, is not only a breach of contract, but discharges the charterer. Taylor v. Caldwell (8 L. T. Rep. 356; 3 B. & S. 826) is a strong authority in the same direction." Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) was a case in which during the time that a music hall had been let by one party to another, the hall was burnt to the ground, and it was held in a considered judgment given by Blackburn, J., that owing to the disappearance of the music hall—it having been burnt to the ground before the time of performance came—that the contract came to an end, that there was nothing for it to operate upon, and it became impossible of performance. Again, Bramwell, B. goes on to say in Jackson's case: "But, if I am right, that the voyage, the adventure, was frustrated by perils of the seas, both parties were discharged, and a loading of cargo in August would have been a new adventure, a new agreement." Nothing could be clearer than those words to show that the learned judges were of opinion that the agreement had come to an end in the events which had happened. Here the same event has happened as had happened in the case of Jackson v. The Union Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), namely, that the voyage contemplated by the charter-party had become impossible. As I understand the meaning of that case, therefore, the agreement is at an end; the chartered freight has been lost; the risk which has been insured against has arisen, and the insurance company is liable. Then comes the question in the case: Is the insurance company to remain liable notwithstanding the insertion of these restrictive words in clause 8? I have come to the conclusion that the arbitrator was right, and that the liability no longer existed. "Cancellation," I agree, is not a happy word to use in reference to this matter, nor would "rescission" be a very accurate word to use. But the substance of the matter is that the charter-party has ceased to exist. That being so, the mode in which that fact is indicated appears to me to be comparatively immaterial. It is true that in one sense the word "cancellation" points to an act of the parties, and that was really the main argument for the plaintiff. It was said that a fact which happened, namely, the impossibility of the adventure. cannot cancel the contract; but the parties can, and here the parties have not, as they have done nothing. But in my judgment "cancellation" can be effected in the sense in which the word is here used, by the occurrence of facts which have indicated that the charter-party has become annulled, has ceased to exist, and I think it would be putting an undue restriction upon the word "cancellation" to hold that it means something or other done by either party. It is suggested for the plaintiff that the charter-party still exists as an agreement. I differ from that suggestion, and I do not think that it exists as an agreement at all any longer; it has passed away. The voyage which was contemplated can never be performed, and the agreement therefore has come to an end, and is annulled. If we were to hold otherwise, the singular result would follow that if the parties had met together and had agreed that neither party should bring an action against the other, then this clause would apply. Surely the same result must follow if the facts have taken place which prevent, in point of law, either party bringing an action against the other. I think, therefore, upon the whole, that it would be an undue restriction to say that the word "cancellation" only applies to that clause of a charter-party where the charterer is bound to cancel on some day mentioned in it, and I think that the clause really does include all the cases in which, in point of fact, the charter-party has ceased to have any effective existence. Upon these grounds, therefore, I think that the arbitrator was right.

Kennedy, J.—I agree in the conclusion arrived at, and for the same reasons, and I do not add anything.

Judgment for the defendants with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Botterell and Roche.

Solicitors for the defendants, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Tuesday, Jan. 29, 1895.

(Before Wills and Wright, JJ.)

Reg. v. Huggins and another (Justices of Gravesend); Ex parte Clancy. (a)

Justice of the peace—Interest disqualifying—Bias—Justice belonging to privileged class for whose benefit proceedings are taken—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 361.

C., an unlicensed pilot, was convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction under sect. 361 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, of having continued in charge of a ship after a qualified pilot had offered to take charge of her. M., one of the six justices who sat to hear and determine the case, was a duly qualified pilot and licensed for the same pilotage district, but for more than forty years he had been a "choice" pilot, that is, a pilot chosen and engaged beforehand by shipowners, and for the last nineteen years he had been, and was at the date of the conviction, in the service of a large steamship company, who were entitled to his exclusive services, and who never employed unlicensed pilots.

Held, that, as M. belonged to a small class of privileged persons for whose protection the proceedings were taken, there was such a reasonable apprehension of bias as to disqualify him from sitting, and that therefore the conviction was bad.

Rule calling on Henry Huggins and another, justices of the peace for the borough of Gravesend, and William Larkins. to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue for the removal of a conviction of Thomas James Clancy. for assuming and continuing in the charge of a ship as an unqualified pilot after a qualified pilot (the said William Larkins) had offered to take charge of her, and why the conviction should not be quashed on the ground that Thomas Martin had an interest in the subject-matter of the conviction.

At a court of petty sessions held on the 10th Oct. 1894, in and for the borough of Gravesend, Thomas James Clancy was summoned by William Larkins, for that he on the river Thames, then being an unqualified pilot, did unlawfully assume and continue in charge of a certain ship after the said William Larkins, a duly qualified pilot, had to his knowledge offered to take charge of her.

Six justices sat to hear and determine the case, and Clancy was convicted. After his conviction it came to his knowledge that one of the justices —Mr. Thomas Martin, who resided at Gravesend —was a pilot duly licensed by the Trinity House to take ships down the Thames to Gravesend, and also from Gravesend to the sea, and that at the time of the hearing and determination of the said summons against him, Mr. Martin was a duly qualified pilot, actively engaged as a pilot at Gravesend and in the London pilotage district.

The present rule for a certiorari was then obtained at the instance of Mr. Clancy, upon the grounds that Mr. Martin, being a licensed pilot, was in competition with unlicensed pilots, and therefore had a pecuniary interest in the result of the conviction and a substantial bias against the accused, and so was disqualified from sitting to hear and determine the case.

In an affidavit filed by Mr. Martin, he said that he never had, and has not now any interest whatever in the conviction of Clancy; that although he is a duly licensed Trinity House pilot, he does not in any way compete with Clancy, or any other unlicensed pilot; that the only licensed pilots who in any way compete with Clancy are those licensed pilots who take "turns" at a pilot station, and that he does not and never has taken any part in the "turn" system; that for forty-three years he has been a licensed "choice" pilot (that is, a pilot chosen and regularly engaged beforehand by ship owners to pilot their ships); that for nineteen years last past he has acted as a "choice" pilot for the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company only; that for five years last past he has acted as pilot on the outward voyages only of the ships of the said company; that he goes on board the said ships at Gravesend on the days appointed for sailing, and his licence entitles him to pilot the said ships as far as the Isle of Wight; that the ships of the said company never employ unlicensed pilots, but employ "choice" licensed pilots only, and that Mr. Clancy could not therefore compete with him in his employment as pilot of the ships of the company; that under the terms of his engagement with the company, the company are exclusively entitled to his services as pilot, and that he is not entitled to offer his services as pilot to any other employer so long as his engagement continues, and that therefore he cannot compete with Mr. Clancy in acting as pilot of ships other than those of the company; that in becoming party to the said conviction he was not in any way influenced by favour or prejudice for or against the accused or the class of pilots of which he is one, but acted solely on the evidence before him, and that the justices were unanimous in convicting Mr. Clancy.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) provides:

Sect. 360. A qualified pilot may supersede an unqualified pilot, but it shall be lawful for the master to pay to such unqualified pilot a proportionate sum for his services, and to deduct the same from the charge of the qualified pilot.

Sect. 361. An unqualified pilot assuming or continuing in the charge of any ship after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of her, or using a licence which he is not entitled to use for the purpose of making himself appear to be a qualified pilot, shall for each offence incur a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds.

Sect. 362. An unqualified pilot may, within any pilotage district, without subjecting himself or his employer to any penalty, take charge of a ship as pilot under the following circumstances: that is to say, when no qualified pilot has offered to take charge of such ship, or made a signal for that purpose, &c.

Poland, Q.C. and R. D. Muir for Larkins, showed cause.—Mr. Clancy was an unlicensed pilot, and as he had continued in charge of the ship after the prosecutor in the action, a qualified pilot, had offered to take charge of her, he had undoubtedly committed an offence under sect. 361. It is said here that Mr. Martin, being a qualified pilot, was in competition with the class of unlicensed pilots, and therefore with Clancy, and that he was in consequence disqualified from sitting as having an interest in the result. There are three classes of cases where a person has been held disqualified from acting as a judge, namely, where he acts as prosecutor and judge; where he has a pecuniary interest in the result of the proceedings; and where he has such a substantial bias as would prevent him from acting as an impartial judge. A person then, to be free from disqualification, must not act as prosecutor and judge, must have no pecuniary interest in the result, and must have no substantial bias:

(a) Reported by W. W. Orr, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Reg. v. Handsley and others, 8 Q. B. Div. 383.

[Wright, J.—Actual bias is not necessary.] There must be a substantial bias; the mere possibility of bias will not be sufficient to disqualify:

Reg. v. Myers and others, 34 L. T. Rep. 247; 1 Q. B. Div. 173.

[Wills, J.—This person had a legal right to go and compete with the accused if he chose, and had he not therefore an interest in the result?] The substance is that he had not the smallest personal interest of any kind in the matter. He says he is in the permanent and sole employment of this company, and therefore he could have no interest as a competitor with Clancy. The cases on the point are collected in Reg. v. Handsley (ubi sup.), and the present case does not fall within the rule laid down in that case. In the case of Reg. v. Allen and others (33 L. J. 98, M. C.), the point was considered as to disqualification by reason of justices having a direct interest in the matter, and the case of Ex parte Pettitmangin, referred to in a note to that case (at p. 99), is in favour of our contention, as there the court refused a rule for a certiorari to quash a conviction by two justices, one of whom was a member of a watch committee which had given instructions for the prosecution. So the judgments of Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ., in the case of Leeson v. The General Council of Medical Education and Registration (61 L. T. Rep. 849; 43 Ch. Div. 366), show that there was no disqualification here. There are numerous cases, such as prosecutions for cruelty to animals, where the justices may be interested in the result, and yet no disqualification. It is not enough merely to connect the justices with the prosecution in some form or other; and this is quite consistent with the decision in

Reg. v. The London County Council; Ex parte Akkersdyk, 66 L. T. Rep. 168; (1892) 1 Q. B. 190.

We can find no case exactly like the present, and if this conviction be quashed the decision will go beyond any case yet decided. Clancy was no more a competitor than a pilot acting for any other port, and even if Martin's engagement with the Peninsular and Oriental Company were terminated, Clancy could not compete with him in his employment as pilot, and therefore Martin could have no pecuniary interest whatever in the result.

R. W. Burnie in support of the rule.—I rely upon both grounds of the rule, and I submit that Mr. Martin was disqualified both on the ground of pecuniary interest, and on the ground of bias. He had a pecuniary interest in the result of this particular conviction, in the subject-matter of this conviction. [Wright, J.—There was no pecuniary interest.] He had a pecuniary interest to this extent that, at any moment he might become a pilot competing with unqualified pilots, and the cases show that the very slightest pecuniary interest, however small, is sufficient to disqualify. I also rely on the second ground of the rule that there was a likelihood of real, substantial bias, although no bias may in fact have existed. The qualified pilots at Gravesend are a small class, and by the rules of the Trinity House, if a person has not offered his services before a certain age he cannot become a qualified pilot, although he may continue to act after that age if he be already qualified. The class is therefore limited, and selected not by open competition, but in that limited way. It is not illegal to be an unqualified pilot, and in fact in certain cases the section under which Clancy was convicted (sect. 361), allows an unqualified pilot to take charge of a compulsory ship, and as a fact an unqualified pilot is preferred by masters of ships, and consequently the qualified pilot comes into direct competition with the unqualified pilot. He would come into the keenest competition with that class to which Clancy belongs, namely, unqualified pilots. Apart from the question of pecuniary interest, I submit that this is a case where we have on the one hand an unqualified pilot legally entitled to take charge of ships, and on the other hand the limited class of qualified pilots to which Mr. Martin belongs, and it is therefore a clear case of a real probability of bias.

Wills, J.—This is a case of some difficulty, because, as in all such cases, it is difficult to keep separate the different questions of interest, bias, and the risk of bias. Undoubtedly in some of the decisions on this subject there has been confusion in the terms used in cases where the disqualification is pecuniary interest, and in cases where the disqualification is bias. Again, there are other cases where the objection was not so much on the ground of bias, as on the ground that the same person cannot act as prosecutor and judge. There have been other cases in which the tribunal giving the decision was not properly speaking a judicial body, but was acting in such a way that, although it was not a judicial body, its proceedings were contrary to natural justice, and upon that ground the decision was not allowed to stand. In each one of these qualifying circumstances the considerations are not identical, and unless this is clearly kept in mind we may be led astray by expressions perfectly right with regard to certain states of facts, but incorrect with regard to such a case as this. Now in this case the facts which seem to be important are those relating to the question of bias, because the point as to pecuniary interest is out of the question. The point, then, we have to decide is whether there was bias, that is, actual bias, or a reasonable risk of bias—such a reasonable apprehension of bias as a man might justly entertain; and we have also to consider what the result would be in the future if similar things were allowed to be done in similar circumstances. I do not myself for a moment attribute to Mr. Martin that he was subject to actual bias. There are no facts stated in the affidavits upon which we could come to that conclusion. But at the same time he does belong to a small class of privileged persons for whose protection against unlicensed pilots these proceedings were taken. That seems to me to be the important point here, namely, that Mr. Martin belongs to a small class of privileged persons whose privileges were being interfered with by Clancy. I cannot help thinking that under such circumstances the result is not satisfactory, and in the interests of the administration of justice this conviction ought not to be allowed to stand. It is most important in the administration of justice by magistrates, who now have so many jurisdictions to exercise, that such administration should be free not only from any interference by motives which ought not to influence judicial tribunals, but also from any appearance of conduct which might give reasonable apprehension of such motives. If such reasonable apprehension became general it might seriously interfere with the administration of justice, and impair the confidence which the public ought to have in such administration. Suppose, as has been very properly put by my brother Wright during the argument, that all the justices had been licensed pilots, or that all had been unlicensed pilots, could anyone say that it would have been a proper tribunal to try such a case as this. There can be only one answer to that question, and the same principle applies here where one only of the justices was a licensed pilot. Without attributing to Mr. Martin anything approaching to misconduct, or anything more than a mistake which was natural under the circumstances, as no objection was made to him, I think there is enough in this case to justify us in saying that the constitution of the bench was not such as it ought to have been, and the key-note of my judgment therefore is that this gentleman belonged to a small class for whose benefit these proceedings were taken.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. Mr. Poland has referred to cases where this court has been asked to interfere on somewhat similar grounds with the proceedings of administrative bodies—not courts of justice, but administrative bodies such as the county council, or the college of physicians. But there is a real difference between the two cases. We ought to be very slow indeed to interfere with those outside bodies, unless something really wrong has been done; but not so with regard to inferior courts. With regard to them we ought to act on slighter grounds than in the case of administrative bodies.

Rule absolute.

Solicitor for applicant, E. H. Bedford.

Solicitors for Larkins, Sismey and Sismey, for Tolhurst, Lovell, and Clinch, Gravesend.

Wednesday Jan. 30, 1895.

(Before LAWRANCE and WRIGHT, JJ.)

STAFFORD (app.) v. DYER (resp.). (a)

Compulsory pilotage—Unexempted vessel—Qualification of pilot—Refusal to take pilot—Liability of master—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 353—Order in Council, Feb. 5, 1873.

The Merchant Shipping Act provides, by sect. 353, that every master of any unexempted ship, navigating within a compulsory pilotage district, who, after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of such ship, either himself pilots such ship without possessing a pilotage certificate enabling him so to do, or employs or continues to employ an unqualified person to pilot her, shall for every such offence incur a penalty of double the amount of pilotage demandable for the conduct of such ship.

The appellant was the holder of a licence which entitled him to act as pilot for the purpose of conducting exempted ships, and no others, up and down the river Thames. The respondent was the master of an unexempted ship which the appellant offered to pilot on an occasion when she was navigating up the river Thames, no pilot licensed to pilot unexempted ships having offered his services. The respondent refused to accept the services of the appellant, and employed an unlicensed pilot to navigate the ship.

The appellant sought to recover a penalty against the respondent under the above section on the ground that he was a qualified pilot.

Held, that the respondent was not liable to a penalty, as the appellant was not a qualified pilot for the purpose of navigating the respondent's ship.

THIS was a case stated by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, acting in and for the borough of Gravesend.

On the 5th Oct 1894 the justices heard and dismissed a certain summons issued upon an information preferred by the appellant against the respondent under sect. 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), for that the respondent on the 27th Sept. 1894, on the river Thames, at and in the said borough, then and there being the master of the ship Falcon, then navigating within the compulsory district called "the London District," unlawfully (after the appellant, a qualified pilot, had, to the knowledge of the respondent, offered to take charge of such ship) did employ and continue to employ an unqualified person, namely, one George Kemp, to pilot her.

The following facts were proved on the first hearing:

The respondent was the master of the British steamship Falcon which trades and carries passengers between London and Hull. On the 27th Sept. 1894 the Falcon was off Gravesend, and was then carrying passengers on a voyage from Hull to London, when the appellant offered to take charge of her as pilot from Gravesend to London. The respondent refused the appellant's offer. The appellant is licensed to pilot exempted ships between London and Gravesend. When the appellant offered to take charge of the ship, no pilot licensed to pilot between London and Gravesend unexempted ships carrying passengers between places in the United Kingdom had offered his services. After the offer and refusal, the respondent continued to employ an unqualified person, one Kemp, to pilot the ship from Gravesend to London, which is within the compulsory pilotage district called "the London District."

Among the different classes of pilots for the river Thames between London Bridge and Gravesend are the following: (1) The fully qualified pilots who are free from the restrictions of the other classes hereinafter named. (2) Those licensed under the Order in Council of the 1st May, 1855 who until after a term of service and further examination are limited to ships not exceeding fourteen feet draft, unless there shall be no fully qualified pilot to be obtained. (3) Those licensed under the same Order in Council to pilot home trade passenger ships only. (4) Those licensed under the Order in Council of the 5th Feb. 1873, to pilot exempted ships and no others. The appellant belongs to this class. (5) Pilots who have no licence from any pilotage authority. Kemp belongs to this class.

(a) Reported by W. H. HORSFALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant: (1) That the appellant was a "qualified pilot," within the meaning of sect. 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. (2) That, if the appellant was so qualified, the respondent had incurred the penalty named in the section. The case of The Carl XV. (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 242; 68 L. T. Rep. 149; (1892) P. 132, 324) was cited in support of these contentions.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the appellant was not a qualified pilot within the above section, and that, therefore, no penalty had been incurred by the respondent.

The justices being of opinion that the appellant was not a "qualified pilot" for the ship within the meaning of sect. 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and that therefore no penalty had been incurred by respondent, dismissed the summons and information.

The licence of the appellant was dated the 23rd March 1892, and the material portion was as follows:

> This licence does not authorise the bearer to pilot any ship carrying passengers. Pilot for exempted ships . . .
>
> We, the Trinity House . . . do hereby appoint and licence the said Edward George Stafford to act as a pilot for the purpose of conducting exempted ships and no others up and down the river Thames between London Bridge and the Town Pier, Gravesend . . . Provided always that this licence shall not authorise or empower the said Edward George Stafford to supersede in the charge of any ship any other pilot duly licensed by the Trinity House for the said navigation between London Bridge and Gravesend.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), enacts:

> Sect. 2. "Qualified pilot" shall mean any person duly licensed by any pilotage authority to conduct ships to which he does not belong.
>
> Sect. 353. Subject to any alteration to be made by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the power hereinbefore in that behalf given, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory immediately before the time when this Act comes into operation: and all exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing within such districts shall also continue in force; and every master of any unexempted ship navigating within any such district who, after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of such ship or has made a signal for that purpose, either himself pilots such ship without possessing a pilotage certificate enabling him so to do, or employs or continues to employ an unqualified pilot to pilot her . . . shall for every such offence incur a penalty of double the amount of pilotage demandable for the conduct of such ship.

The appellant obtained his licence under the provisions of an Order in Council of the 5th Feb. 1873 (see Maude and Pollock's Law of Merchant Shipping, 4th edit., vol. 2, p. 79), which provides:

> Paragraph 2 (1) that such licence shall authorise him to act as pilot only on board such exempted ships, and no others; all pilots so licensed being intended to be designated "pilots for exempted ships;" (2) that such licence shall not authorise him to supersede in the charge of any ship any other pilot duly licensed by the Trinity House for the said navigation between London Bridge and Gravesend.

Sir W. Phillimore and Muir for the appellant.—It is submitted that the decision of the justices was wrong. The appellant is a "qualified pilot," and although he only holds a licence to pilot exempted ships, yet, if there is no qualified pilot ready to pilot an unexempted ship, the appellant is entitled to do so in preference to an unqualified pilot. The man who acted as pilot of this ship was not a qualified pilot. It has been held that a ship is not liable for the injury caused by the negligence of a pilot when navigating in a compulsory pilotage district although the pilot does not hold a licence which qualifies him to act as pilot of such ship:

> The Carl XV., 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 242; 68 L. T. Rep. 149; (1892) P. 132, 234.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Isaacs were not called upon.

Lawrance, J.—I think that this appeal must be dismissed. The licence which the appellant held authorised him to pilot exempted ships and no others, and the ship in the present case appears to have been an unexempted ship. He received his licence under the terms of an Order in Council which contains no proviso that he is to be entitled to supersede an unqualified pilot in charge of a ship for which he himself is not qualified.

Wright, J.—I am of the same opinion. In The Carl XV. (ubi sup.) both Sir C. Butt and the Court of Appeal rested their decision upon the words "unless there shall be no qualified pilot to be obtained who has passed the said examination for ships drawing more than fourteen feet of water." Those words appear in the Order in Council under the provisions of which the pilot in that case obtained his licence. There are no such words in the Order in Council under which the appellant obtained his licence, nor are there any such words in the licence itself. The appellant was only licensed for exempted ships, and he was therefore not qualified to pilot the ship of which the respondent was master. This appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Sismey and Sismey, for Tolhurst, Lovell, and Clinch, Gravesend.
Solicitor for the respondent, W. Batham.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Jan. 25, 26, and Feb. 6, 1895.

(Before Bruce, J.)

The Charlton. (a)

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Bristol Channel Pilotage District—Port of Bristol—Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 160).

A vessel lying at anchor about a mile to the north-west of the English and Welsh Grounds Light-ship in the Bristol Channel was run into by a steamship proceeding from Bristol to Cardiff, which was in charge of a pilot licensed by the Bristol Corporation for the port of Bristol and the Bristol Channel Pilotage District. One rate is payable for the pilotage of a vessel from

(a) Reported by Butler Aspinall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bristol to any part of the Bristol Channel eastward of the Holms.

In the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 160) the boundary of the port of Bristol between the Holms and Aust is stated to be "from the westwardmost part of the Flat and Steep Holms, up the course of the Bristol Channel eastward to Aust in the county of Gloucester."

Held, that the boundary of the port of Bristol between the Holms and Aust is a straight line between those two places and does not follow the course of the navigable channel.

Held further, that the collision being to the northwestward of such line was not within the port of Bristol, but as it was within the Bristol Channel Pilotage District, within a part of which (namely, the port of Bristol) the employment of a pilot was compulsory, and as one pilotage rate was payable to a part of the district beyond the spot where the collision occurred, the pilot was not the defendants' servant, and they were exonerated from liability for his negligence.

THIS was an action in rem, instituted by the owners of the steamship Beechdene, against the owners of the steamship Charlton and freight, to recover compensation for damage occasioned by a collision between the two vessels on the 28th Aug. 1894 in the Bristol Channel.

The Beechdene was at anchor about a mile to the north-west of the English and Welsh Grounds Lightship when she was run into and damaged by the Charlton whilst the latter was proceeding from Bristol to Cardiff.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants with negligent navigation and not keeping a good look-out. The defendants, by their defence, denied that a good look-out was not kept on board the Charlton; but admitted that the collision was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Charlton. They further pleaded that the damage to the plaintiffs' vessel was occasioned by the fault or incapacity of the pilot of the Charlton, that such pilot was a qualified pilot in charge of the Charlton at the time of the collision, and that the collision occurred within the Bristol pilotage district in which or in part of which the employment of a pilot was by law compulsory on the defendants.

Bruce, J. found that the negligence was solely that of the pilot; and the question as to whether the pilot was in charge of the Charlton so as to relieve the owners from liability now came on for argument.

The Bristol Wharfage Act 1807 (47 Geo. 3, c. 33), s. 9, provides that all vessels (with certain exceptions) navigating the Bristol Channel eastwards of Lundy Island are bound to carry a pilot. Sect. 11 enforces a penalty upon persons acting as pilots without being licensed for the district. Sect. 17 gives power to the Corporation of Bristol to fix and establish rates of pilotage for all pilots licensed for the Bristol Channel.

By the Bristol Dock Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 66, masters are compelled to take pilots within the port of Bristol.

The Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 236), s. 4, repealed so much of sect. 9 of the Bristol Wharfage Act 1807 "as relates to vessels navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from either of the said ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester."

By the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 39, certain powers with respect to pilotage were conferred upon the Board of Trade, which the board was authorised to exercise by provisional order. In accordance with these powers a provisional order was duly issued with regard to vessels navigating the Bristol Channel, and confirmed by the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 160).

The order, as set out in the schedule to that Act, contains (inter alia) the following:

3. Notwithstanding anything contained in the Bristol Wharfage Act 1807, the masters and owners of all vessels sailing, navigating, or passing up or down the Bristol Channel to or from the port of Bristol, shall be, and they are by this Order, exempted from all obligation to be conducted, piloted, or navigated, by pilots authorised or licensed by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Bristol, except when within the limits of that port, which limits are as follows: namely, from the westwardmost part of the Flat and Steep Holms, up the course of the Bristol Channel eastward to Aust, in the county of Gloucester, and from the said Holms southward athwart the channel to Uphill, and from thence along the coast eastward in the counties of Somerset and Gloucester to Aust aforesaid, and also from Holesmouth in Kingroad up the Avon to the city of Bristol, together with the several pills lying on the said river.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Scrutton for the defendants. —The collision occurred within the port of Bristol, and where pilotage was compulsory. The true construction of the Order of 1891 is, that the port includes all the water east of the Flat and Steep Holms which can be used for navigation as far as Aust, irrespective of whether it is north or south of a line drawn from Flatholm to Aust. The fact that the westwardmost part of the islands is chosen shows that the line limiting the port is intended to go across the channel. Pilotage was originally compulsory under the Bristol Wharfage Act 1807 for all vessels eastward of Lundy Island. Only a part of that compulsion was removed by the Act of 1861, namely, with respect to vessels bound to or from Newport, Cardiff, or Gloucester. But even if the collision did not occur where pilotage is compulsory, the pilot was not the servant of the owners, but still in charge so as to relieve them from liability. Pilotage is admittedly compulsory in the Avon, the mere fact that the pilot had passed out of the port does not make him the defendants' servants. There was only one rate to pay, and this rate took him beyond the place of collision. This brings us within

The General Steam Navigation Company v. The British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company Limited, 20 L. T. Rep. 581; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 237; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238.

