CARRIAGE OF GOODS.

1. Advance freight—Charter-party—Advantage of exchange—Advance not taken.—Where a clause in a charter-party provides for "cash for steamer's ordinary disbursements at port or ports of loading . . . to be advanced at exchange of 50d. to the dollar . . . on account of freight (captain's receipts to be conclusive evidence of the amount of such advances, and of their having been properly made), and balance of freight on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash"; the shipowners may ask through their master for sufficient to pay their disbursements if they require it, but they are not bound to do so, and hence, where no advance freight is obtained, the charterers cannot deduct from the freight the profit they would have made by the difference of exchange on the amount spent in disbursements at the port of loading if they had advanced the money. (Adm.) The Primula page 429

2. Advance of freight — Charter-party — "If required."—Charterer's liability on loss.—Where a cargo is shipped under a charter-party containing the clause "one-third freight, if required, to be advanced, less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance," and the vessel and cargo are lost, the charterers are not liable to pay the advanced freight if the shipowners do not ask for payment until after the loss. (Ct. of App.) Smith, Hill, and Co. v. Pyman, Bell, and Co. 7

3. Bill of lading—Charter-party—"All other conditions as per charter-party"—Incorporation.—Where a bill of lading contains certain excepted perils and after them the words "paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party," the latter words do not incorporate the excepted perils in the charter-party, but only those conditions in the charter-party which are to be performed by the consignee of the goods. (Ct. of App.) Serraino and Sons v. Campbell 48

4. Bill of lading—Charter-party—Express stipulations—Governing contract.—By a charter-party it was provided that the shipowners should fix in a suitable place proper refrigerating machinery and insulated chambers, to be kept at a temperature not exceeding 28 degrees Fahrenheit; any accident, breakdown, or mishap to the machinery or cause beyond the owner's control not preventing; and it was further provided that the "performance by the owners of their part of the agreement is subject to the exceptions and perils mentioned in the bill of lading according to form attached hereto and the agreement herein contained shall be read as if such clause and conditions were herein repeated; all cargo shipped by the charterers in pursuance of this agreement shall be received and carried subject to the terms and conditions in the said bill of lading, except as altered by these presents." By the terms of the bill of lading any loss or damage was excepted which might result from the "consequence of any damage, breakdown, or injury to a defect in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery or their appurtenances, refrigerating engines or chambers, or any part thereof, however such damage, defect, or injury might be caused, and notwithstanding that the same might have existed at or at any time before the loading or sailing of the vessel, or by unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means had been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness." In an action for damage to cargo caused by the refrigerators being unfit and insufficient, and by the insulated chambers not having been kept at the agreed temperature, it was held that, as the stipulation to provide proper refrigerating machinery and keep the insulated chambers at a proper temperature was an express stipulation, the bill of lading must be taken to have been altered by the charter-party so as to prevent the exceptions in the bill of lading operating to exempt the shipowners from performing their express contract; and further, that even if the performance of the charter-party was subject to the exceptions in the bill of lading, the contract in the charter-party as to the refrigerating machinery was so clear and unequivocal that it could not be held to be overridden by the general provisions of the bill of lading. (H. of L. affirming Ct. of App.) Houston and Co. v. Sansinena and Co......page 311

5. Bill of lading—Construction—Special purpose—General words.—Where an agreement in special terms and for a special purpose has been entered into between a shipper of goods and shipowner, such special terms cannot be modified by reading into them the general words of a bill of lading under which the goods have been shipped. (H. of L.) Houston and Co. v. Sansinena and Co. ... 311

6. Bill of lading—Construction—Particular contract—General words.—Where general words are used in a bill of lading contract, and are intended to be made applicable to the circumstances of the particular contract, the main object and intent of the particular contract are to be looked at, and the general words are to be limited to that view (H. of L.) Glyn v. Margetson 366

7. Bill of lading — Holders of title to goods—Warehousemen — Conversion — Liability. — C., a merchant at Bristol, imported goods from H. and Co. in Canada, the course of business between them being that H. and Co. shipped the goods to this country, receiving bills of lading made out to their order. These bills of lading, together with bills of exchange drawn by them on C., were sold by H. and Co. to various Canadian banks, and were then remitted to banks in this country with a document called a hypothecation note. By the terms of the hypothecation note the banks here might retain the bills of lading until payment of the bills of exchange if they were not satisfied with C.'s acceptances. C. was a customer of the plaintiff's bank, and in the months of October and November, 1890, he requested the plaintiffs to pay his acceptances in respect of the several consignments of goods imported by them in the way referred to. This the plaintiffs did, receiving the bills of lading for the shipments from the holders of the acceptances. The consignments in question on arrival in this country had, for the convenience of all concerned, been warehoused by the shipowners at the defendants' warehouses in Bristol for delivery by them against the shipowners' delivery orders. Shortly before the plaintiffs had so paid C.'s acceptances for him he had, by the negligence of the defendants' servants, succeeded in getting possession of a large quantity of the goods from the defendants' warehouses without presenting any delivery orders. In Dec. 1890 C. became insolvent. Thereupon the plaintiffs, having obtained delivery orders from the shipowners, presented them to the defendants and demanded delivery of the goods. Upon the defendants failing to deliver the goods which C. had irregularly obtained, the plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants to recover the value of the goods. Held, that, independently of the Bills of Lading Act, the plaintiffs were entitled at common law to recover the goods, their position being that of pledgees of the bills of lading, notwithstanding that the defendants were not in possession of the goods at the time when the plaintiffs' title thereto accrued. (Ct. of App.) Bristol and West of England Bank, Limited, v. The Midland Railway Company .....page 69

8. Bill of lading—Perils of the sea—Negligence—Burden of proof.—Where a bill of lading contains the customary exception of loss by perils of the sea, and an action is brought by the shipper against the shipowner for damage to goods shipped thereunder, if the shipowner pleads and proves perils of the sea, the burden is upon the plaintiff of proving that the damage was caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants. (Ct. of App.) The Glendarroch 420

9. Charter-party—Provision as to signing bills of lading—Duty to present for signature—Advance freight—Measure of damages.—By a charter-party it was agreed that the ship was to load a cargo of coals and deliver the same "on being paid freight on bills of lading quantity . . . one-third on signing bills of lading and the remainder on unloading in cash . . . the captain or agents to sign bills of lading for weight put on board as presented to him according to railway or dock company's weight without prejudice to the tenour of the charter-party, and without any alteration within twenty-four hours after coals on board." The ship was loaded and had just sailed when she sank and the cargo was lost. The charterers had not at that time presented any bills of lading for the captain's signature, and afterwards refused to present any. In an action by the owners against the charterers: Held, that there was an implied obligation on the charterers to present bills for the captain's signature immediately the ship was loaded, and by not doing so they had committed a breach of their duty under the charter-party in respect of which the owners were entitled to damages, the measure of damages being the advance freight which they would otherwise have obtained. (Ct. of App.) Oriental Steamship Co. Limited v. Tylor and another 377

10. Common carrier in India—English Common Law—Indian Contract Act 1872.—The liability of a common carrier of goods for hire in India is governed by the English common law, and is not affected by the provisions of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, and consequently owners of steamers carrying goods as common carriers on the Irrawaddy are liable for their loss, except where caused by the act of God or the Queen's enemies. (P. C.) Irrawaddy Flotilla Co. v. Bywandass 129

11. Contract of affreightment—Bill of lading—Construction—Law of flag—Sale of goods by master.—Where cargo was shipped by British subjects on board a German ship for carriage to England under English bills of lading, the Court, in an action for short delivery, Held, that the master was entitled to deal with it according to the law of the flag; and hence, where he had sold part of the cargo at a port of distress without instructions from the shippers, such sale was justifiable by German law, as he had, after taking the best advice he could obtain, sold the cargo in the honest belief that he was acting for the best for all parties in the emergency which had arisen. (Adm. Div.) The August ..... page 110

12. Contract of affreightment—Charter-party—Construction—Law of flag—Circumstances to be taken into account.—The fact that goods are carried in a foreign ship is not in itself conclusive to show that the charter-party under which the goods are carried must be construed according to the law of the flag. All the circumstances, such as the language in which it is written, the stipulations it contains, and the parties, must be considered in determining what law is to be applied. (Ct. of App.) The Industrie 457

13. Contract of affreightment—Charter-party—Construction—Law of flag—Circumstances attaching to the contract.—The plaintiffs, who were German subjects domiciled in Germany and owners of a German steamship, entered into a charter-party with the defendants, who were British subjects, through their (the plaintiffs') agent, a German subject, whereby the defendants chartered the steamship Industrie for the carriage of a cargo of rice in bags from abroad to a port in England for orders. The charter-party, which was made in London, and was in the English language, contained all the provisions usually found in English charter-parties; and also the following words, "freight being payable at and after the rate of 35s. sterling per ton of 20cwt. delivered . . . all freight to be paid on right delivery of the cargo if discharged in the United Kingdom in cash as customary, if on the Continent in cash at the exchange of the day of final discharge without discount." The ship proceeded to her port of loading, and there took on board a cargo of rice belonging to the defendants, and on her homeward voyage, having encountered bad weather, put into a port of distress, when it was found that the cargo had sustained damage, and the master, acting under the advice of surveyors, sold part of the cargo as being unfit for reshipment. In an action by the shipowner to recover full freight on the damaged cargo which was sold: Held, by the Court of Appeal (reversing the decision of Barnes, J.), that the defendants were not liable, as the charter-party must be construed as an English contract according to English law, and that the law of the flag did not apply, and that the payment of freight being expressly dealt with in the charter-party none was recoverable in respect of cargo not delivered at the port of destination. (Ct. of App.) The Industrie..... 457

14. Contract of affreightment—Excepted perils—Voyage—Possibility of performance—Delay by perils—Liability.—A shipowner who has agreed that his ship shall proceed to a certain port and there deliver the cargo, unless prevented by the perils of the sea, is not justified in abandoning the voyage, unless the excepted perils have made it, either physically impossible to complete the voyage, or so clearly unreasonable, as to be impossible from a business point of view, and hence where a vessel has gone ashore but has been got off and repaired, so as to be capable of proceeding to the port of discharge, within a reasonable time, the shipowners are liable to the charterers for any loss that they may sustain by reason of the shipowner not carrying out the charter-party. (Ct. of App.) The Assicurazioni Generali and Schenker & Co., v. S.S. Bessie Morris Co. Ltd., and another..... page 217

15. Damage to cargo.—Bill of lading—Exception of masters and mariners negligence.—Negligence of stevedore—Management of ship—Bad stowage.—A cargo of oranges was shipped on board the defendants's vessel under a bill of lading, which contained a clause excepting "damage from any act, neglect, or default of the pilot, master, or mariners in the navigation or management of the ship." The cargo was damaged through the improper and negligent stowage of the stevedore. Held, that inasmuch as the stevedore was not included in the list of persons mentioned in the bill of lading whose acts and defaults were excepted, the defendants were not exempted from liability. Held also, that the words "management of the ship" did not include bad stowage. (Adm. Div.) The Ferro..... 309

16. Damage to cargo—Bill of lading—Excepted Perils—Neglect of master to remedy defect.—Where by the terms of a bill of lading shipowners are relieved from liability for damage to cargo when caused by "perils of the sea and accidents of navigation, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or servants of the shipowners," and the cargo is damaged by sea-water getting into the hold through an iron rivet being loosened by stress of weather, a fact which the master discovers during the voyage but neglects to remedy and thereby permits the damage to be largely increased, such damage is covered by the above exceptions, and the shipowners are not liable for any portion of it. (Adm. Div.) The Cressington. 27

17. Demurrage—Bill of lading—Strike—Reasonable time—Circumstances of port of discharge.—Goods consigned to the respondents were shipped on board a ship of the appellant under bills of lading which contained no stipulation as to the time within which the cargo was to be discharged. The ship duly arrived at her port of discharge, and the unloading was commenced, but before it was completed a strike took place among the dock labourers, and the completion of the unloading was delayed for a considerable time. It was admitted that during the continuance of the strike it was impossible to obtain the necessary labour to complete the discharge of the ship: Held, that the respondents were only bound to discharge the ship in a reasonable time, and therefore were not liable for the delay, under the circumstances which existed at the port. (H. of L.) Hick v. Rodocanachi & Son Limited. 97 (and on appeal to H. L.) Hick v. Raymond & Reid 233

18. Demurrage—Bill of lading—"Arrival"—Berth for cargo occupied.—Where a bill of lading for a grain cargo provided that the ship "may commence discharging immediately on arrival," and upon the ship's arrival the berth for grain cargoes was occupied, and the ship was not able to immediately commence discharging, but she was discharged as fast as she could be under the circumstances, the consignees were not liable to pay the shipowners damages for detention. (Ct. of App.) The Delano..... 523

19. Demurrage—Charter-party—Delay of stevedore—Liability for.—Where by a charter-party it was agreed that the ship should proceed to Leith and London and there load cargo within a certain time and that a stevedore should be "appointed by the charterers in London only, but employed and paid for by owners," and in consequence of some of the Leith cargo shifting and being damaged by bad weather on the voyage to London, it was necessary at London to land and recondition the damaged cargo, and restow the shifted cargo, and also necessary to shift some of the Leith cargo to enable the London cargo to be properly stowed, which matters together with some delay on the part of the London stevedore caused the ship to be detained, the charterers were held not liable either for demurrage arising either from the moving of the cargo or the stevedore's delay, the stevedore being the servant of the owners, or for the expense of moving the cargo to enable the London cargo to be loaded, such expense being either the expense of storage or of work done by order of the master without the authority of the charterers. (Ct. of App.) Harris v. Best, Ryley, and Co......page 272

20. Demurrage—Charter-party—Discharge by dock company—"As fast as she could deliver"—Custom of port.—Where, in compliance with the terms of a charter-party, a vessel proceeded to a dock as ordered where she was to be discharged "as fast as she could deliver," but owing to the crowded state of the dock discharging—which, according to the custom of the port, was done solely by the dock company both for the shipowner and the charterer—was delayed several days, the charterers were held not liable for such delay, as the ship had in the circumstances existing been discharged as fast as she could deliver. (Adm. Div.) The Jaederen 260

21. Demurrage—Charter-party—Discharge into lighters—Strike of lightermen—Appeal.—By charter-party between plaintiffs and defendants it was agreed that plaintiffs' ship should load a cargo of timber and proceed to Sharpness and be there discharged in the customary manner and with the customary steamer despatch of the port; Sundays and any time lost by strikes, lock-outs, or combinations of workmen not to count as part of the discharging. Demurrage to be paid at an agreed rate for any detention of the vessel through default of merchants or charterers, and the usual custom of the wood trade to be observed in each port. At Sharpness it is customary to discharge timber into lighters and convey it by canal to Gloucester. Owing to a strike in the port of Gloucester among the labourers who discharged the lighters there were no lighters obtainable when the vessel arrived at Sharpness. As soon as the strike ended the vessel discharged her cargo. In an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants in the County Court for demurrage the judge held that Sharpness was included in the port of Gloucester, and that after the strike ended, the defendants, with the exception of one day which they had not accounted for, had done all that could reasonably be expected of them in affecting the vessel's discharge. He therefore gave judgment for one day's demurrage with costs. Held (affirming the decision of the County Court judge), that the discharge into lighters was the mode of discharge accepted by the parties, that the loss of time, beyond the one day, was caused by the strike within the meaning of the charter-party, and that therefore the charterers were excused. Held also, that, as the Divisional Court has only an appellate jurisdiction, a cross-appeal by the defendants upon a question of fact involving an amount less than 50*l.* could not be entertained. (Adm.) The Alne Holme..... 344

22. Demurrage—Charter-party—Discharging—Selection of berth by charterer—Strike.—By a charter-party it was agreed that a vessel should proceed "to London either to the Pool, Regent's Canal, Victoria Docks, Derricks, or Beckton," as ordered by the charterers, eighty-four hours being allowed for loading and discharging the cargo, "strikes of workmen at the port of loading or discharging being excepted." The charterers ordered the vessel to proceed to the Regent's Canal. After the vessel left the port of loading a strike of workmen commenced at the Regent's Canal, and the charterers knowing of the strike could have ordered the vessel at Gravesend to proceed to one of the other places named, but did not do so. The vessel proceeded to the Regent's Canal, and, owing to the strike, the charterers could not take delivery of the cargo there, though they could have done so at any of the other named places. The lay days were exceeded, and the shipowner claimed demurrage, Held (affirming the judgment of Pollock, B.), that there being no limit in the charter-party to the charterer's right to select one of the named places, they could insist on her going to a place where she might be delayed by a strike, and that they were protected by the exception as to "strikes of workmen;" and were not liable for the delay of the vessel. (Ct. of App.) Bulman v. Fenwick .....page 388

23. Demurrage—Charter-party—Discharge by port officials—"As fast as can deliver"—Custom of port.—By a charter-party a vessel was to proceed to H. with a cargo of oranges "to be discharged at usual fruit berth as fast as steamer can deliver as customary, and where ordered by charterers." When the vessel arrived at H. the fruit warehouses were full, and neither of the usual fruit berths was available until after the expiration of four days. The warehouses on the quay, as well as the appliances for unloading there, were under the control of Government officials, who regulated the unloading of the vessels, and determined the quay at which a vessel should be moored: Held, that the obligation of the charterer to unload did not commence until the vessel was berthed at a usual fruit berth, that the words "as customary" meant that the discharge must be as fast as the custom of the port would allow, and that the charterer was not liable to pay for the demurrage which was occasioned by the custom of the port. (Ct. of App., reversing Charles, J.) Good & Co. v. Isaacs 212

24. Demurrage—Charter-party—Exceptions—Restraints of princes—Political disturbances or impediments—Delay in shipment—Export duties.—The defendants chartered the plaintiffs' vessel to proceed to Iquique, in Chili, and there to load for the United Kingdom a cargo of 3000 tons of nitrate of soda at the rate of 200 tons per working lay day, and after provisions as to the lay days came the usual clause mutually excepting restraints of princes and rulers, political disturbances or impediments during the said voyage. At the trial of the action the learned judge found as a fact that the ordinary and recognised mode of loading nitrate at Iquique was to send the required amount of nitrate down by railway from the mines direct to the ship at the quay when she was ready for loading. When the ship arrived at Iquique considerable delay was caused in the loading by reason of a civil war having broken out and the mines and the railway being for a time in the possession of the troops, so that no nitrate could be sent down by railway to the ship. She was also further delayed by putting into another Chilian port for coal, where the authorities then in power demanded export duties already paid at Iquique. In an action for demurrage: Held, that the delay in both cases was within the exception in the charter-party. (Ct. of App.) Smith and Service v. Rosario Nitrate Company Limited .....page 417

25. Demurrage—Charter-party—Strike—Custom of port—Circumstances of port of discharge.—Where by a charter-party it was agreed that the ship should deliver her cargo at a certain port as customary, and that the discharge should be "with all despatch as customary and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days at 6d. per net register ton per day," and according to the custom of the port, the discharge was carried out by the dock company, and was delayed for four days in consequence of a strike among the dock labourers. It was held, in an action by the shipowners against the charterers for damages for this delay: That no definite time was fixed by the charter-party for the unloading to take place in, and that therefore a reasonable time under the circumstances should be allowed, and that the delay was a circumstance which arose out of the application of a custom of the port, and that the charterers were not liable. (Ct. of App., reversing Wright, J.) Castlegate Steamship Co. Limited v. Dempsey and Co 185

26. Demurrage—Charter-party—Voyage—Discharging berths named by charterers—"Safe berth as ordered."—Where it was agreed by charter-party that certain vessels being loaded should proceed to the Mersey and deliver their cargo "at any safe berth as ordered on arrival in the dock at Garston," and the charterers having named the berths the vessels were kept waiting owing to the crowded state of the dock: It was held in an action to recover demurrage for such delay that the carrying voyage was not ended till the vessels were in the berth named by the charterers, and that therefore they were not liable for demurrage. (Ct. of App.) Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company Limited v. Morel Bros. and Co. and Richards and Co. 106

27. Demurrage—Lien—Cesser clauses—Delay at port of loading—Liability of charterers.—Where by a charter-party it was agreed that the charterer's "liability was to cease on completion of loading provided the value of the cargo is sufficient to satisfy the lien which is hereby given for demurrage," such cesser clause in an action by the shipowner to recover from the charterer damages for detention at the port of loading was held not to relieve the charterer from liability for the delay where the lien for demurrage clause had reference only to delay at the port of discharge, because the charter-party made no provision for the time within which the ship was to be loaded whilst providing a time for discharging. (Ct. of App.) Dunlop and Sons v. Balfour..... 181

28. Deviation—Bill of lading—Description of voyage.—Perishable goods were shipped under a bill of loading from a port in the south-east of Spain to Liverpool. The bill of lading contained a clause giving the ship "liberty to proceed to and stay at any port or ports in any rotation in the Mediterranean, Levant, Black Sea, or Adriatic, or on the coasts of Africa, Spain, Portugal, France, Great Britain, and Ireland, for the purpose of delivering coals, cargo, or passengers, or for any other purpose whatsoever." After the cargo was loaded the ship proceeded to a port in the north-east of Spain before proceeding to Liverpool. Owing to the delay so caused the cargo was damaged. Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the clause in the bill of lading although general must be construed with reference to the particular voyage, and that consequently the deviation was not justified by the bill of lading, and that the shipowners were liable for the damage. (H. of L.) Glynn v. Margetson .....page 366

29. Deviation—Bill of lading—Excepted perils—Return to port of loading—Reasonable necessity—Duty of communication.—A ship belonging to the defendants, who were shipowners and shipbuilders at Bristol, shipped in addition to other cargo, some tin plates belonging to the plaintiffs at Cardiff, for New York. The bill of lading contained the usual exemptions from liability in respect of damage by collison, &c. In the course of the voyage the ship experienced very heavy weather, and repairs became necessary. The master put into Queenstown at first, and afterwards, having communicated with the defendants, determined to return to Bristol for repairs. In the Avon the ship came into collision with another vessel and sank. She was subsequently raised and taken to Bristol. The plaintiffs sued for damages for the failure of the defendants to deliver the tin plates in New York according to the bill of lading. The case was tried before a judge and special jury, and the verdict and judgment were for the defendants. The plaintiffs applied for a new trial, and contended that the master was not justified without the consent of the cargo-owners in returning to Bristol, but should have had the ship repaired at Queenstown or Swansea, that the jury had been misdirected, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. Held, that the return to Bristol was not such a deviation from the course as could not be held to be reasonably necessary; that the ship being a "general ship," it was not necessary to communicate with the cargo-owners before returning to Bristol; that the question of reasonable necessity was on for the jury, and that the verdict should not be disturbed. (Ct. of App.) Phelps, James, and Co. v. Hill and Co. 42

30. Evidence—Ambiguity—Documents prior to contract.—Where there is no ambiguity in the language of a charter-party letters and telegrams between the parties prior to the execution of the charter-party were held not admissible in evidence to explain the contract. (Adm.) The Nifa 324

31. Evidence—Custom—Charter-party—Cost of discharging.—Where to a charter-party agreeing that the cargo was to be taken to and from the ship at merchant's risk and expense, the parties added in writing that the cargo was to be "supplied as fast as steamer could load and stow same, and discharged as fast as steamer can deliver, and according to the custom of the respective ports," evidence of custom to prove that at the port of discharge the cost of discharging the cargo from the ship's rail on to the quay is paid by the shipowner was not admissible, as the clause as to the payment of delivery and the customary mode of delivery, meaning thereby the time and manner, were not inconsistent, and by the express terms of the charter-party the charterer must pay such expenses. (Adm.) The Nifa 324

32. Freight—Liability for—Consignee for sale—Deposit—Merchant Shipping Acts—Warehousing clauses.—A consignee for sale of a cargo shipped abroad and delivered to him out of a warehouse under a bill of lading, is not liable to be sued for the bill of lading freight if he has deposited the amount of such freight with the warehouse owner under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act, 1862. (H. of L. reversing Ct. of App.) White and Co. v. Furness, Withey, and Co..... 574

33. Loading—Full and complete cargo—Draft of water—Delay for want of water—Duty to remain.—Where by a charter-party a vessel is to proceed to a berth in a named dock, and "there load, always afloat, a full and complete cargo," and it is found that after she has loaded a portion of her cargo, although she could take in the remainder and still remain afloat in the dock, she could not, when fully loaded, pass over the dock sill until next spring tides, which would delay her a week, she is not entitled, when partly loaded, to leave the dock to avoid this delay. (Adm. Div.) The Curfew ..... page 29

34. Loss of cargo—Bill of lading—Exception of Robbery—Theft by stevedores.—Where goods are shipped under a bill of lading exempting the shipowners from liability for loss caused by "pirates, robbers, or thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not or by land or sea" the shipowners are not thereby relieved from liability for theft of the goods by the stevedores' men employed in the service of the ship. (Ct. of App.) Steinman and Co. v. The Angier Line 46

35. Non-delivery of cargo—Debenture liability—Measure of damages—Freight and landing charges—Inquiry as to damages—Practice.—In an action by plaintiffs claiming as consignees named in a bill of lading delivery of certain cargoes and damages for their detention, the defendants, who claimed the goods under a contract with the consignor, were allowed to receive and retain the cargoes pending trial, under a consent order, without prejudice to any question between the parties. Ten months later a receiver was appointed. The Court subsequently held that the plaintiffs were entitled to the cargoes and directed an inquiry to ascertain what damages the plaintiffs had sustained by the defendants' detention, but refused to allow the defendants to be reimbursed freight and landing charges paid by them on account of the cargoes. On appeal the House of Lords varied this judgment by allowing the defendants the freight and landing charges, but, as no application was made to vary the terms of the inquiry, it remained undisturbed. Upon the inquiry as to damages the chief clerk awarded damages on the basis of the detention being wrongful from the arrival of the cargoes until the decree of the court of first instance. Upon a summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate, it was held that the previous decision of the House of Lords as to the right of the defendants to be reimbursed the freight and landing charges was consistent with the order for the inquiry as to damages; that the consent order did not make the detention after that date lawful, but that after the order for the appointment of a receiver the cargoes were in the possession of the court, and that the period of illegal detention for which the defendants were liable in damages was from the arrival of each cargo up to the order for the appointment of a receiver. (H. of L.) Dreyfus Bros. v. Peruvian Guano Co. 225

36. Performance of contract—Reasonable time—No time fixed.—Where no period is fixed for the performance of a contract of carriage in a bill of lading the obligation is to perform it within a reasonable time under the circumstances existing at the time of the performance of the contract, and there is no liability for delay, however protracted, if such delay is attributable to causes beyond the control of the party on whom the obligation rests, and he has not acted negligently nor unreasonably. (H. of L.) Hick v. Raymond and Reid 233

37. Practice—Joinder of plaintiffs—Several shippers—Short delivery.—Several shippers or consignees of different shipments of goods shipped on board the same ships for carriage from and to the same places are not entitled to be joined as plaintiffs in one action against the shipowner on the bills of lading claiming damages for short delivery. (H. of L.) Smurthwaite and others v. Hannay and others ..... page 485

38. Short shipment—Dead freight—Bad stowage—Tender of full cargo—Liability.—Where charterers agreed to provide a ship with a "full and complete cargo of sugar in hogsheads and (or) bags or other lawful merchandise" there is no obligation to supply the cargo in any particular order, and if the master of the ship stows bags and hogsheads in such a manner as they come to the ship that there are no bags available to fill up the alleyways and lazarette the shipowner cannot claim dead freight because these spaces are empty if the charterers tender more hogsheads to make a complete cargo. (Ct. of App.) Furness v. Chas. Tennant and Co. 179

39. Warranty of seaworthiness—Dunnage—Surveyor's certificate—Shipowner's duty.—Where by the terms of a charter-party the ship is to be properly dunnaged to the satisfaction of a surveyor, who is to give a certificate thereof to the charterers, the giving of such certificate does not release the shipowners from their obligation to make the ship seaworthy by proper dunnaging. (Adm. Div.) The Cressington 27

40. Warranty of seaworthiness—Damage to cargo—Preventible cause—Unprotected pipe.—Where goods shipped under a bill of lading freeing the shipowners from liability for damage caused by the neglect or default of the crew were during the voyage damaged by sea water, in consequence of an incased pipe which communicated with a water-closet having been broken by pressure of cargo, it being customary to case such pipes, the shipowners were held liable for such damage, as the ship was unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, and therefore the exceptions in the bill of lading did not relieve the owners from responsibility. (H. of L.) Gilroy and Co. v. Price and Co. 314

41. Warranty of seaworthiness—Shipowner—Charterer—Demise of ship—Liability in contract and tort—Managing owner.—By an agreement in writing the defendant F. agreed to sell a ship to the defendant G., the purchase to be completed in four months on payment of the last instalment of the purchase money, the ship in the meantime to remain the property of F. By a charter-party of the same date F. chartered the ship to L. for the four months on the conditions (inter alia), the charterers to provide and pay the captain, officers, and crew, the chief engineer to be appointed by the owners but paid by the charterer; the owner to insure the vessel and maintain her hull and machinery in an efficient state, the charterers paying other expenses; the captain to be under the orders of the charterer, who should indemnify the owner from all liability arising from the captain signing bills of lading. F. was registered as owner and managing owner under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1876. During the currency of the charter-party goods shipped on board the ship were lost in consequence of her unseaworthiness. The bills of lading in respect of these goods were signed by the captain and the charterers' agent. In an action by the goods owner against F. and G. it was held, that F., the shipowner, was not liable, as the bills of lading were not signed by his servants or by his authority and no duty arose towards the plaintiffs by the acts of any person for whom he was responsible and that he was not liable by reason of his being registered as managing owner. (H. of L. affirming Ct. of App.) Baumwoll Manufactur von Carl Scheibler v. Furness.....page 263

42. Warranty of seaworthiness—Steamship—Sufficiency of coal for voyage.—A steamship is bound to have on board of her at the commencement of the voyage a sufficient quantity of coal to enable her to perform her voyage, and if she starts with less she is unseaworthy (Semble) unless the voyage is one on which it is the usual practice to call at intermediate ports for coals. (Ct. of App.) Thin and Sinclair v. Richardson and Co..... 165

43. Warranty of seaworthiness—Steamship—Sufficiency of coal for voyage—Calling at intermediate ports—Stages of voyage.—A cargo of esparto grass was shipped at Oran upon a steamer of the defendants for a voyage from Oran to Garston under a charter-party, which reserved liberty to the owners "to fill up with ore or other dead weight cargo for owners' benefit," and contained a warranty of seaworthiness and an exception as to perils, one of which was "any act, neglect, or default whatever of the pilot, master, or crew." Ore or other weight dead cargo could not be obtained at Oran, and the vessel proceeded to Huelva, where she filled up with ore. On leaving Oran the vessel had not enough coal for the voyage to Garston, but had enough for the voyage to Huelva, and on leaving Huelva she had not enough for the voyage to Garston, and consequently was wrecked and the cargo of esparto grass lost. On leaving Oran the captain thought that there was an amount of coal on board which would have been sufficient for the voyage to Garston, and at Huelva the engineer reported an amount of coal sufficient for the voyage to Garston; this was owing to a mistake as to the actual amount on board: Held (affirming the judgment of Day, J.), that the defendants were liable for the loss of the cargo because the voyage was either a voyage from Oran to Garston and the vessel was unseaworthy on leaving Oran, or it was a voyage to Garston to be performed in stages, and the vessel was unseaworthy at the commencement of the last stage, and the exception as to perils did not affect the warranty of seaworthiness. (Ct. of App.) Thin and Sinclair v. Richards and Co. 165

CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS.

Contract—Conditions—Notice—Personal injuries.—Where a steamship passenger took a ticket upon which were printed in small type certain conditions limiting the liability of the shipowner for loss or injury to the passengers or their luggage, and these conditions were not called to the attention of the passenger, and the ticket was handed to her folded up, it was held in an action by the passenger for personal injuries that there was evidence upon which a jury might find that the shipowners had not done what was reasonably necessary to give the passenger notice of the conditions and that she was not bound by them. (H. of L.) Richardson Spence and Co. v. Rowntree 482

CESSER CLAUSE.

See Carriage of Goods, No. 27—Charter-party, Nos. 5, 6, 7.

CHARTER-PARTY.

1. Bills of lading—Captain's duty to sign—Penalty—Damages—Owners offer to sign.—Where a charter-party contained a clause in the following terms: "Captain to sign bills of lading (at plaintiff's office) without responsibility as to weight, and as presented to him, without prejudice to the tenor of this charter-party, within twenty-four hours after the cargo is on board, or pay 4*d*. per register ton per day (the first day's payment being due on the expiration of the said twenty-four hours) for each day's delay," and the captain refused to sign for seventeen days, but the owners offered to sign on his behalf within twenty-four hours: In an action by the charterers against the owners: Held, that the signature of the owners was not sufficient to satisfy the provision in the charter-party. Also that the clause was one for a penalty, and not for liquidated damages. (Adm.) The Princess .....page 432

2. Cancellation clause—Time of arrival—Ship ready but not at berth—Prevented by port regulations.—Where a charter-party provided that the freighters were to have the option of cancelling the charter if the vessel failed to arrive at the port of loading and to be ready to load on or before midnight on a certain date, and the vessel arrived on the last day of the stipulated time and was in herself ready to load, but was prohibited from communicating with the shore until the doctor had visited her, which he did not do till next day: it was held that the vessel was not ready to load within the stipulated time and that therefore the charterers were entitled to cancel the charter-party. (Adm. Div.) The Austin Friars 503

3. Condition precedent—"Now sailed or about to sail"—Refusal to load—Waiver.—By a charter-party it was agreed that the plaintiff's ship, should, after discharging homeward cargo, proceed to Quebec and there load a cargo for the United Kingdom for the charterers, the defendants. At the date of the charter-party the owner and charterers knew that the ship was at or had just left Mobile, and she was described in the charter-party as "now sailed or about to sail from a pitch pine port." The ship did not in fact sail from Mobile till nearly four weeks after the date of the charter-party. The charterers refused to load the ship at Quebec. In an action by the owner against them for this breach of the charter-party: Held, that the description of the ship as "now sailed or about to sail" was a substantive part of the contract, and that its accuracy was a condition precedent, the breach of which entitled the charterers to treat the contract as at an end. Held also, that, as a fact, the charterers had treated the contract as subsisting, and had therefore waived the performance of the condition precedent, and that therefore the plaintiff was entitled to judgment in his action, and the defendants were entitled to damages sustained by reason of the delay in the sailing of the ship. (Ct. of App.) Bentsen v. Taylor, Sons, and Co.... 385

4. Despatch money—Discharging clause—Sunday and fête-days excepted—Mode of computation.—Where a charter-party provided that a steamer was to be "discharged at the rate of 200 tons per day, weather permitting (Sundays and fête-days excepted), according to the custom of the port of discharge, and if sooner discharged to pay at the rate of 8*s*. 4*d*. per hour for every hour saved," it was held that Sundays and fête-days were not to be taken into account in computing the number of hours saved in discharging and hence despatch money was payable on the difference between the number of hours actually taken to discharge the ship and the total number of hours allowed by the charter-party. (Adm.) The Glendevon ..... page 439

5. Detention at port of loading—Cesser of liability claim—Demurrage—Lien for—Liability of charterer.—By a charter-party it was agreed between the plaintiffs, shipowners, and the defendants, charterers, that the ship should "load in the usual and customary manner," a cargo of coals, "the vessel to be loaded as customary, but subject in all respects to the colliery guarantee in 108 colliery working hours." The cargo was to be unloaded at a specified rate per day, "or charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of 30*s.* per hour." The master to sign clean bill of lading. The charterer's liability under this charter-party to cease on the cargo being loaded and the advance freight paid, the owners having a lien on the cargo for the balance of the freight and demurrage." By colliery guarantee certain colliery proprietors undertook to load the ship for the defendants in 108 working hours, demurrage, if any, to be at the rate of 20*s.* per hour. The vessel was not loaded in 108 working hours. Held, that the defendants were protected from liability by the cesser clause, as the word demurrage here applied both to port of loading and of discharge. (Ct. of App.) Restitution Steamship Company v. Sir John Pirie and Co...... 11, n.

6. Detention at port of loading—Costs of liability claim—Demurrage—Lien for—Liability of charterer.—Where a charter-party provides that the ship is to load "in the usual and customary manner," and that the cargo is to "be unloaded at the average rate of not less than 100 tons per working day . . . charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of 4*d.* per ton register per diem, except in case of unavoidable accident . . . charterers liability under this charter-party to cease on the cargo being loaded, the owners having a lien on the cargo for freight and demurrage," the charterers, in an action by the owners against them for damages for delay at the port of loading, are not protected from liability by the cesser clause, which, in these circumstances, applies to demurrage proper only. (Ct. of App.) Clink v. Radford and Co...... 10

7. Freight—Lien—Cesser of liability clause—Bills of lading for less than chartered freight—Liability for the excess.—Where, under the provisions of a charter-party, a ship was re-chartered, and the original charter-party contained a clause that the captain should sign bills of lading for the cargo at any rate of freight required without prejudice to the charter-party, and also a clause for the cesser of the charterer's liability, coupled with a stipulation, "the owner having a lien on the cargo for all freight and demurrage under this charter-party:" Held, that, there being no express agreement to the contrary, the cesser of liability only relieved the charterers from liability to pay so much of the chartered freight as was equivalent to the lien given to the shipowner, and therefore the charterers were liable to pay the difference between the chartered freight and the bill of lading freight. (Ct. of App.) Hansen v. Harrold Bros...... 464

8. Freight—Part shipment—Loss by fire—Liability for freight—Rate—Refusal to ship again—Damages—Reduction of.—By a charter-party the defendants contracted, except prevented by fire, to load the plaintiff's ship with a full cargo of jute at 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per ton, but the captain was to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charter-party or to the owners' lien, provided the bill of lading freight in the aggregate fully covered the freight due under the charter-party. The defendants had shipped 7545 bales of jute, when a fire broke out and destroyed 5458 of the bales, and delayed the sailing of the ship. The freight specified in the bills of lading for the goods burnt was 1*l.* 5*s.* per ton. The defendants then refused to ship any more goods, and the plaintiffs filled the ship with cargo, some at 1*l.* 5*s.* per ton, and some at a lower rate. The plaintiffs having brought this action to recover damages for breach of the charter-party by the defendants in not having loaded a full cargo: Held (affirming the decision of Pollock, B.), that with regard to the bales burnt, each party had pro tanto fulfilled their respective obligations under the charter-party, and the defendants were under no liability to pay freight for the bales burnt, nor bound or entitled to reload cargo to take their place; and that the freight received by the plaintiffs for the cargo shipped by them in the space formerly occupied by the burnt bales ought not to go in reduction of any damages payable by the defendants. Held, also, that the fire only absolved the defendants from payment of so much of the freight as would have been actually received for the goods burnt, viz., 1*l.* 5*s.* per ton, and not 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per ton. (Ct. of App.) Aitken, Lilburn, and Co. v. Ernsthausen and Co.... page 462

9. Running days—Meaning.—The term "running days" in a charter-party mean, in the absence of any indication to the contrary, calendar days and not periods of twenty-four hours. (Ct. of App.) The Katy 510, 527

10. Shipment—Delay through shipowner's default—Demurrage of trucks—Liability for delay—Measure of damages.—By the terms of a contract the defendants agreed with the plaintiffs to have a certain ship ready on a certain date, in the South West India Docks, to receive a cargo of tiles for shipment to Australia. The ship was not ready on the agreed day, and the tiles being kept waiting in the trucks in which the plaintiffs had had them brought into the docks, the plaintiffs were obliged to pay the railway company, the owners of the trucks, a certain sum for the detention, which sum they now sought to recover from the defendants as damages for their breach of contract. If the plaintiffs had followed the ordinary course of business at the docks, they would have employed the dock company to bring the tiles into the docks up to the ship's side, and the dock company's scale of charges, which were slightly higher than the railway company's, would have included storage of the tiles at the docks for three weeks without further charge. The time during which the trucks were actually detained was less than three weeks. Held, that the defendants had no right to assume that the plaintiffs would follow the ordinary course of business in the mode of bringing their goods into the docks, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to deliver the tiles in any manner they pleased, and that the detention of the trucks was the natural and ordinary consequence of the defendants' breach of contract. (Ct. of App.) Welch, Perrin, and Co. v. Anderson and Co...... 177

11. Time charter—Breakdown clause—Loss of time—Towage—Liability for hire.—Where a charter-party provided that the owners should maintain the ship in an efficient state, and that "in the event of loss of time from . . . . breakdown of machinery, want of repairs, or damage whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service," and whilst on the voyage, in consequence of one of the engines breaking down, the ship had to put into an intermediate port, from whence, by an agreement between shipowners and charterers, she was towed by a tug to her port of discharge, it was held that the shipowners were not entitled to hire whilst the ship was being towed, but were entitled to hire during the time the ship was discharging her cargo at the port of destination. COLLISION.

1. Appeal—Practice—Point not raised in court below.—Where, on appeal in a collision case, it appeared that the court below had found that the appellants' ship was to blame, and had accepted the story told by the respondents; it was Held, that it was not open to the appellants on the appeal to raise the contention that, assuming the appellants to be to blame, the respondents were also to blame, if the appellants had not raised such question in the court below. (P. C.) The Pleides; The Jane..... 41

2. Claim and counter-claim—Tug and tow and third ship—Both to blame—Assignment of judgment—Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1854.—In a collision action brought by the owners of a steamship against the owners of a tug and her tow, all three vessels were found to blame, the tug and tow being respectively condemned in a moiety of the plaintiffs' claim, and the plaintiffs in a moiety of the counter-claim of the tug. The owners of the tow now asked the court to order under the provisions of sect. 5 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856, an assignment of the steamship's judgment to them upon their paying the steamship the whole of the amount due under her judgment: Held (dismissing the motion), that the statute did not apply, as there was no joint debt existing before the judgment creating the liability. (Adm. Div.) The Englishman and Australia..... 605

3. Coming to anchor—Duty to warn—Stern light.—Where a steamship under way at night in the Firth of Clyde stops her way and puts herself across the line of navigation for the purpose of coming to an anchor, she is to blame for not warning vessels coming up behind her of her manœuvres, even though she is carrying a fixed stern light. (Ct. of App.) The Queen Victoria.. 9

4. Common employment—Seamens' effects—Same owners.—Where a collision occurred in Sea Reach of the river Thames between two steamers owned by the same owners, it was held that the masters and crews of such steamers were not in common employment, and hence the master and crew of one ship were allowed to prove for their lost effects against the fund which represented the limit of liability of the owners for the negligence of the other ship. (Adm.) The Petrel..... 434

5. Compulsory pilotage—Bristol Channel—Port of Bristol—Employment in place where compulsory—Collision within district.—A vessel lying at anchor about a mile to the northwest of the English and Welsh Grounds Lightship in the Bristol Channel was run into by a steamship proceeding from Bristol to Cardiff, which was in charge of a pilot licensed by the Bristol Corporation for the port of Bristol and the Bristol Channel Pilotage District. One rate is payable for the pilotage of a vessel from Bristol to any part of the Bristol Channel eastward of the Holms. In the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 160) the boundary of the port of Bristol between the Holms and Aust is stated to be "from the westwardmost part of the Flat and Steep Holms, up the course of the Bristol Channel eastward to Aust in the county of Gloucester." Held, that the boundary of the port of Bristol between the Holms and Aust is a straight line between those two places and does not follow the course of the navigable channel: Held further, that the collision being to the northwestward of such line was not within the port of Bristol, but as it was within the Bristol Channel Pilotage District, within a part of which (namely, the port of Bristol) the employment of a pilot was compulsory, and as one pilotage rate was payable to a part of the district beyond the spot where the collision occurred, the pilot was not the defendants' servant, and they were exonerated from liability for his negligence (Adm. Div.) The Charlton.....page 569

6. Compulsory pilotage—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854—O. in C., May 1855—London District—Draft of ship—Pilot's licence—"Under 14ft."—Where a vessel requiring a compulsory pilot in the London district and drawing more than 14ft. takes a Trinity House Pilot whose licence limits him to conducting ships of not more than 14ft. draught, because no other pilot is available, the effect of the pilotage provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and of the Order in Council of the 1st May 1855, forbidding a pilot restricted to conducting vessels of 14ft. draught to conducting vessels of greater draught, "unless there shall be no qualified pilot to be obtained who has passed the said examination for ships drawing more that 14ft. water," is to make the pilot in such circumstances a qualified pilot, and to relieve the shipowners under sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, from liability for loss occasioned by his fault. (Ct. of App.) The Carl XV..... 242

7. Compulsory pilotage—Thames Navigation Rules 1892—Sect. 20—Position of anchor—Responsibility of pilot.—The position of an anchor which is required for letting go in a port is within the jurisdiction of the pilot. If damage is caused by the anchor, so placed by the order of a compulsory pilot, the owners are not liable, notwithstanding the fact that the position of the anchor is in breach of a port rule. (Adm.) The Monte Rosa..... 326

8. Damage—Admiralty rule—Both to blame—Tug and Tow—Collision between tug and third ship.—Where a steam tug towing came into collision with another vessel and all three vessels were found to blame, the Court held that such a collision was a maritime tort within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty; that the right to recover damages was governed by the rule prevailing in that court, and not by the common law doctrine of contributory negligence; and hence the owners of the tug and the owners of the tow were liable for half the damages of the other vessel after deducting half the damages of the tug. (Adm. Div.) The Englishman and Australia..... 603

9. Damages—Delay in proceeding—Interest on amount recovered.—In a collision action in rem, not instituted till twelve years after the collision occurred, the Court having held that the circumstances of the delay were not such as to preclude the plaintiffs from recovering, although they might have proceeded earlier, gave the plaintiffs interest for the twelve years on the damages awarded. (Adm. Div.) The Kong Magnus...page 64

10. Damages—Jettison—General average.—Where in consequence of a collision cargo is jettisoned, the amount payable as general average contribution by the ship in respect of such jettison is not recoverable from the wrong-doing ship which caused the collision. (Adm. Div.) The Marpessa..... 155

11. Danube Navigation Rules, Art. 32—Narrow passages—Ascending and descending ships—Duty to stop and wait.—Under art. 32 of the Regulations applicable to the navigation of the Lower Danube, directing that, "when a vessel ascending the river finds itself exposed to meeting a vessel descending at a point which does not afford sufficient breadth, she must stop below the passage till the other vessel has cleared it; and if the ascending vessel should be actually in the passage as the other approaches it, the descending vessel must stop above until the passage is clear;" an ascending ship must stop below the passage until a descending ship has cleared it whenever the ascending ship has notice that if she proceeds she will be exposed to the risk of meeting the descending ship at or near that point; and the descending vessel must stop above the passage when the ascending ship has reached such point and has actually begun to navigate the contracted passage before notice is conveyed to her that if she proceeds she will be exposed to the risk of meeting the descending ship at or near the point. (P. C.) The Clieveden; The Diana... 489

12. Danube Navigation Rules, Art. 32—Narrow passages—Ascending and descending ships—Duty to stop and wait.—Where a ship ascending the lower Danube neglects to stop below a passage referred to in art. 32 of the Regulations it is the duty of the descending ship to refrain from any attempt to exercise her right of precedence when the intention of the ascending steamer to violate the regulations becomes reasonably apparent. (P. C.) The Clieveden; The Diana..... 489

13. Danube Navigation Rules, Art. 32—Narrow channel—Sulina Cut.—Semble: The channel at the lower part of the Sulina Cut is not within the scope of art. 32 of the Danube Regulations. (P. C.) The Clieveden; The Diana..... 489

14. Inevitable accident — Definition. — Inevitable accident is that which cannot be prevented by the exercise of ordinary care, caut on, and maritime skill: Lord Esher, M.R., dubitante. (Ct. of App.) The Schwan..... 347

15. Inevitable accident—Vessel at anchor—Failure of steering gear—Burden of proof.—Where a ship which in consequence of her steam steering gear failing to act runs into and damages a vessel at anchor, her owners to establish the plea of inevitable accident must show that the cause of the accident was one which could not be avoided, and they do not do so by proving that the gear was a good patent in extensive use, that it was properly overhauled from time to time, and that competent persons subsequently to the collision were unable to discover the cause of its failure to act. (Ct. of App.) The Merchant Prince..... 208

16. Mersey Navigation Rules, art. 4 — Second light aft—Customs signal.—A steamship under way in the Mersey is not entitled to carry a white light at the mizen truck as a signal for a Customs officer or otherwise than as a quarantine light; and if she carries such a light for the former purpose, she is guilty of a breach of the Mersey Navigation Rules, and will be held to blame for a collision if the other vessel might be misled thereby. (Adm. Div.) The Talbot.....page 36

17. Practice—Costs—Action under 300*l.*—Where successful plaintiffs in a collision action instituted in the High Court recover less than 300*l.*, they will not in the absence of special circumstances be allowed costs of the action or reference. (Adm. Div.) The Asia..... 25

18. Practice—Cross actions—Stay of proceedings for bail—Jurisdiction.—Where a collision action in personam and one in rem were consolidated and the conduct given to the plaintiff in the action in personam who had brought his action in personam because the other ship had been sunk, the Court held that it had no power under sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 to stay the defendant's proceedings until he had given security to answer the plaintiff's claim. (Adm.) The Rougemont... 437

19. Practice—Undertaking by solicitors—Appearance.—Where in a collision action in rem solicitors for the defendants accept service of the writ and indorse it with the words "We accept service on behalf of the defendants, the owners of the A., and undertake to put in bail in a sum not exceeding the value of the said barque A.," and in consequence of their authority being withdrawn by the defendants they do not enter an appearance, they do not thereby commit a breach of their undertaking so as to render themselves liable to attachment under Order XII., r. 18, inasmuch as they have never expressly undertaken to appear. (Adm. Div.) The Anna and Bertha..... 31

20. Regulations for Preventing Collisions—Fog—Duty to stop and reverse.—Where two steamships are approaching one another in a fog they must stop and reverse, unless the indications are distinct and unequivocal that if both vessels continue to do what they appear to be doing they will pass clear without risk of collision. (H. of L.) The Lancashire..... 376

21. Regulations for Preventing Collissions, arts. 12-13—Fog—Whistle—Speed.—A steamer approaching a fog, before entering it ought to reduce her speed and blow her whistle. (Adm. Div.) The N. Strong..... 194

22. Regulations for Preventing Collisions, Art. 13—Fog—Speed—Sailing ship.—A barque which is in a fog making four knots an hour in the English Channel five to six miles S.W. of the Longships, is going at a moderate speed. (Adm. Div.) The N. Strong..... 194

23. Regulations for Preventing Collisions, Art. 5—Lights—"Not under command."—A steamship which still retains steerage way, but in consequence of some accident can only answer her helm, or stop and reverse, slowly and with difficulty, or is in imminent danger of a breakdown of her propelling power at any moment, may be "not under command" within the meaning of Art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, but this is not so where the vessel's machinery is in such a condition as to make her steam four to five knots, and which is stopped to cure the accident which has reduced her speed to that amount. (H. of L.) The P. Caland..... 317

24. Regulations for Preventing Collisions—Merchant Shipping Act, 1873—Breach not contributing.—In a case of collision a ship will not be deemed in fault for an infringement of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, under sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, if it is shown that such infringement could not in any way contribute to the collision. (H. of L.) The Duke of Buccleugh.....page 68

25. Regulations for Preventing Collisions, art. 21—Narrow channel—Thames estuary.—A collision between an outgoing and an incoming steamship occurred in the Swin to the westward of a line between the Maplin Spit Light and the Middle Lightship. Held, that the outgoing steamer was to blame for breach of art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and that she ought to have kept to that side of the fairway which lay on her starboard hand. (Ct. of App.) The Minnie..... 521

26. Regulations for Preventing Collisions, art. 21—Narrow channel—Thames estuary.—The space in the Thames estuary between the Middle Lightship and the Middle Sands is a narrow channel, within the meaning of art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. (Ct. of App.) The Minnie 521

27. Regulations for Preventing Collisions—Order in Council, 24th June 1885—Lights—Trawlers—Pyrotechnic lights—Duty to show.—Where a British trawler, while engaged in trawling at night, is being approached by another vessel, she need not show pyrotechnic lights under all circumstances, but only when the other vessel is approaching in such a way as to indicate risk of collision. (Adm. Div.) The Orion..... 88

28. Regulations for Preventing Collisions, art. 20—Overtaking ship—Duty to keep clear—Side-lights visible.—A vessel which is overtaking another may still be under the obligation to keep out of the way under art. 20 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, notwithstanding that she has advanced from the area covered by the stern light into a position where she has one of the side lights of the overtaken ship in view. (Adm. Div.) The Moliere 364

29. Regulations for Preventing Collisions, arts. 20, 22—Overtaken ship—Necessary deviation from course—Duty.—An overtaken vessel which finds it necessary to manœuvre for a danger of navigation is to blame if she deviates from her course more than is necessary to avoid immediate danger. (Ct. of App.) The Saragossa 289

30. Regulations for Preventing Collisions, arts. 20, 22—Overtaking and overtaken ships—Deviation from course—Duty of overtaking ship.—Where a vessel which is being overtaken by another deviates from her course, it is the duty of the overtaking ship to exercise reasonable care to keep out of the way of the former; and if she does take such care, and does her best to avoid collision, she is relieved from the duty imposed upon her by art. 20 of keeping out of the way. (Ct. of App.) The Saragossa..... 289

31. Regulations for Preventing Collisions, art. 11—Overtaking ship—Light over stern—Duty to repeat.—A fishing smack on her way to her fishing ground in the North Sea, on a clear night, sighted the lights of an overtaking steamer on her port quarter. The smack exhibited one flare-up light while the steamer was still at a considerable distance, but the steamer, nevertheless, continued her course, and a collision occurred. Held, that the smack was to blame for breach of art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, for not continuing to show flare-up lights at proper intervals as long as there was danger. (Ct. of App.) The Bassett Hound 467

32. Steamship and barge—Absence of person in charge.—Where a collision occurred at night in a dock lighted by electric light between a steam-tug under way and a moored barge, the Court, while holding the tug to blame, refused to hold the barge also to blame on the ground that at the time of the collision there was no one on board of her, as the absence of a man had nothing to do with the collision, or the subsequent sinking of the barge. (Adm. Div.) The Hornet.....page 262

33. Thames Navigation Rules 1872, art. 20—Anchor—Stock awash—Construction.—It is not an infringement of art. 20 of the Thames Navigation Rules 1872, providing that no vessel shall be navigated with its anchor hanging perpendicularly from the hawse, "unless the stock shall be awash," to carry it with the shackle or ring awash, as the rule only requires it to be carried as low as stock awash, and does not prohibit it from being carried lower. (Adm. Div.) The J. R. Hinde..... 257

34. Thames Navigation Rules 1872, art. 20—Anchor—Stock awash—Damage avoidable by ordinary care—Liability.—The Thames rule as to carrying the anchor stock awash does not necessarily render a vessel liable in a collision action for a breach thereof, and where a defendant's vessel carried the anchor in an improper position, but those in charge of the plaintiff's vessel—which was negligently navigated—being able to see the position of the anchor could by the exercise of ordinary care exerted up to the moment of the collision have avoided it, the plaintiff was not allowed to recover for damage done to his vessel by the anchor, as it was not shown that the defendant on the plaintiff's negligence becoming apparent could have prevented the injury done by the anchor. (Adm.) The Monte Rosa... 326

35. Thames Navigation Rules 1880, art. 24—Crossing vessel—When crossed.—A vessel moving from one side of the Thames to the other is a crossing vessel, within the meaning of art. 24 of the Thames rules, until she has completed the manœuvre she has in view, viz., to get straight up or down the river, on the side to which she is going, and that manœuvre is not completed, although her stem may be as near to the opposite shore as she can safely get, if she is still athwart the stream. (H. of L.) The River Derwent 37

36. Thames Navigation Rules 1880, art. 13—Fairway—Fog—Signals.—The fairway of a river is not necessarily confined to that part of the channel which is marked by buoys, but includes all that part of the river inshore of the buoys which is navigable for vessels of moderate draft, and hence where a sailing barge at anchor in the navigable channel inside the West Blyth buoy, river Thames, neglected during a fog to ring a bell, she was held to have committed a breach of art. 13 of the Thames Navigation Rules. (Adm. Div.) The Blue Bell 601

37. Thames navigation—Going into dock—Lights—Signals required.—A steamer dropping up the Thames stern first on a dark night for the purpose of going into dock and exhibiting only her stern light to down-coming vessels is bound to keep a look out up river, and ought, when she sees a vessel coming down, to give such sufficient signal as will enable the down-coming steamer to avoid her. Semble, a proper signal under such circumstances would be a prolonged blast of the steam-whistle of not less than five seconds' duration. (Adm. Div.) The Juno..... 506

38. Thames Navigation Rules 1892—Lights—Ship at anchor.—A vessel of the length of 150 feet or more is bound, under art. 7 (c) of the Thames Conservancy Regulations 1892, to exhibit, as soon as she comes to anchor, at or near her stern a second riding light, so placed, and of such a character, as to show an unbroken light visible all around the horizon at a distance of at least one mile. (Adm. Div.) The Wega.....page 597

39. Thames Navigation Rules 1880, arts. 5 and 7—Lights—At anchor.—It is the duty of a steamship anchoring in the Thames to take in her side lights as soon as she is held by her anchor. (Adm. Div.) The Wega..... 597

40. Thames Navigation Rules 1880, 1887, art. 18—Turning vessel—Whistle signals.—A steamship turning round in the Thames is bound to give the four-blast signal on or before commencing to do so, in obedience to art. 18 of the Thames Rules and Bye-laws, 1887, and it is not enough for her merely to blow three blasts when as part of the manœuvre of turning she reverses her engines. (Adm. Div.) The New Pelton..... 81

41. Thames Navigation Rules 1880, 1887, art. 18—Turning vessel—Coming to anchor—Whistle signal.—A steamship in the river Thames putting herself athwart the river and stopping her way to come to anchor is a steam vessel not under command within the meaning of art 18 of the Thames Conservancy Regulations 1887, and it is incumbent upon her when carrying out such manœuvre to sound four or more blasts of the steam whistle in rapid succession to warn approaching vessels. (Adm. Div.) The Wega..... 597

42. Thames Navigation Rules 1880, 1887, art. 18—Turning vessel—Coming to anchor—Whistle signals—Duty to repeat.—Where a steam-vessel is throwing herself across the Thames to come to anchor, three short blasts do not constitute the appropriate signal to signify that she is a vessel throwing herself across a navigable channel, even though she may be reversing at the time. If the danger from an approaching vessel is such as to require it, more than four blasts should be sounded so long as the danger lasts, and the danger is not necessarily past until the vessel anchoring has swung to her anchor. (Adm. Div.) The Wega..... 597

43. Wreck—Lighting—Harbour authority—Owner in possession—Lien.—Where a harbour authority undertakes and pays for the lighting of a sunken wreck of which the owners continue in possession and eventually raise, there is no maritime lien attaching to the wreck by reason of a collision with another vessel in consequence of the wreck being inefficiently lighted. (P.C.) The Utopia... 408

44. Wreck—Lighting—Harbour authority—Owners in possession—Liability.—Where the harbour authority of the port of G. undertook and paid for the lighting of a sunken wreck, of which her owners continued in possession and eventually raised, and in consequence of the lighting being inefficient another vessel collided with the wreck, her owners were held not liable for the collision, the control and management of the lighting of the wreck having been undertaken by the harbour authority, and the owners having been guilty of no negligence. (P.C.) The Utopia 408

45. Yacht Racing Rules—Contract—Liability for damage—Limitation.—The defendant entered his yacht for a race, and gave his assent in writing that he would be bound by certain rules which provided that owners of competing yachts should be liable for all damages caused by infringement of the rules. A collision occurred through a breach of the rules by the defendant's yacht, and the plaintiff's yacht was sunk. Held, first, that entering of the yacht for the rules created a contract between the competitors; secondly (reversing Bruce, J.), that, with regard to damages, the word "all" in the rules excluded the operation of sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act, 1862, limiting the liability to 8*l.* per ton, and that the defendant was liable in full to the plaintiff for the damage done. COMPULSORY PILOTAGE.

1. Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 379—Coasting trade—Carrying cargo for foreign ports between two British ports.—A vessel whilst carrying cargo from a port in the United Kingdom, for delivery at a foreign port, is not a ship employed in the coasting trade, even though in the course of her voyage to the foreign port she proceeds from one port in the United Kingdom to another to complete her cargo, and is therefore not exempt from compulsory pilotage under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 379, sub-sect. 1. (Adm. Div.) The Winestead 547

2. Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 379—"Trading from place in Europe," &c.—"United Kingdom."—The word "Europe" in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 379, sub-sect. 3, and in the Order in Council of the 21st Dec. 1871, is used in contradistinction to the words "United Kingdom," and therefore a vessel trading from London to Cardiff is not a vessel trading to a place in Europe north and east of Brest, and is not exempt from compulsory pilotage under those enactments. Shipowning Association—Agents—Restriction of trade.—An association of shipowners which offers favourable terms to shippers confining their shipping to the association's ships, and threatens to dismiss any agent of theirs who acts for competing shipowners, although it may cause loss to other shipowners, is not unlawful, and an action for conspiracy to prevent other shipowners carrying on their trade will not lie against it. CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT.

Cleansing and disinfecting ship—Parts required to be cleansed.—An Order in Council—clause 100 of the Animals Order of 1886—made under the powers given by sect. 32, sub-sect. 21, of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1878, prescribing that a vessel used for carrying animals by sea should, after the landing of animals therefrom, and before the taking on board of any other animal or other cargo, be cleansed and disinfected by having all parts of the vessel with which animals or their droppings had come in contact scraped and swept, makes it compulsory that before any new cargo can be put on board any part of the vessel, even those parts which have not been used for carrying cattle, the parts of the vessel with which cattle or their droppings have come in contact must be cleansed and disinfected according to the requirements of the order, and where shipowners place new cargo on board, although on parts of the vessel where no cattle have been carried, before cleansing and disinfecting the vessel, they are guilty of a breach of the order. COUNTY COURTS ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

1. Appeal—Judge and assessors—Difference of opinion—Judgment in accord with assessors.—In a collision action brought in the County Court the judge formed an opinion on the evidence in favour of the plaintiffs, but the nautical assessors took the view that the plaintiffs' vessel was to blame. The judge said that he felt bound to act upon the assessors' advice, and gave judgment for the defendants, expressing at the same time his dissent therefrom. The plaintiffs appealed. Held that, on these facts, the court had no power to alter the decision of the learned judge. Semble, the High Court has power in such circumstances to order a new trial. (Adm. Div.) The Fred 550

2. Costs—Action within County Court limits—Damage to ship—Negligence of dock company.—Where shipowners successfully brought an action in personam in the High Court against a dock company to recover a sum within the limits of the County Court jurisdiction in Admiralty for damage occasioned to their ship by the negligence of the company's servants in bringing her into collision with a pierhead while moving from one dock to another, it was held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that such damage was damage "by collision or otherwise" within the meaning of sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), that therefore the action might have been brought in a County Court, and hence the judge at the trial had jurisdiction to deprive the plaintiffs of their costs. (H. of L.) The Zeta..... 369

3. County Courts Act 1888, and County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868—Demurrage—Place to bring actions.—Sect. 74 of the County Courts Act 1888, which contains provisions as to the district within which actions are to be commenced, is not inconsistent with sect. 21 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and applies to County Court Admiralty actions; and hence a claim for demurrage in personam, under sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, is rightly instituted in the court within the district of which the defendants carry on business. (Adm. Div.) The Hero 86

4. County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1888, s. 21, sub-sect. 2—Demurrage—Action by shipowners—Place to bring actions.—Where an action was brought in a County Court by shipowners against the indorsees of a bill of lading which incorporated the terms of the charter-party, for demurrage for detention at the port of discharge of the plaintiff's ship which at the commencement of the proceedings was on the high seas, and the cargo to which the bill of lading referred was within the district of another County Court, it was held that the action related to the vessel only, and proceedings were therefore rightly commenced under sub-sect. (2) of sect. 21 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act of 1868 in the court in the district of which the owners of the vessel resided. (Ct. of App.) Pugsley and Co. v. Ropkins and Co. .....page 215

5. County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, s. 2—Demurrage—Bill of lading.—An action for demurrage upon a bill of lading is within the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 and 33 Vict. c. 51) s. 2, by which jurisdiction in Admiralty is given to the County Courts up to a specified limit "as to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship." (Ct. of App.) Pugsley and Co. v. Ropkins and Co. 215

6. Pilot—Admiralty jurisdiction—Action in personam.—Under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts 1868 and 1869 County Courts having Admiralty jurisdiction have no greater jurisdiction in respect of claims for damage to ships than that which was possessed by the Admiralty Court prior to the Judicature Act, and as the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction to entertain an action against a pilot for damage to a ship arising from a collision caused by his negligence or want of skill, the City of London Court cannot entertain such an action upon its Admiralty side. (Ct. of App.) Reg. v. Judge of the City of London Court 140

7. Practice—Appeal—County Courts Act 1888, s. 120—Questions of law.—Under sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888 there is a right of appeal in an Admiralty cause or suit on a point of law, although the amount involved is under 50*l.* (Ct. of App.) The Delano..... 523

8. Practice—Appeal—County Courts Act 1888, s. 120—Questions of law.—Sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888, which gives a right of appeal on points of law, and rejection or admission of evidence where the amount claimed exceeds 20*l.*, applies to County Court Admiralty appeals, and hence a plaintiff in an action on the Admiralty side who claims more than 20*l.* and recovers only 1*s.* as nominal damages may appeal to the High Court notwithstanding the specific provisions of sect. 31 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868. (Adm. Div.) The Eden..... 174

9. Practice—Appeal—Under 50*l.*—Interlocutory.—There is a right of appeal from a County Court in an interlocutory matter by permission of the County Court judge, although the amount decreed or ordered to be due is under 50*l.* (Adm. Div.) The Alert..... 544

10. Practice—Collision—Mode of trial—Assessors—In an Admiralty cause of collision in a County Court, where one party asks for a jury and the other demands assessors, the trial must be by judge and assessors. Semble, in salvage and towage causes the same rule applies. (Adm. Div.) The Tynwald..... 539

11. Practice—Mode of trial—Juries.—Semble sect. 101 of the County Courts Act 1888 as to parties being entitled to a jury does not apply to Admiralty causes. (Adm. Div.) The Tynwald..... 539

12. Practice—Power of amendment of claim—County Courts Act 1888, s. 87.—A County Court judge has power, under sect. 87 of the County Courts Act 1888, to amend a claim in an Admiralty action of collision after the question of liability has been decided, and before the reference. (Adm. Div.) The Alert .....page 544

13. Salvage—Practice—Value—Proof of.—By rules 96 and 97 of the County Court Rules the value of the res in a County Court salvage action ought as a general rule to be proved by affidavit or appraisement and not by evidence at the trial, though semble there may be exceptions to this rule. (Adm. Div.) The Argo 534

14. Salvage—Practice—Value—Evidence—Admissibility.—Where in an action for salvage in the County Court the plaintiff having failed to ask for an appraisement disputes the value of the res as stated in the defendant's affidavit of value, and tenders evidence as to value, it is for the judge to exercise his discretion as to the admission or non-admission of such evidence. DAMAGE.

1. Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 7—Damage to person.—The word "damage" in sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, is as applicable to damage done to person as to damage done to property. (Adm.) The Theta 480

2. Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 7—Damage to person—"By ship"—Ship not the active instrument.—The chief engineer of a steamship, while crossing the deck of another vessel moored between the quay and his own vessel, fell down a hatchway, which was covered with a tarpaulin, and was injured. Held, that the ship could not be said to be the active instrument of the damage done, that it was done on board the ship, and not by the ship, within the meaning of sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Jurisdiction Act; and hence the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain an action in rem against the ship by the injured man. (Adm.) The Theta 480

3. Harbour-master's authority—Lock used as dry dock—Negligence—Liability.—A ship of the appellants, while in a dock the property of the respondent company, fouled her propeller, and it became necessary to put her upon the ground to free it. By the authority of the deputy harbour-master, whose powers and duties were regulated by a private Act of Parliament, the ship was placed in the sea lock leading into the dock for the purpose of being put on the ground. The lock had been lengthened since its original construction, but an old sill had been left, which made the bottom uneven. When the water was let out, the ship grounded on this sill and sustained serious damage. Held (reversing the judgment of the court below, Lords Bramwell and Morris dissenting), that the harbour-master was acting within the scope of his authority in authorising the use of the lock as a dry dock, and that the respondents were liable for his negligence in allowing the ship to take the ground in an improper place. (H. of L.) Little and others v. The Port Talbot Company; The Apollo 115

4. Injury to ship—Negligence of harbour-master in charge—Duty to obey.—Where a harbour-master acting under statutory powers is directing the course of a ship within his jurisdiction, the persons in charge of the ship are not at liberty to disregard his orders because they believe (rightly) that he is making a mistake, except in the last resort, when the danger of strictly obeying them is fully obvious. (H. of L.) Reney v. Magistrates of Kircudbright.....page 221

5. Injury to ship—Negligence of harbour-master in charge—Contributory negligence—Liability.—A ship of the appellant was entering the harbour of the respondents under the directions of their harbour-master, whose orders those in charge of the ship were legally bound to obey. The master was in charge of the ship, and he was assisted in the navigation by two local fishermen. In consequence of a mistake of the harbour-master as to the state of the tide, the vessel ran upon a bank, and was damaged. The master was not aware of the existence of the bank, but the fishermen were aware of it, and of the true state of the tide. Held that the accident was caused by the negligence of the harbour-master, for which the respondents were liable, and that there was no contributory negligence on the part of those in charge of the ship. (H. of L.) Reney v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright 221

6. Negligence—Probable and natural consequence—Liability—Neglect to take tug.—A steamship whilst getting up her anchors in a gale of wind to proceed to a safer anchorage, negligently failed to obtain the assistance of a tug so as to enable her to perform the manœuvre safely. She was in consequence driven against a pier, where she again negligently abstained for a considerable time from taking the assistance of a tug, which was offered to her. Having ultimately taken such assistance, she was towed in the only direction then possible, when, coming into a heavy seaway and the full force of a strong gale, the towing hawser parted, and she was driven ashore, doing damage to the plaintiffs' property. There was no negligence on the part of the ship after she took the assistance of the tug. The Trinity Masters having advised the court that the breaking of the tow rope was a thing that would "very probably" happen, considering the direction in which it was necessary to tow the ship after she had collided with the pier, and considering the wind and weather she would meet whilst being towed, it was held that the damage following upon such breaking of the tow rope was a natural consequence of the defendants' original negligence, and that the owners of the ship were liable for such damage. GENERAL AVERAGE.

1. Salvage—Expenses incurred for ship and cargo.—Reasonable expenditure incurred by a shipowner in salvage operations may be distributed over the interests protected and benefited, and need not fall upon the ship alone. (H. of L.) Rose and others v. Bank of Australasia.....page 445

2. Salvage of cargo—Ship abandoned—Expenses incurred—Contribution.—A ship containing a valuable cargo of a perishable nature was stranded on the coast of France, while on a voyage to the United Kingdom, and eventually became a total loss. The shipowners incurred expenditure in attempting to save the ship and in removing the cargo from the ship, drying it, and carting it to a port from which it could be shipped to the port of destination. For these purposes they employed persons who were skilled in salvage operations, and also a French agent on the spot. Some of the cargo could not be identified, and was sold by auction, and a brokerage commission was paid. The ship was abandoned. In an action brought by the shipowners against consignees of cargo to recover general average, particular average, salvage, and other charges: Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the expenditure above-mentioned, which was of an extraordinary character, was reasonably incurred for the benefit of all parties, and that the consignees were liable for their proportion of it. (H. of L.) Rose and others v. Bank of Australasia..... 445

3. Salvage of cargo—Ship abandoned—Subsequent expenses—Continuous operation—Contribution.—Per Lord Herschell, L.C.: Semble, where cargo has been removed from a stranded ship, and is by a continuous operation carried to a place of safety, expenditure incurred after all hope of saving the ship has been abandoned may still be treated as general average expenditure. (H. of L.) Rose and others v. Bank of Australasia...page 445

4. Stranding—Abnormal use of ship's engines—Coal consumed—Contribution.—By a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants, the former insured the hull and machinery of their steamship against the usual marine risks. In the course of her voyage the vessel stranded, and was eventually got off by means of her engines and by lightening the ship. On the question as to whether the defendants were liable to contribute pro rata in general average in respect of the coal so consumed: Held (affirming the President, Sir F. Jeune), that, as there had been an abnormal use of the engines which constituted a general average act, there must also have been an abnormal consumption of coal, and the shipowners were therefore entitled to general average contribution in respect thereof. HARBOURS AND DOCKS.

1. Dock Companies — Statutory powers — Limitation.—The statutory powers conferred by the Legislature upon dock companies and other bodies created for public purposes, and authorised to acquire land for such purposes, are inserted in order to define—i.e., limit—the rights conferred, and as implying a prohibition against the exercise of more extensive rights which such companies might have by virtue of their ownership of property. (Ct. of App.) London Association of Shipowners and Brokers, Limited, and others v. London and India Docks Joint Committee, and the London and St. Katharine Dock Company ... 195

2. Dock Company—Statutory power—Bye-laws—Validity—Confirmation.—Under the two statutes—the London and St. Katharine Docks Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii) and the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27)—the public have certain rights to use the docks belonging to the London and St. Katharine Dock Company, including the wharf, quays, and warehouses, and the company are empowered to make bye-laws and regulations and charges for their use; but such regulations and bye-laws are not valid and binding until made, confirmed, and published as bye-laws in the manner prescribed by the Act of 1847. (Ct. of App.) London Association of Shipowners and Brokers Limited and others v. London and India Docks Joint Committee, and the London and St. Katharine Dock Company 195

3. Dock Company—Statutory powers—Bye-laws—Authority—Effect.—The power of making bye-laws by a dock company authorised to acquire property differs from the power which every owner of property has of making agreements with those persons who desire to use it. A bye-law is not an agreement, but a law binding on all persons to whom it applies, whether they agree to be bound by it or not. LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

1. Merchant Shipping Acts—Gross tonnage—Crew space—Deductions.—If the requirements of sect. 9 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867 are complied with, shipowners in limiting their liability are entitled to deduct crew space from the gross tonnage, notwithstanding the repeal of sect. 21, subsect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, by sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889. (Adm.) The Petrel 434

2. Merchant Shipping Acts—Gross tonnage—Navigation spaces — Deductions—The owner of a steamship in limiting his liability is not entitled, in calculating the tonnage upon which his liability is based, to deduct the navigation spaces mentioned in sect. 3 of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889. (Adm. Div.) The Umbilo 26

3. Merchant Shipping Act 1854 — Two collisions — Distinct occasions — Separate acts of negligence.—The steamship S. having negligently starboarded across the bows of the steamship A. continued under her starboard helm, and collided with the D., and by her starboarding caused the A. to collide with the M. The S. limited her liability in respect of the damage caused by her improper navigation on the occasion of the collision between her and the D., and sought to make the owners of the A. claim against the fund in the limitation action on the ground that both collisions were caused by the same improper act of navigation, viz., the starboarding Held, that the S. had time and opportunity to correct the starboarding before striking the D., and that the damage to the D. happened on a distinct occasion from the damage to the A. by collision with the M., and therefore the S. was separately liable to the A. over and above the fund paid into court in the limitation action. MARINE INSURANCE.