The Charlton was not employed in the coasting trade:

The Agricola, 2 W. Rob. 10;
The Lloyd's, or Sea Queen, 9 L. T. Rep. 236; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391; 32 L. J. 197, Adm. Br. & L. 359.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Dr. Raikes, Q.C. (Batten with them) for the plaintiffs.—The collision did not occur within the port of Bristol. The grant from which the definition of the port of Bristol is derived is obscure. Grants by the Crown are construed against the grantee. Where a grant is obscure, usage is the test:

The Duke of Beaufort v. The Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Swansea, 3 Ex. 413.

Primâ facie the definition means a straight line drawn from point to point. As soon as the vessel got out of the port of Bristol pilotage ceased to be compulsory, and charge could have been taken from the pilot. As the Charlton was bound to Cardiff, and was then in the waters of the Bristol Channel, she was expressly, by the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861, exempt from compulsory pilotage. This case is the converse of The General Steam Navigation Company v. The British, &c. (ubi sup.), because at the time of the collision the pilot had passed out of the limit for which he was paid.

Aspinall, Q.C. in reply.—The Charlton had not passed out of the limit for which the rate was paid.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 6.—BRUCE, J.—The collision in this case was admitted by the defence to be caused by the negligent navigation of the defendants' vessel, the Charlton; but the defendants denied that such negligent navigation was by themselves, or their servants, or by any person for whose acts they were responsible, and they allege that the damage was caused by the default of a pilot who was in charge of the Charlton at the time of the collision, and that the collision occurred within the Bristol pilotage district in which, or in part of which, the employment of a pilot was by law compulsory on the defendants. The plaintiffs joined issue on the defence except as to any admissions in the defence. It was clearly proved in evidence that the negligent navigation of the Charlton was the fault of the pilot alone, and therefore the only question to be decided is whether the owners are liable for the wrongful act of the pilot. The first question of fact is: Did the collision occur within the limits of the port of Bristol, as defined by the schedule in the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 160)? The actual place where the collision occurred is not in dispute; it is marked in red on the chart and is to the north and west of a line drawn from the westwardmost part of the Flat and Steep Holms to Aust. I am of opinion that this line is the westwardmost boundary of the port of Bristol, and that therefore the collision happened beyond the limits of the port. It has been contended that the words of the order set out in the schedule to the above-mentioned Act do not mean that a straight line from point to point is to form the westwardmost boundary of the port, but that an irregular line is to be taken "up the course of the Bristol Channel," so drawn as to include the main channel in the Bristol Channel. But I cannot accede to this contention; it seems to me to be unreasonable to suppose that any such indefinite boundary would be fixed. Where two points are mentioned between which a boundary is to run, I think, in the absence of express words, a straight line between the two points must be taken to indicate the boundary. I therefore come to the conclusion that the collision occurred outside of the limits of the port of Bristol as defined by the above Act.

It is plain that the effect of the Act of 1891 is to exempt all vessels, other than passenger vessels, passing up and down the Bristol Channel to or from the port of Bristol from the obligation to employ pilots except within the limits of the port of Bristol. This vessel was not a vessel carrying passengers, and it is not contended that it was compulsory upon her master to employ a pilot at the actual spot where the collision happened, assuming the spot to be outside the limits of the port. But it is urged, on the authority of the case of The General Steam Navigation Company v. The British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.), that the provisions contained in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 388, operate to exempt the owners and master from liability for loss or damage occasioned by the fault of any qualified pilot acting in charge of the ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law, even though the employment of the pilot may not have been compulsory at the spot where the collision happened. Did the collision happen within a pilotage district and was the pilot compulsorily employed within any part of the district, seems to be the form which, on the authority of the decision I have referred to, the question to be determined should assume. A pilotage district, I think, means a district for which pilots are licensed by any pilotage authority. By 47 Geo. 3, c. 33, commonly called the Bristol Wharfage Act 1807, after reciting that under certain charters and Acts there mentioned the corporation of Bristol had appointed pilots for the port of Bristol, and reciting that it was expedient that the authority of the said corporation should be extended to the appointment of pilots into and out of, and upon the whole of the Bristol Channel, it is enacted by sect. 9 that all vessels passing up, down, or upon the Bristol Channel to the eastward of Lundy Island except coasting vessels and Irish traders, should be conducted, piloted, and navigated by pilots duly authorised and licensed by the said corporation. And sect. 11 enforces a penalty upon persons acting as pilots without being licensed for the district aforesaid. By sect. 17 power is given to the said corporation to fix and establish rates of pilotage for all pilots licensed for the Bristol Channel. By 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 66, power is given to the Bristol Corporation to license persons to be and officiate as pilots within the port of Bristol, and a penalty is imposed upon any person not so licensed who shall pilot any vessel within such port. The Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 236), after reciting the Bristol Wharfage Act 1807, before mentioned, and reciting that a separate system of pilotage had been authorised for the harbour of Penarth, and reciting that, owing to the great extension of trade in the several ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester since the passing of the said Act of 1807, it was expedient that a separate system of pilotage should be established in the Bristol Channel in connection with those respective ports under the supervision of local boards for each of such ports, enacts (sect. 4) that so much of sect. 9 of the Bristol Wharfage Act 1807 as related to vessels (the word "vessels" according to the interpretation clause not including coasters or Irish traders) passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from either of the said ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester should be repealed. The Act then proceeds to establish a pilotage board for each of the said three ports, and defines the district over which each board shall exercise jurisdiction. By the order contained in the schedule to the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891, already mentioned, it is provided that, notwithstanding anything contained in the Bristol Wharfage Act 1807, the masters of all vessels up or down the Bristol Channel to or from the port of Bristol shall be exempted from the obligation to be piloted by pilots authorised by the corporation of Bristol, except when within the limits of the port. The result of this legislation appears to be that by the Bristol Wharfage Act a pilotage district was created for the whole of the Bristol Channel eastward of Lundy, the licensing authority being the corporation of Bristol. By the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 pilotage districts were created for Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester, and vessels passing up or down the Bristol Channel to or from either of the said ports were relieved from the operation of the compulsory clause contained in the Bristol Wharfage Act 1807. And by the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 the masters of all vessels passing up or down the Bristol Channel to or from the port of Bristol were exempted, notwithstanding anything contained in the Bristol Wharfage Act 1807, from being obliged to employ, outside the limits of the port, pilots licensed by the corporation of Bristol. But the obligation to employ pilots created by the Act of 1807 does not seem to have been further relaxed, at least so far as regards vessels going to or from Bristol or Cardiff. It may be that the pilotage districts of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester have been carved out of the Bristol Channel district, and made into separate districts, at least for some purposes; but, as it has not been suggested that the place of the collision is situated within the limits of any one of these ports, it does not become material to consider that question in this case. It is enough that the collision occurred in some part of the Bristol Channel district, if the employment of a pilot was compulsory in any part of the same district If the Bristol Channel pilotage district still exists I think it cannot be doubted that the collision occurred within it. Does the district still exist? The Bristol Wharfage Act 1807 is still in force except in so far as it is modified by subsequent legislation. Sect. 11 of the Act provides that no person shall take charge of any vessel or in any manner act as pilot within "the limits aforesaid" unless authorised by licence under the corporation of Bristol; "the limits aforesaid" being the Bristol Channel to the eastward of Lundy Island, as defined in sect. 9 of the above Act. The Bristol Wharfage Act 1807 has, as already observed, been modified by the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861, but only as regards the class of vessels specially referred to in sect. 4 of the Act of 1861. And, subject to the rights conferred by the Act of 1861 on the pilotage boards of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester, and subject to powers conferred by Acts, which it is not necessary to refer to, upon other authorities having jurisdiction over other ports in the Bristol Channel, the power of the Bristol corporation to license pilots for the Bristol Channel pilotage district seems to remain in force. I cannot help arriving at the conclusion that there still exists a Bristol Channel pilotage district. I am confirmed in this view by the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 2) Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 208). The schedule of that Act refers to the corporation of Bristol as the pilotage authority for the district of the Bristol Channel eastward of Lundy Island. The licence of the pilot who was in charge of the Charlton in this case was a licence to him to officiate as a pilot within the port of Bristol and "jurisdiction of the corporation of Bristol," and to pilot vessels navigating up, down, or upon the Bristol Channel to the eastward of Lundy Island, excepting coasting vessels and Irish traders, and except vessels bound to or from Swansea, Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester. He, therefore, holds a licence entitling him to act as pilot not only in the port of Bristol, but over the Bristol Channel, subject to the exceptions mentioned. The effect of these I will consider presently.

Having satisfied myself that there is a Bristol Channel pilotage district, the next question to be considered is, was the employment of a pilot compulsory upon the master of the Charlton in any part of such district? I think that the port of Bristol is included in the Bristol Channel district, and is part of the district regulated by the provisions of the Bristol Wharfage Act 1807 (see sect. 17 of that Act), and I think that the employment of a pilot is compulsory within the port of Bristol. The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 66, makes pilotage compulsory within the port of Bristol, and the provisions of that Act do not seem to be affected by the provisions of any of the subsequent Acts. Indeed, independently of the provisions of the Act last mentioned, pilotage seems to have been compulsory upon all vessels other than coasters and Irish traders under the Act of 1807, and the compulsory provisions of the Act, subject to the exceptions contained in sect. 4 of the Act of 1861 relating to vessels bound to or from Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, do not seem to have been relaxed as regards the port of Bristol. If the pilotage was compulsory within the port of Bristol, and the pilot in charge was compulsorily employed within the port, I do not see how I can avoid applying the principle laid down in the case of The General Steam Navigation Company v. The British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company Limited (ubi sup.). The pilot was undoubtedly a duly licensed pilot for the port of Bristol, licensed by the pilotage authority for the Bristol Channel pilotage district. I think he was also licensed by the same authority for that portion of the Bristol Channel pilotage district outside the limits of the port of Bristol. It is curious that the form of the licence granted to the pilot seems in its terms not to extend to give the pilot authority to pilot in the Bristol Channel, outside the limits of the port of Bristol, vessels bound to Cardiff. This vessel was bound from Bristol to Cardiff. I assume that the Bristol corporation has no power to licence a pilot to pilot a vessel bound to Cardiff within the limits of the port of Cardiff; but I do not well understand why this limited form of licence has been adopted. The words seem to have been copied from the operative words of sect. 4 of the Act of 1861; but if the licence is to be strictly construed, the words as used in the licence would have a much wider effect then the words as used in the section. But I think the words of sect. 4 of the Act of 1861 must be limited so as to apply only to vessels proceeding from sea to Cardiff and the other ports mentioned, or from Cardiff and the other ports mentioned to sea, and that it does not interfere with the rights of Bristol pilots to pilot vessels from parts of the Bristol Channel outside of limits of Cardiff and the other ports to Bristol or vice versâ. And I think it is reasonable to construe the licence as a licence to enable the pilot to conduct vessels from Bristol to any part of the Bristol Channel district not included in the limits of Cardiff and the other ports mentioned. Moreover, I think the words in the earlier part of the licence "jurisdiction of the Corporation of Bristol" ought to have some meaning given to them, and I think they are wide enough to confer authority upon the pilot to conduct a vessel over any part of the Bristol Channel pilotage district subject to the authority of the Corporation of Bristol. It appears from the table of pilotage rates approved by Her Majesty in Council on the 30th July 1891, that one rate is payable for the pilotage of a vessel from Bristol to the Holms, and it appeared from the evidence of the pilot that if he took a ship to the limits of the ports of Cardiff or Newport he would be paid the same rate as if he took the ship to the Holms. It seems, therefore, that the pilot was employed to take the ship for one rate from Bristol to a part of the Bristol Channel pilotage district beyond the place where the collision occurred. It seems, therefore, that the pilot having been taken on board compulsorily and put in charge of the ship, and the defendants having been compelled to pay the pilot for the pilotage of a vessel to a part of the district beyond the place where the collision happened, that I must hold, in accordance with the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in the case I have referred to, that the defendants are exonerated from liability for the negligence of a pilot who in law is not their servant. I have not arrived at this conclusion without some hesitation, because the complexity of the legislation affecting pilotage in the Bristol Channel is so great as to render it an exceedingly difficult task to understand the conflicting enactments which have from time to time come into force affecting one part or another of the district. And I fear that there are many pilotage districts round our coasts where the law is in the same perplexing state. I cannot help saying that it seems to me to be a reproach to a great nation whose "home is on the deep" that a series of modern enactments affecting the interest of plain seafaring men should be so voluminous, so carelessly framed, and of so confused a character, as to render it a matter of extreme difficulty so to piece them together as to make any consistent meaning out of them. As the defendants have from the first admitted that their vessel was negligently navigated, and the issue was taken alone on the question whether the negligent navigation was caused by the servants of the defendants, I think the defendants, according to the practice laid down in The Juno (34 L. T. Rep. 741; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 217; 1 P. Div. 135), followed in The Winton (49 L. T. Rep. 403; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 143; 8 P. Div. 176), and The Oakfield (54 L. T. Rep. 578; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 575; 11 P. Div. 34). are entitled to their costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Solicitors for the defendants, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Thursday, Feb. 28, 1895.

(Before BRUCE, J.)

THE STRATHGARRY. (a)

Practice — Salvage — Consolidation of suits — Consent of parties.

The considerations which lead the court to order consolidation in salvage suits are those of convenience and economy without regard to the consent of the parties, provided it can be done without injustice to the different claimants.

APPEAL to Bruce, J., in chambers from an order of the registrar.

F. Laing for the owners of the Medoc.

Butler Aspinall for the owners of the Hawkhurst.

Balloch for the owners of the Strathgarry.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the following judgment:

BRUCE, J.—Two actions of salvage having been instituted against the Strathgarry, her cargo and freight, the registrar ordered the two actions to be consolidated. One of these actions is an action on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Medoc, and in that action the plaintiffs claim that they rendered a salvage service of great importance in towing the Strathgarry in a disabled state a distance of about 255 miles into a port of safety. The other action is brought on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Hawkhurst against the same vessel; the plaintiffs in the action allege that they are entitled to recover a sum of 500*l*., stipulated to be paid to them by an agreement signed by the master of the Strathgarry, for services in the nature of towage, which were rendered in accordance with the request of the master of the Strathgarry. The plaintiffs in the action I have first mentioned appealed against the consolidation order made by the registrar. The case was heard by me in chambers, but as it seems to be important that the practice of the court with respect to the consolidation of salvage actions should be clearly settled, I undertook to give the matter careful consideration, and to give in court the reasons for my decision. I have come to the conclusion that I should affirm the consolidation order. It is quite true that different questions are raised in the two actions, but both actions relate to services rendered to the same ship, and both services commenced about the same period. The Hawkhurst was the first vessel to fall in with the Strathgarry, but the Medoc came up while the Hawkhurst was still in company with the Strathgarry. In both actions the degree of danger in which the Strathgarry was placed by reason of her disabled condition must form an element for the consideration of the court, and both actions to some extent depend upon the evidence of the same facts so far as regards this part of the case. The practice of the court in consolidating salvage actions has never been limited to cases where the rights of the various claimants depend upon the same facts, or arise out of services of the same description. So much may clearly be gathered from the judgment of Dr. Lushington in the case of The William Hutt (Lush. 25), and from the judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore in The Melpomene (28 L. T. Rep. 76; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 129). The matters which ordinarily lead the court to order consolidation in salvage actions are considerations of convenience and economy. Whenever the matters at issue in two or more actions arise out of services rendered to the same ship in relation to the same peril, it is ordinarily convenient to have the matter determined in one proceeding. Where actions are consolidated there is nothing to prevent parties who may have separate interests appearing by separate counsel, and any point in the case which may affect one or more of the parties apart from the others can as well be determined in a consolidated cause as in a separate action. There are certain formal steps which must be taken in order to obtain the trial of an action, and if each of several sets of salvors is allowed to carry on to hearing a separate action against the same property these formal steps must necessarily be taken in each action. But if the whole matter is brought before the court in one proceeding, then it becomes unnecessary for more than one of the parties to incur the expense of the formal proceedings incident to the hearing; and the defendant, in the event of the costs of the case being given against him, is not called upon to pay more than the single set of costs incurred in respect of these formal steps. It seems to me that convenience obviously points to the adoption of the procedure of consolidation whenever it can be done without injustice to rival claimants. In the present case, I think it is clear that the two sets of claimants must be entitled to appear by separate counsel, but, as I have said, there is nothing in a consolidation order to take away that right, and I cannot see that anyone will gain any advantage by neglecting to adopt a proceeding which will greatly lessen the formal costs of the hearing which would be incurred if the actions were not to be consolidated. At one time there was an inclination to relax the old practice of the court, and not to insist upon consolidation when it was objected to by one or other of the parties. It was for a time considered that by the exercise of its powers to condemn in costs a party who improperly refused to consent to consolidation the court would be able indirectly to prevent the parties being harassed by the unnecessary expense of double proceedings. This seems to have been the view expressed by Sir Robert Phillimore in the case of The Jacob Landstrom (40 L. T. Rep. 38; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 58; 4 P. Div. 191). But I am informed that the experience gained in the registry since 1878 has shown that very great difficulty is experienced in enforcing this rule as to costs, whilst in many cases the disallowance of costs after they had been incurred has been felt to be a considerable hardship. I believe it to be much better to adhere to the old practice and to consolidate actions wherever it appears to be convenient to do so, without regard to the consent of the parties, and without holding out any threat as to the costs which, in the absence of consolidation, must necessarily be incurred. The consent of the parties, which was all important in the proceeding which was known as consolidation at common law, is not a governing factor in the consolidation as practised in the Admiralty Court. At common law what was known as consolidation was, in effect, an order to stay several actions pending the trial of one, on the terms that the defendants in the actions that were stayed agreed that in the event of judgment being given for the plaintiff in the action which was tried, they would consent to a similar judgment being entered in the other actions. But consolidation in Admiralty means that the several causes shall be tried together as one case, and, as I have said, no other considerations than those of economy and convenience ought to influence the court. There may be cases where the circumstances are of such a nature that it would be inconvenient and unjust to consolidate the cases, and in those cases the court will, in the exercise of its discretion, refuse to consolidate, but when the actions may be conveniently consolidated without injustice to the parties, the court ought not to be prevented from making the order for consolidation simply on the ground that the parties withhold their consent. I have said that I confirm the decision of the registrar as to the consolidation order in question. Then there was a question raised as to which of the plaintiffs should have the conduct of the consolidated case. It seems to me that the rule which has always been acted upon is that the principal salvor should be the salvor to have the conduct of the consolidated cause. I cannot doubt in this case that the steamship Medoc rendered the service which is the principal service, and I think I ought to vary the registrar's order to the extent of giving them the conduct of the cause. As I have partly confirmed, partly varied, the decision of the registrar, I think I should best deal with the costs of the appeal by giving no costs.

Solicitors: for the owners of the Medoc, Gellatly, Warburton, and Co.; for the owners of the Hawkhurst, Thos. Cooper and Co.; for the owners of the Strathgarry, Botterell and Roche.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Nov. 13 and Dec. 17, 1894.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lords WATSON and MACNAGHTEN.)

WHITE AND CO. v. FURNESS, WITHEY, AND CO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Consignee for sale—Receipt of goods under bill of lading—Liability for freight—Deposit—Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), ss. 66-72.

A consignee for sale of a cargo shipped abroad and delivered to him out of a warehouse under a bill of lading, is not liable to be sued for the bill of lading freight if he has deposited the amount of such freight with the warehouse owner under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862.

Judgment of the court below reversed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and Smith, L.JJ., Davey, L.J. dissenting), reported in 70 L. T. Rep. 463, 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 450, and (1894) 1 Q. B. 483, who had affirmed a judgment of Day, J. at the trial.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought by the respondents, the owners of the steamship Inchulva, against the appellants, who were fruit and produce brokers and commission agents in Covent-garden Market, to recover the sum of 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* for freight alleged to be due to the former from the latter. The question raised by the appeal was whether a mere consignee for sale of a cargo shipped abroad and delivered to him here out of a warehouse under a bill of lading is liable to be sued for the bill of lading freight, although he has deposited the amount of such freight under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict., c. 63). By the Act in question, provision is made, (1) for enabling the owners of any ship arriving from foreign parts to land the goods on a wharf or in a warehouse (sect. 67); (2) for preserving his lien for freight and other charges on the goods so landed (sect. 68); (3) for the discharge of this lien either by the production of a receipt or release from the shipowners (sect. 69), or by a deposit by the owner of the goods of the amount claimed for freight and other charges (sect. 70); (4) for the payment by the warehouseman to the shipowner of the whole deposit in fifteen days, if there is no dispute between the shipowner and the owner of the goods as to the amount properly payable for the freight, &c. (sect. 71); (5) for the payment by the warehouseman to the shipowner of so much of the deposit as is admitted by the owner of the goods, and for returning the balance to the owner of the goods, unless the shipowner shall within thirty days take proceedings to recover the amount in dispute from the owner of the goods (sect. 72). Sect. 72 runs thus: "If such deposit as aforesaid is made with the wharf or warehouse owner, and the person making the same does, within fifteen days after making it, give to the wharf or warehouse owner such notice in writing as aforesaid, the wharf or warehouse owner shall immediately apprise the shipowner of such notice, and shall pay or tender to him out of the sum deposited the sum, if any, admitted by such notice to be payable, and shall retain the remainder or balance, or, if no sum is admitted to be payable, the whole of the sum deposited, for thirty days from the date of the said notice; and at the expiration of such thirty days, unless legal proceedings have in the meantime been instituted by the shipowner against the owner of the goods to recover the said balance or sum or otherwise for the settlement of any disputes which may have arisen between them concerning such freight or other charges as aforesaid, and notice in writing of such proceedings has been served on him, the wharf or warehouse owner shall pay the said balance or sum over to the owner of the goods, and shall by such payment be discharged from all liability in respect thereof."

The facts of the case were these: A cargo of apples belonging to shippers in Canada was shipped on board the respondents' vessel for carriage from Halifax to London. The apples were consigned to the appellants for sale, no property in the goods passing to them, and by the bill of lading were made deliverable to them or their assigns, "freight and charges payable by consignees as per margin." The ship arrived in the Victoria Docks on Saturday, the 10th Dec. 1892. On the 12th the appellants first heard of her arrival, and, in pursuance of the provisions of the statute, they paid a sum sufficient to cover the freight to the dock company, at the same time giving the dock company notice not to part with the money until further instructions. The respondents had already sent a notice to the dock company to the effect that they were to take all the goods and hold them for the freight. The dock company, on receiving the money from the appellants, sent a notice to the respondents of the fact, and also that they were to hold the sum so paid until further instructions. The respondents thereupon wrote on the 13th Dec. to the appellants, threatening to issue a writ unless the freight was paid on that day. The appellants refused, saying that they had acted in accordance with the provisions of the Act, that the money had been paid to the dock company, and that the dock company would pay it over as soon as the appellants were satisfied of the correct and sound delivery of the goods. The apples were landed on the 13th Dec., and the appellants proceeded to take them away for the purpose of selling them by auction, and remitting the net proceeds to their principals in Canada. Owing, however, to the direction of the appellants to the dock company not to part with the money deposited by the appellants until further instructions, the respondents were unable to obtain payment of their freight, and, on the 13th Dec., they issued the writ in this action for its recovery. After the writ was issued, the appellants released the sum deposited with the dock company, and it was tendered to the respondents, who refused to receive it, and it had since been paid into court.

Sir R. Webster, Q.C. and Cranstoun (Channell, Q.C. with them), for the appellants, argued that the statute made the deposit with the warehousekeeper equivalent to payment of freight. If the shipowner does not claim more than is justly due to him he gets it at once, and a mere consignee for sale, such as the appellants were here, who has made the deposit, is not liable to be sued for the bill of lading freight. If it were not for the provisions of the statute, a shipowner who desired to retain his lien for freight would have to keep the goods on board his ship. See

Sanders v. Vanzeller, 4 Q. B. 260;
Young v. Moeller, 5 E. & B. 755.

In consequence of these decisions, the Bill of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111) was passed. The appellants have discharged all their liability by payment to the dock company. If the consignee improperly stops the freight, an action might lie against him, not for freight, but for damages. If the goods had still been in the hands of the shipowner, and the freight had been paid from some other source, he would be bound to deliver, and so is the dock company, but no contract by the consignees to pay freight can be implied in the circumstances.

Bigham, Q.C. and H. F. Boyd (with them Noad), for the respondents, contended that the common law liability to pay the freight was not affected by the statute. As soon as the owner of the goods gets delivery the obligation to pay freight arises, and a promise is implied. The consignees by their own act extinguished the shipowner's lien, and obtained delivery, which implies a promise to pay freight. The shipowner would not part with his lien without some consideration. The statute preserves a right of action for the freight, and imposes the liability to pay it on the consignee. There was evidence to support Day, J.'s finding of fact. The dock company were the agents of both parties, and by the custom of the port of London there was delivery as soon as the goods were over the ship's side:

Meyerstein v. Barber, 16 L. T. Rep. 569; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 518; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 38.

The contract to pay freight was implied on delivery to the dock company:

Mors Le Blanch v. Wilson, 28 L. T. Rep. 415; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 605; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 227.

Sect. 72 of the statute leaves the matter incomplete, and something further must be implied.