1. Attaching of policy—Change of voyage—Deviation clause.—A policy of marine insurance was stated to be "at and from the Mersey and (or) London, both or either, to any port or ports in Portugal and (or) Spain this side Gibraltar, and (or) at and from thence by any inland conveyances to any place or places in the interior," including all risks whatsoever from the time of leaving the warehouse in the United Kingdom, and all risks of every kind until safely delivered at the warehouses of the consignees. The policy contained this clause: "Deviation and (or) change of voyage (or) transhipments not included in the policy to be held covered at a premium to be arranged." Goods of the assured were despatched from Bradford to Madrid, and the consignors intended the goods to be shipped, as on former occasions, at Liverpool for Seville, and carried thence by land to Madrid, and they instructed the insurance brokers that the voyage was to Seville. It appeared from the bills of lading that the voyage was not to Seville at all, and that the bills of lading of the goods in question were made out to Cartagena. The ship was lost with the goods while on that part of the voyage which was common to vessels going to the western ports of Spain and those going to the eastern ports. The consignors on discovering the change of voyage after the loss offered to pay the extra premium to Cartagena, but it was refused. In an action upon the policy by the consignors against the underwriters: held, that in substance the policy was a policy of insurance from the Thames or Mersey to a port on the west coast of Spain; and that, as in this case there was not a mere intention to deviate, and as the ship, so far as the goods were concerned, had sailed on a different voyage, and one for which the assured had no right to "declare" them, the policy and deviation clause never attached, and the assured had no right to recover on the policy. (Ct. of App.) Simon Israel and Co. v. Sedgwick and others .....page 245

2. Attaching of policy—Freight—Frozen meat cargo—Breakdown of machinery—No cargo shipped—Ship arrived.—By a policy of marine insurance "upon freight of meat valued at 3000*l*.," the underwriters were "to be liable for any loss occasioned by breaking down of machinery until final sailing of vessel, the ship called Hydarnes, lost or not lost, at and from Monte Video to any ports or places in any order in the River Plate . . . and thence to the United Kingdom . . ." This part of the policy was written. Then followed a clause to the effect that the assurance should commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise from the loading of the said goods on board the ship at Monte Video. With the exception of the words "Monte Video" this clause was in print, being part of the form of policy generally used by the defendant insurance company. After discharging her outward cargo at Monte Video, the ship proceeded to the River Plate to obtain a cargo of frozen meat, but her refrigerating machinery broke down under such circumstances that she was unable to take any frozen meat on board, so that the adventure, so far as the carriage of meat was concerned, had to be abandoned. By the contract under which she was to have taken a cargo of frozen meat, the shipowners, the assured, became entitled to freight on all carcases shipped. At the date of the policy it was known to both assured and underwriters that there were no proper appliances at Monte Video for loading frozen meat, so that the ship could not possibly take any frozen meat on board at that port. In an action by the assured upon the policy: Held (reversing Wills, J.), that the defendants were liable because in construing the policy, so much of the printed clause in the document as defined the commencement of the risk to be from the loading of the goods at Monte Video was in the circumstances insensible and should be rejected, and that the risk attached at Monte Video and did not depend upon the loading of the cargo. (Ct. of App.) Hydarnes Steamship Company v. The Indemnity Mutual Marine Insurance Company 470, 553

3. Chartered freight—Charter-party—Hire ceasing during breakdown of machinery—Perils insured against—Breakdown caused thereby—Loss by perils—Concealment.—A charter-party entered into between the plaintiffs and a French company for hire of their vessel contained a clause to the effect that "in the event of loss of time by . . . breakdown of engines or machinery, . . . and the progress of the steamer is thereby delayed for more than twenty-four running hours, payment of hire to cease until such time as she is again in an efficient state to resume her voyage." An insurance slip, initialled by the defendant, was taken out by the plaintiffs for three months, "freight chartered and (or) as if chartered, on board or not on board, . . . one-third diminishing each month;" and a policy executed in accordance with the slip contained the usual clause as to "perils of the seas," &c. In the course of her voyage the vessel was delayed for twenty-eight days, owing to the breaking of her thrust-shaft. The plaintiffs brought an action on the policy for the loss of hire, and Barnes, J., found as a fact that the breakage was due to a peril of the sea. Held (affirming the decision of Barnes, J., and affirming the decision in The Alps (68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 624; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 337; (1893) 1 P. 109), that the clause in the charter-party was put into operation through the immediate action of the perils insured against, and that therefore the defendant was liable. Also that, although the defendant was not informed when he initialled the slip that he was insuring freight under a charter containing the twenty-four hours clause, there was no concealment of a material fact, as a time charter almost invariably contains the twenty-four hours clause, and this fact, together with the words on the slip, "And (or) as if chartered, on board or not on board, . . . one-third diminishing each month," clearly showed the defendant the kind of risk he was asked to insure. (Ct. of App.) The Bedouin .....page 391

4. Chartered freight—Charter-party—Hire ceasing during repairs—Perils insured against—Fire Loss by perils.—By a charter-party entered into between the plaintiffs and certain charterers for the hire of the plaintiff's vessel at so much per month it was provided that, in the event of loss of time from want of repairs, &c., preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four working hours, the payment of the hire should cease from the hour when detention began until the vessel was again efficient. The plaintiffs insured the chartered freight by a policy effected with the defendants which contained the usual clause specifying perils of the seas, fire, &c. The vessel was damaged by fire, and there was loss of hire, under the clause in the charter-party, during the time she was being repaired. Held, that the clause was put into operation through the immediate action of the perils insured against, and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to recover under the policy. (Adm.) The Alps ... 337

5. Chartered freight—Damage to ship—Repairs—Claim for contribution as per foreign statement—Statement made in London.—Where a British ship under charter outward bound in ballast to America to load for the homeward voyage put into an English port to repair damage caused by heavy weather, and incurred expenses for such repairs which were not incurred to avert a loss of the joint interest of ship and freight, and the shipowners sued the underwriters to recover an alleged general average loss on a policy on chartered homeward freight, providing that general average was payable "as per foreign statement if required," the underwriters were held not liable for a contribution to an alleged general average loss shown by an average statement prepared in London according to the alleged provisions of the American law, the expenses in question not being a general average loss, and the shipowners being alone interested in ship and freight, and as there was no necessity for any foreign adjustment, the foreign statement clause imposed no liability upon the underwriters. (Adm.) The Brigetta... 403

6. Chartered freight—Stranding—Refusal to load—Cancellation.—A policy of insurance upon freight under a charter-party provided that "no claim arising from the cancelling of any charter, nor for loss of time under a time charter," should be allowed. While proceeding to the port of loading, the vessel stranded, and was so damaged that the voyage contemplated by the charter-party became impossible. The charterers did not load under the charter-party. The charter did not contain a "cancellation" clause, and the parties did not agree to rescind the contract. Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that the charter had not been "cancelled" within the meaning of the policy, and that the insurers were liable. (Ct. of App.) Jamieson v. Newcastle Steamship Freight Insurance Association.....page 562, 593

7. Collision clause—Proviso as to expenses of raising wreck—Liability for such expenses.—At the time of a collision in foreign waters, between the ships N. and P., the plaintiffs, the owners of the N., were insured in the defendant company by a policy of insurance which contained a collision clause, to which the following proviso was attached: "Provided always, that this clause shall in no case extend to any sum which the assured may become liable to pay, or shall pay for removal of obstructions under statutory powers, for injury to harbours, wharves, piers, stages, and similar structures, consequent on such collision, or in respect of the cargo or engagements of the insured vessel, or for loss of life or personal injury." In consequence of the collision the P. sank, and was ultimately removed by the local authorities acting under statutory powers. The expenses of such removal were directed to be paid by the P. to the local authority, and were so paid. In cross-actions for damages in respect of the said collision both ships admitted liability, and, on the damages being referred to the registrar and merchants for assessment, the registrar, by agreement and consent of the parties, allowed as part of the claim on behalf of the owners of the P. the sum so paid by the owners of the P. whereby the owners of the N. became liable to pay as part of the damages, to the owners of the P., a moiety of such sum. In an action by the owners of the N., against the underwriters of the N., to recover moneys alleged to be due under the said policy, in respect of the removal of the P.: Held (reversing Barnes, J.), that the assured could not recover, as the underwriters were exempted from liability by the terms of the proviso to the collision clause. (Ct. of App.) The North Britain 413

8. Collision clause—Tug towing the ship insured—Collision between tug and third ship—Liability.—Where a ship was insured under a policy which contained the clause "if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured shall, in consequence, become liable to pay, and shall pay to the persons interested in such other ship or vessel any sum or sums of money," the underwriters would pay the assured a proportion of the sum so paid, and a tug whilst towing such ship collided with another ship whose owners recovered damages from both tug and tow it was held that the collision between the tug and the damaged vessel was a collision with the tow within the meaning of the policy, and that the underwriters were liable. (H. of L.) McCowan v. Baine and others; The Niobe 89

9. Collision with sunken wreck—Wreck—Sunken cargo.—Where a steamship ran aground and rested on an old sunken wreck, and then moved forward on to iron ore, which had some years before formed part of a cargo of another vessel, and sustained damage by the contact with the wreck and ore, the underwriters were held liable for such damage under a policy covering "loss or damage through collision with any sunken wreck." (Adm.) The Munroe 407

10. Fire—"Burnt"—Warranty free from average unless, &c.—A ship is not "burnt" within the meaning of the memorandum in a Lloyd's policy of insurance, "warranted free from average under 3 per cent., unless the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt," unless the injury by fire is of so substantial a character that the ship can be said to be "burnt" in the popular sense of the term. (Ct. of App.) The Glenlivet.....page 395

11. General average as per foreign statement—Sue and labour clause—Statement drawn up abroad—Particular average.—Plaintiff, a shipowner, effected with the defendants two policies of insurance on a ship and freight containing the words, "general average payable according to foreign statement," and the usual sue and labour clause. A loss occurred owing to the vessel stranding through the negligence of the master, and a general average statement was drawn up (at Rotterdam) in accordance with Dutch practice. Various charges which were incurred in getting the ship and cargo off were apportioned as general average, which, if the average statement had been made in England, might have been treated as particular average on ship and freight, or as charges under the sue and labour clause. The shipowner was unable to obtain contribution to general average from the cargo owners, because by Dutch law when a loss occurs through the negligence of the master, contribution to general average losses cannot be recovered from the cargo owners by the shipowner, even though (as in this case) the bills of lading contain the exception of "strandings, . . . even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment by the pilot, master, or other servants of the shipowner." The shipowner then brought this action on the policies on ship and freight to recover as particular average on ship and freight, or as charges under the sue and labour clause, what they were precluded by Dutch law from recovering as general average. Held, that the plaintiff having agreed to be bound by a foreign average statement, could not now go behind the statement drawn up at Rotterdam, and could not recover as particular average charges which had been treated as general average in the foreign statement, and that the foreign statement governed as between the assured and the underwriters. (Ct. of App.) The Mary Thomas 495

12. Loss by perils insured against—Proximate cause—Tug—Damage by collision with any object—Consequential injury.—A tug was insured against "the risk of collision and damage received in collision with any object." The policy did not include the perils of the sea. The tug ran against a floating snag which did it considerable injury, including damage to the engine-room machinery, and amongst other things broke the cover of the condenser, leaving an opening about twenty square inches in area. The tug commenced leaking, and there being danger that the water would come into the ship through the ejection pipes and the hole in the condenser cover, the pipes were plugged from the outside. While she was being towed to a place of repair, a plug came out and the water rushed into the engine-room through the ejection pipes and the hole in the condenser cover, and she began to fill rapidly. An attempt to again plug the ejection pipes failed, and the vessel sank. Held, that the collision, and not the towing, was the proximate cause of the loss, and that the insurers were liable under the policy for a total loss. (Ct. of App.) Reischer v. Borwick 493

13. Payment — Brokers — Bills for amount due — Direct liability.—Policies of insurance upon certain of the plaintiffs' ships were effected with the defendants by a firm of insurance brokers on behalf of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs subsequently authorised the brokers to settle their claim against the defendants under these policies, and to receive payment in cash in accordance with the recognised custom. Instead of cash the brokers took a bill of exchange at three months in payment of a general account including the plaintiff's. This bill was discounted and was eventually paid by the defendants. The brokers failed and did not pay the plaintiffs. In an action to recover the money the underwriters were held liable because the taking of the bill was not within the authority conferred upon the brokers by the plaintiffs and was contrary to the recognised business custom, and because the bill even when discounted did not constitute a payment to the plaintiffs. (Ct. of App.) Hine Brothers v. Steamship Insurance Syndicate Limited ...page 558

14. Re-insurance—Nonpayment by original insurers —Liability. — Where an insurance company, having re-insured a ship under a policy "subject to the same terms and conditions as the original policy or policies and to pay as may be paid thereon," became liable to pay the assured but being in liquidation had not done so, payment by the original insurers is not a condition precedent to payment by the re-insurers and the re-insurers are liable under their policy. (Ch. Div.) Eddystone Marine Insurance Company, Re; Ex parte Western Marine Insurance Company 167

15. Separate packages—Average recoverable separately or on the whole—Damage to part—Examination of the whole—Expenses.—The plaintiff shipped a number of cases of galvanised iron for carriage from Bristol to London, there to be transshipped by barges to another vessel for export to Australia. The goods were insured for the voyage from Bristol up to and including the transshipment, and by the policy average was agreed to be recoverable on each package separately or on the whole. In a storm upon the insured voyage most of the cases were wetted by salt water, and in London the plaintiff had them all landed and examined. All the cases were unpacked; and those in which the iron was found to be undamaged were repacked and exported, while those in which the iron was damaged were sold by auction. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to be reimbursed by the underwriters only for the loss upon the cases in which the iron had been damaged, and was, therefore, not entitled to the expenses incurred by him in the examination of those cases of iron to which no damage had in fact occurred. (Ct. of App.) Lysaght v. Coleman and another 552

16. Stranding—Free from general and particular average unless stranded—Cargo not on board—Particular average loss.—Policies of insurance on two parcels of rice effected by plaintiffs with defendants contained the ordinary memorandum by which rice is warranted "free from average unless general, or the ship be stranded," &c., and a special memorandum as follows: "Warranted free from particular average unless the ship be stranded, &c. The rice was to be carried in a French ship, and during the voyage she was damaged in a storm and some of the rice was jettisoned, and some more was condemned and sold at a port where the vessel put in for repairs. While the cargo was on shore the vessel stranded and was lost, and the rest of the cargo was forwarded in a British ship, some of it being damaged en route by perils of the sea. Plaintiffs paid freight pro rata itineris, according to French law, on all the rice discharged from the French ship. The defendants paid their proportion of general average and forwarding charges, but resisted the plaintiffs' claim for a particular average loss on the damaged rice, including the pro rata freight charged against it. Held, that, as the stranding occurred when the goods insured were not on board the vessel, the warranty against particular average remained good, and therefore the defendants were not liable. (Adm. Div.) The Alsace and Lorraine .....page 362

17. Stranding—Particular average—Part cargo shipped — Valued policy — Advance freight.— Where in a policy of marine insurance the subject matter was described as "26,910 bags of maize from A., 6065*l* at 1 per cent.; 8299 bags of maize from B., 1875*l* at seven-eighths per cent," the goods being valued at "7940*l* (included 1361*l* 8*s*. 6*d*. advance on freight)," and the policy covered all risk of craft and contained a warranty against particular average unless the ship or craft be stranded, the stranding of the ships while the 26,910 bags were on board and before the 8200 bags were on board was held not to let in a claim for particular average caused by sea perils after all the cargo was on board on the 8299 bags shipped at B, such bags not being at risk in the ship when the ship stranded; and such policy being treated as one policy upon valued goods, and not as a policy by which advanced freight was separately insured, it was held that the particular average loss on the 26,910 bags was to be calculated upon the full amount of 7942*l*. (Q. B. Div.) Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Co., v. Pitts, Son, and King 302

18. Tug let on hire—Agreement to insure and indemnify—Extent of liability.—In an agreement by which a tug-owner agreed to let his tug, it was provided that the owner would fully insure and keep insured the tug against certain specified risks, including risk of collision causing damage to the tug or other craft; and, further, that if at any time during the continuance of the agreement any of the risks covered should happen, the tug-owner would indemnify the hirer in respect of all such damage to the extent of all moneys received by him under the insurance. The owner effected policies to cover the specified risks for 2000*l*., leaving 800*l*., the balance of the agreed value of the tug, uninsured. A barge employed by the hirers of the tug coming into collision, whilst in tow of the tug, with a steamship at anchor, an action was brought by the owners of the steamship against the hirers of the tug. The latter admitted liability, and the damages were assessed by the registrar. The tug-owner sent in a claim to the underwriters who refused to pay. In an action by the hirers against the owners of the tug for repayment to them under the contract of the amount of damages paid and costs incurred by them in consequence of the proceedings by the colliding steamship, or, in the alternative, for such amount as damages for breach of the contract: Held, that the defendant, the tug-owner, was only liable to indemnify the hirer to the extent of any moneys received by him under the policies, that he was under no obligation to sue the underwriters, and that as he had received no moneys he was under no liability to the hirers. (Adm. Div.) Williams, Torrey, and Field Limited, v. Knight 500

19. Valued policy—Freight—Homeward voyage—Damage on outward voyage—Detention—Freight falling—Loss.—Plaintiffs, owners of a steamship, then on an outward voyage, effected a policy of insurance on freight, at an agreed valuation, in the said vessel on her homeward voyage, the insurance to commence from the loading of the cargo. The vessel met with an accident on her outward voyage, and was detained at the port of discharge for repairs, during which time freights fell. Some cargo was engaged, before the date of the policy, for the homeward voyage, of which part was loaded at the original rate of freight, and the remainder cancelled. More cargo was from time to time shipped at much lower rates than were current at the time the policy was effected, and the vessel eventually sailed with a full cargo. She was destroyed by fire in the course of the voyage, and the freight, less an advance, was lost: Held, that the policy covered the freight at risk, and that the valuation was binding upon both parties, and could not be opened. MARINE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION.

Rules—Membership—Right to sue—Agent.—The defendant association was a company limited by guarantee, and its objects were the mutual insurance by the association of the ships of the members, and of ships which the members might be authorised to insure in their own names, and of ships in which they may be otherwise interested, and of the freights of such ships, and every person became a member who, on behalf of himself or any other person or persons, insured or entered for protection any ship in the association, and ceased to be a member as soon as he no longer had any ship under insurance or protection in the association: and all claims were to be enforced against the association only, and not against any members thereof, and the association was not to be liable to any member or other person for the amount of any loss, except to the extent of the funds which the association could recover from the members or persons liable for the same. The managers and agents of a certain ship effected with the defendant association by a deed-poll, a policy of insurance upon the ship and freight. While this policy was in force the ship became a total loss. In an action by the plaintiffs as part owners of the ship, suing on behalf of themselves and the other co-owners of the ship, to recover the loss: Held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to maintain the action, as their primâ facie right to sue as undisclosed principals was taken away by the express terms of the contract, and as the rules and articles of association of the company which were incorporated with the policy, showed that it was the intention of the parties that the association should deal only with "members" in respect of the settlement of losses, and that in this case the agents who entered the ship for insurance, were the "members" of the association in respect of such ship, and not the plaintiffs. MASTER'S WAGES AND DISBURSEMENTS.

1. Disbursements—Maritime lien—Merchant Shipping Act 1889—Authority of master—Owner's or charterer's credit—Lien on freight.—The Merchant Shipping Act 1889 gives a maritime lien on the ship to the master for disbursements on account of the ship only in cases in which he has authority to pledge the credit of the owner, and does not extend to disbursements for things which the charterer, and not the owner, was bound to provide under a charter-party. There can be no lien on freight where there is not a lien on the ship in respect of the same debt. (H. of L.) Morgan v. Castlegate Steamship Company; The Castlegate ..... page 284

2. Disbursements—Maritime lien—Payments by masters—Bill at owner's request before coaling.—Where a master of a ship by arrangement with his owners, paid before his ship sailed from this country, for coal supplied to his ship by a bill of exchange upon his owners in favour of the vendor of the coals, and the bill of exchange was not met by the owners; it was held in an action in rem by the master to recover the amount of his liability under sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1889 that as this was not a liability incurred by him in his office as master, he had no maritime lien in respect of his liability under the bill of exchange. (Ct. of App. affirming Adm. Div.) The Orienta 508, 529

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS.

1. Overloading—Fault of master—Ignorance of owner—Liability.—Where a British ship whilst in a foreign port was so loaded by her master as to submerge the centre of her disc, and her owner was not informed or aware of such fact, the owner was held not to have committed a breach of sect. 28 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, which forbids the submersion of the centre of the disc, as there was no evidence to show that the owner had allowed her to be overloaded. (Q. B. D.) Massey (app.) v. Morriss (resp.) 586

2. Registration—Passenger certificate—Launch—Artificial lake.—An electric launch of about 3 tons burthen which carried passengers for hire on pleasure trips on an artificial lake in a park was held not to be "a vessel engaged in navigation" within the meaning of sect. 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and hence her owners cannot be convicted under sect. 318 of the Act for failing to exhibit in some conspicuous part of the vessel the duplicate of a certificate issued by the Board of Trade for such vessel. MORTGAGOR AND MORTGAGEE.

Charterers—First and second mortgagees—Sale—Several rights—Certificate of registry.—A shipowner agreed with the defendants to provide a ship (then building) which should be run and worked by them as charterers in their line under their control and discretion. The agreement was to continue in force for five years, and was to be binding on the owner's executors and administrators. The ship was completed and registered on the 3rd Jan. 1891. On the 5th Jan. in the same year she was mortgaged by the owner to a company to secure an account current. The mortgagees had no notice of the engagements subsisting with the defendants. On the 30th Nov. 1892 the owner gave a second mortgage on the ship to the plaintiff to secure an account current. The plaintiff was aware of the existence of the contract with the defendants, and inferred that the terms were onerous. On the 17th Oct. 1893 the owner died, and the first mortgagees took possession of the ship, and transferred her by a bill of sale to the plaintiff. At the time of the sale the plaintiff knew the terms of the agreement under which the ship was being worked in the defendants' line. Subsequently the plaintiff entered into a contract to sell the ship to a firm which knew the nature of the contract with the defendants. The plaintiff moved for an order that the defendants should deliver up to him the certificate of registry of the ship. It was agreed to turn the motion into the trial of the action without pleadings, and that the defendants should be taken to have applied for an injunction restraining the plaintiff from dealing with the ship in a manner contrary to the provision of the agreement. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to have the certificate of registry delivered up to him. The defendants' application for an injunction was refused upon the ground that the first mortgagees, who had no notice of the ship's engagements, were entitled to realise their security by selling the ship free of her engagements, and that the plaintiff, although he had notice of her engagements, was entitled to the same rights as were possessed by his vendors, the first mortgagees. NECESSARIES.

1. Jurisdiction — Broker's commission — Charter-party—Future voyage.—A broker's commission on a charter-party for a future voyage effected while the ship is at sea under another charter is not a necessary within the meaning of sect. 6 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, and hence the Admiralty Court has no jurisdiction to entertain an action in rem in respect thereof. (Adm. Div.) The Marianne 34

2. Jurisdiction—Foreign ship—Foreign port—High seas.—The High Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction over a claim in respect of necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in a foreign port, even although that port be not upon the high seas. (Ct. of App.) The Mecca 529

PERSONAL INJURY.

1. Common employment—Master and crew.—The captain and crew employed by a shipowner in the navigation of a ship are fellow-servants engaged in a common employment, and therefore the owner is not liable for negligence of the captain which causes injury or death to one of the crew. (H. of L.) Hedley v. Pinkney and Sons' Steamship Company Limited 483

2. Common employment—Negligence—Master and servant—Liability.—Where a defendant has committed negligence by one of his servants, resulting in injury to the plaintiff, the defence of common employment is not open to him if he cannot show that the plaintiff was also his servant at the time of the occurrence of the injury. (P. C.) Cameron and another v. Nystrom 320

3. Injury to stevedore—Negligence of crew—Common employment—Liability.—Where by a contract between a shipowner and a stevedore it was agreed that the shipowner should "provide for each hatch being discharged, one winch driver, and one hatchman," the shipowner is liable to the stevedore's labourers for injury caused by the negligence of one of the winchmen, who was one of the crew of the ship, there being no common employment between the winchmen and the stevedore labourers. (P.C.) Union Steamship Company v. Claridge ..... page 412

4. Master and servant — Liability — Stevedore — Shipowner.—Where a stevedore had contracted to discharge a vessel for a lump sum, the fact that the master of the vessel had control over some of the incidents of the discharge held not to make the servants of the stevedore the servants of the shipowner so as to free the stevedore from liability for injury to one of the seamen caused by their negligence. (P.C.) Cameron and another v. Nystrom 320

5. Stevedore—Shipowner—Negligence of shipowner—Liability of stevedore—Recovery over.—A workmen in the employment of the plaintiffs, a firm of stevedores, whilst unloading a cargo for the plaintiffs, was injured owing to the defective state of one of the chains provided by the defendant, the owner of the ship being discharged. The workman sued the plaintiffs under the Employers Liability Act, for damages for personal injuries, and the plaintiffs properly settled his claim by the payment to him of 125*l*. The defect in the chain might have been discovered by the plaintiffs by the exercise of reasonable care. Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover that sum from the defendant, as the injury to the workman was the natural consequence of the defendant's breach of contract. PILOTAGE.

1. Conviction—Unlicensed pilot—Pilot as magistrate.—C., an unlicensed pilot, was convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction under sect. 361 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, of having continued in charge of a ship after a qualified pilot had offered to take charge of her. M., one of the six justices who sat to hear and determine the case, was a duly qualified pilot and licensed for the same pilotage district, but for more than forty years he had been a "choice" pilot, that is, a pilot chosen and engaged beforehand by shipowners, and for the last nineteen years he had been, and was at the date of the conviction, in the service of a large steamship company, who were entitled to his exclusive services, and who never employed unlicensed pilots. Held, that, as M. belonged to a small class of privileged persons for whose protection the proceedings were taken, there was such a reasonable apprehension of bias as to disqualify him from sitting, and that therefore the conviction was bad. exempted ships, and the master refused his services, the master is not liable to a penalty under sect. 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, inasmuch as the pilot is not qualified to take charge of the ship. (Q. B. Div.) Stafford v. Dyer .....page 568

PRACTICE.

1. Adding parties—Order XVI., rr. 2 and 11—Collision.—The court has power under Order XVI., rr. 2 and 11, in a collision action in personam tried in the Admiralty Division, to add or substitute new plaintiffs after judgment, but before the reference to assess the damages. (Ct. of App.) The Duke of Buccleugh..... 294

2. Adding parties—Order XVI., rr. 2 and 11—After appeal.—In a collision action in personam by owners of ship and cargo, which, having been carried to the House of Lords, resulted in a decision in favour of the plaintiffs, the name of the cargo owner's agent was by mistake inserted in the writ as a plaintiff. Prior to the reference to assess damages this mistake was discovered, and on application to substitute the name of the real cargo owner: Held, that the court had power, under Order XVI., rr. 2 and 11, to grant the application, and that in the circumstances it ought to be made. (Ct. of App.) The Duke of Buccleugh 294

3. Appeal—County Court — Admiralty Court — Leave.—Where a judgment of the County Court in Admiralty has been altered by the Admiralty Division, an appeal lies without leave to the Court of Appeal. (Ct. of App.) The Dart 353

4. Appeal—County Court—Admiralty Divisional Court—No notes—Re-examination of witnesses.—Where an appeal is brought from a County Court, and no note of the evidence or proceedings in that court has been taken, a Divisional Court has jurisdiction to order that the witnesses of both parties called and examined in the County Court be produced and examined at the hearing of the appeal, care being taken to prevent the appeal assuming the form of a new trial. (Ct. of App.) The Crescent 297

5. Appeal—House of Lords—Question of fact.—The House of Lords will only reverse the concurrent finding of two courts below upon a question of fact if it is clearly demonstrated that such finding is erroneous, not upon a balance of probabilities. (H. of L.) The P. Caland 317

6. Appeal—Privy Council—Security for costs—Privy Council Rules 1865—Vice-Admiralty Court Rules 1883.—Rule 15 of the Privy Council Rules of 1865, regulating appellate procedure from Vice-Admiralty Courts, by which an appellant is required to give bail in 200*l.* to answer the costs of appeal, is not impliedly repealed by rule 150 of the Vice-Admiralty Court Rules of 1883, by which an appellant may be required to give security not exceeding 300*l.* for the costs of the appeal, but the Judicial Committee has a discretion in fitting cases to dispense the appellant from giving security under rule 15 of the Privy Council Rules 1865. (P. C.) The Hesketh 160

7. Arbitrator — Remitting to arbitrator — Fresh evidence discovered.—The discovery of new evidence since the award, which the arbitrator may consider material to the matter in dispute, is a ground upon which the court may properly remit the matters referred to the reconsideration of the arbitrator under section 10 of the Arbitration Act 1889. (Ct. of App.) Re an Arbitration between Keighley, Maxted, and Co. and Bryan, Durant, and Co. .....page 268

8. Costs—Action under County Court limits—Right to—Discretion—Circumstances.—Whether successful plaintiffs who having instituted a collision action in the High Court recover less than 300*l.* will be allowed costs depends upon the particular circumstances of each case, and if the circumstances are such that the court thinks the plaintiffs acted reasonably in instituting the action in the High Court, they will be entitled to costs. (Adm.) The Saltburn..... 325

9. Costs—Attendance—Country solicitor—Discretion—Reviewing taxation.—The registrar, in taxing the costs in an Admiralty action between party and party, has a discretion in allowing or disallowing the costs of the attendance of the country solicitor at the trial in London. The facts that the country solicitor has had the conduct of the case, and has taken the statements of the witnesses, are circumstances which may justify the allowance of his attendance at the trial. Where such costs had been disallowed the matter was referred back to the registrar to review this taxation. (Adm.) The Soto 335

10. Costs—Refreshers—When entitled to.—Where a trial, which extended over seven and a half hours, commenced one day and was concluded the next day, the Court upheld the registrar in allowing refreshers to the counsel of the successful litigant, although it lasted less than five hours on the first day. (Adm. Div.) The Courier 157

11. County Court action—Transfer—Other actions in High Court—Rights and order of sharing.—Quære: Whether if a judgment has been obtained in the County Court, and the action is afterwards transferred to the High Court, such a judgment would give priority over claimants in suits pending in the High Court, or whether the plaintiff in the County Court action should only be admitted to share in the proceeds in the High Court on terms of equality with the suitors in that court. 12. Default action—Reference.—In a default action in rem the Admiralty Court will not before judgment refer the plaintiffs' claim to the registrar for assessment. (Adm. Div.) The Titia..... 32

13. Examination of witnesses—Transcript of evidence—Amendment of.—Where witnesses in an Admiralty action are examined before an examiner, and their evidence is taken down by a shorthand-writer and the transcript of such evidence is filed, the Court will, if there is reasonable ground for believing the transcript to be inaccurate, entertain an application to take the transcript off the file and return it to the examiner for amendment so as to make it correspond with the evidence actually given. (Adm. Div.) The Knutsford.... 33

14. Fund in court—Right to claim against—After decree.—Semble, Whilst in an action in rem the proceeds of the vessel remain in court, an unconditional decreee can be modified so as to let in others who, without laches, put forward claims of a like character. (Adm.) The Africano..... 427

15. Joinder of causes of action—Order XVI., r. 1.—Order XVI., r. 1, deals only with the parties to an action, and has no reference to the joinder of several causes of action. (H. of L.) Smurthwaite and others v. Hannay and others..... 485

16. Jurisdiction—Court of passage—Action for debt—Seaman's wages—Registrar's order for payment.—An order made by the Judge of the Court of Passage of the City of Liverpool under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1869, providing that in Admiralty actions brought in the Court of Passage to recover a debt or liquidated demand the registrar may, if the plaintiff satisfy him by affidavit that there is no defence to the action, make an order empowering the plaintiff to enter up judgment and proceed to execution thereon is ultra vires, and hence in an action for seamen's wages the registrar has no power to decree that the defendants should pay the sum claimed. 17. Jurisdiction—Founding—Service of writ in rem—No arrest—Default—Due service of a writ in rem, without arrest of the ship, is sufficient notice to the persons interested to found jurisdiction and to enable the court to pronounce judgment by default against them. 18. Jurisdiction—Service of writ—No arrest—Removal of ship—Default.—Where in an action in rem for damage to cargo, the defendant's ship, after being served with a writ, but before being arrested, was secretly removed out of the jurisdiction, the Court gave judgment by default for the plaintiff's claim. (Adm. Div.) The Nautik..... 591

19. Non-joinder of parties—Co-contractor—One resident out of jurisdiction—When one co-contractor is a foreign resident out of the jurisdiction, the other co-contractor who has been sued alone is not entitled as of right to an order that his co-contractor shall be joined as a defendant, but the court or a judge has a discretion whether they will, under the circumstances of the case, make such order or not. (Ct. of App.) Wilson, Son, and Co. v. Balcarses Brook Steamship Company..... 321

20. Non-joinder of parties—Shipowner and Charterer—Disbursement—Joint Liability—Residence out of jurisdiction.—Where plaintiff claims for disbursements made on account of a ship, a defendant (the shipowner) cannot claim, as a matter of right, to have his joint contractor (the charterer, who has guaranteed the disbursements) added as a co-defendant under Order XVI., r. 11, when the joint contractor is a foreigner residing out of the jurisdiction. (Q.B.D.) Wilson, Son, and Co. v. Killick and others 275

21. Non-joinder of parties—Abatement—Resident out of jurisdiction.—Pilley v. Robinson (58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 110; 20 Q. B. Div. 155) only applies to cases where, under the old practice before the Judicature Acts, a plea in abatement could have been put forward, and that could not be done if the joint contractor whose non-joinder was complained of was a foreigner residing out of the jurisdiction. (Q. B Div.) Wilson, Son, and Co. v. Killick and others 275

22. Production of documents—Scotch action—Examination—Power to order production—The production of documents under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 82, s. 5, is only auxiliary to the examination of witnesses, and hence in an action pending in Scotland with regard to the sale of a ship the High Court of Justice in England has no jurisdiction to order the Chairman and Secretary of Lloyd's, not parties to the litigation to appear before a commissioner in London not for the purpose of being examined but merely to produce certain documents in their control. (Ct. of App.) Burchard and others v. McFarlane; Ex parte Tindall and Dryhurst .....page 93

23. Prohibition—Admiralty—Inferior court—Injunction.—The Admiralty Division has power to grant a prohibition with reference to a matter pending before an inferior court and also to issue an injunction to a party proceeding in an inferior court from going on with such proceedings. (Adm. Div.) The Teresa..... 505

24. Prohibition—Appeal—Admiralty.—An appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from an order of a judge of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, refusing a writ of prohibition. (Ct. of App.) The Recepta..... 359

25. Prohibition — Appeal — Admiralty — County Court action—County Courts Act 1888, sect. 132.—An application for prohibition by a party to a County Court Admiralty action was made in chambers under sect. 127 of the County Courts Act 1888, to a judge of the Admiralty Division, and refused. The applicant wishing to appeal, the judge granted him leave to appeal direct to the Court of Appeal without further argument in court. On the appeal coming on the respondent took the objection that, by sect. 132 of the County Courts Act 1888, there was in such a case no appeal to the Court of Appeal from the decision of the Admiralty Division: Held, that there was an appeal. (Ct. of App.) The Recepta..... 359

26. Prohibition—Jurisdiction—Admiralty Division.—The Admiralty Division has jurisdiction to grant prohibition, and an application may be made to the judge in chambers for it. (Ct. of App.) The Recepta..... 359

27. Service out of the jurisdiction—Performance within—Place of payment not named—Order XI., r 1 (e).—In order to bring a case within Order XI., r. 1 (e), so as to justify service out of the jurisdiction, the court must see, either in the written words themselves or in those words coupled with the surrounding circumstances, that the contract in question is one which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction. Where money is payable under a contract, and no place of payment is named in it, the case is not brought within the rule by the fact that the person to whom the money is payable is resident within the jurisdiction. (Ct. of App.) Bell and Co. v. Antwerp, London, and Brazil Line 154

28. Service out of the jurisdiction—Place of performance—Salvage—Contract—Payment—Where to be made.—A German ship belonging to a German company carrying on business in Germany, having stranded on the English coast, her master entered into a written contract with a German and Swedish salvage company, by which they undertook to get the ship off and to convey her to Southampton against "a salvage reward or compensation" of 50 per cent. of the value of the salved property, the value in case of difference to be settled by arbitration, the money to be paid to the German salvage company, who were to have a lien upon the ship and cargo. No place of payment was named in the contract. The ship was got off, and delivered to her owners in Southampton. The value was ascertained by arbitration held in Germany. In these circumstances the Swedish company commenced an action in personam in the Admiralty Division against the German shipowners to recover their proportion of the salvage money due under the contract, and now sought to obtain leave under Order XI., r. 1 (e) to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction. Held (affirming Sir Francis Jeune), that there was no breach of contract which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, and hence the plaintiffs were not entitled to serve notice of the writ upon the defendants out of the jurisdiction. (Ct. of App.) The Eider .....page 354

29. Solicitor's lien—Costs—Charge upon fund—Conflicting rights.—A. having threatened to sue B. on a dishonoured bill of exchange, B. agreed to give him a charge on certain money which B.'s solicitors were taking proceedings to recover from two insurance companies, on two separate policies of insurance on a ship. The charge was prepared by B.'s solicitors, after an interview at which A. and B. were also present, and the solicitors sent it to A. in a letter, in which, "in pursuance of the inclosed written charge," they undertook out of any moneys received by them from either the S. Association or the M. Association under the policies to hand over to A., "after payment of the legal charges," so much of the amount recovered from the said association (sic) as might be sufficient to repay him the amount secured by the charge. The proceedings against the M. Association were compromised on the association agreeing to pay a certain sum. Some time afterwards the S. Association obtained judgment in their favour. Held (reversing Kekewich, J.), that the undertaking given by B.'s solicitors could not be construed as entitling them to payment of their legal charges in respect of the proceedings relating to both policies; and that the undertaking was not inconsistent with the general principle as to a solicitor's right of lien. (Ct. of App.) MacKenzie v. Macintosh 14, 53

30. Solicitor's lien—Fund recovered—Deeds and documents—Difference. A difference exists between the lien of a solicitor on a fund recovered for his client in an action and on deeds coming into his possession, inasmuch as in the former case he has no lien for all costs due to him from his client, but only for the costs of recovering that particular fund; and even where the solicitor actually gets the fund into his possession he obtains no greater lien than if it had remained in court. (Ct. of App. reversing Kekewich J.) MacKenzie v. Macintosh 14, 53

31. Tender — Admiralty — Effect — Offer — Order XXII.—Less found due—Payment out.—A tender, according to the old Admiralty practice, is nothing more than an offer, and it was not intended by Order XXII. to alter this practice, or to assimilate it to the technical rules regulating tender at common law; hence, where in a collision action the defendants having agreed to pay a percentage of the plaintiffs' damages, tendered a sum which the registrar found to be in excess of the sum due to the plaintiffs, the Court refused to order payment out of court to the plaintiffs of the whole of the tender, and only gave them the amount found due by the registrar. (Adm.) The Mona 478

32. Wrongful arrest—Action for.—Semble, an action lies at common law for the malicious arrest of a ship by Admiralty process. (Adm Div.) The Walter D. Wallett 398

33. Wrongful arrest — Damages — Action for—Grounds.—Where a ship is wrongfully arrested by Admiralty process, an action will lie in Admiralty without proof of actual damage, if the arrest was made malâ fide or crassâ negligentiâ so as to imply malice. (Adm. Div.) The Walter D. Wallett 398

PRIORITIES.

Several judgments in rem—Various duties—Distribution pro ratâ—Fund in court—Where a vessel has been sold in an action in rem for necessaries, and judgment given for the plaintiffs without prejudice to other claims against the vessel, and reserving all questions of priority of such claims, the court will order a pro ratâ distribution of the proceeds among all claimants for necessaries, irrespective of the dates of the institution of their suits, as the court holds the property not only for the first plaintiff, but for all creditors of the same class who assert their claims before an unconditional decree is pronounced. SALE OF GOODS.

1. Passing of property—Conversion—Waiver of right—Interest.—The plaintiffs N. and Co. engaged with the defendants, who were shipowners, for the shipment of a large quantity of oil to Montreal during the season, and it was arranged that the defendants were to receive no goods on board unless a clean receipt were given. The plaintiff A. sold fifty barrels of oil to N. and Co., and delivered them to the defendants. The defendants received the oil, but refused to give a clean receipt for it. The plaintiff A. demanded re-delivery, which the defendants refused, as other cargo had been stowed on the top of it. N. and Co. having agreed to pay A. for the oil in cash in exchange for mate's receipt, refused to pay for the fifty barrels. A. brought an action against the defendants for conversion, and afterwards amended the writ by adding N. and Co. The consignees at Montreal accepted the oil and paid N. and Co., who thereupon paid A. Held, that A. had waived the right of saying that the property in the goods had not passed to N. and Co., and therefore, since the goods were not his at the time that re-delivery was refused, no action lay for conversion; and further, that no action lay for his loss of interest through the delay in payment to him of the price of the goods. (Ct. of App.) Armstrong and others v. Allan Brothers... 293

2. Contract for specific quantity—Shipment of excess—Bill of lading for more or less than contract—Refusal to accept.—By a contract in writing K. bought from B. "about 3000 tons of wheat (10 per cent more or less) to be shipped by steamer" from India, payment to be made by cash in London within seven days from delivery of invoice in exchange for bill or bills of lading. In the contract there was the following clause: "Sellers have option of shipping less than the minimum quantity, in which case the price of the quantity short shipped of the medium quantity will be settled at the value of the day of the appropriation. Sellers can also exceed the maximum quantity, in which case the excess over the medium quantity will remain for their account." B. informed K. that 3800 tons had been shipped on the Bombay, and that he appropriated 3000 tons of that shipment to the contract with K., and he subsequently sent K. an invoice for 3000 tons ex Bombay. The bills of lading of the 3800 tons were two for 1750 tons each and two for 250 tons each. B. offered to deliver to K. either all the bills of lading or two for 1750 tons each, but B. refused to accept the tender or to pay any part of the price: Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that the buyers were entitled to delivery of a bill or bills of lading for the amount of wheat which they had bought and were entitled to refuse the tender made by the sellers. (Ct. of App.) Keighley, Maxted, and Co. v. Bryant, Durant, and Co. ..... page 418

SALVAGE.

1. Agent—Amount of reward—Payment in any event.—An agent may claim as a salvor, but where the owners of the salved property authorise him to engage or render assistance, and are liable to pay him some remuneration for what he has done, even though his services prove unsuccessful, the court in awarding him salvage for successful services, will take such fact into account, and not award so large a sum as it would to a salvor who ran the risk of getting nothing for his expenditure should he prove unsuccessful. (Adm.) The Kate B. Jones..... 332

2. Agreement for fixed sum—Exorbitance—Not on equal terms.—Where salvors claim a fixed sum under an agreement, the court will not give effect to it if it appears that the parties to it did not contract on equal terms, and that the agreed sum is exorbitant, and will in such circumstances award the salvors such sum as it thinks just. (Adm. Div.) The Rialto..... 35

3. Agreement for fixed sum—Setting aside.—A steamship in the Atlantic fell in with another which had broken her main shaft. It was agreed in writing between the masters that the owners of the ship in distress should pay the salvors 6000*l.* for being towed to the nearest port or anchorage. The master of the vessel in distress had reason for believing that unless he consented to such terms the salvors would not assist. The salvage was successfully accomplished without special difficulty or danger; the distance towed was about 450 miles. The value of the salved property was 38,768*l.* In a salvage action to recover the 6000*l.*, or such sum as the court thought just, the Court refused to uphold the agreement and awarded 3000*l.* and costs. (Adm. Div.) The Rialto 35

4. Agreement to attempt to salve—Failure to place in safety—Right to reward.—Plaintiffs in a salvage action left a vessel ultimately saved by other salvors in a worse position than that in which they picked her up. The Court having found that there was an agreement that the plaintiffs should endeavour to tow her to a place of safety for a remuneration to be fixed on shore: Held that the plaintiffs, having performed the agreement, although not entitled to salvage, were entitled to remuneration for what they had done. (Adm. Div.) The Lepanto..... page 192

5. Agreement to tow into port—Payment in any event—Effect in amount.—When before rendering salvage service, an agreement was entered into that the disabled steamer should be towed into port, if possible, by the salving steamer, and whatever services were rendered and loss of time should be settled between the respective owners, the Court, in estimating the amount of award, Held, that the agreement was to be taken into account as an element reducing the award, as it was open to the construction that the salvors were entitled to some remuneration even though their services were unsuccessful. (Adm.) The Edenmore 334

6. Agreement to tow into safety—Partial performance — Ultimate safety — Right to reward.—Plaintiffs in a salvage action left a vessel ultimately saved by other salvors in a position somewhat better than that in which they first picked her up. There was an agreement in writing that the plaintiffs should tow the vessel to a place of safety for a specified sum, but this agreement the plaintiffs failed to carry out. Held, that, although the plaintiffs had failed to perform the specific agreement, notwithstanding that such performance though difficult was not impossible, they had rendered some beneficial service which contributed to the safety of the vessel, and were therefore entitled to remuneration for what they had done. (Adm. Div.) The Hestia 599

7. Agreement to dock ship—Vessel grounding—Towed off—No immediate risk—Services within contract.—Where the owners of a tug contracted to tow a vessel from sea and dock her, and while manœuvring to enter the dock the vessel grounded, and was towed off by the tug, the Court refused to award salvage on the ground that the vessel was never in any immediate danger, and that the tug had not run any risk or performed any service beyond what was contemplated by the parties when they entered into the towage contract. (Adm.) The Liverpool..... 340

8. Appeal—Amount—Reduction—Increase.—In salvage cases, the Court of Appeal will vary the amount of the award, if, after carefully considering the evidence and giving every possible weight to the view of the judge below, it thinks that the amount is so large as to be unjust to the owners of the salved property, or so small as to be unjust to the salvors. (Ct. of App.) The Accomac..... 153

9. Collision—Damage—Deduction from award.—When salvors, whilst rendering services, by want of skill brought their ship into collision with the salved ship, and did her damage amounting to about 400*l.*, the Court, in awarding salvage, deducted such sum from the award. (Adm. Div.) The Dwina..... 173

10. Derelict crew leaving ship—On board salving ship.—Where during the performance of salvage services the master and crew of the salved ship went and remained on board the salving ship which put men on the salved ship to steer her, the Court refused to treat the salved ship as a derelict and award salvage on that basis. (Adm. Div.) The Lepanto..... 192

11. Distribution—Share of persons not navigating.—Where a large steamer carrying a doctor, stewardess, baker, and other persons of an analogous description, who took no part in navigating the ship, was awarded 12,000*l.* for salvage services, the Court, in apportioning it, ordered that the above-mentioned members of the crew should only have a half share according to their rating. (Adm. Div.) The Spree ..... page 397

12. Fire—Tender—Amount of award—Services in dock.—A fire broke out on board a vessel which was lying alongside a jetty at the entrance to a dock. The vessel was under repairs, with no steam up, and had no one but her master and a watchman on board. At the request of the master a steamship, which had just arrived, hove alongside, and, getting her hose on board the burning vessel, extinguished the fire which, if it had remained unchecked, would have caused very serious damage. The services were such as might have been rendered by a fire engine on shore. The value of the salved vessel was 9500*l.* The defendants tendered 200*l.* The Court upheld the tender, being of opinion that the services were not of such a character as to require that the award should be assessed upon the same liberal principles as obtain in the ordinary cases of sea salvage rendered by one ship to another. (Adm. Div.) The City of Newcastle 546

13. Insurance premium — Extra for prohibited port—To be considered.—Where salvors proved that by reason of the services they had to pay an extra premium to their underwriters to waive a breach of warranty in taking the salved ship into a port prohibited by their policy, the Court held that such payment was an element for consideration in assessing the award. (Adm.) The Edenmore 334

14. Misconduct of salvors—Refusal to give up to master—Forfeiture.—Where salvors having taken possession of a vessel which had got ashore and been temporarily abandoned by her master and crew in order to get tug assistance, refused to allow her master and crew on board, and remained in possession on board whilst the tugs provided by the master towed the ship into a place of safety: The Court held that there had been such misconduct as to work a total forfeiture of award, although the plaintiffs had in the absence of the master and crew laid out two anchors which contributed to the vessel's ultimate safety. (Adm. Div.). The Capella 158

15. Practice — Amendment of writ — Amount awarded greater than claimed—Action in rem*—Bail—Execution against defendants personally.*—Where in a salvage action in rem claiming 5000*l.*, in which the defendant's solicitors gave a written undertaking to appear and put in bail in an amount not exceeding 5000*l.*, the Court awarded 7500*l.*, and subsequently ordered the indorsement on the writ to be amended by altering the claim from 5000*l.* to 8500*l.*, the plaintiffs were allowed to issue execution against the defendants personally for the amount of the award, and were not restricted to the amount named in the undertaking to put in bail. (Adm. Div.) The Dictator 251

16. Practice—Appeal—Costs—Reduction of award.—Where a salvage award is reduced on appeal it is a general, though not a hard and fast rule, to give no costs of the appeal. (Ct. of App.) The Gipsy Queen 568

17. Practice—Appraised value—Sale for less—Basis of award.—Where the defendants in a salvage action had allowed the court to proceed to award salvage upon the marshal's appraisement, the Court refused to vary the decree merely because, after the decree, for some reason unexplained, the property was sold and realised much less than the appraised value. (Adm.; affirmed on appeal.) The Georg ..... page 476

18. Practice — Consolidation — Convenience — Economy.—The considerations which lead the Court to order consolidation in salvage suits are those of convenience and economy without regard to the consent of the parties, provided it can be done without injustice to the different claimants. (Adm. Div.) The Strathgarry 573

19. Practice—Shipowners within jurisdiction—Cargo owners without—Service of notice.—Where salvage services have been rendered to ship and cargo, and an action is commenced in personam to recover for such services against the shipowners resident within the jurisdiction, the Court may join the cargo owners resident out of the jurisdiction, and give leave, under Order XI., r. 1 (g), to serve notice of the writ upon them. (Adm. Div.) The Elton 66

20. Seamen's shares—Agreement—Merchant Shipping Acts—"Employed on salvage service"—Trawlers.—Sect. 18 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, which precludes sect. 182 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 from applying to ships which are "to be employed on salvage service," does not apply to a steam trawler whose crew agree with the owners to take a fixed proportion of any salvage that may be earned. (Adm.) The Wilhelm Tell 329

21. Seamen's shares—Agreement—Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883*—Deductions.*—Where the crew of a steam trawler, by articles of agreement in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade under the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883, agreed to "participate in any sum or sums of money arising from any salvage or salvage services performed for any ship in distress or otherwise, in the proportion set forth opposite to their respective names in this agreement," the master, mate, and boatswain, who had agreed to take 10, 7, and 3 per cent. respectively of any salvage, were held bound by such agreement, such agreement being equitable in the opinion of the court, but the owners were not allowed before apportioning the salvage to deduct from it cost of repairs and loss of fishing, but were directed to give the crew a proportion based upon the total award without deductions. (Adm.) The Wilhelm Tell 329

22. Seamen's shares—Equitable agreement.—Sect. 182 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 does not prevent seamen entering into and being bound by an equitable agreement for the apportionment of salvage. (Adm.) The Wilhelm Tell 329

23. Seaman's share—Void agreement—Deductions—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 182.—An agreement by which a seaman stipulates that he shall be entitled to his proportion of a sum awarded for salvage services, calculated not upon the amount awarded but upon so much of that amount as remains after certain deductions have been made is inoperative by virtue of sect. 182 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. (Adm.) The Saltburn 474

24. Seaman's share—Void agreement—Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883*—Interlineations.—Semble*, where clauses fixing a seaman's share of salvage are added to an agreement made with the seaman under the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act 1883, such clauses are interlineations and alterations within the meaning of sect 22 of that Act, and if added without the consent of the seaman they are void. (Adm.). The Saltburn 474

25. Services rendered—Further service refused—Readiness to continue—Right to reward.—Where a ship, after having rendered salvage service to another ship in distress, is in a position to render further valuable service but is superseded, at the desire of the ship in distress, by another ship which is chosen to complete the service, the Court, in estimating the amount of remuneration to which the first salvors are entitled, will take into consideration not only the services which they actually effected, but also those which they were ready and able to perform. SEAMEN.

Nature of employment—Neglect of duty—Merchant Shipping Acts—Employers and Workmen Act 1875.—Where a member of the crew of a steamship has entered into no articles of agreement, and is consequently not registered as a seamen, and such ship though registered under the Merchant Shipping Acts is exclusively employed for the conveyance of salt upon the rivers Weaver and Mersey, from Winsford to Liverpool, proceedings are rightly taken against the member of the crew for refusing to obey orders under the Employers and Workmen Act 1875, and not under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, such ship not being a sea-going ship. SHIPOWNERS.

1. Co-owners — Liability for repairs — Managing owner — Bills of exchange—Payment—Discharge.—The claim of persons who execute repairs to a vessel against the owners is not discharged by the fact that being unable to get cash from the managing owner in payment of the debt, they have taken and renewed bills on account from the managing owner. (Adm.) The Huntsman.. 431

2. Co-owners — Managing owner — Authority — Credit—Repairs—Insurance—Liability to repairers.—Where the owners of a vessel depute the managing owner to employ her for their benefit he has authority to order and pledge their credit for the necessary repairs, fitting and outfit of the vessel, and the fact that the vessel is insured and the managing owner has collected the money from the underwriters to pay for the repairs does not relieve the co-owners from liability to the persons who repair the ship. (Adm.) The Huntsman..... 431

3. Co-owners—Managing owner—Duty to account—Reasonable time.—It is the duty of a managing owner to account to his co-owners for the ship's earnings and disbursements within a reasonable time, but what is a reasonable time must depend upon the circumstances of each case. There is no fixed rule that a ship's accounts are to be ready before she sails on her next voyage. (Adm. Div.) The Mount Vernon..... 32

4. Negligence—Liability—Injury to seaman—Master and crew—Common employment.—The master and crew of a merchant ship are fellow-servants and engaged in a common employment, so that the owners are not liable for an injury to one of the crew caused by the negligence of the master. THAMES CONSERVANCY.

Election of conservators—Objection to voter—Proxies —Returning officer—Effect.—The Thames Conservancy Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. clxxxvii.) empowers, amongst other persons, shipowners to vote at elections of conservators. Sect. 12 defines the qualification of shipowners. Sect. 22 provides that a vote at an election by shipowners, &c., may be given either personally or by proxy, or in the case of a body corporate by any shareholder or officer of the body as their proxy. Sect. 23 provides that the returning officer shall, according to the best of his ability, make a return of those elected, and every person so returned shall be deemed duly elected. Sect. 25 provides that an election by shipowners shall not be invalidated or be illegal by reason of any error in any list of voters, or by reason of any irregularity in the making or publishing such list, or by reason of any other error or irregularity in or about any election or matter preliminary or incidental thereto. At an election of conservators by shipowners objection was taken to the return of the respondents on the ground that some of the votes were invalid inasmuch as they had been given by proxies given by certain corporate bodies to electors not shareholders or officers of such corporate bodies, and such votes had been received and counted at such election by the returning officer: Held, on a rule for an information in the nature of a quo warranto, that, in an election of conservators by shipowners, a body corporate can only exercise its right of voting by proxy by a shareholder or officer of the body, and not by an elector. The returning officer, however, had acted judicially, and his return was conclusive, and the reception and counting of the votes objected to was precisely one of those errors in or about an election provided for by sect. 25. 1. Apprentice—Lightermen — "Qualified" Watermen Act 1859—Conservancy bye-laws.—An apprentice not licensed as lighterman, but properly bound for the period and in the manner prescribed by the Watermen Act 1859, is an apprentice "qualified according to the Act," within the meaning of sect. 54 of the Act, and he cannot be convicted under that section for acting as a lighterman without having a licence. Such apprentice may be a competent person to assist as second hand a duly licensed lighterman when navigating on the river Thames a barge of over fifty tons burden, within the meaning of the 16th bye-law of the Thames Conservancy, as the words in that bye-law "one man in addition," are satisfied by there being on board to assist an apprentice duly bound within the meaning of the Watermen Act, and the bye-laws made thereunder. Agents—Telegraph—Code words—Mistake—Mistaken order—Warranty of accuracy.—The plaintiffs entered into a contract with the defendant to supply the defendant's ship, then at Newcastle, New South Wales, with coal. The plaintiffs sent a telegram from London to their house in Newcastle, New South Wales, with instructions as to drawing upon the defendant for the price of the coal. The telegram contained a code word "journee" which meant "after this vessel is loaded owners order her to proceed to R." By a mistake in the transmission of the telegram, the code word "jounce" was substituted for "journee." "Jounce meant an order to proceed to C. The plaintiffs' house in Newcastle informed the master of the ship of the instructions they had received. The master doubted the accuracy of the instructions, and the plaintiffs' house gave him a letter confirming the contents of the telegram. The master accordingly proceeded with the ship to C. The result of the ship's going to C. instead of to R. was a loss to the defendant, for which the defendant counterclaimed against the plaintiffs in an action by the plaintiffs for the price of the coal. The jury found that the master acted reasonably under the circumstances. Held, that the letter given by the plaintiffs to the master, though a warranty to the master was not a warranty on which the defendant could sue the plaintiffs; that on the finding of the jury the defendant had no right of action against the master, and could not therefore claim to sue the plaintiffs in order to avoid a multiplicity of actions; that the plaintiffs had not by the giving of the letter constituted the master their agent. HOUSE OF LORDS.

Nov. 27, 28, and Dec. 1, 1890.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury), Lords WATSON, BRAMWELL, HERSCHELL, and MORRIS.)

HOGARTH AND OTHERS v. MILLER AND CO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SECOND DIVISION OF THE COURT OF SESSION IN SCOTLAND.

Charter-party—Cesser clause—Payment of hire to cease till ship in an efficient state to resume service—Discharge of cargo.

The respondents hired a steamship of the appellants for a voyage or voyages within certain limits at a fixed rate per month, the owners to maintain the ship in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for the service. The charter-party further provided that "in the event of loss of time from . . . breakdown of machinery, want of repairs, or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service."

On a voyage from A. to H. one of the engines broke down, and the vessel had to put into the port of P. It was found impossible to repair the engine there, and all parties agreed that a tug should be employed to assist the vessel to reach H., and that the expense should be treated as general average loss. The vessel arrived at H., and, while the cargo was being discharged in ordinary course, the repairs to the machinery were completed.

Held (Lord Bramwell dissenting), that the owners were not entitled to hire for the time occupied by the voyage from P. to H., but (Lord Morris dissenting) that they were entitled to hire for the period occupied in discharging the cargo at H. Judgment of the court below affirmed with a variation.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, consisting of the Lord Justice Clerk (Macdonald), Lords Young and Lee, who had reversed a judgment of the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) in an action brought by the appellants against the respondents. The case is reported in 16 Court Sess. Cas. 4th series, 599.

By a charter-party dated the 26th Feb. 1887, it was agreed that the respondents, who were merchants in Glasgow, should hire from the appellants, the owners, the steamship Westphalia, of Glasgow, of 1135 tons gross registered tonnage, for a voyage from Swansea or other ports in the United Kingdom or the Continent to an African port and back to Europe. The charter-party contained the following clause:

> In the event of loss of time from . . . breakdown of machinery, want of repairs, or damage whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, the payment of the hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service.

The vessel started on her return voyage from the West African coast to Harburg, but about the 30th Sept. her high-pressure engine broke down, and she had to put back to the port of Las Palmas, Grand Canary.

It was found impossible to repair the machinery at Las Palmas, and eventually the voyage home was completed by the vessel being towed by a tug with the aid of her own low-pressure engine. It was agreed at the time that the expenses of employing the tug should be the subject of general average payable by ship, freight, and cargo. The ship left Las Palmas on the 18th Oct., and reached Harburg on the 31st Oct., having occupied very little more than the average time on the voyage. On the arrival of the vessel at her port of final destination the discharging of the cargo was proceeded with leisurely, as it was known that the repairs of the engine would occupy a considerable time, and was completed on the 10th Nov., on which day the repairs to the engine were finished, and the ship left Harburg on the 11th. In these circumstances the present action was brought by the shipowners against the charterers to recover the whole of the sum contracted to be paid for conveying the cargo, on the ground that, although the ship's own engines had broken down, the defect was made good by the employment of the tug. They also claimed 130*l.*, the full sum for the days during which the cargo was being unloaded. The respondents relied upon the "breaking down" clause in the charter-party. The Court below decided in favour of the respondents on the first point, but awarded 60*l.* as for an average period for the discharge, Lord Young doubting. The shipowners appealed.

Finlay, Q.C. and Leck appeared for the appellants.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgments as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: The whole of this case, as it appears to me, turns upon the true construction of the contract which regulates the relation between the parties, and there are two very diverse views which have been presented to your Lordships upon the true construction of the language of that instrument. I think that each part of the contract must be looked at with care, and that it must be remembered that in the construction of the contract we are not bound simply by the exact words. We must remember that it is a mercantile contract, and we must remember the nature of the subject-matter with respect to which each of the parties was contracting. Now the contract is for the hire of a ship, and each of the parties must be taken to know what are, in the ordinary course, the duties to be performed by a ship, and it must be taken that each party is contemplating the possibility of the benefit which he is contracting to obtain being interrupted by various causes. That clause of the contract which has to be interpreted is in these terms, and each part of it, I should say, ought to be looked at with care, and with reference to the words which are found associated with it in the particular instrument which we have to construe. It is, "That in the event of loss of time"—that is the leading and guiding principle by which we are to ascertain what it is with reference to which the succeeding words are used. What the hirer of the ship is guarding against by this contract with the owner of the ship is, that he is not to pay during such period of time as he shall lose (that is, lose time) in the use of the ship by reason of any of the contingencies which this particular clause contemplates—"that in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, want of repairs, or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours." The language is consonant with what I have indicated as being the general intention of the parties in entering into this part of the contract. In the first place, it is "in the event of loss of time," and then the parties proceed to show that the contingency which is to give rise to the actual operation of the clause is that the working powers of the vessel are interfered with, and "the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours," and upon that there is to be a cesser. What the parties to this contract contemplated was this: The hirer of the vessel wants to use the vessel for the purpose of his adventure, and he is contemplating the possibility that by some of the causes indicated in the clause itself, namely, "the deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, want of repairs, or damage," the efficient working of the vessel may be stopped, and so loss of time may be incurred; and he protects himself by saying that during such period as the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive hours payment shall cease; and now come the words upon which such reliance is placed, "until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." If the contention which has been put forward at your Lordships' bar were well founded, one might have expected that the parties in contemplating what upon that view was said to be their intention, if they had intended that the test should be the efficient state of the vessel as it originally was, might very readily have used the words, "until such time as the deficiency of men or stores has been removed, or the breakdown of the machinery has been set to rights, or the want of repairs has been supplied, or the damage has been remedied," and so forth; or the terms might have been inserted that the resumption of the payment shall be dependent upon the vessel being restored to full efficiency in all respects as to seaworthiness and otherwise, as she was at the time when she was originally handed over. But the parties have not used such language. On the contrary, the test by which the payment for the hire is to be resumed is the efficient state of the vessel to resume her service; so that each of those words, as it appears to me, has relation to that which both of the parties must be taken to have well understood, namely, the purpose for which the vessel was hired, the nature of the service to be performed by the vessel, and the efficiency of the vessel to perform such service as shall be required of her in the course of the voyage.

As to the first part of the claim which has been insisted upon here, I confess that I entertain no doubt whatever that the vessel was not efficient in any sense for the prosecution of her voyage from Las Palmas to Harburg. I decline altogether to enter into the question of the contract of insurance, with which these parties have nothing to do—I mean have nothing to do with respect to the performance or the construction of this contract. The contract must receive the same construction whether the vessel was insured or not, and the question what other rights might have been obtained by the shipowner by supplying that which by the hypothesis he did not supply, is a question which is not before your Lordships, and one upon which I, at all events, decline to express any opinion. As a matter of fact this vessel did not, and could not, pursue her voyage as a vessel from Las Palmas to Harburg. That another vessel took her in tow, that another vessel accomplished the voyage and brought this vessel, not as an efficient steamer, but as a floating barge, whereby the goods were brought to Harburg, seems to me to be nothing to the purpose. I use that phrase because, although I am not aware that it is suggested that the low-pressure engine was used for the purpose of easing the work of the tug, that appears to me to be entirely irrelevant when one is ascertaining whether this vessel of its own independent power was efficient for the purpose of prosecuting the voyage. All that is suggested is, that the tug was assisted by the use of the low-pressure engine. I find as a matter of evidence, as each court I think has found, that the vessel was not seaworthy for the purpose of accomplishing her voyage without the assistance of a tug; and in truth, as it appears to me, upon these facts it is clear that the voyage which was accomplished, and the service which it was contemplated this hired vessel was to perform, was performed by another vessel, and that the auxiliary assistance which she gave to that other vessel was not making the vessel herself an efficient vessel for the working of which the hirer was to pay. It appears to me that the various hypotheses which have been put dispose of this part of the case, because the greater or less degree of efficiency of the vessel which these hypotheses have suggested appears to imply in all cases this admission, that without the additional assistance the vessel could not have accomplished that object which both the shipowner and the hirer had contemplated as being that which the shipowner was to supply to the hirer. If so, how can it be said in any business sense, apart from the mere words, that the vessel was "in an efficient state to resume her service?" That being once admitted as a question of fact (and if it were not admitted I should certainly find it upon the evidence), it appears to me that she was not herself seaworthy or efficient to perform the voyage, and did not herself perform the voyage. That is conclusive upon the first part of the case, and therefore no payment for the hire was due during the period that she was passing from Las Palmas to Harburg.

With reference to the second question which has been argued, it appears to me that one has again to refer to each of these clauses of the contract to see what the parties were bargaining for. I should read the contract as meaning this, which I think was suggested in the course of the argument, that she should be efficient to do what she was required to do when she was called upon to do it, and accordingly at each period, if what was required of her was to lie at anchor, if it was to lie alongside the wharf, upon each of these occasions, if she was efficient to do it at the time, she would then become, in the language of the contract, to my mind, "efficient," reading with it the other words, "for the working of the vessel." How does a vessel work when she is lying alongside a wharf to discharge her cargo? She has machinery there for the purpose. It is not only that she has the goods in the hold, but she has machinery there for the purpose of discharging the cargo. It is not denied that during the period that she was lying at Harburg there was that machinery at work enabling the hirer to do quickly all that this particular portion of her employment required to be done. It appears to me, therefore, that at that period there was a right in the shipowner to demand payment of the hire, because at that time his vessel was efficiently working; the working of the vessel was proceeding as efficiently as it could with reference to the particular employment demanded of her at the time. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that the pursuer here was entitled to payment for the hire of the vessel during the period of discharge. That would make the pursuer entitled, I think, to a sum of 136*l.* 4*s.*, and for that I think that judgment should be entered. I wish to say one word as to the other view which has been presented, that the shipowner was not entitled to anything in respect of the period during which she was discharging. It has been put in various forms by the learned counsel. What reason or good sense would there be in construing a mercantile contract so that all right to payment should cease when the other party was getting everything he could out of the use of the vessel, if she was in an efficient state? I can see none. And what was put in argument seems to me conclusive; if some other part of the steam gearing not used for the purpose of navigation had got out of working order in mid-ocean, and there had been no longer use for that particular thing, the reason why such a breakdown of the machinery in mid-ocean would not have created a cesser of payment under the contract would, I suppose, have been this—it would have been argued, and argued justly, "It is true that there has been a breakdown of machinery, but that breakdown of machinery is not the only event contemplated; it does not of itself entitle you to a cesser of payment. There must be to entitle you to a cesser of payment a loss of time arising from a breakdown of machinery. Not even then does the cesser of payment arise, but there must be a loss of time by the breakdown of machinery whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for the agreed time." That appears to me to reflect great light upon the other question—what was the breakdown of the machinery which was contemplated by both the parties? The resumption of the right to payment is correlative with it; and, inasmuch as when the vessel got to Harburg she became "efficient" for the purpose for which alone she was wanted at that time, it appears to me that the right to payment arose. Under ordinary circumstances, when a substantial claim has been established by the pursuer or plaintiff the result is that he is entitled to costs; but in this case, certainly, there are difficulties in either view of this question. For my own part it seems to me that both parties have been insisting on rights which they did not possess. The pursuer has insisted upon a right to payment during the whole period of the voyage from Las Palmas to Harburg, to which, I submit to your Lordships, he is not entitled. On the other hand, the charterer, the defender, has been insisting from the first that he was not bound to pay anything in respect of the period of discharge, when the owner of the vessel was, according to the view which I have presented to your Lordships, entitled to the hire of the vessel. The result of that appears to me to be that both parties have been in the wrong, and both parties have been insisting on an affirmative case. It does not seem to me to be like the ordinary case in which the plaintiff has merely claimed too much, and has failed in proof as to some of it. It appears to be rather in the nature of two separate claims, each of the parties failing to make out one of those claims. Under those circumstances, while I move your Lordships that the interlocutor be amended by entitling the pursuer to judgment for 136*l.* 4*s.*, on the other hand it appears to me that the course of litigation has been such that neither of the parties is in a position to ask for costs. I therefore move your Lordships that the costs both here and below, from the original rise of this litigation to the present moment, shall not be given to either of the parties, but that each of them shall pay their own costs.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: If the appellants were suing for freight in respect of cargo which had been safely carried to its destination, notwithstanding the unseaworthiness of the ship, that consideration might have gone a long way in their favour. Such is not the nature of the claim which they prefer. They hired their ship and the services of its crew for an all-round voyage from this country to the West Coast of Africa, and thence to a home port or a port on the Continent. Hire is payable according to a monthly rate subject to a special stipulation, which provides, in the first place, that the shipowner shall maintain the hull and machinery throughout in a thoroughly efficient condition; and, in the second place, that under certain circumstances payment of hire shall cease. The high-pressure engine of the vessel broke down on her way home from Africa, and in consequence she put into the port of Las Palmas, which she reached with the aid of her low-pressure engine, assisted by her sails. The parties seem to be agreed that the condition of the vessel upon her arrival there brought her within the condition of the contract as to cesser of hire. Loss of time was incurred through the breakdown of the machinery, and the vessel was stopped for more than forty-eight hours, having been detained by the cause I have mentioned from the 1st Oct. to the 18th Oct. before she ultimately sailed. The appellants do not claim hire for that period. Whilst the vessel lay at Las Palmas it was found not to be expedient to repair her at that port from want of workmen and want of materials, and accordingly an arrangement was entered into, of the details of which we know nothing beyond this, that the parties, hirers and charterers, agreed to bring her to Harburg, which was her first port of destination, at their joint expense, by means of a tug, and that the cost of bringing her should be defrayed by them on the same footing as if it had been general average loss. Accordingly the vessel sailed in tow of a tug, and reached Harburg on the 1st Nov. almost in due course. The first question which arises is this: Was the vessel when she started under tow for Harburg in an efficient state to resume her service within the meaning of the contract? I have no hesitation in answering the question in the negative. The service contemplated was a service to be performed by the vessel without foreign aid, the means of propulsion through the water being her own machinery. But the fact is that she did not proceed from Las Palmas to Harburg in that condition; she was towed; and I think that is quite sufficient to bring the whole period from her leaving Las Palmas till she reached the pier at Harburg within the terms of the condition I have referred to, and that no hire is due for that period. It was suggested in the course of the argument that a reasonable allowance was due from the charterers in respect of the amount of use which they undoubtedly had, because their cargo was conveyed to the port of destination, and safely conveyed, in a hull which was the property of the shipowner. They had undoubtedly that use, and they had besides, to some extent, the aid during the voyage of steam power supplied by the shipowner. I do not mean to cast any doubt upon the suggestion that there may be circumstances which as matter of commercial expediency, or as matter of equity, may justify the conclusion that where a contract payment has ceased there may, notwithstanding, be a quantum meruit due to the shipowner; but in all such cases it must be in the nature of a reasonable payment, warranted by the circumstances, in exchange for a use by which the charterer has benefited. But what are the facts here? If the shipowner had chosen to pay for a tug to tow the steamer to Harburg, and had thereby supplied at his own cost an equivalent for an efficient vessel, which his was not at the time, it may be that that would have been considered (I think it might fairly have been considered) by the court as so substantial an equivalent for the stipulations of the contract which he had violated that he was entitled to recover hire for that period. But that equivalent was not in this case given by the shipowner; it was paid for to the extent of 860*l.* odd by the charterers, the balance of the hire of the tug to the amount of some 230*l.* being borne by the shipowner. If the shipowner had at his own cost paid for the tug he would have expended about 800*l.* more than the hire he would have earned. On the other hand, under the arrangement which was entered into and acted upon, the charterers have paid considerably more than double the hire which they stipulated to pay for an efficient vessel in terms of the contract. In that state of facts I cannot find any consideration which points to the propriety of making an allowance by way of quantum meruit to the appellants; and therefore I have come to the conclusion that upon the first branch of the case the judgment of the court below is well-founded.

In regard to the second branch of the case, the claim for hire whilst the vessel was under discharge at Harburg, I have come to a different conclusion, because it appears to me, for the reasons which have been already indicated by the Lord Chancellor, that from the moment when she reached the pier at Harburg the vessel was in an efficient state to perform that part of the contract work for which she was hired, and for which she was in the possession of the respondents. Her steam winches were in perfect order, and it humbly appears to me that if charterers keep possession of a vessel which is in a thoroughly efficient state for all the purposes contemplated at the time by the contract, and required by them, they must, in the terms of the contract, pay the stipulated hire. No doubt there is a statement made by the respondents to the effect that the discharge of the cargo proceeded leisurely, and that it was known to the defenders and their agents that the repairs would last for a considerable time. I venture to doubt whether that statement, if admitted, would afford a good answer to the claim for hire. But the evidence shows that the statement is not justified by the facts. The agent for the charterer at Harburg did everything in his power to expedite the unloading of the cargo, and it is apparent that he was not able to effect his purpose in a shorter time than was actually occupied by that proceeding. Therefore the only inference which I can draw from the evidence in this case, if it were necessary to draw it, would be this, that no more than an ordinary time, according to the circumstances of the port, was occupied at Harburg by the discharge. I therefore come, upon the second point, to a conclusion adverse to the decision of the court below. I concur upon both points in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor, and also in the proposal which he has made with respect to costs.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: My opinion differs from those which have been expressed, and from those opinions which are entertained by Lord Herschell and Lord Morris. I cannot help thinking that most undue importance has been attached to the word "efficient." Now I look at the meaning of this contract as being this: when there is a breakdown which occasions a loss of time of a substantial character, that is to say for forty-eight hours at the least, during that lost time no hire shall be paid; but when there is no loss of time in consequence of that breakdown, that is no total loss though a delay, then the hire shall be paid. That is the meaning I attribute to this contract. It seems to me to be the ordinary mercantile and reasonable meaning, when you get the benefit of the ship you shall pay for its hire. But it will be said they did not get the benefit of the ship on the voyage from Las Palmas to Harburg. I say they did. I say the charterer got the benefit of the ship on that voyage. It is true he paid, or largely paid, for a tug; I think it does not matter at all that he was insured, because the question is precisely the same as it ought to be if he had not been insured. I am of that opinion. If he thought fit to pay for the service of a tug for the purpose of accelerating the arrival of the vessel at Harburg, he thought fit to do it for his own purposes. He did not stipulate that if he did so he should not pay for the hire of the vessel; it seems to me that he ought to have done so. He might have refused to do it if he had liked—he might have said, "I have nothing to do with getting your vessel to Harburg, that is your affair;" but he thought fit to do it, and did not think fit to stipulate that in consideration of his doing it he should not pay for the hire. It cannot be said that the vessel did not reach Harburg, for she did. It is true she was helped, and then the sort of argument used is, "she was not efficient for the purpose of her service." I say she was efficient sub modo, even if the very word "efficient" is to be regarded, because she could do it with help. I accept what has been assumed to be true, that she was not fit to go from Las Palmas to Harburg without help, but she was fit to do it with help, and did it with help. It seems to me, as I have said before, that an undue importance is attached to the word "efficient." I think it is an example of qui hæret in literâ hæret in cortice. The substantial matter, to my mind, is that the charterer has got the benefit of the carriage of his goods in that ship from Las Palmas to Harburg, and ought to pay for it. I think that is all I need say about the first point. With respect to the second point, of course with the opinion which I entertain, I must concur in the judgment which has been moved, and the opinions which have been expressed.

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: I concur in the view which has been put before your Lordships by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Watson. I do not lay any special stress upon the word "efficient" in the phrase "efficient working of the vessel." If the word "efficient" had been left out and the word "working" had been the only word there, I think I should have come to the same conclusion as that at which I have arrived. The subject-matter of this contract of hire is a steamer as a steamer, not either as a hulk to serve as a warehouse for goods, or as a vessel to be propelled without steam by means of her sails. The hire is estimated with a view to the fact that she is a steamer, and that the goods are to be brought on her intended voyage or voyages during the time of the hire by the ordinary means of propulsion by which a steamer passes through the water. When, therefore, the vessel at Las Palmas ceased to be able to prosecute her voyage as a steamer, it appears to me that there was a breakdown of the machinery, the result of which was a stoppage of the working of the vessel; and I should come to that conclusion though it were shown that the vessel could have proceeded under sail. That condition of things, therefore, having come about that the working of the vessel was stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, the payment of hire was to cease till she was again in an efficient state. I should have said the same if it had been "in a state to resume her service," her service being the carriage of goods as a steamer upon the stipulated voyages. Now it is said, on behalf of the appellants, that she did become in an efficient state as soon as she was taken in tow. I am unable to accede to that argument if it is intended to assert by it that no matter who provides the tug, or under what circumstances she takes the vessel in tow, the vessel is to be regarded as in a condition to resume her service, and so earn hire. I put during the course of the argument the case of this vessel being in a desperate condition, only to be saved from total loss by a salving vessel which takes her in tow and brings her into port, making, of course, a large claim for her services. Is it to be said that as soon as she was in tow of a steamer she became efficient, or became in a condition to resume her service, without looking at all where that steamer came from, or who was to pay for it? I cannot think so. I do not intend to assert that if the owner himself provided a steamer to tow the vessel into her port of destination, if he did not recover, strictly speaking, the hire under this contract, he would not be entitled to recover as for a substituted service in the same way in which, under other contracts, a shipowner who has contracted to carry goods in a particular ship on a particular voyage may recover although he does not bring them on that voyage in that ship, but tranships them, and brings them in some other ship. It has never been doubted that he may, in such a case, recover in respect of the carriage of those goods. So there might have been a right (it is quite unnecessary to consider whether there would have been) of the same sort if the owner had substituted steam power outside the vessel instead of putting the machinery into a fit state within the vessel. But that is not the case here. In the present case, the vessel having broken down and not being in a condition to prosecute her voyage as a steamer, it is agreed between the owner of the cargo, or the charterer, and the shipowner that it shall be treated as a joint loss, and that the vessel shall be brought home at joint expense, treating that joint expense as a general average loss arising from a disaster in the course of the voyage. That was the arrangement come to. Now it seems to me that, when the vessel is brought home under an arrangement of that description, she is not really prosecuting her voyage under this contract at all, and cannot be so regarded, inasmuch as she is being brought home at joint expense by an arrangement of that description, in order to save the shipowner and the cargo owner from inconveniences; and therefore, it being the interest of both parties that the vessel shall be brought on in that way for the benefit of the shipowner, and the cargo for the benefit of the cargo owner, at their joint expense, proportioned to the value of the vessel and of the cargo respectively, I cannot regard that as in any way affording a right to a resumption of the hire which was to be paid for the use of a steamer which could carry the goods as a steamer from the port where she took them on board to the port of her destination.

On the other point I agree with the view which has been already stated. It seems to me that it would be somewhat extravagant to hold that, when a vessel has been thus by arrangement brought home, or rather brought to the port of discharge, at the joint expense, as soon as she arrives at the port of discharge you are to look back to see how she arrived there, and not rather to see what was the service then required of her, and whether she was in a condition to perform that service. It seems to me that during those ten days, whether you lay any stress on the word "efficient" or not, she was in a condition to perform the service that was required of her.

Lord MORRIS.—My Lords: I entirely agree with the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor, and with the opinions which have been expressed by Lords Watson and Herschell, as regards that portion of the voyage for which hire is claimed, namely, the part of it between Las Palmas and Harburg. But I am further of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled to recover anything. In order to arrive at a conclusion upon this case I think it necessary to refer to the charter-party. It appears to me that in the argument of this case before the court in Scotland and before this House, there has been some confusion between what would be the rights of the parties in the earning of freight, and under the contract contained in this charter-party for the hire of this steam-vessel out and out. The first portion which I would refer to is, "that the owners agree to let, and the charterers agree to hire, the said steamship for a voyage," afterwards mentioned, that is a voyage from certain ports mentioned to the West Coast of Africa and back again, "she being ready to receive cargo, with a clear hold, and being tight, staunch, strong, and every way fitted for the service." Now the first question which I would ask is, what is the service contemplated there? The service contemplated there is that she should be a steamship fitted in all respects to go from the ports mentioned to the West Coast of Africa and back again. She was to be a vessel fitted for that service. The clause proceeds on the assumption that she was fitted for the service at starting; it provides that "the owners shall maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for the service." What service? The service of being a steamship fit to go from the ports which are defined. I now come to the clause in question, and I agree with Lord Herschell that we should not give any peculiar importance to the word "efficient." I shall use it as if the word "fit" were used. The clause in question is, "That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, want of repairs, or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." I read, as I have said, "fit" for "efficient." "Until she shall be in a fit state to resume her service." What service? The service contemplated of being a steamship which was originally fit to go from certain ports to the West Coast of Africa and back again. The owner contracted, under the second clause to which I have referred, to keep her in that efficient or fit state to perform that service. But as the owner would only be liable in an action for damages, the parties very wisely chose to measure their damages, and accordingly the measure is that the hire is to cease on the contingency of there being "a loss of time from a deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, want of repairs, or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, until she be again in a fit state to resume her service." What service? She was to be a vessel which was fit to go on certain voyages described. Now was she that? On the portion of the voyage from Las Palmas to Harburg she was clearly unable to do it. When was the moment when she again became fit? Nothing was done to make her fit on the first day of her discharge. When did the period begin at which she was again fit for the performance of "that service," namely, the service between these ports? I say only upon the day when she was put by repairs into a state in which she was fit to perform the voyages which she was originally required to perform, a state in which the owner undertook that she should be during the whole period. For these reasons I concur with the judgment of the Lord Chancellor with regard to the portion of the voyage from Las Palmas to Harburg. But I have also come to the conclusion that the pursuer is not entitled to any portion of the sum which he has claimed. The court in Scotland appear to have given the sum of 60*l.* in a vague sort of way. I am of opinion that, if the pursuer is entitled to anything, he is entitled to payment for the entire ten days occupied in the discharging, and that we cannot go into the question of dawdling in the discharge. But I am of opinion that he is entitled to nothing; and therefore I do not agree with the view that has been expressed by the majority of your Lordships' House, that the interlocutor of the Court of Session in Scotland should be amended as proposed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Wednesday, April 8, 1891.