Sir R. Webster, Q.C. was not called on to reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Dec. 17.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell). — My Lords: The facts which have given rise to this appeal may be shortly stated. Certain consignments of apples were shipped upon a vessel of the respondents to be carried to London. The appellants were named in the bill of lading as consignees. The appellants, although so named, were not persons to whom the ownership of the property passed by the bills of lading, but were merely agents for sale on behalf of the owners of the goods. The vessel arrived in Victoria Docks, on Saturday, the 10th Dec. 1892. The appellants were not at the discharging berth ready to take delivery ex ship. The master thereupon, under sect. 67 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, proceeded to land the apples into a warehouse of the London and India Docks Joint Committee. On Monday, the 12th Dec., the appellants sent to the docks committee a letter inclosing a cheque for 152*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.*, being the full amount of freight under the bills of lading, as calculated by them. The cheque was inclosed in a letter in these terms: "Dear Sirs,—We herewith hand you cheque for freight under the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, c. 63, ss. 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, and request you to hold same pending the receipt of your landing account and our further instructions.—Yours, &c., W. N. WHITE and Co." The amount of the freight payable under the bills of lading was in fact 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, the excess having been paid to the dock company owing to a miscalculation. The appellants having thus made the deposit under sect. 70 of the Act referred to, took delivery of the apples ex warehouse. The respondents insisted that they were entitled to claim payment of the freight from the appellants. The latter maintained that, having, under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, paid the amount claimed to the dock company, they were entitled to delivery without any further payment, and were not liable to the respondents for freight. The writ in this action was therefore issued. On the 14th Dec. the appellants wrote to the docks committee directing them to pay to the respondents 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, the correct amount of the freight, less a sum of 15*s.* for three barrels "broken and plundered, at 5*s.* each." On the next day the docks committee tendered the respondents the sum of 148*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, which was refused, and the action was proceeded with. That amount was ultimately paid into court to the credit of the action. The statement of claim was for 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* for freight. After notice of trial had been given, the plaintiffs amended their statement of claim by claiming in the alternative a declaration that they were entitled to a lien on the goods for the freight, and were also entitled to a lien upon and to the sum of 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* paid by the defendants to, or deposited with, the docks committee in respect of the freight. In answer to this amendment the defendants said that they had no interest in the claim so put forward, and had never resisted such claim. The question, therefore, at issue between the parties, and the only question, was whether the appellants were liable under the circumstances to pay the respondents the freight claimed by them. The appellants were not parties to the original contract of carriage; they were not persons to whom the property in the goods had passed, and therefore liable under the Bills of Lading Act; but it is said that they incurred liability by taking delivery of the goods. Now, it is not disputed that where a consignee takes delivery under a bill of lading, and the master of the vessel by giving delivery abandons his lien, there is evidence from which a contract to pay freight may be inferred. This has been regarded as the law ever since the case of Sanders v. Vanzeller (4 Q. B. 260); but in that case it was distinctly stated that it was not a presumption of law that such a contract existed, but only a presumption of fact. Inasmuch as a shipowner is entitled to retain goods for the purpose of securing payment of his freight, it is only natural to infer, if the goods are parted with to a consignee before the freight is paid and the lien is thus abandoned, that it could only be on the understanding on both sides that the consignee undertook to pay the freight. And I cannot doubt that in such a case, except under very special circumstances, a jury, or whatever tribunal has to determine the facts, will always find that there was such a contract. But it must be borne in mind that it is only by reason of his lien that the shipowner is entitled to refuse delivery to the owner of the goods or his agent, and I think the abandonment of this right is an essential element in the facts which give rise to the inference of a contract to pay the freight. In the present case the appellants did not receive the cargo from the shipowner but from the dock company, in whose warehouses the master had deposited it. The goods were warehoused under sect. 67 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63). By sect. 68 if the requisite notice is given to the warehouse owner the goods in his hands continue liable to the same lien as they were subject to before the landing, and the warehouse owner is bound to retain them until the lien is discharged in the manner mentioned in the Act. Sect. 70 provides that the owner of the goods (in which term an agent for the owner entitled to the possession of the goods is included) may deposit with the warehouse owner a sum of money equal in amount to the sum claimed by the shipowner, and thereupon the lien shall be discharged, but without prejudice to any other remedy which the shipowner may have for the recovery of the freight. Upon payment of the amount claimed, therefore, by the appellants to the dock company the lien of the shipowner ceased. Any remedy which the shipowner had for the recovery of his freight of course remained intact. But he had, beyond all question, at that time no remedy against the appellants. They afterwards took delivery from the dock company, and the question is whether from this circumstance any contract is to be implied on their part to pay freight to the respondents. I am quite unable to see how, as a matter of fact, any such contract can be implied. In cases like that which I have previously mentioned, where the consignee takes delivery from the ship and the shipowner abandons his lien, the fair inference is that both parties intended that the consignee taking the delivery should become liable for the freight; but, under the circumstances with which I am now dealing, I am at a loss to see what there is to justify the inference that both parties so intended. There seems to me no reason why the consignee should, in that case, make, or be supposed to make, any promise to pay the freight; nor am I able to find any consideration to support such a promise. As soon as the shipowner's lien is discharged he ceases to have any right to the goods which lie in the warehouse. They are not his property; the only right which he ever had to them was a right of lien. They are the property of the owner of the goods, and the dock company would, as it seems to me, have no right to refuse to deliver them to the owner or to any agent authorised by him to demand them.

How, then, can the receipt of the goods by the agent of the owner from the dock company, who are legally bound to deliver them, give rise to any inference of a promise, or afford the consideration for any promise by the consignee to pay freight to the shipowner? If the only provisions of the Act had been those which I have hitherto mentioned, I do not think the court below would have held that the appellants were liable for the freight. The conclusion at which the Court of Appeal arrived resulted, I think, from the construction which they put upon sect. 72 of the Act. Sect. 71 provides that, if the freight claimed is deposited with the warehouse owner, and the person making the deposit does not within fifteen days after making it give to the warehouse owner notice in writing to retain it, or any part of it, the warehouse owner may, at the expiration of such fifteen days, pay the sum so deposited over to the shipowner. Sect. 72 then provides that, if the person making the deposit does within fifteen days give the warehouse owner such notice in writing, the warehouse owner shall apprise the shipowner of the notice and shall pay out of the sum deposited the sum, if any, admitted by the notice to be payable; and shall retain the remainder or balance, or, if no sum is admitted to be payable, the whole of the sum deposited, for thirty days from the date of the notice; "and at the expiration of such thirty days, unless legal proceedings have in the meantime been instituted by the shipowner against the owner of the goods to recover the said balance or sum, or otherwise for the settlement of any disputes which may have arisen between them concerning such freight or charges as aforesaid, and notice in writing of such proceedings has been served on him, the wharf or warehouse owner shall pay the said balance or sum over to the owner of the goods, and shall by such payment be discharged from all liability in respect thereof." Lindley, L.J. was of opinion, and Smith, L.J. shared his view, that the effect of sect. 72 was to give the shipowner the remedy against the consignee personally which he would have had if the consignee had taken delivery from the ship and the shipowner had thereby abandoned his lien. Those learned judges thought that the language of the latter part of sect. 72 pointed to an action to recover the freight, and therefore, by implication, conferred a right to bring such an action against the consignee. I am, with all deference, quite unable to arrive at that conclusion. The section does not define the nature of the legal proceedings to be instituted by the shipowner or limit them to an action for the freight. It is true that it mentions legal proceedings instituted against the owner of the goods to recover "the said balance or sum." But it is not disputed that an action might be maintained upon the contract of carriage against any person liable in respect of that contract. And the section proceeds, "or otherwise for the settlement of any disputes which may have arisen between them concerning such freight." Lindley, L.J. concedes, and I do not think there can be any doubt about it, that a suit might be maintained by the shipowner for the purpose of enforcing his security upon the sum deposited, and that in such proceedings any dispute as to whether the shipowner was entitled to the whole, or, if not, to what part of the sum might be determined. There seems to me, therefore, to be quite enough to satisfy all the words and objects of the section, without inferring that it confers a right to maintain an action founded on an implied contract under circumstances which render it unreasonable in my opinion to infer that any such contract was in fact entered into. It was said by Smith, L.J. that it was the duty of the consignee to be ready to take delivery of the cargo, and that it would be strange that a consignee, by neglecting to be ready to receive the goods at the ship's side, could compel the shipowner to resort to the warehousing clauses of the Act, and then, having made the deposit and thus obtained possession of the goods, could force the shipowner to sue the shipper or owner of the goods for the freight, wherever he might happen to be. I think there is a fallacy in this argument. A consignee in the position of the appellants is not bound as between him and the shipowner to be ready to take delivery of the goods. He is under no obligation to him at all. The shipper has no doubt undertaken that the consignee shall be so ready, and upon this contract he is, of course, liable; but the contract in no way affects the consignee. If liable at all, it is admitted that he becomes so only by reason of a new contract made by himself. If the effect of the statute on the construction which I have indicated were to leave the shipowner with nothing but the liability arising from the contract of shipment, it might be strange that the Legislature should so materially have altered his position. But it is to be remembered that his lien can only be discharged, and the consignee can only obtain delivery, if the whole amount of his claim be in the hands of the dock company, to secure to him the entire sum to which he is entitled. It is quite true that in some cases he might only obtain the sum due to him after a delay greater than would have been involved if he had not warehoused the goods and that section of the Act had not come into operation. But the Act imposes on him no obligation to warehouse them. It is merely an empowering enactment of which he need not take advantage. It may be that the enactment was not intended solely for the benefit of the shipowner, but had also in view the interests of the owners of the goods. But I see nothing in its provisions to justify what, as it seems to me, would not be a construction of the Act, but the insertion in it of a distinct enactment, which I do not find there. For these reasons I agree with the judgment of Davey, L.J., whose opinion was in favour of the appellants. But for the amendment of the statement of claim I should have thought that the proper course was to dismiss the action with costs, as at the outset the only claim was for freight, for which, in my opinion, the defendants were not liable. By the amendment, however, the respondents claimed a declaration that they were entitled to the whole of the deposit. The appellants did not oppose this claim, and stated they had never opposed it. This was not correct. Down to that time they had insisted on their right to retain 15*s.*, part of it. This right I think they abandoned by their answer to the amended statement of claim. I think the proper course is to declare that the plaintiffs are entitled to the sum of 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* deposited with the dock company. Inasmuch as their claim in the first instance was only for the freight, I think that they should not have any costs of the action from the date of the defence to the amended statement of claim. Inasmuch as the only question in controversy was that which your Lordships are prepared to determine against them, I think they should pay the defendants their costs. The defendants must also have their costs here and in the courts below.

Lord WATSON. — My Lords: The pecuniary interests involved in this appeal are of trifling amount, but the questions which it raises are of considerable importance to shipowners, and to that class of consignees who are not parties to any contract for the carriage of the goods consigned to them. The facts of the case are simple enough, and are not the subjects of controversy. In the end of Nov. 1892 a quantity of apples, consigned in separate parcels, by four different persons, was shipped on board the steamer Inchulva, which is owned by the respondents, for conveyance from Halifax, Nova Scotia, to the port of London. The appellants were the consignees named in all the bills of lading, which were duly forwarded to them. It is not disputed that the consignments were made to them as agents for the consignors; that no property in the goods passed to them; and that, under the shipping documents, they incurred no personal liability for freight. Each of the bills of lading contained a condition expressed in these terms: "The shipowners shall be entitled to land these goods upon the quays of the dock where the steamer discharges, immediately on her arrival, and upon the goods being so landed the shipowners' liability shall cease." The Inchulva arrived in the Victoria Docks on Saturday, the 10th Dec. 1892, and next morning was ready to unload. From some cause or other, the precise nature of which does not appear to be material, the appellants were not prepared to take immediate delivery ex the ship. The respondents did not act upon the permission given them by the clause just quoted to land the goods upon the quays of the dock so that no question arises as to the construction and effect of that clause. They took advantage of the provisions contained in sect. 68 and subsequent clauses of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862; and, between 9 a.m. of Monday the 12th and noon of Tuesday, the 13th Dec. placed the whole of the goods in a warehouse of the London and India Joint Docks Committee. On the 13th Dec. they gave a written notice to the docks committee not to part with the goods until freight was paid, but did not specify the amount of the freight which they claimed. On the 12th Dec. the appellants deposited in the hands of the docks committee the sum of 152*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.*, which was the total amount of freight payable according to the bills of lading, upon the assumption that the whole cargo had been safely carried. It proved to be in excess of the freight claimed by the respondents, which was 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* The appellants admitted 148*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* to be justly due, but disputed the balance of 15*s.*, and they accordingly directed the warehousemen to tender the freight, so far as admitted, to the respondents, and to retain the balance of the deposited money. The warehousemen, in respect of the deposit, delivered the goods to the appellants. The respondents declined to accept payment from the warehousemen of any sum short of the full amount of freight which they claimed. A correspondence ensued in which the parties took up these hostile positions. The respondents insisted that they were entitled to receive immediate payment of their full claim, leaving the appellants to recover any overpayment which they might be able to establish. The appellants maintained that in so far as they were concerned the respondents had no pecuniary claim except against the deposited fund; that they were only entitled to immediate payment of freight in so far as admitted; and that they were not entitled to payment of disputed freight out of the fund until they duly established their right to it. The respondents then brought the present action, in which they claimed a personal decree against the appellants for the full amount of freight which they alleged to be due. The statement of claim is couched in very general terms, but these appear to me to import, and I have no doubt were meant to convey the assertion, that the appellants had incurred a personal obligation to pay freight, which was not satisfied by their depositing the amount of freight claimed with the warehousemen. The defence is confined to a denial of liability. In the course of the action the sum deposited was brought into court by the docks committee. Before the case went to trial, the respondents amended their pleadings by adding a new and alternative claim for a declaration "that they were entitled to a lien upon the above-mentioned goods for the said freight, and are now entitled to a lien upon and to the sum of 148*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, part of a sum of 152*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* paid by the defendants to or deposited with the London and India Docks Joint Committee in respect of the said freight." In their amended defence the appellants stated, with reference to the alternative, "that they have no interest in the claim put forward, and they have never resisted such a claim." The answer thus made by the appellants does not appear to me to be altogether accurate. They had all along admitted that the respondents had a lien on the deposited money for whatever freight they could establish to be justly due. But they had persistently denied that the respondents had a good lien for more than 148*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* Their answer for the first time conceded that the respondents had a valid lien for the full freight claimed. That admission put it within the power of the respondents to end the litigation. The deposited money was in court. Had the judge been moved to grant the declaration, which was not opposed, it would necessarily have been followed by an order to pay to the respondents, out of that money, the full amount of their claim. The respondents elected to proceed with the litigation, and it is obvious that their object was to establish that, in addition to their admitted right to enforce their lien over the money deposited, they had an independent personal claim against the appellants, which they could enforce by action. Day, J. sustained their claim, and gave them a personal decree against the appellants. His decision was affirmed by a majority of the Appeal Court consisting of Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ., Davey, L.J. dissenting.

Before adverting to the provisions of the Act of 1862, it may be useful to consider what, previous to its passing, were the mutual rights arising to parties in the same position as these litigants. The law upon that point does not appear to me to admit of doubt. The holder of the bills, although he was no party to the contract of carriage, and had no property in the goods, had yet a good title to demand delivery; but he could not insist on that demand unless he was prepared, as a condition of obtaining delivery, to satisfy the shipowner's claim for freight. On the other hand, if delivery was not taken on these terms, or, if he delivered the goods without being paid freight, the shipowner could not sue a holder of the bills who was not liable upon the contract of carriage, unless he could show that such holder had incurred an independent obligation to pay freight. The existence of such an obligation was not matter of legal implication. It required to be proved as a matter of fact. In cases where the goods had been delivered it was frequently held to be matter of reasonable inference that delivery had been given and received, on the mutual understanding that the recipient was to pay the freight in consideration of the surrender of his lien by the shipowner. Sect. 70 of the Act provides that when goods have been landed and warehoused, with notice of the shipowner's lien, in terms of sects. 67 and 68, upon deposit of the amount of freight claimed, with the warehouseman, "the lien shall be discharged, but without prejudice to any other remedy which the shipowner may have for the recovery of the freight." The effect of that enactment is that, whenever the deposit is duly made, the shipowner's lien is transferred from the goods to the money deposited, and the warehouseman becomes bound to deliver the goods to the depositor. Sects. 71 and 72 prescribe the course which is to be followed in the event of the shipowner electing to take his remedy against the money, which is thus made subject to his lien. If the depositor does not, within fifteen days after making the deposit, give notice in writing to the warehouseman to retain it, the money becomes payable to the shipowner. If notice is given within the time limited, the warehouseman must forthwith apprise the shipowner of such notice, and pay or tender to him the sum admitted to be due, retaining the balance of the deposited money for thirty days from the date of the notice. On the expiry of that period the balance retained is to be repaid to the depositor, "unless legal proceedings have in the meantime been instituted by the shipowner against the owner of the goods to recover the said balance or sum, or otherwise for the settlement of any disputes which may have arisen between them concerning such freight or other charges as aforesaid." These enactments plainly contemplate that the shipowner may enforce his statutory lien by an action for ascertainment of the amount of freight justly due to him, and for payment of that amount out of the deposited money. And they reserved to the shipowner all remedies which he had for recovery of freight, other than through his lien upon the goods, at the time when such lien is extinguished, in terms of sect. 70. In the present case there does not appear to me to be any evidence which can raise an inference in fact that the appellants promised to pay freight to the respondents. The only object which the appellants had in view was to obtain lawful possession of the goods, and that object was fully attained by their compliance with the statutory condition, which at once terminated the respondents' lien on the goods, and gave them a right to claim delivery from the joint docks committee. To my mind, it is in the last degree improbable that the appellants should have undertaken a personal liability, which was unnecessary for their purpose, and would have been wholly gratuitous. It was maintained, in the course of the argument for the respondents, that the provisions with reference to "legal proceedings," which I have already quoted, which are to be found towards the end of sect. 72, confer upon them the right to make a personal claim against the appellants. I do not think that these provisions are capable of being so interpreted, They do not profess to give any new remedy; they simply direct that, in a certain event, the warehouseman shall retain the sum or the balance of the sum deposited with him until the shipowner has established the amount of the freight to which he is entitled, by means of a decree obtained in any proceedings which he may have a good title to raise and insist on. For these reasons I am of opinion that the present action, as originally laid, entirely fails, and that the order appealed from must be reversed. I concur in the judgment which has been proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I agree. The first question to be considered seems to be this: Apart from the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, had the respondents as against the appellants any remedy for the recovery of their freight other than a lien upon the goods by the carriage of which the freight was earned? The appellants, it must be remembered, were not parties to the contract of affreightment. Nor were they liable for the freight under the Bills of Lading Act 1855, being only agents for sale to whom the property in the goods did not pass. No doubt, if they had received the goods from the ship, one would have inferred a contract on their part to pay the freight in consideration of the shipowner giving up his lien. That would have been only reasonable. The master could not be asked to forego his lien without getting an equivalent. It would involve a breach of duty to his employer. The only possible equivalent short of actual payment would be a binding promise to pay. But the goods in the present case were not received by the appellants from the ship. What occurred was this: the master, availing himself of the power given to him by the Act of 1862, landed the goods and placed them in the custody of the London and India Docks Joint Committee subject to a stop for freight. Until the owner of the goods deposited with the docks committee a sum equal to the amount claimed for freight, the docks committee held the goods for the shipowner to protect his lien. As soon as the deposit was made the lien was discharged by virtue of the enactment. The only obstacle to the delivery of the goods was then removed, and the appellants at once became entitled to possession. It is difficult to see how a contract on the part of the appellants to pay freight can be inferred either from the delivery of the goods by the shipowner to persons who received them as his agents, whose possession for the time was his possession, or from the circumstance that those persons, after they had ceased to be his agents, delivered the goods to the appellants, who had at that time a perfect and unqualified title to immediate possession. If it be that, independently of the Act of 1862, the respondents as against the appellants had no remedy for recovery of their freight other than their lien, there comes the question: Does the Act give a personal remedy for the recovery of the freight against the owner of the goods when he receives them from the wharf or warehouse owner? The respondents maintain that the Act does give such a remedy, and they rely (as Lindley, L.J. relied) on sects. 70 and 72. Sect. 70 certainly does not give the shipowner a new remedy against the owner of the goods. It does not purport to do anything of the kind. It merely declares that the discharge of the lien is to be without prejudice to any other remedy which the shipowner may have for the recovery of the freight. He may have another remedy against the owner of the goods, or he may not. Although the rights given to the shipowner in lieu of and in substitution for his lien are not completely worked out in sect. 72, the meaning is perfectly clear. The sum deposited, which must in every case be the full amount claimed by the shipowner, is to be made available, and made available, if necessary, by process of law, for the purpose of satisfying the shipowner's claim so far as his claim is admitted or may be established by legal proceedings. "The said balance or sum," which is spoken of in sect. 72 as the subject-matter of the legal proceedings there referred to, is, I think, the specific sum on deposit with the wharf or warehouse owner, or (as the case may be) the balance of that sum remaining in the hands of the wharf or warehouse owner after payment of so much as is admitted by the owner of the goods to be due to the shipowner. So far there is nothing, I think, to suggest the creation of a personal liability on the part of the owner of the goods. Nor do I think that the words which follow, "or otherwise for the settlement of any disputes between them concerning such freight," necessarily or naturally imply that the shipowner was to have a claim against the owner of the goods personally in all cases or in any case in which he would not have such claim independently of the Act of 1862. It is, I think, a mistake to suppose that this part of the Act was passed simply for the benefit of the shipowner, and so to approach its construction from that point of view only. This part of the Act was passed, I should suppose, for the convenience of commerce, and in order to facilitate the despatch of business. Possibly it may be used unreasonably or even oppressively by persons who are more bent on giving trouble to others than doing their own business in a business-like way, if such persons there be. But that is hardly a reason for doing violence to language tolerably plain, or for importing into the enactment provisions which are not obvious if it be construed fairly and without any leaning to one side or the other. I think that the view of Davey, L.J. was correct, and I concur in the motion which has been proposed.

Order appealed from reversed: cause remitted to the Queen's Bench Division with a declaration: appellants to have their costs in this House and in the courts below from the date of the defence to the amended statement of claim.

Solicitors for appellants, Devereux and Heiron.
Solicitors for respondents, Wm. A. Crump and Son.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

March 28 and 29, 1895.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ.)

THE SATANITA. (a)

Collision—Limitation of liability—Yacht Racing Association Rules—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54.

The defendant entered his yacht for a race, and gave his assent in writing that he would be bound by certain rules which provided that owners of competing yachts should be liable for all damages caused by infringement of the rules. A collision occurred through a breach of the rules by the defendant's yacht, and the plaintiff's yacht was sunk.

Held, first, that entering of the yacht for the race and the rules created a contract between the competitors; secondly (reversing Bruce, J.), that, with regard to damages, the word "all" in the rules excluded the operation of sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862, limiting the liability to 8*l. per ton, and that the defendant was liable in full to the plaintiff for the damage done.*

APPEAL from a decision of Bruce, J., dated the 18th Dec. 1894.

This was an action for damages arising out of a collision. The plaintiff was the Earl of Dunraven, owner of the yacht Valkyrie, and the defendant was Mr. Walter D. Clark, owner of the yacht Satanita. The collision occurred in the Clyde, near Hunter's Quay, on the 5th July 1894.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

The Valkyrie was a steel-framed racing cutter yacht of 106 tons register, and manned by a crew of thirty-three hands; the Satanita was of 117 tons register, and was registered at the port of Southampton. The two vessels were preparing, in company with the Britannia and the Vigilant, to take part in the fifty-mile race at the regatta of the Mudhook Yacht Club. The race was held under the rules of the Yacht Racing Association, rule 17 of which provides that after the five-minutes gun has been fired and the Blue Peter hoisted, all yachts in the race become amenable to the rules. The weather was overcast, with slight rain; there was a fresh breeze from the south-west, and the tide was flood, of no appreciable force. According to the Valkyrie's story, she was off Hunter's Quay at about 10.30 a.m., ready to start, under single-reefed mainsail, jib-headed topsail, staysail and jib, close hauled on the starboard tack heading about south, and making from seven to eight knots. The five-minutes gun had been fired and the Blue Peter hoisted, and the Valkyrie, with other yachts, was cruising about and waiting for the second gun to cross the starting line between the commodore's steam yacht Lutra and the mark boat, the former on her weather bow, and both at some distance. The Satanita was then seen approaching on the port tack at about 500 yards distance and broad on the port bow of the Valkyrie about three points. She was sailing fast, ramping full, and heading across the bows of the Valkyrie. The latter kept her course close hauled on the starboard tack until it was seen that a collision was imminent, when she put her helm down and luffed up to ease the blow. Satanita then struck the Valkyrie amidships on the port side abaft her rigging, doing her such damage that she sank in a few minutes. The plaintiffs charged the defendant with improperly failing to keep out of the way of the Valkyrie, and also with neglect of article 14 of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea and of the 18th sailing rule of the Yacht Racing Association. The Satanita alleged that she was hampered by a small sailing boat as she approached the Valkyrie, and so failed or was unable to keep clear of her. The defendant paid 952*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.* into court, being the amount of damages for which he alleged he was answerable under the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, calculated at the rate of 8*l.* per ton, with the admission for the purposes of this action that if the collision was caused by the improper navigation of the Satanita it occurred without his own actual fault or privity.

Besides rule 17 of the Y. R. A., above mentioned, the following rules are material:

24. If a yacht, in consequence of her neglect of any of these rules, shall foul another yacht, or compel other yachts to foul, she shall forfeit all claim to the prize and shall pay all damages.

32. Any yacht disobeying or infringing any of these rules, which shall apply to all yachts whether sailing in the same or different races, shall be disqualified from receiving any prize she would otherwise have won, and her owner shall be liable as for all damages arising therefrom.

The following undertaking was signed by the owners of all the yachts entering for the race, including the defendant:

While sailing under this entry I will obey and be bound by the sailing rules of the Yacht Racing Association and the bye-laws of the club.

Sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862 provides (inter alia):

The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or priority, that is to say,

(1) Where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person being carried in such ship;

(2) Where any damage or lose is caused to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any such ship;

(3) Where any loss of life or personal injury is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat;

(4) Where any loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other thing whatsoever on board any other ship or boat; be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things to an aggregate amount exceeding 15*l.* per ton for each ton of their ship's tonnage; nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury or not, to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage; such tonnage to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships the gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine room.