(Before Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., Lord ESHER, M.R., and FRY, L.J.)

SMITH, HILL, AND Co. v. PYMAN, BELL, AND Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Freight — Advance freight to be paid "if required"—Loss of ship and cargo—Demand of payment made after loss—Charterer not liable.

A ship was chartered to carry a cargo of coals by a charter-party which provided that "one-third freight, if required, was to be advanced, less three per cent. for interest and insurance." Very soon after the ship had loaded her cargo and sailed she was totally lost, together with the cargo. After the loss the shipowners demanded payment of the one-third freight in advance under the above clause, which the charterers refused to pay.

Held (reversing the decision of Charles, J.), that a request by the shipowners was a condition precedent to any liability to pay the one-third freight in advance, and that such request could not be made after the ship was lost, and that the charterers were therefore not liable.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of Charles, J., upon further consideration, after trial at Leeds without a jury.

The action was brought to recover a sum of 245*l.* for "advance freight" alleged to be due under a charter-party. The defendants chartered the plaintiffs' ship Gamma to load a cargo of coals at Hull and proceed therewith to Odessa. By the charter-party the freight was to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, and the charter-party contained, among other provisions, the following clause: "One-third freight, if required, to be advanced, less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance."

The ship, having loaded her cargo of coals, sailed from Hull on the morning of the 19th Dec. 1888, and within three-quarters of an hour after she had started took the ground. In the course of the same day she broke her back, and was, together with her cargo, totally lost. Shortly after the ship had thus been lost the charterers' bills of lading were brought to the plaintiffs, together with the colliery invoices of the coal, and thereupon one-third of the freight in advance was asked for by the plaintiffs. The defendants refused to pay, upon the ground that, the ship having been lost, they were not liable to pay any freight, and the advance freight could not be then demanded.

The action was tried at Leeds before Charles, J. without a jury, and, upon further consideration, the learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed. The defendants appealed.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. and Robson for the appellants.—The question is, whether a claim for the advance freight under this charter-party could be made after the ship was lost. Under the clause the one-third freight in advance would not become payable until demanded, and the demand could not be made after the vessel was lost; if it could, it would be a demand for payment of freight which was not being earned, and could not be earned. A demand cannot be made for payment of a part of a sum which has not been and cannot be earned. The further words in this clause, "less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance," show that the demand for the advance freight must be made at a time when it will be possible for the charterers to insure that advance freight, for they are to deduct that 3 per cent. to meet the cost of insurance. After the ship was lost they could not insure, and could not effect the object for which the deduction was to be allowed. The addition of the words "if required" makes this contract different from those in which advance freight is made payable unconditionally. These words import a condition precedent to any liability on the part of the charterers to pay the advance freight; they are not to be liable until a demand is made. The judgment of Charles, J. proceeded upon an erroneous view of the meaning of "advance freight," founded upon the judgment of Lord Kingsdown in Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moore P.C. 361, 390), where he says: "But a sum of money payable before the arrival of the ship at her port of discharge, and payable by the shippers of the goods at the port of shipment, does not acquire the legal character of freight because it is described by that name in a bill of lading, nor does it acquire the legal incidents of freight. It is, in effect, money to be paid for taking the goods on board and undertaking to carry, and not for carrying them." That statement of the law was, however, explained and reviewed by the House of Lords in Allison v. Bristol Marine Insurance Company (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 809; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 178; L. Rep. 1 App. Cas. 209), where the opinion of Brett, J. was adopted as the correct view of that case. Brett, J. (at p. 813) said: "It becomes necessary, in the next place, in consequence of the argument founded on them, to consider the true import of the often-quoted words of Lord Kingsdown in Kirchner v. Venus (ubi sup.). In that case there was no dispute that the freight was payable by the shipper in advance. . . . The shipper did not make the stipulated payment in advance. The captain at Sydney, claiming a lien on the cargo for freight, refused to deliver the cargo to the assignee of the bill of lading without payment by him of the freight. The advice of the council was that there was no lien. It was not necessary to say that advance freight was not freight at all. It was only necessary to say that the incident of lien did not attach to freight so to be paid. And I think that the latter is all that is said by Lord Kingsdown. He does not say that the money payable in advance is not freight at all. . . . The observations of Lord Kingsdown are pointed to that question. The true meaning of them is that, so far as concerns a question of nothing being due until delivery, or a question of lien, it is the same, in effect, as if the money were to be paid for taking the goods on board, and as if it were not to be paid for carrying them."

Cyril Dodd, Q.C. and Montague Lush for the respondents.—Advance freight, though it may be in some sense freight, has not all the incidents of freight:

Irving v. Richardson, 2 B. & Ad. 193.

Advance freight is payable in all events, though the goods are not carried to their destination. That rule applies to this case, and the addition of the words "if required" makes no difference. The requirement must be made within a reasonable time, and that is all; it can be made even after the loss, provided only that it is made within a reasonable time. The charterers could insure themselves against the probability of being required to pay advance freight before they were required to pay it.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—This appeal must be allowed. This contract is one which, in its terms, stands by itself, and my judgment is founded upon the true construction of the terms of this contract. The judgments in the cases which have been so much referred to leave the law, as applicable to this case, clear and untouched. Here we have to deal with a contract the wording of which is different from the wording of the contracts in those cases. It is clear that advance freight is, for some purposes, freight, and we have here a contract as to freight some of which is, in a general way, advance freight. But in this case the contract as to advance freight is contained in three lines of the charter-party, as follows: "One-third freight, if required, to be advanced, less three per cent. for interest and insurance." I am clearly of opinion that the fair meaning to be placed upon those words is, that one-third of the freight is to be advanced if required by the shipowners for freight and insurance. If that be so, it follows from the well-established rule of law that it is a condition precedent to the right to have freight paid in advance that the shipowners should "require" it. It is not necessary for us to decide what that clause may mean besides, but it is clear that there must be some demand before the one-third freight becomes payable, whether it be for necessary purposes or merely at the pleasure of the shipowners. Then the demand or requirement is to be for freight which may be insured. The demand in this case was not made until after it had become impossible to insure the freight if the demand were made. The demand, therefore, was not made at a time when it could be enforced, and there was no contract to pay the advance freight under the circumstances which have arisen in this case. This contract was, in my opinion, expressly framed in order to prevent any further extension of the rule of our law as to the absolute liability to pay advance freight. The judgment of Charles, J. proceeded upon the footing of giving no effect to the words "if required . . . for interest and insurance" and must be reversed.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the charterers of the vessel contracted to pay the freight upon the unloading and right delivery of the cargo at Odessa. If the cargo did not arrive at Odessa, or was not delivered, there would be no freight to pay. Then there is a further stipulation in the charter-party that part of the freight is to be payable in advance, part of that very freight which was made payable on unloading and right delivery of the cargo. In my opinion advance freight is part of the freight. There is in our law a rule, well known to the parties, that if freight is advanced and the vessel is lost, yet that part of the freight which has been advanced cannot be recovered back although it was not really due and had not been earned, and although it was part of the freight. Another well-established rule is that, if there is only a stipulation to pay advance freight, such advance freight becomes payable upon the ship starting, and can be recovered even after the loss of the vessel. Those rules were well known to the parties when they made their contract, but they did not make that contract in the ordinary form. They altered the ordinary form in a manner favourable to the charterers, as to the payment of advance freight. Certainly this advance freight, provided for by this contract, was not to become due at the moment of the departure of the ship, but only if and when the shipowners required payment thereof to be made. To hold that it became due before that was done would be to strike out of the contract the words "if required," which words were, in my opinion, put in for the protection of the charterers. Those words "if required" import a stipulation or condition precedent to any liability on the part of the charterers to pay any advance freight at all; if there were no such words the charterers would have been liable to pay at once as soon as the ship started, and those words are a stipulation in their favour that they are not to be liable to pay then, but only to be liable to pay if and when the shipowners so requested. Now, is there anything in the contract to show what is the meaning of this stipulation in favour of the charterers? The charterers would have no insurable interest in the advance freight until they became liable to pay it; they have no interest whatever in the freight until they are liable to pay it. The words of the stipulation itself are "one-third freight, if required, to be advanced, less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance." That shows that they were not to be liable for advance freight until they were required to pay it, for they could not insure until they became liable, and when they were to become liable they were to deduct 3 per cent. for the purpose of insuring, and they could not be made liable to pay except when they could insure. If follows from what I have said that, in order to carry out the obvious intention of the parties, the request to pay advance freight must be made at a time when the charterers can insure such freight, and therefore not after the loss of the ship. The shipowner might require the advance freight to be paid at any time during the voyage before the ship is lost, but not after the loss, because there is a stipulation in favour of the charterers as to insurance which could not be carried out after the loss. The judgment of Charles, J. is really founded upon the words of Lord Kingsdown in Kirchner v. Venus (ubi sup.), and upon the wrong interpretation of those words. The true meaning of Lord Kingsdown's judgment is explained in Allison v. Bristol Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.) by Lord Hatherley, and therefore the judgment of Charles, J. was founded upon a wrong view of the law, and must be reversed.

Fry, L.J.—The question in this appeal turns upon the construction of a clause in a charter-party. Under the charter-party "one-third freight, if required, was to be advanced, less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance." That clause gives to the payee an option as to the time for payment of part of the freight, and primâ facie that option can only exist when the whole sum is either payable, or can become payable. An option as to the time of payment of money which cannot become payable at all is a contradiction in terms. This option, therefore, cannot be exercised after the money has ceased to be payable. It has been argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that there is a rule of law, as to what is called "advance freight," which prevents the right to claim this advance freight being defeated. That rule of law has nothing to do with this case, for here there is only an option given to the shipowners to say whether there shall be any advance freight or not. This is merely a payment to be made, under certain circumstances, on account of freight, and how a payment on account of a sum which never can become payable can be demanded, I cannot understand. By the contract, from this sum which was to be paid if required, a deduction of 3 per cent. was to be made for a two-fold purpose—for interest and for insurance. The deduction for interest was to be made as a compensation to the payer for paying at an earlier date. As the ship, however, was lost no time for payment of the freight could arrive, and consequently compensation for paying a part of it at an earlier date would be absurd. The meaning of the allowance for insurance was that a deduction was to be allowed to the charterers to enable them to insure when the risk as to that part of the freight was transferred to them, when it would be impossible for them to recover back the advance freight if they had paid it. After the vessel was lost the charterers could not effect such an insurance. This clause, in my opinion, really gave an option to the shipowners which could not be exercised after the money, as to which the option was given, ceased to be payable at all.

The Queen Victoria. (a)

Collision--Lights—Fairway of navigation—Whistle—Firth of Clyde.

Where a steamship under way at night in the Firth of Clyde stops her way and puts herself across the line of navigation for the purpose of coming to an anchor, she is to blame for not warning vessels coming up behind her of her manœuvres, even though she is carrying a fixed stern light.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action from a decision of Butt, J., holding both ships to blame.

The collision occurred on the 29th Dec. 1889, in the Firth of Clyde, between the plaintiffs' steamship the Ovington and the defendants' steamship the Queen Victoria.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at Law.

The Ovington, a steamship of 444 tons net register, was at the time of the collision on a voyage from Glasgow to Hamburg, laden with a general cargo. At about 2 a.m. on the 29th Dec., while she was proceeding down the Firth of Clyde, her master, in consequence of the weather coming on thick and overcast, determined to come to anchor. The helm of the Ovington was accordingly ported and the engines were stopped, and after the Ovington had been got round and whilst her anchor was about to be let go, those on board saw the masthead and red lights of the steamship Queen Victoria distant from 150 to 300 yards, and about two to three points abaft the beam on the port side. Very shortly afterwards the green light came into view, whereupon the Queen Victoria was loudly hailed, but she came on, and with her stem and starboard bow struck the port bow of the Ovington.

The Ovington, in addition to her masthead and side lights, was carrying a bright white light over the stern.

The defendants, who counter-claimed, charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with improperly neglecting to give any signal or warning that the Ovington was going to anchor.

Butt, J. found both ships to blame. He condemned the Queen Victoria for bad look-out. As to the Ovington he said as follows: "With regard to the Ovington I confess I have had more doubt. She had come across the line of navigation up to Glasgow for the purpose of coming to anchor, and had not got straightened up. She was lying probably with some little way upon her, partially across the line of navigation. It occurred to me, and the Elder Brethren are strong upon this point, that in those circumstances it was incumbent upon her to have a proper look-out. She clearly had not a proper look-out aft, for the Queen Victoria, with her lights properly burning, is allowed to approach within 200 yards of her before those on board the Ovington are aware of her presence. That was negligent navigation. The Elder Brethren advise me, and I agree with them, that, had she had a proper look-out aft, and had she seen the Queen Victoria coming up at a greater distance, they think that she would have made, and they advise me that she certainly ought to have made, a signal with her steam-whistle to draw attention to the fact that she was lying very nearly motionless in the line of navigation. They moreover advise me that, having regard to the way in which the Queen Victoria approached her, she ought certainly to have set her engines astern, and that that in all probability would have avoided this collision. I must, therefore, pronounce both these vessels to blame."

Sir Walter Phillimore and Holman, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—There was no need for the Ovington to have a look-out aft. She was carrying a fixed stern light, which was quite sufficient by itself to indicate her manœuvres to the Queen Victoria.

Barnes, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The Lord Chancellor.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. I confess that, even if I had been left to my own unbiassed judgment, I should have thought that, under the circumstances of this particular case, the vessel which, being partly at all events within the ordinary line of navigation where ships might reasonably be expected to navigate, and it being dark and cloudy, suddenly stops its way and prepares to anchor, when for aught it knows vessels may be coming up behind, ought to give notice to vessels approaching from behind that there is an obstruction in the way. I should have thought that this would have been her duty on ordinary principles applicable not to ships alone. It would appear from the state of things in this case that more than the ordinary precautions should have been taken to have given some notice to the Queen Victoria. Of course what that is to be differs according to the place, the exigencies of the case, and the space for navigation. In the case of a carriage on the high road being overtaken there is some indication made, and some precaution taken. But if I had not thought so, I should have found myself differing from the Elder Brethren in the court below, who agree that a proper look-out should have been kept for the Queen Victoria. They thought and advised that the Ovington ought to have made some whistle signal to draw attention to the fact that she was lying, as is admitted, in the line of navigation. They also advised that, when the Queen Victoria approached, the Ovington ought to have set her engines astern, and so have avoided the collision. That is what happened below. Then we are advised by our assessors that they entirely agree with the assessors in the court below. I certainly should not be inclined, even if I were of a different opinion, to express an opinion different to theirs. But the truth is that, even if I had been left to my own unassisted judgment, I should have come to the same conclusion. I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The question here is, whether the Ovington failed to take the ordinary precautions necessary for safe navigation under the circumstances of the case. It is not as if she had stopped in some unfrequented place, but she had stopped in the fairway of ships coming up and going down the Clyde. Therefore she knew that ships would be coming up. Now the nautical gentlemen both here and below say that, stopping as she did across the fairway of the channel, she ought to have looked out for vessels approaching her. They say she ought to have had a look-out for vessels coming up astern. They admittedly did not do that. Our assessors then go on to say that, if she had had such a look-out, she must have seen the Queen Victoria coming up, and considering that she was only just forging ahead, almost lying dead athwart the channel, she ought to have given notice to the other ship that she was so, and the ordinary way of doing it was by using her whistle. I agree with that view, and think it was her duty. I therefore see no reason to interfere with the decision of the court below.

Clink v. Radford and Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Cesser clause—Construction—Lien for demurrage at port of discharge—Detention at port of loading.

By a charter-party it was provided that the ship was to load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of coals, and was to proceed to the port of discharge, "the cargo to be unloaded at the average rate of not less than one hundred tons per working day . . . charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of fourpence per ton register per diem, except in case of unavoidable accident . . . charterers' liability, under this charter-party, to cease on the cargo being loaded, the owners having a lien on the cargo for freight and demurrage." In an action by the owners against the charterers for damages for detention at the port of loading:

Held, that the provisions for demurrage at the port of discharge could not be extended, so as to apply to damages for detention at the port of loading, and that the cesser clause afforded no defence to the action.

Bannister v. Breslauer (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 418; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 490; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 497) observed upon.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Pollock, B., on further consideration after the trial with a jury.

The action was brought by a shipowner against the charterers of the ship for damages for detention at the port of loading. By the charter-party the ship was to load at Newcastle, New South Wales, "in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of coals," and after proceeding to San Francisco, was to deliver her cargo, "the cargo to be unloaded at the average rate of not less than one hundred tons per working day . . . charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of fourpence per ton register per diem, except in case of unavoidable accident or other hindrance beyond charterers' control . . . the charterers' liability under this charter-party to cease on the cargo being loaded, the owners having a lien on the cargo for freight and demurrage."

The ship was detained for sixteen days beyond the time in which she ought to have loaded, and, the plaintiff suing for damages for this detention, the defendants relied on the cesser clause. Pollock, B., on further consideration, held that the cesser clause afforded no defence to the action, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

R. T. Reid, Q.C. and A. Spokes for the defendants.—No demurrage is specifically mentioned at the port of loading, but the lien clause should be construed liberally, and the word "demurrage" should be extended beyond its strict meaning, so as to include damages for detention at the port of loading. The Restitution Steamship Company v. Sir John Pirie and Co.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Colliery guarantee—Demurrage—Cesser clause.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Cave, J., reported 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 330; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 428.

The action was brought to recover damages for demurrage and for the detention of a ship at the port of loading.

By a charter-party it was agreed between the plaintiffs, who were the owners of a steamship called the Restitution, and the defendants as charterers, that the ship should proceed to Cardiff and "there load in the usual and customary manner" a cargo of coals for carriage to Singapore. An advance freight was to be paid "eight days from final sailing from the last port in the United Kingdom, and from the date of master's signing clean bills of lading without alteration as presented by charterers." The vessel was "to be loaded as customary, but subject in all respects to the colliery guarantee, in 108 colliery working hours. The cargo to be unloaded at the average rate of not less than 200 tons per working day . . . or charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of 30*s.* per hour. The charterers' liability under this charter-party to cease on the cargo being loaded and the advance freight paid, the owners having a lien on the cargo for the balance of the freight and demurrage."

By the colliery guarantee, the colliery owners undertook to load the ship for the defendants subject to the following condition: "The said steamer shall load in Roath Basin, Cardiff, and after being completely discharged and unballasted and written notice thereof given to us within our usual office hours, we shall be allowed, for shipping a cargo of Ferndale steam coal to be received by the vessel at the usual tip or tips, 108 hours during which she shall be available and ready for loading. Demurrage, if any, to be at the rate of 20*s.* per hour."

The vessel was not loaded within the stipulated time, and the present action being brought for demurrage, Cave, J. held that the defendants, the charterers, were relieved from liability by virtue of the cesser clause.

Abel Thomas for the defendants.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff, the shipowner, has sued the defendants for demurrage, which he asserts was caused by delay at the port of loading. On what contract is he suing? What contract between them can give rise to a claim for demurrage except the charter-party? That is the only contract between them that could give rise to it. When a shipowner sues for demurrage he sues for damages in respect of the detention of his ship; therefore we must see what the contract is with regard to the employment of this ship. The contract, whatever it is or between whomsoever it may be, with regard to getting coals from the colliery and bringing them down to the quay and putting them on board the ship is not a contract for the hire of the ship. The colliery owner has nothing to do with the ship, and does not hire her. The contract for the hire of the ship is the charter-party and nothing else. On looking at the charter-party, therefore, we must first of all see whether there is a demurrage clause in it. The charter-party says, "the ship to be loaded as customary." That has nothing to do with the colliery guarantee unless it is customary to have a colliery guarantee in every case at this port. It goes on, "but subject in all respects to the colliery guarantee." The utmost that does is to bring into the charter-party so much of the colliery guarantee as is applicable to the charter-party, and that must be taken as though it was written into it. The guarantee states that the coals are to be shipped from under the tip, and to be shipped in a certain number of hours, and demurrage (if it is not done in those hours) is to be paid at the rate of 20*s.* an hour. Therefore the last point that has been raised does not arise, because here the demurrage is fixed. Now, the colliery guarantee is written into the stipulation in the charter-party as to loading. The charter-party is full of other stipulations, such as with regard to the unloading and the time at which the ship should arrive, but these are not affected by introducing that stipulation as to loading. Now, the cesser clause assumes a breach of the charter-party as against the shipowner, and in a certain case the liability of the charterers—that is, the defendants—is to cease. These cesser clauses are never put in except where a person, who is really an agent, makes himself liable as a principal under the charter-party. There is no sense in them except in that respect. Then, because the defendants are acting as agents for somebody else, but are also making themselves liable as charterers, they put in a clause that "the charterers' liability under this charter-party is to cease on the cargo being loaded and the advance freight paid." Now, that is the whole of the cesser clause. The charter-party goes on in the way in which charter-parties usually are drawn, "the owners having a lien on the cargo for the balance of the freight and demurrage." That is a statement; it is not part of the condition on which the cesser is to take place. The cargo being loaded and the advance freight paid are the only conditions of the cesser. No doubt the last clause gives a lien on the cargo for the balance of the freight and demurrage, but it is no part of the condition on which the charterers' personal liability is to cease. When the cargo is loaded and the advance freight paid, the charterer's liability ceases, but the shipowner has a lien on the cargo; that is to say, he gives up his right to sue the charterers, and is content to take, for the purpose of enforcing his right to demurrage, the right of a lien on the cargo. Now, first of all it is said that that only applies to demurrage caused at the port of discharge. But that would make nonsense of the clause; for then the clause would be that the charterers' liability for demurrage caused at the port of discharge is to cease on the ship being loaded and advance freight paid eight days after the ship has sailed. That is pure nonsense, because the claim for demurrage at the port of discharge has not arisen at that time. Why should we confine general words, which are applicable to demurrage both at the port of loading and the port of discharge, to one of them only? The only reason given was that it had been undertaken that the captain should sign clean bills of lading. I do not think it is necessary in the present case to determine what is the meaning of that, or what would be the effect of it in favour of the holder of the bills of lading. The coals may be shipped under this charter-party by the charterer for himself, in which case he would not really want a bill of lading. He would get one perhaps, and then he would probably pass it on; but he need not, and if he did not then there is no bill of lading in the way. If there is a bill of lading it would give no new rights as between the shipowner and the charterer, if the latter has not handed it on to someone else. He would be liable on the charter-party just as if there was no bill of lading. A bill is nothing, then, as between

Gorell Barnes, Q.C. and Leek, for the plaintiff, cited

Gardiner v. Macfarlane, 16 Court Sess. Cas. 4th series, 658.

Lord Esher, M.R.—It seems to me that rules have been laid down in the various cases which are enough for our decision of this case. The main rule as to the interpretation of the cesser clause in a charter-party which I gather on looking at the cases is that, unless the cesser clause is expressed in terms so clear that it cannot be got rid of, the court will always be inclined to construe it so as not to apply to the particular breach complained of, if by so doing the owner is left unprotected against everyone else. In other words, it cannot be assumed that the owner would by the cesser clause give up, without any mercantile reason at all, rights stipulated for in the contract. If that be true, then the matter here, as in other cases, depends on whether, if the cesser clause be applied to the particular breach complained of so as to free the charterer, we can find that with regard to this particular breach the owner has a remedy for his loss against someone else. If this is so, we should construe the cesser clause in its fullest possible meaning, and say that the charterer is released; but if it is found that by so construing it the owner would be left without any remedy against anyone else, then we must say that the cesser clause could not have been intended to apply to such a breach. That is the rule that has been clearly adopted; let us now apply it to the present case.

The breach which is here relied on is a breach by the charterers in not loading within a reasonable time. If the charterers are not liable for that breach, has the owner a claim against anyone in respect of it? That depends upon whether the word "demurrage" can be applicable in this charter-party to the breach complained of here as committed at the port of loading. To determine this we must look at the whole charter-party. Looking at the owner's rights at the port of loading, we find that the charterers are bound to load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of coals. An unreasonable delay in this would be a breach by the charterers. Now, is there any demurrage applicable to that breach? It seems to me there is none. No demurrage is mentioned, no fixed sum is settled as payable for detention. So that, reading alone what is said of the port of loading, no demurrage is mentioned at all in any sense of the word. Now, coming to the port of discharge, we find that the cargo is "to be unloaded at the average rate of not less than 100 tons per working day"—and knowing the amount of cargo we can calculate the number of days—"the charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of fourpence per ton register per diem, except in case of unavoidable accident." That comes to this: the charterers are to have so many days for unloading, and for all days occupied after that time demurrage at a fixed rate is to be paid. But that demurrage applies only to the unloading of the ship, and it would, I think, be unfair to apply to delay in loading that which is expressly stipulated to be for delay in unloading. We find, therefore, that there is no clause allowing demurrage at the port of loading, but there is one referring to the port of discharge. Then comes the cesser clause by which "the charterers' liability under this charter-party to cease on the cargo being loaded, the owners having a lien on the cargo for freight and demurrage." That means the demurrage at the port of discharge which had just been previously mentioned, and therefore the owner has no lien under this charter-party for delay of the ship at the port of loading. If that is the true construction of this charter-party with regard to delay at the port of loading, and if the cesser clause be construed so as to relieve the charterers from liability for their breach, then the shipowner will be left wholly unprotected. Therefore, according to the rule laid down, this cesser clause does not apply to the breach for which the plaintiff has brought this action, and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. There is an additional reason for holding that no lien is given by this charter-party for delay at the port of loading, namely, the inconvenience and difficulty arising from a lien for an unascertained and unascertainable amount. As to Bannister v. Breslauer (ubi sup.), I only say that, if that case is contrary to the view I have expressed of the rule to be applied here, it cannot be supported.

the shipowner and the charterer but a receipt that he has received the goods on board. So long as it remains in the charterer's hands it is only a receipt; but when it is passed on to someone else it may give him rights. Now, supposing that that person would be entitled to say, "You have no lien; you have given me a clean bill of lading," what then? It does not affect the question as between the present plaintiffs and defendants. I do not think this bill of lading would absolve the holder of it from this lien, because there is such a reference to the charter-party as incorporates into the bill the stipulation as to lien. I do not think it would; but if it did it would have no effect in the present case, which is between the owner and the charterer. The learned judge was right in saying that the personal liability of the persons who have signed as charterers has ceased altogether. The judgment was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Lindley, L.J.—If this action had been brought against Davies and Son, who signed the colliery guarantee, the questions would be very different to those which we have now to consider. The question we have now to consider is, what is the liability of Pirie and Co. upon the document which they have signed, including—to put the most favourable possible view to the appellants—the colliery guarantee as part of the charter-party. If you leave the colliery guarantee out altogether there is no case at all against the defendants. If you bring it in as part of the charter-party and construe the two documents as one, which is the most favourable way for the appellants, then we have to consider the true meaning of the expanded document. I see no difficulty in that, and it appears to me that these words override everything, and are clearly applicable to the case: "the charterers' liability under this charter-party to cease on the cargo being loaded and the advance freight paid." That language is perfectly general, and means that if the cargo is loaded and the advance freight paid, than the charterers' liability is to cease altogether. Then it goes on to say, "the owners having a lien on the cargo for the balance of the freight and demurrage." That I should construe in this way, "the owners are to have a lien." Be that as it may, the exoneration appears to me to be as plain as anything can be. Then it is said that that is contrary to Gray v. Carr (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522) and some other cases. I do not think so. I have not narrowly compared the language in this document with the language in the document which was before the court in Gray v. Carr; but it appears to me that all the cases mentioned by Cave, J., so far as they go, amply justify the construction he has put upon this document. The appeal should be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—The learned judge considered the cesser clause an answer to this action; I think he was right, and I agree with him.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and think this judgment must be affirmed. We have here to construe a cesser clause providing for the ceasing of the charterers' liability on the cargo being loaded. No doubt if the parties so choose they may frame the clause so as to emancipate the charterers from any liability they like, without any terms for the compensation of the owner; but we should not expect to meet with such a one in a commercial transaction. Such clauses generally couple with the cesser of the charterers' liability a corresponding creation of lien. And there is a principle of reason which is obvious to commercial minds, and which should be considered, namely, that it is to be expected that reasonable persons would regard the lien as an equivalent for the cesser of liability. That is a sound principle of commercial reasoning which has been recognised and sanctioned by the courts in many important cases. That being the principle to apply in construing charter-parties, no one would expect to find a shipowner putting himself at the mercy of the charterer without any equivalent unless there was some other way of protecting himself against the act of the charterer. Taking that as the principle which is to be applied here, the question is reduced to the simple one of putting a construction on this charter-party. The lien is given, and if it is to be commensurate with the release of liability we shall be able to ascertain what is meant by the charterers' liability ceasing on the cargo being loaded by examining the extent to which the lien has been given. The lien clause provides that the owners are to have a lien on the cargo for freight and demurrage; we proceed, therefore, to ask whether "demurrage" includes damages for detention at the port of loading. Now, "demurrage" is a word with two senses, and I will take the language of Cleasby, B. in Lockhart v. Falk (33 L. T. Rep. N. S., at p. 98; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 11; L. Rep. 10 Ex., at p. 135), as to the way in which we ought to deal with the question of interpretation. He says this: "The word 'demurrage' no doubt properly signifies the agreed additional payment (generally per day) for an allowed detention beyond a period either specified in or to be collected from the instrument; but it has also a popular or more general meaning of compensation for undue detention, and from the whole of each charter-party containing the clause in question we must collect what is the proper meaning to be assigned to it." Demurrage is, as has been said, an elastic word; it has a strict sense, but it can be stretched beyond it. The learned Baron proceeds thus: "When the charter-party contains no clause allowing demurrage at a specified rate at all, it has been held that the word 'demurrage' in the exemption clause applies to detention, and that the charterer is discharged as soon as a cargo is on board. This was the case of Bannister v. Breslauer (ubi sup.)." Demurrage having two meanings, the charter-party must be looked at to see which sense the word is used in there—the strict sense or the elastic sense. But a lien is also created, and, primâ facie, a lien is only created as a convenient means of obtaining payment of a liquidated sum, or of a sum that may be ascertained; and though the parties may agree that the lien shall extend to an unliquidated sum, nevertheless there is a primâ facie inconvenience in creating a lien to cover unliquidated damages for detention. So far as I know all the cases, except Bannister v. Breslauer (ubi sup.), where a lien has been created for damages for detention of a ship are cases where you can directly or indirectly find some practical means for measuring the damages. Bannister v. Breslauer (ubi sup.) can only be supported, if at all, on the ground that no other meaning could be given to the word "demurrage" in that particular charter-party than by including in it damages for detention at the port of loading. With these observations we come to the remainder of the charter-party. We find that the word "demurrage" is used in the previous part of the charter-party in its strict sense of damages agreed upon for delay at the port of discharge, but there is no similar clause as to the port of loading. Coming, therefore, to the cesser clause, we must assume that it only discharges the charterers from liability with respect to those matters which come under the head of demurrage in the sense in which that word has been previously used in the charter-party, and does not extend to unliquidated damages for detention at the port of loading. It is unnecessary to go through all the cases when once the principle of reasoning which we have applied here has been extracted from them. The cesser clause in this charter-party has no application to the present action.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the rule which is to be applied to this case is well ascertained. That rule is a most rational one, and it is that the cesser of the charterer's liability is to be taken if possible as coextensive with the lien of the owner. If that were not so we should have this result; a clause in the charter-party creating a liability, a cesser clause destroying it, and no lien clause re-creating it in someone else. What then would be the use of a stipulation as to loading? It seems obvious to me that such a construction would be most unreasonable, and the court will not adopt it unless absolutely driven to it. The clause must, if it can reasonably bear it, be construed so as to create a lien co-extensive with the liability destroyed by it. In Kish v. Cory (ubi sup.) Amphlett, B. said: "There are two ways, and two ways only, in which that injustice could be remedied; either to say "the charterer's liability to cease" does not go beyond the freight and demurrage properly so called, which are subject to the lien; or to say that demurrage, where mentioned in the lien clause, includes what may properly be called detention." The question now is, as to the meaning of "demurrage" in this cesser clause. That word, as has been already pointed out, has a strict and also a popular meaning. We have to consider how it is used in this charter-party. Is there any reason why we should depart from its strict and proper meaning? There are in the charter-party provisions as to the loading of the ship, but no mention of demurrage at the port of loading. There are also provisions as to the port of discharge, and there demurrage is in terms provided for. It seems to follow that there is no reason for extending the meaning of the word "demurrage," and the word as used in the lien clause applies only to demurrage at the port of discharge. There is this further reason for holding as we do: that, unless driven by stress of circumstances, we should not be inclined to apply the lien to unliquidated damages. I also wish to add that this cesser clause lends itself easily to this restricted meaning. It does not say simply that the charterer's liability is to cease, but the charterer's liability "under this charter-party." Those words seems to me to refer to payments made in accordance with the charter-party rather than to unliquidated damages for a breach of it. Though I should arrive at the same conclusion if those words were not in the charter-party, still I think they make the restricted construction of the cesser clause specially applicable.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

March 3 and 4, 1891.

MACKENZIE v. MACKINTOSH. (a)

Solicitor—Lien—Charge on money to be recovered in two actions—One action only successful—Lien of solicitor on money recovered for costs of both actions in priority to charge—Marine insurance.

A difference exists between the lien of a solicitor on a fund recovered for his client in an action and on deeds coming into his possession, inasmuch as in the former case he has no lien for all costs due to him from his client, but only for the costs of recovering that particular fund.

A. having threatened to sue B. on a dishonoured bill of exchange, B. agreed to give him a charge on certain money which B.'s solicitors were taking proceedings to recover from two insurance companies on two separate policies of insurance on a ship. The charge was prepared by B.'s solicitors, after an interview at which A. and B. were also present, and the solicitors sent it to A. in a letter in which they undertook out of any moneys received by them from either the S. Association or the M. Association under the policies to hand over to A. "after payment of the legal charges" so much of the amount recovered from the said associations as might be sufficient to repay him the amount secured by the charge.

The proceedings against the M. Association were compromised on the association agreeing to pay a certain sum, and B.'s solicitors then wrote to A. saying he might consider himself secured. Sometime afterwards the S. Association obtained judgment in their favour.

Held, that if the charge stood alone, B.'s solicitors would only be entitled to be paid their costs of recovering the fund in priority to A.; but that the undertaking and surrounding circumstances showed that there was a bargain which entitled the solicitors to have their costs with reference to the proceedings on both policies out of any money received, in priority to any payment being made to A. on his charge.

TRIAL OF ACTION.

In 1886 Robert Wade, who was the owner of a ship called the Vigilant, effected a policy of insurance with the Bristol Marine Insurance Association for the sum of 1250*l.* on the hull of that vessel, and also a similar policy with the South of England General Club for Sailing Ships for a like sum; and also a policy with the South of England Freight Club for the sum of 300*l.* on the freight of the vessel.

In Oct. 1886 the plaintiff was the holder of two acceptances given by Wade, one for 265*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, dated the 20th July 1886 and due on the 11th Nov. 1886, and another for 100*l.*, dated the 20th July 1886 and due on the 12th Oct. 1886.

The acceptances were drawn by the master of the Vigilant upon Wade in favour of Wade's agent at St. Thomas, in the West Indies, in respect of expenses there incurred by the agent. The latter acceptance having been dishonoured, the plaintiff was about to commence legal proceedings against Wade in order to recover the amount thereof, but it was afterwards agreed that the legal proceedings should not be commenced in consideration of Wade securing to the plaintiff the amount due to him by virtue of both acceptances by giving him a charge on the policies above-mentioned for the amount of both acceptances, together with interest thereon.

The Vigilant at this time had been lost, and the defendants Lowless and Co. had been retained by Wade to act for him as his solicitors to recover the sums due to him under the above-mentioned policies.

On the 21st Oct. 1886 the plaintiff's managing clerk, Wade, and Nelson and one of the defendant firm, met at the defendants' office, and the following charge was dictated by Nelson to a shorthand clerk, and was afterwards written out and signed by Wade:

I hereby charge all my interest in a certain policy of marine insurance dated the 15th Feb. 1886 effected with the South of England General Club for Sailing Ships for the sum of 1250*l.* on the hull of The Vigilant, and also a certain policy dated the 15th Feb. 1886 effected with the South of England Freight Club for the sum of 300*l.* on the freight of The Vigilant, and also a certain policy of insurance current for the year 1886 effected with the Bristol Marine Insurance Association for the sum of 1250*l.* on the hull of The Vigilant, with the payment to you of the amount of two several acceptances of mine to the draft of John Sharpe, the master of The Vigilant, as follows:

1. For 265*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, dated the 20th July 1886, and due on the 11th Nov. 1886.

2. The 100*l.*, dated 20th July 1886, to the draft of John Sharpe, due on the 12th Oct. 1886, making a total of 365*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, together with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the due date of the said bills until payment and the notarial charges thereon, and I hereby agree and authorise my solicitors, Messrs. Lowless and Co., or the said South of England Insurance Company, to pay out of such sums as I may recover against them by action at law or by arbitration to you the said D. Forbes Mackenzie and Co. the said sums so secured as aforesaid.

The charge was sent to the plaintiff by the defendants Lowless and Co., together with the following letter of the same date, and signed by them:

Dear Sir,—In pursuance of the inclosed written charge signed by Mr. Wade to-day, we undertake out of any moneys received by us from either the South of England Insurance Association or the Bristol Marine Insurance Association under the policies on The Vigilant referred to in Mr. Wade's security to hand over to you after payment of the legal charges so much of the amount recovered from the said association as may be sufficient to repay you the amount secured by Mr. Wade, or, in the event of the same not amounting to the amount of the charge, the whole thereof.

(a) Reported by E. A. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The claims against the insurance companies were prosecuted by the defendants Lowless and Co. as solicitors for Wade, and that against the Bristol Marine Insurance Association was, on the 10th Nov. 1887, compromised by them.

On the 11th Nov. 1887 the defendants Lowless and Co. sent the following letter to the plaintiff's solicitors:

As promised, we beg to advise you that our client's arbitration against the Bristol Association was concluded yesterday. The claim was compromised, the association agreeing to pay a sum which will more than cover your client's charge. Please send us exact particulars of this. Your clients will still have to wait for payment, a call will have to be made upon the members of the association to pay it, but they may look upon themselves as secured.

On the 15th Nov. 1887 the defendants Lowless and Co. also sent the following letter to the plaintiff's solicitors:

We are obliged by your favour of yesterday, which we will send to our client, but it is quite necessary you should wait for collection of the money; until then our client has no means of paying yours.

Our object in writing was to satisfy them that the money is at least secured.

On the 21st March 1888 the sum of 410*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.* was paid to the defendants Lowless and Co. in respect of the policy in the Bristol Association. The plaintiff was not aware at that time that the money had been actually paid to the defendants Lowless and Co., and had not given consent to it being paid to them.

An action was brought against the South of England General Club for Sailing Ships to recover the amount of the policies, but, after protracted litigation, the action resulted in favour of the company.

A question then arose as to the rights of the plaintiff and the defendants Lowless and Co. with reference to the money recovered from the Bristol Marine Insurance Association.

The plaintiff contended that he was entitled to be paid the amount of his charge thereout, subject to the taxed costs of the defendants Lowless and Co. of recovering that sum; while the defendants Lowless and Co. contended that they were also entitled to be paid the amount of their costs of the action against the South of England General Club for Sailing Ships in priority to anything being paid to the plaintiff, the result of which would be that the plaintiff would get nothing.

The plaintiff then commenced this action to have the question decided.

On the 17th July 1889 a receiving order was made against Wade, but the defendant Mackintosh, his trustee in bankruptcy, disclaimed any interest in the money in dispute in this action.

The action was heard by Kekewich, J., and the plaintiff's managing clerk stated in his evidence that at the meeting on the 21st Oct. 1886 Nelson stated that the policies could not be handed over to the plaintiff, as the defendants Lowless and Co. were collecting the money; but he agreed to give the plaintiff a letter undertaking to pay the money when it was received.

Renshaw, Q.C. and Biss for the plaintiff.—The defendants have no general lien on the money, but only for their taxed costs of recovering it:

Lann v. Church, 4 Madd.;
Bozon v. Bolland, 4 My. & Cr. 354, 357;
Hall v. Laver, 1 Hare, 571, 577.

The same rule applies to money obtained as the result of a compromise:

Ormerod v. Tate, 1 East, 464;
Ross v. Buxton, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 630; 42 Ch. Div. 190, 195.

To some extent this is a question of construction. The charge given by Wade is clear. The letter with which it is sent creates the difficulty. But in it the two insurance companies are separated, and the defendants undertake to pay out the money received from "either," and later on, after referring to the payment of the legal charges, they refer to the "amount recovered from the said association," and not associations. Therefore, after the defendants have been paid the sum due to them for their taxed costs of recovering the money received from the Bristol Marine Insurance Association, the plaintiff is entitled to the balance towards payment of the amount due to him on the charge. When the defendants, in their letters of the 11th and 15th Nov. told the plaintiff that he was secured they made themselves trustees of the money for the plaintiff subject to the payment of the costs of recovering it, which are given them by statute:

Re Clark; Ex parte Newland, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 916; 4 Ch. Div. 515.

It is not likely that the plaintiff would have consented in consideration of the charge to stay the proceedings he was about to commence against Wade, if the agreement was that the defendants were to have all these costs out of the fund, as they now contend, before he received anything. The compromise was agreed to in Nov. 1887, just before the letter of the 11th of that month, though the amount had to be collected from the members of the association, and was not actually ready for payment until March 1888. If the agreement was as is contended for by the defendants, the plaintiff would not have allowed the defendants after November to go on with the other action at his expense.

Marten, Q.C. and Horace Nelson for the defendants Lowless and Co.—These defendants have a general lien on the money in their hands:

Basil Montagu's Summary of the Law of Lien, p. 53;
Mercer v. Graves, L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 499;
The General Share Trust Company v. Chapman, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 179; 1 C. P. Div. 771;
Jones v. Turnbull, 2 M. & W. 601;
Re Messenger; Ex parte Calvert, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 920; 3 Ch. Div. 317;
Fisher on Mortgages, 3rd ed. vol. 1, p. 158, ss. 201, 295;
Colmer v. Ede, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 884; 40 L. J. 185, Ch.;
Stokes on Solicitors, part 2, c. iv., p. 138.

In the cases cited on the other side the money had not been received by the solicitor. In the case of Re Clark; Ex parte Newland (ubi sup.), the money had been provided by the surety for the purpose of paying the creditors, and it was the money of the surety, and the solicitor had sent a letter to the creditors saying he would pay. When the defendants wrote the letters of the 11th and 15th Nov. the amount agreed on was 720*l.* They thought that would be sufficient; but it was reduced by calls due to the association from Wade. The words "legal charges" in the undertaking mean charges against Wade, and there is nothing in the letter to confine them to the particular company from which the money is received. These defendants were aware of Wade's pecuniary position, and it is not likely that they would continue speculative actions in which the plaintiff would have the benefit and they the responsibility.

Renshaw in reply.—Apart from the undertaking it is clear that the plaintiff would be entitled to the fund subject to the payment to these defendants of their taxed costs of recovering the amount. There is a difference between the lien of a solicitor on documents in his possession and the fruits of a judgment:

Lucas v. Peacock, 9 Beav. 177.

The cases cited on the other side do not touch this point. The book referred to, viz., Basil Montagu's Summary of the Law of Lien, was published before the decision in Bozon v. Bolland (ubi sup.). If the plaintiff had continued his proceedings, and recovered payment on the bills, he could have garnished the amount received from the Bristol Marine. He agreed to take the charge instead, and ought to have had the policies handed over to him; but, as the defendants had begun the proceedings against the insurance companies, they were allowed to retain them, and that is the reason that this undertaking was given by them. It was intended to meet the case of the defendants obtaining possession of the fund. It is an undertaking severally applicable to both associations, and the words after "legal charges" must be read distributively. "Amount" and "association" are both in the singular. Though the money in Re Clark; Ex parte Newland (ubi sup.), was supplied by the surety, the judgment is that the solicitor was a trustee of it. These defendants obtained the money from the association behind the back of the plaintiff, and on giving an indemnity to the association, and can obtain no benefit from having it in their possession:

Wickens v. Townshend, 1 Russ. & My. 361.

He also referred to Fisher on Mortgages, 3 edit. vol. i. p. 158; "Lien of Solicitors," s. 225.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question is, what are the rights of the defendants with reference to the undertaking given by them on the 21st Oct. 1886 to the plaintiff. That undertaking cannot be understood without reference to the charge of even date given by Mr. Robert Wade to the plaintiff; and that charge and undertaking cannot properly be construed without regard, of course, to the circumstances under which they were given, and to the law applicable to the subject-matter of such charge and undertaking. Mr. Robert Wade was a debtor to the plaintiff on bills of exchange. One bill was due, the other was still running, but the plaintiff had a claim against Mr. Robert Wade. He, on the other hand, had claims against certain mutual insurance associations in respect of a ship and the freight of a ship, and he was willing to give the plaintiff a charge on the moneys coming to him from those associations, so as to meet the debt due or to become due in respect of the bills. If Mr. Robert Wade had simply given the plaintiff a charge, that charge might have been worked out in more ways than one. The mortgagee—that is to say, the person entitled to the charge—might have insisted on a right himself to recover, or he might have given notice to the associations, and that ultimately would have had the same effect as a garnishee order; or he might have authorised the mortgagor's solicitor to proceed and give them notice to pay over. In either event what he would have taken over under that would have been what the mortgagor could give him—no more and no less, supposing the charge to be properly drawn. I apprehend that what the mortgagor was entitled to give the plaintiff was a charge as regarded each association on the money recovered from that association. Take for instance the Bristol Marine Association. If the proceedings against that association had gone on in the usual way—either by action at law, or by arbitration, or by compromise—and a certain sum had ultimately been found to be payable to Mr. Robert Wade on his policy, that amount would have belonged to the mortgagee by virtue of the charge. But what were the moneys recovered? The moneys recovered of course are represented by the sum paid by the association, less the costs of obtaining payment. It has been argued on behalf of the defendants that a client employing a solicitor to recover moneys from the debtor to him is not only liable to pay out of the moneys recovered the costs of the proceedings (which no one doubts), but that he is liable to pay out of those moneys all the costs which he happens to owe to the solicitor. That, according to my view, is not the law, and notwithstanding the citations from an ancient book—at least a book many years old, namely, Basil Montagu's Summary of the Law of Lien—it never has been the law within the present generation. But there is a broad distinction between the lien of a solicitor on his client's deeds, documents, and papers, generally called a lien on deeds, which attaches to all his papers, and the lien on a fund recovered for his client in an action. There are really no modern cases (not one has been cited) going to show that there is a charge on the fund in the way of a general lien for all of the costs due from the client to the solicitor; whereas it has been settled—beyond the time of legal memory I might almost say—that a solicitor has a lien on the deeds, documents, and papers in his hands. The distinction between the two liens (they are both called "liens,") is that one is passive and the other an active lien. In one case he can only retain his papers, and in the other he can enforce his lien as a charge and recover it, and he can do so independently of the statute which enabled the solicitor to proceed in the Court of Chancery by petition and obtain a charging order. That certainly seems to me to have been established—at any rate to be laid down, I will not say established—in the case of Bozon v. Bolland (4 My. & C. 354), where the subject is elaborately treated. The doctrine is also recognised in the case cited by Mr. Renshaw, in reply, of Lucas v. Peacock (9 Beav. 177), where (p. 180) Lord Langdale says this: "The solicitor's lien on a fund is not a general lien, it extends only to costs in the cause or costs immediately connected with the costs of the cause;" and Bozon v. Bolland (ubi sup.) is referred to. It is true that in that case, as in many others, the fund was a fund in court. But there are cases which applied the direction to funds not in court, and on principle it seems to me that the rule must be the same. It is said that Bacon, V.C. (sitting as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy) decided otherwise in the case of Re Messenger; Ex parte Calvert (34 L. T.

Rep. N. S. 920; 3 Ch. Div. 317). I have looked at the case and have read the judgment more than once and have tried to master the facts which the learned Vice-Chancellor said were a little complicated. What clearly happened there—at any rate what clearly happened according to the Vice-Chancellor's view—was that the solicitor was claiming a lien on the deeds. The solicitor had acted as the solicitor for the mortgagor; the mortgagor became bankrupt. Then the solicitor was employed by his trustee in bankruptcy to sell the equity of redemption, and the solicitor (as the solicitor for the mortgagor) had got the deeds and had never parted with them—he had a general lien on the deeds from the first. The Vice-Chancellor said that the solicitor had never lost the lien, and he certainly did not decide—he certainly did not purport to decide, and I do not think intended to decide—that there was anything like a general lien on the fund.

Therefore I apprehend that, if there had been merely a charge without anything more, the plaintiff here would have been entitled to recover from the several associations whatever was due from them, only deducting in each case the costs incurred in the recovery of the particular sum, and might have looked to Messrs. Lowless and Co. or to anyone else. But there was obviously an arrangement that Messrs. Lowless and Co. should conduct the litigation—the claims. It is not made the subject of agreement as between the parties, but in the charge there is a statement that Mr. Robert Wade agrees and authorises his solicitors to pay out of such sums as "I"—meaning "Robert Wade"—"may recover against them by action at law or by arbitration to you, D. Forbes Mackenzie and Co. the sums so secured." It is necessarily implied from that that it was intended that Lowless and Co. should take the necessary proceedings in the name of course of Robert Wade, and that they should receive the money. I cannot see how that could alter in any way the rights of the plaintiff. I think that he—I am looking now at the charge alone—would be entitled to say to Messrs. Lowless and Co., "You must pay me the moneys recovered from the Bristol Association, deducting only what is the cost incurred in recovering that sum. I am not concerned with your not recovering the costs incurred in making claims against the other association, any more than I am with the costs due to you from your client in respect of matters entirely outside this charge. You act for him and not for me. You recover the fund, and I do not of course seek to claim anything from you except the clear fund. But the clear fund is money paid by the association less the costs of recovering it." Now, if that is the right construction—and I apprehend it to be—of the charge with reference to the matter as it stood on the 21st Oct., what is the construction of the accompanying letter of undertaking? Messrs. Lowless and Co. being, as I have concluded, intended to conduct the litigation, conduct the claims. Of course, having notice of the charge made by their client, they gave (I suppose as part of the bargain) an undertaking to pay to the plaintiff "out of any moneys received by us from either the South of England Insurance Association or the Bristol Marine Insurance Association"—there are only two mentioned—"under the policies on the Vigilant referred to in Mr. Wade's security, to hand over to you after payment of the legal charges so much of the amount recovered from the said associations as may be sufficient to repay you the amount secured by Mr. Wade." By a slip of the pen "Association" was written there when I suppose "Associations" in the plural was intended. But it does not in the slightest degree alter the construction, and it may be read the other way. Why was that term put in, "to hand over to you after payment of the legal charges?" According to my view it was unnecessary if it was only inserted to secure to Messrs. Lowless and Co. what was coming to them—viz., the costs incurred by them as regarded each particular association out of the moneys recovered from the association. In that view, if it was only intended to cover that, it was put in out of abundant caution. Of course, that is possible. But after the words "after payment of the legal charges," there follows a reference to the moneys generally received from the two associations under the policies effected with the two associations. I think the grammatical meaning is, that the two claims are to be grouped together; that Messrs. Lowless and Co. are to conduct both claims; that they are to receive as one sum all the moneys recoverable from both; and that they are to deduct from the total the legal charges which they had incurred in respect of both. I fail to read the undertaking in any other way. I have looked at it as one is bound to look at a letter of this kind which is not perhaps perfectly clear as the point is raised. I have looked at it backwards and forwards. I have looked at it with reference to the charge, and I come to the conclusion which I came to at an early stage of the case yesterday, that the bargain was that legal charges of both claims were to be paid before any moneys could come to the plaintiff. That seems reasonable because one has to view what is fair as between man and man in such a proceeding. I leave out of sight that Mr. Wade was insolvent, because there seems to be some doubt whether Messrs. Lowless and Co. were aware of that fact at the time. This, however, I know, that Mr. Wade could not meet the bill which was due, and could only satisfy his creditor by giving a charge on claims against mutual insurance associations which all men know take some time and some trouble to recover. But it was likely that they should say: "If we are going to do this—in Wade's name, who is it is true our own client, but really on behalf of you who are going to take all the fruit—it is only fair that you should be responsible for the costs as far as the money recovered would go. You will not be our client, we shall have no legal right against you, but it is only fair that you should make us safe to the extent of the moneys recovered." Therefore, whether I look at it as a mere question of construction bringing the law to bear, or look at it from what is reasonable, it seems to me that the same result follows. Now, if that is sound, is there any reason in what happened afterwards to alter that construction and to give the plaintiff rights which he otherwise would not have had?

There are only two points made, and I will deal with them separately. In the first place, it is said that Messrs. Lowless and Co. declared themselves trustees of the moneys, or (for I suppose this is the meaning) that they promised to pay independently of their general costs against the other association the moneys received from one association. I say that must be the meaning, because a declaration of trust seems to me to be out of the question. As I have had occasion to say before, for a declaration of trust you not only want a trust and a cestui que trust which you have here, but you want property. I am far from saying that you may not make a declaration of trust of a fund when it shall be received; but if a plaintiff comes forward to make out and establish a case of a defendant being declared a trustee for him, he must show that he is a trustee of something. At the time when the letters which are relied upon here were written nothing had been received, and though, of course, it was hoped that moneys would be received, the moneys had not been received at all. Therefore I cannot fasten a declaration of trust on Messrs. Lowless and Co. by virtue of their letters of November 1887. But is it a binding promise irrespective of their undertaking? I think not. On the 11th Nov. they write telling the plaintiff that the money claim has been compromised and for a sum "which will more than cover your client's charge," and then they say: "Please send us exact particulars of this. Your clients will still have to wait for payment. A call will have to be made upon the members of the association to pay it, but they may look upon themselves as secured." No doubt, as Mr. King, who wrote the letter, told us in the witness-box, he honestly believed that it was so. The sum recovered on the compromise was considerably in excess of the plaintiff's claim. There was a set-off for calls due from Wade, but he thought that that would be small. He had not, of course, counted up his costs at that time, and he had no doubt that there would be a large balance, as he says. Really there is nothing in that amounting to a personal undertaking by the solicitors that a sum enough to cover the plaintiff's charge shall be handed over. Then all that happened afterwards was, that the plaintiff thought that, as Wade had got a judgment he might, in some way or another, raise enough money to pay him. But it was ultimately explained to him that that could not be done, and he would have to wait until the association paid. There is a case cited upon that which I must notice; it is the case of Re Clark; Ex parte Newland (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 916; 4 Ch. Div. 515). That was distinguished by Mr. Marten on the ground that money had there been paid by sureties, but money had been paid to the hands of the solicitors by a surety of the creditors, and therefore the money itself was in a different position and in that way not money received by the solicitor. I am not disposed to rely upon that distinction, but the money was in his hands. He was declaring a trust of money in his hands presently applicable, and I think that alone distinguishes it, and is sufficient to distinguish that case which does not otherwise, I think, have much application to the present.

The other point was rather a peculiar one, and one which I must deal with tenderly, because it affects persons who are not before the court. The Bristol Association were represented by solicitors who have been described as Messrs. Brittan and Co. of Bristol. The plaintiff had wisely given notice to them of his charge, and Messrs. Lowless and Co. (I have not the slightest doubt with perfect honesty) wished to get the moneys from Messrs. Brittan and Co., in order to satisfy the plaintiff, and also of course to satisfy themselves. Messrs. Brittan and Co. could not pay, having notice of the charge, without the assent of the plaintiff, and instead of getting that Messrs. Lowless and Co. give Messrs. Brittan and Co. an indemnity. I apprehend the indemnity was really given to the Bristol Association. It was given in terms to Messrs. Brittan and Co., and on that they paid. If my view of the law is right, that certainly increased Messrs. Lowless and Co.'s claim for costs, and the plaintiff might have recovered from the Bristol Association more than according to the construction of the charge he could claim from Messrs. Lowless and Co. But, had it been so, and supposing Messrs. Brittan and Co. had not paid and had said, "We must have the concurrence of the plaintiff" (the owner of the charges), the only result would have been, so far as I can at present determine, that the defendants Messrs. Lowless and Co. would have intervened and said, "You have promised to pay all our legal charges of both claims, and you cannot recover this fund and put it into your own pocket, except subject to those legal charges." If the undertaking is sound as well as the charge, really no harm was done; but, if the plaintiff has any claim against Messrs. Brittan and Co. or their clients, it is not in the slightest degree affected by my judgment. Messrs. Brittan and Co. have an indemnity which no doubt they deem sufficient, and I should have no doubt is sufficient, but that does not prevent their being liable. Of course, the indemnity is given because they may be liable, and it is against them that the plaintiff must go. I should not have gone into that if it had not been for the case which was cited of Wickens v. Townshend (1 Russ. & My. 361). It does not seem to me to bear much upon the case; but the point there was, that there was an improper receipt. In this case there does not seem to be any impropriety at all. I say no impropriety. There may be risk, there may be imprudence, but there is no impropriety in one man saying to another, "True you cannot pay to me without the concurrence of a third party; but I will give you an indemnity which is sufficient, and on that you may pay me." The result is, the liability still remains, and a third party is not injured, because he has a debtor still as he had before. The debtor is secured upon a binding indemnity. That distinguishes the case entirely from that where the court held there had been an improper proceeding. I think also that point fails. The result is, that the plaintiff's claim fails as regards his claim against Messrs. Lowless and Co.; but I think the plaintiff is entitled to have some inquiries made so as to ascertain whether they have been really overpaid or not, if the plaintiff thinks it worth while. According to Mr. King's account, the defendants after all are losers, and taking into account what they recovered from the Bristol Association and fruitless costs against the South of England Association, they are out of pocket. But still, if the plaintiff thinks it right, he is entitled to an account of what is due to him on his charge and to have the costs of the defendants brought in under both and taxed, and can so see whether there is any balance coming to their hands, of course at the risk of costs.

MONTGOMERIE AND OTHERS v. THE UNITED KINGDOM MUTUAL STEAMSHIP ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION LIMITED. (a)

Insurance (marine)—Mutual Marine Insurance Association—Agent for owners of ship entering ship for insurance—Agent thereby becoming member of association—Right of owners of ship not being members to sue the association for loss of ship.

The defendant association was a company limited by guarantee, and its objects were the mutual insurance by the association of the ships of the members, and of ships which the members might be authorised to insure in their own names, and of ships in which they may be otherwise interested, and of the freights of such ships, and every person became a member who, on behalf of himself or any other person or persons, insured or entered for protection any ship in the association, and ceased to be a member as soon as he no longer had any ship under insurance or protection in the association; and all claims were to be enforced against the association only, and not against any members thereof, and the association was not to be liable to any member or other person for the amount of any loss, except to the extent of the funds which the association could recover from the members or persons liable for the same. The managers and agents of a certain ship effected with the defendant association, by a deed-poll, a policy of insurance upon the ship and freight. While this policy was in force the ship became a total loss. In an action by the plaintiffs as part owners of the ship, suing on behalf of themselves and the other co-owners of the ship, to recover the loss:

Held (by Wright, J.), that the plaintiffs were not entitled to maintain the action, as their primâ facie right to sue as undisclosed principals was taken away by the express terms of the contract, and as the rules and articles of association of the company, which were incorporated with the policy, showed that it was the intention of the parties that the association should deal only with "members" in respect of the settlement of losses, and that in this case the agents, who entered the ship for insurance, were the "member" of the association in respect of such ship, and not the plaintiffs.

The United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association Limited v. Nevill (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226, n.; 19 Q. B. Div. 110) considered.

ACTION tried before Wright, J. without a jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, who were part owners of the steamship William Hartmann, of Newcastle, on behalf of themselves and all other the registered co-owners of the ship, to recover from the defendant association certain moneys alleged to be due to the plaintiffs on certain policies of insurance.

At the date of the policies in question, Messrs. Perry, Raines, and Co. were the managers and agents of the ship on behalf of the plaintiffs and the other co-owners of the ship; and Perry, Raines, and Co. effected with the defendant association an insurance upon the ship for 5000*l.*, and upon her freight for 1000*l.*, which expired on the 20th Feb. 1883. Upon the expiration of that policy, they effected another insurance on the ship for 4000*l.*, and upon her freight for 1000*l.* These policies of 4000*l.* and 1000*l.* respectively were to continue in force from the 20th Feb. 1883 to the 20th Feb. 1884.

In the month of Oct. 1883, and while these policies were in full force, the ship became a total loss by perils of the sea, and the claim now made by the plaintiffs against the association was, in respect of the total loss, for the said sum of 4000*l.*, and of 872*l.*, being the freight at risk under the freight policy, and in respect of average losses under all the policies, to which they said the defendants were liable to contribute, for a sum of about 200*l.*

The defendants in their defence said that Perry, Raines, and Co., as owners of the ship, entered the ship for insurance in the ship and freight clubs within the defendant association, which is a joint-stock company registered under the Companies Act 1862, having for its object the mutual insurance by the association of its members in respect of ships entered by them, and that by reason of such entries Perry, Raines, and Co. became members of the defendant association in respect of the insurances of the said ship; that under the memorandum and articles of association and the rules of the several clubs of the defendant association, the association is under no liability to any persons other than its members, and that the plaintiffs and the other co-owners, for whom they sue, were not entered on the register, and did not become members of the defendant association in respect of the said steamer, but that Perry, Raines, and Co. became members of the association in respect of the insurances.

After the loss of the ship, Perry, Raines, and Co. made claims upon the defendant association in respect thereof, and the defendant association settled with Perry, Raines, and Co., and paid to them as members of the association, and in accordance with the articles of association and the rules, the amounts due under the policies. The defendants also alleged that at the time of effecting the policies they had no notice that the plaintiffs were interested in the ship, or in the insurances effected thereon, and that they had no notice that the plaintiffs claimed to be so interested until after Perry, Raines, and Co. had become insolvent, and the moneys payable under the insurances had been paid to them.

The question now was whether, under the circumstances, the plaintiffs were entitled to maintain the present action against the defendant association.

The defendant association is a company limited by guarantee, and not having a capital divided into shares, and the objects for which the association is established are the mutual insurance by the asssociation (1) of the ships of the members, and of ships which the members may be authorised to insure in their own names, and of ships in which they may be otherwise interested, and whether propelled by steam, sails, or otherwise; and (2) of the freights of such ships; and (3) of the individual members themselves against any liabilities that may be incurred by them personally as owners or otherwise in respect of such ships; and (4) of all other interests or matters usually or properly covered by or included in insurances with respect to shipping and to interests therein, or liabilities in respect thereof, every such insurance being undertaken by the association either as such or on behalf of members of separate classes within the association.

By art. 4 (as to definition of members):

Every person who on behalf of himself or any other person or persons insures or enters for protection any ship or ships, or share or shares of a ship in the association, shall as from the date of the commencement of such insurance or protection be deemed to have become a member of the association, and every such person shall be deemed to have ceased to be a member as soon as he shall no longer have any ship, or share or shares of a ship under insurance or protection in the association, but without prejudice to the rights and remedies of the association against the person so ceasing to be a member in respect of obligations incurred up to the time of his ceasing to be such member.

The articles provided for the division of the association into three different classes or clubs, namely, the Steam Ship Club, the Freight Club, and the Protecting Club.

Art. 39 provides:

All policies of insurance underwritten on behalf of any of the said classes shall be underwritten in the name of the association, but no person shall in respect of any insurance or protection in any of the classes be liable to pay or entitled to receive any money in respect of any insurance or protection in any other of the classes.

Art. 41:

All claims in respect of insurances or protection shall be made and enforced against the association only, and not against any members thereof; but the association shall not be liable to any member or other person for the amount of any loss, claim, or demand, except to the extent of the funds which the association is able to recover from the members or persons liable for the same, and which are applicable to that purpose.

Art. 44:

For the purpose of providing funds for making any payment necessary or proper to be made by or on behalf of the association, it shall be lawful for the committee from time to time to direct that there shall be paid to the association by the members thereof rateably, for the purpose of providing for or making good any such payments, such sums as the committee may from time to time deem necessary.

Arts. 45 and 46 provide as to the rate of contribution to be paid by the members in respect of any loss, claim, demand, or expenses, and if the amount be not duly paid the amount of the deficiency shall be borne by the other members of the association, and payment may be enforced in the name of the association.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C. (Barnes, Q.C. and J. Walton with him) for the plaintiffs.—The defendant association are here sued in the character of insurers, and the first question is the right of the plaintiffs to sue. The plaintiffs, who are owners of the vessel to the extent of 34-64ths, are entitled to sue the defendants, and they are entitled to base their case on this principle, that there is here a contract made by an agent, Perry, Raines, and Co., for an undisclosed principal, namely, the plaintiffs, and that principal can come in and sue. The case of The United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association Limited v. Nevill (19 Q. B. Div. 110; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226, n.) is different from the present, as there it was held that the defendant could not be sued—that is, that only the person in whose name the ship was entered could be sued; although that is so, the person in whose interest the ship was insured may sue as principal:

The Great Britain 100 A 1 Steamship Insurance Association v. Wyllie, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 916; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 398; 22 Q. B. Div. 710;
Ocean Iron Steamship Insurance Association Limited v. Leslie, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226; 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 722; 22 Q. B. Div. 722, note.

A. Cohen, Q.C. (J. Fox with him) for the defendant association.—The right to sue must be coextensive and correlative with the liability to be sued. In Nevill's case (ubi sup.) the rules were precisely the same as the rules in the present case, and there it was held that a person in precisely the same position as the plaintiffs here, could not be sued by the association for contributions. That shows here that, conversely, the plaintiffs cannot maintain this action, as they are not the persons who made this contract with the defendant association, or entered the ship for insurance. Perry, Raines, and Co. were the persons who entered this ship for insurance, and they alone became entitled to sue, as they alone could be sued. The plaintiffs were in no way parties or privies to this contract, and they have no right to sue.

Wright, J.—This action is brought on a policy in the form of a deed-poll, by which the United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association Limited covenant with Perry, Raines, and Co. to pay losses in certain events, and Perry, Raines, and Co. were described as persons who became a member of the association, and who entered for insurance a steamship, the William Hartmann, and the covenant is in consideration of the premium—that is, the observance by the assured of the rules and regulations. The agreement is that the member having ships entered shall, according to the provisions of the articles of association, and the different rules indorsed on the policy, and subject to a certain proviso, be liable to make good losses upon the ship which may attach to the policy. The proviso is: "In accordance with the articles of association and the rules, this policy and the other policies of the association and class are granted on this condition, and it is hereby specially agreed that the association under all their policies of insurance of the said class shall be liable in the whole only to the extent of so much of the said funds as the said association is able to recover from the members of the said class." Then as to the rules, there are only two that are material to what I am now upon. The question is whether the plaintiffs, Montgomerie and Co., who are not named in the policy as covenantees, are entitled to maintain an action in their own names against the United Kingdom Association, for the amount of the loss which happened to the William Hartmann in the year 1883. There is no doubt whatever as to the general rule as regards an agent, that where a person contracts as agent for a principal, the contract is the contract of the principal and not that of the agent, and, prima facie, at common law the only person who may sue is the principal, and the only person who can be sued is the principal. To that rule, of course, there are many exceptions. First of all, the agent may be added as the party to the contract, if he has so contracted, and is appointed as the party to be sued. Secondly, the principal may be excluded in several other cases. He may be excluded if the contract is made by a deed inter partes to which the principal is no party. In that case, by ancient rule of common law, it does not matter if the person made a party is agent or not. That does not apply here, this being a deed-poll. Another exception is in the case of bills and notes. If a person who is an agent makes himself a party in writing to a bill or note, a principal cannot be added to that by the law merchant. And another exception is by usage, which is treated as forming part of contracts or of the law merchant, where there is a foreign principal. Generally speaking, the agent in England is the party to the contract, and not the foreign principal; but that is subject to certain limitations. Then a principal's liability may be limited, and not excluded. If the other party elects to sue the agent, he cannot afterwards sue the principal. Or, again, in the case of an undisclosed principal, if the undisclosed principal sues, he must accept the facts as he finds them at the date of his disclosure, but only so far as those facts are consistent with reasonable and proper conduct on the part of the other party. And again, if he is sued, he is entitled to an allowance for payments which he may have made to his agent, if the other party gave credit originally to that agent. Thirdly, and this is very important, in all cases the parties can by their express contract provide that the agent shall be the person liable either concurrently with or to the exclusion of the principal, or may provide that the agent shall be the party to sue either concurrently with or to the exclusion of the principal.

These principles apply to marine insurance with very little modification, the chief modification of which I am aware being with reference to ratification. In matters of insurance, apparently in the interests of the assured, a person may become a principal by ratification, although the agent did not insure, and did not purport to insure on his behalf expressly or by name, if the agent in fact insured on behalf of those who might be interested, though the party was not at that moment ascertained; and another exception is that a principal, on whose behalf an insurance was actually made, can ratify the insurance, even though at the time of ratification he knows that the subject of insurance, the vessel or whatever it is, has been lost. I am not aware of any other exception, unless it be that the deed-poll in the case of an insurance can be sued upon, not merely by the covenantee who is named in it, or other person named in it, but by the person interested, on whose behalf the insurance was made. Primâ facie, therefore, the plaintiffs are entitled to sue in this case, but they may be excluded by the terms of the contract, and the real question is whether that is the case here. Now, it was held in the case of The United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association Limited v. Nevill (ubi sup.), on this very contract, that the principal—such as Montgomerie—is excluded from being sued for the premiums, and there appears to be a presumption that rules of that kind are what may be shortly described as correlative. If Montgomerie could not have been sued for the premium, or what is equivalent to the premium, namely, their contribution, there appears to be a presumption that they would not be entitled to sue for that which is the consideration for the premium, namely, the money insured. As Lord Blackburn said in the case of The Elbinger Actien-Gesellschaft v. Claye (28 L.T. Rep. N. S. 405; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 316, 317), "The right to sue, and liability to be sued upon a contract are reciprocal;" and then he goes on to point out certain exceptions; then again, he says, "I must say I think that the two things are correlative. A man cannot make a contract in such a way as to take the benefit, unless also he takes the responsibility of it." The real question here is, have the parties so contracted that Montgomerie and Co. cannot sue, the alternative being that the action should be brought in the name of Perry, Raines, and Co. I have come to the conclusion that the parties have so contracted. I think that the rules annexed to the policy and to the articles of association, which are incorporated with the policy, show that it was plainly the intention of the parties that the association should look to the member only for contribution, and should have to deal and be entitled to say they would deal with the member only, in respect of the settlement of losses. Now, the member here is, I think, Perry, Raines, and Co., and with respect to this particular contract, which was discussed in the case of The United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association Limited v. Nevill (ubi sup.) as distinguished from the contract discussed in Wyllie's case (ubi sup.), the rule on which I place particular reliance here is the arbitration clause. It was plainly in contemplation of the parties that all settlements under those policies should be made by arbitration, and when we have to consider who it is that the parties intend should be entitled to sue, it is natural to look to the clause which provides the machinery under which the proceedings against the company are to be taken. This is the arbitration clause: "The sum if any to be paid by this club in satisfaction of any claim, shall in the first instance be settled by the committee, and the member"—not "the party entitled," but "the member"—"and the member, if he agrees to accept such sum (if any) as may be allowed by the committee in full satisfaction of his claim, shall be entitled to demand payment so soon as the amount to be paid has been so ascertained and settled, but not before, and payment shall only be claimed according to the customary mode of payment in use in this club." Then in case of difference it is to be decided by arbitrators, one appointed by the committee, and one by the member making the claim—"Provided always, and it is hereby expressly agreed that no action shall be commenced or other proceedings taken in any court or tribunal for recovery of any claim or demand under or by virtue of any policy in this club, unless and until the amount thereof, if in dispute, has been decided by arbitration; and the obtaining such decision is hereby declared to be a condition precedent to the right of any member to maintain any such action or other proceeding." That clause has not been insisted upon as an answer to the action, and I refer to it as showing who it is the parties thought the proper person to deal with the association.

Then I turn to the articles of association which are incorporated into the contract. First, it is not perhaps immaterial to observe, though not directly material, that the memorandum of association speaks only of insurance of ships of members, and ships which members may be authorised to insure in their own names. That leads to the inference that the distinction was present to the mind of the framer of these documents. Though a member may insure on behalf of somebody else, it was the member and not the person on whose behalf he insures that was intended. I think the material parts of the articles of association are those to which reference has been made, that in the interpretation clause "member" means member of the association. Then doubt arises, perhaps most on the third clause, and one I will refer to afterwards: "The association shall consist of the several persons who shall for the time being be insured or protected, or shall have entered or agreed to enter ships for insurance or protection." Primâ facie, that would seem to provide that everyone who had their interest protected by a policy should be in some sense a member of the association. But then comes, "(4) Definition of members. Every person who on behalf of himself or any other person or persons insures or enters for protection any ship or ships, or share or shares of a ship in the association, shall as from the date of the commencement of such insurance or protection be deemed to have become a member of the association;" and it appears to me that that is an express provision that those persons only are to be deemed to be members who have, on behalf of themselves or anybody else, insured or entered for protection any ship or ships. Then comes, "(40) Every engagement or liability of a member of the association in respect of any insurance or protection, shall for all purposes relating to enforcing such engagement or liability, be deemed to be an engagement or liability by or on the part of such member to the association, and not to any other member or members, and all moneys payable thereunder shall be paid to the association." "(41) All claims in respect of insurances or protection shall be made and enforced against the association only, and not against any members thereof." Now come the words which at first sight appear to me to lead to a different construction: "But the association shall not be liable to any member or other person for the amount of any loss, claim, or demand, except to the extent of the funds which the association is able to recover from the members or persons liable for the same, and which are applicable to that purpose;" but, although primâ facie "member or other person" there would mean member or person interested, it appears to me to be consistent with that clause that the words, "liable to any member or other person," include liability to the other person through the hands of the member. It is most material to point out that in the case of The United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association Limited v. Nevill (ubi sup.), Fry, L.J. expressly deals with those words, and, after considering the terms of the policy, points out what in his judgment those words, "member or other person," mean, member or other person succeeding to or representing a member in the same way as personal representatives, or a trustee in bankruptcy, or a similar succession of that kind.

It only remains on this point to refer shortly to the judgment in that case. The Master of the Rolls there says (19 Q. B. Div. p. 115): "I think that, in the case of such a contract as this under seal, it is not allowable to go behind the instrument to make undisclosed principals responsible, because they are not parties, and have not attached their seals to the contract under seal." I mention that to point out that I am not sure that the Master of the Rolls really based his judgment on that consideration. If there had been a deed inter partes, it would have been an answer at once, that Montgomerie and Co. were not parties to the deed. I mention that to show that I think that is not the ground of the decision on which I proceed. Then the Master of the Rolls says: "The association can only sue the member as an assured for what is equivalent to the premium. It seems to follow that if they cannot sue him as an insurer, neither can they sue the person who is alleged to be his undisclosed principal as an insurer. If such person can be sued at all, it must be as an assured, for what is equivalent to the premium. But can he be so sued?" and he goes on to give judgment to the effect that the principal corresponding to Montgomerie and Co. in this case could not be sued for contributions, and then he says, "I do not think that he is a party to the contract as an undisclosed principal, although he may be a cestui que trust in respect of the proceeds the member may receive. Not being a party, he cannot sue or be sued on the contract." The only point for decision in that case was whether he could be sued, but the Master of the Rolls does in terms say that he cannot sue. Fry, L.J. appears to take the same view, though I cannot find that either he or Lopes, L.J. expressed any view on that particular point. Fry, L.J. does deal expressly, as I say, with those words, "member or other person," and he says: "It is true that in art. 41, the expressions 'or other person' and 'or other persons' follow the words 'member or members'; but these words are, I think, used as equivalent to executors, administrators, or assigns." Then in the case of Great Britain 100 A 1 Steamship Insurance Association v. Wyllie (60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 916; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 398; 22 Q. B. Div. 710), and in the judgment delivered by Mathew, J. in the case of the Ocean Iron Steamship Insurance Association Limited v. Leslie (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 722; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226; 22 Q. B. Div. 722, note), the question arose upon a totally different form of policy, namely, a Lloyd's form of policy, and a different conclusion was arrived at, and the decision in Nevill's case was expressly stated to be entirely consistent with the decision in Wyllie's case, and the decision in the former case was put in Wyllie's case by the Court of Appeal, and by Mathew, J. in Leslie's case on the ground that the parties had contracted themselves out of the right which the association had to sue Nevill; and the general rule of law, but for that express contract, would have been that Nevill could have been sued, as it was held that Wyllie and Leslie could be sued for their contributions. For these reasons I think that this action cannot be maintained by the plaintiffs Montgomerie and others against the United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association; that disposes of the action altogether, and judgment must be for the defendant association.

HICK v. RODOCANACHI, SONS, AND CO. AND OTHERS. (a)

Charter-party — Cesser clause — Bill of lading — Demurrage—Delay caused by strikes—Liability of consignee of cargo.

In determining what is a reasonable time for discharging a vessel only those circumstances and conditions which ordinarily exist in the port of discharge are to be taken into account, and not circumstances which cannot ordinarily be foreseen when the contract of carriage is made, such as strikes, &c.

A charter-party provided that a vessel therein named should proceed to a port in the sea of Azoff, and having there loaded a cargo of wheat should proceed to a port in the United Kingdom to discharge; that the charterer's liability should cease when the cargo was shipped, the owner or his agent having an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, demurrage, and lighterage at the port of discharge; that the 1885 bill of lading should be used under the charter, and its conditions form part thereof.

The master signed bills of lading in the form prescribed by the charter, but they contained no reference to the charter nor any clause which would relieve the consignees of the cargo from loss to the ship occasioned by strikes; but it was provided that the goods were to be applied for within twenty-four hours of the ship's arrival, otherwise the master was to be at liberty to put into lighters and land the same at the risk and expense of the owners.

The vessel arrived in London on Aug. 14, and the discharge of the cargo proceeded from the 15*th to the* 20*th Aug., when the dock labourers employed by the consignee of the cargo to discharge the vessel struck. In consequence of the strike the discharge of the vessel was not completed until the* 18*th Sept.*

Held, that, under the clause of the charter above set out, the liability of the charterers had ceased, but that the consignees of the cargo were liable for the loss occasioned by the detention of the vessel, as they had not discharged the vessel within a reasonable time.

THIS action was brought by the plaintiff, the owner of the s.s. Derwentdale, to recover from the defendants the sum of 721*l.* 7*s.* as demurrage and damages for the detention of that vessel.

By a charter-party dated the 18th June 1889, and made between the plaintiff, as owner of the Derwentdale, of the one part, and the defendants, Rodocanachi, Sons. and Co., freighters, of the other part, it was agreed that the steamer should with all convenient speed proceed to Constantinople, and as there ordered to a safe port in the Sea of Azof, and there load always afloat from the factors of the said freighters, a full and complete cargo of wheat, and being so loaded should therewith proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom and there deliver always afloat, &c. The cargo to be brought and taken from alongside the steamer at freighter's expense and risk, but the crew to render all customary assistance in hauling lighters alongside. Twelve running days, Sundays excepted, are to be allowed the said freighters (if the steamer be not sooner despatched) for sending the cargo alongside and unloading, but in no case shall more than six running days, Sundays excepted, be allowed for unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days at fourpence per ton on the steamer's gross register tonnage per running day. The freighter's liability on this charter to cease when the cargo is shipped (provided the same is worth the freight, dead freight, and demurrage on arrival at the port of discharge), the owner or his agent having an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, demurrage, lighterage at port of discharge and average. The 1885 bill of lading to be used under the charter, and its conditions to form part hereof.