Dec. 18, 1894.—Sir Walter Phillimore, Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Batten for the owner of the Valkyrie.—Although it cannot be said that the collision occurred with the defendant's privity, there is clearly a contract between him and all those who entered for the race that they would obey the sailing rules, and that those who failed to obey them should pay in full for any damage so caused. In other words, the common law, which was specially excluded in Admiralty causes, should here apply:

Gray v. Pearson, 23 L. T. Rep. 416; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 568;

Evans v. Hooper, 33 L. T. Rep. 374; 1 Q. B. Div. 45;

Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Company v. Butler, 54 L. T. Rep. 444; 16 Q. B. Div. 778.

Fitzroy Cowper for the master and crew of the Valkyrie.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Pollard, Stuart Moore, and the Hon. G. C. Colville for the defendant.—The reasonable and proper construction of the rules is, that breach of them involves liability to pay damages recoverable by law. For nearly a century the statute has limited the liability of owners where the accident does not occur through their fault or privity, and it would require express language to provide that it was not to apply to a collision of this nature. If there was a contract at all it was with the club, and not with the entrants:

The Carl Johann, 3 Hagg. 186;

Elliott v. Richardson, 22 L. T. Rep. 858; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 744;

Cope v. Doherty, 31 L. T. Rep. O. S. 307.

Bruce, J.—In this case I am of opinion that the owner of the Satanita is entitled to have his liability limited. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 63—the Act now in force—provides that the owner of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not be answerable in damages in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, or merchandise, beyond an aggregate amount of 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage, in cases where the loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship without his actual fault or privity. The first question which was raised in this case was whether the damage occasioned by the Satanita to the Valkyrie was caused with or without the actual fault or privity of Mr. Clarke, the owner of the Satanita. But after the evidence of Mr. Clarke and the master of the Satanita, Sir Walter Phillimore said he no longer contended that the damage was caused by the actual fault or privity of Mr. Clarke. The next question raised is whether Mr. Clarke, by entering his yacht to run in the Mudhook Yacht Club races, the regatta in question, and in entering the yacht upon the terms of the Mudhook Yacht Club rules and the rules of the Y.R.A., has abandoned the limitation of liability which he would otherwise be entitled to by virtue of the statute to which I have referred. Two points have been raised. The first is, whether any contract was entered into binding Mr. Clarke to pay all damages in respect of the Valkyrie; and, secondly, what was the meaning of the contract if a contract was entered into? It is contended by Sir Walter Phillimore, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that Mr. Clarke had agreed to waive the limitation of his liability—that by agreeing to the rule which provided that the owner shall be liable for all damages he had intimated that he intended to waive the limitation of liability which the law entitled him to do. The question of fact for me to decide is whether such a contract was entered into, and, although I am not prepared to say that the circumstances which have been proved in this case might not constitute a contract, yet it seems to me in the highest degree improbable that Mr. Clarke should ever agree to waive such a right. It appears from his evidence that he was perfectly well aware of the risks which were incurred by allowing his yacht to be steered by amateur helmsmen, because he told his captain that, although the amateur helmsman might steer the yacht, yet he (the sailing master) was to interfere the moment he saw any danger; that although he might lose the race by so doing, yet he was to take care that the yacht was not put in such a position as to be likely to cause danger or damage. It proves clearly what was present to Mr. Clarke's mind. Although he was willing to agree to the rules of the yacht club so far as racing the yacht was concerned, yet he had no great confidence in the amateur yachtsmen, and had his sailing master ready in case of any great emergency. I think it clearly shows that he appreciated the experience and professional skill of a man whose skill arises from long experience, and who would be able to act rightly—an experience which enables a man to act on the instant, a habit acquired commonly only by men who make it their lifelong training, and who would in a moment appreciate the whole situation. All this, I think, Mr. Clarke appreciated. It seems to me that it was in the highest degree improbable that he should enter into a contract by which he should trust his yacht to amateur steersmen on the terms that if any damage was done he should be liable, not as men are ordinarily liable for damage done, but to a much larger extent.

Then comes the question, if there was a contract, what was the meaning of the words used? If there was any contract, I am of opinion that it was a contract by which Mr. Clarke never agreed to abandon the rights given him by the statute. When he said he agreed to the words "her owners shall be liable for all damages arising therefrom," I think he meant that he would be liable for the legal consequences. A good deal has been said about the policy of the law which gives a limitation of liability to the ship. I don't know that I need consider the grounds of that policy. It is enough for the present purposes to know that that limitation of liability extends to all British ships—all British registered ships. It extends to pleasure yachts as well as to other vessels, and therefore Mr. Clarke knew that under the ordinary circumstances his liability would be limited to 8*l.* per ton. I cannot think that the reasonable construction to be put upon these words, "the owner shall be liable for all damages," is to say that he was to be liable for damages over and above what the law ordinarily would make him liable for. It seems to me that the reasonable construction to be put upon these words is, as I have said, that the owner should be answerable only to the extent which the existing law says. Another point has been put by Sir Walter Phillimore, but it is sufficient for me to say with respect to it that I think the damage has arisen by improper navigation, and the conclusion I have come to is that Mr. Clarke is entitled to have his liability limited.

With regard to costs, the learned judge decided, on the authority of The Empusa (41 L. T. Rep. 383; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 185; 5 Prob. Div. 6), that the costs of the action should be borne by the plaintiff, except such costs as were incurred by the defendant in proving his limitation of liability.

The plaintiff appealed.

March 28. — Sir Walter Phillimore, Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Batten for the appellant.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Pollard, and the Hon. G. C. Colville for the respondent.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This action is brought by the owner of a yacht against the owner of another yacht, and the action, although it is brought in the Admiralty Court, is really brought on a charge that the yacht which is sued has broken the rules which govern her sailing in a regatta in which she is contesting for a prize. The first question raised is whether, supposing her to have broken the rules, she can be sued for that breach of the rules by the owner of the competing yacht which has been damaged. The form in which this question is stated is this: Was there any contract between the owners of those two yachts? It may be put thus: Did the owner of the competing yacht—of the yacht which is sued—enter into any obligation to the owner of the other yacht; and if his yacht broke the rules, and thereby injured the other yacht, should he pay damages? I will say, first, it seems to me clear that he did, and the way that he has undertaken that obligation is this: There are a certain number of gentlemen who form themselves into a committee and propose to give prizes for matches sailed between yachts at a certain place on a certain day, and they promulgate certain rules, which are not obligatory on anybody, and they say, if you want to sail in any of our matches you cannot do so unless you submit yourself to the conditions which we have thus laid down. You are not obliged to do it, of course, but you cannot sail your yacht for our prize unless you do that, and one of the conditions is, if you do sail for one of such prizes you must enter into an obligation with the owners of the yachts who are competing, which they at the same time enter into similarly with you that if by a breach of any of our rules you do a damage or injury to the owners of a competing yacht you shall be liable to make good the damage which you have so done. If that is so, there is that relation immediately formed between the yacht owners when they do sail, and not till then. There are other conditions with regard to these matches, which constitute a relation between each of the yacht owners who enters his yacht and sails it, and the committee themselves, but that does not in the least do away with what the yacht owner has undertaken, namely, to enter into a relation with the other yacht owner, that relation containing an obligation. Here the owner of the yacht, Mr. Clarke, entered into a relation with Lord Dunraven when he sailed his yacht against Lord Dunraven's yacht, and that relation contained an obligation that if by any breach of any of these rules he did damage to the yacht of Lord Dunraven, he would have to pay the damages. There is the relation existing between them. Now, it is admitted, that Mr. Clarke's yacht did break the rules. He admits that he broke the 18th rule, and by breaking the rule his yacht ran into Lord Dunraven's yacht and sank it. That is conceded. Now comes the question, What damage is he liable for? He had entered into a relation with Lord Dunraven under these rules. It is quite a different relation from that which exists between the owners of two ships sailing on the ocean. The only relation which exists between two ships sailing on the ocean is that one of them shall not by negligence run into the other. There have grown up rules known to all sailors, if you please to call them so, long before the statute was passed, and any ship which violated those known rules has been held to be acting negligently towards the other ship, but with regard to whom she had only this relation, that she was not to do her any injury by negligence. It is a relation which arises from two things or persons being contiguous to each other. As it has often been said, if you choose to drive a tandem across Salisbury Plain as hard as ever you like and sway it about from one side to the other, you are doing no harm to anybody if there is nobody else on Salisbury Plain; but if there is somebody else on Salisbury Plain, and if he comes so near to you that if you play this peculiar antic you are likely to run into him and damage him by reason of your contiguity, and being so near to the person that if negligent you may injure him, immediately there arises a duty upon you to drive with such reasonable care that it is not by your carelessness that you run into him. So it was with a ship on the sea. A ship may sail in any way she likes on the sea if there is no other ship near her. She may go sailing round and round in a circle if she likes. But the moment there comes another ship so near to her that if she navigates without due and reasonable regard for the other ship she may injure her, it is by reason of the known proximity of one to the other that the rule immediately comes into force, and the relative duties at once arise. Besides those duties which determine what would be negligent steering or sailing, there came an Act of Parliament which stated that when two sailing ships are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision (none of the rules apply before that moment) then each of them is to do certain things. Those rules do really fix what under those circumstances will be negligence. I do not doubt if those rules are broken by reason of an inevitable cause which you cannot avoid, as, for instance, by a hurricane which no skill can withstand, the person who breaks them is not liable, because what happened did not happen in consequence of his breach of the rules, but by reason of an overmastering power which would reduce what happened to inevitable accident. That being the view known to all persons who sail, you come to the rules of this committee, and what it was that the persons sailing in these matches agreed should be their rule of sailing. They could not make any rules which would affect ships which are not going to this regatta. I cannot agree in the least with Sir Richard Webster when he says that either a yacht or anything else coming up the Solent, or going out from Southampton Water down the Solent, are bound to take notice of the rules of this regatta. They have nothing to do with it. They are entitled to sail in and out according to the mode of navigation applicable to open water. They ought not to sail according to these rules, even though they knew that the regatta was being held, and even although they knew all the rules of the regatta they would not be bound to observe them. On the contrary, they ought to observe the ordinary rules of navigation of vessels in open water, or at sea. They have nothing to do with these rules at all. If, whilst they are so sailing, they do interfere with the regatta, it is the regatta's boats that must take care of themselves with regard to those ships which are not sailing under the regatta rules. They must observe the ordinary rules of navigation, and if that spoils their match it cannot be helped. There are some of these rules, as has been pointed out, which alter the ordinary rules of navigation, and if they alter the ordinary rules of navigation as between these parties who have agreed to sail according to these altered rules, if one of them breaks these altered rules, he is by these rules liable to have a claim maintained against him. Then comes the question, what is that? We have to construe the rule which is applicable in this case. Of course we are referred to other rules, but the rule which we have to construe in this case is rule 32. I was going to speak about rule 24, because I know they have relied in a sense upon it, but I think the governing rule in this case is rule 32: "Any yacht disobeying or infringing any of these rules which shall apply to all yachts, whether sailing in the same or different races"—for to-day I do not undertake to construe that part of the rule at all, because I do not think it is material. I have no doubt what the true meaning of that part is, but I do not think it necessary to state it—"shall be disqualified from receiving any prize." If, therefore, there is a condition which they have agreed upon with the committee, the persons who give the prizes, that they shall be disqualified from receiving any prize, it does not affect the owners of other yachts. Now we come to this: "And her owner shall be liable for all damages arising therefrom." Can that mean an obligation which they have undertaken to the committee? If she runs into one of the other yachts, which she has done on this occasion, how can that damage the committee? The committee have no interest in the yacht. They have not to pay for the loss of the yacht. The committee have nothing to do with the yacht, except that they have allowed her to run in the race for a prize, and if she won the race they have entered into an obligation to give her a cup, or money, or whatever it might be. They are not damaged, and cannot be damaged. Then who has the right to claim those damages? It seems to me clear it is the owner of the yacht which has been sailing against this yacht, or at all events in the regatta. You must read in "to any other yacht which he may damage" "for all damages arising therefrom." If you look at rule 24 it seems to me to make it more clear that must be the meaning, because there it is: "If a yacht in consequence of her neglect of any of these rules shall foul another yacht"—that is the thing which does the injury to the other yacht owner—"she shall forfeit all claim to the prize, and shall pay all damages."

What meaning are we to put upon those words "all damages?" If it had been "shall pay damages" it would have been a futile rule I should think, because if they broke the rule negligently they would be liable to damages. Why have they put in the word "all?" Nobody has been able to suggest any meaning to this word "all" except the one that it must be all the damages caused by the fouling. All the damage to whom? All the damage to the owner by reason of his yacht having been injured. To my mind it is plain and clear. It is all damage caused to the owner of another yacht by reason of an injury having been done to that yacht. I have no doubt if a yacht owner chooses to take his wife's box of valuable jewels in his yacht that he is going to make a present of after the race is over, that the loss of those jewels is a thing which the other party had no right to contemplate as a possible result of what he was doing and would not be liable for it. It is for injury done to the yacht, and I cannot see how to construe that word "all" without saying that the effect of it is clearly to do away with the limitation contained in the Merchant Shipping Act. I say deliberately that, although it cannot be denied that this rule, if it were not for those words would apply, it is a mere accident, for the Merchant Shipping Act was not intended to apply to all yachts, and certainly not to racing yachts, and they are only brought in by the section in this Act defining what ships are to be considered as within the statute. It is always agreeable to think that a rule which one feels obliged to lay down can have a reasonable foundation, and I think it can in this case. The yachts under these rules are to be steered or sailed either by the owner or by an amateur. The yachts which come in to compete do not know what yachts are coming against them, and if not, how can they possibly know the sailor-like capabilities of the owner of that yacht, or of his amateur friend? They cannot. They have no means of judging of it. Then they are not in the condition that they would be if the yachts were to be sailed by a master, because a master must be a certificated master, and therefore there is the protection that the yacht is going to be steered and sailed by a capable sailor who has obtained a master's certificate. Here the yacht may be in fault by reason of the incapacity of a person as to whose capacity they have no power of judging. I think it was very reasonable, and I can guess the reason why they said if you do enter into such a game as this to be played by an incapable person, and if he does commit a fault to the injury of the other, you must pay all the damages and not be limited to pay either 8*l.* or 15*l.* a ton. Such a limitation would make the risk terrible, because, although you may have a most valuable yacht, and perhaps the best yacht in the kingdom, which may be sunk by another yacht of a very small tonnage, then she has no real remedy at all for that which has been done. I think probably the rule was made for those reasons. At all events, those reasons seem to me to make the rule, and the interpretation of the rule in its largest form to be a most reasonable protection against gentlemen who will have their little gamble with their yachts, and I think that the rule is a very good and proper one. At all events, I have a strong conviction that the interpretation which we are proposing to put upon it is a reasonable and a right interpretation, and I think, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed.

Lopes, L.J.—If we were not differing from the learned judge below, and if this were not important in the sense of involving a very large amount of money, I should not think fit to deliver any judgment of my own, but should be quite prepared to adopt the judgment the Master of the Rolls has given. But in the circumstances I will very shortly express my view of this case. The questions are: First, was there a contract? Secondly, what was the contract? I have, in the first instance, to mention what is really admitted in this case. It is admitted that the Satanita and Valkyrie had been entered for the 50 mile race in the regatta of the Mudhook Yacht Club on the Clyde, and had respectively agreed to obey the rules of the Yacht Racing Association, and the yachts in the races became amenable to those rules. There is another thing which is admitted, and that is this—that the Satanita violated one of these rules. The rule violated was rule 18, which says—"When two yachts are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision, one of them shall keep out of the way of the other, as follows: A yacht which is running free shall keep out of the way of a yacht which is close-hauled. A yacht which is close-hauled on the port tack shall keep out of the way of a yacht which is close-hauled on the starboard tack." Therefore we start with this, that rule 18 was infringed, and that the owners of both these yachts adopted these rules, and, in point of fact, sailed their yachts under these rules. In the first place was there a contract? To my mind there was a contract. Probably a contract with the committee in certain cases, but also a contract between the owners of the competing yachts amongst themselves in other respects, viz., the contract was an undertaking that the owner of one competing yacht should pay the damages of the owners of any other competing yacht which is injured by his yacht—all the damages arising from any infringement or disobedience of the rule. In my opinion, directly any owner entered his yacht to sail this contract stands, and it is perfectly clear that in this case the owners of the Valkyrie and the Satanita did enter their respective yachts and did sail. Therefore in my opinion there was a contract, and under rule 32 damages became payable. It is not disputed that under the contract damages became payable, but it is said that the damages are limited under the Merchant Shipping Act. In order to decide that we must look at rule 32. I do not overlook rule 24, but I am prepared to base my judgment on the meaning of rule 32. This says, that "any yacht disobeying or infringing any of these rules, which shall apply to all yachts, whether sailing in the same or different races, shall be disqualified from receiving any prize she would otherwise have won, and her owners shall be liable for all damages arising therefrom." It is said by Sir Richard Webster on the part of the Satanita, that that means all legal consequences — all damages recoverable by law—and therefore only means damages limited by the Merchant Shipping Act. If that is the true construction of that rule, I can see no necessity for inserting the words "for all damages arising therefrom," because the damages limited by the Merchant Shipping Act would have followed. There would have been no necessity for those words. Again, if the construction contended for by Sir Richard Webster be correct, this anomaly, to my mind, would arise. There would be damages of one kind when there was improper navigation, but there would be damages of another kind if the injury was caused by anything other than improper navigation. I cannot for one moment agree with that construction of the rule. I cannot understand why we are not to give full effect to the words "all damages arising therefrom." Any other construction would, I think, be contrary to the true meaning of the words contained in that rule. It is said that the words must be given their ordinary meaning, unless the giving of that meaning leads to an absurdity. Does giving that meaning to the word "all" lead to absurdity here? On the contrary, I quite believe here that that word "all" was used deliberately and for a purpose. It is to be recollected that in this case these yachts were not to be steered by a professional steersman, but either by the owner or an amateur steersman, and it was natural in those circumstances that the owner of one yacht should not be exposed to the great risk which might arise to his yacht by reason of another yacht being steered, it may be, by an incompetent steersman, of whose competency the owner of the other yacht had no knowledge. It seems to me to be a reasonable ground for introducing this word. It cannot, therefore, be said that the construction which we propose to give the words leads to an absurdity. The case was suggested by Mr. Pollard of a lady who is supposed to have fallen into the water, and damage is sustained to her dress. It is said that if we give this large construction to the word "all" we should be including a case like that. But the lady was not a party to this contract, and therefore could not recover under this rule. I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned judge in the court below must be reversed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I will very shortly state my reasons out of deference to the learned judge. The first question is that of contract or no contract. All that is necessary, it appears to me, to constitute a contract between the yacht owners is to bring home to each of them the knowledge that the race is to be run under the Yacht Racing Association rules, and then they, the one and the other, deliberately enter upon those terms. Of course here we have a written document, signed by each, which, if there were any doubt at all, would render it abundantly clear that he was perfectly well aware of the bargain he was entering into. In no other way than that does it appear to me to be material. The contract did not arise with anyone other than the managing committee till the moment that either Lord Dunraven or Mr. Clarke signed the document, which it was necessary to sign, in order to be a competitor. But when they actually came forward, the owner of the Satanita on the one hand, and the owner of the Valkyrie on the other, and became competitors upon those terms. I think it would be idle to say that there was not then and thereby a contract between them, provided always there is something in the rule which points to a bargain between the owners of yachts. Rule 24 says: "If a yacht, in consequence of her neglect of any of these rules, shall foul another yacht, or compel other yachts to foul, she shall forfeit all claim to the prize, and shall pay all damages." To whom is he to pay those damages? He cannot pay them to the club, nor do I think the club could recover them in any way. The true and sensible construction is that he must pay the owner of the yacht fouled. That is the case of fouling a yacht. When we come to the 32nd Rule we find that for any breach of the rules the owner shall pay "all damages arising therefrom." I am perfectly prepared to acquiesce in the suggestion that those words must be treated according to their ordinary meaning, but there can be no doubt that the ordinary legal meaning of damage includes damage to a vessel sent to the bottom. That cannot be doubted for a moment. The argument that if we give the full meaning to the words "all damages" we may be including damages which are remote, is, I think, removed by the fact that this is damage clearly within the meaning of the law, and it must be construed by the ordinary meaning of the law. As to the limitation, all that the section says is that under certain circumstances, the owner of the ship in default shall not be answerable in damages beyond a certain amount. If we were dealing with that class of case here we should have to apply the section to the case of yachts, but when we come to the actual contract entered into it must be clear, as the counsel for the defendants say, that it means all legal damages. What can be clearer than the meaning of the word "all"? "All damages arising therefrom." There can be no doubt about it; it means what it says. To get out of that meaning you must introduce a great deal more than the argument for the defendants would allow. You must say damages which would be the legal consequence if there were no such contract as we are now dealing with. Otherwise, I do not see any justification for putting the words in. On the whole I have no hesitation in saying that the parties deliberately did contract themselves out of that accidental benefit which was given to them by the Merchant Shipping Act, and that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

It being stated that the master and crew, as well as a lady passenger on board the Valkyrie had claimed damages, the Court intimated that they could not recover under the contract in question, and that the judgment now delivered would only apply to Lord Dunraven.

Solicitors: for the plaintiff, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton; for the defendant, Thos. Cooper and Co.

March 13 and 14, 1895.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ.)

THE GIPSY QUEEN. (a)

Salvage—Practice—Reduction of award—Costs.

Where a salvage award is reduced on appeal it is a general, though not a hard and fast rule, to give no costs of the appeal.

APPEAL from a decision of Bruce, J., dated the 6th Feb. 1895.

The Gipsy Queen became disabled in the North Sea whilst on a voyage from Gothenburg to West Hartlepool, and on the 1st and 2nd Oct. 1894 the Jane Clark towed her 250 miles into port.

The total value of the Gipsy Queen, her cargo and freight, was 5243*l.*, and of the Jane Clark, 10,195*l.* The sum of 1200*l.* and costs was awarded, and apportioned as follows: 900*l.* to the owners of the Jane Clark, 75*l.* to the master, and 225*l.* to the crew.

The defendants appealed.

Raikes, Q.C. and Batten, in support of the appeal, asked for a reduction of the award on the ground that it was excessive.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Butler Aspinall, contrà.

The Court, having consulted the assessors, reduced the award to 800*l.*, apportioned as follows: 620*l.* to the owners, 50*l.* to the master, and 130*l.* to the crew.

Raikes, Q.C. asked for costs.

Sir Walter Phillimore contended that the practice was to give no costs to the successful appellants where a salvage award was reduced.

The Court reserved the question for consideration.

March 14.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—We have considered the question as to costs, and have come to the conclusion that the practice of this court is, in a case of salvage where the amount of the award has been reduced, to give no costs. This is not a hard and fast rule, but is a general rule of practice.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree that the general principle is as stated by the Master of the Rolls, but the court has a discretion in a particular case; for instance, if the court below awards an amount which is very much too large, and the amount is reduced in this court to a very much smaller sum, the Court will probably allow costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I concur.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors: for the appellants, Pritchard and Sons; for the respondents, Crossman and Pritchard, for H. W. Bell, West Hartlepool.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Wednesday, June 6, 1894.

(Before CAVE and COLLINS, JJ.)

MASSEY (app.) v. MORRISS (resp.). (a)

Overladen ship—Vessel in foreign port—Owner resident in this country—Liability of owner—Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80), s. 28.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1876 provides by sect. 28 that any owner or master of a British ship who allows the ship to be so loaded as to submerge in salt water the centre of the disc, shall for each offence incur a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds.

The appellant, the owner of a British ship, was resident and carried on business in this country. His ship, while in a foreign port, was so loaded by the master as to submerge the centre of the disc. The master was appointed by the appellant, who was not informed and was not aware of the overloading of the ship. The appellant was convicted for having allowed his ship to be so overloaded.

Held, that the conviction was wrong, as there was no evidence to show that the appellant had allowed the ship to be overloaded.

CASE stated by the stipendiary magistrate for the city of Liverpool.

The appellant was the owner of the Opah residing and carrying on business at Hull. The Opah was in Dec. 1893 at Kymassi, in the island of Negropont, Greece, and there took on board a cargo chiefly consisting of magnesia stone, and on the 5th Dec. 1893 left Kymassi with the said cargo for Garston. The Opah, at the time of leaving Kymassi aforesaid, was so loaded as to submerge in salt water the centre of the disc to the knowledge of the master. The Opah was at the time aforesaid in command of a master appointed by the appellant. The appellant was not informed, and was not aware of the overloading of the Opah, and the mate stated that he had been ordered by the master not to put the ship at any time below her marks.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80) enacts as follows:

Sect. 28. Any owner or master of a British ship who neglects to cause his ship to be marked as by this Act required, or to keep her so marked, or who allows the ship to be so loaded as to submerge in salt water the centre of the disc, and any person who conceals, removes, alters, defaces, or obliterates, or suffers any person under his control to conceal, remove, alter, deface, or obliterate any of the said marks, except in the event of the particulars thereby denoted being lawfully altered, or except for the purpose of escaping capture by an enemy, shall for each offence incur a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds.

If any of the marks required by this Act is in any respect inaccurate, so as to be likely to mislead, the owner of the ship shall incur a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds.

(a) Reported by W. H. HORSFALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was contended, on behalf of the appellant, that, upon these facts and in the absence of any evidence that the appellant had any knowledge of, or in any way connived at, the overloading, the appellant could not be convicted.

The stipendiary magistrate, however, being of opinion that the appellant was responsible for the act of the master of the said vessel in overloading her, and that it was immaterial whether the appellant was personally aware of the overloading, convicted the appellant.

The questions for the opinion of this court were whether, upon the facts stated, the appellant did allow, within the meaning of sect. 28 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, the Opah to be so loaded as to submerge the centre of the disc of the said vessel, and whether the conviction was right.