The vessel duly proceeded to Constantinople, and was from there ordered to Taganrog, where she was loaded with a cargo of wheat in bulk by the defendants, Rodocanachi, Sons, and Co. The master of the vessel signed and delivered to the said defendants five bills of lading for the said cargo in the form prescribed by the charter-party.

The bills of lading contained no reference to the charter-party, and no time was stipulated for the discharging the cargo, nor did they contain any exemption which would relieve the receivers of the cargo from loss occasioned by strikes. They did, however, state that the goods were to be applied for within twenty-four hours of the ship's arrival and reporting at the Custom House, otherwise the master or agent was to be at liberty to put into lighters or land the same at the risk and expense of the owners of the goods.

The bills of lading were duly indorsed by the defendants Rodocanachi, Sons, and Co., to the defendants, Raymond and Reid.

The Derwentdale arrived in London on Aug. 14th, 1889, was reported at the Custom House on the same day, and on the morning of the 16th began to discharge her cargo; this continued until the 20th, when the dock labourers employed by the defendants, Raymond and Reid, to discharge the vessel, struck. The labourers continued out on strike until the 16th Sept., when they resumed work, and the discharge of the vessel was completed on the 18th Sept. The cargo was thus received by the consignees upon three days before the strike, and upon three days after it had concluded.

On behalf of the defendants, Rodocanachi, Sons, and Co., the defence was set up that their liability for demurrage or for damages for detention of the vessel ceased under the charter-party when the cargo was shipped.

The defendants Raymond and Reid pleaded that the delay was caused by the plaintiff not performing his part of the discharge, and in the alternative that the strike of the dock labourers caused the delay in the discharge of the vessel, and that these defendants were not liable, such delay being beyond their control.

The further facts and arguments appear fully from the judgment.

MATHEW, J.—This is an action brought by the plaintiffs, the owners of a ship called the Derwentdale, to recover demurrage and damages for the detention of the vessel. The defendants are Rodocanachi, Sons, and Co., the charterers of the vessel, and a firm of Raymond and Reid, who were the consignees of the cargo under several bills of lading. The vessel was chartered under a charter-party, known as the Azof charter-party of 1878, to bring home a cargo of grain from a port in the Sea of Azof; the vessel proceeded to Taganrog, loaded her cargo and arrived with it at the Millwall Docks on the 14th Aug. 1889. She had seven days within which to discharge her cargo, and the discharge proceeded from the 15th Aug. down to the 20th. Then the strike occurred, and the ship remained undischarged until the 18th Sept. following, when the strike terminated. This action is brought to recover demurrage in the terms of the charter-party, and damages for the detention of the vessel under those circumstances. The charter-party contained two clauses which are material for the purposes of this case. The first was clause 16, which was in the following terms: "The freighters' liability on this charter to cease when the cargo is shipped, provided the same is worth the freight, dead freight, and demurrage on arrival at port of discharge, the owner or his agent having an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, demurrage, lighterage at port of discharge, and average." That clause was in print, and the other clause was as follows: "The 1885 bill of lading to be used under this charter, and its conditions to form part hereof." Now, it appeared that there were two forms of bill of lading known as the 1885 bill of lading, which had been prepared in that year by a committee of merchants, and used under this Azof charter-party. The first of those forms was known as the cargo bill of lading, and that was used where the entire cargo was consigned to one consignee. The other form of bill of lading was known as the berth bill of lading, and that was used where the cargo was divided into separate parcels and a bill of lading obtained on each of those parcels. In this particular case the cargo was divided into five different parcels, and a bill of lading given in the same form in respect of each of these parcels. Now, as I have stated, under the charter-party in this case there was a lien for demurrage under the clause that I have referred to. The cargo bill of lading is an echo of the charter-party—that is, it incorporated its terms and would have given a lien for demurrage, therefore, to the owners on the cargo upon its arrival at the port of discharge. The berth bill of lading did not incorporate the terms of the charter-party, but it contained a clause in some respects more advantageous to the shipowner—a clause which bound the consignee, after twenty-four hours' notice, to discharge the cargo upon its arrival, and enabled the owner in the event of default to shoot the cargo into lighters, or land it at the expense of the consignee, and that bill of lading further gave a lien by a subsequent clause for any charges that were so incurred. From the circumstances that occurred in this case, the berth bill of lading being used, there was no lien for demurrage, and the case as presented for the plaintiffs took this form. It was said that this was an action against Rodocanachi and Co. for requiring the captain to sign a bill of lading in the berth form and thereby depriving the owner of the ship of the benefit of the charter-party, which would have given him a lien for demurrage. When the case was presented in this ingenious shape, my attention was at once called by Mr. Reid, on behalf of Rodocanachi and Co., to the fact that no such case was raised on the pleadings. That does not appear to be a matter of much importance, as one does not always expect to find the case raised on the pleadings; but Mr. Reid further pointed out that this suggestion was never even made in the course of correspondence that passed between the parties, and it was not until the case came into court that there had ever been the slightest intimation of such a complaint. He said, further, that he was in a position to show that the two bills of lading were used indiscriminately, and an instance was given in which, under a charter-party in this form, the plaintiffs' captain had signed bills of lading in the form of the berth bill of lading, and not the cargo bill of lading.

It was understood at first that there should be an adjournment to permit fuller evidence to be gone into on this important point; but it was thought advisable to exhaust the evidence that was available upon this subject, and I had called before me Mr. Rodocanachi on behalf of the defendants, and Mr. Hick and Mr. Phillips for the shipowner. Mr. Hick was the broker for the shipowner, and Mr. Phillips was his managing man, and the person who had the conduct of the transaction in respect of this charter-party. Mr. Rodocanachi spoke not merely of the course of business and the use indiscriminately of either form of bill of lading, but he went further and spoke of an arrangement between himself and Mr. Hick or Mr. Phillips that either might be used. Neither Mr. Hick nor Mr. Phillips remembered any such conversation, but the latter admitted that he considered that under a charter-party in this form either bill of lading might be used, and that that was the mercantile understanding. Upon that Mr. Barnes very properly abandoned the notion of giving any further evidence upon the subject, and was content to allow the case to stand on the evidence of Mr. Phillips. Then Mr. Barnes, laying aside such details as the understanding of business men or commercial conjectures as to the course of business, argued a point of construction. and from a conveyancing point of view proceeded to point out that it would be absurd and ridiculous to suppose that under a charter-party in this form it could be possible to make use of any bill of lading but a cargo bill of lading, because, he said, under clause 16 the shipowner secured a lien for demurrage, and surely it was inconsistent and absurd to suppose that in the same instrument you should have another clause which would take away from him what the previous clause had given. But, when one comes to look at both forms of the bill of lading, one fails to see any absurdity or any inconsistency, because under the berth bill of lading, as I have mentioned already, there was the very important clause which, if it did not give a lien for demurrage, protected the owner of the ship under ordinary circumstances from any demurrage being incurred for any detention of the vessel, as it gave the owner the right to discharge the cargo at once, and to discharge it at the expense of the consignee. I see no difficulty whatever, therefore, in incorporating the berth bill of lading as the one admitted to be properly described as the 1885 bill of lading within this charter-party. It follows from that that, under the cesser clause, the liability of Rodocanachi and Co. was at an end when the cargo arrived at the Millwall Docks. That disposes of the case against them, and my judgment, so far as they are concerned, must be for them with costs.

Then we come to the case against the other defendants Raymond and Reid, who were the consignees of the cargo under the five bills of lading which had been signed by the captain. Mr. Bucknill, who appeared for these defendants, took two points. He said that the contract contained in the berth bill of lading imposed concurrent obligations upon the shipowner and consignee—the obligation that each should take the part imposed upon him with reference to the discharge of the cargo. Now, what had been done with reference to the discharge of the cargo? An arrangement had been made with the dock people that the cargo should be discharged by them, and the strike intervening stopped the operations of the dock people, and left the consignees without the aid they expected in unloading the ship. But, said Mr. Bucknill, there being concurrent obligations it was incumbent on the owner of the ship to trim the cargo, and the owner of the ship had himself come to an arrangement with the dock people that the trimming should be done by the dock people, and the strike affected the trimming as it affected the subsequent discharge, and therefore the plaintiff, the shipowner, was not in a position to recover as he was not ready and willing to take his part in the discharge of the vessel. I have evidence before me, which satisfies me, that there was no difficulty about trimming the cargo, and the shipowner had on board abundant help for that purpose, and the difficulty arose, not from the inability to trim the cargo, but that, if the cargo had been trimmed, it could not have been discharged because of the strike among the dock labourers. Then he said there is a second point. Agreed that the contract in the bill of lading was a contract that bound the consignee to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time, what is a reasonable time? He contended that in ascertaining that, it is necessary not only to have regard to the circumstances in the contemplation of both parties at the time the contract was entered into, but further to consider the circumstances attending the discharge; and as it would be unreasonable to expect that the consignees in this case should anticipate the strike and the difficulties that followed from it, they have discharged the cargo in a reasonable time, seeing that they were prevented from doing so earlier by circumstances beyond their control. In support of this curious proposition of law that the word "reasonable" must be ascertained with reference to unexpected circumstances that arise at the time the cargo was to be discharged, Mr. Bucknill referred to the well-known case Postlethwaite v. Freeland (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599), and to certain expressions of the Lord Chancellor in delivering his opinion in that case. When those expressions are looked at carefully, and further, when the judgment of Lord Blackburn is examined, it is perfectly clear that the House of Lords never proposed to lay down any such proposition of law. If what Mr. Bucknill contended for was the law, the great majority of the cases that have been decided on this subject must have been decided the other way. I am satisfied that the consignees took upon themselves the burden here of discharging the ship within a reasonable time, that is to say, they undertook to supply all the appliances ordinarily required for the discharge of the ship in the port of London. That obligation they proposed to discharge by employing the dock people. Unfortunately for them, their contract with the dock people, as I gather from the correspondence, relieved the dock people from liability in the event of a strike, and they have no remedy against the dock people and could not compel them in any way to carry the contract out. But the obligation remained the same on them, and that obligation they have failed to discharge. These circumstances were not foreseen; nobody dreamt at the time the contract was entered into of a strike, and the consignees did not protect themselves from the consequences of a strike, and the obligation therefore falls upon them to discharge the ship. It is no doubt a hard case upon them, but under the circumstances my judgment must be for the plaintiff for the amount of demurrage and damages for detention.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem, asking the court to confirm the registrar's report and to condemn the defendants in the costs of the action and reference.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The collision occurred on the 15th Sept. 1890, in the river Thames, between the plaintiffs' fishing smack Oswald Tomlin, and the defendants' steamship Asia. The Oswald Tomlin was lying hove-to when she was run into and sunk by the Asia.

The defendants admitted liability subject to a reference.

The action was instituted in the sum of 500*l*. At the reference the plaintiff claimed 386*l*. 2*s*., of which the registrar allowed 218*l*. 17*s*.

The defendants had previously paid 200*l*. into court, and on the issuing of the report sent the plaintiffs a cheque for 18*l*. 17*s*., and consented to their taking the 200*l*. out of court.

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71):

Sect. 3. Any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes): (3.) As to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision, any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

Sect. 9. If any person shall take in the High Court of Admiralty, or in any Superior Court, proceedings which he might without agreement have taken in a County Court except by order of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty or of such Superior Court or of a County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction, and shall not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the County Court in that Admiralty cause is limited by this Act; and also if any person without agreement shall, except by order as aforesaid, take proceedings as to salvage in the High Court of Admiralty, or in any Superior Court, in respect of property saved, the value of which when saved does not exceed one thousand pounds, he shall not be entitled to costs, and shall be liable to be condemned in costs, unless the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or of a Superior Court before whom the cause is tried or heard, shall certify that it was a proper Admiralty cause to be tried in the High Court of Admiralty of England or in a Superior Court.

Fletcher for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs ask for confirmation of the report and the costs of the action and reference. They have recovered a substantial sum of money, and were justified in proceeding in the High Court. Costs are in the discretion of the court:

The Williamina, 3 P. Div. 97;
Tennant v. Ellis, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 506; 6 Q. B. Div. 46.

Butler Aspinall, for the defendants, contrà.—The plaintiffs should have instituted this action in the County Court. If so, the court ought in its discretion to refuse to give them any costs:

The Herald, 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 324; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 542.

The present application was unnecessary, as we consented to their taking the 200*l*. out of court, and gave them a cheque for the balance.

Fletcher in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This case does not seem distinguishable from The Herald (ubi sup.), and I agree with Butt, J., that it lies upon suitors who have instituted proceedings in the Superior Court to show special circumstances justifying their conduct. No special circumstances have been shown here. I have been asked to extend indulgence to the plaintiffs; but I am unable to do that, as I must administer justice upon some principle. The only hesitation I have felt is, whether or not costs should be allowed on the County Court scale. But I do not feel justified in adopting any other rule than that laid down by Butt, J., viz., that the proceedings having been taken in the Superior Court when they might have been instituted in the County Court, the plaintiffs are not entitled to any costs whether of the action or of the reference. I also condemn the plaintiffs in the costs of the motion.

THE UMBILO. (a)

Collision—Limitation of liability—Steamship—Tonnage—Navigation spaces—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54—Merchant Shipping Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124), s. 9—Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 43), s. 3.

The owner of a steamship in limiting his liability is not entitled, in calculating the tonnage upon which his liability is based, to deduct the navigation spaces mentioned in sect. 3 of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889.

THIS was an action for limitation of liability by the owners of the British steamship Umbilo against the owners of the barque Ethel and others.

The collision in respect of which limitation of liability was sought occurred on the 24th June 1890 between the Umbilo and the Ethel. The Ethel sank.

In a damage action by the owners of the Ethel, her cargo and her master and crew, against the owners of the Umbilo the latter admitted liability.

The plaintiffs in the present action sought to limit their liability to 14,777*l*. 8*s*. 9*d*., such sum being 8*l*. per ton on the gross tonnage of 1847·18 tons, the alleged gross tonnage of the Umbilo without deduction on account of engine room.

According to the register of the Umbilo her gross tonnage was 1922·82 tons, of this 60·86 tons was for space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew under the Merchant Shipping Act 1867, sect. 9, and 14·78 tons was for space used exclusively for the accommodation of the master, and for space used exclusively for chart room and boatswain's stores, referred to in sect. 3 of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889.

The plaintiffs, in arriving at their alleged gross tonnage of 1847·18 tons, deducted from 1922·82 tons, the two figures above referred to, 60·86 and 14·78 tons.

The defendants by their defence denied that the plaintiffs in calculating their gross tonnage were entitled to deduct the 14·78 tons under the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889.

The following Acts of Parliament are material to the decision:—

Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862:

Sect. 54. The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not . . . be answerable in damages . . . in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things . . . to an aggregate amount exceeding eight pounds for each ton of the ship's tonnage; such tonnage to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships the gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine-room.

Merchant Shipping Act 1867:

Sect. 9. The following rules shall be observed with respect to accommodation on board British ships (that is to say): (1.) Every place in any ship occupied by seamen or apprentices and appropriated to their use shall have for every such seaman or apprentice a space of not less than seventy-two cubic feet and of not less than twelve superficial feet measured on the deck or floor of such place. (3.) No such place as aforesaid shall be deemed to be such as to authorise a deduction from registered tonnage under the provisions hereinafter contained, unless there is in use in the ship one or more properly constructed privy or privies for the use of the crew.

Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889:

Sect. 3. In measuring or remeasuring a ship for the purpose of ascertaining her register tonnage the following deductions shall be made from the space included in the measurement of the tonnage: (a.) In the case of a ship wholly propelled by sails, any space set apart and used exclusively for the storage of sails. (b.) In the case of any ship: (i.) Any space used exclusively for the accommodation of the master; (ii.) any space used exclusively for the working of the helm, the capstan, and the anchor gear or for keeping the charts, signals, and other instruments of navigation and boatswain's stores; and (iii.) the space occupied by the donkey-engine and boiler if connected with the main pumps of the ship.

Sect. 7. This Act may be cited as the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act, and shall be construed as one with the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and the Acts amending the same.

Lauriston Batten for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs' figure of 1847·18 tons is correct. In The Franconia (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 57; 3 P. Div. 164) it was held, that similar words to those in sect. 3 of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889 entitled shipowners in limiting their liability to the deductions mentioned in sect. 9 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867. A steamer's liability ought to be calculated upon her register tonnage, plus her engine-room space. The Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889, sect. 7, provides that it is to be read as one with the earlier Merchant Shipping Acts, and if so, its provisions are applicable to the statutory enactments dealing with a shipowner's liability. It is clear that a sailing ship is entitled to these deductions, and if so, there is no reason why a steamship should not have the same privilege.

Butler Aspinall, for the defendants, contrà.—Having regard to the fact that the deductions spoken of in sect. 9 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867 have been allowed for so many years, we do not propose to contest the plaintiffs' right to deduct the 60·86 tons. It is, however, contended that they are not entitled to any deductions under the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889. That Act does not in any way deal with limitation of liability. By the express provisions of sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, a steamship's "gross tonnage" is made the basis of her owners' liability. Sect. 3 of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889 deals solely with register tonnage. A distinction between gross and register tonnage has always been drawn in the Merchant Shipping Acts. This distinction was present to the mind of the Legislature when passing the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889, because in sect. 4 there are provisions dealing with gross tonnage. The Act of 1889 was passed to ascertain a ship's tonnage for the purpose of port and harbour dues. These dues are based upon register tonnage. The deductions in sect. 3 are in favour of shipowners in respect of such dues.

Batten in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 16.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This is a suit by the owners of the steamship Umbilo, for limitation of liability in respect of the damage caused to the defendants' barque Ethel by a collision between that vessel and the Umbilo, without the actual fault of the plaintiffs. The question in the case is, what deductions should be made from the gross tonnage of the Umbilo in computing the amount to which the plaintiffs' liability should be limited. By the Merchant Shipping Act of 1862, sect. 54, it is enacted, that the estimated tonnage is to be, "in the case of steamships, the gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine-room." It was not disputed that the plaintiffs were entitled, in computing the gross tonnage of their vessel, to deduct the space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew; but they contended that they are entitled to certain other deductions under the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889. By sect. 3 of that Act it is enacted, that, "In measuring or remeasuring a ship for the purpose of ascertaining her register tonnage, the following deductions shall be made from the space included in the measurement of the tonnage: (i.) Any space used exclusively for the accommodation of the master. (ii.) Any space used exclusively for the working of the helm, the capstan, and the anchor gear, or for keeping the charts, signals, and other instruments of navigation, and boatswain's stores." For the defendants it was argued, that this enactment did not apply to the computation of the "gross tonnage," upon which the liability of the owner is based and it appears to me that that argument is well founded. By sect. 1 of the Act of 1889 it is enacted that, "In the measurement of a ship for the purpose of ascertaining her register tonnage, no deduction shall be allowed in respect of any space which has not first been included in the measurement of her tonnage," i. e., in her gross tonnage; but, as I have already pointed out, that gross tonnage affords the measure of the shipowners' liability. The deductions claimed by the plaintiffs must therefore be reduced by 14·78 tons.

THE CRESSINGTON. (a)

Carriage of goods—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Damage to cargo—Perils of the sea—Certificate—Surveyor.

Where by the terms of a bill of lading shipowners are relieved from liability for damage to cargo when caused by "perils of the sea and accidents of navigation, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners," and the cargo is damaged by sea-water getting into the hold through an iron rivet being loosened by stress of weather, a fact which the master discovers during the voyage but neglects to remedy and thereby permits the damage to be largely increased, such damage is covered by the above exceptions, and the shipowners are not liable for any portion of it.

Where by the terms of a charter-party the ship is to be properly dunnaged to the satisfaction of a surveyor, who is to give a certificate thereof to the charterers, the giving of such certificate does not release the shipowners from their obligation to make the ship seaworthy by proper dunnaging.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a damage to cargo action from a decision of the judge of the County Court of Yorkshire holden at Kingston-on-Hull.

The cargo in question consisted of sacks of wheat, and was shipped at San Francisco on board the defendants' steamship Cressington for carriage to a safe port in the United Kingdom.

By the terms of the bill of lading, of which the plaintiff was the holder, the shipowners were relieved from liability for loss of or damage to cargo caused by the "act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates, assailing thieves, arrest and restraint of princes, rulers, and people, collision, stranding, and other accidents of navigation excepted, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners."

In the margin of the bill of lading were the words "all other conditions as per charter-party." The charter-party contained the same excepted perils as the bill of lading, and also the clause:

Vessel to be properly stowed and dunnaged; and certificate thereof and of good general condition, draft of water, and ventilation, to be furnished to charterers from H. W. Watson, surveyor. If the captain or charterers be dissatisfied with the certificate given the matter in dispute shall at once be submitted to two other regular port marine surveyors, one chosen by the captain and one by the charterers, who, if they cannot agree, may call upon a third surveyor; a majority decision and certificate shall determine the matter in dispute.

The cargo was shipped by the charterers and carried to Queenstown, where it was bought by the plaintiffs, and thence ordered to Hull, where the Cressington arrived on the 3rd Dec. 1889.

The vessel before leaving San Francisco was surveyed by Mr. Watson, who made the following report: "Entitled to full confidence. Can carry a dry and perishable cargo, and is a good risk for underwriters."

On the arrival of the Cressington at Hull it was found that a portion of the cargo was damaged by sea-water, which had got into the hold through a rivet-hole in a stringer plate in the 'tween decks. The rivet in question was a rivet attaching one of the stanchion bars to the deck. This stanchion was at the other end fixed to and supported the bulwarks. Whilst rounding Cape Horn the rivet was by the straining of the ship twisted and loosened, causing the stanchion bar to spring, and in course of time this cracked the bed of cement in which the foot of the stanchion was fixed. The result of this was that, as the stanchions spring from the waterways, the sea-water got down through the rivet-hole and so damaged the cargo.

The Cressington left San Francisco on the 20th June, and in August the master having discovered that the water was getting into the hold on two occasions patched the cement, but did not endeavour to replace or repair the rivet so as to make fast the stanchion.

The County Court judge found that the rivet was a good rivet; that the entry of the water into the hold was caused by a peril of the sea or accident of navigation; that the master could and ought to have stopped the continuance of the leakage; that he fixed the 22nd Sept. as the day when the leakage might have been stopped, and held the defendants liable for all damage accruing after that date. He also held that the waterways in the neighbourhood of the above-mentioned rivet were not properly dunnaged, which prevented the water escaping into the bilges by the drain pipes; and that upon the proper construction of the charter the certificate of the surveyor was not conclusive in favour of the shipowners, and that they remained liable for improper dunnaging notwithstanding such certificate, because their contract was to provide a seaworthy ship, and if she was in fact unseaworthy no certificate saying she was seaworthy would release them from their obligation.

The plaintiffs claimed 189*l.* The judge awarded them 126*l.*, the balance, viz., 63*l.*, being in his opinion the amount of the damage which was occasioned to the cargo before the master had an opportunity of stopping the leakage. He also found that of the 126*l.* the sum of 90*l.* represented the amount of damage which was due to bad dunnage.

Joseph Walton, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The judge was wrong in holding the defendants liable for the damage subsequent to the time when the leak might have been stopped. The damage was caused by a peril of the sea occasioned by the negligence of the master, and therefore directly within the exception in the bill of lading:

Pandorf v. Hamilton, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212; 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 726; 12 App. Cas. 518;
Carmichael v. Liverpool Sailing Shipowners Association, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 184; 19 Q. B. Div. 242; 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 863.

The dunnage was in fact sufficient, but even if not, the shipowner is under no liability, inasmuch as his obligation under the charter-party was that the ship should be dunnaged to the satisfaction of the surveyor. The surveyor gave a certificate approving of the fitness of the ship to carry this cargo.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Witt, for the plaintiff, contrâ.—The words "even when occasioned by the negligence" only refer to the exceptions "collisions, stranding, and other accidents of navigation," and if so, the present loss being occasioned by a peril of the sea, the defendants are not protected, inasmuch as that peril caused damage in consequence of the master's negligence. Although the original damage was a peril of the sea, the master is not relieved by the charter-party from taking steps to remedy it:

Notara v. Henderson, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 225; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278.

The dunnage was improper. The certificate of the surveyor has nothing to do with this question. The provision as to the certificate is not incorporated in the bill of lading:

Serraino v. Campbell, 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 107; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 526; 25 Q. B. Div. 501;
Russell v. Niemann, 17 C. B. N. S. 163;
Bigge v. Parkinson, 31 L. J. 301, Ex.

Walton in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—We are of opinion that the decision of the learned judge is not correct in all particulars. As to part we agree with him; as to the rest we do not. The first question is, whether the primâ facie liability of the shipowners for the damage which arose to the cargo is removed by the exception in the charter-party. The learned judge seems to have thought, and it is not questioned, that the original source of damage was the rolling of the ship, but that the shipowners were liable in this respect, that when the damage was discovered the master did not make use of such means as he might to have prevented the continuance of the leakage, and that this state of circumstances was not covered by the charter-party. We are of opinion that he is wrong in that view. The mischief has arisen through the inflow of water in the course of navigation. This is, in our judgment, a peril of the sea, and also an accident of navigation. But the clause in the charter-party also contains these words, "even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners." Therefore this appears to be one of the things the shipowners wished to guard themselves against. The alleged negligence of the master is just what these words are applicable to. We therefore think that, as to the sum of 63*l.*, the learned judge was wrong. As to the second point, viz., the question of dunnage, we have thought it right to take the opinion of the Trinity Brethren, and they are clearly of opinion, as we also are, that the dunnage was insufficient. There only remains the question whether or not Mr. Watson's certificate is to be taken as conclusive. On that point we entirely agree with the learned judge, and therefore the judgment of the court below must be varied by reducing it to 90*l.*

BUTT, J.—I entirely agree with what my Lord has said as to the exception in the bill of lading protecting the defendants. I only desire to add this, that, had I been disposed to take another view of this question, I should not be quite prepared to accept the learned judge's finding of negligence in respect of the attempts to prevent this damage. I will say no more than that. On the other two points I also agree. The result is, that the judgment is varied as we have indicated, and we direct each party to pay their own costs.

THE CURFEW. (a)

Charter-party — Ambiguity — Evidence—"Always afloat."

Where by a charter-party a vessel is to proceed to a berth in a named dock, and "there load, always afloat, a full and complete cargo," and it is found that after she has loaded a portion of her cargo, although she could take in the remainder and still remain afloat in the dock, she could not, when fully loaded, pass over the dock sill until next spring tides which would delay her a week, she is not entitled, when partly loaded, to leave the dock to avoid this delay.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in an Admiralty action from the decision of the judge of the City of London Court.

The action was instituted by the owners of the steamship Curfew against the charterers.

The plaintiffs claimed under a charter-party, dated the 14th March 1889, 42*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.* for balance of freight, and 16*l.* 10*s.* demurrage. The defendants claimed to set off a like sum, and to counterclaim for 214*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, which was made up as follows: 26*l.* 5*s.* for balance due for trimming; 15*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* cost of taking cargo from North Dock, Swansea, to the Prince of Wales Dock, in consequence of the Curfew shifting from North Dock to Prince of Wales Dock; 1*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* cost of taking cargo from North Dock to the Prince of Wales Dock, at request of master of Curfew; and 171*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*, being damages for breach of warranty by the plaintiffs that the said ship was "expected ready to load about the 10th April," as provided by the said charter-party, whereas she was not ready to load till the 1st May.

The charter-party, so far as is material, is as follows:

It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. R. A. Mudie and Sons, owners of the good steamship or vessel called the Curfew, of Dundee, of the burthen of 1261 register tons or thereabouts . . . now trading and expected ready to load about the 10th April, and the Atlantic Patent Fuel Company Limited, that the said ship, being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to the company's loading berth, North Dock, Swansea, and there load, always afloat, a full and complete cargo of about 2100 tons Atlantic Patent Fuel, with option to charterers of loading part coal at the railway tips . . . Lighterage, if any necessary to enable steamer to complete loading at North Dock, Swansea, to be at merchant's risk and expense.

Owing to bad weather the Curfew did not arrive at Swansea till the 30th April, and then went into dock, and commenced to load on the 2nd May. The tides at this time were falling, and after the Curfew had loaded a portion of her cargo, it became apparent that, if she loaded her full cargo, although she could do so "always afloat" in the dock, she would not be able to cross the dock sill, and would be detained about a week until the tides made sufficiently to enable her to go out. She accordingly left the North Dock and went to the Prince of Wales Dock, where the remainder of the cargo was brought in lighters from the North Dock.

At the trial the learned judge was of opinion that the language of the charter-party was ambiguous, and at the request of the plaintiffs admitted the following telegram from the defendants' agents to the defendants: "Curfew accepts 26*s.* 6*d.* Charter sent last night: load North Dock always afloat; lighterage if any necessary through inability take full cargo North Dock, our expense."

There was a dispute between the parties as to the cost of trimming the cargo, which was solely a question of fact.

The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs for 42*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.* for balance of freight, and for 10*l.* 10*s.* demurrage; and also gave judgment for the defendants on their counter-claim for 1*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* He held that the Curfew was entitled to leave the North Dock.

Sir Walter Phillimore and L. E. Pyke for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—We abandon the counter-claim of 171*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.* for damage for breach of warranty. The judge was wrong in holding that the plaintiffs were entitled to leave the dock to complete the loading. They could in fact load in the dock always afloat, and the loss of their vessel being detained should fall on them. The words "lighterage, if any necessary to enable steamer to complete loading at North Dock," were meant to apply to any necessary lighterage in North Dock. Once the cargo is loaded, any subsequent detention by neap tides should fall on the shipowner:

Pringle v. Mollett, 6 M. & W. 80;
Allen v. Coltart and Co., 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 944; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 104;
Horsley v. Price and Co., 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 101; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 106; 11 Q. B. Div. 244.

Hence the cost of lightering the cargo round to the Prince of Wales Dock should be paid by the shipowner. The court ought not to have admitted evidence to vary the charter-party.

Barnes, Q.C. and F. Laing, for the plaintiffs, contrâ.—We were justified in leaving the dock. The words "lighterage if necessary" point to it being in the contemplation of the parties that the Curfew might have to leave the dock. There is no evidence that lighters were ever used in the dock:

General Steam Navigation Company v. Slipper, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 641; 31 L. J. 185, C. P.; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 180;

Shield v. Wilkins, 5 Eq. Rep. 364.

The learned judge was right in admitting evidence to explain the charter-party, as the language used was ambiguous:

Lewis v. Great Western Railway Company, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 774; 3 Q. B. Div. 195

Jan. 24.—The judgment of the court was delivered by

BUTT, J.—The judgment I am about to deliver in this case is one which was prepared by the President since the case was heard, and was sent to me to see if I concurred. Having considered it, I have come to the same conclusion, and therefore this is now the judgment of the court. This is an action for balance of freight for carriage of fuel in the steamship Curfew and demurrage of that ship. The defendants claim to set off, and made a counter-claim for cost of carriage of a portion of the fuel from the North Dock at Swansea—where it is alleged by the defendants that the Curfew was to load—to the Prince of Wales Dock, where, as alleged by the defendants, the vessel was improperly taken; and secondly for trimming the cargo. The Curfew was chartered on the 14th March 1889 in London, and in the charter-party was described as "expected ready to load about the 10th April," and she was with all "convenient speed to sail and proceed to the company's (that is the defendants) loading berth, North Dock, Swansea, and there load, always afloat, a full and complete cargo of about 2100 tons of Atlantic patent fuel." The steamer was to pay for trimming and extra trimming in case of double decks; lighterage, if any were necessary to enable the steamer to complete the loading at North Dock, Swansea, to be at merchants' risk and expense. The Curfew did not in fact arrive at Swansea till the 30th April. She proceeded to the North Dock and there loaded a portion of her cargo, but in consequence of the delay in her arrival in respect of time, though she could have taken in the remainder of the cargo remaining always afloat, she could not by reason of the neap tides then existing when fully loaded have passed over the sill of the dock for a week. She therefore left the North Dock to complete her loading and went to the Prince's Dock, and the unloaded portion of the cargo had to be sent round to the Prince's Dock.

The first question in the case is, who is to bear the expense of sending the fuel round to the Prince's Dock. The defendant company say that, by the terms of the charter-party, they were only liable to pay such lighterage as might be necessary to complete the loading at the North Dock. The plaintiffs' contention was that the true meaning of the charter-party is that, if the steamer was unable to complete the loading at North Dock, then that the defendants were to pay the lighterage necessary to enable the steamer to complete the loading. The learned judge of the court below considered the language ambiguous, and admitted evidence of the previous correspondence between the parties to show what their intention was in entering into the charter-party; and that evidence being admitted, we agree with the learned judge that it became clear that the plaintiffs' contention was well founded, and that the intention of the parties was that if the steamer was unable to complete the loading in the North Dock, the defendants were to bear the expense of completing the loading elsewhere. This appears from the telegram from the defendants' agent to the defendants, in which he says, "The terms proposed, lighterage, if any necessary through inability to take full cargo North Dock, our expense," which was assented to by his principals. This was the contract which the parties intended to express by the charter-party. We are of opinion that there is sufficient ambiguity in the language of the charter-party to warrant the admission of evidence to explain the ambiguity. We are of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed to establish that they were unable to complete the loading of the steamer at the North Dock within the meaning of the charter-party. But for the fact that the vessel did not arrive at Swansea at the time expected, viz., the 10th April, she would have been able to complete her loading at the North Dock and cross the sill of the dock with her full cargo; but, in order to avoid being detained in the dock a week, she left the North Dock before completing her loading, though she might have continued to have received cargo in the North Dock remaining always afloat. We are of opinion that the fear of this detention did not justify the removal of the steamer from the North Dock. It did not render her unable to complete her loading while afloat in the dock. It only rendered the performance of the contract by the plaintiffs more onerous by reason of the loss of the use of their vessel during the time. We think therefore that the decision of the learned judge below was wrong on this point, and that the defendants establish their set-off or counter-claim as to 15*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, the cost of taking the remainder of the cargo round to the Prince of Wales Dock. [The judgment then dealt with the question of the trimming of the cargo, and affirmed the decision of the judge below thereon.] The result is, that we think that the defendants' set-off of 15*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* is right, but, as each party has been practically successful, we leave each party to pay their own costs of the appeal. The defendants must pay the costs below.

On a subsequent day, on the application of the defendants, the Court ordered that the 10*l.* 10*s.* held to be due to the plaintiffs by the judge in the court below for demurrage should not be allowed, stating that this matter had inadvertently escaped their notice, but that it was the necessary result of the judgment that it should be disallowed.

THE ANNA AND BERTHA. (a)

Collision—Practice—Solicitor's undertaking—Appearance—Attachment—Order IX., rr. 1 and 10.

Where in a collision action in rem solicitors for the defendants accept service of the writ and indorse it with the words "We accept service on behalf of the defendants, the owners of the A., and undertake to put in bail in a sum not exceeding the value of the said barque A.," and in consequence of their authority being withdrawn by the defendants they do not enter an appearance, they do not thereby commit a breach of their undertaking so as to render themselves liable to attachment, inasmuch as they have never expressly undertaken to appear.

THIS was an application by the plaintiff in a collision action in rem that a "writ of attachment issue against George Cotterell Downing and John Just Handcock, of Cardiff, for breach of their undertaking as solicitors for the owners of the barque or vessel Anna and Bertha, some of the defendants, to enter an appearance to the writ of summons in this action on behalf of the said owners of the barque or vessel Anna and Bertha."

The action was instituted against the owners of the foreign barque Anna and Bertha and the owners of a tug which was towing the said barque at the time of the collision.

Messrs. Downing and Handcock, of Cardiff, were the solicitors for the owners of the Anna and Bertha, and having accepted service of the writ of summons they indorsed on it the following words: "We accept service on behalf of the defendants, the owners of the Anna and Bertha, and undertake to put in bail in a sum not exceeding the value of the said barque Anna and Bertha." Subsequently the owners of the Anna and Bertha instructed Messrs. Downing and Handcock not to appear and put in bail, but to allow the barque to be arrested. Messrs. Downing and Handcock accordingly complied with these instructions, and the plaintiffs subsequently arrested the barque.

In these circumstances the plaintiffs applied for a writ of attachment as above stated.

Rules of the Supreme Court:

Order IX., r. 1. No service of writ shall be required when the defendant, by his solicitors, undertakes in writing to accept service and enters an appearance.

Rule 10. In Admiralty actions in rem no service of writ or warrant shall be required where the solicitor of the defendant agrees to accept service, and to put in bail or to pay money into court in lieu of bail.

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—The defendants' solicitors have undertaken to appear, and having failed to comply with their undertaking, the court ought to take steps to make them. [BUTT, J.—They do not in words undertake to appear to the action.] By accepting service they imply that they will appear. This argument is supported by the language of Order IX., rr. 1, 10. Unless they appear our proceedings are abortive. [BUTT, J.—I do not think so. You can proceed by default.]

Boyd, for the defendants' solicitors, contrà.—The application should be dismissed with costs. [BUTT, J.—Technically I think you were wrong in not appearing, and that having accepted service you ought to have entered an appearance.]

BUTT, J.—My view is, as I have already said, that there is no undertaking in words by these solicitors to appear to the action. Their undertaking was to accept service and put in bail. There being no undertaking to enter an appearance, I could not have sent them to prison for not doing it. Therefore the motion for attachment must fail, and it ought, but for one consideration, to have failed with costs. But I do think that, though not expressed in words, there was an implied undertaking to put in an appearance, and that these gentlemen would have put themselves absolutely right by so doing. They have not done so, and I do not think I can give them the costs of the motion. I may say that I do not think that there is the slightest ground for imputing any moral blame to the gentlemen against whom the motion is made.

THE MOUNT VERNON. (a)

Co-ownership action—Accounts—Managing owner.

It is the duty of a managing owner to account to his co-owners for the ship's earnings and disbursements within a reasonable time, but what is a reasonable time must depend upon the circumstances of each case. There is no fixed rule that a ship's accounts are to be ready before she sails on her next voyage.

THIS was a co-ownership action in personam asking for an order that accounts should be taken of the earnings and disbursements of the ship Mount Vernon, and a reference to the registrar to take such accounts.

The plaintiff was the owner of nine sixty-fourth shares in the ship Mount Vernon. The defendants were George Shepherd and the other owners of the remaining fifty-five sixty-fourth shares. George Shepherd was also the managing owner.

The facts, alleged by the plaintiff, were as follows:

On the 9th Oct. 1890 he bought his shares. At such date the Mount Vernon was homeward bound, having left England on the 4th Feb. On the 26th Oct. she arrived in Swansea. On the 20th Nov. the plaintiff wrote to Shepherd, the managing owner, asking for accounts of the last voyage. On the 21st Nov. Shepherd wrote back promising to render a statement of accounts in due course. On the 4th Dec. the plaintiff again wrote to Shepherd asking for the promised statement of accounts. On the same day Shepherd replied in the following terms:

> Yours to hand, and note remarks. The dividend, if any, will be paid in the usual time to shareholders at my convenience, but not before the ship sails.

On the 5th Dec. the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to Shepherd asking for accounts, and on the same day the defendants' solicitors reply, stating that the accounts "will be made up as usual."

The above facts were not disputed by the defendants, who, in addition thereto, proved that during the voyage in question salvage services were rendered to the Mount Vernon, that the salvage claim was not settled till the 29th Nov., that such claim and certain repairs had been the subject of an average adjustment, and that at the moment the claim, in respect of such matters was before the underwriters, and not yet settled.

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to judgment. The defendant Shepherd had time to render an account, and has unreasonably failed to do so. Our only means of getting an account was to institute the present action. The defendant ought to have informed the plaintiff that there were general average questions to be determined, which prevented him rendering an account; but, instead of so doing, he writes to say that accounts will be rendered at his convenience.

L. E. Pyke, for the defendant, was not called upon.

BUTT, J.—It is clear to my mind that this action must be dismissed. The co-owners are entitled, as against the managing owner, to have their accounts properly made up in a reasonable time, and, if the managing owner fails in his duty to them in this respect, an action of this nature will lie. In this case there does not appear to have been the least failure, the least want of care, or the least delay, that was not inevitable, on the part of Mr. Shepherd, the managing owner, and therefore the action must fail. Then, as I understand the matter, it is said that, inasmuch, as Mr. Shepherd in one of his letters said that he should deliver accounts at his convenience, the plaintiff ought not to be condemned in costs. It was wrong of Mr. Shepherd to write that letter. A managing owner has no business to talk about his convenience. His convenience is his duty towards his co-owners. He made that mistake, but I do not think it is one which should for a moment lead me to deprive him of the costs to which the plaintiff has put him by this action. The action must be dismissed with costs.

THE TITIA. (a)

Practice—Action in rem—Default proceedings—Judgment—Registrar and merchants.

In a default action in rem the Admiralty Court will not before judgment refer the plaintiffs' claim to the registrar for assessment.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs in an action in rem for necessaries.

The claim was in respect of necessaries supplied by Messrs. Bahr and Co. to the ship Titia. Her owner had not appeared, and the plaintiffs now asked for judgment, a sale of the vessel, and a reference to the Liverpool district registrar to ascertain what was due to them.

There were other claims against the ship for necessaries and for wages.

Stubbs and Co. had brought an action for necessaries to recover the amount due to them for repairs to the ship, but the action had not proceeded further than statement of claim. The mortgagees of the ship had intervened in the first action to protect their interests. The seamen had brought an action, but the plaintiffs in the first action had offered to pay their wages if the court would allow them, and permit them to recover the amount so paid against the ship.

Carver, for Messrs. Bahr, in support of the motion, also asked leave to pay off the seamen, and to stand in their shoes.

Joseph Walton (with him John Mansfield), for the mortgagees, consented to the motion.

J. P. Aspinall, for Messrs. Stubbs, consented to the motion subject to all questions of priority being reserved, and also asked that his claim against the ship might be referred to the registrar, and investigated together with Messrs. Bahr's claim. He cited

The Immacolata Concezione, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 539; 9 P. Div. 37; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208.

JEUNE, J.—I grant Mr. Carver's motion, but reserve all questions of priorities. With regard to Mr. Aspinall's application I should have been glad to grant it had I been able. My attention has already been called by the registrar to the case of The Immacolata Concezione (ubi sup.). But I notice that that case is eleven years old, and since then no similar order has ever been made. In that case there were a long series of judgments against the defendant ship. Then a late claim—that relied upon by Mr. Aspinall—was put in, and was referred before judgment. But I cannot help thinking that that was done per incuriam. However, in the absence of any further precedent for so long a period of time, and it being certainly against principle, I feel bound to refuse this application, and must require these claimants to get judgment before ordering a reference. I may say that I have spoken to the President on this matter, and that he concurs in my views.

THE KNUTSFORD. (a)

Practice—Collision—Examination of witnesses—Shorthand-writer—Transcript of evidence—Correction.

Where witnesses in an Admiralty action are examined before an examiner, and their evidence is taken down by a shorthand-writer and the transcript of such evidence is filed, the Court will, if there is reasonable ground for believing the transcript to be inaccurate, entertain an application to take the transcript off the file and return it to the examiner for amendment so as to make it correspond with the evidence actually given.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs in a collision action, asking the court to direct that the transcript of the evidence of Robert Williams, a witness on behalf of the defendants, examined before Mr. Richard Stephens Jackson, pursuant to the order of the court made therein, should be taken off the file and returned to the said examiner for amendment so as to make it correspond to the evidence given by the said witness.

The collision occurred at night in the river Mersey, on the 5th Feb. 1891, between the plaintiffs' steamship the Drumhendry and the defendants' steamship the Knutsford. The Drumhendry at the time in question was at anchor; the Knutsford was proceeding down the Mersey, and was in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law.

By an order of court certain of the defendants' witnesses, who were leaving the country prior to the trial of the action, were examined before an examiner on Feb. 14. Their evidence was taken down by a shorthand-writer, who subsequently supplied the examiner with a transcript, which was printed and returned by the examiner to the Admiralty Registry, where it was put upon the file.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The examiner made the following return with the evidence:

On the 14th day of Feb. 1891, previously to the examination of the witnesses herein for the defendants, it was agreed between Mr. Butler Aspinall, counsel for the plaintiffs, and Dr. Raikes, counsel for the defendants, that the evidence should be taken by a shorthand-writer, and that the reading over and signing by the witnesses of their depositions should be dispensed with. I then having by consent of the said parties first duly sworn the shorthand-writer faithfully and correctly to take down and transcribe the evidence to be given before me in this action, I, in the presence of the aforesaid counsel, administered the usual oath of a witness to, and caused to be examined, the following witnesses, who were produced before me on behalf of the defendants to give evidence in this action, viz.: John Harrison, Frank Mills, Robert Williams, and Peter Galbraith.

Dated the 18th day of Feb. 1891.

On the plaintiffs' solicitors being supplied with a copy of the transcript of such evidence, it was discovered that the evidence as printed of Robert Williams was different in certain material respects from that which he had in fact given; and notice of this was at once given to the examiner and to the defendants' solicitor.

On the 24th Feb. the shorthand-writer, in the presence of the examiner and of the plaintiffs' and defendants' solicitors, stated that the transcript was inaccurate. Certain negotiations then passed between the parties as to what steps should be taken to rectify the error, and in the result the plaintiffs now moved the court as above stated. The defendants had offered to consent to the transcript being taken off the file for correction.

Butler Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—The plaintiffs are entitled to have the evidence taken off the file for correction. [BUTT, J.—I very much doubt whether it is on the file. If so, you are premature in your application, which ought to be made at the trial when the defendants put this evidence in.] The practice of this court is to file the evidence on its being returned by the examiner. [BUTT, J.—I am told by the registrar that it has been filed.] If so, the proper time to apply to have the transcript amended is as soon as the error is discovered. [BUTT, J.—Why was a shorthand-writer employed? Ought not the evidence to be taken down by the examiner. That is the rule in the other courts.] It was the practice in this court prior to the Judicature Act to employ a shorthand-writer, and it has since continued to be the practice. [BUTT, J.—I see you have expressly agreed to accept the shorthand-writer's notes of the evidence. If so, can you now question his return?] We are not questioning his notes, but the transcript of his notes. He has admitted that the transcript does not correctly represent his original shorthand notes.

Dr. Raikes for the defendants.—This application is unnecessary. We admit that there are certain errors in the transcript, but we have offered to allow the evidence to be taken off the file for correction. [BUTT, J.—I do not think parties by agreement can take evidence off the file.]

BUTT, J.—I think this motion was necessary, and I shall grant the application, but reserve the question of costs.

At the trial of the action the Knutsford was found alone to blame, and the learned judge (Jeune, J.) held that the costs of the above motion were costs in the cause, and ordered the defendants to pay them.

THE MARIANNE. (a)

Necessaries—Foreign ship—Brokerage on charter-party—3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6.

A broker's commission on a charter-party for a future voyage effected while the ship is at sea under another charter is not a necessary within the meaning of sect. 6 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, and hence the Admiralty Court has no jurisdiction to entertain an action in rem in respect thereof.

THIS was a motion by the defendant in an action in rem for necessaries asking the court to set aside the writ, and stay all further proceedings.

The plaintiffs, Messrs. Lloyd, Lowe, and Co., claimed 28*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*, which was their commission on two charter-parties effected by them for the defendants' barque, the Marianne, and the cost of charter, stamps, and copies.

The Marianne was a Swedish barque, and at the time when the charter was effected by Messrs. Lloyd, Lowe, and Co. she was at sea in the performance of another voyage.

The defendants appeared under protest, and now moved as above stated.

By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6:

> And be it enacted that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever . . . for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or seagoing vessel, and to enforce the payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time when the . . . necessaries were furnished in respect of which such claim is made.

Barnes, Q.C. and Balloch, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—The court has no jurisdiction to entertain this action. This claim is not for "necessaries" within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. The original intention of the Legislature was to give jurisdiction over claims for anchors, cables, and equipment of that description. It is true that in recent years a more extended meaning has been given to the word "necessaries," so that it now includes money expended in necessaries; but there is no authority for holding it to include commission on charters:

Webster v. Seekamp, 4 B. & Ald. 352;
The Riga, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 202; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 516; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 246;
The Onni, Lush. 154.

It has been held that premiums for insurance are not necessaries:

The Heinrich Bjorn, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 145; 8 P. Div. 151.

In the present case the charters in respect of which the plaintiff is claiming commission were in respect of future voyages.

Sir Walter Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, contrà.—The test of whether an expenditure is necessary is whether it is such as a prudent owner would incur for the voyage. Whilst equipment is necessary to enable a ship to earn freight, it is still more necessary that she should be chartered, otherwise she is worthless to her owner. The word "necessaries" has very properly received an extended meaning:

The Andalina, 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 171; 12 P. Div. 1; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 62;
The Riga (ubi sup.);
The Neptune, 3 Knapp. 99.

The fact that the charter was for a subsequent voyage is immaterial. It was necessary for the voyage that the ship should be chartered.

Balloch in reply.

BUTT, J.—I am of opinion that the writ and other proceedings in this action must be set aside. The claim is for brokerage for procuring two charter-parties for the Swedish barque Marianne. In both cases the charter was not for the voyage then in prosecution, nor was the ship then in port and about to sail on the voyage; but she was at sea performing another contract, and the charters were for the hire of the ship after the termination of the voyage then in existence. The claim is based upon sect. 6 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, by which jurisdiction is given to the High Court of Admiralty for "necessaries supplied to any foreign ship." The question is, whether the court has jurisdiction to entertain the present claim; i.e., has this court jurisdiction to entertain a claim against the res for commission such as is claimed here? Now, it is true that a long time ago claims for necessaries were held to be limited to repairs, anchors, chains, and the like actually furnished to the ship as a necessary part of her equipment; and it is also true that in recent times the courts have extended the meaning of the word, so that it now in certain cases includes claims for money expended for the use of the ship. But I very much doubt whether a sum expended not for the purpose of the voyage in operation and in being at the time has ever been held to come within the meaning of the word "necessaries." Even had there been such a decision I should doubt very much whether broker's commission on a charter-party could be held to come within the meaning of the word. This claim being for brokerage on a charter-party effected not when the ship is in port and about to sail, but when she is at sea performing another contract, I think I should be carrying the meaning of the word "necessaries" too far were I to hold that such brokerage was a necessary. I do not think it comes within the meaning of the word, and that being so, I have no power to entertain this action against the ship. The writ and all other subsequent proceedings must therefore be set aside with costs.

Balloch, for the defendants, asked for damages due to the arrest of the ship.

BUTT, J.—This is the first I have heard of this claim for damages, and I must refuse to entertain it. The parties can take any other action they may be advised.

THE RIALTO. (a)

Salvage—Agreement—Amount of award.

Where salvors claim a fixed sum under an agreement, the court will not give effect to it if it appears that the parties to it did not contract on equal terms, and that the agreed sum is exorbitant, and will in such circumstances award the salvors such sum as it thinks just.

A steamship in the Atlantic fell in with another which had broken her main shaft. It was agreed in writing between the masters that the owners of the ship in distress should pay the salvors 6000*l. for being towed to the nearest port or anchorage. The master of the vessel in distress had reason for believing that unless he consented to such terms the salvors would not assist. The salvage was successfully accomplished without special difficulty or danger; the distance towed was about* 450 miles. The value of the salved property was 38,768*l. In a salvage action to recover the* 6000*l. or such sum as the court thought just, the Court awarded* 3000*l. and costs.*

THIS was a salvage action by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Coomassie against the steamship Rialto, her cargo and freight, for services rendered in the Atlantic Ocean.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—At about 6 a.m. on the 25th Dec. 1890 the Coomassie, a screw-steamship of 2625 tons gross, manned by a crew of thirty hands all told and laden with a cargo of cotton, was in the north Atlantic in the course of a voyage from New Orleans to Havre. The weather was fine, and there was a light breeze from N. to N.N.E. with a heavy swell. In those circumstances those on board the Coomassie sighted a steamship which proved to be the Rialto showing distress rockets and blue lights. The course of the Coomassie was thereupon directed to the Rialto, and the Coomassie having been manœuvered close to the Rialto, the Rialto's boat came to the Coomassie, when it was learnt that the Rialto was a steamer of 2229 tons gross register laden with general cargo and live cargo, and had broken her shaft on the 17th Dec. After certain negotiations as to terms the master of the Rialto signed an agreement — which was drawn up by the master of the Coomassie—whereby, in consideration of the Coomassie towing the Rialto to the nearest port or anchorage (Falmouth preferred), the Rialto was to pay a sum of 6000*l.* Two ropes were then passed between the vessels, and they with some difficulty and danger were made fast. During the operation a heaving line got round the propeller of the Coomassie, and it was with difficulty got clear. Towing then commenced, but in consequence of the yawing of the Rialto the port hawser parted. This was, however, repaired, when towing was resumed, and at about 8 a.m. on the 28th Dec. the Rialto was safely left in Falmouth Roads with a tug in attendance.

For the defendants it was alleged that the master of the Coomassie, on being applied to for assistance, demanded the sum of 6000*l.*, and on the master of the Rialto refusing to pay this sum the Coomassie steamed away as if about to leave the Rialto, and only returned in answer to signals from her. It was after this that the master of the Rialto agreed to pay the 6000*l.*, because he thought that if he did not he ran the risk of losing his ship.

The master of the Coomassie denied that he had ever intended to abandon the Rialto. He admitted steaming away, but according to him it was for the purpose of turning his vessel round, and it was whilst performing this manœuvre that he was signalled by the Rialto to return.

The defendants alleged that the services were rendered without any difficulty or danger, and were of a simple towage character.

Paragraph 3 of the defence was as follows:

3. When the Coomassie came up the weather was very fine and the sea smooth, and there was neither difficulty nor danger in getting the ropes passed between the ships. The master of the Coomassie, however, being aware that there were live cattle on board the Rialto which would be exposed to great suffering in bad weather or if the voyage was prolonged beyond the time for which there was food on board unless cargo was broached for the purpose of feeding them, made use of this circumstance, and altogether refused to allow the amount payable for salvage to be settled on shore in the ordinary way, and endeavoured to oust the jurisdiction of this honourable court by compelling the master of the Rialto to sign an agreement undertaking to pay 6000*l.* by the threat of at once leaving him and his cattle unless he signed it, and under these circumstances the master signed the agreement which had been previously prepared by the master of the Coomassie.

The value of the salved property was 38,768*l.* The value of the Coomassie, her cargo and freight, was 123,000*l.*

The plaintiffs claimed the agreed sum of 6000*l.*, or alternatively such sum as to the court should seem just.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the plaintiffs. — The agreement should be upheld. Both parties had a full knowledge of what they were doing, and if the Rialto was in no immediate danger, as the defendants allege, then the circumstances were not such as to give the plaintiffs an opportunity of using compulsion. The court ought not lightly to invalidate a written agreement of this kind. The values were large and the services most necessary.

Sir Charles Hall (with him Dr. Raikes), for the defendants, contrà.—The sum of 6000*l.* is exorbitant. The consent of the defendants to pay such sum was obtained under circumstances which practically amounted to compulsion. Salvage agreements should always be carefully scrutinised, and if giving effect to them will work manifest injustice, the court ought to set them aside:

The Mark Lane, 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 468; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 540; 15 P. Div. 135;
The Silesia, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 319; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 338; 5 P. Div. 177;
The Medina, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 779; 3 Asp. Mar Law Cas. 305; 2 P. Div. 5.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

BUTT, J.—In this case the first question is, whether the agreement referred to in the statement of claim, and put in evidence, should be upheld. It is an agreement signed by the masters of these two vessels, by which the captain of the Coomassie contracts to tow the Rialto to the nearest port or anchorage, Falmouth preferred. The vessel was towed, or, at all events, would have been towed, if the master of the salved ship had insisted on farther towage, to an anchorage outside Falmouth. The contract, if it was a contract, was therefore performed. According to the agreement the amount to be paid for the services is 6000*l.* The value of the salved property is 38,768*l.* There is no doubt that the services were well performed, but it does not appear that there was any such bad weather as would cause serious risk to the salvors or to their vessel. In these circumstances the question is, should I allow the plaintiffs this agreed sum of 6000*l.* It has been laid down more than once, and I think accurately laid down, that the pressure requisite to invalidate an agreement of this nature made under such circumstances is less than the duress required at common law to invalidate an agreement. What amount of duress will have that effect? The decided cases, of which there are many, show that the agreement insisted upon by the salvors must be inequitable. Then comes the question, what is an inequitable agreement in cases of this sort? There are two ingredients. The parties contracting must be shown to have contracted on unequal terms. I am inclined to think that in general, in the case of salvage services contracted for and about to be performed, the parties are on unequal terms, and that therefore the mere fact of their standing in such a position will not invalidate the agreement. Something more is required, and I think it comes to this, that if contracting, as they did here, on unequal terms, the price asked and insisted upon is exorbitant, then you have the two ingredients which will induce the court not to uphold the agreement. Now I have no doubt that here the parties, as they usually do in such cases, stood upon unequal terms. The question that follows is: Is 6000*l.* a wholly unreasonable, or, in other words, an exorbitant sum? I think it is entirely unreasonable, and therefore it seems to me that the two things necessary to invalidate the agreement exist here.

That being so, and that being entirely a matter for me, the next question is, what amount should the salvors receive? That depends on the usual consideration applicable to cases of this sort. Both ships are large, and I think it is correctly stated in the pleadings that there is always some risk in one steamer manœuvring to take hold of a disabled steamer. It is exemplified in this case by a fact which is always significant, and that is that one of the ropes got foul of the propeller, and by so doing seriously endangered it. The weather, as I have already said, was not bad, although it increased somewhat towards the end of the services. The towage took three days, and extended over some 450 miles. The value of the salved property is 38,000*l.* My opinion, after consulting the Elder Brethren, is, that a proper award is 3000*l.* I am asked to apportion, and will follow the course I usually take. Where the owners of the property are the principal salvors, and there has been practically no risk to the officers and crew, the practice has been to give the shipowners three-fourths. In the present case that is 2250*l.* The master will have 250*l.*, and the remaining 500*l.* will be divided among the officers and crew according to their rating. As the plaintiffs have recovered a large sum of money on their alternative claim, I shall follow the practice in the other divisions, and give them their costs.

THE TALBOT. (a)

Collision—River Mersey—Lights—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.

A steamship under way in the Mersey is not entitled to carry a white light at the mizen truck as a signal for a Customs officer, or otherwise than as a quarantine light; and if she carries such a light for the former purpose she is guilty of a breach of the Mersey Navigation Rules, and will be held to blame for a collision if the other vessel might have been misled thereby.

THIS was a collision action in rem by the owners of the steamship Stanley Force against the owners of the steamship Talbot. The defendants counterclaimed.

The collision occurred in the river Mersey on the 19th Dec. 1890.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 4.15 a.m. on 19th Dec. the Stanley Force, a steamer of 136 tons net register, manned by a crew of ten hands all told, was proceeding down the Mersey on a N.-¼-E. course. The weather was dark and hazy. The tide was the last hour's flood running about one knot. The Stanley Force was making about five or six knots an hour, and was carrying the usual regulation lights. In these circumstances the Stanley Force being off the Salisbury Dock entrance on the Liverpool side, those on board of her saw about half a mile distant, and from one and a half to two points on the port bow, two bright lights of a vessel apparently at anchor, and which proved to be the Talbot. The Stanley Force was kept on her course, when suddenly the green light of the Talbot came into view, showing that she was under way. The engines of the Stanley Force were at once stopped; her whistle was blown, and almost immediately afterwards her engines were reversed full speed, and her helm was put hard-a-port; but the Talbot came on, and with her stem struck the port bow of the Stanley Force, doing her damage.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—Shortly before 4.15 a.m. on 19th Dec. the Talbot, a steamship of 300 tons net register, manned by a crew of fifteen hands all told and laden with a cargo of sugar, was in the Mersey, off the Salisbury Dock entrance, in the course of a voyage from Dunkirk to Liverpool. She was exhibiting the usual regulation lights for a steamship under way in the Mersey, and in addition thereto was carrying a globular lantern at the mizen truck, which was alleged to be the usual Customs signal light for a ship coming from a foreign port. She had come up the river and starboarded to go into the dock, when those on board of her saw the mast-head and red lights of the Stanley Force about a quarter of a mile distant, and bearing about three points on her starboard bow. The Talbot sounded two blasts of her steam-whistle, and when it was seen that the Stanley Force was attempting to pass ahead of her, her engines were reversed, but the Stanley Force came on, and with her port bow struck the Talbot's stern.

The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the Talbot with carrying improper and misleading lights.

The defendants called evidence, which was contradicted by the plaintiffs, to prove that there was a custom for vessels in the Mersey coming from a foreign port to exhibit a white light at the mizen truck, and that the carrying of such a light, whether as a quarantine or Customs light, was so usual that it could not mislead.

The following Acts of Parliament were referred to, and are material to the decision:—

6 Geo. 4, c. 78:

Sect. 8. Every . . . master . . . having the charge of any vessel liable to the performance of quarantine shall . . . hoist . . . in the night time . . . a large signal lanthorn, with a light therein at the (maintop) mast head. . . .

Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85):

Sect. 17. If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in default, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulations necessary.

River Mersey Rules and Regulations:

Art. 4. Every vessel when at anchor shall carry the white light prescribed by art. 8 of the said Regulations (i.e. for Preventing Collisions at Sea), at a height not exceeding twenty feet above the hull, suspended from the forestay, or otherwise near the bow, where it may be best seen, and, in addition to the said light, all vessels having two or more masts shall exhibit another similar white light at double the height of the bow light at the main or mizen peak, or on the boom topping lift, or other position near the stern where it can be best seen.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Joseph Walton for the plaintiffs.—The Talbot is alone to blame. Her navigation was negligent, and she committed a breach of the Mersey Rules in carrying a white light at the mizen truck. No custom has been proved justifying its exhibition. The fact that vessels from quarantine ports carry a second white light is no reason why the Talbot should do so. This second light may have misled those on the Stanley Force into thinking she was a vessel at anchor, and if so, the Talbot is to blame, under sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873.

Barnes, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, contrà.—The Stanley Force is alone to blame. The light at the mizen truck is a well-known signal in the Mersey for a Customs boat, and at night is the only means of giving notice to the Customs officials. If so, the circumstances were such as to make a departure from the regulations necessary. Moreover, the Stanley Force was not only not misled in fact, but could not possibly have been misled, as the light might have been the quarantine light, which is constantly seen in the Mersey.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

THE PRESIDENT (Sir Chas. Butt), having found the Stanley Force to blame for bad look-out, continued:—Those on board the Stanley Force say that the white light carried at the mizen truck on the Talbot misled them into thinking that that vessel was a ship at anchor. By the Mersey Rules a two-masted vessel at anchor is to have a bow light twenty feet above the hull, and a light near the stern double that height. The mizen truck light of the Talbot was about double the height of the forward light, and the two might have appeared to be anchor lights. Whether the Stanley Force was misled is doubtful, as the Elder Brethren think that, apart form the exhibition of the Talbot's green light, which ought to have been seen sooner, the Stanley Force might have seen that the Talbot was coming across the river. If, however, the Stanley Force might have been misled, and if it was wrong for the Talbot to carry this extra light, then the latter vessel must be held to blame, under sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, for a breach of the regulations as to lights, unless circumstances rendered the breach necessary. It is to be observed, that only such vessels as come from a quarantine port can carry a quarantine light; and because some vessels which come into the Mersey are required to carry a light at the maintop mast head, other vessels carrying a second light at the mizen truck are not to be absolved, It was contended that a custom exists to carry the mizen truck light; but no such custom has been proved, nor is there any law requiring this light. The Elder Brethren also think that the Talbot might have waited until she was going into dock before hoisting the light. Therefore, though I am not satisfied that the Stanley Force was misled by the light, still, as it was not necessary for the Talbot to depart from the regulations, and as on the evidence it is doubtful whether the Stanley Force might not have been misled, I must hold, under the Act of Parliament, that the Talbot is also to blame.

THE RIVER DERWENT. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision — Crossing ship — Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the Thames, art. 24.

A vessel moving from one side of the Thames to the other is a crossing vessel, within the meaning of art. 24 of the Thames Rules, until she has completed the manœuvre she has in view, viz., to get straight, up or down the river, on the side to which she is going, and that manœuvre is not completed, although her stem may be as near to the opposite shore as she can safely get, if she is still athwart the stream.

THIS was an action brought by the appellants, the owners of the steamship Allendale, against the respondents, the owners of the steamship the River Derwent, in respect of a collision which occurred between the vessels in the Thames on the 19th Dec. 1888.

The Allendale was coming up the river on the flood tide, and was in the act of crossing the river, from the south to the north side, in order to moor at some buoys with her head to the tide, when the River Derwent, which had been following her up the river, ran into her amidships.

The Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames provide:

Art. 24. Steam-vessels crossing from one side of the river towards the other side shall keep out of the way of vessels navigating up and down the river.

Art. 25. Where by the above rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way the other shall keep her course.

Butt, J. found the River Derwent alone to blame, but the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.) found both vessels to blame.

From this decision the owners of the Allendale appealed.

The case is reported below in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 467; 62 L. T. Rep. N. S. 45, where the facts are fully set out.

Sir C. Hall, Q.C., Barnes, Q.C., and J. P. Aspinall appeared for the appellants.

Sir W. Phillimore and Raikes for the respondents.

The cases of The Thetford (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 179; 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 455) and Davies v. Mann (10 M. & W. 546) were referred to in the course of the arguments.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: The question in this case, and the only question now before your Lordships, is whether the Allendale was partly to blame or not. There can be no doubt that that question must of course in the first instance depend upon rules 24 and 25, however construed. When I say "however construed," I mean whether one does or does not give an exact and precise definition of what is a ship that has accomplished her purpose of crossing. That it is the duty of a ship which is going from one side of the river to the other to keep out of the way of ships which are going up and down is undoubtedly true under these rules, whatever the exact construction of the rules may be. It is undoubtedly a fact that the Allendale did cross from one side of the river to the other. Now, for my own part, I do not think that the question depends, as the Court of Appeal seems to have assumed, upon the exact position of the vessel, and whether the nose of the vessel touched the north shore or not. The rules are presumed to be exhaustive of the conditions in which a ship should be. The moment the vessel has left the south shore and is going towards the north shore, I presume she is in the act of crossing; that is to say, she has begun the operation—she is executing the manœuvre—which is to bring her from the one side of the river to the other; and I think it would be a very strange thing if, although she had not got at right angles to the opposite shore when she began her progress towards it, she would not be a crossing ship; or if, when she has got near the other shore on the opposite side, but has not assumed the position of a vessel going either up or down the stream, it could be said simply, because some part of her has got near to that shore, as near thereto as she could safely get, therefore she has accomplished the whole manœuvre. It seems to me that that would reduce the language of the rule to an absurdity. If she has not accomplished the manœuvre, if she is engaged in the act of crossing from the shore on one side towards the shore on the other, she is still under the obligation which is upon her to keep out of the way of vessels which are coming up and down. Indeed, any other construction of the rule would reduce it to this further absurdity, that she is in a condition which is not provided for at all; she is not coming up, she is not coming down, she is not at anchor, and by the hypothesis she is not crossing. That is a condition of things which I am not able to appreciate. It seems to me clear that she is therefore in the act of accomplishing that manœuvre, and is still under the obligation which the rule imposes upon her of keeping out of the way of vessels coming up and down the river, and then comes the complementary rule that vessels coming up and down the river are bound in respect of that ship to keep their course. Now, for some time I was under the impression that when this vessel had started to perform this manœuvre she had started in reasonable and proper time to effect it, and that the proceeding of the River Derwent was that, coming at a speed inappropriate to the condition of the river at the time, she had persisted in going on, and, as one of my noble and learned friends put it, chasing the other vessel so that she could not properly perform the manœuvre in time. If that had been the condition of things another question certainly would have arisen. But when one comes to see what the real condition of things was it seems to me that the true clue to what happened in this case was, that the Allendale endeavoured to get across in too short an interval of time, thinking very likely (but making a mistake) that she could accomplish the manœuvre in time. She either miscalculated the distance or miscalculated the speed of the other ship, and made that mistake for which she must be responsible; or else I confess I am haunted by the suspicion now that she assumed that, if she did not accomplish the complete execution of the manœuvre in the time in which she thought originally she could accomplish it, then the other vessel would get out of her way, or stop so as to avoid any difficulty. If that was the calculation upon which she proceeded it seems to me that by it she impliedly reversed the obligation, and expected ships going up or down the river to keep out of her way instead of her keeping out of theirs. For these reasons, although I cannot quite assent to the construction which the Court of Appeal have placed upon the rule, or to the inference which they have drawn, yet I am unable to disagree with the conclusion at which they have arrived, namely, that both vessels were to blame. I therefore move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I think these two rules should be treated as a rule of the road, and that what one may call a practical construction ought to be put upon them like that put upon the ordinary rule of the road on land, where as a rule a carriage ought to keep on one particular side of the road; but there may be occasions for going to the other side, and the driver of a carriage who goes to the other side may not be in any sense to blame if he puts no difficulty upon any other carriage that has occasion to use the road. Indeed, he not only may not be to blame, but he may have a cause of action against any person who does him an injury in consequence of the position in which he is, if that person with reasonable care could have avoided it, upon the principle of the case that was mentioned of Davis v. Mann (10 M. & W. 546). On the other hand it may be that by going on the wrong side of the road he has put a carriage coming in the opposite direction in such a difficulty that no blame is attributable to the driver of the opposite carriage, and the fault of the collision is entirely upon the man who has gone to the wrong side of the road. Now, I was going to say interpreting—but I can hardly say interpreting the rule in that way, because it does not need interpretation, it is plain and intelligible without any construction—but I will say understanding the rule in that way, I wish to say that I dissent from the notion of the responsibility being limited to the time while the crossing is being continued. In my opinion it extends to the crossing and the situation in which the vessel is when she has crossed; because it seems to me quite absurd to say that she has kept out of the way of a coming vessel, if, at the very moment of her stopping her crossing, that coming vessel ran into her. I think that she has to keep out of the way of a coming vessel during the crossing and when she has crossed. Now, I should not like to be misunderstood. If the coming vessel were half a mile off at the time when she had finished her crossing, and if that coming vessel persisted in continuing her course, and ran into her, I think the blame would not be in the crossing vessel, but would be entirely in the vessel which had, if I may quote myself, given chase to her and ran into her; in my opinion the blame would be solely with that vessel. But I am supposing the case where, at the moment of stopping, the coming vessel is in such a position that she cannot, or cannot without some extra skill or good fortune, avoid running into the vessel which has crossed.

Those being the principles which govern my judgment in this case, looking at the whole of the evidence, and considering the state of the river and the particular position of these two vessels, that is to say, the Allendale and the River Derwent, and the particular position of the James Sothern, I cannot help thinking that the rule was disobeyed by the Allendale, and that she did not keep out of the way of the River Derwent, so that the River Derwent was put into some difficulty by the manœuvre of the Allendale. I confess that the doubt I rather have is whether the River Derwent was not free from blame; but I am content to think, and do believe, that the River Derwent might perhaps by an extra quantity of skill and care have gone astern of both the James Sothern and the Allendale. I am not at all sure that she could, but at all events I am content to agree—indeed the question is not before us except in so far as it is an ingredient in considering the conduct of the Allendale. I am quite content with the adjudication which has taken place against the River Derwent, and I am of opinion that that which has been given against the Allendale is also right.

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that, if we were to accede to the argument which has been urged at the bar on behalf of the appellants, we should practically fritter away altogether these rules which have been laid down for the navigation of the river Thames. Indeed, the learned counsel for the appellants have argued that to construe them literally, or according to their strict language, would impose difficulties in the navigation of the river, and would create commercial inconvenience, which necessitates some departure from their strict terms. That is an argument to which I cannot for a moment give my assent. It would be better to have no rules at all than not to enforce absolute obedience to them according to the natural interpretation to be put upon them. Unless you do so they really become a snare, a cause of mischief and disaster, rather than an additional source of safety. Therefore it seems to me that, when these rules which have been laid down for the navigation of the river have been broken, the vessel breaking them must be held to blame unless she can justify herself on the ground of some necessity, some superior obligation, which made it under the circumstances justifiable in her to depart from the course laid down. Well, then, was the Allendale, under the circumstances, within the rule bound to keep out of the way of vessels passing up and down the river, which in their turn were justified and indeed required to keep their course? I cannot doubt that upon any reasonable construction of the rule the Allendale was in that position. She had started on the one side of the river and passed over to the other across the path of vessels, if they reached her in time, passing up and down the river; and at the time when the collision occurred she was still athwart the river in the execution of that manœuvre. To say that she was not a vessel which had come under the obligation to keep out of the way of vessels passing up and down the river, and was still under that obligation, it appears to me would be to defeat the rule. That being so, how does she seek to avoid the consequences resulting from the charge that she has broken the rule? The only suggestion appears to me to be, that she had anticipated that the other vessel would so manœuvre or would so conduct herself by stopping as that there would be no collision. To admit that for a moment would be at once to abolish the obligation which lay upon her to keep out of the way of the other vessel. When the argument of the appellants is reduced to this, that she was not breaking the rule because if the other vessel had stopped she would not have been in her way, inasmuch as the other vessel would not have come on and struck her, it appears to me that that of itself shows that the contention is an impossible one, and that the Allendale was rightly held to blame.

Lord FIELD.—My Lords: I am entirely of the same opinion. It appears to me that the Allen- dale in this case was clearly under the obligation of observing rule 24. That she was so when she began to cross, and while she was crossing from the south side to the north side nobody can entertain any doubt at all; and I am inclined to think that the duty imposed upon her by rule 24 came into operation at that time. At the same time the duty imposed by rule 25 upon the River Derwent and the other vessels navigating up and down the river also came into force, because those two rules speak together; they indicate to the ship that is about to cross and is crossing what her duty is, and they indicate to the master or navigator of a ship coming up or down the river what his duty is. It is absolutely essential that those two rules should speak at the same moment of time, namely, when each ship has to decide upon the course on which she is to go. Now, then, what has the crossing ship to do? I feel the full force of the observation of Lord Herschell, that to hold that the duty was not an absolute one, and that the rule was not obligatory upon such a vessel, would be to bring us back to the common law. I am not at all sure if this case had been tried before a jury in a court of common law, and the jury had found the Allendale to blame, that even without the regulation I should have come to the conclusion that that verdict ought to be set aside. But it seems clear to me that the duty is prescribed by the rule, and that it is of the greatest possible importance that the rule should be held to have that force. Now, then, what was she about? She was not going across to a quay or to stand still when she got over there; she was performing a complicated manœuvre. She had to moor at a buoy on the south side of the river, and, the tide flowing at the time, she was obliged to moor head to tide. For that purpose she had therefore to describe first of all a diagonal course across the river, and then swinging round, as the captain says, watching his opportunity to come across to the other side, so as to lie off by the buoy. That during that operation she was at some time or other a crossing ship cannot for a moment be doubted. It may be that in some cases there may be some difficulty in ascertaining the precise point at which the crossing movement becomes separated from the semicircular or turning movement, but I see no difficulty in this case at all. What had she done? When she had got to the north side of mid-channel, somewhere about there, she let go her anchor for the purpose of canting up, and she stopped her engines; but she was still under way; at the very moment of the collision she was forging ahead. Now at this moment her position as regards the stream was this: she had tailed up, I think they said, one or two points, and her head was, one witness says, one point, another witness says two points, slightly off, but still going towards the north shore. She was in motion at the time, and forging ahead, and was performing that manœuvre which it was necessary for her to perform in order to execute the orders which she had got to lie off. Under these circumstances it seems to me that she was still crossing within the meaning of the rule, and was therefore to blame.

Lord HANNEN.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion, and I might, perhaps, content myself with concurring without making any observation upon the case; but I desire to express an opinion upon a question which has been considered in the courts below, namely, as to the effect of these rules 24 and 25. It appears to me that the leading idea to be borne in mind is this, that the crossing from one side of the river to the other is to be taken as one manœuvre, and cannot be divided into portions. You cannot look merely at the time while the vessel is moving ahead in the ordinary way towards the other shore; the object which the vessel has in view must be borne in mind also. That object is, that she may take a course either up or down the river on the other side, and until that is accomplished she is still only engaged in the operation of crossing towards the other side. In this case that operation consisted not merely in the passing across the river in the ordinary way, but in swinging by means of the anchor, which was atrip, I think it is called. That was part of the operation by which she was approaching or crossing towards the other side. There was no idea of her running actually to the other side, but she was manœuvring so as to bring herself into a position which would enable her to take a course up or down the river. Therefore it appears to me that it matters not whether it was under direct steam or in any other way; she was still engaged in the operation of crossing towards the other side, and if the effect was that she placed herself in a position which, having regard to another vessel coming down the river, was putting herself in the way of that vessel, the contention which has been urged on behalf of the Allendale leads to this absurdity, that by putting herself into the way of another vessel she was keeping herself out of its way. Now, what were the duties of the Allendale when she performed the operation of crossing towards the other side? It was her duty to see what was the state of the river, and what vessels were approaching, and amongst others she ought to have seen (and did see) that the River Derwent was approaching, and, as it now turns out and is admitted, not at an excessive speed. Then that was one of the things which the Allendale was bound to take into account. Could she prudently pass across and keep out of the way of another vessel which she saw was coming down in the ordinary course of navigation? Well, it turned out that she could not. But she says, if that vessel had done something other than she did, then there would have been no collision, which is in effect saying, If that other vessel had kept out of my way, then there would have been no collision. That is, in fact, reversing the rule. She had to consider whether, in the existing state of things which she saw, she could with safety accomplish the manœuvre she was engaged in. I will not dwell upon the evidence; it has been sufficiently referred to. I come to the same conclusion as that arrived at by the noble and learned Lords who have preceded me, that the Allendale was to blame, and that is the only question which is before this House.

Feb. 3 and 14, 1891.

(Present: The Right Hons. Lords WATSON and MORRIS, and Sir RICHARD COUCH.)

THE PLEIADES; THE JANE. (a)

Collision—Practice—Contributory negligence.

Where, on appeal in a collision case, it appeared that the court below had found that the appellants' ship was to blame, and had accepted the story told by the respondents; it was Held, that it was not open to the appellants on the appeal to raise the contention that, assuming the appellants to be to blame, the respondents were also to blame, as the appellants had not raised such question in the court below.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Gibraltar in three consolidated collision actions, by which the steamship Pleiades was found alone to blame for a collision with the steamship Jane.

The collision occurred off Europa Point at about 5 p.m. on the 3rd Aug. 1889. The Jane a steamship of 841 tons register, was putting into Gibraltar for coals and was making about seven knots through the water on a N.W. by N. course. The Pleiades, a steamship of 1456 tons register, was coming through the Straits of Gibraltar into the Mediterranean, and was making about ten knots an hour on an E. by N. ¼ N. course. Each vessel kept its course and speed until they were within a short distance of each other, when both vessels ported. The Pleiades at the same time stopped and shortly afterwards reversed her engines, whilst the Jane momentarily stopped her engines and then put them on full speed ahead again. Notwithstanding these manœuvres the vessels came into collision at considerable speed, the Pleiades with her stem striking the port side of the Jane abaft the main rigging.

The judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court found that the Pleiades had the Jane on her starboard side, and that it was her duty, under art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, to keep out of the way of the Jane, and that she was to blame for not doing so. He also found that the Jane kept her course until the Pleiades had come so close as to render a collision inevitable, and that by the porting she rendered the collision less serious.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 16. If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Art. 22. Where by the above rules one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

The charge made by the appellants at the hearing in the court below against the Jane was, that she altered her course and thereby caused the collision; and in answer to question 14, of their preliminary act, asking "what fault if any is attributed to the other ship?" the answer was, "The collision was caused through the s.s. Jane not keeping her course." It was not suggested by either party in the court below that in the event of their vessel being found to blame there was contributory fault on the part of the other vessel.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Raikes for the appellants.—The collision was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Jane. Even assuming the Pleiades to be in fault, the Jane is also to blame for not having stopped and reversed her engines. [Lord WATSON referred to The Tasmania, 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 517; 15 App. Cas. 223.]

Judgment was delivered by

Lord WATSON.—This is an appeal by the owners and master of the steamship Pleiades from a judgment of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Gibraltar, in three consolidated suits, arising out of a collision between their vessel and the steamship Jane. Two of these are cross-actions of damage by the respective masters, and the third an action by the owner of the Jane's cargo against the Pleiades and freight. The learned judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court found that the Pleiades alone was to blame for the disaster; and he has disposed of each action in accordance with that finding. The collision occurred between 4.30 and 5 p.m. on the 3rd Aug. 1889, in broad daylight and in calm fine weather, about a quarter of a mile to the southward of Europa Point Lighthouse. The vessels appear to have first sighted each other when they were from three to four miles apart. The Pleiades was then entering the Mediterranean on an E. ½ N. course, at a speed of ten knots per hour. The Jane was making for the port of Gibraltar, on a crossing course N. W. by W., at the rate of seven and a half knots. Each vessel kept its course, without alteration of speed, until they came within 400 or 500 yards of each other. So far there is no material discrepancy between the accounts given by the witnesses on either side; but there is some conflict of evidence as to subsequent events. On reaching the point already indicated, the Pleiades ported her helm, which carried her half a point to starboard before actual collision, and signalled the manœuvre by two blasts of her whistle; whilst the Jane ported, with the effect (due apparently to her having no keel) of bringing her head five points to starboard at the time of collision. When she altered her helm, the Pleiades first stopped and shortly after reversed her engines; but there must have been considerable way upon her at the moment of collision, because her master states, "It would take nine or ten minutes to stop way from full speed ahead." When the Jane ported, she first stopped and then went full speed ahead. The collision took place in a very short time, apparently not more than from one to two minutes after the first change of helm, the stem of the Pleiades striking the port side of the Jane, nearly at right angles, abaft the main rigging. The witnesses differ as to the sequence of these events. Those of the Pleiades assert that her change of helm was not made until the Jane had ported, and that it was necessitated by the action of the Jane. Those examined for the Jane state that she altered her course after, and in consequence of the Pleiades having intimated that she was starboarding. The learned judge of the court below, before whom all the principal witnesses were examined, gave credit to the version told by the witnesses from the Jane, and their Lordships see no reason to differ from his conclusion. The only case made by the appellants in their pleadings and in their evidence was, that both ships ought to have mantained their original courses, with unaltered speed, in which case there would have been no risk of collision, and that the collision which ensued was entirely owing to the Jane's departure from her original course. In their preliminary act they state that "the collision was caused through the steamship Jane not keeping her course, Articles 16 and 22." The case presented on the other side was, that the Pleiades occasioned the collision by failing to observe article 16, and keep out of the way of the Jane; that the Jane ported because the starboarding of the Pleiades indicated that she had determined to disobey the rule inculcated by article 16; and that the result of her disobedience was to render collision inevitable. It was not suggested by either party that, in the event of their vessel being found to have been in the wrong, there was contributory fault on the part of the other vessel, which would imply joint responsibility. Their Lordships have no hesitation in holding that the decision of the Vice-Admiralty Court upon the issues submitted to it was fully justified by the evidence. They have, with the assistance of their assessors, formed a clear opinion (1) that, if both vessels had continued on their original courses, with unabated speed, to the point of intersection of these courses, there would have been imminent danger of collision; (2) that the attempt of the Pleiades to pursue her original course was in plain violation of the 16th article of the Regulations; and that, having regard to the proximity of Europa Point on the one hand and the abundance of sea room on the other, an endeavour to pass ahead of the Jane was an improper and unseamanlike manœuvre; and (3) that, up to the time when she starboarded, the Pleiades could, by porting and directing her course to starboard, have complied with the Regulations, and passed astern of the Jane without involving risk of collision.

On the argument of this appeal, counsel for the Pleiades maintained for the first time that assuming her to have been culpable by reason of her failure to keep out of the way, the Jane was also in fault, and ought to be jointly condemned in damages, in consequence of her failure to comply with the 18th article of the Regulations. If the argument were admissible at this stage of the proceedings, it would raise the very serious question whether the Jane was justified in steaming ahead instead of reversing when it became apparent that a collision was unavoidable; and the onus of showing that her action was justifiable would undoubtedly rest upon the Jane. Upon the merits of the argument, their Lordships purposely refrain from expressing any opinion, in the present condition of the evidence. They did not call upon the respondents' counsel for a reply, because they were satisfied, upon the appellants' own showing, that they ought not to entertain the question. The point was not taken in the court below, where no reference was made to the 18th article either in the preliminary acts, the pleadings, the evidence, or in the argument. The evidence upon which the contention is now based was elicited from the witnesses in loose and general terms, not for the purpose of ascertaining the precise state of the facts, but simply by way of narrative. The master of the Jane was asked on cross-examination why he ported his helm; but not a single question was put to any of the Jane's witnesses in regard to her going ahead instead of reversing. In these circumstances, their Lordships are not satisfied that they have before them —to use the language of Lord Herschell in The Tasmania (ubi sup.)— "all the facts bearing upon the new contention, as completely as would have been the case if the controversy had arisen at the trial; and next, that no satisfactory explanation could have been offered by those whose conduct is impugned if an opportunity of explanation had been afforded them when in the witness-box." Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment appealed from. The appellants must pay to the respondents, who have appeared, their costs of this appeal.

PHELPS, JAMES, AND CO. v. HILL AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Carriage of goods—Deviation—Power of master — Reasonable necessity — Damage to cargo — Liability.

A ship belonging to the defendants, who were shipowners and shipbuilders at Bristol, shipped, in addition to other cargo, some tin plates belonging to the plaintiffs at Cardiff, for New York. The bill of lading contained the usual exemptions from liability in respect of damage by collision, &c. In the course of the voyage the ship experienced very heavy weather, and repairs became necessary. The master put into Queenstown at first, and afterwards, having communicated with the defendants, determined to return to Bristol for repairs. In the Avon the ship came into collision with another vessel and sank. She was subsequently raised and taken to Bristol. The plaintiffs sued for damages for the failure of the defendants to deliver the tin plates in New York according to the bill of lading. The case was tried before a judge and special jury, and the verdict and judgment were for the defendants. The plaintiffs applied for a new trial, and contended that the master was not justified without the consent of the cargo-owners in returning to Bristol, but should have had the ship repaired at Queenstown or Swansea, that the jury had been misdirected, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

Held, that the return to Bristol was not such a deviation from the course as could not be held to be reasonably necessary; that the ship being a "general ship," it was not necessary to communicate with the cargo-owners before returning to Bristol; that the question of reasonable necessity was one for the jury, and that the verdict should not be disturbed.

THIS action was brought by Messrs. Phelps, James, and Co., merchants, carrying on business in London, and Messrs. Phelps, Dodge, and Co., merchants, carrying on business in New York, against Messrs. Hill and Co., who were shipowners and shipbuilders in Bristol.

The claim was for damages for failure to deliver, according to the bill of lading, certain tinplates shipped by the plaintiffs, on the Llandaff City, a steamship belonging to the defendants.

The Llandaff City left Bristol on the 27th Dec. 1889, partly laden with cargo for New York. The same evening she touched at Swansea and shipped the tin plates in question for New York. She left Swansea on the 1st Jan. 1890.

The ship experienced very bad weather after leaving Swansea, and suffered so much that she was obliged to put back for repairs.

She first put into Queenstown, and the master telegraphed from there to the defendants, who directed him to bring the ship back to Bristol, where they had facilities for repairs.

On her way thither she came into collision in the Avon with another vessel and sank. She was eventually raised and taken to Bristol. The tin plates which were damaged by the water were sold by auction at Bristol.

The bill of lading under which the plaintiffs' goods were shipped for New York, exempted the defendants from liability in respect of:

> Breakage . . . rust, frost, decay, contact with or smell, or evaporation from any other goods, collision, stranding, straining, or other perils of the seas, rivers, navigation or land transit of whatsoever nature or kind; and all damage, loss, or injury arising from the perils or things above mentioned, and whether such perils or things arise from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the master, mariners, engineers, stevedores, or other persons in the service of the shipowner, always excepted . . . with liberty, in the event of the steamer putting back to Bristol or into any port, or otherwise being prevented from any cause from commencing or proceeding in the ordinary course of her voyage, to proceed under sail or in tow of any other vessel, or in any other manner which the shipowner shall think fit, and to ship or tranship the goods by any other vessel.

It was also provided that "the shipowner is not to be liable for any damage to any goods which is capable of being covered by insurance."

The plaintiffs contended that the master should not have returned to Bristol, but should have stayed at Queenstown or put into Swansea for repairs, which last-mentioned port is about sixty miles from Bristol.

The action was tried before Mathew, J. and a special jury. Mathew, J. left to the jury the question, whether the master exercised the discretion of a reasonable man in the interest of the ship and cargo in going to Bristol instead of remaining at Queenstown, or going to Swansea. The jury found that there was no deviation, and judgment was entered for the defendants.

The plaintiffs moved for a new trial.

Barnes, Q.C. and Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—The master should not have taken the tin plates from Queenstown, or at any rate he should not have proceeded beyond Swansea, which was a nearer port for repairs than Bristol. The damage to the ship might have been reasonably repaired at Cardiff, Newport, or Swansea. The master must not deviate from his course more than necessity requires, having regard to the interests of the shipowner and cargo-owners:

Lavabre v. Wilson, 1 Doug. 284;
Turner v. Protection Insurance Company, 25 Maine, 515; Ewbank v. Nutting, 7 C. B. 797.

Before leaving Queenstown for Bristol, the master should have obtained the consent of the cargo-owners as well as of the shipowners.

Bigham, Q.C., Sir Walter Phillimore, and L. E. Pyke for the defendants.—The question depends upon whether there was a reasonable necessity for the deviation made by the master: (Phillips on Marine Insurance, sects. 1018 to 1024.) There was evidence which justified the jury in holding that Bristol was the most convenient port to make for.

Barnes, Q.C. in reply.—The bill of lading was not meant to cover a breach of contract by the shipowner:

Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 714; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 275; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 546.

It has been held that exceptions in the bill of lading, on the ground of necessity, should be strictly construed against the shipowner:

The Australasian Steam Navigation Company v. Morse, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 407; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 222.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 28.—LINDLEY, L.J., having stated the facts of the case, read the following written judgment:—The voyage being fixed by the contract of affreightment, it is the duty of the master to proceed to the port of delivery without delay and without any unnecessary departure from the direct and usual course. But circumstances may arise which render it necessary to depart from this usual course, and tempestuous weather injuring the ship and rendering it necessary to put into some port of repair is one of those circumstances. When a ship is thus injured it is the duty of the master to do the best he can for all concerned, but his primary duty being to complete the voyage with as little delay as possible, it follows that his first care ought to be to get the ship repaired as quickly as he can. The same principle may be expressed in other words; e.g., by saying that he ought to go to the nearest port where the necessary repairs can be most quickly done, or by saying that there ought to be no unnecessary departure from the proper course of the voyage and no unnecessary delay in prosecuting it. But in whatever language the rule is expressed, it must not be so worded as to exclude the element of reasonableness. By "possible" and "necessary" is meant reasonably possible and reasonably necessary, and in considering what is reasonably possible or reasonably necessary every material circumstance must be taken into account; e.g., danger, distance, accommodation, expense, time, and so forth. No one of these can be excluded. Mr. Barnes invited us to exclude the element of expense; but to say that as a matter of law expense is to be disregarded would be to make the rule far too rigid. Suppose there are two ports, both equally safe and accessible and in all respects proper for repairing the ship; but suppose one is a dear port compared with the other, a reasonable man would naturally and properly choose the cheaper. Suppose the cheaper port to be a little more out of the way than the other, is it reasonable to say that the master must go to the other? I can find no authority for so rigid a rule. All the decisions on the subject of deviation show that what is reasonably necessary is permissible in these cases. Lord Mansfield said, in Lavabre v. Wilson (ubi sup.): "A deviation from necessity must be justified both as to substance and manner. Nothing more must be done than what the necessity requires." But this passage, though often referred to, has never been understood as excluding the element of reasonableness. Moreover, if a master of competent skill and knowledge, and acting bonâ fide in the interest of all concerned, has chosen one port in preference to another, then, although the court or a jury may and ought to take a different view if they come to the conclusion that he ought to have acted differently, they ought not to come to such a conclusion on light grounds. In a nicely balanced case they are fully justified in attaching considerable weight to the master's judgment and in allowing that to turn the scale in their own minds. This is what I understand Mr. Phillips to mean in sect. 1022 of his well-known book, and what the court laid down in the American case of Turner v. Protection Insurance Company (ubi sup.). In that case the Court said: "The master in most cases must be the principal judge of the degree of peril to which his vessel is exposed, and of her ability to proceed with safety to a nearer or to a more distant port, and of the facilities for repairing her at different ports. If he is competent and faithful, his decision respecting these matters, made in good faith, should be satisfactory to all interested, although he may err in judgment." That was an action on a policy on which deviation was relied on as a defence. There was no conflict between the cargo-owner and the shipowner as in the case before us. But the same principle is applicable to both classes of cases. Applying this principle to the present case, can we set the verdict of the jury aside? I think not.

Mr. Barnes complained of misdirection on the ground that the learned judge ought to have told the jury that the cargo owners ought to have been communicated with at Queenstown and have been consulted as to what ought to be done. No authority was cited in support of this proposition, and principle and considerations of expediency are against it. Are the cargo-owners to be consulted about repairing the ship? That is nothing to them provided the voyage is duly completed. Are they to be consulted as to what is to be done with the cargo? How is this possible if the ship is a general ship? How is the master to know who all the owners of the cargo are? What is he to do if they differ in opinion? To hold that they ought to be consulted would be to impose a new and intolerable burden on the master. It was contended that there was misdirection in omitting to tell the jury that no deviation could be justified that was not necessary, and that the judge did not sufficiently explain the importance of this to the jury. But this contention is based on the assumption that what is meant by "necessary" is something much more rigid than what is reasonably necessary in a nautical and commercial sense. Then it was said that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence; that the evidence showed that the master sacrificed the interests of the cargo-owners to the interests of the shipowners; that he acted on their orders and not on his own judgment; that even if he was justified in leaving Queenstown he ought to have put into Swansea, and not Bristol. Having studied and read the evidence with care, I cannot disagree with the jury. I find it quite impossible to say that twelve men could not have found a verdict for the defendants if they had really understood the evidence. I am satisfied that the master did consider the interests of the cargo-owners as well as those of his immediate employers, and that he did act bonâ fide to the best of his judgment in the matter. It may be that Swansea would have been as good and in some respects a better port to put into than Bristol; but, on the other hand, there was less risk of delay in Bristol, and there were advantages to the shipowners which there was no real reason for sacrificing. These were all matters fairly before the jury and for them to consider and determine. In my opinion it would be wrong to disturb the verdict. It is not necessary to determine the point raised by the defendants on the clause as to insurance, but I am inclined to think that it has reference to the voyage contracted for, and not to unjustifiable departures from it. The motion is refused, with costs.

Lopes, L.J. read the following written judgment:—The question in this case is whether there was a deviation. If there was a deviation, or, in other words, if the deviation was not justified, the shipowner is liable for a loss by the perils of the sea. He is not protected by the exception of perils in the contract. The voyage must be prosecuted without unnecessary delay or deviation. The shipowner's contract is that he will be diligent in carrying the goods on the agreed voyage, and will do so directly without any unnecessary deviation. But this undertaking is to be understood with reference to the circumstances that arise during the performance of the contract. He is not answerable for delays or deviations which are occasioned or become necessary without default on his part. Where the safety of the adventure under the master's control necessitates that he should go out of his course, he is not only justified in doing so, but it is his duty in the right performance of his contract with the owners of the cargo. The shipowner through his master is bound to act with prudence and skill and care in avoiding dangers and in mitigating the consequences of any disaster which may have happened. The master is bound to take into account the interests of the cargo-owners as well as those of the shipowner. He must act prudently for all concerned. So strict is the rule with regard to deviation that, while the master may deviate to save life, he may not deviate to save property. Going into a port out of the usual course for necessary repairs and staying till they are complete is no deviation, provided it plainly appears that such repairs, under the circumstances and at such port, were reasonably necessary and the delay not greater than necessary for the completion of such repairs, so as to enable the vessel to proceed on her voyage. The deviation must not be greater than a reasonable necessity demands, having regard to the respective interests of shipowner and cargo-owner. A reasonable necessity implies the existence of such a state of things, as having regard to the interest of all concerned, would properly influence the decision of a reasonable, competent, and skilful master.

I now proceed to apply the law as I have stated it to the present case. That the master was justified in the circumstances in seeking a port of refuge is not denied. The port first touched was Queenstown. Nor is it seriously contended that he was not justified in leaving Queenstown, where the cargo could not be reconditioned, and proceeding to a more suitable port. The question is whether in the circumstances he was justified in proceeding to a more distant port—viz., Bristol, rather than to a nearer port, viz., Swansea. Bristol was sixty miles further from Queenstown than Swansea. The vessel was lost by a collision in the river Avon when making her way to Bristol. The shipowners were shipbuilders at Bristol, where they had large repairing and building yards. It was said they had there machinery of a similar kind to that on board the vessel in question which could easily be fitted into the vessel, and which would take the place of that which had been damaged. They had also steamers in the same line as the vessel in question into which, it is said, the cargo could be transshipped. The master, when at Queenstown, telegraphed to his owners at Bristol, who telegraphed to their underwriters, asking for directions. Upon receiving an answer from their underwriters the owners directed the master to bring the vessel to Bristol. After hearing the evidence and a very careful summing up from the learned judge, the jury came to the conclusion that the master was justified in acting as he did, and that there was no deviation. It was said that the learned judge should have directed the jury that there was no evidence upon which they could find that the master was justified in proceeding to Bristol. Such a contention is untenable. Beyond all doubt it was a question to be left to the jury. But then it is said that the verdict found by the jury was against the weight of the evidence, and one which twelve reasonable men, having regard to all the circumstances, could not reasonably find. I cannot adopt this view. I am of opinion there was ample evidence to support the conclusion at which the jury by their verdict arrived. The master was an intelligent, competent, and skilful master, and the measures taken by him were taken in good faith, and an honest exercise of discretion used within its proper limits. Can it be said that the jury were so wrong that their verdict ought to be set aside, if they thought such a state of things existed as, having regard to the interest of all concerned, might properly influence the decision of the master, and induce him to go to Bristol rather than Swansea? For the shipowner Bristol was the more desirable port, nor was it unreasonable for the jury to think upon the evidence that Bristol was better for the cargo-owner, because there would be less delay in refitting and proceeding on the voyage. It is very difficult to say what the state of the cargo was, and how far it required to be reconditioned. But, assuming it required reconditioning, there is no evidence to show that this could not be as well done and with as little expense at Bristol as at Swansea. I can discover no consideration of danger, distance, accommodation, expense, or time which made Swansea so preferable to Bristol as to justify the jury in saying the master was wrong in going to Bristol. In these circumstances it is impossible to say the jury were wrong in the verdict they found; it was a question for them, and they had ample evidence to find as they did. It was said the master, in Queenstown, before determining to proceed to Bristol, ought to have communicated with the cargo-owners. There is no authority for this. Moreover, the ship was a general ship, and there were twenty cargo-owners. It might be that some of the bills of lading were indorsed. To communicate with such cargo-owners would be impracticable. The motion must be refused.

KAY, L.J. read a written judgment as follows:—An extremely interesting and important question has been raised by this motion, viz., what amounts to such necessity as will justify a departure by the master of a ship from the strict course of the voyage, and, when there is necessity for departure, how far such departure may go without amounting to what is called in law a "deviation." The ship was a steamer. The voyage was from Bristol, touching at Swansea to complete cargo, and thence to New York. The cargo was chiefly tin plates. There were some chemicals. The ship was despatched by the owners, and there were about twenty shippers of cargo. The ship completed her cargo and was on the way to New York when she encountered very heavy weather, during which the fore-hatch was carried away, the decks strained and injured, a considerable amount of water made its way from the deck into the hold, some damage was done to the tin plates, the donkey engines were disabled, the pumps choked, the ship was in some danger, and both sides agree that it was necessary to put back to a port of refuge. The nearest was Crookhaven, but the most convenient was Queenstown. The ship made for Queenstown, where she put down a single anchor, as the captain says, because his intention was to return to Bristol to refit. The owners of the ship were themselves shipbuilders, their building yards were at Bristol, they had duplicates there of the different parts of the ship's machinery. Moreover, they had a line of similar steamers which departed on the same voyage periodically, and the captain suggests that it might have been possible, if necessary, to transship the cargo into another of those steamers which had shortly to start. Accordingly he telegraphed to the owners, who, after communicating with their underwriters, directed him to bring the ship back to Bristol. On her way thither she was run into in the Avon by another steamer and sunk. This was a risk excepted by the terms of the bill of lading if it occurred during the proper voyage. The question is whether the captain was right in not having the ship repaired at Queenstown, and, if he was, whether he should not have proceeded to Swansea rather than Bristol, as it was some sixty or seventy miles nearer to Queenstown, and a better place, it is suggested, for selling the cargo, if it should have to be sold, and also for retinning any of the plates that might require to be so treated—an operation which could hardly be performed at Bristol. The general law on the subject of deviation is not in controversy; it can hardly be better expressed than in the words of Lord Mansfield in Lavabre v. Wilson (ubi sup.): "A deviation from necessity must be justified both as to substance and manner. Nothing more must be done than what the necessity requires. The true objection to a deviation is not the increase of the risk. If that were so it would only be necessary to give an additional premium. It is that the party contracting has voluntarily substituted another voyage for that which has been insured." I cannot find that those words have ever been criticised. They are adopted in the latest editions of the text-books on the subject. Another proposition, which seems equally well-established, is, that where there is upon the evidence a question whether what the captain did was necessary under the circumstances, that question is proper to be determined by the jury: (Motteux v. London Assurance Company, 1 Atk. 544; O'Reilly v. Gonne, 4 Camp. 249). Without attempting any exhaustive definition of what amounts to necessity in such cases, I think it may fairly be said necessity does not mean absolute physical necessity only, but a reasonable necessity having regard to the interests of the shipowners and also of the cargo-owners, and to all the other circumstances of the case. It is suggested here that the learned judge should have directed the jury that the captain, before leaving Queenstown for Bristol, should have obtained permission not only from the shipowners, but also from the cargo-owners. No authority for this has been produced, and the practical impossibility of communicating with twenty different consignors, and the consideration that some or other might have indorsed their bills of lading and ceased to have any interest in the adventure, is a sufficient answer to this suggestion.

A more serious question is, whether the learned judge should have directed them that, upon the facts as proved, there was no evidence of necessity to return to Bristol, but that the utmost the captain should have done if he did not refit at Queenstown was to have gone to Swansea. But if upon the evidence there was any doubt as to this question, the case was clearly one to be decided by the jury. I cannot bring myself to the conclusion that there was no evidence to go to the jury which could raise such a doubt. But then, it was argued, even if there was some evidence, the verdict was so much against the weight of evidence that the court should direct a new trial. No doubt it is important on this question to observe that the summing-up of the learned judge was rather against the verdict. I think the question is between Swansea and Bristol, a distance of, say, sixty miles—that is, three or four hours' steaming. Expedition in refitting the ship is a most important consideration for the cargo-owners as well as the shipowners. It is reasonably argued that this would be more quickly done at the shipowners' yards than elsewhere, besides the saving of expense which would certainly be effected. The matter is really reduced to the question whether what was done was the best thing, considering the interest of the cargo-owners as well as of the shipowners. Here the great difficulty is, that we have very little evidence as to the actual state of the cargo and the amount of injury it had sustained. I am unable to satisfy myself that, upon consideration of all the circumstances, the verdict was such as reasonable men could not fairly have come to. There is much doubt about what was the right course to take, but I think it may be said that if the jury had considered that the captain ought to have put into Swansea, or even ought to have stayed at Queenstown, although there were strong reasons against his doing that, it would be difficult for this court to have interfered with their verdict.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bill of lading—Exception of "thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, or by land or sea"—Theft by stevedore's men—Liability of shipowner.

Where by a bill of lading a shipowner was exempted from liability for any loss caused by "pirates, robbers, or thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, or by land or sea:"

Held, that he was liable for a theft of goods committed by the stevedore's men after shipment and during stowage.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Smith, J.

The action was brought against shipowners for the non-delivery of goods shipped on board the defendants' ship for carriage from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres. Smith, J. found as a fact that the goods were stolen by some of the stevedore's men after shipment and during stowage. The stevedore was paid by and was in the service of the ship. By the bill of lading the defendants were exempted from liability for losses caused by "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, or thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, or by land or sea, rain, spray, barratry of the master or mariners, adverse claims, restraint of princes, rulers, or people." There was also a clause by which it was "expressly agreed and declared that the shipowner shall not be liable for or in respect of any neglect or error in judgment on the part of the master, pilot, crew, or other persons whomsoever in his service or employment."

Smith, J. held that the shipowners were not protected by the exception clause in the bill of lading, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Gorell Barnes, Q.C. and Hurst for the defendants.—The words "of whatever kind" were introduced to cover every kind of theft. There is no ambiguity about the meaning of the words; they apply to every kind of theft by whatever person. They cited

Bigham, Q.C. and Carver for the plaintiffs.—The meaning of the words "of whatever kind" which is contended for on behalf of the defendants is too large; it would cover thefts by the shipowner himself. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—The policy of the law would not allow him to take such an advantage of a stipulation put in in his favour.] The words were probably introduced to meet doubts thrown out by Archibald, J. in Taylor v. The Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company (ubi sup.), where he said "theft" meant one committed with violence. The same meaning of the word is also given in 2 Arnould on Insurance, p. 704, fourth edition, which was cited in the argument in that case. These words may cover all descriptions of "thefts," but not all descriptions of "thieves." The question here really is, whether the shipowner has got rid of any ambiguity, the ordinary rule of construction being that an owner is not exempt from liability for his servant's acts unless his exemption be made clear and unambiguous:

Phillips v. Clark, 2 C. B. N. S. 156.

Barratry in the exception applies only to the crew; there is no special exception of servants of any other kind. They also referred to

Cur. adv. vult.

March 21.—BOWEN, L.J. delivered the following written judgment:—This is an action brought by the owner of goods against the shipowner in respect of the loss of cargo, found by Smith, J. to have been stolen by the stevedore's men during stowage. The bill of lading includes among the exceptions "thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, or by land or sea." The stevedore under the charter-party was appointed by the charterer, but paid by the ship and in the service of the ship. Is the shipowner liable to make good the loss? This depends upon the true construction of the exception and its effect on the primâ facie liability of the shipowner from which the exceptions are intended within defined limits to release him. The history of the introduction into English policies and English bills of lading of special provisions as to "thieves" requires to be borne in mind. The broad principle of commercial law always was and is that the ship, in the absence of express provision to the contrary, was liable to the cargo owner for losses occasioned by theft committed on board. This idea was of cardinal moment both in the law of insurance and in the law of carriers. In the earliest forms of insurance, before the middle of the seventeenth century, there were no express words which covered losses by theft, and theft on board a vessel, since it presumably proceeded from negligent custody, and not from accident, was not a peril of the sea: Furtum non est casus fortuitus. "Insurers," says Emerigon, c. 12, s. 29, "are not responsible for simple theft committed on board the vessel, because it is presumed with reason that the accident has happened through some default of the captain or crew." About the middle of the century in question the word "thieves" found its way into the list of the marine casualties against which insurances were effected, and from this time forth there has been a recurring discussion both in England and America as to the extent to which in policies of insurance effect ought to be given to this special stipulation. Robbery imports violence, but "theft," which properly speaking does not, may be of several kinds. There may be the assailing thief from outside—the thief who "breaks through and steals;" there may be a thief on board among those who are lawfully on board; there may, lastly, be a thief among the crew. The controversy has principally turned upon the question whether the term "thieves" ought not to be confined to the first of these categories, viz., depredators outside the ship. That the expression was wide enough to cover, not merely thefts on board by passengers, but also thieves among the crew or servants of the shipowner, has scarcely been suggested, except in an American authority which will hereafter be mentioned. At first it appears to be uncertain to what extent the introduction into English policies of the word "thieves" really affected the insurer. In Malyne's Lex Mercatoria (c. 25, p. 109) the term is interpreted to mean "assailing thieves," "for otherwise," says Malyne, "if there be thieves on shipboard . . . the master of the ship is to answer for that and make it good, so that the assurers are not to be charged with any such loss," which, Malyne adds, "sometimes is not observed." (See also Roccus de Navibus, c. 42 and c. 43; Beawes, 6th edit. pp. 190, 196; Weskett on Insurance, edition of 1781, p. 543; 1 Marshall's Insurance, 187.) The language of Malyne has not been, however, universally accepted as applicable to those policies where express mention is made of thieves: (see Park, Insurance, edition of 1809, p. 30.) And in the case of The Atlantic Insurance Company v. Storrow, in 1835 (5 Paige, Chan. (New York) 293), Chancellor Walworth distinguishes the expressions used in Malyne, Weskett, Roccus, and Emerigon, on the ground that they are speaking only of the general contract against loss by sea risks, and without reference to the express clause in modern policies against loss by thieves. The Chancellor accordingly held the insurer liable for a loss occasioned by the act of thieves who had no connection with the ship, although the master and ship might also be liable as carriers on their bills of lading. In The American Insurance Company of New York v. Bryan, in 1841 (1 Hill, 25), a similar question arose before the Supreme Court of New York in an action upon a policy which contained the word "thieves." The Chief Justice at the trial had directed the jury that a loss by theft, whether by assailing thieves or by embezzlement of the crew, or by whatever person, was within the policy, and this direction was upheld by the court. No English case, however, has gone to this extent; and the law so laid down has been doubted by writers of authority: (see 3 Kent's Commentaries, 11th edit. p. 397; 1 Phillips on Insurance, 2nd edit. p. 649.)

The introduction of the term "thieves" into the exceptions in English bills of lading is of a later date, in older bills of lading dangers of the sea being the only accidents excepted: (Beawes, p. 196; Abbott, 5th edit. p. 214.) For goods stolen or embezzled, the master was liable unless there was vis major: (1 Moloy, p. 329.) By degrees the list of exceptions was expanded, and the word "thieves" in a bill of lading has received a judicial interpretation in the case of Taylor v. The Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company (ubi sup.). It was there held in effect that the term was only intended to deal with thefts by persons "not belonging" to the ship—an expression which, however, is ambiguous, but which in Taylor's case seems to be used as equivalent to persons outside the ship. The present form of bill of lading is subsequent in date to the decision in Taylor's case, and is designed apparently to widen still further the meaning there attributed to the word "thieves." But thieves may "belong" to a ship in two ways. They may be persons who, though they are lawfully on board, have nothing to do with the service of the ship; or they may be the master and crew or persons in the service of the ship. Is the language "thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, or by land or sea," intended in this bill of lading to add both of these classes of depredators, or only the former class, to the "outside thieves" who were previously covered by the word in ordinary bills of lading? This question of construction must be decided on the broad principle which has been so long and so constantly invoked in the interpretation of contracts with carriers by sea as well as by land, viz., that words of general exemption from liability are only intended (unless the words are clear) to relieve the carrier from liability where there has been no misconduct or default on his part or that of his servants. The exceptions in a bill of lading are not intended to excuse the carrier from the obligation of bringing due skill and care on the part of himself and his servants to bear both upon the stowing and upon the carrying of the cargo. Even in cases within the exceptions the shipowner is not protected if default or negligence on his part or that of his servants has contributed to the loss. Accordingly in Grill v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company Limited (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 77; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 476) an exception in a bill of lading of "accidents of whatever nature or kind soever" was held not to cover a collision caused by the negligence of master and crew: (see also Phillips v. Clark, ubi sup., and Czech v. The General Steam Navigation Company, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 14.) It is the duty of the shipowner by himself and his servants to do all he can to avoid the excepted perils; the exception, in other words, limits the liability, not the duty. Upon this ground I am of opinion on this bill of lading that the mere introduction into the list of exceptions of the words "thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, or by land or sea," does not relieve the shipowner from liability for the thefts committed by those in the service of the ship. A subsequent clause in the bill of lading exempts the shipowner from liability for neglect or error in judgment, but leaves wilful misconduct of those in the ship's service still untouched. If it was intended to relieve the shipowner from liability for thefts committed by persons in the ship's service, clear and explicit language to that effect should have been used. I agree, accordingly, with Smith, J., and think that this appeal must be dismissed with costs. The Master of the Rolls concurs in the result at which I have arrived.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A long series of authorities has determined that a shipowner cannot relieve himself from liability except by express words, and in the present case the words of exception are general, not express, and are in marked contrast with the words which expressly exempt the shipowner from liability for the negligence or error of judgment of the master, mariners, or others of the crew, or other persons whomsoever in the owner's employment. The judgment of Smith, J. was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

SERRAINO AND SONS v. CAMPBELL AND OTHERS. (a)

Bill of lading — Excepted perils — Incorporation from charter-party—"All other conditions as per charter."

By a bill of lading a cargo of coals was to be delivered at the port of discharge, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, excepted, unto order or assigns, they paying freight for the said coals and all other conditions as per charter, with average accustomed." The charter-party contained the same exceptions, together with the following clause, "Negligence clause as per Baltic Bill of Lading 1885." This negligence clause excepted "strandings and collisions, and all losses and damages caused thereby, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners." The cargo was lost, owing to the stranding of the vessel through the negligence of the master. The indorsees of the bill of lading having sued the shipowners for the loss of the cargo:

Held (affirming the judgment of Huddleston, B., 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 526; 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 107), that the words in the bill of lading, "all other conditions as per charter," incorporated only those conditions of the charter-party which were to be performed by the consignee of the goods; that therefore the negligence clause was not incorporated; and that the defendants were liable for the loss.

Russell v. Niemann (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 72; 17 C. B. N. S. 163) approved.

APPEAL from the judgment of Huddleston, B., at the trial of the action, reported 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 107; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 526; 25 Q. B. Div. 501.

The plaintiffs were the indorsees of a bill of lading for a cargo of coals shipped on board the defendants' vessel John Banfield, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, for delivery at Trapani, in Sicily. The action was brought to recover damages for the loss of the coal by reason of the stranding of the vessel near Mazzara, on the coast of Sicily. At the trial the jury found that the loss was due to the negligence of the master of the vessel. The coal was shipped by Fisher, Renwick, and Co., under a charter-party, in which Fisher, Renwick, and Co. were described as "agents for charterers," and which contained the usual exceptions of "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, during the said voyage;" and, in writing at the end, "Negligence clause, as per Baltic Bill of Lading 1885." The negligence clause in the Baltic Bill of Lading 1885 was as follows:

Strandings and collisions, and all losses and damages caused thereby, are also excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners.

The bill of lading stated that the coals were Shipped by Fisher, Redwick, and Co., and were to be delivered at Trapani, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of what nature and kind soever excepted, unto order or to assigns, they paying freight for the said coals and all other conditions as per charter, with average accustomed.

The defendants contended that the effect of the words in the bill of lading, "all other conditions as per charter-party," was to incorporate into the bill of lading the negligence clause in the Baltic Bill of Lading 1885, and that consequently they were not liable. The jury having found that the loss was caused by the negligence of the master, they were discharged by consent, and the rest of the case was left to be decided by the learned judge. The learned judge found upon the evidence that Fisher, Renwick, and Co. were principals in the charter-party, and not agents for the plaintiffs, and that therefore the plaintiffs were not parties directly bound by the charter-party. He held that the negligence clause in the Baltic Bill of Lading 1885 was not incorporated in the bill of lading, and therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment.

The defendants appealed.

French, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the defendants.—The words "all other conditions as per charter" incorporate all the conditions of the charter-party that are not inconsistent with the provisions of the bill of lading:

Gray v. Carr, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522; Porteus v. Watney, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195; 3 Q. B. Div. 534.

The case of Russell v. Niemann (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 72; 17 C. B. N. S. 163) is not consistent with those two cases, and must be considered as overruled. There is nothing in the present bill of lading which is inconsistent with the importation of the Baltic clause from the charter-party. It only adds another exception to those already contained in the bill of lading. Taylor v. Perrin (not reported), in the House of Lords, is not a decision against the defendants; the remarks of the Lords are only dicta, which were not necessary for the decision, and which cannot be taken as overruling the judgments of this court in the previous cases. They also referred to Hamilton v. Mackie, 5 Times L. Rep. 677;

Delaurier v. Wyllie, 17 Court of Sess. Cas. 4th series. 167.

Barnes, Q.C. and J. L. Walton, Q.C. for the plaintiffs.—The words "all other conditions as per charter" import into the bill of lading those conditions of the charter-party that are to be performed by the consignee upon delivery of the goods. The incorporation of the Baltic clause in this bill of lading would be inconsistent with the provisions of the bill of lading. The effect would be to add another exception which the parties have not contracted for. Russell v. Niemann (ubi sup.) is in point, and is not touched by the decision in Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.). Moreover, in Taylor v. Perrin (not reported), Lord Blackburn expressly refers to Russell v. Niemann as being correctly decided. They also referred to

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—Lord Esher, M.R.—The plaintiffs, who are consignees of a cargo by indorsement of a bill of lading, sued the defendants, who are the shipowners, for non-delivery of the cargo. The defence set up by the defendants is, that they are not liable for the loss of the goods, inasmuch as the cause of the loss is covered by one of the exceptions which is introduced into the bill of lading by reference from the charter-party. Now the goods were lost owing to the stranding of the vessel, and the jury have found that the loss was due to the negligence of the master. The bill of lading, upon its face, exempts the shipowners from liability for the "act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever." If those were the only exceptions appearing in the bill of lading, it is clear that a stranding of the vessel through the negligence of the master would not come within any of those exceptions, and unless there is something which adds to those exceptions the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed. The defendants, however, rely upon the words immediately following the above, "unto order or assigns, they paying freight for the said coals, and all other conditions as per charter." The defendants contend that the words "all other conditions as per charter" incorporate in the bill of lading an exception which is contained in the charter-party, and which, if incorporated, will relieve them from liability. The charter-party, which is somewhat peculiar, contains the same exceptions as the bill of lading, but at the end of the exceptions this clause is added, "Negligence clause as per Baltic Bill of Lading 1885." The negligence clause in the Baltic Bill of Lading is as follows: "Strandings and collisions, and all losses and damages caused thereby, are also excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner." The question accordingly which presents itself is, whether this exception is introduced into the bill of lading by the words "all other conditions as per charter." Now, these words have given rise to much litigation. In Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.), which was a decision of the Exchequer Chamber, a meaning was placed upon them. It was there contended that the construction to be placed upon the words ought to be limited by reason of the preceding words, "he or they paying freight," and that they were only applicable to matters ejusdem generis with payment of freight. The court, however, refused to limit the words thus, and, in my opinion, the decision came to this, that the effect of those words was to incorporate in the bill of lading all those conditions in the charter-party which were to be performed by the receiver of the goods, i.e., all the conditions which would operate as against the consignee. That was an action by shipowner against consignee. The cases which came after Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.) are only illustrations of the mode of carrying out the principle involved in the decision in that case. The principle seems to me to be this:-first, all the conditions of the charter-party are to be read into the bill of lading; having done that, if it then appears that some of them are too large to be applicable to a bill of lading, they must be struck out as inconsistent. The subsequent cases have not in any way enlarged the principle laid down in Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.), and in some respects have rather limited it. The decision in Gray v. Carr seems to me to have merely followed the construction placed upon the same words by Willes, J. in delivering the judgment of the court in Russell v. Niemann (17 C. B. N. S., at p. 177). That learned judge said that the question was, "whether the exception contained in the bill of lading is expanded by the exception in the charter-party. That depends upon whether the words 'and other conditions as per charter-party' include all the stipulations and conditions contained in that instrument, or whether they are not limited to conditions ejusdem generis with that previously mentioned, viz., payment of freight, conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods. It is a mere question of language and construction, and we think it is enough to say that the latter is the construction which we put upon these words." I do not think that the court there meant to limit the words to such matters as the payment of freight, but that the court meant to apply the words to all those conditions in the charter-party which were to be performed by the consignee—a construction which was afterwards adopted by the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.). I have come to the conclusion, after careful consideration of the matter, that this is the right construction to place upon the words. That being the true construction of the words, it is clear that an exception of perils of the sea is not a "condition" to be performed by the consignee, or indeed by anybody. The negligence clause as to strandings and collisions, which is an excepted peril in the charter-party, is not therefore incorporated in the bill of lading. The excepted perils are only those that are mentioned in the bill of lading. The exception contained in the charter-party becomes useless, inasmuch as the cargo is carried under the terms of the bill of lading. The parties seem to have made some blunder, and the shipowners, in granting bills of lading in this form, did not understand the effect of inserting the words "all other conditions as per charter." The excepted perils not being introduced into the bill of lading by the words of reference, only those excepted perils that are specified in the bill of lading are applicable, and the defendants are liable for the loss of the cargo. Our decision seems to me to be in accordance with Russell v. Niemann (ubi sup.), and that case is not in any way inconsistent with Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.).

Lopes, L.J. read the following judgment, after stating the facts:—As a general principle, it may be laid down that, when bills of lading are in the hands of strangers to the charter-party, either as original shippers or as indorsees to whom the property has passed, they show the contract under which the goods are being carried; and the shipowners' claims, exemptions, and lien on the cargo given by the charter-party are not preserved as against such shippers or indorsees, except so far as those terms of the charter-party are expressly incorporated into the bill of lading. In Russell v. Niemann (ubi sup.) one of the questions was whether the exception contained in the bill of lading was expanded by the exception in the charter-party. The exception in the bill of lading was "the act of God, the King's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, excepted." The exception in the charter-party was, "the act of God, enemies, fire, restraint of princes, and all and every dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever during the said voyage, excepted." After the exception in the bill of lading were the words "paying freight for the said goods, and all other conditions as per charter-party." Willes J., in giving judgment, said: "We now proceed to give judgment on the second point, which is whether the exception contained in the bill of lading is expanded by the exception in the charter-party. That depends upon whether the words 'and other conditions as per charter-party' include all the stipulations and conditions contained in that instrument, or whether they are not limited to conditions ejusdem generis with that previously mentioned, viz., payment of freight, conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods. It is a mere question of language and construction, and we think it enough to say that the latter is the construction which we put upon these words." Here is a distinct decision of Willes, Byles, and Keating, JJ. If this case has not been overruled, and there is no other case inconsistent with it, it remains law, and governs the present case. It was suggested that Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.) is inconsistent with it. It is not in any way inconsistent. Russell v. Niemann was cited in argument, but was not referred to in any of the judgments. Gray v. Carr was in the Exchequer Chamber, and was decided in 1871; Russell v. Niemann in 1864. It is scarcely conceivable that Willes, J., who concurred in the judgment given by Brett, J., describing it as a judgment written with such fresh and accurate acquaintance with the mercantile and maritime law applicable to the subject that he would not attempt to add anything to it, should have forgotten his previous decision which had been cited before him, or meant to overrule it, or thought the case he was then deciding inconsistent with it. Russell v. Niemann is entirely in accordance with Gray v. Carr. The question in Gray v. Carr was whether the shipowner's lien was preserved as against the holder of the bill of lading; whether the contract in the bill of lading, which the holder is presumably bound to perform, incorporated the terms of the charter-party as to the loading, as well as those which related to matters subsequent to the shipment. Great differences of opinion were expressed as to the effect of a bill of lading which made the goods deliverable "unto order, or to his or their assigns, he or they paying freight and all other conditions or demurrage (if any should be incurred), for the said goods as per the aforesaid charterparty." The question was whether this entitled the shipowner, as against the holders of the bill of lading, to the benefit of a clause in the charter-party, by which the owners were to have "an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, tonnage, and average" in respect of certain demurrage which had been incurred at the port of loading before the bill of lading had been granted. The Court of Queen's Bench and a majority of the Exchequer Chamber held that the clause entitled the shipowner to a lien for the demurrage at the port of loading, and that by the terms of the bill of lading this right was preserved against the consignees. On the other hand, Willes and Brett, JJ. held that the words would be satisfied by making them apply to damages in the nature of the demurrage for delay at the port of discharge. It will be observed that this decision in no way touches that in Russell v. Niemann, where it was held that the words "other conditions as per charter-party" did not include all the stipulations contained in the charter-party, but were limited to conditions ejusdem generis with those previously mentioned, viz., conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods. It cannot be said that the Baltic clause is such a condition; it is not a condition to be performed by the consignees. The words "all other conditions" must be construed with reference to the preceding words, "paying freight for the coals," and include only such conditions as are ejusdem generis with the payment of freight, conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods. It seems to me unnecessary to refer to the other cases cited: suffice it to say that none of them are inconsistent with Russell v. Niemann. I will only add that Russell v. Niemann was recognised and approved of in Taylor v. Perrin, an unreported case in the House of Lords, the shorthand-writer's notes of which I have seen. Lord O'Hagan described Russell v. Niemann as a perfectly well-decided case. Lord Blackburn said: "The case which has been referred to—Russell v. Niemann—in which Willes, J. gave judgment, as it appears to me perfectly correctly, decided that the reference to the charter-party is meant to bring in those conditions which would apply to the person who has taken the bill of lading, and is taking delivery of the cargo, such as payment of demurrage, the payment of freight, the manner of paying, and so on, but is by no mean to be taken to incorporate all the conditions of the charter-party." I am of opinion that the present case is governed by Russell v. Niemann, and that the judgment of the learned judge was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

KAY, L.J. read the following judgment:—We have to construe a bill of lading, dated Dec. 20, 1887, which expresses that certain steam coals have been shipped on the John Banfield, then in the river Tyne, and bound for Trapani, which were to be delivered there in good order, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, excepted, unto order or assigns, they paying freight for the said coals, and all other conditions as per charter-party." The question is, what is the effect of these last words? "They paying freight and all other conditions," primâ facie signifies, they paying freight and performing or observing all other conditions. "They" are the consignees or their assigns to whom this bill of lading is given. It is a contract between the shipowners and the consignees. The actual difficulty arises thus: the charter-party (amongst other conditions) contains one as to excepted risks in much larger terms than the exception of risks in the bill of lading. It is a contract between the defendants and Fisher, Renwick, and Co., that the ship shall load coal in the Tyne and proceed to Trapani, and deliver the coal there to the order of Fisher and Co. or their assigns, for a freight at a specified rate per ton, "the freighter paying all customary dues and duties on the cargo and the ship, all other charges (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, always excepted.)" The charter-party (amongst other things) provided that the liability of Fisher and Co. as to all matters and things in every respect, as well before and after as during the shipment, is to cease as soon as the cargo is shipped, and then follow these words, which create the difficulty, "Negligence clause as per Baltic Bill of Lading 1885." The Baltic Bill of Lading contains this negligence clause: "Strandings and collisions, and all losses and damages caused thereby, are also excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners." But for this addition, the excepted risks in the charter-party and in the bill of lading, which has to be construed, would be in the same terms, save that the words, "during the voyage" are added in the charter-party. The additional exceptions of strandings and collisions occasioned by negligence are not among the risks expressly excepted in the bill of lading. Is this additional exception imported into the bill of lading by the words, "and all other conditions as per charter-party?" If the clauses as to excepted risks in the charter-party are to be written into the bill of lading, in addition to the clause on that subject already there, that would be to repeat the clause already in the bill of lading, and to add this further clause, "excepting certain risks occasioned by negligence." Can it by any fair mode of construction be said that the referential words, "all other conditions as per charter-party," oblige us to do this? Apart from authority, I should say that, as the bill of lading has expressed what risks are to be excepted, which means that the goods shall be delivered to the consignee unless prevented by some of these excepted risks, this express contract could not be altered by such general words of reference, which cannot fairly be construed to incorporate into the bill of lading conditions in the charter-party relating to matters already expressly provided for in the bill of lading. Even grammatically, this reading may be the only true one. It is "other conditions." Other than what? Other than freight certainly. But why not, also, other than the matters expressly provided for in the bill of lading? Suppose it had expressly provided for freight at a less amount than in the charter-party, would these words introduce the extra amount stipulated for in the charter-party? A contract must be read without bias in favour of either of the parties to it. But, where one of those parties has introduced a stipulation for his own benefit, it is an equally well-settled rule that, if the meaning be doubtful, the other party to the contract shall have the benefit of the doubt. The same rule is expressed in other words by saying that, if the shipowners meant to add to the risks specially enumerated in the bill of lading, he was bound to make this quite clear on the face of the contract: (see per James, L.J. in German v. Chapman, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 685, at p. 686; 7 Ch. Div. 271, at p. 276.) The plaintiffs are the owners of the cargo and the indorsees of the bill of lading. They sue the shipowners for damages because the cargo was lost by stranding of the ship owing to negligence of the officers and crew, the damages claimed being the value of the cargo, less freight. If the view I have indicated be the true construction of the bill of lading, they must recover, because the negligence clause, though in the charter-party, is not imported into the bill of lading.

It was suggested at the bar that the charterer and consignee were really the same person; but counsel did not insist upon this, and I do not think it could be maintained. But the argument has been, that the matter is settled against the consignee by authority which is binding upon us. The precise question arose in Russell v. Niemann (ubi sup.), where the bill of lading excepted certain specified risks, and then contained the words "paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." The charter-party excepted the same risks, and others, and the question was, whether the further exception of other risks was introduced in the bill of lading. The Court (consisting of Willes, Byles, and Keating, JJ.) held that it was not, the judgment of the court upon this point, delivered by Willes, J., being that the words "all other conditions as per charter-party" were "limited to conditions ejusdem generis with that previously mentioned, viz., payment of freight — conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods." It is urged that this decision has been overruled. No case expressly overruling or dissenting from it has been cited; and in 1883 Lord Blackburn, in his speech in the House of Lords in an appeal in Taylor v. Perrin (not reported), gave to it the sanction of his high authority. However, that was not one of the actual grounds on which the case in the House of Lords was decided, and therefore is not binding as a judgment of the House of Lords, and we have accordingly to consider the cases which, though they do not profess to overrule Russell v. Niemann, are said to be inconsistent with it. In all of them it is treated as a question of construction of the particular bill of lading. The contest in many of them was, whether the consignee was liable for demurrage, the general rule being that he is not liable, to quote the words of Lord Campbell, "unless the bill of lading makes the goods deliverable on payment of demurrage, or contains equivalent words." In Wegener v. Smith (15 C. B. 285) the words in the bill of lading were, that the goods were to be delivered "against payment of the agreed freight and other conditions as per charter-party." This was held to mean, some payment beyond freight stipulated for in the charter-party, which must be demurrage. In Smith v. Sieveking (ubi sup.) Lord Campbell, C.J. delivered the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, entirely approving the last case, and holding that demurrage at the port of loading was not payable by the consignee, where the words in the bill of lading were "paying for the goods as per charter-party," because by those words, "the reference to the charter-party must be considered merely to ascertain the rate of freight," and paying for the goods did not mean paying for the detention of the ship by the charterer.

These authorities, and all others that I have consulted, concur in showing that the immediate context of the words in the bill of lading to be construed is of great importance, and that, where the words are placed, as in this case, in a clause which begins, "the consignees paying freight and all other conditions," &c., the bill of lading must be read to refer to conditions to be observed by the consignee. Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.) was one of the cases most relied on by the appellants. There the words in the bill of lading were "he or they paying freight and all other conditions, or demurrage (if any should be incurred) for the said goods as per the aforesaid charter-party." The words "and all other conditions" were added in writing in a printed form. The shipowner claimed against the consignees named in the bill of lading a lien on the cargo (1) for demurrage at the port of loading; (2) for dead freight—i.e., freight for part of the ship which ought to have been filled with cargo, but was not; and (3) for damages for detention beyond the demurrage days. The majority of the judges in the Exchequer Chamber held that a lien was given by the charter-party for demurrage proper, but not for detention beyond the demurrage days, nor for dead freight, and that the right of lien for demurrage was imported by the bill of lading into the contract between the owner and consignee. The difficulty as to this was, that the charter-party did not provide for demurrage at the port of discharge, but only at the port of loading, and very weighty reasons were given by the present Master of the Rolls against construing the bill of lading so as to make the consignees liable for demurrage incurred before his goods were on board, and before the bill of lading was signed. It was pointed out that, in Wegener v. Smith (ubi sup.), the demurrage claimed had accrued in the port of delivery by default of the consignee. But in Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.) demurrage was actually mentioned in the bill of lading; the word is used, and the reference to the charter-party as to demurrage could not have any meaning except to secure to the owner as against the consignee the lien given by the charter-party for the only demurrage there contemplated, viz., demurrage at the port of loading. However, the principal matter which we have now to consider is, whether this case overruled or weakened the authority of Russell v. Niemann (ubi sup.). The decision is certainly not in the least inconsistent with it.

Russell v. Niemann was cited; but none of the judges intimated any disapproval of it, and it seems to me that the two cases may very well stand together. The next case relied on is Porteus v. Watney (ubi sup.), in the Court of Appeal. The words in the bill of lading were: "On paying freight for the said goods, and all other conditions as per charter-party." The charter-party provided for demurrage at the port of discharge. The ship seems to have been employed as a general ship, and the goods of the particular consignee were in the main hold, under the goods of other shippers, who failed to take away their goods in proper time; so that, without any fault of the defendants, three days' demurrage was incurred before they obtained delivery. They were held liable; that is to say, the condition as to demurrage at the port of delivery was imported into the bill of lading by the words "all other conditions." This decision, again, seems to me quite consistent with Russell v. Niemann. Demurrage at the port of delivery might reasonably, according to that case, be held to be one of the payments to be made by the consignee under the words "paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party;" and though it was a hard case on the particular consignee, that could not be a sufficient reason for saying that he had not so contracted. In Gullischen v. Stewart Brothers (ubi sup.), under like words, an attempt was made to import into the bill of lading a clause in the charter-party, making the responsibility of the charterers cease as soon as the cargo was on board, and thus leaving the shipowner no right of action against the consignee for demurrage at the port of discharge. This attempt was defeated by the judgments of Pollock, B. and Lopes, J., who both held that, in considering what clauses were to be imported into the bill of lading, the cesser clause must be rejected. Their decision was affirmed in the Court of Appeal, Lord Coleridge, C.J. saying, 13 Q. B. Div., at p. 318: "Those words are incorporated which are consistent with the liabilities arising upon the bill of lading, and not those which are inconsistent." Lord Esher, M.R. said, at p. 319: "The clause as to cesser of the charterer's liability is not incorporated." Bowen, L.J. said, at p. 319: "The bill of lading incorporates certain provisions of the charter-party, but not the clause as to cesser of liability." In Gardner v. Trechmann (ubi sup.) the words were "other conditions as per charter-party;" and it was argued that those words made the consignee liable for an amount of freight stipulated for in the charter-party which exceeded the amount specified in the bill of lading. This was rejected, Lord Esher, M.R. saying that the general reference to the charter-party only brought into the bill of lading "those clauses of the charter-party which are applicable to the contract in the bill of lading, and those clauses of the charter-party cannot be brought in which would alter the express stipulations in the bill of lading." Cotton and Lindley, L.JJ. agreed. The last words I have quoted appear to me to confirm the conclusion at which I have arrived in the present case. They are perfectly consistent with Russell v. Niemann, which is, as I think, supported by this decision of the Court of Appeal. Hamilton v. Mackie (ubi sup.) seems to have decided that these words of reference would not introduce into the bill of lading a clause for reference to arbitration of any dispute under the charter-party.

I must say that, in my opinion, it is inexpedient to lay down a rigid rule of construction such as that contended for by the appellants. We have been urged to hold that the authorities which I have examined have determined that all the clauses of the charter-party, or at least all those that can be made to relate to a contract between the shipowner and the consignees, are to be read into a bill of lading containing these usual words of reference, and then those clauses which are inconsistent, which it is argued means contradictory to something in the bill of lading, are to be disregarded. If for "disregarded" you say "rejected," that is equivalent to not reading them in at all. I do not agree that this is the true result of the authorities. I hold the true result to be, that in each case the court must decide from the context, and such surrounding circumstances as it is bound to regard, which clauses of the charter-party are to be incorporated into the bill of lading by such words as "all other conditions as per charter-party;" and that where, as in Russell v. Niemann (ubi sup.), and in the present case, certain risks are expressly excepted in the bill of lading, it is not a legitimate construction of the clause of reference to give it the effect of importing other and larger exceptions because they are contained in the charter-party. In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Solicitor—Lien—Charge by plaintiff to third person on money to be recovered in two actions—One action only successful—Lien of solicitor on money recovered for costs of both actions in priority to charge.

A difference exists between the lien of a solicitor on a fund recovered for his client in an action and on deeds coming into his possession, inasmuch as in the former case he has no lien for all costs due to him from his client, but only for the costs of recovering that particular fund; and even where the solicitor actually gets the fund into his possession he obtains no greater lien than if it had remained in court.

A. having threatened to sue B. on a dishonoured bill of exchange, B. agreed to give him a charge on certain money which B.'s solicitors were taking proceedings to recover from two insurance companies, on two separate policies of insurance on a ship. The charge was prepared by B.'s solicitors, after an interview at which A. and B. were also present, and the solicitors sent it to A. in a letter, in which, "in pursuance of the inclosed written charge," they undertook out of any moneys received by them from either the S. Association or the M. Association under the policies to hand over to A., "after payment of the legal charges," so much of the amount recovered from the said association (sic) as might be sufficient to repay him the amount secured by the charge.

The proceedings against the M. Association were compromised on the association agreeing to pay a certain sum. Some time afterwards the S. Association obtained judgment in their favour.

Held, that the undertaking given by B.'s solicitors could not be construed as entitling them to payment of their legal charges in respect of the proceedings relating to both policies; and that the undertaking was not inconsistent with the general principle as to a solicitor's right of lien.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 318; ante, p. 14) reversed.

In 1886 Robert Wade, who was the owner of a ship called the Vigilant, effected a policy of insurance with the Bristol Marine Insurance Association for the sum of 1250*l.* on the hull of that vessel, and also a similar policy with the South of England General Club for sailing ships for a like sum, and also a policy with the South of England Freight Club for the sum of 300*l.* on the freight of the vessel.

In Oct. 1886 the plaintiff was the holder of two acceptances given by Wade, one for 265*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, dated the 20th July 1886, and due on the 11th Nov. 1886; and another for 100*l.*, dated the 20th July 1886, and due on the 12th Oct. 1886.

The acceptances were drawn by the master of the Vigilant upon Wade in favour of Wade's agent at St. Thomas, in the West Indies, in respect of expenses there incurred by the agent. The latter acceptance having been dishonoured, the plaintiff was about to commence legal proceedings against Wade in order to recover the amount thereof; but it was afterwards agreed that the legal proceedings should not be commenced in consideration of Wade securing to the plaintiff the amount due to him by virtue of both acceptances, by giving him a charge on the policies above mentioned for the amount of both acceptances, together with interest thereon.

The Vigilant at this time had been lost, and the defendants Lowless and Co. had been retained by Wade to act for him as his solicitors to recover the sums due to him under the above-mentioned policies.

On the 21st Oct. 1886 the plaintiff's managing clerk, Wade, and Nelson, one of the firm of Lowless and Co., met at Lowless and Co.'s office, and the following charge was dictated by Nelson to a shorthand clerk, and was afterwards written out and signed by Wade:

I hereby charge all my interest in a certain policy of marine insurance, dated the 15th Feb. 1886, effected with the South of England General Club for Sailing Ships for the sum of 1250*l.* on the hull of the Vigilant, and also a certain policy dated the 15th Feb. 1886, effected with the South of England Freight Club for the sum of 300*l.* on the freight of the Vigilant, and also a certain policy of insurance current for the year 1886, effected with the Bristol Marine Insurance Association, for the sum of 1250*l.* on the hull of the Vigilant with the payment to you of the amount of two several acceptances of mine to the draft of John Sharpe, the master of the Vigilant, as follows:

1. For 265*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, dated the 20th July 1886, and due on the 11th Nov. 1886.

2. The 100*l.* dated the 20th July 1886 to the draft of John Sharpe due on the 12th Oct. 1886, making a total of 165*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* together with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the due date of the said bills, until payment and the notarial charges thereon; and I hereby agree and authorise my solicitors, Messrs. Lowless and Co., or the said South of England Insurance Company, to pay out of such sums as I may recover against them by action at law, or by arbitration, to you the said D. Forbes Mackenzie and Co. the said sums so secured as aforesaid.

The charge was sent to the plaintiff by the defendants Lowless and Co., together with the following letter of the same date and signed by them:

Dear Sir,—In pursuance of the inclosed written charge signed by Mr. Wade to-day, we undertake, out of any moneys received by us from either the South of England Insurance Association or the Bristol Marine Insurance Association under the policies on the Vigilant referred to in Mr. Wade's security, to hand over to you, after payment of the legal charges, so much of the amount recovered from the said association (sic) as may be sufficient to repay you the amount secured by Mr. Wade, or in the event of the same not amounting to the amount of the charge, the whole thereof.

The claims against the insurance companies were prosecuted by the defendants Lowless and Co. as solicitors for Wade, and that against the Bristol Marine Insurance Association was on the 10th Nov. 1887 eventually compromised by them. On the 21st March 1888 the sum of 410*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.* was paid to the defendants Lowless and Co. in respect of the policy in the Bristol Marine Insurance Association.

The plaintiff was not aware at that time that the money had been actually paid to the defendants Lowless and Co., and had not given any consent to such payment.

An action was brought against the South of England General Club for Sailing Ships to recover the amount of the policies, but after protracted litigation the action resulted in favour of the company.

A question then arose as to the rights of the plaintiff and the defendants Lowless and Co. with reference to the money recovered from the Bristol Marine Insurance Association.

The plaintiff contended that he was entitled to be paid the amount of his charge thereout, subject to the taxed costs of the defendants Lowless and Co. of recovering that sum, while the defendants Lowless and Co. contended that they were also entitled to be paid the amount of their costs of the action against the South of England General Club for Sailing Ships in priority to anything being paid to the plaintiff, the result of which would be that the plaintiff would get nothing.

The plaintiff then commenced this action to have the question decided.

On the 17th July 1889 a receiving order was made against Wade, but the defendant Mackintosh, his trustee in bankruptcy, disclaimed any interest in the money in dispute in this action.

The action came on for trial before Kekewich, J. on the 3rd and 4th March 1891, when his Lordship decided (64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 318; ante, p. 14) that, if the charge stood alone, the defendants Lowless and Co. had no retaining lien on the money recovered for all their costs, and were only entitled to be paid their costs of recovering the funds in priority to the plaintiff, but that, considering that the defendants Lowless and Co. were aware that the bill had been dishonoured, the undertaking and surrounding circumstances showed that there was a bargain between the parties that the two policies were grouped together, and the defendants Lowless and Co. were to receive all the money recovered from both or either association, and were to have their costs with reference to the proceedings on both policies out of any money so received in priority to any payment being made to the plaintiff on his charge.

From that decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Renshaw, Q.C. and Biss for the appellant.—The respondents Lowless and Co. have no general lien on the money in their hands, but only for their taxed costs of recovering it:

Bozon v. Bolland, 4 My. & Cr. 354, 357.

The charge given by Wade is clear. The letter with which it was sent creates the difficulty. But in it the two insurance companies are separated, and the respondents undertake to pay out of the money received from "either;" and later on, after referring to the payment of the legal charges, they speak of the "amount recovered from the said association" and not "associations." Therefore, after the respondents have been paid the sum due to them for their taxed costs of recovering the money received from the Bristol Marine Insurance Association, the appellant is entitled to the balance towards payment of the amount due to him on the charge. Apart from the undertaking it is clear that the appellant would be entitled to the fund subject to the payment to the respondents of their taxed costs of recovering the amount. There is a difference between the lien of a solicitor on documents in his possession and the fruits of a judgment. If the appellant had continued his proceedings, and recovered judgment on the bills, he could have garnished the amount received from the Bristol Marine Insurance Association. He agreed to take the charge instead, and ought to have had the policies handed over to him, but, as the respondents had begun the proceedings against the insurance companies, they were allowed to retain them. That is the reason that this undertaking was given by them. It was intended to meet the case of the respondents obtaining possession of the fund. It is an undertaking severally applicable to both associations, and the words after "legal charges" must be read distributively. The respondents obtained the money from the association behind the back of the appellant, and on giving an indemnity to the association, and can obtain no benefit from having it in their possession:

Wickens v. Townsend, 1 R. & My. 361.

Marten, Q.C. and Horace Nelson for the respondents Lowless and Co.—We submit that the respondents have a general lien on the money in their hands:

In the case of Re Clarke; Ex parte Newland (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 916; 4 Ch. Div. 515), the money had been provided by the surety for the purpose of paying the creditors, and it was the money of the surety, and the solicitor had sent a letter to the creditors saying he would pay. The words "legal charges" in the undertaking mean charges against Wade, and there is nothing in the letter to confine them to the particular association from which the money is received. The respondents were aware of Wade's pecuniary position, and it is not likely that the respondents would continue speculative actions in which the appellant would have the benefit and they the responsibility. A disjunctive construction of the letter results in the absurdity that the appellant was to be paid the amount recovered from one association, without reference to the fact that he might have been fully satisfied by the amount recovered from the other. They referred also to Bishop v. Huggins, Barnes, 38.

No reply was called for.

Lindley, L.J.—In order to understand the letter of the 21st Oct. 1886 it is necessary to understand the position of the persons by whom it was written, and to whom it was addressed. It is a letter written by Messrs. Lowless and Co., who were the solicitors of a person of the name of Wade. It was written to the plaintiff, who was a creditor of Wade, and who had obtained from Wade an order charging certain policies of marine insurance with payment of 365*l*. 16*s*. 8*d*. The charge given by Wade was dated the 21st Oct. 1886. At that date Wade had effected three policies of insurance, one on the ship Vigilant in the South of England General Club for Sailing Ships, for the sum of 1250*l*.; one in the South of England Freight Club, for the sum of 300*l*.; and another in the Bristol Marine Insurance Association, for the sum of 1250*l*. At the date of the charge he had made claims, as I understand, on all three of those clubs for payment of losses which he had sustained in respect of that ship and freight. The proceedings against the South of England General Club for Sailing Ships had proceeded further than any of the other claims. They actually, as I understand, had got so far as to begin proceedings by arbitration; but the claims had been made as against the others. The plaintiff was the holder of an overdue bill of exchange accepted by Wade, and he was the holder of another bill of exchange which was likely shortly to become due, the aggregate amount of the bills being 365*l*. 16*s*. 8*d*. Under these circumstances Wade gave the plaintiff this charge: [His Lordship read the charge and continued:] No mention is there made as to authorising the solicitors to pay out of the moneys which might be obtained against the Bristol Marine Insurance Association, because, I suppose, the proceedings against that association had not gone far, and the others were progressing. The charge was on all three policies. The authority to pay was confined to what might be recovered against the South of England Insurance Company. Now, on the same day, the solicitors wrote to the plaintiff this letter: [His Lordship read the letter and continued:] The present controversy arises upon the construction of that letter. The question is, What is meant by the expression "after payment of the legal charges"?

The solicitors contend that, upon the true construction of that letter, they are not bound to hand over any moneys received by them from either of those offices until they have deducted the whole of their charges in respect of all the policies. They contend that it is consistent with this letter that their lien should be upon all the moneys received from both offices for their charges in respect of the moneys or any of them. In other words, they claim to be entitled to lump the moneys together, and to deduct from those moneys what may be due to them in respect of their costs of obtaining them. Now, is that consistent with the letter? Is that consistent with the very first words of it, "In pursuance of the inclosed written charge signed by Mr. Wade to-day we undertake?" What were the plaintiff's rights under the charge apart from this letter? His rights, I apprehend, apart from this letter, would be to enforce his charge against each fund, subject only to the right of Wade's solicitors to be paid their charges in respect of that fund. I apprehend, notwithstanding the observations of Mr. Marten and Mr. Nelson, that the distinction between a solicitor's lien upon money recovered by him—whether it is in court or out of court—and upon deeds, is perfectly well settled. He has a general lien upon deeds and papers in his hands for all costs, however arising. But he has no such general right of lien against moneys which he recovers for his client. Whether he gets them or does not, his lien or right to be paid out of those funds is to be confined to the costs incurred in respect of those funds, subject, of course, only to this, that he has the ordinary rights of set-off which one creditor has as against another, and which I need not further refer to. That distinction is pointed out by Lord Cottenham in th case of Bozon v. Bolland (4 My. & Cr. 354), and must not be lost sight of.

The Bristol Marine Insurance Association case was settled first, and in March 1888 a sum of 478*l.* was received by the solicitors in respect of that particular policy. Under the charge given by Wade, the plaintiff might have said to Messrs. Lowless and Co., "Pay me over that money minus your charges in respect of getting it." That would be his clear right under the charge. Now, is it consistent with Messrs. Lowless and Co.'s letter that the right of the plaintiff should be altered and cut down to the extent that they say? The plaintiff is not, they contend, to have a shilling out of the Bristol Association money until they have ascertained the result of the litigation against the other offices, and until they have deducted out of what moneys they may receive all their costs which have been incurred. I do not think that that is the true construction of the letter, nor is it consistent with the language of the letter. It is inconsistent, to my mind, with the very first words to which I have called attention, which purport to be an undertaking pursuant to the charge —not cutting it down, but giving effect to it. The moment they receive money in respect of either of these policies, their duty is to hand it over to the plaintiff to satisfy his charge—subject, of course, to their right to deduct their costs in respect of it. It is said that that is not the true meaning. It is said that "after payment of the legal charges" does not admit of that construction. My answer to that is, that when you construe the letter closely, you see that payment of the legal charges means this: "We undertake to pay you the money, but, mind, we are not going to pay you in full. That is not what we undertake. We are going to deduct what we are entitled to deduct as against Wade in respect of the policy." It is necessary to say that. It is not surplusage to say it; because, if they wrote a letter to the third party saying that they would hand him over all the moneys they received, they would lose their right, as against him, to deduct their costs. It was necessary to put that in, to preserve that right. That was the object. That is consistent, and only consistent, I think, with the expression "after payment of the legal charges so much of the amount recovered from the said association;" language which, to my mind, shows that as each sum was recovered the plaintiff's right to have that, pro tanto or in full as the case might be, was to accrue to him. It was said by Mr. Nelson that that lands one in an absurdity. But I cannot see the absurdity, because, of course, you must construe this letter with reference to its object; which was, to secure to the plaintiff payment of his charge, and unless you find that on that construction you are paying him twenty shillings in the pound twice over, the absurdity which has been referred to does not arise. With deference to the learned judge in the court below, I think that the true construction of this letter is that which I have stated. It does appear to me that it would be contrary to the general principles to give to this ambiguous letter—for it is a little ambiguous—the extended construction contended for by the solicitors. If they had intended to stipulate for something more than they were entitled to, they should have taken care to stipulate for that in language which could not be misunderstood. In a case of ambiguity and doubt like this, I think it is right to construe the letter most strongly against the utterer—a rule which one never ought to have recourse to unless one is driven to it. If you can see the meaning, of course that rule does not arise. I think I can; but, even if I cannot, and even if the letter is more ambiguous than I think it is, it appears to me that we are right and justified in construing it most strongly against Messrs. Lowless and Co. The result is, that the appeal will be allowed, and the declaration must be varied. Instead of being that Messrs. Lowless and Co. are entitled to deduct, as against the plaintiff, their legal charges properly due to them in respect of the proceedings against the Bristol Marine Insurance Association as well as against the South of England Insurance Association, that must be struck out and the word "only" must be inserted. I understand that Kekewich, J. has directed certain accounts, and has reserved the costs of those accounts. But he has ordered the defendants to pay their costs up to the judgment. That will have to be altered, and, I apprehend, the costs will have to be paid by the defendants.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff had pecuniary claims against Wade which Wade was unable to meet. But Wade, although he had not got the ready money to meet the claims which were about to mature against him, had an interest in certain policies of marine insurance which he had effected on a ship with certain companies. He proposed to purchase the forbearance of the plaintiff by charging his interest in the sums which he was about to recover, or hoped to recover, under the policies against these companies. We have to decide what are the liabilities which have been incurred by Messrs. Lowless, who were Wade's solicitors, in respect of handing over the moneys to the plaintiff which are the subject-matter of the charge. In the first place, I will deal with the charge. The charge was executed by Wade, and was forwarded by his solicitors to the plaintiff, with an accompanying letter in which they add to the charge an undertaking of their own. In order to construe that undertaking it seems to me that we ought to have regard to the charge which was sent unaltered by the solicitors to the plaintiffs. I think that I may mention here that one may start with the supposition that Messrs. Lowless did not intend to alter substantially what was contained in the charge, except so far as was necessary to protect their own legal rights, because they were persons who had rights as against Wade as well as the plaintiff. I will take the charge first before considering what the true construction of the letter is. How is the charge to be construed? As regards that there is really very little possibility of difference. The charge is a charge on all the interest of Wade in certain policies of marine insurance. Now a policy of insurance is a contract. The contract, as soon as it is made, becomes evidence of the right of the person who under the contract is entitled to the money. When Wade charged his interest in the policies he meant to assign all the benefit of the contract to the person in whose favour he executed the charge. In order to see exactly what rights arise upon this charge besides the conveyance to the grantee of all of the contractual rights of Wade in his beneficial interest in the contract, we must observe that something at the same time is done between Wade and his solicitors as regards the policies which are the evidence of Wade's title to succeed against the companies. One of the policies is at this moment in the hands of the solicitors. The other is not as yet in their hands. Apart from all question of special contract, what would be the rights of the parties arising thereupon? The solicitors, as regards the policy which was already in their hands, could at most have only a lien upon that document for the costs which had been incurred up to that time. At that moment there would be no more. If Wade continued to employ these solicitors there might, as between himself and them, arise—in fact would arise—a continuing lien (subject to any rights that Wade had by this charge) for costs which he incurred as against the solicitors afterwards. But we must look at the exact moment at which this charge is created. At that moment, as regards the policy in their hands, the outside they would have would be a lien upon the policy for the general costs which Wade then owed them. However, that lien upon the policy gives them no right to the fund recovered under the policy. It is only a lien upon the document. As regards a lien upon the fund which was afterwards to be recovered, that they could only acquire by the effect of the continuing relationship between a solicitor and client, which continued after the date of the charge and while the litigation was proceeding. Assuming that even under the conveyance of his interest in this policy Wade conveyed only to the plaintiff a right to so much of the moneys that had been recovered as would remain after deducting the ordinary lien as between the solicitors and himself which would result in the course of the litigation—taking the construction which is the most favourable to the solicitors—still, it would give the solicitors no more right to deduct, and would impose upon the plaintiff no more liability to acquiesce in the deduction, than so far as the ordinary legal lien would obtain between solicitor and client as regards the fund recovered in the action. The charges being distinctive, the plaintiff would have a right at the end of the litigation in regard to each policy to have paid over to him all the money recovered in the action, deducting only the legal charges to which the solicitors were entitled in respect of that money. I think that is the true view as regards the position of the parties which had been created by the charge.

Now let us see whether the letter which accompanied the charge really alters the undertaking of the solicitors. It may be said, perhaps, that if it does alter the undertaking of the solicitors it gives a greater right to the solicitors to retain than would appear upon the mere charge itself, coupled with the fact that they had a right to retain one of the policies against their client. If it does more than that it may be said that by accepting the letter the plaintiff put himself in the position of acquiescing in the increased onus or burden which is imposed in relation to the terms of the letter. We have to see whether by the letter the solicitors meant more than to insist upon their natural and calculable rights, assuming that they did not intend to abandon their rights. The first question which we have to ask ourselves is, When does the right to have the money paid over to the plaintiff accrue? To put it in other words, and perhaps a little more accurately, when does the right to have the money paid over in discharge pro tanto of the security first accrue? That is the first question to be considered and dealt with. Now, there are two possible views that may be taken of that. I think that they are the only two possible views that would occur to business men. The first is, that the right to have the money paid over in discharge pro tanto of the security first accrues at the date of the first recovery of money upon any of the policies mentioned in the letter. That is strictly consistent with the disjunctive language of the letter itself. According to the other view which is contended for, there would be no right to have the money paid over in discharge pro tanto of the security until the end of all the litigation relating to all the policies. That would keep open the settlement until the end of all the litigation. That really is a view not consistent with the disjunctive terms of the letter. If there is one thing in the case that I think clear, it is that the right to have money paid over in discharge of the security pro tanto accrued as soon as any money was recovered as against the company. Having made that step in the logic of the case, I think it necessarily leads to the further inference that something was to be deducted. The legal charges were to be deducted. What does the term "legal charges" mean? You may take three alternative views as regards that. You may say that "legal charges" means merely the legal charges which the solicitors would have a right, in the absence of express bargain with their own client, to deduct against their own client, from the several funds as they were recovered. I entertain no doubt, if that is the true view, that the legal charges in each case which could have been recovered by the solicitors against their own client out of the fund which was recovered do not extend to legal charges generally with regard to other litigations, but only with regard to the legal charges incurred in respect of the fund in question in the particular litigation. That that is the law I think is clear. If authority were wanted, I think the language used by the learned judges in the case of Bozon v. Bolland (4 My. & Cr. 354) is conclusive upon the matter. And that is the view which is presented here by the appellant. It has this in its favour, that it alters the language of the charge, or adds to it no further than is exactly necessary to protect the interests of the solicitors and the rights of the solicitors so far as they would have taken effect against their own client if there had been no charging order at all, and if there had been no further express contract. But there are two other views which have been presented to us on behalf of the respondents. The first is, that "legal charges" means such legal charges as may be incurred during the whole of all these litigations—in respect of all of them. That adds materially to the common law rights of the solicitors against their client, rights which it would require some evidence and special terms to enlarge. But the objection to that argument is, that it keeps open the settlement of the accounts during the whole of the litigation. That is inconsistent with the view at which I have arrived of the meaning of the letter, and as to the date at which the first money is to be paid over in discharge pro tanto of the security. If the payment is to be made as soon as the first sum recoverable is recovered, surely the legal charges to be deducted cannot be legal charges which come into existence afterwards. I dismiss therefore that view. It is inconsistent with the construction of the letter which seems to me to be forced upon us by the disjunctive language of it. But then there is a third and intermediate view to which Mr. Marten has ingeniously directed our attention and argued is the true view. He says, assuming against himself that the money is to be paid over as soon as the first sum is recovered, you may deduct legal charges which had been incurred up to that date in respect of all the litigation, not merely that particular litigation, but in respect of all the litigation up to the date of payment. One of the objections which I have mentioned already as weighing with me against the larger construction which Mr. Marten has been addressing to us and been arguing for applies also to this—that it is an enlargement of the rights of the solicitors which the common law would have given them as against their own client apart from the special contract. But, further, I think that there is a business view about it which is not to be overlooked. It makes unintelligible and accidental the value of the charge to the plaintiff, because it makes the amount which he would be entitled to recover from the first payment by the first company depend, not upon the legal costs incurred in that litigation, but the costs which might happen to be incurred up to that date in the other litigations. It would not be commensurate with anything that the solicitors had done in that action, but commensurate with what they might happen to have done in other actions. That would be a matter of pure accident and speculation, depending not upon anything rational or reasonable which could be considered by the plaintiff as regards that particular suit, but upon the delays, interruptions, and expenses which might occur in the other suits. But again it would be impracticable to measure, because you could not get the costs taxed unless the solicitors were to break off their connection with their own client as soon as the first sum was recovered; which would be an absurd hypothesis. No one would suppose that that would be the date which Wade would choose for breaking off with his solicitors if they had been successful in the first action. Unless there was to be an interruption and discontinuance of the connection of solicitor and client, they could not get taxed or ascertained finally the legal charges which they had a right to make against their client as regards litigation which as yet was not closed. I think, therefore, that it would be an unbusiness-like view to suppose that, although the money was to be paid over at the end of the first litigation, the legal charges which were to be deducted were to be so much of the current expenses of another litigation which had taken place up to that date. Therefore, to fall back on the first of the three alternatives, I think that the legal charges which were to be deducted were the legal charges which had been incurred in that particular litigation which has been finally concluded by the success of the plaintiff, and by the recovery at law of the sum due to him in respect of the particular suit—a view which is consistent with the charge as originally given. I do not suppose that anybody really meant that Wade was not to continue to recover the funds on the usual terms between solicitor and client, there being the usual liability to pay the costs which might be properly incurred. I think for these reasons that Kekewich, J. was wrong. I am not quite certain as to the exact way in which he would have met all the arguments which have crossed my mind as favourable to the appellant; and therefore I do not deal with his language more specifically than I have done. I think this appeal ought to succeed.