Pickford, Q.C. and Maurice Hill for the appellant. — Before an owner can be convicted for allowing his ship to be overloaded, it must be shown that he had some knowledge of the fact that the overloading had taken place. There is an absolute liability on the part of the owner, under the section, if the marks are wrongly placed, but not if there is overloading. The magistrate was guided in his decision by the judgments given in cases under the Licensing Acts, where the licensed persons had been convicted for allowing drunkenness or gaming on their premises, although such drunkenness or gaming took place without their actual knowledge. But the scheme of the Licensing Acts is entirely different from that of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and there is no analogy between them. This section contemplates the case of something being allowed by the master which is not allowed by the owner. [CAVE, J.—There must be something in the nature of "allowing" by the owner.] There is nothing of that description, unless it could be said that the owner having appointed the master was responsible for his acts. There is no mens rea on the part of the owner.

H. Sutton for the respondent.—The knowledge of the owner of the overloading is to be implied, and he is to be treated as if he was an actual party to the act. In sect. 22 of the same statute the words used are "knowingly allows," which point to a distinction between cases in which facts come to the knowledge of the owner, and those in which they do not. It has been held under the Licensing Acts, that the knowledge of the person in charge of licensed premises is to be considered knowledge on the part of the licensed person, although such licensed person may not be on the premises at the time when the act complained of is committed:

Bond v. Evans, 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 411; 21 Q. B. Div. 249;

Mullins v. Collins, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 838; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 292.

[CAVE, J.—I do not think that any inference can be drawn from those cases that will assist in that now before us.] The owner appointed the master, and is therefore responsible for his acts. [CAVE, J.—If the master had committed the same offence before, and the owner continued him in his position as master, it might be some evidence against the owner.]

CAVE, J.—This seems to me to be a very clear case. The words of the section are, "any owner or master of a British ship who allows the ship to be so loaded as to submerge in salt water the centre of the disc shall for each offence incur a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds." The question is whether the appellant did allow his ship to be so loaded as to submerge in salt water the centre of the disc. There is nothing to show that he in any way allowed it, except that he appointed the master who was in command of the ship when the loading was performed, and I cannot think that it was the intention of the Legislature that the owner should be liable upon that account. If such had been the intention, it would have been easy to say that, if the master overloaded the ship, the owner should be liable. In order to make the owner liable there must be some act done by him, and in the present case there is no such act. By appointing the master, the owner does not render himself liable for everything done by that master on the other side of the world. If it could be shown that a particular master had been appointed with the object of having the ship overloaded, that would be a very different case, but there is no such suggestion in the present case. The alehouse cases which seem to have influenced the magistrate when hearing this case are distinguishable from this case. There the licensed person is made responsible for what goes on upon his premises, and he obtains his licence upon the ground of his personal character. If he were not responsible he might delegate some person, who was not fit, to carry on his business, and then when a complaint was made he could say that he was not responsible. The Licensing Acts are drawn with the object of preventing this being done. Those cases are in no degree analogous to the present case. I am therefore of opinion that this conviction must be quashed.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Conviction quashed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Botterell and Roche, for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

Solicitor for the respondent, The Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Thursday, March 28, 1895.

(Before CAVE and WRIGHT, JJ.)

GOSLING (app.) v. NEWTON AND EAGERS (resps.). (a)

Thames Conservancy — Navigation of barge — Apprentice duly bound—Right of apprentice to act as lighterman—Right of apprentice to assist licensed lighterman as second hand—The Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii.), s. 54*—Bye-law* 35 made thereunder—Bye-law 16 of the Thames Conservancy.

An unlicensed apprentice but properly bound for the period and in the manner prescribed by the Watermen Act 1859, is an apprentice "qualified according to the Act," within the meaning of sect. 54 of the Act, and he cannot be convicted under that section for acting as a lighterman without having a licence.

Such apprentice may be a competent person to assist as second hand a duly licensed lighterman

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

when navigating on the river Thames a barge of over fifty tons burden, within the meaning of the 16th bye-law of the Thames Conservancy, as the words in that bye-law "one man in addition," are satisfied by there being on board to assist an apprentice duly bound within the meaning of the Watermen Act and the bye-laws made thereunder.

CASE stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

Two summonses were taken out by one Gosling the appellant, one under sect. 54 of the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii.), against the respondent Newton, that he did, on the 9th Oct. 1894, on the River Thames off Millbank "unlawfully act as a lighterman on board the barge Sherwood without having a licence so to do contrary to the statute;" the other against the respondent Eagers, that he did, on the same day and at the same place "unlawfully navigate the barge Sherwood, of above fifty tons burden, without having one man in addition on board to assist in the navigation and management of the same, contrary to the bye-laws of the Thames Conservancy."

These summonses were heard together before the magistrate on the 18th Oct., when the following facts were proved or admitted:

On the 9th Oct. 1894 the barge Sherwood, of above fifty tons burden, was being navigated on the River Thames, under the charge and control of the respondent Edward Eagers, who was then a duly licensed lighterman and a competent man within the meaning of the Watermen Act and the bye-laws made thereunder, and the bye-laws of the Conservators of the River Thames.

The respondent Eagers was at that time being assisted in the navigation of the barge by the respondent Newton, an apprentice, duly bound within the meaning of the said Act and nineteen years of age, although as a matter of fact he had only served a few weeks of his apprenticeship.

The respondent Newton was not qualified to act as a lighterman, nor was he qualified to hold a lighterman's licence within the meaning of the said Act.

The Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii.) provides:

Sect. 3. The term "lighterman" shall mean any person working or navigating for hire a lighter, barge, boat, or other like craft within the limits of this Act.

By sect. 46, every freeman of the company, or widow of a freeman, may take apprentices for the purpose of having them instructed in the management of barges, lighters, boats, vessels, and other like craft, and no apprentice shall be bound for a less period than five years.

By sect. 47, every registered owner of a barge, lighter, or other like craft, having in his employ a freeman of the company, or a lighterman licensed as hereinafter mentioned, and actually employed in navigating the barge, lighter, or other like craft of his employer, may take such apprentices as he thinks fit; and by sect. 48, it shall not be lawful for any freeman, or widow of a freeman, or registered barge owner, to bind or take any person as an apprentice who shall be under the age of fourteen, or above the age of twenty years.

Sect. 52. It shall be lawful for all apprentices bound to a party authorised by this Act to take apprentices, to have or take the sole charge of any boat, barge, or other vessel, provided such apprentices shall have worked and rowed upon the said river as apprentices for the space of two years at the least, and upon their being found qualified to act, upon examination by the said court, and upon obtaining a licence from the said court, subject to an appeal to the Conservators of the River Thames, as is hereinafter provided with respect to licensed lightermen, &c.

Sect. 54. If any person, not being a freeman licensed in pursuance of this Act, or an apprentice, qualified according to this Act, to a freeman, or to the widow of a freeman of the said company (except as hereinafter is mentioned), shall at any time act as a waterman or lighterman, or ply or work or navigate any wherry, passenger boat, lighter, vessel, or other craft upon the said river, from or to any place or places, or ship, or vessel within the limits of this Act, for hire or gain (except as hereinafter is mentioned), every such person shall forfeit and pay for every such offence any sum not exceeding forty shillings: Provided always, that it shall be lawful for any person who shall obtain a licence as is herein provided, or is an apprentice qualified as herein provided, to work as a lighterman within the limits of this Act.

Sect. 55. Any person qualified as hereinafter mentioned, if desirous of working as a lighterman, may apply to the court of masters, wardens, and assistants for a lighterman's licence authorising him to work as a lighterman within the limits of this Act, &c.

Sect. 56. No person shall be deemed qualified for a lighterman's licence unless he is of the age of nineteen or upwards, is of good character, and has served an apprenticeship of five years at the least to some person authorised by this Act to take apprentices for the purpose of having them instructed as lightermen, and has, for a period of two years at least preceding his application been continuously engaged in working a barge, lighter, or other like craft within or through the limits of this Act.

Sect. 66. No barge, lighter, boat, or other like craft . . . shall be worked or navigated within the limits of this Act, unless there be in charge of such craft a lighterman licensed in manner hereinbefore mentioned, or an apprentice qualified as hereinbefore mentioned, &c.

By sect. 80 the court of masters, wardens, and assistants are empowered to make such bye-laws as they think proper for the government and regulation of lightermen and watermen, so that the same bye-laws be not inconsistent with the laws of the kingdom, or with this Act, or with any of the bye-laws, rules, orders, or regulations made or to be made by the Conservators of the River Thames under the authority of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, or of any Act for the time being in force relating to the conservancy of the river Thames; provided that no such bye-laws shall be of any validity until they have been approved by the Conservators of the River Thames.

Bye-law 35, made in pursuance of the above section in July 1860, and approved by the Conservators of the River Thames, provides:

That in all cases in which it may be necessary or requisite under such Act or these bye-laws or under the bye-laws of the Conservators of the River Thames that for the benefit of the public using the river in boats, barges, or vessels, two able and skilful persons shall be employed in the management and navigation of passenger boats at Gravesend, and in vessels of more than 50 tons burden, navigated on the river, one waterman or lighterman, licensed in manner provided by such Act and bye-laws, or an apprentice licensed to take the sole charge of craft, and an apprentice actually bound in manner provided by such Act, but not a person entered on liking for the purpose of being bound shall be deemed and taken to be able and skilful persons within the meaning of such Act and bye-laws respectively.

Bye-law 16 of the Thames Conservancy, made in pursuance of the Thames Conservancy Acts, and sanctioned by Her Majesty in Feb. 1872, provides:

All barges, boats, lighters, and other like craft navigating the river, shall, when under way, have at least one competent man constantly on board for the navigation and management thereof, and all such craft of above 50 tons burden shall, when under way, have one man in addition on board to assist in the navigation and management of the same with the following exceptions, &c."

It was contended on the part of the appellant that the respondent Newton must be a licensed freeman, or an apprentice licensed, and qualified according to sect. 52 of the Act, to be entitled to act as a lighterman under the Act, and that bye-law 35 was inconsistent with the Act, and was therefore void and ultra vires, and it was further contended that bye-law 16 under the Conservancy Acts must be taken to mean that the second hand on board to assist must be a person duly licensed under the provisions of the Watermen Act, and the appellant relied on Perkins v. Gingell (50 J. P. 277), as an authority for that proposition.

For the respondents it was contended that Newton was acting in accordance with the provisions of bye-law 35, he being an apprentice actually bound, and that therefore no offence had been committed within the Act, and that no offence had been committed under bye-law 16, as the words "one man in addition," were satisfied by having on board to assist an apprentice duly bound within the meaning of bye-law 35.

The learned magistrate took time to consider his decision, which he gave in favour of the respondents, being of opinion that bye-law 35 was not ultra vires, that no offence had been committed under sect. 54 of the Act. and that the interpretation to be given to the words "one man in addition" in bye-law 16 was to be found in the judgment of Huddleston, B. in Goldsmith v. Slattery (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 561; 63 L. T. Rep. 273). He was also of opinion that the decision in Perkins v. Gingell (50 J. P. 277), was an authority in favour of the respondents, and he dismissed the summonses accordingly.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Is bye-law 35 of the Watermen's Act good and valid as regards the matter decided in this case. (2) Is an unlicensed, but duly bound apprentice, as second hand on a barge of over 50 tons burden a sufficient compliance with the requirement of the 16th bye-law of the Thames Conservancy.

Gore-Browne (Cluer with him) for the appellant.—The respondent Newton was not qualified to assist Eagers in the navigation of the barge. Newton was summoned under sect. 54, and by that section, as he was not a licensed freeman, he was liable to be convicted unless he was an "apprentice qualified according to the Act." Now, "qualified" in this section must mean "qualified as hereinafter mentioned," that is, as specified in sects. 55 and 56, which view is confirmed by sect. 66; and an apprentice qualified according to the Act must at least be qualified under sect. 52, which points out that an apprentice can only take sole charge when he has served two years, and has obtained a licence as therein provided, which Newton had not done. Bye-law 16 of the Thames Conservancy expressly lays down that in such a case as the present there must be one "competent" man on board, and "one man in addition;" and by the decision in Goldsmith v. Slattery (ubi sup.); and Perkins v. Gingell (50 J. P. 277) "one man in addition" means one competent and skilful man in addition. This provision is not satisfied by the case of an apprentice, who has served only a few weeks of his apprenticeship, and who cannot be a competent man within the meaning of the bye-law. The decisions in those cases are clearly in favour of the appellant, though the dicta may be against him. If there be any discrepancy between this requirement of bye-law 16 and the provisions of bye-law 35, it is met by this observation, that bye-law 35 was made in 1860, and it cannot be that a bye-law made in 1860 containing the words "two able and skilful persons," can help us in the construction of bye-law 16, made in 1872, which contains no such words, but which uses instead the word "competent," that is authorised. Upon these grounds Newton was not an apprentice qualified according to the Act, and he ought therefore to have been convicted under sect. 54. The charge against Eagers involves the same point, and if Newton was not a competent person to assist as second hand, then Eagers is liable to conviction under bye-law 16.

Finlay, Q.C. and Scrutton, for the respondents, were not called upon.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case Aaron James Newton is summoned for acting as a lighterman without having a licence within the meaning of sect. 54 of the Watermen Act. It appears to me clear, on looking at the Act, that "qualified as herein provided," refers to the provisions in sects. 46, 47, and, I think, 48, under which in substance the enactment is that apprentices are to be persons apprenticed to freemen or to registered barge owners for a term of not less than five years, the term beginning at a not younger age than fourteen, or an older age than twenty, and there is a provision in a subsequent section—sect. 52—that for sole charge they must have had a further two years' working experience. It appears to me to be clear that that is the meaning of the words "apprentice qualified as herein provided" or "qualified according to this Act." No other form of qualification is suggested as being found in the Act, and those sections read in a reasonable sense do show the meaning of the words "qualified apprentice." Then Edward Eagers was summoned for navigating a barge of above fifty tons without his second hand, the said Newton being licensed. To a great extent that depends upon the same question; but it is said that it is complicated by other considerations, and that under the Thames Conservancy Act, in addition to Eagers, who was a competent and licensed person, the 16th bye-law of the Thames Conservancy requires that there should be one man in addition on board, and it is said that that is not satisfied by there being an apprentice, at the very commencement, it may be, of his apprenticeship, and therefore inexperienced. But I think the cases cited on behalf of the appellant show that, in the opinion of the judges who decided those cases, an apprentice properly bound for the period and in the manner prescribed by the Watermen Act, may be a competent person. It is not necessary for the decision of this case to say that under all circumstances such apprentice must be a competent person. That point is not raised for us, nor has the magistrate decided it. We must take it here that no case was made that the particular apprentice was not competent It seems to me clear, on the expression of opinion in those cases, and on the 35th bye-law, if the bye-law applies to the matter, as it seems to have been held that it does apply, that an apprentice qualified under the Watermen Act may be a competent person, and that is all we need decide.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. As soon as my brother pointed out sects. 46, 47, and 48 of the Act, it seemed to me that there was an end of the case, and no argument I have heard has induced me to think that the decision of the magistrate is at all wrong.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Safford and Kent.
Solicitors for the respondents, Wilson, Bristows, and Carpmael.

Tuesday, April 2, 1895.

(Before CHARLES, J.)

MOWBRAY v. MERRYWEATHER. (a)

Negligence—Injury to plaintiffs' workman owing to defect in gearing supplied by third party—Liability of third party to plaintiffs—Remoteness of damage.

A workman in the employment of the plaintiffs, a firm of stevedores, whilst unloading a cargo for the plaintiffs, was injured owing to the defective state of one of the chains provided by the defendant, the owner of the ship being discharged. The workman sued the plaintiffs for damages for personal injuries, and the plaintiffs properly settled his claim by the payment to him of 125l. The defect in the chain might have been discovered by the plaintiffs by the exercise of reasonable case.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover that sum from the defendant, as the injury to the workman was the natural consequence of the defendant's breach of contract.

FURTHER consideration of an action tried before Charles, J. at the last Leeds Assizes, when judgment was reserved. The facts and arguments appear fully from the judgment of the learned judge.

Robson, Q.C. and Meynell appeared for the plaintiffs.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C. and H. Gawan Taylor for the defendant.

April 2.—CHARLES, J.—The facts of this case are very simple, and in all substantial particulars undisputed. The plaintiffs are stevedores at West Hartlepool, and the defendant is owner of the steamship Wenby. The plaintiffs on the 16th Aug. 1894 undertook to discharge a cargo of deals from the ship, and, in accordance with the custom of the port, the defendant promised to provide all necessary and proper derricks, cranes, chains, winches, and other gearing reasonably fit for the purpose of discharging the cargo. They failed to do so, and supplied a chain so defective that whilst it was being used in discharge of the cargo it broke, and thereby a workman of the plaintiffs was seriously injured. The injured workman thereupon brought an action against the plaintiffs under the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act 1880, ss. 1 and 2, basing his claim upon the defective condition of the chain, a defective condition which he alleged might have been discovered by the plaintiffs by the exercise of reasonable care. The plaintiffs did not contest the claim, and paid the workman 125*l.*, which they now sought to recover from the defendant. It was not suggested by the defendant that the settlement was an improper one, and it was admitted upon the trial before me at the last Leeds Assizes, by the defendant on the one hand, that there had been a breach by him of the implied warranty that the derrick, crane, and chains should be reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were supplied, and, by the plaintiffs on the other, that they might by the exercise of reasonable care have discovered the defect in the chains. The defendant, however, contended that the damage sought to be recovered was too remote, and I reserved my decision on this point.

The argument of the defendant was to the following effect: True it was, he said, that there was a breach of warranty, but the damages which the plaintiffs have had to pay resulted not from that breach, but from a negligent act committed by the plaintiffs themselves. They were not responsible at common law merely for permitting the workman to use a plant in fact defective and unfit for the purpose for which it was intended to be used. They were only liable under the Employers' Liability Act 1880, which in this respect, however, seems simply declaratory by reason of the defect being one which had not been discovered owing to their own negligence. The damage to the workman was caused, therefore, by their own want of care, and could not be imputed to the defendant as the natural consequence of his breach of warranty. The plaintiffs, in reply, contended that they had a right to rely upon the defendant's warranty. As between him and them the cause of action was complete, and the negligence of which they had been guilty—the failure to carefully examine and test the chain—was really due to the reliance they placed on the defendant's warranty. The workman, it was further argued, could himself have recovered damages against the defendant, and, according to the most limited construction which can be placed on the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Heaven v. Pender (49 L. T. Rep. 357; 11 Q. B. Div. 502), this argument, at all events, is well founded. The case of Smith v. London and St. Katharine's Docks (18 L. T. Rep. 403; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 66; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 326) is an authority to the same effect. The amount paid by the plaintiffs being admitted to be reasonable, the only question I have to determine is whether the damage done to the workman, and which he could only recover from the plaintiffs by showing want of care in them, may nevertheless be regarded as the natural consequence of the defendant's breach of contract; or, in other words, a consequence which might reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties. Now, the defendant cannot have supposed that the plaintiffs meant themselves to unload the ship. He must be taken to have known that the plaintiffs would employ others to do so, and, in my opinion, injury to a person so employed is a natural consequence of the breach of warranty. Does it make any difference that the personal liability of the plaintiffs to their workman is based on the circumstance that they were themselves guilty of want of care? I cannot think so. The breach of the warranty upon which the plantiffs relied, and, as far as the defendant is concerned, had a right to rely, remains, and is the efficient cause of the subsequent mischief. As regards the workman, they may have been guilty of negligence in not themselves testing the efficiency of the chain; but I do not see how their failure in their duty towards him exonerated the defendant from his failure to perform his contract with him. His breach of contract created a dangerous state of things which has brought about an accident, and for that accident he must, in my opinion, be held responsible, even though the plaintiffs' negligence was the immediate cause of it.

(a) Reported by W. H. HORSFALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There does not appear to be any very direct authority on the subject, but the reasoning of Martin, B. in Burrows v. The March Gas and Coke Company (22 L. T. Rep. 24; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 67; 7 Ex. 96) entirely covers the case. There the defendants, a gas company, contracted to supply the plaintiff with a proper service pipe from a main outside to a meter inside his premises, and gas escaped from a defect in the pipe. A servant of a gasfitter incautiously went into the room with a lighted candle, and the escaped gas exploded. The defendants were held liable for all the damage done, and Martin, B. expressly states that the liability of the defendant would have been the same even if the gasfitter's servant had been the plaintiffs' own. The other judges in the Court of Exchequer and the Exchequer Chamber base their decision upon the principle that the breach of contract was the primary and substantial cause of the explosion, and that so it remained notwithstanding the negligence of the gasfitter. The defendant, the court considered, must be held to have contemplated the possibility of careless persons bringing a light into contact with escaping gas. On behalf of the defendant three cases were cited: Wrightup v. Chamberlain (7 Scott, 598), Kiddle and Son v. Lovett (16 Q. B. Div. 605), and Ovington v. McVicar (2 Macph. 1066), a decision in 1864 of the Court of Session. In Wrightup v. Chamberlain (ubi sup.) the plaintiff bought a horse of the defendant with a warranty of soundness. The horse having been delivered, he resold it with a similar warranty. It was, in fact, unsound, and the purchaser from the plaintiff sued him for the breach of warranty. He defended the action unsuccessfully, and sought to recover from the defendant the costs of the defence. The jury found that he might, before he defended the action, have found out by examining the horse that it was unsound, and upon this finding it was held that he could not recover the costs of what was a rash and improvident defence. It is obvious that this decision has little or no bearing upon the present case. In Kiddle and Son v. Lovett (ubi sup.), however, the facts were in many respects very similar to those proved or admitted here. A suspended platform was put up for the plaintiffs by the defendant under a contract that he would fix it safely, to enable the plaintiffs to paint a house. The platform fell owing to the defective manner in which it was suspended, and hurt one of the painters in the plaintiffs' employment. The injured man brought an action under the Employers' Liability Act 1880 against the plaintiffs, which they settled by paying him 125*l.* They then sued the defendant for breach of his contract. The cause was tried before Denman, J., who found as a fact that the plaintiffs had been guilty of no negligence, and that they had settled the action under a mistaken belief in their own liability. That being so, the learned judge thought that they had no right to fix the defendant with the amount they had paid as damage, naturally or necessarily flowing from the defendant's breach of contract. The payment was one which need not have been made at all. The question, therefore, which is now before me did not arise, and it is only referred to by the learned judge at the close of his judgment with the observation that it was unnecessary to give any opinion upon it. "The point," he says, "is discussed in the third edition of Messrs. Roberts and Wallace's valuable work on the Liability of Employers, p. 471, and a Scotch case of Ovington v. McVicar is cited in the note as supporting the view that the damages in such a case be too remote." But, upon reference to that case, I find that the judges all thought that the master, who had extra-judicially settled a workman's claim was not under any legal liability to the workman. In that respect the case is exactly similar to Kiddle and Son v. Lovett, but the Lord Justice Clerk and the other judges of the court do express an opinion that even if the master had been legally liable to the workman he could not have made the defendant responsible. With all respect, I am unable to agree with them, and the case having been actually decided upon the ground that no liability for latent defect in machinery against which no care could have effectually guarded existed in the master, it does not constitute an authority for the present defendant. My judgment must be for the plaintiffs for 125*l.*

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Higson Simpson, West Hartlepool.

Solicitors for the defendant, Turnbull and Tilley, West Hartlepool.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Jan. 14 and 16, 1895.

(Before Bruce, J.)

THE NAUTIK. (a)

Practice—Jurisdiction—Writ in rem—Removal of ship out of jurisdiction before arrest—Judgment by default.

Due service of a writ in rem, without arrest of the ship, is sufficient notice to the persons interested to found jurisdiction and to enable the court to pronounce judgment by default against them.

Where in an action in rem for damage to cargo, the defendant's ship, after being served with a writ, but before being arrested, was secretly removed out of the jurisdiction, the court gave judgment by default for the plaintiffs' claim.

(a) Reported by Butler Aspinall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THIS was an action for damage to cargo in rem against the barque Nautik.

The plaintiffs, as indorsees of a bill of lading, signed by the master of the Norwegian barque Nautik on behalf of himself and the defendants, the owners of the barque, took delivery, on the arrival of the Nautik at Liverpool, of a cargo of cotton seed, which had been shipped on board of her at Pernambuco for delivery to them at Liverpool.

The plaintiffs alleged that the cotton seed had deteriorated, and that such deterioration was not occasioned by any of the perils or causes excepted in the bill of lading, and on the 15th Aug. 1894 issued their writ in rem in an action for damages.

On the 17th Aug. the writ was served by nailing the original on the mainmast of the Nautik whilst she was lying in Prince's Dock, Liverpool, and, on taking off the process, a copy of the writ was left nailed in its place.

No bail having been put in on behalf of the defendants, on the 20th Aug. a warrant of arrest was issued and lodged with the deputy-marshal.

On the 21st Aug. the deputy-marshal's officer informed the plaintiffs that the Nautik was not to be found within the port of Liverpool, and it was then discovered that the master of the Nautik had engaged a tug to tow her up to Garston, where she was under charter to load another cargo, that she had anchored in the Garston channel, but that at nightfall the master of the Nautik had engaged another tug to tow her to sea, and that she had proceeded to sea without a clearance or bill of health.

The defendants' solicitors having communicated with their clients, and being aware that the Nautik was under charter to load a cargo at Garston, had on the 15th Aug. written to the plaintiffs stating that their clients were willing to continue an undertaking that the Nautik should not leave the port of Liverpool until twenty-four hours' notice of her sailing should have been given to the plaintiffs; but on the 20th Aug. they wrote that their clients declined to sign the undertaking, and withdrew their letter of the 15th.

The Nautik had in the meantime proceeded to sea.

Under these circumstances the plaintiffs set the action down for trial, and now asked the court for judgment by default.

Aspinall, Q.C. for the plaintiffs in support of the motion.—All the necessary time has elapsed to entitle the plaintiffs to judgment. Before the Judicature Act there was no writ as distinguished from a warrant, the form of the warrant shows a direction to the marshal "to arrest the said, &c., and to keep the same under safe arrest, until you shall receive further orders from us; and to cite all persons who have, or claim to have, any right, title, or interest in the said, &c." The wording here shows that the marshal had to undertake two distinct acts, namely, an arrest and a citation. By the Judicature Act these two acts were separated, the writ took the place of the citation, and the warrant alone is now addressed to the marshal. The writ cites the parties interested to appear within a certain time, and states that in default of their so doing that judgment may be given in their absence. These words must mean what they express. The object of proceeding in rem has always been to cite the owner through the res. The holding of the ship is merely for the plaintiffs' security for his debt. The Black Book of the Admiralty (edited by Sir Travers Twiss), in the Appendix, p. 350, shows that the directions given were to arrest a certain ship, and to cite per eandem navem the owner. The whole object of the procedure was to get at the owner either by citation or the arrest of the ship:

The Parlement Belge, 42 L. T. Rep. 273; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234; 5 P. Div. 197.

BRUCE, J.—In this case the plaintiff seeks to obtain judgment by default against the Nautik, a Norwegian vessel, in an action for damage to cargo. A writ in rem, in the ordinary form, was served on the 17th Aug. on the vessel while she was lying in the Prince's Dock, Liverpool. After the service of the writ, and before the barque was arrested, the master of the barque clandestinely sailed at night from the port of Liverpool, and the barque has not since been within the jurisdiction. The usual time having elapsed since the date of service of the writ to entitle the plaintiff to have the case heard, the question arises whether, the property not having been under the arrest of the court, the court has jurisdiction to pronounce judgment by default. I am of opinion that it has. Service of a writ in rem upon property within the jurisdiction of the court is notice to all persons interested in the property of the claim indorsed upon the writ. It is quite true that, according to the older practice, a suit in rem was commonly commenced by a warrant arresting the property, just as in still earlier practice a suit in personam was commonly commenced by a warrant arresting the person. But all that is necessary to found jurisdiction is to give formal notice to the persons interested that a claim is made against them or against their property in a court of competent jurisdiction, and that, if they do not appear to vindicate their rights judgment may be given in their absence. The rules of the Supreme Court have directed that actions in rem shall be commenced by writ, and I think the service of the writ on the property has the same effect ,so far as notice to the persons interested in the property is concerned, as service of the warrant had under the former practice. To confer jurisdiction it is not, I think, necessary that the property, the subject-matter of the suit, should be actually in the possession of the court or under the arrest of the court, it is enough that it should be, according to the words of Lord Chelmsford, in the case of Castrique v. Imrie (23 L. T. Rep. 54; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 460; L. Rep. 4 H. of L. 448), within the lawful control of the state under the authority of which the court sits. The same view is expressed by Jessel, M.R., in The City of Mecca (44 L. T. Rep. 754; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 416; 6 P. Div. 112). That learned judge says: "An action for enforcing a maritime lien may no doubt be commenced without an actual arrest of the ship." I therefore give judgment for the plaintiffs' claim with costs.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, John R. Watkins, Liverpool.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

May 16 and 17, 1895.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., SMITH and RIGBY, L.JJ.)

JAMIESON v. THE NEWCASTLE STEAMSHIP FREIGHT INSURANCE ASSOCIATION. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — Insurance on freight under charter-party—Loss of freight—"Cancellation" of charter-party—Delay through peril of the sea —Frustration of adventure.

A policy of insurance upon freight under a charter-party provided that "no claim arising from the cancelling of any charter, nor for loss of time under a time charter," should be allowed. While proceeding to the port of loading, the vessel stranded and was so damaged that the voyage contemplated by the charter-party became impossible. The charterers did not load under the charter-party. The charter did not contain a "cancellation" clause, and the parties did not agree to rescind the contract.

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that the charter had not been "cancelled" within the meaning of the policy, and that the insurers were liable.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiff from the decision of the Divisional Court (Charles and Kennedy, JJ.) upon a special case stated by an arbitrator.

The facts stated by the arbitrator were as follows:

The claim in respect of which the dispute arose was a claim by Mr. Jamieson, who was the owner of the steamship Abrota, against the Newcastle Steamship Freight Insurance Association, for 762*l.*, alleged to be due under a marine policy of insurance for 800*l.* upon the freight of the Abrota, which policy was dated the 23rd Feb. 1893, and was executed by the association. It was a time policy, the insurance being from the 20th Feb. 1893 to the 20th Feb. 1894, and the rules of the association formed part of the policy. The risks insured against included perils of the sea, and, by rule 8, it was provided that "no claim arising from the cancelling of any charter, nor for loss of time under a time charter," should be allowed.

On the 10th Oct. 1893, whilst the policy was in force, a charter-party was entered into between the owners of the Abrota and Messrs. Math. Ullern and Cie, of Honfleur, by which the Abrota was chartered by Messrs. Ullern to proceed to Kotka, and there load a cargo for Honfleur.

On the 4th Oct. 1893 the Abrota left St. Petersburg for Kotka, and on the same day stranded.

On the 15th Oct. she was got off, and soon afterwards it was found that she had sustained considerable damage.

The repair of the damage was commenced on the 31st Oct. and completed on the 11th Dec.

In the meantime, about the 4th Dec., the port of Kotka had become closed for the winter by ice.

On the 26th Oct. 1893 the charterers sent a telegram to Mr. Jamieson, inquiring whether the Abrota would load at once, or he would cancel the charter-party. The telegram was in French, as follows:

> Telegraphiez si Abrota chargera immediatement ou si vous resiliez.

On the 27th Oct. Mr. Jamieson wrote to his brokers, asking them to reply to the charterers' telegram, and stating as follows:

> The position is, if we cancel the charter we void our insurance. Now it is for the cargo-owner to act, that is to say, charter another steamer and bring the cargo away, giving us notice of their intention of doing so, and for them to run the risk of cancelling the charter, as we cannot take this responsibility on our shoulders.

The brokers accordingly wrote to the charterers, in accordance with Mr. Jamieson's instructions, and the charterers, on the 31st Oct., sent to Mr. Jamieson this telegram:

> Your agents have declared the Abrota is unable to fulfil the charter, inviting us to charter another ship; the charter of the Abrota is therefore annulled.

On the same day Mr. Jamieson replied by a telegram:

> Abrota cannot agree cancel charter; if you forward by another steamer, you must take all responsibility.

The charterers, being unwilling to wait for the Abrota, refused to load her under the charter-party, and forwarded their cargo by another steamer.

The arbitrator found as a fact that on the 14th Oct. 1893 the vessel was damaged by perils of the sea, and that the time necessary for repairing such damage was so long that the voyage contemplated in the charter-party became, in a commercial sense, impossible He found that on the 31st Oct. 1893 there was no probability that the vessel could be loaded at Kotka within a reasonable time, and that the charterers were therefore entitled then to give, and did give, notice to the shipowners that they would not load the vessel under the charter-party. He also found that there was, under these circumstances, a loss of freight by perils insured against in respect of which Mr. Jamieson would be entitled to recover 762*l.* from the association if his claim is not a claim arising from the cancelling of any charter-party within the meaning of rule 8.

Construing the words of rule 8 in the sense in which they would be ordinarily understood by men of business, especially having regard to the object of the words in question, the arbitrator found that, under the circumstances set forth, the charter-party was cancelled within the meaning of the rule; and he found that Mr. Jamieson's claim was a claim arising from the cancelling of a charter-party.

Subject to the opinion of the court on the question stated, he awarded that Mr. Jamieson was not entitled to recover anything from the association in respect of the matters in dispute, and he awarded that Mr. Jamieson should pay to the association the taxed costs of the reference and award.

No witnesses were called before the arbitrator to prove that the word "cancelled" had any technical or peculiar meaning in shipping or insurance business; and it was not contended that the word had acquired any such technical or peculiar meaning.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether under the circumstances the claim of Mr. Jamieson is a claim arising from the cancelling of a charter-party within the meaning of rule 8.

If the question be answered in the affirmative the award is to stand; if in the negative, then the award is that there is due to Mr. Jamieson from the association the sum of 762*l.*, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum from the 11th Jan. 1894, and the taxed costs of the reference and award.

The Divisional Court (Charles and Kennedy, JJ.) held that the decision of the arbitrator was right, and confirmed his award.

The plaintiff appealed.

Bigham, Q.C. (Maurice Hill with him) for the appellants.—The question is, whether the plaintiff's claim arises from a "cancellation" of the charter-party within the meaning of clause 8. In these matters "cancelling" is a well-known expression, and it implies an act done by the parties to the contract. Cancellation implies the consent of the parties being given, and that thereby the contract ceases to exist. In the present case the carrying out of the charter-party has been prevented by the perils of the sea. Circumstances of that kind do not cancel the charter-party; they release the charterer from the obligation of putting goods on board the ship, but that is not cancellation:

Jackson v. The Union Marine Insurance Company, 31 L. T. Rep. 789; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125.

Finlay, Q.C. and Scrutton for the respondents.—Cancellation means annulment. Everything that puts an end to a contract cancels it. There is no necessity for the parties to meet together and agree that the contract is at an end:

Adamson v. Newcastle Steamship Freight Insurance Association, 41 L. T. Rep. 160; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 4 Q. B. Div. 462;

Mercantile Steamship Company Limited v. Tyser, 7 Q. B. Div. 73; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 6, n.

This clause was put in to meet the decision in The Alps (68 L. T. Rep. 624; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 337; (1893) P. 109), which was affirmed by this court in The Bedouin (69 L. T. Rep. 782; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391; (1894) P. 1).

Maurice Hill replied.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff brought an action against an insurance society upon a policy of insurance on chartered freight. The question is whether, under the circumstances, the plaintiff is entitled to recover upon the policy. The plaintiff had chartered a steamship by charter-party. That charter-party was in an ordinary form, and did not contain a certain clause which, it is well known, is contained in very many charter-parties, though not in all; that is, it did not contain what is called a cancelling clause, which is a clause generally providing that if the ship is not at the port of loading within a certain time the charterer can cancel the charter-party. Such a clause was not in the plaintiff's charter-party. This ship sailed for the port of loading and, on the way, was stranded, and so badly stranded that it was a long time before she could be got off. It took so long after that to repair her that the arbitrator found that "the time necessary for repairing such damage was so long that the voyage contemplated in the charter-party became, in a commercial sense, impossible." The adventure, under the charter-party, was therefore absolutely at an end, so that neither could the charterer load the ship for that adventure, nor could the shipowner carry the cargo upon that adventure. All, therefore, was at an end, and by reason of a peril of the sea. Unless, therefore, there was something to prevent it, there was a clear loss of freight under the charter-party to the shipowner by reason of a peril of the sea. That being so, the case is clearly within the terms of the policy of insurance, unless there is some stipulation in the policy to meet the case and to relieve the insurers. The insurers rely on the clause which provided that "no claim arising from the cancelling of any charter nor for loss of time under a time charter" should be allowed, that is, that the insurers should not be liable for a claim arising from a cancellation of the charter. The insurers insist that this charter-party was cancelled, within the meaning of that clause, and that, therefore, they are not liable. Now, what is the rule of construction to be applied to a policy such as this? The words of the policy are to be construed according to their ordinary business sense as used in the English language, and that rule is not to be departed from unless it is absolutely necessary to do so. Now, is the phrase to "cancel a charter-party" an ordinary phrase in the English language? It cannot be denied that it is. If there is no stipulation in a charter-party as to cancellation, how can either party cancel it? A charter-party can be cancelled only in the same way as any other contract. The rule is that neither party alone can cancel it, unless there is some stipulation to that effect. It can only be cancelled by mutual consent of both parties. It is well known, and it is admitted, that some charter-parties contain a cancellation clause, by which both parties agree that, if the ship does not arrive at the loading berth before a certain day, the charterer can, as against the shipowner, cancel the charter-party. The word "cancel" is used because both parties agree that it shall be done. In a business sense it means that, on a certain event, the charterer may cancel the charter-party, though the shipowner may not be willing. When there is such a clause, if there is a delay of the ship, caused by a peril of the sea, or by any other cause, the charterer, on account of that delay, can cancel the charter-party if he pleases. If circumstances arise which give the charterer the right to cancel, and he does so, that is an act done of his own free will. Now, was this charterer, if there had been a cancelling clause, in a position to exercise his option of cancelling? I think not. It has been found that the adventure was at an end by reason of the delay which occurred. It was impossible, therefore, for the charterer to load the ship under the charter-party. He might have done so under a new agreement, but he could not load under this charter-party. The shipowner also could not agree to carry under this charter-party; he would do so only under a new agreement. The charterer, therefore, was not in a position to cancel the charter-party; neither party was in such a position. The charter-party was gone by reason of the time having so far elapsed that the charter-party was at an end. Can anyone say that that could fairly and reasonably be called a cancellation? I think not. That is the cancellation upon which the insurers rely, and I am of opinion that it was not a cancellation. The loss of freight was directly caused by a peril of the sea, and the policy applies, and the shipowner is, therefore, entitled to the amount of the policy. The appeal succeeds, and must be allowed.

SMITH, L.J.—This is a claim by a shipowner against insurers upon a time policy on chartered freight. The shipowner alleges that the freight has been lost by a peril of the sea, within the meaning of the policy. The defendants rely upon the eighth condition of the policy, by which it is provided that "no claim arising from the cancelling of any charter, nor for loss of time under a time charter" shall be allowed. They say that there was a cancelling of this charter-party within the meaning of that condition. The short question is whether the defendants can make out that contention. The facts of the case are very simple. The shipowner made a charter by which the ship was to proceed to Kotka, and there load a cargo for Honfleur. While the ship was proceeding to Kotka to take in the cargo, she stranded, and became, by a peril of the sea, so damaged as to be unable to perform the contract, as laid down in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.). Neither party was then bound to proceed any further under the charter-party. It is said that, under these circumstances, the charter-party was "cancelled." I agree that, if there is a clause which is plain and can have only one grammatical construction, we must not look at the consequences which may result from that construction; but, if it is not plain, it is legitimate to consider the consequences. It is admitted here that, if the ship, by a peril of the sea, had become unable to go to Kotka at all, the insurers would have been bound to pay under the policy. Why, if the defendants' construction of the policy is correct, would they not be relieved from liability in such a case as that? I cannot see any difference between such a case and the present case. The ship here was so damaged that she could not continue her voyage. What is the difference between that and the present case? Where is the "cancelling" of the charter-party in either case? I cannot see any cancellation. I am of opinion that "cancelling" means the cancelling of the charter-party by mutual consent. I am fortified in that opinion by the latter part of clause 8. "Loss of time" there must mean by mutual consent of the parties, and I read the part of the clause which relates to "cancelling" to the same effect, that is, to mean if the charter-party is cancelled by mutual consent. Charles, J., in the court below, says that the clause includes the case where the charter-party has ceased to exist quite apart from the will of the parties. That will cover both the case of a total loss, and also the case of a stranding, which has prevented the ship from proceeding to the port of loading in time. I cannot so read the clause. There was no "cancelling" within the meaning of the clause, and the appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The only question is, what is the proper meaning of the word "cancelling" in the policy of insurance. The arbitrator has said that "construing the words of rule 8 in the sense in which they would be ordinarily understood by men of business," he finds that "the charter-party was cancelled within the meaning of the rule." He leaves that question, however, to be determined by the court, and he adds at the end of the case that there was no evidence that the word "cancelled" has any technical or peculiar meaning in shipping or insurance business, and that it was not contended that it had acquired any such technical or peculiar meaning. We must take the ordinary meaning of the word "cancel," which is that there is an agreement between the parties to put an end to the charter-party. Many other things besides a cancelling of the policy may prevent the shipowner from getting his freight. Here the arbitrator has found that "the voyage contemplated by the charter-party became, in a commercial sense, impossible." Any other finding would have been impossible. Before the repairs were finished, the port of Kotka was closed for the winter. Assuming that "cancelling" means something done by arrangement between the parties, the shipowner declined to cancel this charter-party. There was no cancellation of this charter-party within the meaning of clause eight of the policy, or at all. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: for appellant, Botterell and Roche; for respondents, Thomas Cooper and Co.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

April 2 and 10, 1895.

(Before CAVE and LAWRANCE, JJ.)

REG. v. SAMUEL AND ANOTHER. (a)

Thames Conservators—Election by shipowners—Voting of corporate bodies by proxy—Errors or irregularities "in or about" an election—Thames Conservancy Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. clxxxvii.), ss. 12, 22, 23, and 25.

The Thames Conservancy Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. clxxxvii.) empowers, amongst other persons, shipowners to vote at elections of conservators. Sect. 12 defines the qualification of shipowners. Sect. 22 provides that a vote at an election by shipowners, &c., may be given either personally or by proxy, or in the case of a body corporate by any shareholder or officer of the body as their proxy. Sect. 23 provides that the returning officer shall, according to the best of his ability, make a return of those elected, and every person so returned shall be deemed duly elected. Sect. 25 provides that an election by shipowners shall not be invalidated or be illegal by reason of any error in any list of voters, or by reason of any irregularity in the making or publishing such list, or by reason of any other error or irregularity in or about any election or matter preliminary or incidental thereto.

At an election of conservators by shipowners objection was taken to the return of the respondents on the ground that some of the votes were invalid inasmuch as they had been given by proxies given by certain corporate bodies to electors not shareholders or officers of such corporate bodies, and such votes had been received and counted at such election by the returning officer.

(a) Reported by G. H. GRANT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, on a rule for an information in the nature of a quo warranto, that, in an election of conservators by shipowners, a body corporate can only exercise its right of voting by proxy by a shareholder or officer of the body, and not by an elector. The returning officer, however, had acted judicially, and his return was conclusive, and the reception and counting of the votes objected to was precisely one of those errors in or about an election provided for by sect. 25.

IN this case a rule nisi had been obtained at the instance of the Poltallock Ship Company Limited against Marcus Samuel and Cory Francis Wright, calling upon them to show cause why an information in the nature of a quo warranto should not be exhibited against them to show by what authority they claimed to exercise the office of Conservators of the River Thames, elected by shipowners under the Thames Conservancy Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. clxxxvii.) on the ground that votes were received and counted at an election by the returning officer, which had been given in favour of the said Samuel and Wright by means of proxies given by corporate bodies to electors not shareholders or officers of such corporate bodies.

The facts of the case, and the sections of the aforesaid Act which bear upon this case, sufficiently appear in the written judgment.

J. Walton, Q.C. (Danckwerts with him) showed cause against the rule.—The decision of the returning officer is conclusive, and cannot be impeached:

Reg. v. Diplock, 21 L. T. Rep. 24; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 549;
Reg. v. Collins, 36 L. T. Rep. 192; 2 Q. B. Div. 30;
Cullen v. Morris, 2 Starkie, 577.

It is submitted that by sect. 25 an error, if there is one, does not vitiate the election. As to the question of proceedings by quo warranto there was cited

Reg. v. Owens, 2 E. & E. 86; 28 L. J. 316, Q. B.

The relator here is the Poltallock Shipping Company, and their proxy attended the election, but took no objection at the time. Having concurred in the election they cannot raise an objection now:

Rex v. Trevenen, 2 B. & Ald. 339;
Rex v. Slythe, 6 B. & C. 240; 9 D. & R. 226;
Rex v. Parry, 6 A. & E. 810.

Cripps, Q.C. (Scrutton with him) in support of the rule.

The arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment. Cur. adv. vult.

April 10.—The following written judgment of the court was delivered by LAWRANCE, J.—In this case a rule was obtained against Marcus Samuel and Cory Wright calling upon them to show cause why an information in the nature of a quo warranto should not be exhibited against them to show by what authority they claimed to exercise the office of Conservators of the river Thames, elected by shipowners under the Thames Conservancy Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. clxxxvii.), on the ground that votes given in favour of the said Marcus Samuel and Cory Wright by means of proxies given by corporate bodies to electors not shareholders or officers of such corporate bodies were received and counted at such election by the returning officer. The rule was obtained at the instance of the Poltallock Ship Company Limited. The statute empowers certain persons therein named, including among others shipowners, to vote for conservators of the river Thames, each class having the right to return a certain number to the board. By sect. 12 the qualification of shipowners is defined, and they are divided into two classes, A and B, class A being owners of 250 tons of shipping registered in the port of London, and class B being owners of the same amount of shipping registered at any other port than London, but having a place or places of business within the administrative county of London, and entering the port of London at least once a year. An election of conservators took place on the 5th Dec. 1894, when Samuel and Wright were returned as having been elected by the shipowners. Objection was made to the return on the ground that some of the votes given by certain corporate bodies were invalid by reason of their having voted in a manner not sanctioned by the Act. Sect. 22 provides that a vote at any election of any conservator by shipowners, by owners of sailing barges, lighters, and steamtugs, by dockowners, or by wharfingers may be given either by the elector personally or by another elector as his proxy, or in case of a body corporate by any shareholder or officer of the body as their proxy. That section deals with the manner in which voting by shipowners or corporate bodies is to be conducted. By sect. 23 the returning officer shall, according to the best of his judgment and ability, make a true return in writing to the conservators of the person or persons elected, and any person so returned shall be deemed duly elected. This section deals with the duties of the returning officer. On behalf of the respondents it was urged that bodies corporate were entitled to vote in the same manner as shipowners, owners of sailing barges, lighters, and steam tugs, dockowners, and wharfingers—namely, by another elector as proxy—and that the words "or in case of a body corporate by any shareholder or officer of their body as their proxy" conferred a right of voting in addition to their right of voting in the same manner as that prescribed in the section as applicable to the other class of voters mentioned in the earlier part of the section. We are unable to accede to this view, and we are of opinion that the only way in which a body corporate can exercise its right of voting by proxy is by any shareholder or officer of the body. It was contended that this view of the section would entail a hardship on bodies corporate, as their principal places of business might be at a considerable distance from London; but it is to be observed that it is a condition precedent to their right of voting that they should have a place or places of business in the administrative county of London, and in all probability some officer connected with such place of business who would be qualified to vote as proxy. The words of the section are clear and distinct, and we are of opinion that the returning officer did not take a correct view of the provisions of the section.

It was contended, secondly, that, assuming the returning officer was wrong in his view of the provisions of the 22nd section, by sects. 23 and 25 his return was final, and that no information in the nature of a quo warranto would lie, as his duties are by sect. 23 judicial, and not ministerial, and numerous cases were cited to show that under those circumstances his decision is final. It is unnecessary to refer more particularly to the cases which establish the principle contended for, but it may be remarked that the words of both sect. 23 and sect. 25 are much stronger than any words contained in the statutes on which the cases which were called to our notice were decided. By sect. 23 it is provided that the returning officer shall, according to the best of his judgment and ability make a true return in writing to the conservators of the person or persons elected, and any person so returned shall be deemed duly elected. No contention was raised on the part of the relator that the returning officer had not complied with the requirements of the section, and if that section stood alone we should have been of opinion that the returning officer had acted judicially in the matter, and that his return was conclusive. Sect. 25, however, provides that any election by shipowners shall not be invalidated or be illegal by reason of any error in any list of voters, or by reason of any irregularity in the making or publishing of any such list, or by reason of any other error or irregularity in or about any election or in or about any matter preliminary or incidental thereto, and we think that the reception and counting of the votes complained of by the returning officer was precisely one of the errors or irregularities "in or about" an election "or in or about" a "matter . . . incidental thereto." Under these circumstances we are of opinion that the rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Solicitors: against the rule, Walton, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton; in support of rule, Renshaw, Kekewich, and Smith.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Feb. 15, 16, 18, and 21, 1895.

(Before BRUCE, J., assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE WEGA. (a)

Collision—Thames—Steamship anchoring—Steamship not under command—Blasts of steam whistle—Side lights—Second riding light at stern—Thames Conservancy Regulations, Arts. 7 (c) and 18.

A steamship in the river Thames putting herself athwart the river and stopping her way to come to anchor is a steam vessel not under command within the meaning of art. 18 of the Thames Conservancy Regulations 1887, and it is incumbent upon her when carrying out such manœuvre to sound four or more blasts of the steam whistle in rapid succession to warn approaching vessels.

Where a steam-vessel is throwing herself across the river to come to anchor, three short blasts do not constitute the appropriate signal to signify that she is a vessel throwing herself across a navigable channel, even though she may be reversing at the time.

If the danger from an approaching vessel is such as to require it, more than four blasts should be sounded so long as the danger lasts, and the danger is not necessarily past until the vessel anchoring has swung to her anchor.

It is the duty of a steamship anchoring in the Thames to take in her side lights as soon as she is held by her anchor.

A vessel of the length of 150 feet or more is bound, under art. 7 (c) of the Thames Conservancy Regulations 1892, to exhibit, as soon as she comes to anchor, at or near her stern a second riding light so placed, and of such a character, as to show an unbroken light visible all around the horizon at a distance of at least one mile.

THIS was a collision action in rem brought by the owners of the steamship Galatea against the owners of the steamship Wega. The defendants counter-claimed.

The collision occurred in Barking Reach, in the river Thames, on the evening of the 21st Nov. 1894.

The facts of the case are fully set out in the judgment.

Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames:

Art. 18. When a steam-vessel is turning round or for any reason is not under command and cannot get out of the way of an approaching vessel, or when it is unsafe or impracticable for a steam vessel to keep out of the way of a sailing vessel, she shall signify the same by four or more blasts of the steam whistle in rapid succession, the blasts to be of about three seconds' duration.

Art. 7, as amended by an Order in Council of the 5th Aug. 1892, provides for the carrying of a riding light by vessels at anchor or moored in the river with certain exceptions. Amongst those exceptions is the following:

(c) Every vessel of the length of 150 feet or more lying in the river at her own anchor, or at any mooring buoys where she will swing, shall in lieu of the riding light carry in the forward part of the vessel at a height of not less than twenty feet, and not exceeding forty feet above the hull, a white light in a globular lantern of not less than eight inches in diameter, and so constructed as to show a clear uniform and unbroken light visible all round the horizon at a distance of at least one mile on a dark night with a clear atmosphere; and at or near the stern of the vessel, and at such a height that it shall not be less than fifteen feet lower than the forward light another such light.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Dawson Miller for the plaintiffs, the owners of the Galatea.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Dr. Stubbs for the defendants, the owners of the Wega.—The following cases were referred to in argument:

The Philotaxe, 37 L. T. Rep. 540; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 512;

The New Pelton, 65 L. L. T. Rep. 494; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 81; (1891) P. Div. 258.