Fry, L.J.—The meaning of the document in question has been so fully discussed by my learned brethren, and in a sense which is in so exact accordance with my own view, that I should say nothing were it not that I am differing from the decision of the learned judge of the court below. We think it respectful to the learned judge from whom we differ to give our individual reasons for so doing. I will therefore endeavour briefly to give my reasons. Now, in the first place, reading the document which is in controversy, it appears to me to be plain that its language is disjunctive, and that its meaning is disjunctive. By that I mean that it was intended to create a separate charge upon the claim which Wade had against the South of England Insurance Association and the Bristol Marine Insurance Association. I think it was a very natural and a very reasonable intention that the two securities should be separate the one from the other. That is, in my judgment, plainly expressed by the language used. It is an undertaking out of the moneys received from either of those associations to hand over to the plaintiff, after payment of the legal charges, as much of the amount —not of the "amounts" in the plural, but of the "amount" in the singular—recovered from the said association (again using the singular and not the plural), and which would be sufficient to repay him. Therefore the language does not seem to be ambiguous. It seems to me to be just the same —as Mr. Nelson put it—as if two letters had been written, one dealing with one association and the other with the other; as if, therefore, there had been two collateral securities. Then it is said that this absurdity results—that, as each provides for the payment of the amount due, the plaintiff would be paid twice over. Well, that is an observation which always will occur where there are collateral securities, if it were not for the law of the court which prevents a person who has more than one security availing himself of his collateral securities for anything more than the amount due upon them. Although there may be several securities, there is but one amount; and the duplication of language of two securities does not duplicate the rights of the plaintiff. Now, that conclusion is consistent, as it seems to me, with many things to which I am bound to make reference. In the first place, I find that the intention of this document was, to carry into effect the previous written charge given by Wade. The written charge given by Wade had, in my judgment, created a distinct right in the plaintiff upon the balance of each of the sums coming from the policies separately. Therefore, the way in which I read the document exactly accords with the declaration at the commencement of the document—that it is made in pursuance of the charge. Again, it appears to me that the way in which I read the document makes it consistent with the rights of Messrs. Lowless and Co. Their rights were, to deduct, from the sums received from each of the policies, the charges incurred in the action in which they were so recovered, and nothing more; and this document exactly maintains that right.

Now, it is obvious, to my mind, that the intention was not to enlarge the rights of the solicitors, but to give an undertaking by them consonant with their rights, preserving their rights, but not enlarging them. It is obvious, therefore, that my construction is consistent with what appears to me to be the natural intention—the maintenance of the existing rights of the solicitors. But it has been said by Mr. Marten that the construction which I have put upon this document does violence to the general words "legal charges," and that legal charges must mean all charges which at the time of the receipt of the money were recoverable by the solicitors against the client. I think it does no such violence. In the first place, it is obvious that, if you are dealing separately with separate rights of action and separate claims, the probability is that the charges on those claims will be dealt with separately. But further than that—as has been already exhaustively shown by Bowen, L.J.—if you read "legal charges" to be anything more than the charges on the particular fund—whether you mean all future charges or all charges then accrued—it is impossible to deal with the two securities separately, and you defeat that intention of treating them separately which the letter expresses. On the contrary, you tie together the two securities which it was the intention of the letter to separate. The effect of the argument would be that you would have to consolidate and lump together the legal charges, and you would have to consolidate and lump together the amounts received on the policies, and deduct one of those total sums from the other total sum. The letter shows a distinct intention not to do that. I think, therefore, that the true construction of the letter is, that the rights of the solicitors are to deduct from each sum received from each association the costs incurred in the litigation with that association, and nothing more. Therefore I think that we must make a declaration in the terms which have been adverted to by Lindley, L.J.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

April 15, 16, and May 15, 1891.

(Before Charles, J.)

Baumvoll Manufactur von C. Scheibler v. Gilchrest and Co. and Furness; The Sultan. (a)

Charter-party—Bill of lading—Goods shipped on board chartered ship—No notice of charter-party to shipper—Bills of lading signed by master of ship and agents of charterers—Loss of goods—Liability of owner of ship—Principal and agent.

By a charter-party the defendant F. (described as the owner of the ship) agreed to let a ship to the defendants Gilchrest and Co. (G. and Co.), as charterers for four months, and at the end of that time the charterers were to purchase the ship upon terms agreed upon. G. and Co., the charterers, at once took possession of the ship, and appointed the captain and crew. F. was afterwards registered as owner of the ship, and also as managing owner under the 36th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, and he also insured the ship. Subsequently the plaintiff shipped a cargo of cotton on board the ship under bills of lading not referring to any charter-party, some of which were signed by the master, and some by K. and Co., the charterers' agents for shipment. The owner F. knew nothing of the circumstances under which the goods had been shipped, or the bills of lading signed, and the plaintiff, the shipper of the goods, had no knowledge or notice of the charter-party, or of the relations which existed between G. and Co. and F. There had been no actual demise of the ship, and no notice to the shipper that the master's ordinary authority had been put an end to. A loss having occurred during the existence of the charter-party, an action was brought by the plaintiff, the shipper, against the defendants G. and Co., as charterers, and against the defendant F. as owner of the ship. Upon the trial of a preliminary question whether the charterers or the owner were liable for this loss:

Held (by Charles, J.), that the bills of lading were binding on the defendant F. as owner of the ship, as the plaintiff had shipped his goods on board in ignorance of the charter-party and without any notice of the same, and there had been no actual demise of the ship, and no notice to the shipper that the master's ordinary authority had been put an end to, and that whether the master were actually the servant of the charterers or not, he was held out to the shipper as the servant of the owner, and that the owner, therefore, was liable to the plaintiff for the breach of duty and contract (if any) committed.

Trial of a preliminary question in an action by Charles, J. without a jury.

The facts are fully set out in the written judgment of the learned judge, and they are sufficiently stated in the headnote for the purposes of this argument.

Sir Walter Phillimore, Q.C. and Dr. Stubbs for the plaintiff.—Furness as owner, is liable for the loss through the unseaworthiness of the ship, the bills of lading having been signed some by C. as master, and the remainder by K. and Co., as agents, the shipper not having had notice of the charter-party, and the charter-party in fact not passing the ownership temporarily to the charterers. The shipper is entitled to look to Furness, as the bills of lading were signed by the agents for the ship known to Furness, while the charterers were not known to the shipper. The registered owner, who in this case is Furness, is held out as the person liable to the public:

Steel v. Lester, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 642; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 537; 3 C. P. Div. 21;
Hayn v. Culliford, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 48, 128; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 288; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536; 3 C. P. Div. 410; 4 C. P. Div. 182;
Fenton v. The City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, 8 A. & E. 835;
Sandeman v. Scurr, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 446; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 608; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 86;
The St. Cloud, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 309; Br. & Lush. 4;
The Omoa Coal and Iron Company v. Huntley, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 184; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; 2 C. P. Div. 464.

These cases all show that the liability is inherent to the ownership, as the public are entitled to look to the owner. The fact that Furness insured in the Indemnity Association shows that he knew that he was liable.

Barnes, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the defendant Furness.—There is no authority that the owner is liable except when the bills of lading are signed by the master. [Sir W. Phillimore. Yes; Hayn v. Culliford (ubi sup.) is an authority for that.] It is not proved here that K. and Co. had the authority of Furness to sign for him. As to the cargo represented by the bills of lading signed by the master, Furness is not liable unless it is proved that the relationship of master and servant existed between him (Furness) and the master:

James v. Jones, 3 Esp. 27.

Furness never intended to become owner of the ship, but acted as intermediary for the purchase of the ship, as Gilchrest was not in a position to pay the money, and Furness was never in possession of the ship, and did not appoint the crew. Mere ownership does not entail liability:

Mackenzie v. Rowe, 2 Camp. 482;
Newberry v. Colvin, 7 Bing. 190;
Reeve v. Davis, 1 A. & E. 312,

where an action for repairs against registered owners failed, as it was held they were not the real contracting parties. In Maclachlan's Merchant Shipping, 3rd edit., pp. 342-350, all the cases are given, and they are reviewed in Sandeman v. Scurr (ubi sup.). Furness was not held out as owner, as in fact the vendor's name only appears in Lloyd's register. Even if he were, it is not conclusive of liability, as was pointed out in Steel v. Lester (3 C. P. Div. 128). In the series of cases from Newberry v. Colvin (ubi sup.) to Sandeman v. Scurr (ubi sup.), the question was whether the owner was liable, the master having admittedly been his servant. The terms of the charter-party and notice to shippers of the charter-party are important if the relationship of master and servant be admitted or proved, otherwise not. Where the person signing bills of lading is not the owner's servant or agent, the owner is not liable, and that is the case here. The insurance of the ship by Furness in the Indemnity Association was to protect himself from such claims as claims by cargo owners of another ship injured in collision, claims which would be enforced against the ship in rem, and such insurance does not point to any personal liability at all.

Stubbs in reply.—As to the last point, such claims give no maritime lien:

The Admiralty Court Act 1861, 24 Vict. c. 10;
The Henrich Björn, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 11 App. Cas. 270;
The Sara, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 26; 14 App. Cas. 209.

The owner's responsibility to shippers is based on the ground that the shippers are entitled to have a person to look to sufficiently solvent to own ships, and not a mere man of straw as a speculative charterer may be.

The defendants Gilchrest and Co. did not appear.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 15.—Charles, J. delivered a written judgment as follows:—In this action the plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants for the loss of 1200 bales of cotton shipped by him on board the steamship Sultan, in Dec. 1889, at New Orleans, to be carried to Bremen, and there delivered to him. The ship was in the course of the voyage abandoned at sea, and the cargo lost. It was alleged by the plaintiff that the loss was attributable to the unseaworthiness of the ship, but a preliminary question was raised on the pleadings whether, assuming that the goods mentioned in the statement of claim were lost as therein alleged, the defendant Christopher Furness, and the defendants, Messrs. Gilchrest and Co., or either, and which of them, were liable for the alleged breach of duty and contract in respect of such loss. This question was in June 26, 1890, ordered to be tried before any other question in the cause, and it was accordingly heard before me on the 15th April. Messrs. Gilchrest and Co. were not represented on that occasion. The facts were as follows: Prior to Oct. 1888, the ship Sultan was a foreign ship called the Asia. On the 13th Oct. Mr. Furness bought her, and renamed her the Sultan; and on the same day agreed to re-sell her to Gilchrest and Co. for a company to be called the Mexican Gulf Steamship Company, for 13,500*l.*, 500*l.* in cash, and the balance on transfer of the steamer after the expiration of a charter-party, also dated the 13th Oct. The parties to it were the defendant Furness, described as "owner of the good screw steamship Asia," and the defendants Gilchrest and Co. for a proposed new company, to be called the Mexican Gulf Steamship Company, who were described as "merchants and charterers." The following are the material provisions: "C. Furness agrees to let, and the Mexican Gulf Steamship Company agree to hire, the said steamship for four calendar months from the — day of October, she being then placed at the disposal of the charterers under English flag in London in such dock or at such wharf or place where she may safely be afloat as charterers may direct, she being then light, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the service and with full complement of officers, seamen, engineers, and fireman for a vessel of her tonnage, to be employed in such lawful trade between ports in the United Kingdom or on the Continent, and in the United States, West Indies, and Gulf of Mexico, and within the limits of ordinary Lloyd's warranties, but not Suez Canal, as charterers or their agents shall direct on the following conditions: That the charterers shall provide and pay for all the provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew; owner shall pay for the insurance of the vessel, also maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for the service; that the charterers shall provide and pay for all the coals, fuel, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, and all other charges whatsoever except those before stated; and the charterers shall pay for the use and hire of the said vessel at the rate of 750*l.* per calendar month, commencing on the 19th day of — or so soon after as steamer is transfered to Mr. Furness and delivered to charterers, but not later than the 23rd Oct. 1888, at and after the same rates for any part of a month, hire to continue from the time specified for terminating the charter until her delivery to owners (unless lost) at a port in the United Kingdom, payment to be made in cash in advance monthly, and in default of such payments as herein specified the owners shall have the faculty of withdrawing the said steamer from the service of the charterers without prejudice to any claim they, the owners, may have on the charterers in pursuance of this charter; that the cargo or cargoes shall be laden or discharged in any dock or at any wharf or place that the charterers may direct, where she can always safely be afloat; that the whole reach, burden, and passage accommodation of the ship (not being more than she can reasonably stow and carry) shall be at charterers' disposal, reserving only proper and sufficient space for ship's officers, crew, tackle, apparel, furniture, provisions, and stores; that the captain shall prosecute his voyage with the utmost despatch, and shall render all customary assistance with ship's crew and boats; that the captain shall be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other arrangements, and the charterers hereby agree to indemnify the owner from all consequences or liabilities that may arise from the captain's signing bills of lading, or in otherwise complying with the same. Owner has the option of appointing chief engineer, to be paid by the charterers. That if the charterers shall have reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the engineer, the owner shall, on receiving particulars of the complaint, investigate the same, and, if necessary, make a change in the appointment when steamer in England; that the master shall be furnished from time to time with all requisite instructions and sailing directions, and shall keep a full and complete log of the voyage or voyages, which are to be taken to the charterers or their agents; that the charterers shall have the option of continuing the charter for a further period of —— on giving notice thereof to owners —— previous to the expiration of the first-named; that in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four working hours, the payment of hire shall cease till she may be again in an efficient state to resume her service, but should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to cargo, such detention or loss of time shall be at the charterers' risk and expense; that should the vessel be loss, any freight paid in advance and not earned (reckoning from date of her loss) shall be returned to the charterers, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, restraint of Princes, rulers, and people, and all other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation throughout this charter-party always excepted; that the charterers undertake at the expiration of this charter to purchase the said vessel for the sum of 13,500*l.*, per contract dated the 13th Oct. 1888; that the owners shall have a lien upon all cargoes and all sub-freights for freight or charter money due under this charter, and charterers to have a lien on the ship for all moneys paid in advance and not earned. All derelicts for the benefit of charterers and owners mutually; penalty for non-performance of this charter 2000*l.* as liquidated damages." This charter-party was partly in print and partly in writing, and in its printed shape provided for the appointment and payment of the captain by the owner, and not by the charterers. This circumstance was relied on as showing what the intention of the parties was, and it was further suggested that the indemnity clause 5, which was in print, had been allowed to remain in the altered document by mistake, and had ceased to have any significance when considered with the rest of the instrument. I do not think, however, that I am at liberty so to regard the clause. It is not inconsistent with the altered form, and must, in my opinion, have its due weight. In construing a charter-party no greater effect can be given to writing than to print, although a different rule may prevail with reference to policies of insurance: (Alsager v. St. Katharine Docks Company, 14 M. & W. 799.) Gilchrest and Co. at once took possession of the ship, which had previously belonged to Spanish owners, and appointed the captain and crew, the owner, however, exercising his option of nominating the chief engineer under the terms of the agreement for sale. Furness received 500*l.* in cash, and the balance was, as hereby arranged, secured by a mortgage to him of the ship. Some repairs were done to her by Gilchrest and Co., and early in November she sailed for New Orleans. In the meantime, on the 30th Oct., Mr. Furness was registered as owner, and his name and address as managing owner were registered under the provisions of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, s. 36 (1876), and the register-certificate had been handed to Gilchrest and Co., by the brokers. On the 2nd Nov.

Furness wrote inquiring for the captain's name, which was given, and on the 30th Nov. he wrote thus to the captain, care of Messrs. Keen and Co., shipbrokers, New Orleans: "You are doubtless aware that I am the registered owner of the steamship Sultan, but according to contract entered into with Messrs. Gilchrest and Co., the vessel will be sold to that firm at an early date. The object of the present letter, however, is to ask you to see that during the time the vessel is my property my interests are protected in every way to the best of your ability, and I shall be glad to hear from you periodically as to your movements, and any further matters which you may think of interest to me. I rely on you, prior to leaving the States with your vessel, that all accounts for disbursements for stores, coals, &c., prior to your leaving port are settled and paid. This action will no doubt avoid any unnecessary correspondence after the vessel changes owners. If you will kindly advise me at your convenience quantity of cargo carried in each hold, quantity of bunkers on board, and draught of water on leaving this side, I shall esteem it a favour. The information is required for statistical purposes. Trusting that under your command this vessel will be in every way successful, and awaiting your reply in due course, I am, &c."

It is also to be observed that on the 14th Nov. 1888, Mr. Furness insured the ship in the United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association. In Dec. 1888 the plaintiff shipped the cotton on board the Sultan under bills of lading not referring to any charter-party, some of which were signed by the master and others by Messrs. Keen and Co., for carriage to Bremen. Mr. Furness, however, knew nothing of the circumstances under which the goods had been shipped, or the bills of lading signed by the master, and so far as actual authority went, Keen and Co. acted as Gilchrest and Co.'s agents for shipment. All the bills of lading, as well those signed by the master as those signed in their own name, stated them to be "agents." The plaintiff had no knowledge or notice of the charter-party, or of the relations which existed between Gilchrest and Co. and Furness. At the time of the loss it was agreed that the charter-party was still in force. Now it could not be successfully contended that in this case there was an actual demise of the ship, but it was said that the terms of the charter-party and the facts proved indicated that the defendant Furness was not responsible. He was, however, the "registered owner" and the designated "managing owner," under 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, and at the time the bills of lading were signed knew who the captain was, and who the agents at New Orleans were. Primâ facie, therefore, he was bound by the signature of the master, and, indeed, also, under the circumstances, by the signature of the agents. The plaintiff, as I have stated, had no notice that any charter-party existed, nothing to warn him in any way that the captain had ceased to occupy his normal position, and had no authority to sign bills of lading for owners. It was pointed out that he and the rest of the crew were the charterers' servants; and so they were in one sense, for the charterers appointed and paid them all. But I have here to deal with a case where there had been no demise of the ship, and no notice to the shipper that the master's ordinary authority had been put an end to, and it seems to me that the cases of The St. Cloud (ubi sup.) and Sandeman v. Scurr (ubi sup.), The Patria (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 849; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 436), apply. The St. Cloud was a case of damage to cargo, the defendant pleaded that the vessel was under charter, and the plaintiffs replied that they had no notice of such charter. In dealing with this defence Dr. Lushington says at p. 15, "When goods have been shipped in good condition on board a vessel, and by the misconduct or neglect of those in charge of her loss occurs, some one must be responsible. I apprehend that, primâ facie, the owner of the vessel is the person responsible, but the cases decided at common law show that there are circumstances under which the owner will be divested of such responsibility, and that responsibility will be cast upon another. Such is the case of a vessel demised by charter to another so as to divest the owner altogether of possession, when the charterer is pro hac vice the owner: (Colvin v. Newberry, 1 Cl. & F. 283.) The present charter-party I apprehend to be clearly not one of this description. There is no demise of the vessel. The owner through his master retains possession. There is a covenant to consign the vessel as the charterer may designate. There is a reservation of the cabin and deck; and for the goods shipped the charterer is to pay the owner certain rates of freight mentioned in the charter-party. This appears to me to be clearly distinguished from a charter-party demising and giving up possession of the vessel. It is contended, however, that the contract contained in the bill of lading was made by the master as agent of the charterer, and not as agent of the owner; and in support of this position is cited the case of Schuster v. McKellar (7 E. & B. 704). But there is an important distinction in this case. The shipper is not proved to have had notice of the charter-party. Until he had such notice he would be justified in supposing that in dealing with the master for the carriage of his goods he was dealing with the owner's agent. For, primâ facie, the master is the agent of the owner of the ship. I cannot think that it is consistent with justice or according to mercantile practice that a shipper of goods on board a ship put up in the usual way should lose his right to sue the owner for damage on account of a charter of this description of which he has no notice. I think the burden of proof must fall on the shipowner claiming exemption from liability; he must show that the shipper had notice of the charter, and was aware that in making the contract the master was agent for the charterer."

It is urged in the present case that the owner through his master did not retain possession. But in the sense in which Dr. Lushington used the words, I think he did. Here, as there, there is a reservation of space for ships' officers, freight is to be paid at a certain rate, and the owner takes an indemnity against the master's acts for which he may be responsible. Sandeman v. Scurr (ubi sup.) is to the same effect. Indeed, when the judgment is carefully examined, it appears exactly to cover the case before me. There the defendants were owners of the Village Belle. She proceeded under charter-party to Oporto consigned to charterers' agent. They put her up there as a general ship, and the plaintiffs delivered their goods on board, receiving bills of lading signed by the master in the usual form. They had no notice or knowledge of any charter-party, or that the ship was not entirely at the owners' disposition. The goods were damaged by improper stowage, and the owners were held responsible. "It is unnecessary to decide," says Cockburn, C.J., at p. 95 (L. Rep. 2 Q. B.), "whether the charterers would or would not have been liable if an action had under the circumstances been brought against them. Our judgment proceeds on a ground wholly irrespective of the question of the charterers' liability, and not inconsistent with it—viz., that the plaintiffs, having delivered their goods to be carried in ignorance of the vessel being chartered, and having dealt with the master as clothed with the ordinary authority of a master to receive goods and give bills of lading on behalf of his owners, are entitled to look to the owners as responsible for the safe carriage of the goods. The result of the authorities from Parish v. Crawford (2 Str. 1251; Abbott on Shipping, 10th edit. 31; 12th edit. 25) downwards, and more especially the case of Newberry v. Colvin, in which the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber (7 Bing. 190; 1 C. & J. 192), reversing the judgment of Court of Queen's Bench (8 B. & C. 166), was affirmed on appeal by the House of Lords (1 Cl. & F. 283), is to establish the position that in construing a charter-party with reference to the liability of the owners of the chartered ship, it is necessary to look to the charter-party to see whether it operates as a demise of the ship itself, to which the services of the master and crew may or may not be superadded, or whether all that the charterer acquires by the term of the instrument is the right to have his goods conveyed by the particular vessel, and, as subsidiary thereto, to have the use of the vessel and the services of the master and crew. In the first case the charterer becomes for the time the owner of the vessel, the master and crew become to all intents and purposes his servants, and through them the possession of the ship is in him. In the second, notwithstanding the temporary right of the charterer to have his goods loaded and conveyed in the vessel, the ownership remains in the original owners; and through the master and crew, who continue to be their servants, the possession of the ship also. If the master, by the agreement of his owners and the charterer, acquires authority to sign bills of lading on behalf of the latter, he nevertheless remains in all other respects the servant of the owners—in other words, he retains that relation to his owners out of which by the law merchant arises the authority to sign bills of lading by which the owner will be bound. It appears to us clear that the charter-party in the present instance falls under the second of the two classes referred to. There is here no demise of the ship itself, either expressed or implied. It amounts to no more than a grant to the charterer of a right to have his cargo brought home in the ship while the ship itself continues, through the master and crew, in possession of the owners, the master and crew remaining their servants. It is on this ground that our judgment is founded. We think that, so long as the relation of the owner and master continues, the latter, as regards parties who ship goods in ignorance of any arrangement whereby the authority ordinarily incidental to that relation is affected, must be taken to have authority to bind his owners by giving bills of lading. We proceed on the well-known principle that, where a party allows another to appear before the world as his agent in any given capacity, he must be liable to any party who contracts with such apparent agent in a matter within the scope of such agency. The master of the vessel has by law authority to sign bills of lading on behalf of his owners. A person shipping goods on board a vessel unaware that the vessel has been chartered to another is warranted in assuming that the master is acting by virture of his ordinary authority, and, therefore, acting for his owner in signing bills of lading. It may be that as between the owner, the master, and the charterer, the authority of the master is to sign bills of lading on behalf of the charterer only, and not of the owner. But in our judgment this altered state of the master's authority will not affect the liability of the owner, whose servant the master still remains, clothed with a character to which the authority to bind his owner by signing bills of lading attaches by virtue of his office. We think that, until the fact that the master's authority has been put an end to is brought to the knowledge of a shipper of goods, the latter has a right to look to the owner as the principal with whom his contract has been made." The learned Lord Chief Justice then proceeds to distinguish Newberry v. Colvin (7 Bing. 209; 1 Cl. & F. 283) on the ground that in that case, where, moreover, there had been an absolute demise of the ship, the charter-party was known to the shippers, and thus the inference which would otherwise have arisen was negatived, that the master was held out by the owners as their agent. The cases relied on for the defendant Furness, which will be found collected in Maclachlan on Shipping, third edition, 342-350, undoubtedly show that a charter-party, though not in form an absolute demise, may still be in such terms as to constitute the charterer the owner pro tempore of the ship, and to make the captain his servant and agent, and his only, and this charter, it was contended, had this effect. But even assuming this contention to be correct, and, as I have remarked, the captain being appointed and paid by the charterer was in one sense his servant, no authority was cited for the proposition that the rights of the third person who ships goods on board in ignorance of the charter-party can be affected. On the contrary, it seems to me to be established by the cases I have referred to that the test of liability in such a case does not depend on the question whether the master actually was the charterer's servant, but on the question whether he has been held out to be the owners' servant. Here he certainly was so held out, and "the well-known principle" mentioned in Sandeman v. Scurr (ubi sup.) therefore, in my opinion, applies. Mr. Furness, though he did not actually authorise the captain or agent, "allowed them to appear before the world" in a given capacity, and is liable to any one who contracts with such apparent agent "in a matter within the scope of such agency." I must in these circumstances decide the preliminary question raised against the defendant, Mr. Furness, and find that he is liable to the plaintiff for the breach of duty and contract which it is alleged has been committed. The costs of the argument of this preliminary question are to be costs in the cause.

Order that the bills of lading are binding on the defendant Furness as owner of the ship, and that he is liable to the plaintiff for the breach of duty and contract (if any) which may have been committed. Costs in the cause.

TURNER v. MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD; THE ZETA. (a)

Damage — Costs — County Court — Action in personam—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 4.

Where shipowners brought an action in personam against a dock company to recover 221*l.* 4*s.* 6*d. for damage occasioned to their ship by the alleged negligence of the dock company's servants in bringing her into collision with a pierhead while she was being moved from one dock to another, the court held that such damage was damage to a ship "by collision or otherwise" within the meaning of sect.* 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, and that in the circumstances it was a fit case to be tried in the County Court, and therefor refused to give the plaintiffs, although successful, their costs.

THIS was an action in personam by the owners of the steamship Zeta against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board to recover compensation for damage occasioned to the Zeta by the alleged negligence of the defendants' servants.

The Zeta, at the time that she sustained the damage complained of, was being moved under her own steam from the Stanley Dock, Liverpool, into the Sandon Graving Dock. The Zeta had her own master and crew on board, but was under the orders of the dock officials, and during the operation her propeller struck the wall of the pierhead, which broke two of her propeller blades.

The President gave judgment for the plaintiffs, on the ground that the damage was occasioned by the negligence of the defendants' servants.

According to the plaintiffs' particulars their damages amounted to 221*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*

In these circumstances the defendants applied that the plaintiffs should be disallowed their costs.

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71):

Sect. 3. Any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes): (3.) As to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision—any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51):

Sect. 4. The third section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 shall extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

Carver and A. H. Maxwell for the defendants.—This action might have been instituted in the County Court. It is a claim for damage to a ship, and therefore within the meaning of sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, which gives County Courts Admiralty jurisdiction over "claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise." Had the action been tried in the Liverpool County Court, a great deal of expense would have been saved. The plaintiffs ought, therefore, not to get their costs:

The Asia, (1891) 1 P. 121; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 25; 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 327.

Barnes, Q.C. and Joseph Walton, for the plaintiffs, contra.—The County Court had no jurisdiction in this case. Damage to a ship by contact with a pier is not within the Admiralty County Court Acts of 1868 and 1869. The words "or otherwise" in sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 refer to damage by wash and such class of sea damage:

The Alexandria, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 574; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 565; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 464; Everard v. Kendall, L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think that the cases cited by Mr. Barnes on behalf of the plaintiffs are applicable to this case. I think the combined effect of the County Courts Acts of 1868 and 1869 is to give the County Court jurisdiction. If so, this claim might perfectly well have been brought in the County Court exercising Admiralty jurisdiction in Liverpool, where the cause of action arose. Most, if not all of the defendants' witnesses reside in Liverpool. Expense would therefore have been avoided if the action had been tried there. No difficult questions of law or fact were involved. The simple question was, which party was telling the truth. I therefore refuse the plaintiffs the costs of the action. The damages will be referred to the registrar in the usual way, unless the parties can come to terms as to the amount of the damages.

THE KONG MAGNUS. (a)

Collision—Delay in instituting suit—Interest—Statute of Limitations.

In a collision action in rem, not instituted till twelve years after the collision occurred, the Court, having held that the circumstances of the delay were not such as to preclude the plaintiffs from recovering, although they might have proceeded earlier, gave the plaintiffs interest for the twelve years on the damages awarded.

THIS was an objection to the registrar's report by the defendants in a collision action in rem.

The collision occurred on the 19th April 1878 between the plaintiffs' British brigantine the Mizpah and the defendants' Norwegian steamship the Kong Magnus.

The action was instituted on the 8th Jan. 1889.

The defendants by their defence, in addition to denying that the collision was caused by their negligence, also pleaded that the court ought not to entertain the suit, on the ground of laches and delay in its institution.

By order of court this latter question was ordered to be tried before the merits of the collision were investigated.

At the trial of this issue the President (the Right Hon. Sir Jas. Hannen) held that, although the Kong Magnus had been on many occasions within the jurisdiction between the collision and the institution of the suit, and the plaintiffs had had several opportunities of arresting her, the circumstances of the case were not such as to make it inequitable for the action to proceed, but that in trying the case the court would make every reasonable presumption in favour of the defendants: (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 583; 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715; (1891) 1 P. 223.)

Subsequently to this decision the action was stayed by consent upon the terms that the defendants should pay the plaintiffs one-half of the damages proceeded for, and that the amount of such damages should be referred to the registrar for assessment.

The reference having been held, the assistant registrar held that the plaintiffs' damages amounted to 2609*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*, and, in addition thereto, he allowed interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the 1st May 1878 (the day when the Mizpah would have probably reached her destination) until the damages should be paid. His report as to this matter was as follows:

> In regard to the question of interest, I was referred to a passage in the judgment of the late President. It appeared to me that this left the question entirely to the discretion of the registrar. I came to the conclusion that I ought to give interest since the late President had decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover damages against the defendants, and I could see no reason why, if they were entitled to any damages at all, they should not be entitled to interest as part of those damages. As I understand the subject, interest has always been given by the registrar and merchants, not as interest on a judgment debt, but as part of the damages, to represent the amount of profit arising from the use of the capital sum. The plaintiffs had for a number of years been deprived of the capital sum, and equally also of the profit derivable from it. I therefore saw no reason to depart from the constant and long practice of the court in this case. The merchants agreed in my view of the matter.

The defendants now objected to the allowance of any interest.

Cohen, Q.C. and F. Laing for the defendants.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to any interest. The defendants' liability was not ascertained until the registrar had assessed the plaintiffs' damages, and therefore the defendants could not have paid interest. If so, the defendants were not in default, and according to common-law principles they are not liable for interest. Assuming it to be the practice to give interest in this division, it is within the discretion of the court to withhold it if it sees fit. Having regard to the peculiar circumstances of this case, the plaintiffs are not entitled to interest:

The Amalia, 5 N. Rep. 164.

In any event, the court should in equity apply the principle of the Statute of Limitations and not give more than six years' interest:

Thomson v. Eastwood, 2 App. Cas. 215.

Sir Walter Phillimore and F. W. Raikes for the plaintiffs, contrd.—It is the long-established practice of this court to give interest in these cases. This practice has been approved of in the Court of Appeal:

The Gertrude; The Baron Aberdare, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 315; 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 251; 13 P. Div. 105.

The defendants have in fact had the use of the plaintiffs' money for twelve years, and therefore, in order to give the plaintiffs' a restitutio in integrum, they ought to have interest for that period:

The Dundee, 2 Hagg. 137;
The Canada, Lush. 586;
Straker v. Hartland, 5 N. Rep. 163.

The Statute of Limitations is not applicable to a collision action in rem; moreover, in the Chancery case of Edgar v. Reynolds (4 Drew. 269) the court gave interest for thirty years.

F. Laing in reply.

THE PRESIDENT.—It seems quite clear that a different rule as to including interest in the damages exists in collision actions in this division to that which prevails in the common law courts. A court of common law does not include interest in the damages assessed, because, as I understand it, until a man knows the amount of the principal liability which he ought to discharge he could not—not knowing its amount—pay the interest into court, and therefore he was not in default. On the other hand, the view of the Admiralty Court was, I presume, this: that the person liable in damages, having kept in his pocket the sum of money which ought to have been paid to the claimant, and having therefore been in a position to receive interest on it, ought to be held to be keeping it for the person to whom the court has found it was payable. These are the two views taken of the matter, and I am not quite sure that, if it were res integra, I should not be disposed to say that the more logical and better rule was that of the common law courts. But I am not entitled to take that course, because a clear and uniform rule has long existed in this court which has been approved of in the Court of Appeal, and therefore I cannot depart from it. I am bound to hold, though somewhat against my inclination, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover this interest.

But then it is said that, even if that be so, there are authorities to the effect that, though there is no Statute of Limitations barring the plaintiffs' right to recover more than six years' interest, still, acting equitably, I ought to refuse to allow interest for more than six years. In support of that contention the case of Thomson v. Eastwood (ubi sup.) was cited. I, however, do not think that that case supports the contention. That was a case in which, by the will there in question, a trust had been expressly constituted, and it was in consequence of that trust that the operation of the Statute of Limitations was prevented. The property, between the time when the claim might have been asserted and the time when it was asserted, had passed into other hands. In those circumstances the House of Lords, as a court of equity, decided to apply the principle of the Statute of Limitations, though the statute itself did not touch the case. I do not think that that case is analogous to the present one, nor do I think that there is any case which will support the contention that interest ought to be restricted to six years. Being constrained to hold that interest is due, I must hold that that interest runs from the time of the collision. That is the view that the registrar seems to have taken. I observe that he says in his report: "The plaintiffs had for a number of years been deprived of the capital sum, and equally also of the profit derivable from it. I therefore saw no reason to depart from the constant and long practice of the court in this case." I decline to interfere with the report, and disallow the objection with costs.

THE ELTON. (a)

Salvage—Practice—Action in personam—"Proper party"—R. S. C., Order XI., r. 1 (g).

Where salvage services have been rendered to ship and cargo, and an action is commenced in personam to recover for such services against the shipowners resident within the jurisdiction, the Court may join the cargo owners resident out of the jurisdiction, and give leave, under Order XI., r. 1 (g), to serve notice of the writ upon them.

THIS was a motion by certain defendants, in a salvage action in personam, to set aside an order for service of notice of the writ on them.

The plaintiffs were the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Cervin, and in Sept. 1890 rendered salvage services in the Black Sea to the steamship Elton, her cargo and freight. The Elton had stranded, and, after some of her cargo had been jettisoned, she was towed off by the Cervin. The Elton at the time in question was on a voyage from Nicolaieff to Bergen laden with a cargo of grain, and, after the performance of the salvage services, she proceeded on her voyage, and delivered her cargo to the consignees at Bergen, upon their signing an average agreement whereby they undertook to pay their proportion in general average of the losses consequent on the stranding.

In these circumstances the plaintiffs commenced an action in personam against the shipowners, and on the 9th Dec. 1890 Sir Jas. Hannen, on an ex parte application, gave the plaintiffs leave to serve notice of the writ on the cargo owners at Bergen, and to join the latter as defendants.

The defendant cargo owners now moved to set aside the service of the notice of the writ.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Rules of the Supreme Court:

Order XI., r. 1. Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the court or a judge whenever (g) any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Dr. Stubbs) on behalf of the cargo owners.—The cargo owners are neither "necessary" nor "proper" parties to this action. There is no reason why the plaintiffs should not pursue their remedy abroad. The case of The Steamship Thanemore Limited v. Thompson (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 378) is not an authority against our contention. It was a decision on Order XI., r. 1 (e), and Order XI., r. 2. Moreover, in that case, the underwriter in Scotland had subscribed the same policy as the defendant underwriters in England. By the old practice of the Admiralty Court cargo owners could not have been made parties in a case like the present.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, contrà.—The cargo owners are "proper parties" within the meaning of Order XI., r. 1 (g). It is very desirable that the total amount of salvage payable to the plaintiffs should be determined by the same tribunal; otherwise, there will be two decisions in two countries tried under different principles of law and procedure:

The Peace, Swa. 115.

Had these cargo owners been resident in England they might have been properly joined under the rule; the fact of their being foreigners resident out of the jurisdiction is immaterial:

Massey v. Heynes, 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 470; 21 Q. B. Div. 330;
Washburn Company v. Cunard Steamship Company, 5 Times Rep. 592.

By the practice of the Admiralty Court, prior to the Judicature Acts, these cargo owners could have been made defendants:

The Hope, 3 Ch. Rob. 215;
The Meg Merrilies, 3 Hagg. 346;
The Rapid, 3 Hagg. 410.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

April 14.—JEUNE, J.—In this case an action in personam has been brought for salvage against the owners of the steamship Elton and her freight, who are within the jurisdiction and who have been served with the writ, and against the owners of her cargo; but the latter being out of the jurisdiction, an order was in Dec. 1890 obtained for service of notice of the writ on them, and the matter now comes before me on motion to set that order aside. The only question is, whether the owners of cargo are proper parties to the action within the meaning of Order XI., r. 1 (g). The case of Massey v. Heynes (ubi sup.) has placed a clear interpretation on the meaning of this sub-section, and supplies a test for determining to what persons notice of a writ may be given. Wills, J. says: "I think that if, according to the regular practice of the courts of this country—supposing all parties subject to the jurisdiction—the person to be served is one who as a matter of course would be joined on the same writ and be treated as one of the defendants in the action, he is a proper, if not a necessary, party to the action;" and this view was confirmed by the unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal. It may be remarked that the case of Massey v. Heynes (ubi sup.) was one in which the defendants were alternatively liable, and in which, therefore, before Order XVI. they could not have been made parties. The case therefore shows that all persons who could at the option of the plaintiffs be made parties under Order XVI. are proper parties within Order XI., r. 1 (g). Before the case of Massey v. Heynes (ubi sup.) the Queen's Bench Division, in The Steamship Thanemore Limited v. Thompson and others (ubi sup.), held that in an action against underwriters severally liable those in Scotland might be served with the writ; and shortly after that, in The Washburn Company v. The Cunard Steamship Company and Parkes and Son (ubi sup.), where the action was brought by the owners of a patent for making barbed wire to restrain the steamship company, who were carrying a consignment of such wire to Parkes and Son in Ireland, from parting with it, Stirling, J. held that Parkes and Son might be served with the writ. It was suggested by Sir Walter Phillimore that these last two cases referred to defendants in Scotland and Ireland, and that therefore Order XI., r. 2, applied. This is so; and, as Stirling, J. points out, it gives rise to considerations of convenience different to those if the parties to be served be resident in other countries. But this only, I think, shows that there are cases where the court will not give leave in regard to Scotch or Irish defendants where it would if they were foreigners, not that the court can give a permission in respect of Scotch or Irish residents which it cannot in respect of persons out of the United Kingdom. Applying the test thus furnished, it seems to me impossible to doubt that notice of this writ should be permitted to be given to the owners of the cargo. If they were within the jurisdiction would they not be proper parties to the action? If they could be made so under Order XVI., and it seems to me they clearly could, the case of Massey v. Heynes (ubi sup.) is in point, and is decisive of this motion.

But the matter stands even on firmer ground, because I think that by the practice of the Admiralty Court they could always have been made parties. No doubt the great mass of cases in which both owners of ship and cargo have been made defendants have been proceedings in rem. But although salvage suits in the form of actions in personam are comparatively rare, the Court of Admiralty always had jurisdiction, founded apparently on the fiction of an action in rem having been brought and the property salved having been allowed to be taken by the owners, to entertain such suits when at least there existed a corpus of property salved. This is shown by the cases of The Hope and The Trelawney (3 Ch. Rob. 215), The Chieftain (4 Notes of Cas. 459), The Meg Merrilies (5 Hagg. 346), and the language of the present Master of the Rolls in Cargo ex Schiller (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 714; 2 P. Div. 145; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 439). It does not clearly appear that in any of these cases proceedings were taken against the owners of ship and cargo as separate parties, although in The Chieftain (ubi sup.) and The Meg Merrilies (ubi sup.) this may have been the case; but I see no reason why such parties, if consisting of separate individuals, or sets of individuals, should not have been brought before the court together by monition. It is indeed possible that the reason why the fiction by which the Admiralty Court maintained the proceeding in personam was allowed to prevail, and why actions for salvage at common law are so rare, is that the facility for bringing all parties before the court gave advantages which the common law jurisdiction could not afford. But however this may be, every consideration both of authority and principle points to the convenience, and indeed the justice, of the owners of ship, freight, and cargo being all before the court when the amount of salvage is to be determined. The case of The Peace (ubi sup.) is an instance of the strong view taken by the Court of Admiralty on this point. In that case the ship and freight were first proceeded against, and afterwards the owners of the cargo, and Dr. Lushington ordered the cargo owners to pay their share of the costs of the proceedings against the owners of the ship. "It is true," he said, "the owners of the cargo did not come in in the original suit. They left the owners of the ship to defend the suit, and say that they are now ready to pay their share of the salvage. Extreme injustice would be done if the court were to sanction that course. The owners of the cargo would lie by, and then when the owners of the ship had obtained a reduction of the amount of salvage claimed they would take advantage of it." A little afterwards, in the case of The Mary Pleasants (Swa. 224), Dr. Lushington dwelt on the difficulty in estimating the remuneration to be paid by the ship apart from that to be paid by the cargo. This appears to be only consonant with common sense. It is easy to imagine a case such as that of a general ship, the cargo having possibly passed to many foreigners, in which separate actions against each individual owner would be impossible. Again, in the case of an agreement for the amount of remuneration which must be made by the master on behalf of the cargo as well as ship (The Westminster, 1 Wm. Rob. 229), it would clearly be wrong, if it can be avoided, that the validity of such an agreement be called in question in several actions with possibly different results. But, apart from any special circumstances, it would seem clear that, when the question at issue depends on one set of facts, and is the determination of the total amount of remuneration which several persons have to pay, and which they all have to make good by general and apportioned contribution, all such persons should, if possible, be before the court. Sir Walter Phillimore argued that it would be against international comity to bring the case of these foreign owners of cargo here; but it appears to me that the principles of international comity may be more soundly invoked to sanction the determination of an entire question of salvage by the tribunal which is seised of a portion of it, especially as conflict of jurisdiction can always be prevented by compelling a plaintiff to select in which tribunal he will proceed. I think, therefore, that this motion must be rejected.

At the trial of the action the Court awarded 1900*l.*, with costs as below:

According to the decree as drawn up in the registry, the general costs of the action payable to the plaintiffs were to be apportioned between the owners of ship, freight, and cargo, but without prejudice to the salvors' right to recover the whole from either; and the costs of the motion to set aside service of the writ were to be borne exclusively by the cargo owners, as also any costs occasioned by the postponement of the case through the cargo owners not having appeared when first served with notice of the writ.

This decree was subsequently varied in part by the judge directing that the defendant shipowners' costs of the postponement were in the first instance to be paid to them by the plaintiffs, and then recovered by the plaintiffs from the cargo owners.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Breach of Regulations for Preventing Collision — Liability — Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.

In a case of collision a ship will not be deemed in fault for an infringement of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, under sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, if it is shown that such infringement could not in any way contribute to the collision.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

The Fanny M. Carvill (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 646; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 565; 13 App. Cas. 455, n.) approved.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), reversing a judgment of Butt, J. in an action brought by the respondents, the owners of the sailing ship Vandalia, against the owners of the steamer Duke of Buccleuch in respect of damage sustained by the former in a collision between the two vessels which occurred early on the morning of March 7, 1889, in which the Duke of Buccleuch was lost with all hands. Butt, J. found that both vessels were to blame, but the Court of Appeal decided that the Duke of Buccleuch alone was to blame, and gave judgment in favour of the owners of the Vandalia. The case is reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 471; 62 L. T. Rep. N. S. 94; 15 P. Div. 86.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster, Q.C.), Sir W. Phillimore, Barnes, Q.C., and T. Laing appeared for the appellants.

Cohen, Q.C. and Myburgh, Q.C. (Dr. Raikes with them) for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

June 26.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

(a) Reported by C. E. Malden, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord Herschell.—My Lords: Early on the morning of the 7th March 1889 the steamer Duke of Buccleuch and the sailing vessel Vandalia, the former outward, the latter inward bound, came into collision in the British Channel. In an action brought by the owners of the Vandalia against the owners of the steamer the latter was found to blame, and upon this finding no question arises. The learned judge who tried the cause in the Admiralty Division found that the Vandalia was also to blame. This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, from whose judgment the present appeal is brought. The ground of the adverse decision as regards the Vandalia in the Admiralty Division was, that she had broken the sailing rules, and must therefore be held to blame. It was found as a fact that her port light was so placed as to be, on the occasion in question, to some extent obscured by one of her sails. The Court of Appeal did not dissent from this finding, but they considered that it had been established that this breach of the rules could not possibly have contributed to the collision. The Master of the Rolls, after stating that the law applicable to the case was that laid down in The Fanny M. Carvill (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 646; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 565; 13 App. Cas. 455, n.), the judgment in which case he entirely adopted, said: "I take it that that case decides this, that if it can be shown that the vessel has (I will speak only of lights here) her lights not perfect according to the rule, that if you can show that there is a defect in the lights, that vessel must be held to blame, unless she can show that the defect which exists in her lights could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision which actually takes place." I think this is a correct statement of the law to be applied to the present case, and I do not understand any of your Lordships to dissent from it. The sole question is, whether the Court of Appeal has correctly appreciated the facts. The case certainly comes before your Lordships in an unsatisfactory condition in some respects. The learned judge of the Admiralty Division appears to have thought that the fact that the rule had been broken established the liability of the Vandalia, and not to have entered upon the inquiry, what was the extent of the obscuration caused by the sail, and what the relative position of the two vessels, and whether the Duke of Buccleuch ever could have been within the area of obscuration. Your Lordships have therefore the bare finding that the sail would somewhat obscure the light without any determination of the extent to which it would be interfered with. The amount of interference would depend upon the bellying of the sail. [After discussing the evidence in detail his Lordship concluded thus:] As I am aware that your Lordships do not all entertain the view I have expressed, and out of sincere respect for that difference of opinion, I have repeatedly considered and weighed the facts and arguments, but with the result that I am unable to see, except upon assumptions which appear to me to be inconsistent with the evidence, that the Court of Appeal erred in the judgment which they pronounced. I may add that I am as sensible as any of your Lordships can be of the importance of enforcing the statutory rules, and that I certainly should not be disposed to exonerate a vessel shown to have broken them on any minute calculation as to distance or bearing.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: I wish that Lord Hannen had read his opinion to your Lordships before I express mine, because I agree with him, and I have little doubt that I have been much influenced by knowing what his opinion was. I think that this is a very unsatisfactory case—very unsatisfactory. I cannot agree that the Vandalia is not liable. I agree with the law laid down in The Fanny M. Carvill. I think the illustration given by Lord Esher, M.R. irresistible. It would be absurd to hold a vessel liable for a collision on a bright day because she had not a foghorn on board. But I doubt whether the courts are justified in putting an exception on the statute such as is necessary to exempt the Vandalia from liability, an exception giving rise to nice questions. She had her lights where she ought not to have had them. It is said that that could not have caused the collision, and unless it is made out that it could not, which she had got to make out, she is liable. [His Lordship then discussed the evidence, and said he was not satisfied that the Vandalia's disregard of rule could not cause the collision, nor that it did not; on the contrary, he inclined to think it did.]

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: This case has given me a good deal of anxiety, and I have been slow to make up my mind upon it. But, after giving full weight to the arguments of the learned counsel for the appellants, and considering over and over again the opinion of Lord Hannen, I have come somewhat reluctantly to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought not to be disturbed. It is at least satisfactory to find that there is no difference of opinion in this House on any point of law involved in the case. Your Lordships are, I believe, all of opinion that the law was correctly laid down in the case of The Fanny M. Carvill. [His Lordship then discussed the evidence, and came to the same conclusion as Lord Herschell.]

Lord HANNEN, after stating the facts and discussing the evidence as to the position of the lights, proceeded thus:—The extent to which the bellying of the sail would cause obscuration is not given by the assessors, and it would appear that Butt, J. did not consider it necessary in his view of the law to ascertain this. "Am I to hold," he says, "that this vessel had her yards absolutely sharp braced? I do not think that I can. I think that the Act of Parliament is passed to prevent my going into these nice questions of fact" (amongst which would also be the extent of the bellying of the sail). And he continues: "I must hold that there was an infringement which might possibly have contributed to or caused this collision." These latter words imply that the learned judge had come to the conclusion that the Duke of Buccleuch was in such a position that the obscuration of the Vandalia's lights by the foresail might possibly contribute to the collision, and he considered that, in accordance with the decision in The Fanny M. Carvill and other cases he was not bound to find that the obscuration did in fact contribute to the disaster. This appears to be a perfectly accurate view of the effect of the judgment of the Privy Council in The Fanny M. Carvill. Sir James Colville, delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee, there says: "Their Lordships therefore conceive that, whatever be the true construction of the enactment in question, that which would take the case out of its operation by mere proof that the infringement of the regulation did not, in point of fact, contribute to the collision, is inadmissible. They conceive that the Legislature intended at least to obviate the necessity for the determination of this question of fact (often a very nice one) upon conflicting evidence." He then proceeds to consider the possible constructions which may be put upon the enactment, and he rejects the one that an infringement of any of the regulations gives rise to an absolute presumption of culpability, and adopts the other, "that the infringement must be one having some possible connection with the collision; or, in other words, that the presumption of culpability may be met by proof that the infringement could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision;" and he concludes by saying that this construction "gives effect to the statute by excluding proof that infringement which might have contributed to a collision did not in fact do so, and by throwing on the party guilty of the infringement the burden of showing that it could not possibly have done so." This view of the law was accepted in the Court of Appeal, and will, I presume, be approved of by your Lordships; but the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that the proved infringement by the Vandalia of the rule with regard to lights could not possibly have contributed to the collision, and therefore that the Vandalia has sustained the burden of proof required to free her from responsibility. I regret to say that I cannot concur in this view of the facts. [His Lordship then discussed the evidence, and concluded as follows:] For these reasons I am of opinion that the Vandalia has failed to establish that the obscuration of her light by her foresail could not possibly have contributed to the collision, and therefore that the judgment of Butt, J. should be restored.

COURT OF APPEAL.

July 6 and 7, 1891.

(Before LINDLEY, FRY, and LOPES, L.JJ.)

THE BRISTOL AND WEST OF ENGLAND BANK LIMITED v. THE MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bill of lading—Hypothecation note—Delivery order—Property in goods.

C., a merchant at Bristol, imported goods from H. and Co. in Canada, the course of business between them being that H. and Co. shipped the goods to this country, receiving bills of lading made out to their order. These bills of lading, together with bills of exchange drawn by them on C., were sold by H. and Co. to various Canadian banks, and were then remitted to banks in this country with a document called a hypothecation note.

By the terms of the hypothecation note the banks here might retain the bills of lading until payment of the bills of exchange if they were not satisfied with C.'s acceptances. C. was a customer of the plaintiffs' bank, and in the months of October and November 1890 he requested the plaintiffs to pay his acceptances in respect of the several consignments of goods imported by them in the way referred to. This the plaintiffs did, receiving the bills of lading for the shipments from the holders of the acceptances. The consignments in question on arrival in this country had, for the convenience of all concerned, been warehoused by the shipowners at the defendants' warehouses in Bristol for delivery by them against the shipowners' delivery orders.

Shortly before the plaintiffs had so paid C.'s acceptances for him he had, by the negligence of the defendants' servants, succeeded in getting possession of a large quantity of the goods from the defendants' warehouses without presenting any delivery orders. In Dec. 1890 C. became insolvent. Thereupon the plaintiffs, having obtained delivery orders from the shipowners, presented them to the defendants and demanded delivery of the goods. Upon the defendants failing to deliver the goods which C. had irregularly obtained, the plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants to recover the value of the goods.

Held, that, independently of the Bills of Lading Act, the plaintiffs were entitled at common law to recover the goods, their position being that of pledgees of the bills of lading, notwithstanding that the defendants were not in possession of the goods at the time when the plaintiffs' title thereto accrued.

Decision of Lord Coleridge, C.J. affirmed, but on different grounds.

Goodman v. Boycott (2 B. & S. 1), Short v. Simpson (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 674; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 248), and Pirie and Sons v. Warden (Sco. Sess. Cas., 3rd series, vol. 9, p. 523) considered and approved.

The plaintiffs were a banking company whose head office was at Bristol, and the defendants were a railway company having warehouses in that city.

This action was brought to recover the sum of 1761*l.* 12*s.*, the value of 867 boxes of cheeses and 140 tubs of butter, which had been deposited with the defendants as warehousemen in their warehouse at Bristol, and which the plaintiffs alleged belonged to them, and the defendants had refused to deliver.

The circumstances giving rise to the action were as follows:—

In May 1889 Robert William Clark commenced business in Bristol as a wholesale provision merchant, and a monthly carriage account was given to him by the defendants.

Clark opened a banking account with the plaintiffs, and they agreed to allow him an overdraft of 1000*l.*, half of which was secured by a certain guarantee. Clark bought all his goods through brokers in Canada and America, among them being Hodgson Bros., of Montreal and New York. Clark's practice was to cable to these firms to ascertain if they could purchase for him certain provisions, and on receipt of a satisfactory reply he instructed them to purchase.

After purchasing, Hodgson Bros. used to ship the goods on board one of the Dominion line of steamers, of which Flinn, Main, and Montgomery, of Bristol, were the managing directors. They then sent to Clark invoices of the goods, showing that they were shipped on account and risk of Clark.

The steamers in question ran between Canada and Avonmouth, and on arrival at Avonmouth Flinn and Co. handed a document to the Bristol Docks Committee, Avonmouth, who unloaded the goods from the ship and delivered them to the defendants with consignment notes instructing them to carry to Bristol and hold to the order of Flinn and Co. The defendants gave the Bristol Docks Committee a receipt for the goods, and then carried them to Bristol, where they warehoused them to the orders of Flinn and Co. in accordance with the terms of the consignment notes. Other goods for other merchants arriving by the same steamer were also warehoused by the defendants, but the goods intended for Clark, which bore his private marks, were separately entered in the warehouse book, although appearing under the heading to the order of Flinn and Co.

Immediately on the arrival of the goods at Bristol, Flinn and Co. sent to Clark a freight note, which was at once paid.

The goods were purchased by and shipped to Clark in large quantities, and, to enable him to more easily deal with them, Hodgson Bros. split the lots into a number of small consignments, and sent them by separate bills of lading and invoices. But though, as before stated, they sent the invoices direct to Clark, they forwarded the bills of lading with bills of exchange, drawn by Hodgson Bros. for the value of the goods attached, to a London banker, who afterwards sent the bills of exchange to a bank in Bristol for Clark's acceptance. The bills were accepted by Clark, and were payable at sixty days after sight.

The bills of lading were in the following form:

Received in apparent good order and condition from Hodgson Bros. for shipment . . . 208 boxes cheese, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered from the ship's deck (where the shipowner's responsibility shall cease) in the like good order and condition subject to the exceptions and restrictions of the following and undermentioned clauses, at the port of Avonmouth Dock, Bristol. . . . The owners of the vessel are not answerable for any discrepancies between the shipping marks as described in the margin hereof and the actual marks on the property; nor for any difference between the contents of the packages and description of the same in the bills of lading; nor for any discrepancies between the mill brands of flour as herein described and those actually delivered. The goods to be received by the consignee immediately the vessel is ready to discharge, or otherwise they will be landed and stored at the sole expense and risk of their owner in the warehouse provided for that purpose, or in the public store as the collector of the port shall direct, and when deposited in the public store to be subject to rent, and the keys of the warehouse to be delivered to and kept in charge of the officer of customs under the direction of the collector, who is hereby authorised to grant a general order for discharging immediately after the entry of the ship. . . . The shipowner is not to be liable for any damage to any goods, however caused, which is capable of being covered by insurance; nor for any claim notice of which is not given before the removal of the goods; nor for any claims for damage or detention to goods, whether under through bills of lading or otherwise where the damage is done or detention occurs whilst the goods are not in the possession of the shipowner; nor in any case for more than the invoice or declared value of the goods whichever shall be the least. The goods are at the risk of their owners while on the quay, or elsewhere awaiting shipment, and the shipowner's responsibility begins when the goods are actually laden on board the ship and not before. . . . Freight, if payable by shippers, is due in full in exchange for bill of lading, or if payable by consignees, on arrival of goods at place of destination in exchange for delivery order; settlement in either case to be made without discount or abatement. Freight payable by shippers to be paid, ship lost or not lost. Freight payable by consignee to be paid at the current rate of exchange for banker's light bills on London, on the date of the steamer's report at the Custom-house. Freight on goods to order. . . . This bill of lading, duly indorsed, is to be given up in exchange for delivery order.

The letter sent to a London banker, in which bills of lading and the bills of exchange were forwarded, was in the following form, and was termed a hypothecation note:

390*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.*—Montreal, 15th August 1890.—To the Manager of the City Bank Limited, London.—Sir,—We have this day sold to the Bank of Toronto a bill of exchange for three hundred and ninety pounds 0/9 on R. W. Clark, Esq., Bristol, against a shipment of twenty boxes cheese, ex Indrani, Bristol. The agreement with the Bank of Toronto is, that the bills of lading are to be given up to R. W. Clark, Esq., Bristol, upon payment or bankers' guarantee without prejudice to your claim on us in the event of the bill not being paid at maturity, but if they decline to accept; or if the acceptance is not satisfactory to you, or if the bill be not paid at maturity, then you are hereby authorised to retain the bills of lading, and at any time at your discretion to place the 208 cheese in the hands of your brokers for sale on account of whom it may concern, and apply the proceeds towards the payment of the bill, and in case of any deficiency we hereby agree to pay the amount of any such deficiency to the Bank of Toronto on demand; and also that, if you should require the transfer of the policies of marine insurance, the same shall be given, and in case of refusal to transfer by the parties drawn on, then you are to have the privilege of effecting a special insurance for cost of which you are to have a lien on the above merchandise. And we also hereby authorise the said bank and the holders of the above bill for the time being to take conditional acceptance to such bill to the effect that on payment thereof the above-mentioned bills of lading and shipping documents shall be delivered to the drawers or acceptors thereof, and such authorisation on our part shall be taken to extend to the case of acceptance for honour.—Yours respectfully, HODGSON BROS., p.p. Arthur Hodgson.

Insured in . . .—If the documents hereby hypothecated are surrendered against payment of this bill before maturity, the allowance of discount to the acceptor is to be at the rate of one half per cent. per annum above the advertised rate of interest for short deposits allowed by the leading joint-stock banks in London, England.

Clark generally allowed the bills of exchange to mature, but sometimes he intrusted the plaintiffs to take them up under rebate and debit his banking account with the amount thereof, or he took them up himself under rebate by forwarding a cheque to the London bank holding the bills of lading and acceptances. When Clark dealt with the London bank direct, the bills of exchange and bills of lading were forwarded to him, and he thereupon produced the bill of lading to Flinn and Co. and obtained from them a delivery order on the defendants for the goods referred to. When Clark did not require the goods, he (as before stated) allowed the bills of exchange to mature, and the day before they became due he wrote to the plaintiffs instructing them to advise the bills. This the plaintiffs did, and on the day this letter was written debited Clark's banking account with the amount, afterwards taking up the acceptances and receiving the bills of lading. They retained both, and when Clark had sold the goods he asked for the bill of lading, which was handed to him as a matter of course. He then took it to Flinn and Co. and obtained from them a delivery order on the defendants, which he afterwards handed to them in exchange for the goods.

Clark soon after he commenced business prevailed on some of the warehouse officials of the defendants to allow him to take away samples of the goods bearing his private mark stored to the order of Flinn and Co. without handing over a delivery order signed by that firm, promising to send a delivery order later, and this he did for some time.

From allowing Clark to take samples the practice grew into allowing him to take bulk, and in Dec. 1890 he had persuaded the defendants' servants to hand over to him goods to the value of nearly 2000*l.* without Flinn and Co.'s delivery orders.

On the 5th Dec. 1890 one Glasson, carrying on business in Bristol, presented to the defendants delivery orders, signed by Flinn and Co. in favour of the plaintiffs, instructing the defendants to deliver 1107 packages of cheeses which formed part of four large consignments of cheeses which had been sent in the manner before described by Hodgson Bros. on account of Clark in the s.s. Indrani, Texas, Knight Companion, and Ontario, and warehoused in the usual way by the defendants to the order of Flinn and Co. On these orders being presented a clerk was sent with Glasson into the warehouse to see if the cheeses were in stock, when it was discovered that only a small portion of those referred to in the delivery orders were in the possession of the defendants.

The goods agent of the defendants at Bristol was made acquainted with the circumstances, and on inquiry into the matter he found that his warehouse officials had allowed Clark to take away the goods that were missing without handing over Flinn and Co.'s delivery orders.

The defendants delivered to the order of the plaintiffs such of the goods referred to in the delivery orders as they had on hand, and denied that they were liable for the goods which they had delivered to Clark without orders.

On the 11th Dec. 1890 Clark filed his petition in bankruptcy.

A correspondence took place between Flinn and Co. and the plaintiffs and the defendants and their respective solicitors, and eventually the present action was commenced.

By their statement of defence, the defendants denied that the goods in question ever were deposited with them by or on behalf of the plaintiffs as alleged or at all. They denied that the goods ever were the property of the plaintiffs, or that the plaintiffs ever were the holders of any bills of lading relating to the goods. The defendants alleged that, if the plaintiffs ever took or purported to take any assignment of any of the bills of lading or any interest therein respectively for their own benefit or at all (which was denied), they did so after the bills of lading respectively had ceased to represent or to have any power of passing the property in the goods respectively by reason of the termination and fulfilment of the respective contracts of affreightment in respect whereof the bills respectively had been originally given.

The defendants alleged also that, if they ever held the goods as warehousemen (which was not admitted), and if the plaintiffs ever were the holders of any of the bills of lading (which was denied), the defendants delivered up to the true owner, namely, Clark, the goods before the respective times at which the plaintiffs became the holders of the bills of lading relating to the same respectively.

By their reply the plaintiffs contended that the defendants ought not to be admitted to say, and were estopped from saying, that they had not got the goods at the material times, or that they had at such times delivered them up to Clark, by reason of the defendants having negligently and improperly allowed the bills of lading to remain outstanding, and by not having required any proper delivery orders from the persons in whose names the goods were warehoused, which circumstances were calculated to and did lead the plaintiffs to act as though the defendants had still got the goods, and to take the bills of lading as the symbol of the goods as security for the plaintiffs advising and paying the bills of exchange to the amount of the invoice prices of the goods.

The action was tried before Lord Coleridge, C.J. and a special jury at the Bristol Assizes, on the 21st and 23rd March 1891, when the jury were discharged and the damages were agreed at 1761*l.*

The questions of law arising were reserved for further consideration, and were argued before his Lordship in London on the 18th April 1891.

The following judgment was then delivered :

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—It seems that in this case the defendants by their contention, which is ingenious enough, really attempt to put forward a defence which the facts, when rightly understood, do not justify. Here are a quantity of cheeses, which finally become the property, as representing others, of a man called Flinn, and they are delivered to the defendants, the Midland Railway Company, by Flinn. Flinn gets from the railway company a receipt, and the receipt is a receipt of those goods to be held for Flinn in effect. Flinn, the property being in him, gives a delivery order for a quantity of those goods to the plaintiffs, or he gives a delivery order which comes into the hands of the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs go with that delivery order and ask for the goods which they are entitled to have. The defendants have parted with those goods to a man called Clark. They have parted with those goods, as they admit (not giving up their legal defence), in a way in which, if they had been aware of all the circumstances, and if their servants had behaved properly, they would not have done. But they say, although they have parted wrongfully with the goods, and although Clark had no right to have them, still the plaintiffs cannot sue, and they say they cannot sue because the receipt and the delivery order together made a contract only between themselves as the givers of the receipt and Flinn as the holder or maker of these delivery orders. I am not of that opinion. It seems to me that the true effect of the transaction was, that they received these goods to hold for Flinn or for any person properly representing Flinn, and who came for Flinn's property with Flinn's authority. It is true that there were intermediate circumstances which are not necessary, in my judgment, to be considered; but in the result the delivery order given by the proper person was presented to the defendants, who were the custodians of the articles represented by that delivery order. They having improperly parted with them, an action is brought to recover the goods, or for damages for the non-delivery of them. I am of opinion that the action and the damages must be for the plaintiffs. The amount that was agreed was 1761*l.*

From that decision the defendants now appealed.

Bucknill, Q.C., Castle, Q.C., and J. V. Austin for the appellants.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to recover the value of the goods in question. They never were the true owners of the goods. The utmost that they had was a lien on the goods. They were never entitled to the possession of the goods up to the time of Clark's bankruptcy. So soon as the bills of exchange were paid the bills of lading were exhausted and dead. A common carrier of goods who is also a wharfinger is not estopped from setting up that the person who deposited the goods never was the true owner :

Sheridan v. The New Quay Company, 30 L. T. Rep. O. S. 304; 28 L. J. 58, C. P.

[Lopes, L.J. referred to his judgment in Rogers v. Lambert (64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 406; (1891) 1 Q. B. 318), remarking that he would repeat the observations there made.] As regards the effect of an indorsement and delivery of a bill of lading, the mere indorsement and delivery of a bill of lading by way of pledge for a loan does not pass "the property in the goods" to the indorsee, so as to transfer to him all liabilities in respect of the goods within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c 111):

Sewell v. Burdick, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 445; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 376; 10 App. Cas. 74.

In Barber v. Meyerstein (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 449; L. Rep. 4 E. & I. App. 317) it was laid down that, where goods are at sea, the parting with the bill of lading, which is the symbol of the goods, is parting with the ownership of the goods themselves; and that the same principle applies to goods which, for the convenience of parties, have been landed at a sufferance wharf. As to how long a bill of lading remains the symbol of the goods which it represents, it was decided in that case that, so long as the engagement of the shipowner has not been completely fulfilled, the bill of lading is a living instrument, and the transfer of it for value passes the absolute property in the goods. But the present case goes further than Barber v. Meyerstein (ubi sup.). Primâ facie, on payment of shipping charges and freight to the shipowner, the primary object of the bill of lading is at an end; the object for which a bill of lading has been given as a receipt by the shipowner has then been fulfilled. The consignee is entitled to a delivery order so soon as he has paid the freight for the goods. Whatever the rights of the plaintiffs were, they were not derived directly or indirectly through Clark; for Clark having the goods could convey no right to anyone else. The plaintiffs cannot sue in contract, because there was no contract between them and the defendants; they cannot sue in tort, because they had no interest in the goods at the time of the conversion. The wrongful act of the defendants, if any, having been done before the plaintiffs acquired any title to the goods, such act does not afford the plaintiffs any cause of action:

Goodman v. Boycott, 2 B. & S. 1.

We submit that the view taken by Blackburn, J. in that case was correct, and that his judgment should be followed rather than that of the dissentient judge, Wightman, J. In that case Blackburn, J., at p. 9, said that the plaintiff there could maintain no action of trover or trespass for any act done to the title deeds, which were the subject of the action, before they were his, nor could he maintain in his own name any action on the contract of bailment for the loss admitted to have taken place before the plaintiff had any property in them. That opinion was adopted in Lord v. Price (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 271; L. Rep. 9 Ex. 54). There it was held that the purchaser of goods which remained in the possession of the vendor subject to the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money could not maintain an action of trover against a wrong-doer. Whatever title accrued to the plaintiffs, whatever rights they have acquired, they have no right to maintain this action. If A. draws a cheque on his bankers to the order of B. and the bankers fail to pay the cheque when presented, the person who has a cause of action is the drawer A. not the payee B. The payee is a stranger to the bankers. That is precisely this case; for here the plaintiffs are strangers to the defendants, and cannot sue them. They have no cause of action either in contract or tort. They referred also to Glynn, Mills, and Co. v. East and West India Docks Company, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 584; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 345; 6 Q. B. Div. 475.

Sir Walter Phillimore, Poole, Q.C., and L. E. Pyke for the respondents.—So long as the bills of lading were outstanding they represented the goods, and the plaintiffs being the holders of the bills of lading, were the owners of the goods. Therefore, the delivery by the defendants to Clark was wrongful. In Short v. Simpson (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 674; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 248, 252), which was decided before the case of Sewell v. Burdick (ubi sup.), goods were shipped for Bombay under a bill of lading making them deliverable "to order or assigns." The consignor indorsed the bill of lading in blank and deposited it with a banker as security for an advance of money, and, on his repaying the sum advanced, the bill of lading was re-indorsed and delivered back to him. It was held, that such re-indorsement of the bill of lading to him remitted the consignor to all his rights as against the shipowners under the original contract; and consequently that he was entitled to sue them for a breach, whether occurring before or after such re-indorsement. That is in accordance with the opinion expressed by Wightman, J. in Goodman v. Boycott (ubi sup.), and is opposed to the view taken by Blackman, J. in that case. The opinion of Wightman, J. is also supported by the decision in Pirie and Sons v. Warden (Sco. Sess. Cas., 3rd series, vol. 9, p. 523). There it was held that, although delivery of a cargo had been wrongful, the plaintiffs were not precluded from acquiring right to the cargo by subsequent indorsement of the bill of lading, and that they had therefore a good title to sue for damages. They referred also to Lindley, L.J.—I do not think it is necessary to take time to consider this case, although there are points in it which are somewhat difficult. This is really an action by the plaintiffs, who are the Bristol and West of England Bank, to recover damages for the non-delivery of goods which they say were theirs. The facts are rather complicated, but the outline of them is not difficult to follow nor to state. Clark, a customer of the plaintiffs, bought cheeses and butter for sale, of course on the expectation of making a profit. I will leave out all reference to the butter and confine my remarks to the cheeses which we have heard more about. Clark employed a person named Hodgson in Canada to buy cheeses for him, and Hodgson bought them and shipped them to Bristol, and the bill of lading which we have before us is, I think, in the ordinary form. It states that the cheeses are marked and numbered in the margin, and are "to be delivered from the ship's deck" and so on "unto shippers' orders or to their assigns, freight payable by consignee at the rate of" so and so. I take it that "consignee" there obviously means the person who claims under the shipper—under the order or assignment of the shipper. It does not mean somebody else. "The goods to be received by the consignee immediately the vessel is ready to discharge, or otherwise they will be landed and stored at the sole expense and risk of their owner in the warehouse provided for that purpose, or in the public store as the collector of the port shall direct, and when deposited in the public store to be subject to rent" and so on. The only other clause I need read I think is this: "Freight, if payable by shippers, is due in full in exchange for bill of lading, or, if payable by consignees, on arrival of goods at place of destination, in exchange for delivery order. Settlement in either case to be made without discount or abatement." I think that those are the important passages in the bill of lading. The bill of lading was indorsed by Hodgson, who was the shipper. Now, what was done with it was this: It was sent with a bill of exchange drawn on Clark for the price to a bank at Toronto, and the bank at Toronto sent the documents (the bill of exchange and the bill of lading, and I suppose the insurance—I do not know) to a London bank, the City Bank I think in this particular case. The City Bank were the holders both of the bill of lading and of the bill of exchange. They sent the documents down to Bristol, showed them to Clark, and got Clark to accept the bill of exchange. But the City Bank were not merely agents to collect for the Toronto bank. The City Bank bought the bill of exchange, and that is shown by what is called a hypothecation note, to which I do not attach very much importance, although it has been a great deal discussed. It merely shows the fact that the City Bank were the buyers of the bill of exchange, and with it they had the bill of lading. The hypothecation note runs thus: It is addressed to the manager of the City Bank Limited London, and it is written by Hodgson: "We have this day sold to the Bank of Toronto a bill of exchange for 390*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* on R. W. Clark, Esq., Bristol, against a shipment of 208 boxes cheese ex Indrani, Bristol. The agreement with the Bank of Toronto is, that the bills of lading are to be given up to R. W. Clarke, Esq., upon payment, or banker's guarantee, without prejudice to your claim on us in the event of the bill not being paid at maturity; but if they decline to accept, or if the acceptance is not satisfactory to you, or if the bill be not paid at maturity, then you are hereby authorised to retain the bills of lading, and at any time at your discretion to place the 208 cheeses in the hands of your brokers for sale;" and so on. I do not think I need read any more. Now, it is quite obvious to me that the position of the City Bank was this: They were holders for value of the bill of exchange. They were entitled to sue Clark upon it, of course, to recover the money. They had as security for that bill of exchange the bills of lading for these cheeses. In other words, they were pledgees at law of these cheeses, not under the Bills of Lading Act, but quite apart from that statute. They had a right, on the production of the bills of lading and payment of freight, to receive the cheeses from the shipowner or the warehouseman where they might be stored. That was their position. Now, it appears that when the bills of exchange were about to become due Clark could not take them up. Clark requested the plaintiffs to take them up—to pay them—and the plaintiffs did so, and the plaintiffs got from the City Bank the bills of exchange and the bill of lading which is indorsed in blank—and they become, so far as I can see, by that transaction, in point of title, the transferees of the title of the City Bank at the request of Clark. That is their position. They have the same title to the goods that the City Bank had—a title to sue as pledgees of the goods at law for the delivery of the goods, of course upon payment of the freight if the freight has not been paid. Now they go to the defendants for the goods. The defendants have had the goods handed to them by the shipowner, or by a person named Flinn who is acting for the shipowner, and it appears that the cheeses were taken to Avonmouth. They were to go to Bristol, and by the custom of the trade they were transshipped at Avonmouth. Flinn, who acted for the shipowner, deposited the cheeses with the Midland Railway Company to carry them, as I understand it, to Bristol, and then they were to deliver on the order of Flinn. Flinn, I suppose, would have no business to part with them except upon the production of the bill of lading. He could not give a valid order—at least he could not, except at his risk and the risk of his masters and employers—to deliver them to anybody except to those who were entitled to them. He had no more right to deliver them to Clark than he had to deliver them to me. Clark goes and pays the freight. He does not produce the bill of lading. He does that when the bill of lading and the bills of exchange are still in the hands of the City Bank. Clark gets the goods, whether by a false pretence or by misplaced confidence I do not know; but he gets the goods from the defendants, who had no right to deliver them to him. He produces no delivery order or anything else. In other words, he cheats the City Bank. He gets the goods from the defendants, those goods belonging to the City Bank as pledgees of the bill of lading.

Now comes the question whether the plaintiffs can sue the defendants in respect of those goods. My answer is "Yes." I see no difficulty at all about it, except the difficulty which I will allude to presently. If the plaintiffs had as assignees the same title to these goods that the City Bank had, they were owners of the goods and could sue, in trover or detinue at common law, quite apart from the Bills of Lading Act, anybody who wrongfully withheld those goods. They go to the defendants; and the defendants say, "No, we cannot give the goods to you; we gave them to Clark." Is that any answer? Now there is the whole difficulty. Mr. Castle says "Yes." Mr. Castle says, upon the authority of Goodman v. Boycott (2 B. & S. 1), that there is a difficulty, and that the plaintiffs cannot sue. He says, "Supposing that you are (as you say but which I deny) the owners of these goods, go and get them from those who have got them; do not come to me who have not got them." And the question arises whether it lies in the mouth of the defendants to say "We have not got the goods," when they have wrongfully parted with them. My answer is "No." I quite see that Mr. Castle has the very high authority of Lord Blackburn for saying "Yes." Lord Blackburn differed from the learned judge, Wightman, J., who was his colleague in the case referred to; and it is quite obvious that his view is opposed to that taken by Willes, J. in the later case, to which Sir Walter Phillimore referred, of Short v. Simpson (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 674; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 248), and that view is entirely inconsistent also with the Scotch case to which Mr. Poole referred, of Pirie and Sons v. Warden (Sco. Sess. Cas., 3rd series, vol. 9, 523). On principle it strikes me that there is not much in the view taken by Lord Blackburn if you look at it apart from technicalities. It is a mere question of pleading. Lord Blackburn's difficulty would have been got rid of immediately if the vendor to the plaintiff had been a co-plaintiff; there would have been no answer to the action at all. So here, if the City Bank were co-plaintiffs, there would be no answer at all. Is there anything, therefore, in substance which ought to induce us to say that this action cannot be maintained because you have not got the City Bank? My answer is, "No; it is a mere question of pleading, and there is no substance in it." If there were substance in it, we should be holding that the defendants had wrongfully got rid of nearly 1800*l.* worth of goods, and were answerable to nobody at all, which is sheer nonsense. It appears to me, therefore, that this case has been rightly decided, and the appeal must be dismissed; but I am not prepared to decide it on the ground on which the Lord Chief Justice decided it, namely, that the plaintiffs are entitled to these goods, and to recover them under colour of Flinn's title. I do not myself understand that Flinn's delivery order which the plaintiffs had was important except in this respect; it was a condition precedent to their recovering the goods. They got the delivery order for what it was worth; but their title to the goods does not turn on the delivery order from Flinn. It turns on the bill of lading which they got from the City Bank. In my opinion, therefore, this appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and when the facts of this case are threshed out it appears to me that the plaintiffs' title to recover is not very difficult to be stated. According to the view I take, the bill of lading was pledged to the Toronto Bank at the same time that the bill of exchange was sold to that bank. That bank became, in my opinion, pledgees of the bill of lading. That pledge appears to have been transferred by the Toronto Bank to the City Bank, and thereupon they were the pledgees of the bill of lading; they had the property in the goods. Whilst they had that property in the goods as pledgees a wrongful act was done by the defendant company; they delivered the goods which they had no right so to deliver to Clark. But that wrongful act did not displace the property which was vested in the City Bank. Their property as pledgees still remains. When the Bristol Bank came to the City Bank and took up the bill of exchange they did it, in my judgment, with the intention of becoming the assigns of all the rights of the City Bank. It has been argued that they did not so do; they came as agents for Clark, and that they were merely to get back from Clark some rights in these bills. In my judgment, that is not the true nature of the transaction between the parties. The probable, the natural, the reasonable transaction is one upon which the Bristol Bank were to acquire all the rights of the City Bank—to use the well-known expression, they were to "stand in the shoes" of the City Bank. The right of property therefore which the City Bank had in these goods when the Bristol Bank paid them was transferred from the City Bank to the Bristol Bank. They became pledgees of the goods, and, as such pledgees, can maintain trover or detinue for the goods. When they apply for the goods they are told that the goods are not there. Primâ facie that gives them a perfect cause of action either of trover or detinue against the defendants, who ought to have had the goods; and the only question—the only point, at any rate, for consideration is this, whether that defence is affected by the fact that the wrongful act done by the defendant company was before the accrual of the plaintiffs' title. That very point occurred for decision in Goodman v. Boycott (ubi sup.) nearly thirty years ago, and was then determined by the judgment of the senior judge against that point. It was held that it made no difference whether the wrongful act was before or after the accrual of the plaintiffs' title. It is quite true that the very eminent colleague of that learned judge differed from him. That decision appears to have stood from the year 1862 down to the present time unquestioned. No cases have been called to our attention in which any doubt has been thrown on the propriety of the decision of Wightman, J. On the contrary, it appears to me a similar view was taken by Willes, J. in the subsequent case of Short v. Simpson (ubi sup.), and was also taken in the Scotch case of Pirie v. Warden (ubi sup.). But, further than that, it appears to me to be good law and good sense, which, in this case at any rate and I hope in most cases, is the same thing. I think it is reasonable to say that the man who ought to have the goods shall not be allowed to set up a wrongful prior act by which he has made away with the goods. He who ought to produce the goods of the man who has the title to the goods and the property in the goods cannot discharge himself by saying, "I have wrongfully made away with them, but that was before the accrual of your title." I further agree with what has been said by the Lord Justice that the point becomes one really of mere pleading, and I think the decision of Wightman, J. in the case of Goodman v. Boycott, which I have referred to, was consonant with good sense, with business habits, and is thoroughly right. I therefore have no hesitation in saying that that defence, in my judgment, does not avail the defendants. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs have a perfectly good common law title, independent of the Bills of Lading Act, under which they can sue the defendants in their character as pledgees of these goods, and that, not producing the goods, they have no valid answer in saying, "We made away with them before your title accrued."