Feb. 21.—BRUCE, J.—This action is brought by the owners of the steamship Galatea against the owners of the steamship Wega, and the owners of the Wega counter-claim against the owners of the Galatea. The Galatea was on a voyage from Treport to London, and shortly before the collision she was proceeding up Barking Reach, when her master says he suddenly got into a dense fog, and he decided to anchor for safety. The tide was about the last hour flood, flowing about half a knot an hour. His engines were stopped, and his helm put hard a port to give the vessel an angle across the river; then the engines were put slow ahead, and then full speed astern in order to take the way off his ship, and when the way was taken off his ship he let go his anchor.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He had ascertained by sounding that he was in four fathoms, and he ordered the mate to give the ship fifteen fathoms of chain. He got a hail from the mate that the anchor was holding, and he then according to his own account, gave an order to have the side lights and the masthead light taken in and the riding light put up, and he saw this order carried out. The Wega was coming down the Reach in charge of a Trinity House pilot, and those on board her say that they saw the masthead light and red light of the Galatea about half a mile off nearly ahead, but a little on the port bow of the Wega. The pilot of the Wega says he took the Galatea to be a vessel coming up the river, and he ported so as to get into a position to pass her port side to port side. Suddenly the red light of the Galatea disappeared, and a riding light appeared on the Galatea, and those on board the Wega saw that the Galatea was lying athwart the river. The engines of the Wega were put full speed astern, and her helm hard a-port, but the port quarter of the Galatea and the stem of the Wega came into collision. The first question to be considered is—was the Wega to blame? Had she a proper look-out? It seems to be an admitted fact in the case that immediately after the Galatea anchored, or almost at the moment she anchored, the fog lifted. The case of the Galatea, according to her preliminary act, is that she saw the Wega about a mile off; the case of the Wega, according to her preliminary act, is that she saw the Galatea about half a mile off. I think that these distances are exaggerated, but the statements made on the one side and the other are sufficient to show that the fog had at least to a great extent cleared off. Those on board the Wega say that they saw the red light of the Galatea from a quarter to half a mile away. I am asked to disbelieve this statement, and to regard it as a mere excuse made by the Wega for porting her helm. But I cannot in this way summarily set aside the positive evidence of the pilot, the master, the chief officer, and the second mate of the Wega. It is quite true that questions of fact are not to be determined by the number of witnesses on the one side or the other, but I cannot help coming to the conclusion that the probabilities of the case favour the statement of the witnesses for the Wega. I cannot doubt that the Wega ported, and, if she saw a red light, port helm was the natural manœuvre for her to adopt. The Galatea brought up to the south of mid-channel, and it is difficult to understand why the Wega should have attempted to pass to the south of the Galatea, unless the red light of the Galatea was visible. But the whole question is a question of time. At the time the anchor of the Galatea was let go the red light was exhibited, and properly exhibited. Was it taken in with due expedition? If the statement of the witnesses from the Wega is correct, it is hardly possible to avoid the conclusion that the red light was not taken in as soon as it might have been, and should have been. One of the witnesses from the Galatea said that the red light of the Wega was first seen by him five or six minutes after the side lights and masthead light were taken in. And several of the witnesses from the Galatea gave evidence which would lead to the conclusion that an appreciable, or even a considerable, time elapsed between the lights of the Galatea being taken in and the lights of the Wega coming into sight. But there is no matter upon which witnesses are so likely to be mistaken as on questions of time. And I have come to the conclusion on the evidence that the red light of the Galatea was left exhibited after the Galatea came to anchor, not perhaps for a long time, but for a sufficient time to mislead the Wega. If the red light was left exhibited for a period of two minutes or even less after the Galatea was brought up, I think it would be enough to lead to the mischief which happened. The red light ought to have been taken in immediately the Galatea was brought up. I do not think that was done. There was a lapse of two, three, or four minutes, or more, between the time when the ships sighted each other and the collision. According to the witnesses from the Galatea the red light was taken in just at the time the anchor light was put up. The man who put up the riding light says that he got the riding light up, and went back to the forecastle. Before he got back to the forecastle the Wega was within hailing distance, and he heard the hailing. His evidence, I think, tends to confirm the statement of the Wega that the side lights of the Galatea were not taken in until the Wega was very close upon her. I have come to the conclusion that the Wega is not to blame, she was embarrassed by seeing the red light, and, in the circumstances, I do not think she was to blame for porting. She could not have ported more than she did, because of the barges on her starboard bow. As soon as the Wega found that the Galatea was nearly athwart and at anchor, she at once adopted the only possible measures to avoid collision. I think a good look-out was being kept on board the Wega, and that she was carefully navigated, and at a proper rate of speed taking the state of the weather into consideration, and that therefore no blame attaches to her.

It follows from what I have already said that I think the Galatea is to blame for allowing her red light to be exhibited for an appreciable time after she came to anchor. The operation of anchoring in a river like the Thames in a fog, or in thick weather or at night, is an operation which requires to be performed with very great care. When the Galatea adopted the manœuvre of throwing herself athwart the river, she ought to have been astute in the adoption of all precautions to minimise the danger. The side lights ought to have been taken in instantly she was held by her anchor. I think there was delay in carrying out this duty. Moreover the Trinity Brethren advise me, and I think, that the Galatea is to blame for neglecting to sound the signals required by art. 18 of the Thames Conservancy Regulations. It has been contended that the article applies only where a vessel is turning round in the sense of going round from one course to an opposite course. I think that a vessel throwing herself athwart the river and stopping her way to come to anchor is "not under command" within the meaning of the rule, and that it was incumbent upon the Galatea to have sounded four or more blasts in rapid succession. It is said that the Galatea did sound three short blasts as she was reversing before she let go her anchor. I am not quite satisfied upon the evidence that she did, but, even if she did, three short blasts do not constitute the appropriate signal to signify that a vessel is throwing herself athwart a navigable channel. It is said that the Wega did not hear the three short blasts, and that therefore it is not to be assumed that she would have heard four or more. But I cannot assent to that argument. Four blasts or more constitute a danger signal which is calculated to attract attention. And as I read the rule it requires not merely four blasts to be sounded, but four blasts or more—which I think is to be taken to mean that the blasts shall be more than four when the danger is such as to require it. And I cannot doubt in the present case that if the Galatea had sounded four short blasts and more so long as the danger lasted, that a warning would have been given which would probably have enabled the Wega to avoid the collision. It is contended that as the Galatea was at anchor before the collision, the circumstances which rendered it incumbent upon her to sound the danger signal had passed. But the danger cannot, I think, be said to have passed until the Galatea had swung to her anchor. The Elder Brethren consider that in the state of the tide the Galatea would in a little time have swung to tide head down the river, and, so long as she was swinging across the river, so long as it seems to me, did the danger occasioned by her turning continue. Again, I think that the Galatea is to blame for not having near her stern a second riding light exhibited, so as to show an unbroken light all round the horizon in accordance with art. 7 (c) of the Thames Conservancy Regulations allowed by the Order in Council of the 5th Aug. 1892. Whether the Galatea had a masthead light showing a light over twenty points exhibited on her stern or taffrail is a question on which there is great conflict of evidence. But if she had, it would give very uncertain warning to a vessel coming down the river. Until the Galatea was nearly athwart the river it would not show up the river at all, and even then the extent to which it would show would depend to a considerable degree upon the position in which it was fixed or hung. Whether there was a stern light exhibited from the stern of the Galatea or not, it was not a light of such a character as to attract the attention of vessels coming down the river at the distance of a mile, or anything like that distance. I think it was the duty of the Galatea as soon as she came to anchor, to exhibit a second riding light near her stern as prescribed by the regulation I have referred to. I think it was specially incumbent upon her, having regard to the position in which she was, that she should be careful to comply with this regulation in order to afford notice to vessels coming up or down that she was athwart, or nearly athwart, the channel, and I think it is highly probable that if a bright riding light had been exhibited near the stern of the Galatea, that it would have been seen by the Wega at a distance sufficient to have enabled the Wega to keep out of the way of the Galatea.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, William A. Crump and Son.

Solicitors for the defendants, Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes.

March 2, 4, and 5, 1895.

(Before BRUCE, J., and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE HESTIA. (a)

Salvage—Agreement to render specific service—Failure to perform—Beneficial services—Right to remuneration.

Plaintiffs in a salvage action left a vessel ultimately saved by other salvors in a position somewhat better than that in which they first picked her up. There was an agreement in writing that the plaintiffs should tow the vessel to a place of safety for a specified sum, but this agreement the plaintiffs failed to carry out.

Held, that, although the plaintiffs had failed to perform the specific agreement, notwithstanding that such performance though difficult was not impossible, they had rendered some beneficial service which contributed to the safety of the vessel, and were therefore entitled to remuneration for what they had done.

THIS was a salvage action instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Escalona, against the owners of the steamship Hestia, her cargo and freight.

The Escalona was a screw-steamship of 1880 tons gross, and at the time of the services in question was on a voyage from Three Rivers to London, laden with a general cargo, and carried a crew of twenty-seven hands, all told. The Hestia was a screw-steamship of 3790 tons gross, manned by a crew of forty hands, all told, and was on a voyage from Glasgow to Montreal, laden with a general cargo. When picked up by the Escalona she was in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, anchored about twenty-two miles E.S.E. of Heath Point, with her tail shaft broken outside the stern tube, and having lost her propeller. When the Escalona had made fast, the following agreement was entered into in writing between the master of the Escalona and the master of the Hestia:

Steamship Escalona.—At sea, Nov. 3, 1894.—I hereby agree to pay to the steamship Escalona or owners, the sum of three thousand pounds (3000*l.*) for towing the steamship Hestia from sea to a place of safety. (Signed) JOHN RAINNIE, Master steamship Hestia.

The Escalona towed the Hestia for a distance of a little more than fifty miles when the hawser broke, the weather became very bad, and the Hestia put her anchors down, and rode out the gale. When the wind moderated the Hestia endeavoured to get up her anchors, but refused to slip them, and the master of the Escalona thereupon proceeded on his voyage, calling at Heath Point to telegraph to Montreal for a tug. The Hestia was afterwards towed into the river by another vessel.

The plaintiffs said that the Escalona was willing and ready to tow the Hestia into the river, and but for the refusal of those on board the Hestia to leave their anchorage could have done so without difficulty, and that they had left the Hestia in comparative safety and in good anchorage ground. The defendants denied that the Escalona had performed the agreement, or that she was entitled to any salvage remuneration, and alleged that the Escalona had abandoned the agreement.

The value of the Hestia was 24,500*l.*, of her cargo 9620*l.*, and of her freight 360*l.* The value of the Escalona was 13,000*l.*, of her cargo 8150*l.*, and of her freight 1670*l.*

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Aspinall, Q.C. (with him Laing) for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs performed the agreement. They took the Hestia to a place of safety, and are therefore entitled to 3000*l.* Even if they did not perform the agreement, they rendered beneficial services to the Hestia, and are entitled to adequate remuneration for what they did:

The Westbourne, 61 L.T. Rep. 156; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405; 14 P. Div. 132;
Kennedy's Law of Salvage, p. 198.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (with him Butler Aspinall), for the defendants, contrà.—The plaintiffs are bound by the contract. They have failed to perform it, and are therefore entitled to nothing. The same principles of law apply to a salvage contract as are applicable to any other contract:

Cutter v. Powell, 6 T. R. 320.

BRUCE, J.—In this case the Escalona fell in with the steamship Hestia when she was in a disabled condition, and no doubt in a position of some peril, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. At that time, on the 3rd of Nov. an agreement was made between the master of the Escalona and the master of the Hestia, which was in these terms: [reads it.] The Escalona took the Hestia in tow and towed her for a distance of a little over fifty miles, when the hawser broke, the weather became very bad, and the Hestia put her anchors down and rode out the gale of wind in a position of some difficulty and danger. After that she was in very deep water, and the Escalona does not seem to have been able to hold her so as to enable her to get up her anchors. There may have been some misconception on the part of the Escalona as to what the Hestia was doing. In point of fact the master of the Hestia did attempt to get up his anchors, and he succeeded in getting in twenty fathoms of, I think, his starboard anchor cable, and was able in the course of the day to get up his starboard anchor, no doubt with labour on the part of his crew. The Escalona seems to have thought that the Hestia could not get up her anchors, and that it would be useless to hold her while she was getting up her anchors. The master of the Hestia refused to slip his anchors, and the master of the Escalona seems to have come to the conclusion that it was not necessary for him to stay there longer, and he went and left the Hestia, going, no doubt, to send a message from the lighthouse. In point of fact, whatever the master of the Escalona thought, he did not perform this agreement. He never brought the Hestia into a place of safety. Therefore I am clearly of opinion that the 3000*l.* cannot be recovered under the agreement. But it is contended that, even assuming that the master of the Escalona rendered some service which contributed to the ultimate safety of the Hestia, still he is not entitled to any award, because by virtue of his agreement he undertook to render a certain specified service for a specified sum, and he has not performed that agreement. It is said that he is not entitled to anything, even though the service rendered may in some degree have contributed to the safety of the vessel. Now that is a proposition of law to be considered by me. No doubt at common law, according to the strict doctrine of common law, where there is a special agreement to render a certain service for a specified amount, unless that agreement is performed, the amount is not recoverable. And more than that, according to the ordinary principles applied in common law, you cannot assume an implied agreement where there is a special agreement. If this related to services strictly regulated by common law principles, I should have very great difficulty in saying that the Escalona was entitled to anything, even on the assumption that she had rendered some service. But I do not think that the principle which undoubtedly applies at common law necessarily applies, or does apply, in this court in salvage actions. Where salvage services are rendered, a salvage award may be recovered altogether in the absence of an agreement. Ordinarily you can only recover at law for services rendered upon a contract specified, or a contract implied, but it is quite clear that in this court salvage can be recovered for services, although there is no contract. For services rendered in Admiralty it is quite clear that the owners of the vessel are liable to pay, if the vessel is saved, out of the property saved, an award to those who have saved the property, although there is no evidence of contract. I think I may adopt the principle laid down by Kennedy, J. in his work on salvage, where he says: "A salvage agreement, properly so called, is an agreement which fixes the amount to be paid to the salvor for his assistance but still leaves the right to any payment contingent upon the preservation of some part at least of the property in peril. Such an agreement does not alter the character of the services or of the reward." Therefore, if the salvage agreement leaves untouched all the other conditions, I do not think I ought to say, if the plaintiffs have not performed their agreement, that they therefore cannot be entitled to recover anything. I think they are in the same position as if they had had no agreement. I cannot find in this case, and the Elder Brethren do not think, that it was impossible for the Escalona to have saved the vessel. If the Escalona had stayed there a little longer, the probability was that they would have been able to take the vessel in tow. I cannot find as a matter of fact that there were circumstances which rendered the performance impossible. But the circumstances had become so difficult, and the master of the Escalona found the expenditure of power necessary to complete the service so great, that I do not find that he was guilty of negligence. I think he was mistrustful of his own tackle. Still, if he did render any service to the Hestia, if he did contribute to her ultimate safety, I think he is entitled to some salvage reward. Now I have to consider this question, and I have considered it with the assistance of the Elder Brethren. Did the Escalona render any service that contributed to the ultimate safety of the Hestia? That is a somewhat difficult question. No doubt the Hestia was in a position of difficulty when picked up by the Escalona, and she was also, I think, in a position of some difficulty and some danger where she was left by the Escalona, and, apart from the circumstances which I shall mention presently, it would be very difficult—and the Elder Brethren agree with me—to say that the ship in the position in which she was left by the Escalona was in a position of much greater safety than where found. But there are circumstances, I think, to be taken into account. As left by the Escalona the Hestia was in a position where she could more easily communicate for help; she could communicate with the lighthouse at South Point, and therefore she was in a somewhat better position. Then she was towed some fifty miles nearer her destination; and there is this circumstance, that she was probably taken more into the way of the vessels passing along the Gulf of St. Lawrence. If she had been left where she was it is impossible to say what might have happened to her. She might have drifted into a position where vessels might not have fallen in with her. I think that, in this respect, as she was nearer communication, and nearer her destination, and a little more near the track of vessels, I am entitled to say that in some way the Escalona did contribute to the safety of the vessel. But I think that she contributed to a small extent, and therefore the award must be a small sum. I think that if I award 300*l.* I shall be giving a proper award.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche.
Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

April 2, 8, and May 7, 1895.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir F. H. Jeune) and BRUCE, J., with TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE BLUE BELL. (a)

Collision—Fog—"Fairway" of the river Thames—Meaning of—Thames Conservancy Rules 1880, arts. 11, 12, 13.

The fairway of a river is not necessarily confined to that part of the channel which is marked by buoys, but includes all that part of the river inshore of the buoys which is navigable for vessels of moderate draught, and hence where a sailing barge at anchor in the navigable channel inside the West Blyth buoy, river Thames, neglected during a fog to ring a bell, she was held to have committed a breach of art. 13 of the Thames Navigation Rules.

APPEAL from a decision of the judge of the City of London Court, dated the 2nd Jan. 1895.

The plaintiff was Mr. G. W. Gill, of Rochester, owner of the sailing barge Shield, and the defendants were the owners of the steamship Blue Bell.

On the 11th Oct. 1894 the Shield was proceeding up the Thames with a cargo of clay, and anchored inside the West Blyth buoy during a fog. She exhibited an anchor light, and sounded her bell occasionally. In the night the Blue Bell, which was a vessel of 344 tons register, and was on a voyage from London to Antwerp with a general cargo, came into collision with the barge, and cut her down to the water's edge. She was run on to the Blyth Sand, temporary repairs were effected, and she was able to proceed in tow to London. Her owner brought an action in the City of London Court against the owners of the Blue Bell, and the following judgment was given:

Mr. Commissioner KERR.—If the barge was out of the fairway—and I think upon the whole of the evidence I am bound to find that she was out of the fairway of the river—all she was bound to do was to anchor, and to have her riding light up. No man is bound to be on deck, and no bell is bound to be rung. They are only bound to ring the bell when the vessel is in the fairway. If she was out of the fairway it is perfectly clear that the steamer came out of the fairway, whether in consequence of the fog or in consequence of some occurrence I do not know. I do not say from any act—from any positive act—of negligence on the part of the steamer, but at all events she was out of the fairway of the river. She passed these two barges [the learned judge is here referring to two other barges lying at anchor on the port quarter of the Shield] on the inner side near the shore, and she anchored on the line of the fairway between the middle buoy and the west buoy, showing she must have come out of the fairway of the river for some reason or other, and she was, to use the language of the common law, a kind of trespasser. It is perfectly clear from the damage done to the barge, cutting into her three feet, that it could not have been done with the impact of a vessel going only with the tide. That is quite out of the question. There must have been considerable way on the steamer to have done the amount of damage which was done to the barge. Whether the captain was altogether prudent in going so far as he did, considering the fog, is an important question. I am always disposed to hold that a vessel which goes on in a fog must take the consequences; but it is not necessary to decide that here. It is quite enough to decide that the defendant vessel has not cleared herself of the duty of showing that there was no negligence on her part in effecting this damage. She has done this damage to a vessel which had a full right to be where she was, and she has not cleared herself, and there must be judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Crawford for the appellants.

Pyke, Q.C. and Laing for the respondent.

Judgment was reserved, and delivered on May 7 by BRUCE, J.—This is an appeal from a decision of the learned judge of the City of London Court. The action was instituted by the owner of the sailing barge Shield against the owners of the steamship Blue Bell to recover damage sustained by the barge in a collision with the Blue Bell in a fog. The collision happened in the river Thames near the West Blyth Buoy, above and inside of the buoy; that is, between the buoy and the south shore of the river. The barge was at anchor, and the learned judge has held that, as the barge was inside the buoy, she was out of the fairway, and was under no obligation to ring a bell. The learned judge has also found that, as the steamship Blue Bell passed to the south of the buoy, "she was, to use the language of the common law, a kind of trespasser." He has decided that the steamship is alone to blame for the collision. The appellants, the owners of the Blue Bell, contend that the barge was to blame for neglecting to comply with the provisions of the 13th article of the regulations governing the navigation of vessels in the river Thames. The 12th article provides that: "Every sailing vessel navigating the river shall be provided with . . . an efficient bell;" and the 13th article provides that: "In fog all steam vessels and all sailing vessels, when in the fairway of the river, and not under way, shall at intervals of not more than two minutes ring a bell." There is no express finding by the learned judge that the Shield neglected to comply with the article last mentioned; all that he decided on this part of the case was that the Shield was not bound to ring a bell. But we think it may be inferred, from a passage in his judgment, that he was not satisfied upon the evidence that those on board the Shield did, at intervals of not more than two minutes, ring a bell. It is, of course, a difficult matter for us, who have not heard the witnesses, to deal with a question of fact, upon which there has been no express finding by the court below. But we gather from the evidence of the master of the barge himself that her bell had not been rung for an interval of ten minutes before the collision. It is true that statements of witnesses respecting intervals of time are often far from accurate, and the mate of the barge, although he agrees with the statement of the master as to the time by the clock (2.10 a.m.), when a bell was last rung, says he thinks that it was about two or three minutes before he heard the shout from the Blue Bell. But neither the master nor the mate seems to have undertaken the duty of attending to the bell. The mate said that sometimes he attended to it and sometimes the master. In his deposition before the receiver of wreck the master stated that he or his mate had frequently visited the deck, looking to the riding light and ringing the ship's bell. We think that the fair deduction from the whole of the evidence is that the master and the mate were below while the barge was at anchor; that one or the other came on deck at uncertain intervals; that the bell was rung only occasionlly; and that it was certainly not rung for an interval of more than two minutes, probably more than ten minutes, before the collision.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Then the question arises whether the 13th article of the Thames regulations applies; in other words, whether the barge was in the fairway of the river. In his deposition before the receiver of wreck the master of the barge described his position to be about 500 yards above the Middle Blyth Buoy, and just inside. At the hearing he described the place as 400 or 500 yards above the West Blythe Buoy, and inside about 200 yards. He marked the place on a chart produced to him, but whether he knew the exact position in which he was anchored is, we think, somewhat doubtful. The depth of water above and inside the West Blythe Buoy is not inconsiderable. For some distance above and inside the buoy the depth of water at low water springs is not less than eighteen feet, and for more than a cable's length above and inside the buoy the depth is nowhere less than ten feet. When the barge anchored an hour and a half or two hours before high water she anchored, according to the evidence of her master, in three fathoms. The barge Sphere, which drew five feet of water, was anchored forty or fifty yards inside of the Shield, and there was another barge, a light barge, anchored about fifty yards inside of the Shield. The Blue Bell drew eleven feet six inches, and at the place of the collision there was certainly water enough for her at half ebb. All the facts stated in evidence seem to us to point to the conclusion that the Shield was anchored above and inside of the West Blyth Buoy, but not so far inside as to be out of the navigable channel. That is to say, she was anchored in a part of the river where it is safe for vessels of moderate draught to navigate. The West Blyth and the Middle Blyth Buoys mark the southern boundary of the channel commonly used by large vessels of deep draught, but they are put there simply as marks to indicate the extent of the deep water channel. There is no regulation to forbid vessels navigating inshore of the buoys. There is a clear waterway inshore of the buoys, into which sailing vessels of moderate draught when beating up or down the river occasionally stand, and even sailing vessels with a fair wind, and steam vessels such as the Blue Bell, when the tide is against them, pass inside of the buoys to cheat the tide. Now we are asked to find that the barge Shield, when anchored, as we find she was, in a part of the waterway inside the buoys, where there is a clear passage and where the smaller class of vessels not unfrequently navigate, was under no obligation to ring a bell in a fog. We need hardly say that neither reason nor convenience seems to favour such a conclusion. But, of course, we are bound by the Thames Regulations, and we have only to determine the proper construction to be put upon the words there used. The question turns upon the meaning of the word "fairway." Was the Shield in the fairway of the river? The word "fairway" means, we think, a clear passage way by water. Wherever there is an open navigable passage, used by vessels proceeding up and down a river or channel, that may be said to be a fairway. We think that the meaning of the 13th article is that vessels when in any part of the river used for the passage of vessels shall in a fog, when not under weigh, ring a bell. We think that the Shield was in the fairway, and that she was bound in compliance with the 13th article to ring a bell at intervals of not more than two minutes. She neglected this duty. If she had rung the bell as required by the article we think that it is probable that the bell would have been heard by those on board the Blue Bell in time to have enabled them to take measures to have avoided the collision. We must therefore decide that the Shield is to blame.

The next question to be considered is, was the Blue Bell to blame? We do not think that she can be said to have been "a kind of trespasser," as found by the learned judge below. The buoys, as we have already said, are laid down as guides to navigation, and there is no regulation which renders it unlawful for vessels to pass inshore of them. The 11th article of the regulations governing the navigation of vessels in the Thames provides that all vessels entering or being overtaken by a fog, shall be navigated with the greatest caution, and at a very moderate speed. According to the witnesses from the Blue Bell, the steamship was proceeding down the river dead slow, when they came into a thick fog, and the engines of the Blue Bell were stopped immediately, and the master of the Blue Bell gave orders to the second mate to stand by the anchor. According to the second mate of the Blue Bell, her engines had been stopped ten minutes before the collision. The engineer of the Blue Bell was not called, and no reason seems to have been given for his absence. There is no expressed finding by the learned judge that the steamship was proceeding at more than a very moderate speed, but he expressed the opinion that as the Blue Bell cut into the barge three feet, that could not have been done with the impact of a vessel going only with the tide. We do not feel so confident on that point. The blow was a stem on blow, the tide was of the force of about two knots, and we are not prepared to say that a steamship such as the Blue Bell, 175 feet in length, and laden with a cargo of 300 or 400 tons, might not, if she came stem on, with a speed of no more than two knots, against a barge at anchor, cut three feet into the timbers of the barge. But in the view we take of the case it is not necessary for us to determine this point. The Blue Bell ran into the fog ten minutes or more before the collision. Indeed, from one answer given by the master of the Blue Bell it would seem to have been a quarter of an hour before the collision that the steamship came into the fog. After consulting the elder brethren we have come to the conclusion that there was no good reason why the anchor of the Blue Bell should not have been let go some considerable time before the collision. It would only have been an act of common prudence that the Blue Bell should at once have dropped her anchor when she came into the bank of fog. The case of The Otter (4 A. & E. 203), establishes that in a dense fog it is the duty of a steam-vessel to anchor as soon as circumstances will permit. We think that the Blue Bell is to blame for continuing to proceed, even though at a moderate speed, after she entered the fog, for a period of ten minutes or more. The neglect of the duty to anchor in a thick fog is a frequent cause of damage to property, and loss of life, and we conceive it to be highly important in the interests of navigation that those who disregard the duty should bear the loss occasioned by their imprudence. For the reason we have given we pronounce both ships to blame. There will be no costs to either party; no costs of the cause by reason of the ordinary Admiralty rule; no costs of the appeal in accordance with the rule laid down in The Hector (48 L. T. Rep. 890; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 101; 8 P. Div. 218).