Lopes, L.J.—This case, in my opinion, is outside the Bills of Lading Act, and after a careful consideration of the evidence which has been placed before us, I am of opinion that the position of the plaintiffs is that of pledgees of the bills of lading. The case of Sewell v. Burdick (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 445; 10 App. Cas. 74) establishes this, that the first section of the Bills of Lading Act does not apply to pledgees of bills of lading, as the pledgees have a special property in the goods, and can bring an action at common law either in trover or detinue. Now, with regard to that point, when the case is thoroughly understood, I do not think it is difficult to decide it in the way that it has been decided. But another point was raised by Mr. Castle, who argued the case with great ability, if I may say so, which is not so easy of solution. It was said by him that the plaintiffs cannot maintain trover in this case, because the defendants were no longer in possession of the goods at the time when the plaintiffs' title accrued. It is said by him, "You must go to those people, and sue those people who had possession of the goods at the time the plaintiffs' title accrued and his cause of action arose." Now the case of Goodman v. Boycott (2 B. & S. 1) was cited with regard to this matter. It is somewhat extraordinary that that case is the only authority on this point, and it is also remarkable that in that case, which was decided by two judges, those judges disagreed; the judgment of Wightman, J. prevailing, as he was the senior judge. Now I have carefully read the reasoning of those two learned judges, and, for myself, I prefer the reasoning of Wightman, J., and I am very much impressed with the observation which I find in the course of his judgment. He says: "The action, it is to be observed, is not to recover damages for losing the deeds, but for the detention of them. They must be taken upon these pleadings to be existing. The plaintiff is the owner and they are detained from him, without sufficient legal excuse, by the defendant, who ought to be in possession of them. If this action is not maintainable, I do not see how any action can be maintained by anybody, though the plaintiff has sustained great damage." Now that case, as has been observed by my brother Fry, has not been in any way, so far as I know, criticised or adversely critcised, if at all, since the year 1862, and, moreover, it is a case in conformity with a recent decision, the Scotch case of Pirie v. Warden (ubi sup.), and also is in conformity, as is our present judgment, with an expression of opinion by Willes, J. in the case of Short v. Simpson (ubi sup.). I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Tuesday, June 9, 1891.

(Before Denman and Wills, JJ.)

Thiodon v. Tindall and others (the Committee of Lloyd's Register). (a)

Lloyd's Register of Ships—Survey and classification of ship by Lloyd's—Negligent survey and classification—Purchaser of vessel after survey—Misrepresentation—Right of purchaser to an action against Lloyd's for negligent survey made for previous owner.

No action will lie against the chairman or committee of Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, at the suit of a purchaser of a ship, for an alleged negligent survey or classification of the ship made for the previous owner before the date of the purchase, or for negligently issuing a certificate based upon such survey, whereby a false character was given to the ship through negligence, though not through an intention to deceive, and whereby the purchaser was induced to give a larger price for the ship than he otherwise would have done.

Argument of a point of law raised on the pleadings, under Order XXV., r. 2, the facts alleged in the statement of claim being admitted for the purposes of the argument, and the question being whether the statement of claim disclosed any cause of action.

The statement of claim was as follows:

The plaintiff is the owner of the sailing yacht Ibex, having purchased her under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned.

The defendant, William Henry Tindall, is and is sued as the chairman and representative of Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping.

The said committee consist of and is the executive body of certain persons associated together as a society for the purpose of obtaining a faithful and accurate classification of the shipping of the United Kingdom, and, in pursuance of such purpose, the said committee by their surveyors survey and superintend the construction and building of ships of all descriptions, including yachts, and have reports made to them by such surveyors, and enter such ships in their registers in accordance with such reports, and issue certificates of character of such ships signed by the chairman of the committee of classification, and countersigned by the secretary of the general committee, for which surveys, reports, and certificates the committee make charges to the owners of such ships. The said certificates and register are, and are intended by the defendants to be, acted upon by the owners, and through such owners by others dealing with such ships, as truly representing the character and strength of such ships and the materials of and the nature of the surveys under which such ships are constructed, and the class to which such ships are entitled to belong, according to the rules laid down by the defendants, and the defendants, in consideration of such charges, take upon themselves, and it is and becomes their duty, to state truly and accurately in the said certificates and in the said register such character, strength, materials, and class, and the survey, if any, under which such ships have been constructed, and by such register and certificates the defendants represent that the ships to which they relate are constructed as therein stated.

On the 20th Sept. 1889 the plaintiff, induced by a certificate issued by the said committee, and duly signed and countersigned as hereinbefore mentioned, purchased from the then owner the yacht Ibex, and by such certificate it was represented (or in the alternative warranted) that the said yacht was classed and entered in the yacht register book of the society with the character of A 1 for eleven years, and had been built under special survey, and had the notation mark of such survey affixed in the said register, and that she was built of ten and twelve years' materials, whereas in truth and in fact the said yacht was not built under special survey by the society, nor was she entitled to the notation mark of such survey, nor was she built of ten and twelve years' materials, but the yacht was built of much inferior material and with much inferior workmanship than she would have been if built under special survey and as described in such certificate. The condition of the said yacht at the time of the purchase was unknown to and incapable of discovery by the plaintiff by the use of ordinary care and means.

By reason of the premises the plaintiff gave a much larger price than he would otherwise have done for the said yacht, and was subsequently put to great expense for repairing the same and in putting her into condition to be registered and to be inserted in her proper class in the register of the society, and thereby the defendants have committed a breach of duty or warranty, entailing on the plaintiff the damage aforesaid.

(a) Reported by W. W. Orr, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff also says that the defendants have by their servants so negligently conducted themselves in the premises, and in performance of their duty, that the plaintiff has suffered damage as aforesaid, and the plaintiff claims 300*l.*

According to the facts set out in the statement of defence, it appeared that:

Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping is an unincorporated society for the purpose of obtaining a faithful and accurate classification of the mercantile shipping of the United Kingdom and of the foreign vessels trading thereto, and it does not trade or carry on business or make any gains or profits.

A register book is printed annually by the society for the use of its subscribers, containing the names of the ships or yachts with other useful information, and the character assigned where the vessels are classed by the society. The plaintiff never was a subscriber to or member of the society.

In or about the month of Oct. 1888, the yacht Ibex was classed and entered in the yacht register book of the society with the character A 1 for eleven years from Aug. 1888, subject to being submitted to periodical survey and being kept in good condition.

On the 16th Oct. 1888 the committee of the society issued to the builder or then owner of the yacht a certificate in the words and figures following:

Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, No. 2, White Lion-court, Cornhill, E.C., London, 16th Oct. 1888.—No. 287.—These are to certify that the wood cutter yacht Ibex, of Bideford, 1058-94 Y. M. tons, built by G. E. Parkin, and launched August 1888, has been surveyed at Appledore by the surveyors to this society, and reported to be on the 3rd October 1888 in a good and efficient state, and that she has been classed and entered in the yacht register book of this society with the character A 1 for eleven years from August 1888, subject to being submitted to periodical survey, and being kept in good condition. Built under special survey and the notation mark affixed. Chains proved at a machine under the superintendence of the society and record made of L. C. P. Built of 10 and 12 years' materials; sheathed with copper over iron bolts. October, 1888.—Witness my hand. (Signed) THOS. B. WALKER, Chairman of the Committees of Classification.—(Signed) B. Waymouth, Secretary.

The defendants contended that this certificate stated truly and accurately the classification and character of the yacht, and that it was issued for the purpose of certifying to the builder or owner that the yacht had been classed and entered as stated in the certificate, and for no other purpose, and not with any such warranty as alleged in the statement of claim, and that such certificate was not issued to the plaintiff, and before the purchase of the yacht the plaintiff did not communicate with the committee or any of its officers with reference to the yacht or the certificate.

The defendants also said in their defence that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action.

The question of law now argued was, whether the statement of claim disclosed any cause of action.

A. Cohen, Q.C. (Scrutton with him) for the defendants.—The question is whether the statement of claim, admitting the facts to be true, discloses any cause of action. Although we deny that there was any negligence whatever in making this survey, yet for the purpose of this argument, and for that purpose alone, it is admitted that the facts set out in the statement of claim are true, and we say that, admitting all the facts therein alleged to be true, and admitting that there was negligence on the part of the defendants' officers in making the survey, still there is no cause of action at the suit of the plaintiff. The case is in fact concluded by a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, in the year 1878, in the case of Braginton v. Chapman and others (Trustees of Lloyd's Register); The Midas, reported only in the Shipping and Mercantile Gazette the 1st June 1878 (a), wherein

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

May 28, 1878.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J. and MELLOR, J.)

BRAGINTON v. CHAPMAN AND OTHERS (Trustees of Lloyd's Register of Shipping); THE MIDAS.

Lloyd's Register—Survey and classification of vessel—Certificate—Negligence by Lloyd's officers—Purchase of vessel after negligent classification—Liability of Lloyd's to purchaser for negligent survey and false character given to vessel—Privity of contract—Misrepresentation.

The defendants, the trustees of Lloyd's Register of Shipping, had, on the request of the owner of the barque Midas, to have the vessel surveyed and reclassed, caused a survey of the vessel to be made by one of their surveyors, and after such survey the society issued a certificate in the usual form, in which they stated that the vessel was in a good and efficient state, and that she had been classed and entered in the register with the character A 1 for seven years. The fees for this classification were paid by the owner. After the date of this classification and certificate the plaintiff bought the Midas from the owner, and he did so in reliance upon the statement in the certificate as to the condition of the vessel. Defects were soon afterwards discovered in the condition of the vessel, by reason whereof the plaintiff suffered damage. It was admitted, for the purpose of the case, that the survey was negligently made, and that but for such negligence the defects in such vessel would have been discovered, and the plaintiff saved from the loss which he sustained. In an action by the plaintiff against the trustees of the society to recover damages from the loss so sustained:

Held (by Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor, J.), that, even assuming the negligence of the classification and the false character given to the vessel thereby, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover against the defendants, as his action could not be based upon contract, there being no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, and it could not be based upon misrepresentation, as there was no misrepresentation of a fraudulent character.

SPECIAL case stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, as follows:—

The plaintiff is a shipowner at Clifton, Bristol, and the defendants were the trustees for the year 1874 of Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Ships.

Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Ships, is a society established in the year 1843 with the objects described in their rules and regulations, a copy of which is annexed hereto, and forms part of this case. Sections 2 and 3 provide that a register book is to be printed annually for the use of subscribers, and that such person subscribing the sum of three guineas per annum or other such sum as the general committee may fix, is to be considered a member of the society, and entitled for his own use to one copy of the Register Book.

The plaintiff is not, and was not a subscriber to the society at the time the claim in this action arose. The society obtain from time to time from Her Majesty's Customs, returns of the changes of ownership in vessels classified in their register, and upon receipt thereof the Register Book is posted up with the names of the new owners on payment of a small fee.

Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor, J. decided, upon substantially the same facts as in the present case, that there was no cause of action to the plaintiff,

In Aug. 1874 one Mr. Peters, a shipbuilder, of Bristol, was the owner of the barque Midas, which had been built in the year 1853, and had been for some years classed in the said register.

On the 8th Aug. 1874 Mr. Peters applied to the secretary of the society to have the vessel reclassed, under sects. 55 and 56 of the rules.

On the 10th Aug. 1874 the secretary directed Mr. Follett, the society's surveyor of shipping at Bristol, to hold a survey on the said vessel, in conjunction with one other competent surveyor, and to report the result to the society.

Mr. Follett, in accordance with the said directions, accordingly surveyed the vessel in conjunction with Mr. Patteson, a surveyor of experience and skill. The repairs which they recommended were properly done by Mr. Peters on the 26th Oct.; they made the report of survey, of which a copy is hereto annexed.

On the 3rd Nov. 1874 the society issued to Mr. Peters a certificate in the usual form, which was as follows:—"Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, established 1834, 2, White Lion-court, Cornhill, London, Nov. 3, 1874. These are to certify that the barque Midas, of Bristol, ——— master, 229 tons, bound to ———, has been surveyed at Bristol by the surveyors of the society, and reported to be on the 20th Oct. 1874 in a good and efficient state, and fit to carry dry and perishable cargoes to and from all parts of the world, and that she has been classed and entered in the register book of the society, with the character restored A 1 for seven years from 1874, subject to periodical surveys. Witness my hand," and so forth.

The fees for the said certificate and classification were paid by Mr. Peters, and the vessel was classed and entered on the register in accordance with the certificate. Mr. Peters shortly advertised the Midas for sale, and in the advertisement so issued was the following statement: "This useful vessel is now restored to A 1 at Lloyd's for seven years."

On the 16th Nov. 1874—that is, thirteen days after the certificate—the plaintiff bought the Midas from Mr. Peters for 2650*l.*, which sum was subsequently paid, and the Midas transferred to the plaintiff.

It is to be taken for the purposes of this case that the plaintiff bought in reliance upon the statement in the above-mentioned advertisement.

In Dec. 1874 the society having received from the Customs information of the transfer of the vessel to the plaintiff, gave notice to the plaintiff that, in accordance with their rules, it was necessary that a fee of 1*l.* should be paid before the change of ownership could be recorded in the register. The plaintiff paid the fee, and the change of ownership was entered in the register. Defects were afterwards discovered in the condition of the Midas, by reason whereof plaintiff suffered damage.

It is to be taken for the purpose of this case that the survey already mentioned was negligently made, and that but for such negligence the defects mentioned in the last paragraph would then have been discovered, and the plaintiff would not have sustained the damages which he has sustained.

The question for the opinion of the court is: Whether, upon the facts hereinbefore stated, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, it is agreed that the case shall go back to the arbitrator, to be dealt with in accordance with the decision of the court.

Benjamin, Q.C. for the plaintiff.—This is a case I may say of first impression. It relates to the effect which is to be given in law to the issue by Lloyd's Register of a false character of a ship, a false character through negligence, not through intention to deceive. The plaintiff alleges, and that is so found, that he contracted for the purchase of a ship, and paid for it, upon a false character issued by Lloyd's, and he wants to hold them responsible for their negligence, which is the basis of this contract. The point in the case is, whether there is between the plaintiff and Lloyd's Register Society, a privity of contract resulting from their issuing this certificate to be shown to the plaintiff, or to anybody else who might wish to deal upon the faith of who had purchased the Midas after the survey had been made. [He was stopped.]

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiff.—The point is, their certificate, such privity of contract as to entitle them to say to the plaintiff, "You have deceived us by a misapprehension, and induced us to buy a ship, whereas, if you had done your duty and had not made this representation to us, we should not have suffered the damage which we have suffered." The defendants say we must fail on the ground that there is no contract, but I submit that the contract is to be found in this principle of law, not that there is any legal privity, but that there is an equitable privity on this basis: the certificate is issued as a character of the vessel, just as a master gives a certificate for character to a servant; that certificate is issued for the purpose of being shown to third persons for the purpose of carrying to third persons, who wish to deal with the subject-matter embraced in the certificate, an assurance from those persons that the vessel is in a particular condition. [COCKBURN, C.J.—You put it on the principle of misrepresentation?] Yes; a misrepresentation negligently made, and a misrepresentation intended to be communicated to the persons who were to deal with the vessel. In other words, what is the purpose for which a vessel is surveyed for classification at Lloyd's, and what is to be done with the certificate of classification which is issued by Lloyd's? [COCKBURN, C.J.—You must go the length of basing your case upon a representation not intended to be fraudulent, but which arises out of negligence. You must put it on misrepresentation, because the plaintiff was not a member of the body; he does not pay his money and entitle himself in that way. He takes this as a general publication to all mankind, so that there is no contract at all as between him and the defendants.] It is upon a misrepresentation in a matter which the defendants intended should be communicated to anybody that chooses to contract, and it is like an advertisement offering a reward to anybody that chose to make himself a party to it. Perhaps the nearest analogy I can place it upon is one on which Lord Cairns decided the case in relation to letters of credit. Long ago it was an admitted principle at common law, that if A. wrote to B. saying, "You may draw bills upon me, and I will honour them," a third person could not maintain an action on the ground that the contract was between A. and B.; but as it was intended that the contract between A. and B. should be shown to third persons, it was held in equity that this was really a representation made to a third person, and that the third person had a right to complain if the plaintiff did not make good the promise or representation which he had made to B., because it is something intended to be shown to the world at large, for anyone to act upon. I cannot put the principle better than by referring to the judgment given in the Court of Chancery in the case of Re Agra and Masterman's Bank (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 162; L. Rep. 2 Ch. 391). I quote this judgment, because, as I said, this is a case of prima impressionis, and I can quote no direct authority upon it, but it is on an analogous class of case. In that case a bank gave to D. T. and Co. a letter addressed to them, and expressed thus: "No. 394. You are hereby authorised to draw upon this bank to the extent of 15,000*l.*, and such drafts I undertake duly to honour on presentation. This credit will remain in force twelve months from its date, and parties negotiating bills under it are requested to indorse particulars on the back hereof." D. T. and Co. drew bills under this letter to the amount of 6000*l.*, and indorsed them to the appellant, who duly indorsed particulars on the letter of credit. The bank was afterwards ordered to be wound-up, and D. T. and Co. were indebted to the bank to an amount exceeding what was due on the bills. The court there held that the letter of credit constituted a contract to the benefit of which all persons taking and paying for bills on the faith of it were entitled in equity; and Turner, L.J. says: "The whole effect of the letter is, that the Agra Bank held out to the persons negotiating the bills a promise that it would pay the bills; and it would be impossible, according to my view of the doctrines of courts of equity, to allow the bank, after having sent that letter into the world, addressed to the persons who were to negotiate the bills, and so held out to them that whether this case is distinguishable from Derry v. Peek (61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 265; 14 App. Cas. 337), which decided that if you are bringing an action of deceit you must prove actual fraud. If the action in the present case is an action of deceit, then I must fail according to Derry v.

it would be answerable for their payment, to say that because there was a debt due to it from the person to whom it had given the letter of credit, therefore it would not pay the bills;" and Cairns, L.J. said: "The letter is in form addressed to D. T. and Co., but it is evident that it is written to D. T. and Co. in order that it may be shown by them to those who were to take the bills drawn on the Agra Bank; that it is intended by the writers to be used as an inducement to make persons take those bills; and that the bills were to be taken by such persons 'under' the letter, that is, upon the faith and under the protection and security of the letter. It is a general invitation issued by the Agra Bank, through D. T. and Co., to all persons to whom the letter may be shown, to take bills drawn by D. T. and Co. on the Agra Bank, with reference to the letter, and to alter their position by paying for such bills, with an assurance that, if they or any of them will do so, the Agra Bank will accept such bills on presentation. If it be necessary to determine the question of the legal liability of the Agra Bank, I am of opinion that, upon the offer in this letter being accepted and acted on by the Asiatic Banking Corporation, there was constituted a valid and binding legal contract against the Agra Bank in favour of the Asiatic Banking Corporation. The cases as to the offer of rewards, of which the case of Williams v. Carwardine (4 B. & Ad. 621) is an example, followed by the somewhat analogous cases of Denton v. Great Northern Railway Company (5 E. & B. 860), Warlow v. Harrison (1 E. & E. 295, 309), and Scott v. Pilkington (2 B. & S. 11), appear to me to be sufficient authority to show that there may be privity of contract in such a case; and if the view be adopted which appears to have been taken in the American courts, that the holder of the letter of credit is the agent of the writer for the purpose of entering into such a contract, the same result would be arrived at by a different road." Applying that to the present case, if the defendants say, "We did not give this certificate to you," the answer of the plaintiff is, "No, you gave it to my vendor and made him your agent for showing it to me." Here is a representation of the condition of the vessel, and it is the defendants' own act. Their business is to survey vessels, and of course the body of members do not survey them, but they survey them by their officers. I am arguing that the issuing of the certificate is a representation not founded upon fact, and a representation made for reward, which renders the defendants liable. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The company make the representation, but it is on the strength of the survey made by their officers. It is not the officer who makes the survey who gives the certificate. That being so, as my brother Mellor was asking, how are the company, whose chairman Mr. Chapman is, who signs the certificate, to be held liable for a survey made by their officers which they have no reason to doubt the accuracy of?] Simply because any principal is liable for the act of his agent in performance of the duties that are imposed upon him, and for which the principal receives payment. [COCKBURN, C.J.—But you are founding your cause of action upon misrepresentation. Now, misrepresentation is actionable only when it is either fraudulent, or made without any knowledge sufficient to satisfy a reasonable man of the accuracy of the statement he is making. Is there anything here which would justify the assertion that this company, acting through their chairman, were negligently giving a certificate where they had employed competent officers, and had no reason to doubt the accuracy of the report which those competent officers had made? It is said they were employed for reward and that fees are to be paid by the party, but the fees are not to be paid for getting this certificate, but for registering the ship. The fees were paid by Mr. Peters, the owner of the vessel, who was enabled through this certificate to sell the ship. Mr. Peters might have a cause of action arising out of the contract, I do not say he had not; but there is no contract here. You must decide this case upon the principles which are applicable to misrepresentation. It is not disputed that the officers were competent officers, they being the officers usually employed by the company, and the chairman in the ordinary course of business, upon seeing this report made by the competent officers ordinarily employed, gave the certificate. Where is the negligence? There may be negligence in the officers who made the survey, but how can it be said there was misrepresentation in the chairman in giving a certificate which any other man in his situation would have done?] No doubt, but he would have done it at the risk of his company. [COCKBURN, C.J.—That is to say, if there is any contract. I agree that he is bound by the act of his agent if the plaintiff had any contract out of which this obligation would have arisen; but that is not so. A man comes to me for the character of a subordinate servant. I know nothing of that servant individually; perhaps I have never seen him. I apply to the head man of the establishment, the butler or some other person, and say that person has been so many months in my service, "has he discharged his duties properly?" I get an answer which I have no reason to doubt, and give the character of the servant accordingly. Am I responsible?] That is gratuitous; you do not receive reward, you are not paid for inquiring into the subject. [COCKBURN, C.J.—That appears to me exactly this case. Here it is gratuitous so far as the plaintiff is concerned; the plaintiff never paid a shilling.] True, but Mr. Peters, who paid for this certificate, is furnished with it by the company for the purpose of its being shown by Mr. Peters to the purchaser. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Mr. Peters has been enabled to take the plaintiff in, unintentionally of course, but he sells the vessel as a vessel entitled to the first class when it is not. He thereby sells the vessel at a higher price than it is worth; but when your client wants to be reimbursed, not by Mr. Peters, but by the company, we must see that we apply the principles that are applicable, not to a case of contract, but to a case of misrepresentation.] I do not pretend that there is any contract between the plaintiff and the defendants further than this—that the assignment by Mr. Peters to the plaintiff as a sort of equitable assignment by a certificate, which, with the consent of the defendants, was to be communicated gives a right of action. I cannot as against the defendants allege that they intentionally deceived. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Nor do I see where their negligence is. They have employed a competent officer, who in this instance has made a negligent survey. Are they, in a case where they have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the statement, and where they have employed competent people who sign a report and have given their views in the ordinary course of business—are they to be made responsible for what is not negligence in them?] I can put the case upon no other ground than that of misrepresentation.

W. Williams, Q.C. for the defendants.—I only wish to make one observation. It is not really admitted by the defendants that there is any negligence at all, and in the case negligence is only admitted hypothetically because it would have involved a long and expensive inquiry, which, upon this preliminary point, in the nature of a demurrer, was necessary. [MELLOR, J.—It is only put in for the purpose of the argument?] Yes. There is a judge's order that this might be treated as a demurrer; but it is bonâ fide disputed by the defendants that they are guilty of any negligence at all.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think the action cannot be maintained. It is clear that there is no contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, and no obligation arises. The utmost that can be said on the part of the plaintiff is, that there has been misrepresentation. That is not enough. You must have proof of a misrepresentation of a fraudulent character, as being made contrary to knowledge, or, at all events, without knowledge. Here the defendants have done all they could; they have caused a survey to be made, and a report has been made by the officer they employed, who was a person competent in the matter in question. There is no dispute as to that, and the defendants, in the ordinary course of business, through their chairman, gave the usual certificate. Assuming, for the purpose of the argument, there was negligence on the part of the person employed to Peek (ubi sup.), inasmuch as here it is not contended that there was any actual fraud on the part of the defendants. That principle, however, does not apply, but I base my claim upon this ground, that the defendants have taken upon themselves a duty to the public, that is, to the ship-buying public, have undertaken a duty which they have negligently performed, and for the negligent performance of that duty they are liable in damages to any person who buys a ship upon the faith of their representation as to the classification and character of that ship. The defendants are bound by the act of their servants or officers in making that survey and classification, and a breach of duty by such servants or officers is a breach of duty by the defendants themselves, for which the defendants would be liable. The thing we are complaining of here is a thing about which no mistake could be made. [WILLS, J.—What relation do the defendants establish between themselves and the person who buys a ship, which imposes upon them a legal duty that they should be accurate or right in their survey and classification of the ship?] The defendants are responsible for the acts of their servants, and this negligent survey having been made by their servants, it is the same as if it had been done by themselves; and if the survey had been made by the defendants themselves, they must have seen the inaccuracy of the report and the defects in the yacht, so that this inaccuracy of the report and classification must have been within their own knowledge, and therefore they would have been responsible. They having brought into existence something which other people were sure to use, namely, their report as to the character of this vessel, were absolutely bound to see that that thing did fulfil the character which they represented it to be. In Derry v. Peek (ubi sup.) Lord Herschell said (14 App. Cas., at p. 360: "There is another class of actions which I must refer to also for the purpose of putting it aside. I mean those cases where a person within whose special province it lay to know a particular fact, has given an erroneous answer to an inquiry made with regard to it by a person desirous of ascertaining the fact for the purpose of determining his course accordingly, and has been held bound to make good the assurance he has given. . . . In cases like this it has been said that the circumstance that the answer was honestly made in the belief that it was true affords no defence to the action. Lord Selborne pointed out in Brownlie v. Campbell (5 App. Cas., at p. 935) that these cases were in an altogether different category from actions to recover damages for false representation, such as we are now dealing with." So in Slim v. Croucher (1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 396; 29 L. J. 273, Ch.) the effect of the decision was, that if the person making the representation knows or ought to know the existence of a certain state of things, then he cannot get out of liability by saying that he has forgotten the circumstances. In that case Lord Campbell, L.C. said, "If a man made a representation as to what he ought to have known or did at one time know, he must make it good." What has occurred in this case is, that the defendants either knew or ought to have known of the defective state of the yacht and the inaccuracy in the report, and so they cannot now turn round and say they did not know of it. [WILLS, J.—What is the meaning of the words in the certificate "built under special survey"?] We allege that it is not the fact that the yacht was built under special survey. If there were no officer at all of the society present at the survey or the building, then that is a matter which ought to be known to the defendants, and the statement of that fact in the certificate would render the defendants liable:

Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. 470;
Brownlie v. Campbell, 5 App. Cas., at p. 938.

In this case it was within the knowledge of Lloyd's whether the ship was properly built or not, and they have undertaken a duty to the plaintiff, as one of the public, that this yacht corresponded with and in fact was what their certificate represented it to be, and for the breach of that duty they are liable to the plaintiffs.

Cohen, Q.C. in reply. [DENMAN, J.—The only thing that at all impresses us in favour of the plaintiff is the statement in the certificate of the fact that this yacht was built under special survey.] [He was stopped in his reply as to that part of the case.]

DENMAN, J.—This is a case really, so far as the reported cases are concerned, of first impression; but Mr. Cohen has been able to call our attention to a case which in substance is on all-fours, and it is a case that is entitled to considerable weight, even although it is only reported in the Shipping Gazette, and not in the ordinary reports, because it anticipates the actual law as laid down in the accurate manner it is in Derry v. Peek (ubi sup.), and both sides here agree that it is in accordance with Derry v. Peek (ubi sup.), so far as the liability in cases of this sort is concerned. Mr. Aspinall has ably endeavoured to distinguish that case, but according to my view he has failed really to distinguish it. It is well, however, to call attention to the particular nature of this case. The admitted facts of the case show that Lloyd's—to use the most convenient expression—is a society which is associated together for the purpose of obtaining a faithful and accurate classification of the shipping of the United Kingdom. Then the statement of claim says that they by their surveyors survey ships, and it goes on to state the mode in which the thing is done; it says that the committee make charges to the owners of ships, and then it goes on with this statement: "The said certificate and register are and are intended by the defendants to be acted upon by the owners, and through such owners by others dealing with such ships as truly representing the character and strength of such ships." I think that the fallacy of the argument in favour of the plaintiff really turns upon the assumption that that is a statement of

make the survey, there is no negligence on the part of the company, nor any misrepresentation contrary to their knowledge of the fact, nor a misrepresentation that was not justified by the circumstances that were brought to their minds. Therefore I think that the action, as founded upon misrepresentation, will not lie.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion, for the reasons given by my Lord. Mr. Benjamin can only argue the case upon the ground of misrepresentation, which under the circumstances of the present case does not give a right of action. Therefore, I think, our judgment should be for the defendants.

fact made and triable in the cause, whereas in real truth, when one looks at the whole of the statement of claim, that is, in my view, an assumption or inference which is drawn from the state of things which is set forth in the whole of the statement of claim; and it is upon that very view which occurred to me in the course of the argument that the inability to make out a good case on behalf of the plaintiff here rests. Mr. Cohen has just pointed out the distinction between this case and the cases in equity, some of them old cases, which were relied upon by Mr. Aspinall. Those are cases in which the parties complaining of the defendants were parties who had a right to go to the defendants and say, "You have misled me. There was a privity between us; there was a duty towards me because you undertook a duty towards me, and as between me and you." That is not so in this case. This is a case of a certain person who, because there had been at a certain time a certificate given, merely by alleging negligence contends that he has a good cause of action. The plaintiff cannot have a good cause of action unless he brings the case within the decision in Derry v. Peek (ubi sup.), or within the exception to that case; and the exception to that case is the very exception which I have just alluded to. Otherwise the action is one which is brought merely for an honest misrepresentation without any fraud of a third party, between whom and the plaintiff there is no privity at all. The plaintiff has no right to do that according to Derry v. Peek (ubi sup.), and according to the case to which our attention has been called, namely, the case reported in the Shipping Gazette, of Braginton v. Chapman and others (Trustees of Lloyd's Register); The Midas.

The plaintiff was obviously in a very great difficulty as to how to state his case, and that is very well indicated by the repetition in the course of the statement of claim more than once, as though it were quite uncertain which, if either, he could rely upon, of the words, "represented or in the alternative warranted." Now, there was no representation to the plaintiff; that is certain. There was no fraudulent representation; that also is certain. There was a statement which may have been negligent on the part, at all events, of the persons who made it. That is possible enough; but there certainly was no warranty. It would be impossible, I think, and would be contrary to one's notions of the real relations between parties such as the plaintiff and the defendants here, to suppose that there was any warranty intended. It would be, to my mind, almost as great a stretch as to say that if in a public directory there was a statement of an address of a firm which was inaccurate, and which by reasonable diligence might have been made more accurate—if in that sense there was a negligent statement of the address—that then any one of the public who was induced to give credit to that firm, or who had to pay a very large extra sum for a journey to go to that place to do business with that firm, would have a cause of action against the proprietors of the directory for that statement. It is an assumption and an inference which I think is not warranted by any real solid relation between the parties. It assumes that in that sense, and for all purposes, these certificates when given are intended to be acted upon by all the world, and that that gives a right against Lloyd's, who do their best perhaps, and who sometimes make mistakes in so difficult a matter as the classification of ships. I think that the case of Braginton v. Chapman (ubi sup.) is really in point; that Mr. Aspinall has failed to distinguish it, and that we are bound by that decision, a decision of the Queen's Bench Division, consisting of Cockburn, C.J. and my brother Mellor. I think that case is clearly in point, and that upon that ground alone our judgment ought to be for the defendants.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that the equitable cases quoted are distinguishable, and inasmuch as there is a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, which is exactly in point, unless some distinction can be made, I think we are bound by it; but I do not mean to limit myself to that, because I think that decision was right.

THE NEW PELTON. (a)

Collision—River Thames—Vessel crossing and turning in river—Steam-whistle signals—Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, arts. 17, 18, 24, 25.

A steamship turning round in the Thames is bound to give the four-blast signal on or before commencing to do so, in obedience to art. 18 of the Thames Rules and Bye-laws 1887, and it is not enough for her merely to blow three blasts when as part of the manœuvre of turning she reverses her engines.

THIS was a collision action instituted by the owners of the steamship Plover against the owners of the steamship New Pelton, to recover compensation for damage caused by a collision between the two vessels.

The collision occurred in Gravesend Reach of the river Thames at about 3 p. m. on Feb. 9, 1891. The weather was fine and clear, the wind easterly, and the tide first quarter ebb.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—At about 3 p.m. on Feb. 9, 1891, the Plover, a screw-steamship of 361 tons register, and manned by a crew of nineteen hands all told, was at anchor in Gravesend Reach. She was lying inside the buoys off the Custom-house, and in order to proceed down the river, she being bound to Newcastle in ballast, tripped her anchor, set her engines on easy ahead and put her helm hard-a-port. After she had got partly athwart the river, with her head angling still up stream but towards the north shore, those on board of her saw the steamship New Pelton coming down the river distant about a mile, and bearing about two points on the port bow. Shortly after this the

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Plover's engines were put astern to assist her in getting head down river, and her whistle was blown three short blasts, as a warning to the New Pelton that the Plover was reversing her engines. The New Pelton continued to come on heading for the Plover, and although her whistle was again sounded three short blasts, the New Pelton with her stem struck the Plover on her port side.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—At the time in question the New Pelton, a steamship of 470 tons register, manned by a crew of sixteen hands all told, was proceeding down the river Thames in water ballast on a voyage to Newcastle. She was in about mid-channel of Gravesend Reach, and was making about three knots an hour through the water. In these circumstances those on board of her saw the steamship Plover distant from half to two-thirds of a mile, and bearing about one and a half points on the starboard bow. The Plover was to the southward of the mooring buoys off the Custom-house, and was heading up river. Shortly afterwards the engines of the New Pelton were stopped, for two sailing barges which were standing across her course. The Plover was then seen to be angling towards the north shore, and to be crossing the river as if under a port helm. The engines of the New Pelton were at once put full speed astern, her whistle was blown three short blasts, and her helm put hard-a-starboard. The Plover however continued to manœuvre in order to get head down stream, and with her port side between the fore-rigging and bridge struck the stem of the New Pelton.

The plaintiffs alleged that the time from the Plover commencing to cross the river to the collision was fifteen minutes; the defendants alleged that it was only three or four. The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with breach of arts. 18 and 24 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames of 1880 and 1887 respectively.

Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames:

Art. 17. When two steamships are in sight of one another and are approaching with risk of collision, the following steam signals shall be intimations of the course they intend to take: (c.) Three short blasts of a steam-whistle, each about three seconds duration, shall mean, I am reversing my engines.

Art. 18. When a steam-vessel is turning round, or for any reason is not under command, and cannot get out of the way of an approaching vessel, or when it is unsafe or impracticable for a steam-vessel to keep out of the way of a sailing vessel, she shall signify the same by four or more blasts of the steam-whistle in rapid succession, the blasts to be of about three seconds duration.

Art. 24. Steam-vessels crossing from one side of the river towards the other side, shall keep out of the way of vessels navigating up and down the river

Art. 25. Where, by the above rules, one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

Sir Charles Hall, Q.C. (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the plaintiffs.—The operation of getting across the river had occupied fifteen minutes at the time when the collision occurred. Hence, those on board the New Pelton had ample time to have seen what the Plover was doing. By art. 17 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, a steam-vessel is required to give three blasts when she is reversing her engines; this the Plover did, and if so, she has not infringed the rules as to whistling.

Barnes, Q.C. and L. E. Pyke, for the defendants, contrâ.—The manœuvre of crossing the river by the Plover was sudden and unexpected. She ought to have signified her intention by four blasts in obedience to art. 18. At the time of the collision she was crossing, and is therefore to blame for not keeping out of the way of the New Pelton:

Cur. adv. vult.

May 7.—JEUNE, J.—It seems to me that this case depends upon the length of time during which the Plover was engaged in turning round. The question is one of fact and nautical experience. According to the evidence of the Plover's master, some fifteen minutes elapsed during which she was occupied in getting across the river, and into the position in which she was at the time of the collision. On the other hand the witnesses from the New Pelton say, that only three or four minutes were occupied by the Plover in getting athwart the stream; that is to say, from being in a position in which she was practically stationary opposite the buoys, to being in a position in which she was practically stationary athwart the river. On this the Trinity Masters attach very great importance to the evidence of the mate of the harbour master's launch, who they think is a person whose duty it would be to see what was going on in the river, and according to his evidence the shorter and not the longer time was occupied by the Plover. I have asked the Trinity Masters the practical question, what time would a vessel take to execute the manœuvre which the Plover was intending to execute. They tell me that something like two or three, or at the outside four minutes would be the length of time a vessel in the position of the Plover would take in assuming the position she was in at the time of the collision. I notice that, in The River Derwent (ubi sup.), the Court of Appeal treated a similar question as one for the nautical assessors. I therefore think that the shorter and not the longer time is the truth. Now, if only some three or four minutes were occupied from the time when the Plover begun to cant till the collision, it follows that the New Pelton could only have been something like a quarter of a mile off before the collision took place. The Trinity Masters tell me that, long before the Plover had assumed the position which she ultimately did, the New Pelton was well in sight, and that the Plover might have seen her coming down the river a considerable time before she began to cant out into the stream.

Now as to the conduct of those on the Plover: In the first place, it is said that there was not a proper look-out. The master of the Plover admits that, if he had seen the New Pelton before he began to cant, he would not have gone outside the buoys, but would have waited for the New Pelton to pass. He said he saw nothing, and that nothing was reported as coming down the river when he began to cant. Having regard to my above finding of fact, I think that those on the Plover might have seen the New Pelton in sufficient time to have adopted the course which the master says he would have adopted if he had seen her. It is also clear that the Plover never gave the four-blast but only the three-blast signal, and then only when she was finally going astern. It appears to me clear on authority, and on the very words of the rule itself, that she was bound to give the four-blast signal in proper time to avoid the possibility of collision. In The River Derwent (ubi sup.) the Master of the Rolls says that a vessel should give such a signal under such circumstances, and that the River Derwent broke the rule by not giving the signal indicating that she was about to cross. The President in that case went a little further, for he says in his judgment that "some signal is required from a vessel beginning to turn." If that is so, the Plover ought to have given that signal before she executed the manœuvre which ended in the collison. It is said, however, as it was in The River Derwent (ubi sup.), that there are two answers to that: first, that the New Pelton would not have heard the four-blast signal, as she did not hear the three blasts. It is further said that the New Pelton could have seen the Plover executing the manœuvre, and therefore did not require the four-blast signal. With regard to the first point, I have come to the conclusion that the three-blast signal was given when the Plover was finally going astern, which would be a minute and a half to two minutes before the collision. I think this was the blast which the New Pelton heard, and that the second set of three blasts was only given in the agony of the collision, and probably the New Pelton did not hear it. As to the other point, I think that it is disposed of by the conclusion I have arrived at as to the time occupied by the Plover's manœuvre. In my view the New Pelton could not tell till too late that the Plover was going to place herself across the stream. It appears to me that the very object of a four-blast signal is to give notice in due time that a manœuvre of this kind is going to be executed. It is said further that the Plover made a mistake at the last moment by going astern and not going ahead. The Trinity Masters take that view. They think that it would have been safer to have gone ahead, that there was room to have done so, and that if she had not gone astern the collision might not have occurred.

It now remains to consider the conduct of the New Pelton. Two charges are made against her. The first is, that she starboarded and so did not keep her course, thereby violating rule 25 of the Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames. This charge is not in terms made in the statement of claim, nor is any reference made to the rule. I doubt whether in these circumstances this charge, even if better founded than I think it is, should be allowed to be preferred, because it appears to me that reference should have been made to it at the earliest stage of the case, in order that the attention of the defendants might have been called to the matter, and opportunity given for tendering evidence in respect of it. But has it been proved that the New Pelton really did starboard? There is not much direct evidence on the point, but it is undoubtedly true that the New Pelton seems to have been at some time south of mid-channel, and it appears to be clear that the collision occurred north of mid-channel. It would seem by no means improbable that the New Pelton, having the choice on which side of the barge heading to the north she would go, chose the north rather than the south side, and starboarded to some extent. The view of the Trinity Masters is, that she did not starboard at all. The facts I have mentioned would rather lead me to the conclusion that she did starboard, probably very slightly and probably not more than might have been corrected by some slight after action of the helm, or perhaps not more than would be corrected by the reverse action of the engines. But the view of the Trinity Masters is very clear as to this, which is really the primary consideration, that even if the New Pelton did slightly starboard in order to avoid the barge by going to the north, that was a perfectly proper course for her to take, and that she had a right going down the river to go north of the barge instead of south, and that she ought not to be held liable for negligence on that account. It is to be observed that the manœuvre was executed not in reference to the Plover, but in reference to the barge. It was a proper manœuvre in regard to the barge, and the Trinity Masters are of opinion, in which I coincide, that there is not established against her any charge of negligence in starboarding, even if the fact of starboarding were held to be established. The New Pelton is also charged with not reversing her engines in due time. It was undoubtedly her duty to reverse as soon as it was seen that there would be a collision, and her master admits that, if he had known that the Plover was going to cant, he would have reversed sooner. That question is also decided by my conclusion as to the length of time occupied by the Plover in getting across the stream. If it were the short time spoken to by the witnesses from the New Pelton, there was no time for her to have avoided the collision, even if she had stopped her engines. I therefore hold that the Plover is alone to blame.

THE P. CALAND. (a)

Collision—Steamship—Accident to engines—"Not under command"—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 5.

A steamship which, owing to an accident to her engines, cannot reverse them as quickly as under ordinary circumstances, and may have to stop them suddenly, but is still capable of making three to four knots an hour through the water, and has good steering power, is not out of command within the meaning of art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and is therefore not justified in hoisting three red lights.

THIS was a collision action instituted by the owners of the British steamship Glamorgan against the owners of the Dutch steamship P. Caland. The defendants counter-claimed.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The collision occurred between the two vessels in the Straits of Dover on the night of the 15th April 1891, and in consequence thereof the Glamorgan sank.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 9.50 p.m., on 15th April 1891 the screw-steamship Glamorgan was about four or five miles from the South Foreland Light in the course of a voyage from Antwerp to Cardiff in water ballast. The wind was light from the south-west, the tide was about low water slack, and the weather fine but hazy. The Glamorgan was heading S.-W. by W. half W. magnetic, and was making about nine and a half knots an hour. Her regulation masthead and side lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. In these circumstances those on board the Glamorgan saw an unsteady white light about one point on the starboard bow, and from one and three-quarters to two miles distant. Shortly afterwards three red lights placed vertically were seen apparently on the vessel exhibiting the white light, which was then lost sight of. The Glamorgan's engines were thereupon eased to slow, and her helm was starboarded to give the other vessel (which proved to be the P. Caland) a wide berth. But when the three red lights bore about five points on the starboard bow of the Glamorgan the loom of the P. Caland was made out about two hundred yards off, and at the same time her red side light came into view, showing that she was coming ahead so as to cause risk of collision. The helm of the Glamorgan was at once hard-a-starboarded, two short blasts were sounded on her steam-whistle, and her engines were put full speed ahead as the only means of avoiding a collision. But the P. Caland came on fast, and with her stem struck the starboard side of the Glamorgan, causing her to sink.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—At about 8.30 p.m. on the 15th April 1891 the P. Caland, a screw-steamship of 2584 tons gross, propelled by engines of 350 horse power nominal, manned by a crew of thirty-nine hands all told, and laden with a general cargo, was in the Straits of Dover on a voyage from New York to Amsterdam. She had passed the Varne Light at about 8 p.m. at a distance of one and a half miles, and was making about eleven knots an hour on a N.E. by E. course magnetic. In these circumstances an accident happened to the high-pressure cylinder, rendering it necessary to proceed at a diminished rate of speed, making it impossible to manœuvre rapidly with the engines, and also making it probable that the engines might have suddenly to be stopped for their own safety without orders from the deck. In these circumstances the vessel proceeded on her course at about three knots an hour, the low and high pressure cylinders being worked by hand, it not being thought safe to stop to repair the damage on account of the proximity of the Varne Shoal. The masthead light was taken down, and three red lights to signify that the vessel was "not under command" were substituted for it. The side lights were kept in their places. The starboard anchor was got ready to be let go when a sufficient offing from the Varne Shoal had been obtained, or if the engines stopped, as was probable, owing to the defect in them becoming rapidly worse. In about ten minutes time those on board the P. Caland saw the white light of the Glamorgan about half a point on the port bow and distant about three miles, and shortly afterwards the red light was made out on nearly the same bearing. The lights gradually broadened as they approached, but when about a quarter of a mile off the Glamorgan suddenly shut in her red and opened her green light, rendering a collision imminent. Orders were at once given to the engine-room to reverse full speed, and a long blast was blown on the steam-whistle. The order to the engines was obeyed as soon as their disabled condition would allow, but the Glamorgan still came on, and with her starboard side abaft the bridge caught the stem of the P. Caland. The screens of the P. Caland's side lights were hung on hinges and could be swung in or out from the bridge.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 5. (a) A ship, whether a steamship or a sailing ship, which from any accident is not under command, shall at night carry in the same position as the white light which steamships are required to carry, and if a steamship, in place of that light three red lights in globular lanterns, each not less than ten inches in diameter, in a vertical line one over the other, not less than three feet apart, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night, with a clear atmosphere, at a distance of at least two miles; and shall by day carry in a vertical line, one over the other, not less than three feet apart, in front of but not lower than her foremast head, three black balls or shapes, each two feet in diameter.

(b) A ship, whether a steamship or a sailing ship, employed in laying or picking up a telegraph cable, shall at night carry in the same position as the white light which steamships are required to carry, and if a steamship, in place of that light, three lights in globular lanterns, each not less than ten inches in diameter, in a vertical line, one over the other, not less than six feet apart; the highest and lowest of these lights shall be red, and the middle light shall be white, and they shall be of such a character that the red lights shall be visible at the same distance as the white light. By day she shall carry in a vertical line, one over the other, not less than six feet apart, in front of but not lower than her foremast head, three shapes, not less than two feet in diameter, of which the top and bottom shall be globular in shape and red in colour, and the middle one diamond in shape and white.

(c) The ships referred to in this article when not making any way through the water shall not carry the side lights, but when making way shall carry them.

(d) The lights and shapes required to be shown by this article are to be taken by other ships as signals that the ship showing them is not under command, and cannot therefore get out of the way.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Holman) for the plaintiffs.—The P. Caland is to blame for not showing her red side light when under way, and for exhibiting three red lights when she was under command. The exhibition of the three red lights misled the Glamorgan, and contributed to the collision. The accident to the cylinder only caused a diminution of the speed, and did not render her unmanageable.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him F. W. Raikes and Pritchard), for the defendants, contrà.—The red side light was in fact exhibited, and was not seen by the Glamorgan owing to bad look-out. The defendants did right in exhibiting the three red lights. There was no certainty that her engines might not stop at any moment, there was difficulty about reversing them, and all their manœuvres necessarily took longer than they usually do. In such circumstances, the P. Caland was not in an efficient state to keep out of the way of other vessels. If so, she was "not under command" within the meaning of art. 5 of the Regulations.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

JEUNE, J.—In this case the action is brought by the Glamorgan against the P Caland; there is a counter-claim by the defendants, and hence an inquiry into the conduct of both vessels. The Glamorgan, at the time in question, was going down Channel on a voyage from Antwerp to Cardiff. The P. Caland was coming up Channel, and after she had passed the Varne Light, the vessels being on almost opposite courses, the collision occurred. The main question as to the conduct of the P. Caland is, whether she was right in taking down her masthead light and hoisting three red lights in its place. It is a question about which I have very little doubt. According to the evidence from the P. Caland she passed the Varne Light about 8 p.m., passing it about a mile to a mile and a half off. She was then going full speed, which was eleven knots, though her engineer puts it a little less, and she was steering a course N.-E. by E. magnetic. At 8.15 the engineer found that there was something wrong with the high-pressure cylinder. It turned out that the nut which stops the backward and forward motion of a slide had got loose or had given way, so that the slide of the high-pressure cylinder was prolonged in one direction, which in time had the effect of stopping the action of the slide altogether and preventing any steam passing to the cylinder. The engineer informed the master that there was something wrong with the engines. The anchor was then ordered to be got ready, and the masthead light was taken down and three red lights were put up. The story of the P. Caland's witnesses is, that the side lights were kept out at the same time, a question upon which a great deal of difference exists, and upon which a good deal turns. Those on board the P. Caland saw the Glamorgan approaching about 8.30 p.m.; but from the time when the engines were found to have gone wrong, up to the time of the collision, which they put about 9 p.m., the engines continued to work. At 8.45 p.m., when the engineer saw the captain for the second time, the engines were still working, although working inadequately because the high-pressure cylinder was being worked only by hand, which is not an efficient way of working it. From that time both cylinders were worked by hand, which gave a somewhat better speed to the vessel, something like twenty revolutions being got out of the engines — fifty-six being the full amount, giving a speed which the engineer puts about three or four knots. I may also add that, even after the collision, and after the vessel had sustained the damage she did by it, the engines still appear to have been able to work, because they were used to clear her of the wreck, she having been fixed in the other vessel. In addition to that, they went on being worked for something like half an hour, till the vessel was brought to a standstill for the purpose of repairing her engines. For the purposes of the decision I am going to give, it does not appear to me very material whether the speed the vessel was able to attain was three or four knots or something more. A good deal of evidence has been given, and a good deal of argument addressed to me upon it, as to the actual speed of the P. Caland, and I am by no means sure that these are not considerations which, if I thought it necessary to go elaborately into them, might bring me to the conclusion that the P. Caland in putting her speed at three or four knots was not putting it somewhat under the mark—at any rate, during part of the time from when the Glamorgan was first seen up to the collision. If it were necessary to consider that matter I should have to deal with the question of the force of the blow and the indications which it presents. Were I to do so, I am inclined to think that there are considerations upon that head which would lead me to think that the P. Caland's speed was somewhat greater than her witnesses admit. Again, as to the place of collision, I cannot help thinking that the P. Caland puts the collision at a place considerably short of that at which it actually occurred, and thereby shows that her estimate of her own speed at three or four knots is an inadequate one. It is further to be remarked that, although it may be, when the engine was in its most disabled condition and working only with the auxiliary valve by hand on the high-pressure cylinder, a speed of only three or four knots was obtained; still some improvement was made upon that by working the low-pressure cylinder by means of the auxiliary valve. However, for this purpose I think it is sufficient to say that the speed maintained by the engines, even in their disabled condition, was three or four knots or something more.

If that is so, was the P. Caland justified in hoisting the signal of three red lights, supposing her to be, as I think she was, in perfect command of her rudder, because there is no doubt that she was able to steer perfectly well, and they say that she kept her course. It is not suggested that there was anything wrong with her steering apparatus, or that she had not sufficient way on her to enable her to steer. Therefore, there being, so far as steering power was concerned, no want of command, though there may have been some deterioration in her steaming power, can she be said to be "not under command" within the meaning of article 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea? One would think that the words "not under command" are words to which it is not very difficult to give a meaning. They appear to mean this, that the course cannot be properly controlled or directed. When we look into the article we find that there are two subsequent expressions which appear to throw light upon the matter. Sub-sect. (c) shows that it is not because a vessel is making way that she is necessarily under command, because it is assumed that a vessel may be not under command and justified in hoisting three red lights, and still may be making way and so have the obligation of carrying side lights. On the other hand, when you look at sub-sect. (d) you find that the expression "cannot therefore get out of the way" is used as explanatory, and, as I think, identical with that of not being "under command." Therefore a vessel not under command is a vessel which cannot get out of the way. It appears to me to follow that, if a vessel is in the position of being able to get out of the way, i.e., to direct her course so as to avoid perils and obstacles she may have to encounter, she cannot be said to be not under command. Dr. Raikes has argued, and justly argued, that because a vessel is capable of maintaining a high rate of speed it does not follow that she is under command. Certainly not. A vessel, like a runaway horse, may be not under command, although capable of exercising a considerable rate of speed; but it is equally true to say that, although the speed of a vessel may be deteriorated and not up to her full speed, it does not follow that she is necessarily not under command. All that in this case appears to me to have been the fact is, that the vessel was not able to exercise her full rate of speed, and probably not able to reverse as quickly as before; but still she had not so completely lost her power of motion or of reversing, and not at all her steering power, as to justify one in saying that she was not under command. My judgment therefore is, with regard to a vessel circumstanced as this vessel was, that she was still under command, and that she was therefore wrong in hoisting the three red lights. In this view the Trinity Masters concur. A question has been raised as to the hoisting of the three black balls, after a stop of four hours, when the vessel was going up the Dover Roads; but it appears to me that it does not carry the case any further, because that was after the vessel was disabled by the collision. Therefore I do not think it necessary to enter into the question whether she was justified then, though I do not say that she was, in using the signal corresponding to the night signal of three red lights. But I do hold that the exhibition of the three red lights was not right, and that not only was it extremely likely to mislead vessels approaching her, but that it did in fact mislead the Glamorgan, and, in my judgment contributed to the disaster which took place. [The learned Judge then dealt with the manœuvres of the Glamorgan and the exhibition of the P. Caland's red side light, and thus continued:] The one fact which appears to be absolutely clear and certain is this, that the Glamorgan starboarded considerably. If that is so, can it possibly be consistent with the story that she saw the red side light of the P. Caland? I do not think it can be. I think, if she had seen the red side light of the P. Caland, she never would adopted the course of starboarding, which they say she did. Therefore I think she did not see the red light of the P. Caland. Of course it may be said that she ought to have seen it, and then that brings me to the difficult conflict of evidence there is about the light of the P. Caland. I say conflict of evidence because, although it is perfectly true that the evidence from the Glamorgan is that she did not see the red side light, and the evidence from the P. Caland is positive that the light was there to be seen; still, inasmuch as the Glamorgan saw the three red lights quite well, and is positive she never saw the side light at all, I cannot help thinking that it is one of those cases where the assertions must be taken to be absolutely contradictory, and where, if the red light had been there to be seen, the Glamorgan must have seen it; and if they did not see it they are saying that which is inaccurate. Equally, if the P. Caland's people say the red light was there and it was not, they must be saying that which is not accurate to their knowledge.

I must do the best I can in these circumstances, and the conclusion to which I come is, that the light was not seen because for some reason or other it was not there to be seen. I purposely say for "some reason or other" because I am not bound to say, and find difficulty in saying, the exact cause which may for the time have prevented that light from being seen. I cannot help thinking that there is a very strong probability that that light was turned in for a time. I know they say that it was not so; but there is a strong probability that it was. The vessel beyond all question had hoisted three red lights, and meant very shortly to come to anchor. I cannot help thinking that it is extremely probable that, when she hoisted her three red lights and meant to come to anchor, she did that which she ought to have done when she did come to anchor, viz., bring her red light in; or, at any rate, may have prepared to bring it in by drawing the bolts back, so that when the ship rolled the red light got turned in, wholly or partially, and was so obscured. At any rate that is a possible explanation of the temporary obscuration of the light, so probable in view of what was going to happen, that I am forced to the conclusion that the red light of the P. Caland was turned in till the moment of collision, when it was seen by those on the Glamorgan. The conclusion therefore to which I have come is, that the red side light was not properly exhibited by the P. Caland, and that the Glamorgan was misled by seeing three vertical lights. I think it probable that she considered them stationary lights, that she acted accordingly, intending to pass close by the P. Caland for the purpose, perhaps, of rendering salvage if required; and it was because she was not stationary that the collision occurred. The conclusion which I come to, although the evidence is very contradictory, is that the P. Caland is alone to blame.

THE HERO. (a)

Jurisdiction—County Court—Admiralty action—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71)—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51)—County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43).

Sect. 74 of the County Courts Act 1888, which contains provisions as to the district within which actions are to be commenced, is not inconsistent with sect. 21 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and applies to County Court Admiralty actions; and hence a claim for demurrage in personam, under sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, is rightly instituted in the court within the district of which the defendants carry on business.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs in an action in personam, to recover damages for detention of the plaintiffs' steamship Hero.

The action was instituted under sect. 2, subsect. 1, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, on the Admiralty side of the Glamorganshire County Court holden at Cardiff. The Hero was not within this district when the action was instituted.

The defendants, Messrs. Watson, timber merchants, carrying on business at Cardiff, were the charterers of the s.s. Hero, and also consignees of a cargo of timber carried from Uleaborg to Cardiff, and there delivered to the defendants.

The plaintiffs, who were the Bristol Steam Navigation Company Limited, carrying on business at Bristol, claimed 66*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, being damages in the nature of demurrage for delay at the port of discharge.

At the hearing of the action, the learned County Court judge dismissed it for want of jurisdiction, on the ground that the plaintiffs did not reside within his district, nor was the Hero within it, at the time of the commencement of the proceedings.

The defendants, who had counter-claimed for damage to cargo, withdrew their counter-claim at the trial.

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71):

Sect. 21. Proceedings in an Admiralty cause shall be commenced (1) in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction within the district of which the vessel or property to which the cause relates is at the commencement of the proceedings; (2) if the foregoing rule be not applicable, then in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction in the district of which the owner of the vessel or property to which the cause relates, or his agent in England, resides; or, if such owner or agent does not reside within any such district, then in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction the district whereof is nearest to the place where such owner or agent resides.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51):

Sect. 1. This Act may be cited as the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, and shall be read and interpreted as one Act with the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868.

Sect. 2. Any County Court appointed or to be appointed to have Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto to try and determine the following causes: (1) As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship, and also as to any claim in tort in respect of goods carried in any ship, provided the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*

County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43):

Sect. 74. Except where by this Act it is otherwise provided, every action or matter may be commenced in the court within the district of which the defendant, or one of the defendants, shall dwell or carry on his business at the time of commencing the action or matter, or it may be commenced by leave of the judge or registrar in the court within the district of which the defendant, or one of the defendants, dwelt or carried on business at any time within six calendar months next before the time of commencement, or with the like leave in the court in the district of which the cause of action or claim wholly or in part arose.

Sect. 125. Where an Admiralty action has been heard in the court with the assistance of nautical assessors, Elder Brethren of the Trinity House shall be summoned to assist on the hearing of an appeal by the High Court if either party shall require the same, and the High Court shall be of opinion that the assistance of the Elder Brethren is necessary or desirable.

Abel Thomas, for the plaintiff, in support of the appeal.—The judge of the Cardiff County Court had jurisdiction to try and determine this action. By sect. 21, sub-sects. 1 and 2, the test of jurisdiction is the place where the vessel or property to which the cause relates is, or where the owner thereof resides at the commencement of the proceedings. In the present case the cargo which is the property to which the cause relates was landed at Cardiff, and its owners carry on business there. Apart from the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts, the judge had jurisdiction under sect. 74 of the County Courts Act 1888. By that section the district is determined by the residence or place of business of the defendant. The language of the section is general, and there is no reason why it should not apply to Admiralty actions. The Legislature had present to their minds the special provisions of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts of 1868 and 1869 when passing the County Courts Act 1888. This is shown by the provision in sect. 125 as to the attendance of nautical assessors on appeals to the Admiralty Court from County Courts.

L. E. Pyke, for the respondents, contrà.—The district in which County Court Admiralty actions are to be instituted is solely determined by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868. If so, the action has been instituted in the wrong court. The County Courts Act 1888 does not apply. The Legislature never intended to repeal the special provisions relating to County Court Admiralty actions. In the schedule to the Act of 1888 there is a list of provisions repealed by it. In this schedule the special provisions relating to County Court Admiralty actions do not appear. If so, the inference is that they are still in force. The provisions of sect. 74 of the Act of 1888, couched in general terms, do not repeal previous provisions of a special nature. The fact that the only reference to Admiralty matters is that as to nautical assessors shows that the Legislature did not intend to affect the special provisions of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts of 1868 and 1869.

THE PRESIDENT (Sir Charles Butt).—I am disposed to think that Admiralty jurisdiction was very little present, if at all, to the minds of the Legislature in passing the County Courts Act 1888, and I can quite understand the argument that that Act was never intended to apply to the Admiralty jurisdiction of the County Courts. But there are one or two sections in it which show that those who passed this Act were aware of the existence of Admiralty jurisdiction in County Courts. Being aware of that, they use plain and unqualified language in sect. 74, to the effect that every person having a claim or action may pursue it in the court within the jurisdiction of which the defendant resides. That being so, I am at a loss to see how we can possibly say that the plaintiffs had no right to proceed in the County Court at Cardiff, where the defendants reside. How can we say that the right, which appears to be given in very plain words, is not to be used because there is something in one or two earlier County Court Acts which, it is suggested, does not agree with it. I am of opinion, therefore, that, under sect. 74, the learned judge ought to have proceeded to hear and adjudicate upon this claim.

JEUNE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me primâ facie that, where you have general words in an Act of Parliament, they ought to be interpreted in the sense which they apparently bear, subject to this, that there may be in the Act other expressions which are inconsistent with it, or from which one is entitled to draw the inference that, though the language is general in its terms, it is not intended to have so wide an application. I inquired if there was anything in the Act of 1888 which was inconsistent with extending the operation of sect. 74 to Admiralty proceedings. Nothing of the kind has been pointed out, and I cannot see any reason why the general sections of the Act of 1888 are not to apply to all branches of County Court jurisdiction.

THE ORION. (a)

Collision—Trawlers—Pyrotechnic lights—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Order in Council, June 24, 1885.

Where a British trawler, while engaged in trawling at night, is being approached by another vessel, she need not show pyrotechnic lights under all circumstances, but only when the other vessel is approaching in such a way as to indicate risk of collision.

THIS was a collision action instituted in the County Court of Durham by the Hull Steam Fishing and Ice Company Limited against the owners of the German barque Orion, and thence transferred to the High Court.

The collision occurred between the plaintiffs' sailing trawler the Sir Garnet Wolseley and the Orion in the North Sea at about 5 a.m. on the 16th Jan. 1891.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—At about 5 a.m. on the 16th Jan. 1891 the Sir Garnet Wolseley, a trawler of 77 tons, manned by a crew of five hands all told, was fishing with her trawl down in the North Sea in company with the Red Cross Fleet. The wind was from the east with a choppy sea. The Sir Garnet Wolseley was heading about S.E. by S. with her helm lashed amidships, and was making about one and a half miles an hour. She carried one white light in a globular lantern on the port main cross-trees, and was supplied with red pyrotechnic lights. In these circumstances the third hand, who was in charge, saw the red light of a sailing vessel which proved to be the Orion, distant about a mile, and bearing about four points on the port bow, and apparently heading to pass astern of the Sir Garnet Wolseley. The Orion continued to approach, and when about one-third of a mile off her loom was seen, and shortly afterwards she shut in her red and opened her green light, causing danger of collision. The third hand thereupon burnt a flare, but seeing the Orion still continued to approach he called the master and burnt a second flare. On the master coming up he put the helm hard-a-port and let go the mizen sheet, but the Orion came on, and with the bluff of her starboard bow struck the port bow of the Sir Garnet Wolseley.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—At about 5 a.m. on the 16th Jan. 1891 the Orion, a barque of 519 tons register, manned by a crew of ten hands all told, and bound from London to Middlesbrough, was in the North Sea, steering N. by W. on the starboard tack, and making about two and a half knots an hour. In these circumstances those on board of her saw two fishing smacks on her port bow, the one being one to one and a half points on her port bow, the other, which was the Sir Garnet Wolseley, being two to two and a half points on the port bow. The Orion starboarded her helm and cleared the first smack, but collided with the Sir Garnet Wolseley. Both smacks were carrying a white light in a globular lantern, but the defendants charged the plaintiffs with failing to exhibit any red pyrotechnic lights.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea (by Order in Council dated the 24th June 1885):

Sailing vessels engaged in trawling and having their trawls in the water may carry a white light in a globular lanthorn of not less than eight inches in diameter and so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light all round the horizon and visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere for a distance of at least two miles; and also a sufficient supply of red pyrotechnic lights which shall each burn for at least thirty seconds, and shall when so burning be visible for the same distance under the same conditions as the white light. The white light shall be shown from sunset to sunrise, and one of the red pyrotechnic lights shall be shown on approaching or on being approached by another ship or vessel in sufficient time to prevent collision.

L. E. Pyke for the plaintiffs.—The Orion is alone to blame. She neglected, for no sufficient reason, to keep out of the way of the trawler. There was no duty on the trawler to show pyrotechnic lights until the Orion opened her green. Up to that time there was no reason to anticipate that the Orion would not take timely measures to keep clear of the Sir Garnet Wolseley.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, contrà.—The trawler failed to show the pyrotechnic lights in sufficient time to prevent collision. She ought not to have waited until collision was inevitable. Had she shown them earlier, the collision might have been avoided. If so, the plaintiffs have infringed the regulation, and are to blame.

JEUNE, J.—I have consulted with the Trinity Masters as to the questions raised in this case, and as to a very great part of them there can be, I think, no doubt whatever. The conduct of the Orion is a matter about which it is easy to come to a very clear conclusion. Taking her own story, she says she saw two smacks ahead of her, one about one to one and a half points on her port bow, the other two to two and a half, one being half to three-quarters of a mile from the other. The first smack she says exhibited several pyrotechnic lights. She starboarded and passed her close, and then proceeded to starboard and hard-a-starboard for the second smack, the result being that at the time of the collision she got her head round so much that the Sir Garnet Wolseley's head being about S., the head of the Orion was S.S.W. To do that she must have performed a great part of a semicircle, which conduct appears to the Trinity Masters and myself as little less than inexplicable. I think she was wrong in adopting that course. This brings me to what is really the one substantial con-troverted matter in the case. It is said that there was a breach of the regulations by the Sir Garnet Wolseley in more than one respect. The first is that, although she showed pyrotechnic lights at a certain time, she did not do so early enough, that therefore she committed a breach of a statutory regulation, and that in consequence of that breach it may be that the accident happened, or at least it is impossible to say that the breach did not in some way cause the collision. That gives rise to various considerations. First, one has to consider what is the meaning of the regulation as to showing pyrotechnic lights. The words are these: That a "white light shall be shown from sunset to sunrise, and one of the red pyrotechnic lights shall be shown on approaching or on being approached by another ship or vessel in sufficient time to prevent collision." That rule does not mean that under all circumstances, when a trawler and another vessel are approaching one another, it is necessary to show the pyrotechnic lights; but what it really means is that, when they are approaching one another under such circumstances that there exists a risk of collision, then there is thrown upon the trawler the duty of showing the pyrotechnic light, and of showing it in time to prevent collision. What happened in this case was, that when the green light was seen and not before the pyrotechnic light was shown. Mr. Aspinall says that the red light being continuously seen four points on the port bow of the smack, and the green five, shows that there was risk of collision, the ships getting nearer and nearer, and that the pyrotechnic lights ought to have been displayed during the time the red light was seen. That is an ingenious argument if the foundation is sound, but I doubt if it is. The witness says, not that the red light was seen continuously four points, neither more nor less; but he says that the red light got a little broader on the port bow, and when he comes to the green light, he puts it a whole point broader. But we think that the witness understated his case in this respect; we think it is impossible that her red light should not have got considerably broader as it came on, and not remained at four without alteration. It also appears to the Trinity Masters and myself that, until the green light was seen, circumstances did not arise which cast under the rule the obligation of showing the pyrotechnic lights on the smack. That is one sufficient answer; but I am by no means sure that there might not be found another answer. I am far from satisfied that, even if the pyrotechnic lights had been displayed while the Sir Garnet Wolseley saw the red light approaching, that she would have given the Orion any appreciable advantage or contributed in any way to prevent a collision. She knew the vessels were trawling, and knew from the direction of the wind substantially which way they were going, and she saw the white light all the time. I therefore greatly doubt that, if the pyrotechnic lights had been displayed at an earlier time, it would have given her any advantage. A further point was that, if the third hand instead of burning a flare as he did, lasting some sixty-eight seconds, and then calling the captain, should have put the helm hard-a-port, and let go the mizen sheet as the captain did when he came on deck. But the Trinity Masters are of opinion that the time was so short that, even supposing the man had had presence of mind to rush to the helm, put it hard up and let go the mizen sheet, it could have made no appreciable difference. I think, therefore, that the Orion is alone to blame for this collision, and I decree in favour of the Sir Garnet Wolseley with costs.

McCOWAN v. BAINE AND OTHERS; THE NIOBE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SECOND DIVISION OF THE COURT OF SESSION IN SCOTLAND.

Marine insurance—Collision clause—Construction—Ship in tow—Collision with tug.

A ship of the respondents was insured at and from the Clyde (in tow) to Cardiff and (or) Penarth, while there, and thence to Singapore, &c., and the policy contained a clause "if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured shall in consequence become liable to pay, and shall pay, to the persons interested in such other ship or vessel any sum or sums of money, &c.," then that the underwriters would repay such sum to the insured.

While the ship was being towed from the Clyde to Cardiff her tug came into collision with and did serious damage to another vessel, whose owners recovered damages both from the ship and the tug.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below, Lord Bramwell dissenting), that the collision was a collision within the meaning of the policy, and that the underwriters were liable.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland (the Lord Justice Clerk (Macdonald), Lord Young, Lord Rutherfurd Clark, and Lord Lee), who had affirmed a judgment of the Lord Ordinary (Trayner).

The case is reported in 17 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 1016.

The respondents, the owners of the Niobe, had effected a policy of marine insurance with the appellant, an underwriter. The policy contained the following clause, making the underwriters liable:

> If the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured shall, in consequence thereof, become liable to pay to the persons interested in such other ship or vessel, or in the freight thereof, or in the goods or effects on board thereof, any sum or sums of money, not exceeding the value of the ship hereby assured.

Whilst the Niobe was on her way to Cardiff in tow of the Flying Serpent, her tug came into collision with the Valetta, causing her serious damage, so that she afterwards sank. The Valetta, after colliding with the tug, also came into contact with the Niobe, but without receiving any further injury. In a suit before the Admiralty Court of England it was decided by Lord Hannen (then President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division) that the collision was due to the fault of the tug, which admitted liability, in not porting her helm in terms of the regulations, and that the Niobe was likewise to blame in respect of her failure to keep a look-out and to control and give proper orders to her tug: (The Niobe, 59 L. T. Rep, N. S. 257; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300; 13 P. Div. 55.) The respondents had in consequence paid 12,909*l.* to the owners of the Valetta, and they now sued one of the underwriters of the policy for his proportion of the sum, which they claimed by way of indemnity. The action was heard by Lord Trayner, and judgment was given for the owners of the Niobe, which was affirmed by the Second Division of the Court of Session. The underwriter appealed on the ground that, as no actual collision occurred between the Niobe and the Valetta, he was not liable.

Finlay, Q.C. and J. Walton appeared for the appellant, and contended that the collision was not within the policy, all the actual damage having been done by the tug. The contract should be construed according to the natural meaning of the language. The fact that the Niobe has been held liable in the action in the Admiralty Division in England is irrelevant, so are the cases as to the liability of a ship in tow. We do not dispute the liability of the Niobe for the damage caused, but we say that there was no "collision" such as the parties had in view when the policy was signed. They referred to

The Independence, 14 Moo. P. C. 103.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster, Q.C.), Barnes, Q.C., and Leck, for the respondents, maintained that the facts brought the case within the meaning of the policy, which must be taken to have been made with reference to the known principles of maritime law. "Collision" here means something different from actual contact, and the clause is intended to cover all liability arising from any collision for which the Niobe was in fault. The construction contended for by the appellant is too narrow. See

Marsden on Collisions, 2nd ed., p. 101;
The Sisters, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 122; 1 P. Div. 117;
The Wheatsheaf, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 292.

If a ship is negligently manœuvred so that, in order to avoid a collision, another ship is put into such a position that it sustains damage, this is damage from collision. The contract must be taken to have been made subject to this known liability, and it is too narrow a construction to restrict it to actual contact. Secondly, the tug is the servant of the ship, and the tug and tow must be considered as one. See

The Ticonderoga, Swa. Ad. 215.

Finlay, Q.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 27.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The Earl of Selborne.—My Lords: I cannot help thinking that, in construing such a mercantile contract as this, there is as much danger of error in extreme literalism as in too much latitude; and though I do not adopt the argument that a contract of indemnity against the consequences of collision can be extended to a case in which there has been no collision, but only damages caused by measures properly taken to avoid a collision, I think a construction which makes it cover all damages consequent upon an actual collision, for which the assured is liable, is more reasonable and more in accordance with the probable intention of the parties, if the words will bear it, than one which does not. In the present case the Valetta was sunk by an actual collision, for which the owners of the Niobe have been held liable. But the impact which caused the loss of the Valetta was not of the hull of the Niobe, but of the steam-tug Flying Serpent, which was towing the Niobe on a part of her insured voyage, described in the policy of insurance as "in tow from the Clyde to Cardiff or Penarth." The words of this contract are: "If the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured shall, in consequence thereof, become liable to pay to the persons interested in such other ship or vessel, or in the freight thereof, or in the goods or effects on board thereof, any sum or sums of money, not exceeding the value of the ship hereby assured." If a ship cannot be said to "come into collision with any other ship" except by direct contact, causing damage between the two hulls, including under the term hull all parts of a ship's structure, there was in this case no such contact, and the appellants ought to succeed. But I cannot adopt so narrow a construction of those words. I should hold them to extend to cases in which the injury was caused by the impact, not only of the hull of the ship insured, but of her boats or steam-launch, even if those accessories were not (as in this case) insured, as being, in effect, parts of the ship. I should also hold them to cover an indirect collision, through the impact of the ship insured upon another vessel or thing capable of doing damage, which might by such impact be driven against the ship suffering damage. I should take the same view, as against insurers in similar terms, of a tug towing one or more barges (in which case the barge-owners would not be liable for a collision) if damage to any vessel were caused by the barge or barges being driven against it through the improper navigation of the tug, although there might have been no impact of the tug itself upon the injured vessel. And, after full consideration, it seems to me to be no more than a reasonable extension of the same principles to include within them such a case as the present.

Where a ship in tow has control over, and is answerable for, the navigation of the tug, the two vessels—each physically attached to the other for a common operation, that of the voyage of the ship in tow, for which the tug supplies the motive power—have been said, by high authority, to be for many purposes properly regarded as one vessel. Lord Kingsdown's words in the case of The Independence (14 Moo. P. C. 103) were that the tug "may for many purposes be considered as a part of the ship to which she is attached," and he went on to repeat the reason given in the earlier judgment reported in the same volume (The Cleadon, 14 Moo. P. C. 92), to which he was also a party, where it was said: "The Cleadon being in tow of the tug, it is admitted she and the tug must be considered to be one ship, the motive power being in the tug and the governing power in the ship that was being towed." I think the Flying Serpent and the Niobe may be so regarded for the purpose now in question. The principle on which the Niobe has been held liable for the collision seems to me to go far towards that conclusion. That the Niobe should be in tow from the Clyde to Cardiff or Penarth was, in the present case, part of the contract. I think the construction ought to be the same, so far as relates to that voyage, as if the words in the margin had been "if the ship insured, while in tow between the Clyde and Cardiff or Penarth, shall come into collision with any other vessel," &c. If the contract had been so expressed, I should have thought it arbitrary and not reasonable to exclude a collision by the impact of the tug during that voyage upon another vessel, for the consequences of which the owners of the Niobe were liable. I am, for these reasons, of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from are right, and ought to be affirmed.