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Keene, Marsland, Bryden, and Besant; for the respondent, Ince, Colt, and Ince.

April 13, 30, and May 8, 1894.

(Before the PRESIDENT (Sir Francis Jeune.)

THE ENGLISHMAN AND AUSTRALIA. (a)

Collision—Steamship towing—Liability of tow—Admiralty jurisdiction—Maritime tort—Joint tort-feasors.

Where a steam tug towing came into collision with another vessel and all three vessels were found to blame, the Court held that such a collision was a maritime tort within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty; that the right to recover damages was governed by the rule prevailing in that court, and not by the common law doctrine of contributory negligence; and hence the owners of the tug and the owners of the tow were liable for half the damages of the other vessel after deducting half the damages of the tug.

ACTION for damage by collision.

The plaintiffs were Messrs. Green, Holland, and Sons, owners of the steamship Ada, and the defendants were the owners of the steam tug Englishman and the owners of the barque Australia.

The collision occurred in the North Sea, between Hartlepool and Seaham.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:

On 22nd Feb. 1894, the Ada, a steamship of 555 tons register, belonging to the port of London, with engines of 99 h.p., and a crew of fourteen hands, was on a voyage from Sunderland to Devonport with a cargo of coal, in the North Sea off Seaham. About 6.45 a.m. she was on a S.E. by S. course, with the engines going slow, and making about three to four knots per hour. The weather was foggy, the wind light from the westward, and the tide first quarter ebb of the force of about one knot. The usual lights were exhibited, and the fog whistle was being sounded. In these circumstances the two masthead (towing) lights of the Englishman were observed at about fifty yards distance, and bearing about three points on the starboard bow. The helm of the Ada was immediately put hard-a-starboard, two short blasts were blown on the whistle, and the Englishman was hailed to hard-a-starboard. The engines of the Ada were stopped and ordered to be reversed, but before they could be got astern, the Englishman, coming on at a high rate of speed, with the barque Australia in tow, struck the Ada with her stem a heavy blow on the starboard side, just before the bridge, doing her so much damage that she sank in a short time. Before the collision no whistle from the Englishman nor foghorn from the Ada was heard.

The Englishman, at the time, was under an engagement with the owners of the Australia to tow her to the Tyne, and those on board the Englishman were the servants of the owners of the Australia, and were subject to the control and orders of those on board the Australia.

It was alleged on behalf of the Englishman, which was a screw steam tug of 32 tons register and 169 tons gross, with a crew of nine hands, that at the time and place above mentioned she was towing the Norwegian barque Australia from Havre to South Shields. The wind was north-westerly and light, the weather a thick fog, and the tide about high water. The Englishman was on a N.W. by N. ¾ N. magnetic course, and was making from two and a half to three knots an hour. Her regulation towing and side lights were exhibited, and her whistle and the horn of the barque were being duly sounded for fog.

In these circumstances the whistle, and immediately after the masthead light, of a steamship which proved to be the Ada was heard and seen respectively about three points on the port bow of the Englishman at a distance of about one to two ship's lengths. The helm of the Englishman was at once hard-a-ported and her engines were stopped and reversed full speed, but the Ada coming on fast, and heading so as to cause risk of collision, hailed the Englishman to starboard her helm, but before there was time to do so, the starboard bow of the Ada struck the stem of the Englishman.

It was also alleged (inter alia) that the Ada improperly starboarded her helm, and that she neglected to sound a fog whistle or show a proper or any green side light.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On behalf of the owners of the Australia it was alleged that she did not come into collision with the Ada or cause any damage to her, and if the collision was caused by the negligence of those on board the Englishman, any liability on the part of the Australia was denied.

Before and at the time of the collision the Australia, a Norwegian iron barque of 1232 tons net register, was being towed in ballast from Havre to the river Tyne by the steam-tug Englishman, of Hull, at the rate of between two and a half to three knots an hour, with all sails furled, on a course N.W. by N. ¾ N. magnetic. The regulation lights were exhibited on both vessels, and the foghorn and whistle were being sounded.

Shortly after the fog had become so thick that the tug was no longer visible to those on board the Australia, and they had hailed the tug to shorten in the tow-rope, the crash as of a collision was heard ahead of them, but neither the tug nor any other vessel, or their lights, were visible. The helm of the Australia was at once put hard-a-port, and, as the tug ceased towing the Australia rapidly lost her way, and presently made out the loom of the Englishman and of another steamer, which proved to be the Ada, lying with their heads to the eastward.

These defendants required the terms of the engagement to tow, alleged in the plaintiffs statement of claim, to be proved, and they denied that those on the Englishman were their servants, or were subject in any matter material to the collision complained of, to the control and order of those on board the Australia.

The action was tried before the President (Sir F. Jeune) and Trinity Masters, and on the 13th April 1894 he gave judgment to the effect that both the Ada and the Englishman were to blame for their excessive speed, and that the Australia had full knowledge of the speed of the Englishman, that she was able to hail, and that therefore she could have lessened the speed of the Englishman had she been so minded.

On the 30th April the question as to the liability of the Australia for the negligence of the Englishman came on for further argument.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Nelson for the plaintiffs.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Butler Aspinall for the tug Englishman.

Pyke, Q.C. and Scrutton for the Australia.

Judgment, in which the arguments sufficiently appear, was reserved, and delivered on the 8th May, as follows:—

The PRESIDENT.—In this case the Ada, a steam vessel, brought an action against the tug Englishman and her tow, the Australia, a barque, in respect of a collision between herself and the Englishman, occurring in the North Sea off Seaham. I found that both the Ada and the Englishman were to blame for their excessive speed, and that the Australia should and could have restrained, and did not restrain, the speed of the Englishman. Several points of law are now raised on behalf of the Australia. The first and main point is that the Ada was guilty of contributory negligence, and therefore cannot recover; in other words, that the rule of common law, and not the rule of Admiralty, applies. The argument, as I understand it, is that inasmuch as the collision was not between the Ada and the Australia, but between the Ada and the Englishman, and as therefore, in order to make the Australia liable to the Ada, the principle of the liability of a master for the negligence of his servant is introduced, this ousts the Admiralty doctrine that where in a collision two ships are to blame, the delinquent ship can recover part—fixed by Admiralty practice in this country at half—of the damage, and substitutes the common law doctrine that in an action of negligence neither of two wrongdoers can recover. It is apparently true that the precise set of facts in this case has hitherto not arisen for adjudication, because in the two cases nearest to it there is a difference. Neither in The Niobe (59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 257; 6 Asp Mar. Law Cas. 300; 13 P. D. 55), where a vessel was held entitled to recover both against a tug, with whom she came into collision, and a tow, which was held responsible for the tug; nor in The American and Syria (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 42; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 350; 6 P. C. 127), where, under similar circumstances of collision, a vessel was held entitled to recover against the tug alone, was the plaintiffs' vessel to blame. In the latter case, had the plaintiffs' vessel been to blame, the ordinary rule of Admiralty law would, no doubt, have been followed. But, although there is no authority in point, the case seems to me to be clear on principle, and, indeed, to be free from the difficulties which occur in several cases similar in some respects to the present. This is a case of a maritime tort, arising out of a collision between these ships, and in which both the plaintiffs and the defendants appear in the action as owners of ships, and in that capacity are to blame in respect of the collision. It is a case of a maritime tort, therefore it is a case within the Admiralty jurisdiction (see The Sarah, 1 Lush. 549), and a case to which decisions given in cases of contract, such as The Energy (3 A. & E. 48), are not applicable. It is a case arising out of a collision between ships. Therefore we need not concern ourselves with such exceptions to the Admiralty law as appear to have been made in America. I was referred in argument to the case of The Max Morris (30 Davies's Reps. 1), in which the Supreme Court of the United States held that a man who fell from the bridge to the deck, partly by his own fault and partly by that of the officers of the ship, was entitled to recover part of his damage. But it is sufficient for the present purpose to accept the limitation of the Admiralty jurisdiction to collisions between ships suggested by Lord Herschell and Lord Macnaghten in the case of The Zeta (69 L. T. Rep. N. S. 630; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 369; (1893) App. Cas. at p. 487). It is a case where both the plaintiffs and the defendants appear in the action as owners of the ship, and are not in that capacity to blame in respect of the collision Therefore the question is not the same as in the case of The Milan (1 Lush. 388), where the owners of the cargo in one ship in default brought an action against the owners of the other ship, and it was held that the defendants were liable to pay only half of the damage. It is not necessary to consider how far the authority of The Milan, recognised by the Court of Appeal in the case of The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands Steam Navigation Company (48 L. T. Rep.

N. S. 546; 10 Q. B. Div. 521; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65), was shaken by the observations made by the same court in the subsequent case of The Bernina (56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 450; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 112; 12 P. Div. 36), nor to point out the distinction between the case of The Milan and that of The Bushire (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 740; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 416). Nor is it necessary to consider if the view taken by Butt, J. in The Vera Cruz (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 24; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 254; 9 P. Div. 88), that the Admiralty rule applies not only in actions between ships, but in an action by the captain, is correct. I omit the consideration of the action in that case by the representatives of the captain of one ship against the owners of the other when both ships are to blame, and the captain himself.

The one point which introduces a new element for consideration is that though one of the two ships in collision was the ship of the plaintiffs, the other ship in collision was not the ship of the defendants. But this appears to me to be immaterial when once it is established that the defendants are liable in respect of this collision, and that their liability rests on a principle forming part of the law maritime. This case is not like that of The Vera Cruz (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 104; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 270; 10 App. Cas. 59) and The Bernina, in which the Court of Appeal held that as the actions were under Lord Campbell's Act they were not within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, nor cases in which sect. 25, sub-sect. 9 of the Judicature Act of 1873 applies. It is clear from The Sinquasi (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 768; 4 Asp. Mar Law Cas. 383; 5 P. Div. 241) and the case of The Niobe, that when a vessel comes into collision with a tug by reason of the negligence of the tug, which the tow could have prevented, the tow is liable to such vessel, and that solely by the force of the law maritime. I am by no means sure that this case may not be said to fall within the principle of the tow and tug being in contemplation of law identified as one ship. That principle clearly applies for the purposes of the navigation rules. In The Cleadon (14 Moo. P. C. 93) and in the case of The Niobe (1891) App. Cas. 401), it was held in the House of Lords that the tow and tug were one ship in contemplation of law for all purposes of their joint navigation, and that that principle applied so as to make the underwriters, under a policy which in terms dealt with the insured ship coming into collision, liable in respect of a collision between her tug and another vessel. Nor does it appear to me that the decision in The Mary (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 351; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 183; 5 P. Div. 14), or in the view taken by the Privy Council in The American and Syria (ubi sup.) conflict with either of these authorities. In The Mary the tow and the tug were in pari delicto, but the tow had a freedom from the consequences of her fault from the presence of a pilot, which the tug could not claim. It was indeed said in The American and Syria that the principle of the tug and tow being one ship did not in that case apply to make the tow liable, but that was because not only the sole power, but also the sole control was in the tug. But for the purposes of this case it is sufficient to adopt the language of the Privy Council in The American and Syria, viz., "The tug is in the service of the tow; the tow is answerable for the negligence of her servant, and is for some purposes identified with her." Inasmuch as such liability of the master for his servant is as much a part of the Admiralty as of the common law, and this case, therefore, falls entirely within the principles of Admiralty jurisdiction, I cannot see why the rule of Admiralty that a delinquent ship in collision can recover part of the damages is to be excluded. I will only add that in the case of The Sisters (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 589; 1 P. Div. 117), which was referred to before me as an instance of an action in which the plaintiff and defendant ship were not in collision with each other, I think that the phrase of James, L.J. that "to disentitle the Alfreda to her right to recover there must have been contributory negligence," must be understood to mean that such contributory negligence would disentitle the Alfreda to her right of full recovery. There is nothing to show that the learned judge intended to suggest, much less to decide, that the Alfreda, if negligent, would have failed altogether in the action.

The second point made was that the judgment should be drawn up so as to make the Englishman and the Australia primarily liable for a moiety of the sum recovered, with a remedy over against each in default of the other. This point seems to me to be concluded by the judgment in The Avon and Thomas Joliffe (1891) P. 7), and the form of the judgment in that case should be followed in this. Lastly, it was suggested, but not I think pressed, that the tonnage of the tug limited the total liability of the tug and tow. I can see no authority in the words of the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1862 for this contention.

Solicitors: for the plaintiffs, Lowless and Co.; for the Englishman, Pritchard and Sons; for the Australia, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Nov. 12 and 19, 1894.

(Before BRUCE, J.)

THE ENGLISHMAN AND THE AUSTRALIA, No. 2. (a)

Collision — Joint liability — Payment by one wrong-doer — Indemnity — Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 5.

Sect. 5 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856 provides that "every person, who . . . being liable with another for any debt or duty, shall pay such debt or perform such duty, shall be entitled to have assigned to him . . . . every judgment, specialty, or other security which shall be held by the creditor in respect of such debt or duty."

In a collision action brought by the owners of a steamship against the owners of a tug and her tow, all three vessels were found to blame, the tug and tow being respectively condemned in a moiety of the plaintiffs' claim, and the plaintiffs in a moiety of the counter-claim of the tug. The owners of the tow now asked the court to order an assignment of the steamship's judgment to them upon their paying the steamship the whole of the amount due under her judgment.

Held (dismissing the motion), that the statute did not apply, as there was no joint debt existing before the judgment creating the liability.

Merryweather v. Nixan (8 Term Rep. 186) discussed and explained.

(a) Reported by BASIL CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MOTION for assignment of judgment.

T. E. Scrutton, for the owners of the Australia, in support of the motion.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Nelson for the owners of the Ada.

Butler Aspinall for the owners of the Englishman.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment. In addition to the cases there cited, the following were referred to:

Wooley v. Batte, 2 C. & P. 417;
The Niobe, 65 L. T. Rep. 502; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 89; (1891) A. C. 401;
The Avon and Thomas Jolliffe, (1891) P. 7;
Batchelor v. Lawrence, 3 L. T. Rep. 506; 9 C. B. N. S. 543.

By sect. 5 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856,

Every person who, being surety for the debt or duty of another, or being liable with another for any debt or duty, shall pay such debt or perform such duty, shall be entitled to have assigned to him, or to a trustee for him, every judgment, specialty, or other security, which shall be held by the creditor in respect of such debt or duty, whether such judgment, specialty or other security shall or shall not be deemed at law to have been satisfied by the payment of the debt or the performance of the duty, and such person shall be entitled to stand in the place of the creditor, and to use all the remedies, and, if need be, and upon a proper indemnity, to use the name of the creditor, in any action or other proceeding, at law or in equity, in order to obtain from the principal debtor, or any co-surety, co-contractor, or co-debtor, as the case may be, indemnification for the advances made and loss sustained by the person who shall have so paid such debt or performed such duty, and such payment or performance so made by such surety shall not be pleadable in bar of any such action or other proceeding by him: Provided always, that no co-surety, co-contractor, or co-debtor shall be entitled to recover from any other co-surety, co-contractor, or co-debtor, by the means aforesaid, more than the just proportion to which, as between those parties themselves, such last-mentioned person shall be justly liable.

The case was heard on the 12th Nov. Judgment was reserved and delivered on the 19th Nov.

BRUCE, J.—The facts of the case are these: The steam-tug Englishman, having in tow the barque Australia, came into collision with the steamship Ada. The Ada sank and the Englishman sustained damage. The present action was brought by the owners of the Ada against the owners of the Englishman and the owners of the Australia. The owners of the Englishman, by way of counter-claim, sought to recover against the owners of the Ada the damage sustained by the Englishman. The action was heard by the President, assisted by two Elder Brethren, and the court found all three vessels to blame—the Ada and the Englishman for going at an improper speed in a fog, and the Australia for not controlling the speed of the Englishman. It was, I think, part of the finding of the court that the Englishman was in the service of the Australia, and that the Australia was answerable for the negligence of her servant. The court found, as a fact, that the Australia had full knowledge of the speed of the tug, and that the Australia could have lessened the speed of the tug had she been so minded. The President, by a decree of the 8th May, pronounced the collision to have been occasioned by the fault or default of the owners, masters, and crews of the respective vessels Englishman, Australia, and Ada, and he condemned the owners of the steam-tug Englishman and their bail and the owners of the barque Australia and their bail in a moiety of the plaintiffs' claim in respect of the said damage; and also condemned the owners of the steamship Ada and their bail in a moiety of the counter-claim of the owners of the steam-tug Englishman in respect of the said damage, and he referred the damage to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to report the amount thereof. The registrar has found that half the amount of the damage actually sustained by the Ada amounts to a sum of 3428*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.*, and he has found that half the amount of the Englishman's damage amounts to 237*l.* 13*s.* 3*d.* There are sums to be added for interest and the costs of the reference, which I need not take into consideration. The present application is made on motion by the owner of the Australia asking that on payment by them of the sum of 3217*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, in respect of the damages and interest recoverable under the judgment in the action, or such other sum as may be the balance of costs and interest recoverable thereunder, the plaintiffs, the owners of the Ada, should be ordered to execute to the said defendants, the owners of the Australia, an assignment of the said judgment. I do not know exactly how the figure 3267*l.* is arrived at, but it has been arrived at on the principle of deducting from the amount in which the owners of the Australia and the Englishman have been condemned, the amount in which the owners of the Ada have been condemned in respect of the counter-claim established by the owners of the Englishman against the Ada. In other words, the owners of the Australia claim the benefit of the Englishman's counter-claim, and propose to pay to the Ada no more than the Englishman would be bound to pay.

The application is based on the provisions of sect. 5 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856. In considering whether the prayer of the motion should be granted, one objection of form is not unworthy of consideration. There is no provision in the section enabling the court to exercise the jurisdiction thereby conferred upon motion, and in Phillips v. Dickson (8 C. B. N. S.) there was a direct decision that advantage cannot be taken of the section in question upon motion, and so far as I can discover in all the cases in the books in which relief has been given, otherwise than in administration actions, an action has been instituted for the express purpose of claiming the relief. I am, however, exceedingly reluctant to rest my decision upon a mere question of form, and, therefore, I propose to consider the application as if it had been brought before the court in a formal and regular manner. The first question to be considered is whether the owners of the Australia come within the words "person" . . . "being surety for the debt or duty of another, or being liable with another for any debt or duty." It is not contended that the applicants are sureties, but it is said that they are liable with another (the owners of the Englishman) for a debt or duty—that the owners of the Englishman are co-debtors with the owners of the Australia to the owners of the Ada. But it is clear that the owners of the Australia only became liable upon the judgment, and if they and the owners of the Englishman are codebtors they are co-debtors only by virtue of the joint judgment. On the construction of the section I think it is obvious that the liability creating the obligation of the two persons as co-debtors is a liability which must be existing prior to and independently of the "judgment specialty or other security" the assignment of which is contemplated. The "judgment specialty or other security" referred to in the section as "held by the creditor in respect of such debt or duty" refers, I think, to something in the nature of a security for the debt or duty, and implies that the obligation to pay the debt or perform the duty springs from some other source than the judgment specialty or other security. As there was no joint liability prior to the judgment, and the owners of the Australia and the owners of the Englishman were not co-debtors prior to the judgment, the 5th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856 does not, in my opinion, apply.

But it does not seem to me to be necessary to rest my decision upon a verbal criticism of the section. Sect. 5 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act was never intended to apply to cases where there was no liability to contribute as between the persons jointly liable. It was intended to apply only in cases where the joint liability arose out of or sprang from contract. It was certainly never intended to overrule the principle in Merryweather v. Nixan (ubi sup.), or to give a right to demand an assignment in cases where no right of indemnity exists. As in the course of the argument a good deal was said about Merryweather v. Nixan, it may be well that I should state the doctrine which, it appears to me, that case establishes. The facts were these. The plaintiff and defendant had been held jointly liable to the extent of 840*l.* in an action brought against them by the owner of a reversionary interest in a mill for damage done by them to the mill. The whole 840*l.* was levied on the plaintiff, who sought to recover, in an action of assumpsit, contribution from the defendant. Thompson, B. held that no implied assumpsit arose as between joint wrong-doers and nonsuited the plaintiff. Lord Kenyon and the judges of the King's Bench held the nonsuit right. Lord Kenyon said he had never heard of such an action having been brought where the form of recovery was for a tort—that that was the distinction between this case and that of a joint judgment against several defendants in an action of assumpsit. Then he added, "This decision would not affect cases of indemnity where one man employed another to do acts, not unlawful in themselves, for the purpose of asserting a right." The meaning of that sentence is, I think, this: Although no implied indemnity arises from the simple fact that one of two tort-feasors has paid the whole of the damage for which both are liable, yet this principle does not affect cases where one man has employed another to do acts for the purpose of asserting a right either under an express indemnity or under such circumstances as to raise an implied indemnity, provided the acts are such as not to be obviously unlawful. Adamson v. Jarvis (4 Bing. 66) affords an example of the class of cases which Lord Kenyon referred to. In that case, the plaintiff, an auctioneer, sold goods under order of the defendant, and paid the proceeds to the defendant. The defendant induced the plaintiff to sell the goods by representing to him that the defendant was of right entitled to sell them, and the plaintiff in good faith acted on that representation. The defendant was not entitled to sell the goods, and the true owner recovered the value from the plaintiff, and the plaintiff brought his action against the defendant to recover the amount he had been so compelled to pay. The plaintiff was held entitled to recover. Best, C.J. said, in the course of his judgment: "The plaintiff is hired by defendant to sell, which implies a warranty to indemnify against all the consequences that follow the sale." The circumstances of that case were such as to raise an implied warranty to indemnify. It was never decided in Merryweather v. Nixan that one wrong-doer could not sue another for contribution, but that an implied promise to indemnify did not arise from the mere fact of payment of the whole of the joint liability by one of several wrong-doers. Where the circumstances are such as to raise a promise to indemnify, then the indemnity may be enforced, except, in the words of Best, C.J., in "cases where the person seeking redress must be presumed to have known that he was doing an unlawful act." If the person knows that the act he is engaged to do is not only wrongful but unlawful, then the promise to indemnify is an unlawful contract in contravention of public policy, and one that cannot be enforced in law. Betts v. Gibbins (2 Ad. & Ell. 57) is a case of the same character as the one I have last referred to. The plaintiff dealt with goods under the orders of the defendant under such circumstances as to raise a promise on the part of the defendant to indemnify the plaintiff. There was nothing clearly illegal in the act of the plaintiff, and he was held to be entitled to recover on the implied indemnity. The case of Pearson v. Skelton (1 M. & W. 504) was referred to in the argument. The plaintiff and defendant and several other persons were partners concerned in running a public stage coach. A person whose horse was killed by the negligence of a coachman employed by the partners to drive the coach, recovered damages against the plaintiff, and the plaintiff sought to recover contribution from the defendant. There appeared to be a partnership fund out of which expenses were first to be paid and the residue divided among the proprietors. The principle of Merryweather v. Nixan did not apply, because there was an express contract regulating the rights of the plaintiff and the defendant, but, notwithstanding, the action was held not to be maintainable at law, because the rights of the partners could only be adjusted in the Court of Chancery. An examination of the cases has led me to the conclusion that the actual point decided in Merryweather v. Nixan, that an implied indemnity does not arise as between joint tort-feasors simply by reason of the payment by one of the whole of the joint liability, has never been questioned. Circumstances may exist, as in some of the cases referred to, which give rise to an implied indemnity, or there may be an express indemnity, and where there is such an indemnity, implied or express, it may be enforced, unless the contract of indemnity relates to the doing of an act which is illegal and must be presumed to have been known to be illegal by the person seeking to enforce the indemnity. This view of the law is quite consistent with the observation of Lord Herschell, L.C., in the case of Palmer v. The Wick Steam Shipping Company (1894) A.C. 318), to which attention was directed in the argument. The Lord Chancellor is not speaking of the circumstances which may raise an implied promise to indemnify; he is speaking of the doctrine that one tort-feasor cannot recover from another, and he expresses the opinion that he is only prevented from recovering—that is, in cases where an express or implied indemnity exists—where the person seeking redress must be presumed to have known that he was doing an unlawful act. I do not think that the observation was intended to mean that wherever the act done by joint tort-feasors was not in itself unlawful an indemnity is to be implied from the mere fact that one tort-feasor has paid under compulsion the whole damages arising from the tort. So to lay down the law would be, as it seems to me, to overrule the exact point decided in Merryweather v. Nixan. That, it is clear, Lord Herschell did not intend to do, because he says, "it is now too late to question that decision in this country." I have come to the conclusion that there are no circumstances in the present case to raise an implied promise of indemnity, and I do not think that the applicants are entitled to the order they seek.

I should say further that I think the statute applies only in cases where payment has been made. Had an action been brought by the owners of the Australia to compel an assignment of the judgment, the payment of the amount of the joint debt would have been a necessary allegation in the statement of claim. Further, in this case, I do not gather that there has even been an offer to pay the amount of the damages in which the Australia has been condemned. The offer made, as I understand, has been to pay only the balance due after taking into account the counter-claim of the Englishman. No doubt, according to the decision in The Khedive (43 L. T. Rep. 610; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; L. Rep. 5 H. of L. 876), the balance only could be recovered from the Englishman. But I see no reason why the owners of the Australia should deduct from the amount of their liability the amount due to the owners of the Englishman in respect of the claim.

Motion dismissed.

Solicitors for the owners of the Australia, Thomas Cooper and Co.; for the owners of the Ada, Lowless and Co.; for the owners of the Englishman, Pritchard and Sons.

END OF VOL. VII.