Lord Watson.—My Lords: The Niobe, a sailing ship belonging to the respondents, was covered by a policy of insurance "at and from the Clyde (in tow) to Cardiff and (or) Penarth, while there, and thence to Singapore, and while in port for thirty days after arrival." Provision was made for indemnities against liabilities arising from collision by a marginal clause, upon the construction of which the result of this appeal must depend. Whilst the Niobe was on her way to Cardiff in tow of the Flying Serpent her tug came into collision with the Valetta, causing her serious damage. The Valetta, after colliding with the tug, also came into contact with the Niobe, but without receiving any injury. In a suit before the Admiralty Court of England, it was decided by Lord Hannen that the collision was due to the fault of the tug in not porting her helm in terms of the regulations, and that the Niobe was likewise to blame in respect of her failure to keep a look-out, and to control the steerage of her tug: (The Niobe, 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 257; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300; 13 P. Div. 55.) The respondents have in consequence paid 12,909*l.* odd to the owners of the Valetta, and they now sue one of the underwriters of the policy for his proportion of the sum which they claim by way of indemnity. The legal liability of the Niobe, and the facts upon which it rests, as these were found by the President of the Admiralty Division, are matters of mutual admission in this case. Whether the collision between the Flying Serpent and the Valetta was a collision within the meaning of the marginal clause of the policy is the only subject-matter of controversy. The material part of the clause is in these terms: "And it is further agreed that, if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay, and shall pay, to the persons interested in such other ship or vessel, or in the freight thereof, or in the goods or effects on board thereof, any sum not exceeding the value of the ship hereby assured, we will severally pay the assured such proportion," &c. Then follows a stipulation that, in the same events, in cases where the liability of the ship has been contested with their consent in writing, the insurers will also pay a proportion of the expenses incurred or paid by the insured. Lastly there is a proviso to the effect that the clause shall not extend to any sum which the assured may become liable to pay or shall pay "in respect of loss of life or personal injury to individuals for any cause whatsoever." The clause is certainly not conceived in the terms in which one would have expected it to be if, as was argued, it was the intention of the parties to include in the indemnity all liabilities arising from collision which the Niobe could possibly incur. The condition which must be fulfilled before any obligation can attach to the underwriters is, "that the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with" another ship or vessel. These words in their literal sense import that there must be contact between the Niobe and such other ship or vessel, causing damage to the latter. There are many ways in which a ship under sail may, without being herself in collision, become liable to bear the whole damages resulting from a collision. Her unjustifiable manœuvre may occasion the colliding of two or more vessels, other than herself, without any blame on their part; and in that case the offending ship, and she alone, is responsible for the consequences of her fault. In such a case I should not be prepared to hold that the Niobe had, in the sense of the policy, "come into collision with" the vessels which she caused to collide, because there would be no ground in fact or law for the suggestion that the Niobe ought to be identified with any one of them. So far as I can discover, none of the learned judges of the Court of Session indicated an opinion that the clause was so expressed as to cover every kind of liability for collision. They based their decision upon a special rule of law, which, it is admitted, has no application except as between a ship and her tug. They held that the identity which that rule establishes between tow and tug is so complete that the Niobe herself must be considered to have come into collision with the Valetta within the meaning of the policy.

A sailing vessel and the steam-tug which has her in tow have frequently been described by eminent judges as, for certain purposes, constituting one ship—an expression which has been borrowed by text-writers, and is familiar to persons conversant with maritime law. The expression is figurative, and must not be strained beyond the meaning which the learned judges who have employed it intended that it should bear. As I understand their use of the expression, it signifies that the ship and her tug must be regarded as identical, in so far as the two vessels, with their connecting tackle, must be navigated as if they were one ship, and, the motive power being with the tug, must, in order to comply with the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, be steered and manœuvred as if they formed a single steamship; and also, in so far as the ship towed, when she has (as in this case) the control of the tug and the duty of directing the course of the tug in accordance with these regulations, is responsible for the natural consequences of the tug being wrongly steered through the neglect of her officers and crew to perform that duty. There was, therefore, a legal connection between the Niobe and the Flying Serpent which could not subsist between her and any other vessel which her fault might drive into collision with a stranger ship. The Niobe was in contemplation of the law one and the same ship with the Flying Serpent for all purposes of their joint navigation with a view to avoid the risk of collision, and the fault which led to a collision between that legal composite and the Valetta was admittedly the fault not only of the Flying Serpent but of the Niobe. I admit the force of the appellants' argument that contracts ought to be construed according to the primary and natural meaning of the language in which the contracting parties have chosen to express the terms of their mutual agreement. But there are exceptions to the rule. One of these is to be found in the case where the context affords an interpretation different from the ordinary meaning of the words; and another in the case where their conventional meaning is not the same as their legal meaning. In the latter case the meaning to be attributed to the words of the contract must depend upon the consideration whether, in making it, the parties had or had not the law in their contemplation. The point thus raised appears to me to be a very narrow one. But in this case the contracting parties are shipowners and underwriters, and the clause in question relates to possible legal liabilities of the ship insured, which are entirely dependent upon the rules of maritime law. In these circumstances I have, not without some hesitation, come to the conclusion that they must be presumed to have known the law, and to have contracted on the faith of it.

Lord Bramwell.—My Lords: In this case the facts are, that the Niobe was insured by the respondents with the appellants and others by a policy in the ordinary form, from the Clyde in tow to Cardiff or Penarth, and thence to Singapore. In the margin of the policy is this, I believe usual, clause: "And it is further agreed that, if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured, in consequence thereof, became liable to pay, and shall pay any money not exceeding the value of the ship hereby assured, we will severally pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of the same so paid as our respective subscriptions hereto bear to the value of the ship hereby assured, or if the value hereby declared amounts to a larger sum than to such declared value." What happened was this: The Niobe in tow of a tug proceeded on her voyage, and, by the negligence of the tug and of those navigating the Niobe, the tug came into collision with the Valetta, and sank her. There was a collision between the Niobe and the Valetta which may be disregarded, as it did no damage. In very fact, therefore, the ship has not come into collision with any other ship, and the insured paid something in consequence thereof. The insured (the respondents) have paid to the owners of the Valetta a large sum of money in consequence of the damage to her owing to the conjoint bad seamanship of the tug and the Niobe, and this is sought to be recovered in this suit. I say, then, in very fact the Niobe did not come into collision with the Valetta, causing a liability in the appellants, and, according to the ordinary primary meaning of the words used, the case is not within them. This is agreed. But it is said that for some reason the primary and natural meaning of the words is to be extended, and that we should hold that there was a collision where there was none. I am at a loss to see why. I think that an Act of Parliament, an agreement or other authoritative document, ought never to be dealt with in this way, unless for a cause amounting to a necessity, or approaching to it. It is to be remembered that the authors of the document could always have put in the necessary words if they had thought fit. If they did not, it was either because they thought of the matter and would not, or because they did not think of the matter. In neither case ought the court to do it. In the first case it would be to make a provision opposed to the intention of the framers of the document; in the other case, to make a provision not in the contemplation of those framers. Take this very case: Can anyone say, that if the insured had required the insurers to agree to be liable for a collision by the tug (and be it remembered that it is mentioned that the Niobe was to be towed to Cardiff), I say if such a requirement had been made, can anyone say that the insurers would have agreed to it without an increase of premium — a liability for any towing till the voyage to Singapore was ended? Suppose a suit to reform the document by making the insurers liable for collisions by the tug, could it have succeeded?

Let me examine the reasons given for adding to or altering the meaning of the words used. The Lord Ordinary says, if the collision clause is read in the strictest manner he would be of opinion that the defender is not liable, but he thinks that it admits of being read in a broader and more comprehensive sense. The superlative "strictest" is a difficult word to deal with. Is it to be read in a way not strict; if so, how far short of it? His Lordship gives his reasons; he says: "The risk they wished and had an interest to cover was liability arising from collision for which, as owners of that particular ship, they might be liable . . . that the defender knew they wished to cover it, and it may fairly be presumed that the clause was intended to cover that particular risk." I respectfully ask, where is the evidence that they wished to cover any risk of collision beyond what they have expressed, or that the defender knew that the pursuers so wished? I firmly believe that, if the truth were known, neither party had it in mind; and I repeat, I am by no means sure it would have been included for the same premium. The Lord Justice Clerk says: "In certain circumstances the vessel is looked upon as being part of the tug, and the real question here is, whether that view applies to such a case as this. I think it would have been far better if the policy had been more clearly expressed." With submission, that should be not "more clearly" but "differently" expressed. Nothing can be clearer than it is. It is said that to hold as I do is a "narrow construction." I respectfully deny it. I do not "construe" the words; I simply read them, as I should "twice two are four." If too narrow is wrong, so is too wide, which, to my mind, the construction (for it is a construction) which I object to is. His Lordship came to the conclusion for the pursuer not without hesitation. Lord Young says the collision was just the sort of collision, the possibility of which was contemplated by both sides. I should suppose, then, that he does not agree with the Lord Justice Clerk that it would have been far better if more clearly expressed. Lord Rutherfurd Clark doubts if the pursuer is right. Lord Lee agrees with the Lord Ordinary.

It is said that the Niobe was, in the contemplation of the law, one and the same ship with the Flying Serpent for all purposes of their joint navigation with a view to avoid the risk of collision. I respectfully deny it. I deny that it is an intendment of the law. Lord Kingsdown, a most distinguished lawyer, did once use the unfortunate metaphor (judges ought to be very careful about using such expressions) that "the tug may for many purposes be considered as a part of the ship to which she is attached." He says "for many purposes," not for all. He does not say that it is to be so considered that the plain words of a contract are to be misinterpreted. Had he foreseen what use would be made of his words he would not have used them. These two shall be one. And it is said that the parties to this suit knew all about this, and contracted on the footing of it. This seems to me to be a case (too common) in which there is a tendency to depart from the natural primary meaning of words, and add to or take from them, to hold that constructively words mean something different from what they say. It introduces uncertainty. No case is desperate when plain words may be disregarded. I deprecate this in all cases. In this particular one I believe it will be attended with at least this injustice, that the parties did not contemplate the case that has occurred, and perhaps would have raised the premium if they had. That they did not contemplate it I infer from the words they used. Ingenious cases were put in which there might be damage by collision with the Niobe without her touching the vessel damaged, as where she pushed an intermediate vessel against that damaged. I have no doubt that ingenuity might suggest many difficult cases. I content myself with dealing with the present, where the ship did not in any sense come into collision with any other ship and cause damage. I think the judgment should be reversed; but I suppose I must be in the wrong, because four judges of the Court of Session have held differently, and three of your Lordships, I know, will hold differently.

Lord MORRIS.—My Lords: In my opinion the contract must be construed as an insurance against risk or liability for payment by collision to be incurred by the Niobe while in tow. What the owners were bargaining for was indemnity against loss or payment which the Niobe might incur by being towed. I consider the tug part of the apparatus for moving the ship Niobe, and that a collision by the tug while so towing the Niobe was a collision of the Niobe within the meaning of the marginal clause of the policy; consequently, that the judgment of the Court of Session should be affirmed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, May 12, 1891.

Re AN ACTION PENDING IN SCOTLAND; BURCHARD AND OTHERS v. MACFARLANE AND OTHERS; Ex parte TINDALL AND DRYHURST. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice — Production of documents — Action in Scotland—Commission issued against persons in England not parties to the action—6 & 7 Vict. c. 82, s. 5.

An action having been brought in the Court of Session in Scotland with regard to the sale of a ship, a commission was issued, on the joint application of the pursuers and defenders, requiring the chairman and secretary of Lloyd's to appear before a commissioner in London and produce the documents in their control answering to certain general descriptions in specifications of documents given by the parties to the action. Under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 82, s. 5, an order was afterwards made at judges' chambers in the High Court of Justice here ordering the chairman and secretary to appear before the commissioner for examination as to the documents which Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping had in their possession answering the descriptions given in the specifications. This order was affirmed by the Queen's Bench Division.

Held (reversing this decision), that the production of documents which may be enforced under the statute is only ancillary to the examination of witnesses, and that the order here made being really one for the discovery of documents in the possession of third persons, not parties to the litigation, there was no jurisdiction to make it, and it must be reversed.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J. and Mathew, J.) affirming an order made by Wright, J. in chambers.

The action was brought in the Court of Session in Scotland for breach of a warranty of a ship called the Lady Octavia, sold by the defenders to the pursuers. At the request of both parties to the action, the Lord Ordinary granted a commission to examine certain witnesses, and granted diligence against the havers for recovery of the documents specified in the specifications of the pursuers and defenders, to certain commissioners to take the oaths and examinations of the havers resident in Germany, London, Glasgow, and Edinburgh respectively, and receive their exhibits and productions, and ordained "Mr. A. H. Tindall, chairman, and Mr. A. G. Dryhurst, secretary, of Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, to appear before the commissioner in London and produce any of the documents called for, so far as under their control."

The specification of documents called for by the pursuers was:

(1) All correspondence passing between the defenders

or Barr, their surveyor, or any person on their behalf on the one hand, and Emil Padderatz, surveyor at Hamburg to Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, or any one on his behalf on the other, relating to the condition of the vessel known as the Lady Octavia, or the surveys of the said vessel in 1889, and in July and October 1890, between 1st Jan. 1889 and the date of raising this action. (2) All correspondence between the said Emil Padderatz on the one hand and the London office of the said Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping or any of the officials of the said register relating to the said matters prior to the said date. (3) All reports obtained by, and all communications addressed to, the said Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping or any of the officials of the said register in reference to the said vessel during the years 1889 and 1890. (4) Failing principals, copies, drafts, scrolls, or jottings, of any of the above documents are called for.

The specification of documents called for by the defenders was:

All correspondence passing between the pursuers or any one on their behalf on the one hand, and Lloyd's, or Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, or W. H. Tindall, the chairman, and A. G. Dryhurst, the secretary, or any one on behalf of or as representing Lloyd's, or Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, on the other hand, relating to the vessel referred to on record as the Lady Octavia between 1st May 1890, and the date of raising the present action.

A copy of the interlocutor was duly served, and the commissioner cited Mr. Tindall and Mr. Dryhurst "to attend to produce the documents mentioned in the specifications served upon you, and give your oath and examination respecting the same on behalf of the pursuers."

Mr. Tindall and Mr. Dryhurst having refused to attend, a summons was taken out at judges' chambers under the provisions of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 82, s. 5.

By that statute it is provided as follows:

And whereas there are at present no means of compelling the attendance of persons to be examined under any commission for the examination of witnesses issued by the courts of law and equity in England or Ireland, or by the courts of law in Scotland, to be executed in a part of the realm subject to different laws from that in which such commissions are issued, and great inconvenience may arise by reason thereof: Be it therefore enacted that, if any person, after being served with a written notice to attend any commissioner or commissioners appointed to execute any such commission for the examination of witnesses as aforesaid (such notice being signed by the commissioner or commissioners, and specifying the time and place of attendance), shall refuse or fail to appear and be examined under such commission, such refusal or failure to appear shall be certified by such commissioner or commissioners, and it shall thereupon be competent to or on behalf of any party suing out such commission to apply to any of the superior courts of law in that part of the kingdom within which such commission is to be executed, or any one of the judges of such courts, for a rule or order to compel the person or persons so failing as aforesaid to appear before such commissioner or commissioners and to be examined under such commission; and it shall be lawful for the court, or a judge to whom such application shall be made, by rule or order to command the attendance and examination of any person to be named, or the production of any writings or documents to be mentioned in such rule or order.

Wright, J. thereupon made an order at chambers that Messrs. Tindall and Dryhurst should attend before the commissioner at such time and place as he might appoint, "for examination as to the documents which Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping have in their possession answering the description mentioned in the specifications" of the pursuers and defenders "of process in the said action, and also, that they do respectively produce to the said commissioner the documents mentioned in the said specifications (without prejudice to the said W. H. Tindall and A. G. Dryhurst's objections before the commissioner as to all or any class of documents or document, or to further application by pursuers to a judge in any such case)."

This order was affirmed on appeal to the Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J. and Mathew, J.).

Mr. Tindall and Mr. Dryhurst appealed.

Sir Richard Webster (A.-G.), and Cohen, Q.C. (James Fox with them) for Messrs. Tindall and Dryhurst.—No particular documents are mentioned, the order practically amounts to one for the production of the whole of Lloyd's books, the only restrictive words are that the documents relate to the Lady Octavia. But the main point is that the statute gives no jurisdiction to make such an order. The production of documents which can be ordered under the Act is only ancillary to the examination of witnesses. Lloyd's are not in any way parties to the action, and this is an attempt to force a stranger to an action to produce his books. The object is not the proof of any particular fact, but it is really the getting up of evidence which may be useful to the parties to the action. It is admitted that the only power the court has to make such an order as this is under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 82, but the order that has been made is one merely for discovery, the appellants are not really made witnesses, and only witnesses can be compelled under this Act to produce documents. Such an order as this cannot be made in an English action; the law has been so laid down by the Court of Appeal in a case which arose on the somewhat similar words of Order XXXVII., rule 7:

Elder v. Carter, 62 L. T. Rep. N. S. 516; 25 Q. B. Div. 194.

If this order be allowed to stand, the Scotch courts will be able to exercise in England a greater power than the English courts can exercise in the case of an English action. They cited also O'Shea v. Wood, 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 233.

Gorell Barnes, Q.C. and Lyttelton for the pursuers in the Scotch action.—The order is not merely for discovery, it is primarily to call the appellants as witnesses, and when called, they will no doubt be asked to produce the documents. They will be wanted to prove the handwriting of their surveyor, and other matters, as well as being required to produce the documents. The order has been made by the Scotch court, and therefore it must in England be deemed as valid according to Scotch law. The object of the Act is to enable the courts in England to give assistance in England to the Scotch courts, and unless some conspicuous reason, as of great injustice or oppression, is given, it is only right that the Scotch order should be given its full effect in England. The preamble to sect. 5 clearly contemplates differences between the laws of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the effect of the section is to enable Scotch law to be carried out in England for the purposes of a Scotch action, even though it is contrary to English law.

Lyttelton for the defenders in the Scotch action.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—An action has been brought in Scotland in respect of a contract for the sale of a ship by the defenders to the pursuers, on the terms that she was to be of a certain register at Lloyd's. She had been surveyed by Lloyd's surveyor and had a certificate of it, and it is said that Padderatz, Lloyd's surveyor at Hamburg, was to survey the ship and see if she would justify her register. It was suggested that Padderatz was induced to concur in a fraud, or to perform his duty negligently, and the pursuers and defenders have by agreement obtained this consent order against the chairman and secretary of Lloyd's Register that they should appear before a commissioner in London and produce any documents under their control answering to the descriptions in specifications given by the parties to the action. Now, first, I find no evidence that there are in fact any such documents in existence as are suggested to be by this order. If they are in existence, they relate to the business of third parties, and not to the rights existing between the pursuers and defenders. They are the correspondence between Lloyd's and Lloyd's agent, though it is true that this correspondence took place with reference to the ship which is the subject of the action in Scotland. The documents, if they exist, are Lloyd's and Lloyd's only. Sitting here, I am bound by a decision of the Court of Appeal, and the result of the decision in Elder v. Carter (ubi sup.) is that the inquiry now is, whether or not this order is one made really for inspection and discovery, or whether it is for the examination of witnesses in the course of proof for the purpose of establishing the facts. I do not know what facts are to be established. I do not know what documents are asked for. I do not know that the parties have any knowledge of any particular document or have any knowledge that any document exists at all, and therefore it seems to me that it is inspection and discovery that they want and not proof, and between these two things a broad distinction is drawn in all cases. It will not do to attempt to evade the law by adding at the end of the order that the witnesses are to be examined in respect of the documents in their possession answering to the specification; the real meaning of the order, as I understand it, is that the witnesses are to be examined whether they have such documents in their possession. The addition of those words at the end of the order add nothing to the substance of it. If the real object is discovery, the order will not be rendered valid by a limitation being put in that the order applies simply to documents relating to a certain vessel, and simply to documents made in certain years mentioned.

I am of opinion that the order cannot stand; the Scotch order was obtained by the agreement of the parties to the action against a third party, who is a stranger to the action. Such a person cannot be bound; to enforce such an order would be a gross abuse of private rights. I have hitherto spoken as if this was a matter which occurred in England. On looking at the Act of Parliament it appears to me that the only process intended to be enforced is the production of documents as ancillary to the examination of witnesses. If there be any difference on this point between the law of England and Scotland, I can only say that, sitting here, I know of none, unless there be proper evidence of what is the Scotch law given by a Scotch advocate. No evidence has been produced here that in Scotland such a roving commission would be allowed as this which is before us to-day. Speaking for myself, I do not believe that the power exists in the Scotch courts to enforce upon third parties the production of their documents simply to enable the parties to an action to ascertain whether the third parties have in their possession something which may be useful in the action. I do not believe it exists; but, sitting here, without any evidence being produced, I know nothing about it. The result seems to me to be this, that, looking at the order of the Scotch court, and the order made in England in furtherance of it, we must come to the conclusion that the latter is not justified by sect. 5 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 82, and Order XXXVII., r. 7, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, as it is an order which is practically one for discovery, which would not be made under the circumstances of the case in this country; and I think, therefore, the appeal must be allowed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case Messrs. Tindall and Dryhurst are appealing against an order made by Wright, J., under the provisions of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 82, s. 5, and the ground of their objection is that the judge had no jurisdiction to make the order. That is the question which we have now to determine. That question raises nothing but the true construction of sect. 5, and therefore I decline to consider any point in the law of Scotland. The order is entitled "in the matter of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 82," and "in the matter of an action pending in Scotland between Burchard and others v. Macfarlane and others," so that the order is made against two persons, Tindall and Dryhurst, who have no relation to the action whatever. Their only connection with the matter is that possibly they may be called as witnesses, otherwise they have nothing to do with the parties in the Scotch action. They object, therefore, to the order as being beyond the jurisdiction of the judge, because it is made on third parties, who have nothing to do with the action, with respect to documents which are their sole property and not in any way the property of the parties to the action. They also say, that the order is beyond the jurisdiction of the judge, because it requires them not only to state whether there are in existence such documents as are wanted by the parties to the action, but also to produce them and allow them to be read before it has been determined whether these documents are or are not evidence in the action. What the meaning of this document is I confess I myself have no doubt. The order is that Mr. Tindall, chairman, and Mr. Dryhurst, secretary, of Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, are to attend before a commissioner at such time and place as he may appoint "for examination as to the documents which Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping have in their possession" answering certain descriptions of a very large kind, "and also that they do respectively produce to the said commissioner the documents mentioned in the said specifications." Reading the affidavits and the summons, and the order, I have no doubt that the effect of them is that the appellants are to produce their documents in order that the applicants may see and read them. The question is, whether such an order is within this Act of Parliament. I am of opinion that it is beyond the jurisdiction of the judge to make the order. It is an order made on third parties for discovery, and it has been absolutely held in England that to make such an order is beyond the jurisdiction of a judge. I shall consider presently whether under this statute the law is not the same. Even supposing that the documents had been identified, and the witnesses were required to produce them for the purpose of being read, not at the trial, but before it, as a preliminary to the trial, I should have said that it would be beyond the jurisdiction of the judge to make such an order. Now, let us see whether the same is true on the construction of this statute. In Chancery, before the Judicature Acts, no bill of discovery would have lain against a third person to discover documents in an action between other parties in which he had no interest. A subpœna duces tecum requiring a person to produce documents if he has any would be bad, as it would put on the witness the trouble of looking through what documents he had and coming to the conclusion as to what was relevant to the inquiry. What is a subpœna duces tecum? It is an order from the court requiring a person to produce to the court at the trial a document alleged to be in his possession. He is to produce it to the court, not to the parties; the parties have no right to see the document till it has been produced to the court, and even then subject to the order of the court. When the judge is satisfied that the document is evidence, then he may allow it to be read. Therefore, the suggestion must be that the Act of Parliament gives, as against third parties, a power which did not exist in any court as against them before the Act. Now, the words relied upon in this Act are: "An order for the production of any writings or documents to be mentioned in such rule or order." That is as like the words of Order XXXVII., r. 7, as can be. That rule says: "The court or judge may in any cause or matter, at any stage of the proceedings, order the attendance of any person for the purpose of producing any writings or other documents named in the order." How has that rule been dealt with? It has been held by the Court of Appeal that, notwithstanding the largeness of the words, when you come to consider what was the purpose of the rule, and that to read it according to the largeness of the words would enable the parties to the case to do that which they could not do before either at law or in equity, that that was not the meaning of the rule, and the Court held at once that such an order could not be made against a person who was not a party to the action. So far as to Order XXXVII., r 7. That judgment is binding on this court, and in my opinion is clearly right. Now, coming to sect. 5 of this Act of Parliament, which is an analogous enactment, the question is whether we are not compelled to hold the same. It seems to me that the statute applies to an order for the examination of a witness under a commission as though at the trial, the effect of the examination before the commissioner being the same as though it took place before the judge at the trial of the action. Where there is an order that a witness is to be examined before a commissioner, it is under the same circumstances as would arise if he were examined at the trial, and the order that may be lawfully made is for the attendance for examination as a witness as if he were at the trial; the production of any writings or documents to be mentioned in the rule or order which may be made for his attendance and examination is only equivalent to saying that he must bring the writings or documents as he would bring them with him on a subpœna duces tecum. Here that is evaded. The order is for discovery before examination, instead of for production on examination. The moment it is admitted that he is a third person and in possession of the document, not as the agent of either party, you are asking him to produce the document, not to the court for the purpose of the court exercising a discretion over it, or determining the legal right, but that it may be shown to the parties who, until the matter has been determined by a judge, have no right whatever to see it. It seems to me, therefore, that the case is outside the Act of Parliament, and the learned judge had no jurisdiction whatever to make the order appealed against. The appeal must be allowed.

Fry, L.J.—The circumstances of this case are fraught with suspicion, but I base my judgment not on that, but on the ground that, as it seems to me, such an order as this cannot be made under the Act of Parliament. The order is obviously to my mind one merely for the purpose of discovery. An examination as to documents means as to the possession of the documents, as to what documents are in the custody of the person examined, and as to the description of them. That seems to me to be the natural meaning of the order. On reference to the specifications, to which the order also refers, my conclusion is strongly affirmed, because the documents are not clearly indicated there, but the witness is required to determine whether documents relate to the particular vessel, and the intention apparently is that the society of Lloyd's Register shall go through all the documents in their custody or power that have passed between themselves and their agents to ascertain whether they have anything to do with this vessel. The citation is to the same effect, and there is no evidence that Mr. Tindall or Mr. Dryhurst are persons who could give any evidence with regard to the facts which were in controversy between the parties in this action. Therefore, I have no doubt that the order really is that Mr. Tindall and Mr. Dryhurst are to come before a commissioner in order to make discovery of documents. It is analagous to a bill of discovery against a mere witness. Is such an order within the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 82? In my judgment it clearly is not. That statute enables the court in England, or Scotland, or Ireland, to direct a commission for the examination of witnesses; that is to say, persons who are able to bear testimony with regard to issues in controversy between the litigant parties. It does not mean that they may be examined with regard to the possession of documents which may be relevant to the controversy between the parties. That observation governs, in my opinion, the whole of the section, and I think the words at the end, "for the production of any writings or documents to be mentioned in such rule or order," are only ancillary to the examination of witnesses. The words may enable the parties to require the production of the documents which the witness produces as a witness, but they can not for one moment be stretched so as to enable anyone to obtain discovery against a witness.

Mr. Lyttelton put forward a very ingenious argument indeed, which was this. He said that the law of Scotland must govern the Scotch commission in England, and the law of England must govern the English commission in Scotland, and if the law of Scotland enables you to get discovery against a witness in Scotland, you must be able in England to obtain discovery from the witness. There are two answers to that. In the first place, I do not think that is the true meaning of the clause, but even if it were there is no evidence at all before us that by Scotch law discovery can be obtained against a witness. If that were the Scotch law, it must be borne in mind that the English court must exercise a discretion. I say, without hesitation, that if I were judge at chambers I would never make an order which enabled a Scotch commission in England to obtain discovery from a mere witness. Therefore, I have no doubt that even if Mr. Lyttelton was right in his contention, and the law of Scotland is that which, he suggests, ought to be gathered from this consent order, an English court should not follow it in granting discovery against a mere witness. Now it is to be observed that by the law of England it is impossible to obtain discovery against a witness. In the old Court of Chancery you might maintain a bill for discovery, but it was necessary to show the interest of the plaintiff in the documents to be discovered, the interest of the defendant in the documents to be discovered, and the right of the plaintiff as against the defendant to the production of the documents that were discovered. Without that, the bill was demurrable. It is obvious no such bill could ever lie against a witness. In the same manner with regard to a subpœna duces tecum. You could never call on a witness to ascertain whether documents related to the particular matter in controversy. That case came before Page-Wood, V.C. in 1866, in Lee v. Angus (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 324; Law Rep. 2 Eq. 59), where a subpœna duces tecum was served upon a witness which described the particular documents, and then went on to direct him to produce all other documents in his possession or power in any wise relating to certain matters in question. It was held that as a subpœna duces tecum it was bad, being in fact a bill of discovery against a witness. Then again, under Order XXXVII., r. 7, the same observation applies. That rule is undoubtedly conceived in very wide language. It came before the Court of Appeal in the recent case of Elder v. Carter (ubi sup), and the court took the view that, as there is no right to discovery against a witness, however wide the language of the order may be, there was no power to get the relief sought for. It appears to me that if we were to give the slightest countenance to this proceeding we should be doing a great injustice. It has been said, and not without justice, that it is a remarkable thing that A., by making a series of false statements against B., and putting them on the back of a writ or calling them a statement of claim, may obtain inspection of the books of B. That is the law, but it has never yet been carried to this extent that by making a statement against B., A. can obtain discovery of the books of C. This is an attempt to carry it to that extent, and therefore in my judgment it ought to fail.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Cesser clause—Bill of lading—Demurrage—Delay caused by strikes—Liability of consignees of cargo—Lex non cogit ad impossibilia.

Where the length of time for discharging a ship is not specified in the contract of carriage, and it is therefore the duty of the consignee to discharge within a reasonable time, such time is to be measured not merely by what is the usual and customary time under ordinary circumstances, but by what is a reasonable time in the circumstances actually existing at the port of discharge, and, therefore, if during the discharge circumstances arise which, through no fault of the consignee, delay the discharge (such as a strike) the shipowner is not entitled to demurrage.

A charter-party provided that a vessel therein named should proceed to a port in the Sea of Azof, and having there loaded a cargo of wheat should proceed to a port in the United Kingdom to discharge; that the freighters' liability should cease when the cargo was shipped, the owner or his agent having an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, demurrage, and lighterage at the port of discharge; and that the 1885 bill of lading should be used under the charter, and its conditions form part thereof.

The master signed bills of lading in the form prescribed by the charter, but they contained no reference to the charter, nor any clause which would relieve the consignees of the cargo from loss to the ship occasioned by strikes; but it was provided that the goods were to be applied for within twenty-four hours of the ship's arrival, otherwise the master was to be at liberty to put into lighters or land the same at the risk and expense of the owners.

The vessel arrived in London on the 14th Aug., and the discharge of the cargo proceeded from the 15th down to the 20th, when a strike occurred among the dock labourers, who were employed by the consignees of the cargo to discharge the vessel. In consequence of the strike the discharge of the vessel was not completed until the 18th Sept. The shipowner sued the freighters and the consignees of the cargo for demurrage and damages for the detention of the vessel.

It was decided by Mathew, J. (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 23; 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 138) that, under the cesser clause above set out, the liability of the freighters ceased upon the arrival of the vessel at the port of discharge; but that the consignees of the cargo were liable for the loss occasioned by the detention of the vessel, as they had not dis- charged the vessel within a reasonable time. The consignees appealed.

Held (reversing the decision of Mathew, J.), that, although the consignees were bound to discharge within a reasonable time, they had done all that they could do under the circumstances, and the maxim Lex non cogit ad impossibilia applied; that reasonable time meant reasonable in ordinary circumstances, not in extraordinary circumstances beyond the consignees' control; and that, as the delay was not caused by the consignees, or their agents or servants, they were in no default.

THIS action was brought by the plaintiff, the owner of the s.s. Derwentdale, to recover from the defendants the sum of 721*l.* 7*s.* as demurrage and damages for the detention of that vessel.

By a charter-party dated the 18th June 1889, and made between the plaintiff, as owner of the Derwentdale, of the one part, and the defendants, Rodocanachi, Sons, and Co., freighters, of the other part, it was provided that the steamer should with all convenient speed proceed to Constantinople, and as there ordered to a safe port in the sea of Azof, and there load always afloat from the factors of the freighters a full and complete cargo of wheat, and being so loaded should therewith proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom and there deliver always afloat, &c. The cargo was to be brought and taken from alongside the steamer at the freighters' expense and risk, but the crew were to render all customary assistance in hauling lighters alongside. Twelve running days, Sundays excepted, were to be allowed the freighters (if the steamer were not sooner despatched) for sending the cargo alongside and unloading, but in no case should more than six running days, Sundays excepted, be allowed for unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the lay days at 4*d.* per ton on the steamer's gross register tonnage per running day. The freighters' liability on the charter was to cease when the cargo was shipped (provided the same was worth the freight, dead freight, and demurrage, on arrival at the port of discharge), the owner or his agent having an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, demurrage, lighterage at port of discharge, and average. The 1885 bill of lading was to be used under the charter, and its conditions were to form part thereof.

The Derwentdale duly proceeded to Constantinople, and was from there ordered to Taganrog, where she was loaded with a cargo of wheat in bulk by the defendants, Rodocanachi, Sons, and Co.

The master of the vessel signed and delivered to the defendants five bills of lading for the cargo in the form prescribed by the charter-party.

The bills of lading contained no reference to the charter-party, and no time was stipulated for the discharging the cargo, nor did they contain any exemption which would relieve the consignees of the cargo from loss occasioned by strikes.

They did, however, state that the goods were to be applied for within twenty-four hours of the ship's arrival and reporting at the Custom-house; otherwise the master or agent was to be at liberty to put into lighters or land the same at the risk and expense of the owners of the goods.

The bills of lading were duly indorsed by the defendants Rodocanachi, Sons, and Co., to the defendants Raymond and Reed.

The Derwentdale arrived in London on the 14th Aug. 1889, was reported at the Custom-house on the same day, and on the morning of the 15th began to discharge her cargo. This continued until the 20th, when the dock labourers employed by the defendants Raymond and Reid to discharge the vessel struck. The labourers continued out on strike until the 16th Sept. when they resumed work, and the discharge of the vessel was completed on the 18th Sept.

The cargo was thus received by the consignees upon three days before the strike, and upon three days after it had concluded.

On behalf of the defendants Rodocanachi, Sons, and Co., the defence was set up that their liability for demurrage or for damages for detention of the vessel ceased under the charter-party when the cargo was shipped.

The defendants Raymond and Reid pleaded that the delay was caused by the plaintiff not performing his part of the discharge, and in the alternative that the strike of the dock labourers caused the delay in the discharge of the vessel, and that these defendants were not liable, such delay being beyond their control.

The action came on for trial before Mathew, J., sitting without a jury, on the 10th and 11th Feb. 1891.

It was decided by Mathew, J. (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 23; 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 138), that, under the cesser clause of the charter-party above set out, the liability of the defendants Rodocanachi, Sons, and Co. ceased upon the arrival of the vessel at the port of discharge; but that the defendants Raymond and Reid were liable for the loss occasioned by the detention of the vessel, as they had not discharged the vessel within a reasonable time.

From that decision the defendants Raymond and Reid now appealed.

Sir Richard E. Webster (A.-G.) and Bucknill, Q.C. (Leck with them) for the appellants.—There are two points raised by this appeal. The first point is, that on the true construction of the bill of lading, apart from any other consideration, the appellants are under no liability for demurrage. The 67th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 gives power to the shipowner to enter and land goods, in default of entry and landing by the owner of the goods, after seventy-two hours, if no time for delivery of the goods is expressed in the charter-party or bill of lading. Here, however, the time is restricted to twenty-four hours. According to the express terms of the bill of lading the master, or agent, should, under the circumstances, have exercised the liberty thereby conferred on them of putting the cargo into lighters or landing the same at the risk and expense of the owners. Under a provision of that kind a shipowner has always the right, if there is delay, to put the goods out himself, and he has a lien thereon for his costs and charges incurred in so doing. Not having exercised the right so given to him, the shipowner in this case has no cause of action against the appellants. If, however, the court is against the appellants on that point, then the second point turns upon the question whether the demurrage caused by a strike is a burden to be borne by one of the parties or by both. We submit that each party ought to bear the loss occasioned by vis major under circumstances where the only contract is to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time. The bill of lading contains no stipulation with regard to the time within which the discharge of the cargo is to take place. Then what is the contract to be implied in such a bill of lading? We say that the contract here was that the appellants would, on the arrival of the vessel at the port of discharge, having regard to all the circumstances which might happen, use all due and reasonable care and diligence to take the cargo away, and they were not bound to do more than that; and that "reasonable time" means reasonable, having regard to all the events which happen:

Ford v. Cotesworth, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 127; 5 Ib. 544;
Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599;
Taylor v. Great Northern Railway Company, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 385; Briddon v. Great Northern Railway Company, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 94; 28 L. J. 51, Ex.

The delay in taking away the cargo not being through the fault of the appellants, it is not a delay to take away within a reasonable time. The recent case of Budgett v. Binnington (63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 493, 742; (1891) 1 Q. B. 35) shows that a difference exists between delay in time and reasonable time. They referred also to

J. Gorell Barnes, Q.C. and Robson for the respondent.—As regards the first point taken by the appellants—viz., on the construction of the bill of lading—we submit that the clause referred to is not applicable to the present case, as the cargo had, according to the evidence, actually been applied for within the twenty-four hours of the vessel's arrival at the Custom-house. The event which gave rise to this case is not one which is within that provision, as it occurred in the course of the delivery of the cargo after the same had been applied for. Then, as regards the second point, our contention is, that the appellants are liable for the delay in unloading the cargo caused by the strike, as the absolute obligation was cast upon them of discharging it within a reasonable time. The consignee of a cargo has to take it out of the vessel, and substantially he runs all the risks of the port of discharge. He is bound to watch for the arrival of the ship. Even in a great port like that of London the consignee is bound to know when the ship arrives. He must be ready on the ship's arrival to discharge the cargo, and must provide himself with all the facilities for that discharge He cannot excuse himself on the ground that he is unable to obtain those facilities at a reasonable price. The shipowner cannot be expected to know what is the exact condition of the labouring classes in each port to which his ships are sent. He may be bound to make himself acquainted with the geographical features, but not the social and industrial conditions, of the various ports of the world. But merchants and consignees at their respective ports do know those conditions, and therefore the obligation is cast upon them. In this case it is substantially a question of price of the facilities for discharging the cargo. The consignee of a cargo is aware of an impending strike. He knows the signs, and he can make arrangements to enable him to fulfil the obligation under his contract. [LINDLEY, L.J.—You say it comes to this, that what is a "reasonable time" depends on the obligation cast on the consignee, and that the unforeseen risks of the port fall on those who have to find the labour.] Yes, that is so. The consignee must bear all the risks of the port. The shipowner does not object to the risks he takes so long as he can insure against them. But how can he insure against a strike of which he knows nothing, and which may occur thousands of miles away? A shipowner can insure against almost anything he chooses, provided that he pays the premium required. But how can the premium for an insurance against strikes be determined? To throw upon the shipowner a risk which he cannot anticipate and against which he cannot insure, but against which the consignee can insure, would be manifestly unjust. In numerous charter-parties the exception as to "strikes" is expressly inserted. [FRY, L.J.—I am not certain that a "strike" is not an ordinary incident of the port. LOPES, L.J.—Is an earthquake an ordinary incident? In some places they occur every day.] As to what is a "reasonable time" we rely on the judgments in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 116; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 413; 4 Ex. Div. 165.

[LINDLEY, L.J.—I think that there is some difficulty in reconciling Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company with Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.). The former case is in your favour. But it is a startling proposition that there may be an implied obligation to do something which may be impossible. FRY, L.J.—Will the law ever imply a contract to do anything which is impossible?] So far as Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) goes, it does not seem to qualify the decision in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.). That case is in the respondent's favour on principle, and is not, we submit, overruled by Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.). The judgment in Burmester v. Hodgson (ubi sup.) does not in the least touch the present case. Cases relating to the liability of common carriers, such as Taylor v. Great Northern Railway Company (ubi sup.) and Briddon v. Great Northern Railway Company (ubi sup.), are altogether distinguishable. A carrier has to deal with existing circumstances. All the difficulties likely to arise are in the contemplation of the parties at the time of entering into the contract. Cases turning upon the risk of finding a berth for a ship—such as The Carisbrook (64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 843; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 507; 15 P. Div. 98), following Davies v. M'Veagh (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 308; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 149; 4 Ex. Div. 265)—are not perhaps precedents, but are valuable as showing what the feeling of the courts has been as regards shipowners and consignees. All these cases have been wrongly decided if the appellants' contention here is right. We submit, therefore, that on the whole current of authority the decision of Mathew, J. was right and should be affirmed. It would raise an enormous amount of difficulty in the construction of documents of this nature if this court departs from what we submit is the proper rule of law on the present point. They referred also to

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

Lindley, L.J.—This is an action arising out of the strike at the London Docks in August and September 1889. The plaintiff is a shipowner, and he has sued the defendants for their wrongful detention of his ship. The defendants Rodocanachi and Co. are sued on the charter-party, but by a clause in it their liability ceased on their loading a full and proper cargo of sufficient value to cover freight, dead freight, and demurrage. This clause protected them, and judgment was given for them, and from that judgment there is no appeal. The other defendants, Raymond and Reid, are sued on the bills of lading as consignees of the cargo who have made default in unloading. Judgment has been given against them, and from that judgment they have appealed. By the charter-party the plaintiff's ship was to go to the Sea of Azof, there load a cargo of wheat, and bring that cargo to London. Freight was to be paid on unloading and delivery of the cargo. Twelve running days (Sundays excepted) were allowed for loading and unloading, but not more than six for unloading, and there was provision for ten days' demurrage over the lay days at 4*d.* per ton. The bills of lading were in the form known as the "General Produce, Mediterranean, Black Sea, and Baltic Steamer Bill of Lading, 1885." Bills of lading in this form contain no reference to the charter-party and contain no express limit of time within which the cargo is to be unloaded. They contain clauses which are relied upon as limiting the remedies of the shipowner as against the consignees of the cargo even if they are in default in unloading.

The questions raised by the appeal are therefore two—viz., (1) were the consignees in default in not unloading sooner than they did, and (2) assuming that they were, do the clauses in question relieve them from liability to damages? In order to determine these questions it is necessary to refer to the terms of the bill of lading and to the events which happened. The bill of lading is in the ordinary form, and there are one or two clauses which I will read. I need not read that which is common to all of them, but the clauses which are important are as follows: "The goods are to be applied for within twenty-four hours of ship's arrival and reporting at the Custom House, otherwise the master or agent is to be at liberty to put into lighters or land the same at the risk and expense of the owners of the goods. . . . The master or agent shall have a lien on the goods for freight and payments made, if any, or liabilities incurred in respect of any charges stipulated herein to be borne by the owners of the goods." I do not think that there is anything else of importance. The events which happened were as follows:—The ship arrived at Millwall on the 14th Aug. 1889, and the consignees duly demanded delivery of the cargo. On the 16th they sent barges to receive the cargo, and on that and the two following days the unloading proceeded with due despatch. On the 20th the dock labourers struck; on the 23rd the lightermen struck; on the 26th the strike became general, and it lasted until the 16th Sept. After that date the unloading proceeded with all due despatch. Notwithstanding the strike, the ship's crew were able and willing to do such part of the unloading as had to be performed by the shipowner, and it is to be taken as proved that the plaintiff was in no default. It is also established that the defendants did all they could under the circumstances, and that, unless they are liable for the consequences of the strike, they were also in no default. Returning now to the two questions raised by the appellants, it will be convenient to dispose of the second before considering the first, which is much the more difficult of the two. Assuming the consignees to be in default, it is contended by them that they are relieved from all obligation to pay damages occasioned by their default by reason of those clauses in the bill of lading which empower the master to put the cargo ashore at the risk of the owner, and which give the master a lien on the cargo for all money payable by its owner to the owner of the ship. But these clauses are obviously inserted in the interest and for the benefit of the shipowner, and they give him an additional remedy for the recovery of what is due to him, and not a remedy in substitution for any which he would have apart from these clauses. The master is under no obligation to land the goods and assert his lien instead of allowing the consignees to land them and leaving him to be sued for the payments he ought to make. The master is empowered to do this, but he is under no obligation to exercise the power. He is the person to decide whether he will exercise it or not. Moreover, the right given to the master by the clause in question to land the goods is only conferred upon him in the event of the goods not being applied for within twenty-four hours of the ship's arrival and reporting at the Custom House; but in this case the goods were applied for in the stipulated time. The event, therefore, in which the master had a right to land a cargo under this clause never happened. Upon these grounds it is impossible to hold the defendants relieved from liability by the clauses in question.

This brings me to the first of the questions raised on the appeal—viz., the liability of the consignees for the delay caused by the strike. In order to determine this question it is necessary to ascertain exactly what obligation the consignees of the cargo were under to the shipowner with respect to the discharge of the cargo, and in particular with reference to the time within which the consignees were bound to accept delivery. It is the duty of the consignee to take his goods from the master when he has done his part of the unloading. No time for unloading being specified, the obligation of the defendants to accept delivery was that which is implied by law; in other words, a reasonable time. But this does not solve the difficulty. The questions still remain—What is a reasonable time? How is it to be ascertained? Is it to be ascertained with reference to what is usual, and can be foreseen and provided for, or with reference to the events which actually happen, whatever they may be? The defendants did all they could under the circumstances which happened. Were they bound to do more? It might be naturally expected that those questions would by this time be clearly settled one way or the other by authority; but this is by no means the case. The leading decisions are difficult to reconcile, and the opinions of eminent judges are by no means in accord. The view that a reasonable time means reasonable, having regard to the events which actually happen, is supported by considerable authority. For example, in Taylor v. Great Northern Railway Company (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 385) it was held that a railway company, as a carrier of goods, was bound to deliver them in a reasonable time, but was not liable for delay caused by a block on its line for which it was not responsible. The block was occasioned by the breakdown of a train belonging to another company which had running powers over the defendants' line. Erle, C.J. there said: "When, as in the present case, there is no express contract, there is an implied contract to deliver within a reasonable time, and that I take to mean a time within which the carrier can deliver using all reasonable exertions." The other judges in that case took the same view. This was also the view taken both by the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ford v. Cotesworth (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 127; 5 Ib. 548), and by Lord Blackburn certainly in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 4 Exch. Div. 155; 5 App. Cas. 599). In Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.), which was an action on a charter-party, the stipulation was that the cargo was to be delivered in the usual and customary manner, but nothing was said about time. Owing to a threat of bombardment the cargo could not be landed in the usual time. It was held that the charterer was not liable for the delay. The full import of this case can only be appreciated by attending to the summing up by Cockburn, C.J. (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 130) and to the argument for the plaintiff and to the judgment and to the ultimate decision. The Chief Justice, as appears from the report in 4 Q. B., reserved the question for the court as to the liability of the defendants under the charter-party to demurrage for the time during which the ship lay at her berth, but could not unload owing to the refusal of the authorities to allow the cargo to be landed. And he directed the jury that, the charter-party being silent as to the time for unloading, there arose an implied contract on the part of the freighter to unload and discharge within a reasonable time, and therefore, if there was any unreasonable delay in unloading the cargo and discharging the ship the plaintiffs were entitled to a verdict—that the question whether the time occupied was reasonable or unreasonable was to be judged with reference to the means and facilities available at the port and to the regulations and course of business at the port. Then he goes on thus: "And there would be a point of law whether this case was to be decided with reference to the ordinary state of things at the port or whether any extraordinary circumstances that prevented the unloading might be taken into account. The first question for the jury was whether, looking at the ordinary state of things at the port, there was any unreasonable delay either before the unloading was suspended or after it was resumed; secondly, whether, looking to the existing—that is, the extraordinary—circumstances, there was any unreasonable delay either before the unloading was suspended or after it was resumed." Then there were some other questions which I do not think it necessary to allude to. The jury, in answer to these two questions, found that there had been no unreasonable delay, that is to say, no unreasonable delay looking at the ordinary business at the port, and no unreasonable delay looking at the circumstances that occurred. On that finding a verdict was entered for the defendants. The plaintiffs then moved for judgment for them, and their application was refused, that is to say, the defendants held their verdict. That was affirmed by the Court of Appeal—the Exchequer Chamber. The decision, as I understand it, was in effect that the question of law thus raised—i.e., the question of reasonableness—must be decided not with reference to the ordinary state of things at the port but with reference to the extraordinary circumstances which prevented the unloading in the usual time. The passage in the judgment delivered by Lord Blackburn on the part of the Court of Queen's Bench, contains an obscure passage on p. 133, but that judgment proceeded on the principle that, as the unforeseen occurrence affected both shipowner and charterer alike, and each used reasonable diligence in performing his part of the contract, each performed the only obligation he was under, and, consequently, the action could not be maintained. It will be observed that the decision did not proceed upon the ground that both parties were equally in default, and that neither could complain of the other, but upon the ground that neither party was in default, which is saying, in other words, that there was no default on the part of the defendants. The judgment of Martin, B., in the Exchequer Chamber (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 548) is as explicit on this point as is the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. In Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) a shipowner sued a charterer for not "discharging a cargo with all despatch according to the custom of the port," which the charterer had agreed to do. The point raised in the present case did not there arise, but the case is valuable for the observations made in it on Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.) and on Wright v.

New Zealand Shipping Company (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 413; 4 Ex. Div. 165), which I will refer to presently. Thesiger, L.J. (in 4 Ex. Div. 160) understood Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.) as establishing that where no time for unloading is mentioned "the law implies a contract that each party will use reasonable diligence in performing that part of the delivery which, by the custom of the port, falls on him." Lord Blackburn expressed the same view in 5 App. Cas. 621. His observations are the more valuable as they remove all doubt as to the meaning of the expression "reasonable time under the circumstances." It is clear that he meant under the circumstances which existed at the time of unloading, and Lord Selborne, I think, so understood him in the passage in 5 App. Cas. 608. Burmester v. Hodgson (2 Camp. 488) was referred to in all these cases, but does not throw much light on the question. It was an action by a shipowner against the holders of a bill of lading for delay in unloading a cargo of wine in London. Nothing was said about time, but Sir James Mansfield held that there was an implied agreement to unload in the usual and customary time for unloading wine in London. The delay arose from the crowded state of the docks, which prevented the unloading of the ship in her turn into the bonded warehouses which was the customary way of unloading. Assuming the Chief Justice to have been right as regards the agreement to be implied, the rest followed; but the general proposition that where no time was fixed for unloading it is the charterer's duty to unload in the usual and customary time was emphatically denied by the Court of Queen's Bench in Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.), and again by Lord Blackburn in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.). This is an authority, therefore, against the view that in all cases reasonable time means the usual time under ordinary circumstances. The usual and customary time is the proper time under ordinary circumstances, but not necessarily so under extraordinary circumstances.

I pass now to the authorities relied upon in support of this view. Reliance was placed by counsel for the shipowner on such cases as Adams v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (5 C. B. N. S. 492), relating to the obligation of charterers to furnish cargoes to ships chartered to carry them. In this particular case there was delay in loading. No time was fixed. The delay was twofold: (1) owing to some dispute with a railway company the charterers had no cargo at the place of loading when the ship was ready to receive it; (2) after the cargo arrived there was a further short delay in loading owing to a strike among the colliers. The court held the charterers liable for the delay, and no distinction was made between the first period and the second. But for the first delay the second might have been immaterial. Both Williams and Byles, JJ. pointed out that the real default was in not having a cargo ready to load (see p. 494); but there are undoubtedly expressions in the judgments that the charterers contracted to have the cargo ready within a reasonable time, and that this was a reasonable time under ordinary circumstances. But, as pointed out in that case by Williams and Byles, JJ., and by Lord Blackburn in Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.), the charterer undertakes to have a cargo ready to load by the time the ship is or ought to be ready to receive it; the risk of being unable to provide the cargo falls on the charterer, who has to procure it; the uncertain element of reasonable time for procuring a cargo does not in truth enter into his obligation. Barker v. Hodgson (3 M. & S. 267) is a well-known illustration of this doctrine. The unconditional nature of a charterer's obligation to furnish a cargo appears, however, to have been lost sight of by Thesiger, L.J. in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.). That was an action by a shipowner against a charterer for delay in unloading. No time was fixed, and the charterer had not provided lighters enough to unload all the ships in which he had cargoes in what would have been a reasonable time if there had been fewer ships to unload. He had brought his difficulties on himself, and he unloaded other ships in preference to the plaintiff's ship, and so detained her. The court held the charterer liable for delay, and this, in my opinion, was clearly right, for the defendant was himself responsible for the delay. Lord Bramwell said: "In my judgment a reasonable time for doing an act is a time within which it can be done by a person acting reasonably; but the time which he spends in making his preparations for doing the act cannot be taken into account." Cotton, L.J. based his judgment upon the duty of the defendant to supply a sufficient number of lighters to unload the ship in the time usually taken to unload such a ship. Thesiger, L.J. said: "A reasonable time means a reasonable time under ordinary circumstances, and, in the absence of some stipulation altering the implied contract between the parties, the charterers could not be relieved from the consequences of fortuitous or unforeseen impediments affecting only the due performance by them of their part of the contract. This seems to be the result of the cases of Adams v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (ubi sup.) and Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.)." I cannot myself reconcile this passage with Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.), although it is consistent with what was said in Adams v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (ubi sup.). It is quite obvious that the view of Thesiger, L.J. is opposed to the opinion of Lord Blackburn in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.). In Hill v. Idle (4 Camp. 327) no time for unloading was specified, but the merchant's inability to unload in the usual time was owing to his having shipped a cargo which he could not unship without an order from the Treasury. The delay was caused by himself, and he was properly held responsible for it on that ground. Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.) is, I think, another illustration of the same sound principle. Budgett v. Binnington (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 549, 592; 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 493, 742; (1891) 1 Q. B. 35) throws no light upon the question of reasonable time, for there the charterer had undertaken to unload in a specified number of days, and his inability to do so by reason of a strike was no excuse for his breach of contract. Bassey v. Evans (4 Camp. 131) and Barret v. Dutton (4 Camp. 333) are older illustrations of the same principle. In this state of the authorities it appears to me most in accordance with principle to act upon the maxim Lex non cogit ad impossibilia. We have to deal with implied obligations, and I am not aware of any case in which an obligation to pay damages is ever cast by implication upon a person for failing to do that which is rendered impossible by causes beyond his control. Where no time for unloading is fixed by contract the merchant's obligation is, in my opinion, to use all reasonable diligence under the circumstances which exist at the time of unloading, unless, indeed, as in Hill v. Idle (ubi sup.) and other cases like it those circumstances are attributable to his own conduct. Unless he has caused the delay, or unless it has been caused by his agents or servants, he is in no default, and the loss to the shipowner must be borne by him, not because he is in fault, but because he is unable to show any default on the part of the cargo-owner rendering him liable for the delay from which the shipowner has suffered. It sounds reasonable to say that he who has to find labour must take the risk of the labour market; but this proposition does not solve the difficulty; it leaves out of sight the time within which the labour has to be found. The conclusion at which I have arrived is in harmony with the ordinary course of business, for there are two well-known forms of contract, one with and the other without a specified number of days for unloading. If the first form is used, the risk of a strike falls on the merchant; if the second form is used, it does not, and the risk falls on the shipowner, not because he has agreed to bear it, but because he is unable to throw it on the merchant.

I may add that I have looked for further guidance on the subject in English, American, and other works. The Scotch law as stated in Bell's Commentaries (vol. 1, p. 623) is in accordance with the conclusion at which I have arrived. Mr. Bell says in that work, which is extremely well done, as everybody knows: "Where there is no special contract for lay days or demurrage, nothing said on the subject, or an agreement that the usual time shall be allowed for loading or unloading, the time during which the ship must remain to load or unload will be regulated by what is customary or reasonable, or (in circumstances not occasioned by fault of the shipper) necessary, to accomplish those acts . . . Under this rule the master will not be entitled to demurrage in this case, as where a special contract for days is made, if the delay be occasioned by the crowded state of the docks; nor where the customary mode of delivery of the particular article requires more time than the ordinary delivery. It will be only where the difference in the requisite time of delivery is to be ascribed to the shipper or consignee that demurrage will be due." Mr. Carver, in his work, Carriage by Sea, adopts the same view, as will be seen by reference to paragraph 180. I have not found anything sufficiently clear on the point in American treatises. The French Code de Commerce, 274, is at first sight adverse to this view, but it appears to be in practice construed in accordance with it: "If the time for loading and unloading is not fixed by the contract between the parties, it is determined by the usage of the places." In Gilbert Sirey's Commentary (2nd edit. vol. 2, p. 132, s. 16) I find this: "What if the unloading is delayed by vis major? Decided that during this delay demurrage does not run in favour of the captain (see decisions in the Court of Marseilles), and that in this case the loss by the delay ought to be borne equally by the captain and the consignee." For the reasons I have given I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be allowed, and judgment ought to be entered for the defendants.

FRY, L.J.—The state of things in which this litigation comes before us is as follows: It is an action by the shipowner against the consignees, Messrs. Raymond and Reid, on the bill of lading, and it seeks to make them responsible for the unusual delay which occurred in the unloading of the vessel in the London Docks. That delay resulted from the strike of the dock labourers and of the lightermen, which occurred during the course of the unloading. Two questions have been raised. The first is one upon the express terms of the bill of lading. That bill of lading contains these words: "The goods are to be applied for within twenty-four hours of the ship's arrival and reporting at the Custom-house; otherwise the master or agent is to be at liberty to put into lighters or land the same at the risk and expense of the owners of the goods." Then "the master or agent shall have a lien on the goods for freights and payments made, if any, or liabilities incurred in respect of any charges stipulated herein to be borne by the owners of the goods." Now it was contended on behalf of the defendants that, under the circumstances, the master or agent ought to have exercised that liberty; and that not having used the right so given him, the shipowner had no cause of action. I am unable to concur in that argument for two reasons. In the first place, the clause does not apply in point of fact. The goods were applied for within the twenty-four hours of the ship's arrival at the Custom-house; and, in my opinion, the clause does not apply to any other event than that which is stipulated for. It does not apply to any difficulty arising in the course of the delivery of the goods after they are applied for. Again, the clause in question confers only a liberty. It creates no obligation on the master or agent to put the goods on land, and therefore cannot relieve the consignees from any liability under which they may rest.

The second and far more important question arises from this fact, that the bill of lading contains no expression with regard to the time in which the discharge is to take place. Therefore we have to consider what is the contract to be implied in such a bill of lading. Now, it is to be observed in the first place, that this is a case in which concurrent acts are to be done by the shipowner and the merchant. The shipowner is to trim the goods—the merchant is to receive and discharge them from the ship; and of course neither can perform the one act unless the other is being done concurrently. Now it is found by the judge in this case, and there has been no argument addressed to us to shake his conclusion of fact, that the shipowner had on board abundant help for the trimming, and that there was no difficulty about that operation. Consequently the only difficulty in discharging the ship was the difficulty which arose on the part of the merchant to receive the goods after they are trimmed, and discharge them from the ship. We have therefore a case in which each party has a duty to perform, and in which one only, viz., the merchant, has been prevented from performing his part. I therefore lay aside all those cases in which there are concurrent acts to be done and both the parties concerned have been prevented from performing those acts. Those cases have no relation to the present controversy. But again, no lay days are defined in the bill of lading; consequently I entirely lay aside the consideration of that class of cases in which lay days have been mentioned, and by which it has been determined, from the time of Lord Tenterden down to the recent case of Budgett v. Binnington (63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 493, 742; (1891) 1 Q. B. 35), that where this is the case the merchant makes himself liable if the vessel is not discharged within the time limited, although the delay may not be attributable to his fault or to his default. The question then arises in this way: We have a bill of lading containing no express stipulation as to the time of discharge, and some contract on the side of the ship as to its part in discharging, and some contract on the side of the merchant as to receiving and discharging the cargo thus being implied. What is that contract that is to be implied on the part of the merchant? Is it to discharge the cargo in the customary or usual time, or in a reasonable time under ordinary circumstances, or in a reasonable time under the actual circumstances which occur; or is it to discharge with due and reasonable diligence? In some cases the difference between these forms of expression may be immaterial; in the present case the difference appears to be vital. Now the question has first to be considered on authority, and I shall first consider those cases which throw light on the particular matter in hand, viz., the implied contract to unload on the part of the consignees. First in point of date occurs a case of Burmester v. Hodgson (2 Camp. 488) before Sir James Mansfield, which was in the year 1810, in which he held the implication is to unload in the usual and customary time. It is impossible, I think, not to feel that that decision was influenced by a case which had been tried three days before, also at Guildhall, the case of Rodgers v. Forrester (2 Camp. 483), in which these words had been inserted in the bill of lading, and when the Lord Chief Justice came to hold the implied contract he adopted the very words of the case which had preceded it by three days. However, that was the conclusion at which he arrived. Now there appears to have been no decision upon such a point for seventeen years, and then we come to the case of Rogers v. Hunter (M. & M. 63) before Tenterden, C.J. In that case the bill of lading contained a stipulation for demurrage after a certain number of days from the ship's arrival. In point of fact the goods were so stowed as not to be accessible within the stipulated time. The Lord Chief Justice held that the stipulation did not apply, and that an implied obligation arose on the consignee to remove the goods with reasonable despatch; that is to say, "with reasonable despatch" after the possibility of removing them arose. No doubt that case is no longer law on the principal point decided, as will be found by reference to the case of Porteus v. Watney (39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 3 Q. B. Div. 227, 534) and other cases; but nevertheless it is highly important as containing an expression of the view of the learned Chief Justice as to the nature of the implied contract to unload. It is to be observed that the implication so arrived at by the Chief Justice differed in a marked manner from that arrived at by Sir James Mansfield in the previous case. The next case arose in the year 1868 (Ford v. Cotesworth, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 127; 5 Ib. 548). There there was a stipulation to deliver the cargo in the usual and customary manner, but there was nothing expressed with regard to time. The decision of the Queen's Bench was to this effect: that when the act is one in which both parties are to concur each party contracts that he will use reasonable diligence in performing his part, and the case of Burmester v. Hodgson (ubi sup.) was expressly disapproved. The case of Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.) went to the Exchequer Chamber, and the court expressed the implication in a different way—they said it was to discharge in the usual and customary manner; and, holding that each party was prevented from doing that, they affirmed the decision of the Queen's Bench (see 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 545). Then in 1879 came the case of Wright v. The New Zealand Shipping Company Limited (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 413; 4 Exch. Div. 165), where the charter-party was silent as to the discharge, and the implication was stated to be a contract to unload within a reasonable time, and the Court of Appeal went further and inquired what was a reasonable time. Now, Bramwell, L.J. said: "A reasonable time for doing an act is a time within which it may be done by a person working reasonably"—a statement which obviously assumes that there is a person at work, and therefore excludes circumstances which may prevent his being at work at all. And Thesiger, L.J. said: "A reasonable time means a reasonable time under ordinary circumstances;" thereby of course excluding extraordinary circumstances. The result, therefore, was that the court in that case implied a contract to unload within a reasonable time, judged of by ordinary circumstances, which is obviously a very different thing from using reasonable diligence or using reasonable despatch. Then in 1879 came the case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland in the Court of Appeal (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; 4 Ex. Div. 155; 5 App. Cas. 599), in which this question did not actually arise, but in which nevertheless there were observations made which bear on the point in hand. What is remarkable is that Thesiger, L.J., who had been a party to the decision in the case I have previously mentioned, adopting Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.), stated the implication was one of reasonable diligence. The case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) went to the House of Lords, and in the judgment of Earl Selborne is this paragraph, which seems to me of the greatest importance. After referring to the cases in which time has been fixed, he said: "If on the other hand there is no time fixed the law implies an agreement to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time—that is, as was said by Blackburn, J. in Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.), a reasonable time under all the circumstances. It is obvious, therefore, that not only Lord Selborne but Lord Blackburn also agreed in disapproving of the case of Wright v. The New Zealand Company (ubi sup.), which had been decided in the Queen's Bench and the Court of Appeal. These are, I believe, all the cases which bear on the direct inquiry what authority is there with regard to implication in the case of unloading.

Now, the consideration of these cases shows the existence of two distinct and opposing views; the one is, that time is to be measured by something which may be ascertained more or less exactly when the contract is entered into—reasonable time under ordinary circumstances — or usual and customary time, which appears to me to be the same thing. This view had the support of Mansfield, C.J. in Burmester v. Hodgson (ubi sup.) in the Exchequer Chamber, and in Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.), and by the Court of Appeal in Wright v. The New Zealand Company (ubi sup.). The other view is, that it is measured by the actual emergent events, and by the diligence or negligence of the parties concerned under those events by a measure which cannot be forecast at the time of the contract, but can only be ascertained by the event. This is the "reasonable despatch" of Lord Tenterden in Rogers v. Hunter (ubi sup.), and this is the reasonable diligence of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.), and of Thesiger, L.J. in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.). Now, that represents a very even balance of authority, and it is difficult to say in which direction the beam inclines. But parenthetically I would observe before passing to the other consideration, that if the actual circumstances are to be regarded it does not follow that all facts are to be considered. For example, circumstances causing delay which are to any extent within the power or under the control of the consignee have to be excluded. The question always remains, what circumstances are to be considered. The next inquiry which I address to myself is this: Is any assistance to be gained from the authorities by way of analogy in reference to other implied obligations as to time? I first turn to that obligation which is the nearest possible to the obligation to unload, viz., the obligation to load. Here we are met with this principle, which creates considerable difficulty in applying the obligation to unload because the implied obligation to load is an unqualified obligation on the part of the merchant to have the goods ready at the ordinary place of storage, and therefore it is only in a case arising between the place of storage and the ship that the question of reasonable time or due diligence can arise. The cases seem to me to be far too clear on the point. They show symptoms of a tendency to similar differences of opinion to that which I have already indicated in the case of an implied obligation as to unloading. Thus in Harris v. Dreesman (23 L. J. 210, Ex.) Parke, B. referred to a reasonable time under the circumstances; whilst in Adams v. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (5 C. B. N. S. 492) the Court of Queen's Bench referred to a "reasonable time and under ordinary circumstances."

Then I turn to another class of contract in which an implied obligation of this sort may arise, namely, the case of a common carrier, and upon that there are two authorities. First, the case of Briddon v. The Great Northern Railway Company (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 94; 28 L. J. 51, Ex.), and there reasonable time in the implied obligation of a carrier means with reference to all the circumstances of the case. So a snowstorm is an excuse in the case of a cattle train. And again, in the subsequent case of Taylor v. The Great Northern Railway Company (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 385) the point received a second decision in the same way, and it was held that a common carrier was bound only to carry within a time reasonable, looking at all the circumstances of the case. Erle, C.J. said: "I take reasonable time to mean a time within which a carrier can deliver, using all reasonable exertions." And Byles, J. said: "Reasonable time means a reasonable time, looking at all the circumstances of the case." Then Montagu Smith, J. says: "It must depend on the circumstances of each case what is a reasonable time." Those two decisions are clear, and so far as I have been able to learn, are unshaken by any other authorities upon the point in hand, viz., the obligation of a common carrier. The analogy of these cases is strong in favour of the view that reasonable time must be determined by reference to the actual events which occurred. The beam of the scales in which I have been trying to weigh the opposing authorities is no longer an uncertain equilibrium, but tends distinctly in favour of the view that reasonable time means reasonable time under the circumstances, or, what is the same thing, under all the circumstances of the case. But, lastly, I approach the question on the ground of principle and reasonableness, and I ask myself which of the two implications is the more natural, the more probable. To my mind it is more probable that each party should say, "I will use diligence, I will do what I can under the circumstances," than that one should say to the other, "I will not only use diligence, but I will be responsible for events over which I have no control." If one party in a contract requires the other to be answerable for such events, it is, in my opinion, to be expected that he would stipulate for it expressly, and that expectation is strengthened in the present case because there are well-known forms of bills of lading which do cast the responsibility on the merchant. If the bill of lading requires the discharge to be within the ordinary and customary time, or defines the lay days, the merchant becomes answerable for events over which he has no control. But if these familiar forms be not used, the inference seems to me to be that the shipowner and the merchant alike must be taken to say, We will each do our best; and that they must be taken to say no more. I therefore concur in the conclusion my learned brother has arrived at; but, having regard to the great importance of the matter in controversy, and the fact that we are differing from the decision of the learned judge, I have thought it best to express in my own words the reasons why I conclude that this appeal should be allowed with costs, and judgment entered for the defendants.

Lindley, L.J.—Lopes, L.J., who heard this case, agrees with the conclusion at which we have arrived. Appeal allowed.

The Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company Limited v. Morel Brothers and Co. and Richards and Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Demurrage—End of voyage—Arrival at docks—Option of charterer to name berth on arrival.

By a charter-party it was agreed that certain vessels being loaded should proceed to the Mersey and deliver their cargo "at any safe berth as ordered on arrival in the dock at Garston." The charterers named the berths at which they desired the vessels to discharge, but, as all the berths in the dock were full, the vessels were kept waiting for some time. The owners thereupon claimed demurrage for the delay.

Held (affirming the judgment of Charles, J.), that the carrying voyage was not ended till the vessels were in the berths named by the charterers.

The Carisbrook (62 L. T. Rep. N. S. 843; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 507; 15 Prob. Div. 98) doubted.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Charles, J. at the trial without a jury. The action was brought for the non-delivery of a cargo of copper ore, and the defendants counter-claimed for damages in the nature of demurrage for detention of the vessels carrying the copper by the plaintiffs, the charterers, at the port of discharge.

By the charter-party it was agreed between the plaintiffs and defendants that certain vessels of the defendants should load with copper ore at Huelva, "and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to the Mersey (or so near thereunto as they may safely get) and deliver the same at any safe berth as ordered on arrival in the dock at Garston."

There was also a clause that

Three working days, after being in turn, shall be allotted to the charterers (if the steamers are not sooner despatched) for loading up any quantity up to 1200 tons, and four days if the quantity exceeds 1200 and up to 1700 tons, and to be discharged when berthed with all despatch, as customary at the port of discharge with steamers carrying similar cargoes.

On the arrival of the vessels at Garston Dock berths were named for them, but, as all the berths were full, the vessels were kept waiting for some time, and it was for damages for this delay that the defendants counter-claimed.

The question being, whether under the charter-party the voyage was ended on the arrival of the vessels at the docks or on their being berthed, Charles, J. held that the latter was the true meaning of the agreement, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Kennedy, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the defendants.—The carrying voyage came to an end when the vessels arrived in the docks and were placed at the disposal of the charterers. Any loss for subsequent delay must fall on them. The option of naming a berth was not fairly exercised unless an empty berth was named. We rely mainly on these two cases:

Davies v. McVeagh, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 308; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 149; 4 Ex. Div. 265;
The Carisbrook, 62 L. T. Rep. N. S. 843; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 507; 15 Prob. Div. 98.

Murphy v. Coffin (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 531, n.; 12 Q. B. Div. 87) was wrongly decided, and should be overruled. They also cited

Nelson v. Dahl, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 365; 12 Ch. Div. 568; 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 381; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 6 App. Cas. 38;
Ashworth v. The Crow Orchard Colliery Company, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 266; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 397; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 541;
Pyman v. Dreyfus, 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 724; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 444; 24 Q. B. Div. 152; Dall'Orso v. Mason and Co., 3 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 419.

Gorell Barnes, Q.C. and P. C. Morris for the plaintiffs.—The clause giving the charterers an option in naming a berth was put in for the charterers' benefit, and there is no suggestion that the option has been improperly exercised. The clause in the charter-party does not require the charterers to name an empty berth; it would be an alteration of the contract to read that stipulation into it. This case is therefore not like Harris v. Marcus, Jacobs, and Co. (54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 61; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 530; 15 Q. B. Div. 247). The case of Murphy v. Coffin (ubi sup.) follows Tapscott v. Balfour (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 46); those cases were correctly decided, and show that our contention is right. Davies v. McVeagh is capable of explanation in a way so as not to make it an argument against the plaintiffs. The Carisbrook (ubi sup.) was wrongly decided and should be overruled.

Kennedy, Q.C. replied.

Lord Esher, M.R.—Nelson v. Dahl (ubi sup.) does not govern this case, though it settled many points with regard to charter-parties. What is the object and subject-matter of a charter-party? It is to determine the contract between the shipowner and the shipper of goods as to the delivery of the goods on board the ship, the carriage of them from one place to another, and their delivery at the end of the voyage. The charter-party regulates the terms of the contract on these matters, and it necessarily, therefore, deals with the time, place, and manner of the loading of the ship, the length of the carrying voyage, and with the terms as to the time and mode of discharging the ship of her cargo. When you have to determine the meaning of the contract referring to the delivery of a cargo, you must consider the time when and the place where the carrying voyage is to end, because until it ends there can be no delivery. The end of the carrying voyage may be described in many different ways, but though charter-parties vary and there are many different ways of agreeing what is to be the end of the voyage, yet many phrases describing it are in constant use. The value of Nelson v. Dahl (ubi sup.) is that many of these phrases are discussed and the meaning of them shown. Here we have nothing to do with the beginning, but only with the end of the carrying voyage. Now the end of a carrying voyage is very often agreed to be when the ship arrives at a certain port, or in a particular river, or in a certain dock. Nelson v. Dahl (ubi sup.) settles most of these cases, but it does not deal with a charter-party which describes the end of the carrying voyage as the arrival of the ship at some berth as to which an option is to be exercised by the charterer. Here the voyage is from Huelva to Garston Dock, which is high up the Mersey. If that were all, the carrying voyage would end at Garston Dock, and the meaning of that would be well understood, with all the obligations that would arise in such a case. But that is not all; the charter-party provides for delivery "at any safe berth as ordered." Now, supposing the berths in these dock had been numbered and the contract had been to deliver at No. 1 Garston Dock, what the effect of that would have been would be shown by Nelson v. Dahl (ubi sup.), and the effect would have been that the carrying voyage would not come to an end until the ship arrived and was ready to deliver in No. 1 berth. Now, this contract does not name any particular berth; it says "any safe berth as ordered," which must mean "any safe berth as ordered by the charterers." Does that give them the right of fixing the place where the carrying voyage is to end? Even if the case stood alone I should say that the right was given to the charterers; but the case of Tapscott v. Balfour (ubi sup.) has dealt with this form of words, and the court there held that in such a case as this the charterer has power to fix what is to be the end of the carrying voyage, and the consequence of his doing so is the same when he has given his orders as though the place had been named in the charter-party. That case was decided nearly twenty years ago, and being a decision on the meaning of a mercantile contract in a form frequently used by merchants, we ought at this distance of time to follow it, unless fully convinced that it was wrong. But, apart from that, I think, as a matter of reason, that the case was well decided, and no effect would be given to the words "as ordered" unless it is held that the order, when given by the charterer, settles where the voyage is to end as much as though the place were named in the charter-party. When, therefore, the option in this case of naming the berth was exercised the effect was the same as though the berth had been named in the charter-party. In 1883 Tapscott v. Balfour was followed in the case of Murphy v. Coffin (ubi sup.). As to the case of Davies v. McVeagh (ubi sup.), I shall not now discuss whether it was rightly or wrongly decided. It is open to an interpretation which would show that it was wrongly decided, but there is no need to go the length of giving it that interpretation. If it is interpreted so as to make it contradictory to the decision we are giving in the present case, then I must have decided a point on the Northern Circuit in two different ways within a very short space of time: (see Strahan v. Gabriel, not reported, referred to in the judgment in Nelson v. Dahl in the Court of Appeal, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 365; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 12 Ch. Div. 568.) Davies v. McVeagh (ubi sup.) was decided, I am inclined to think, on the ground that the description of the dock as the Wellington Dock, High Level, meant the Wellington Dock, and not a particular portion of it. But it does not signify now whether that case was decided rightly or wrongly; the present case is decided by Tapscott v. Balfour (ubi sup.). Some remarks were made during the argument, as to the number of lay days. Any stipulation as to the number of lay days, or as to demurrage, or as to the mode of delivery, are all stipulations as to delivery of cargo, which cannot take place until the carrying voyage is ended. The only question we have to determine here is, what was the end of the voyage; we have nothing to do with the delivery which is to take place afterwards. I think Charles, J. was right in the interpretation which he put on this agreement, as to what was to be the end of the carrying voyage, and the appeal must be dismissed. I may add that, as at present advised, I cannot approve of the decision in The Carisbrook (ubi sup.).

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This case turns on the construction of a charter-party, and it follows therefore that no rule can be laid down which cannot be modified in cases of other charter-parties. Nevertheless, charter-parties are well-known documents, and the court travels on well-known lines of interpretation, which it is advisable should always be made clear to the mercantile world. The question we have now to consider is, what was the end of this carrying voyage. The decision in Nelson v. Dahl (ubi sup.), which has been referred to, does not govern this case, but, applying the language there used by the court, we are safe in saying that the risk of the charterers as to demurrage begins as soon as the carrying voyage ends. We must therefore see where the terminus of the carrying voyage is placed by this charter-party. A good deal of confusion has been caused in the argument by a misapplication of the judgment in Davies v. McVeagh (ubi sup.), but no legal conclusion can be deduced from that case with certainty. I have read the judgments in that case and its subsequent explanation by the Master of the Rolls in Nelson v. Dahl (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 365; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 12 Ch. Div. 568), and it seems clear to me that the conclusion arrived at in that case was that the terms as to loading in the Wellington Dock, High Level, meant loading in the Wellington Dock, which has the high level. We have no need to consider here whether that conclusion was correct or not; we must take that construction to have been the proper one in that case, and the running days were to begin from the entry of the ship into that dock. When the terminus a quo had been settled, the rest of the case was easy. But that decision has been used in the argument as if it laid down a general rule in the interpretation of charter-parties that, when a larger place is named for the loading or discharging of the ship, and a particular spot in that larger place is also mentioned, demurrage begins for delay as soon as the larger place has been reached by the vessel. That surely cannot be the law. I think it is desirable that we should say that no such law was ever laid down in Davies v. McVeagh (ubi sup.). That case, however, is not in point with regard to the one we are dealing with now, as no option was there given to the charterers. Here an option was given to the charterers to name the terminus of the voyage, and it has been argued that, as soon as the vessel was placed at the disposal of the charterers the voyage was at an end. That proposition is a great deal too large, if it means that, as soon as the vessel arrived at the place where the charterers were to exercise their option, the demurrage days began. The time at which the charterers were in the present case to exercise their option in naming the berth for the unloading was the ship's arrival at Garston Dock; but it might well be that in another contract, at the time for exercising the option, the place named might be at a distance from where the ship was, and it could not be in such a case that the duty to unload should commence at once. If the time meant is when the ship is placed at the disposal of the charterer for the purpose of unloading, that does not solve the difficulty, but brings us back to the same question—when is the carrying voyage at an end? The time is not named in the charter-party, but power is given to the charterers to fix it, and their fixing of it is just as conclusive as if it had been written in the document. "The charterers," says Bovill, C.J., in Tapscott v. Balfour (ubi sup.), "were to have the selection of the dock, and they accordingly selected the Wellington Dock. It seems to me that the effect of such selection was precisely as if that dock had been expressly named in the charter-party originally." That principle is exactly applicable to the case we are dealing with now.

But, besides that point, another one was taken, and we were told that the option which was given to the charterers was not properly exercised unless the berth named was open at the time it was named. There is confusion in this argument also. The option was given for the benefit of the charterers, and must be exercised within a reasonable time, but I do not think that they were bound to exercise it otherwise than for their own benefit, or were bound to exercise it for the benefit of the other party. Their option was to choose a berth, that is to say, a berth which was reasonably fit for the purpose of delivering the cargo. It would not do to choose one which is blocked up; in such a case the option would not be exercised, and that is what Lord Blackburn meant in the House of Lords in Nelson v. Dahl (ubi sup.), where he says: "If the charter-party had left it free to the merchant to select a dock, it may well be that he was bound to select one into which admittance could be procured." The cases he cited for that proposition are Ogden v. Graham (1 B. & S. 773) and Samuel v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company (8 B. & C. 119). To limit the option of the charterer by saying that, in choosing a berth, he is to suit the convenience of the shipowner seems to me to deprive him of the benefit that he has bargained for. One berth may be more convenient for him, whether for business or any other reason, than another. The most that can be said is, that the charterer does not exercise his option unless he names a berth that is either free or soon likely to be so. As to Murphy v. Coffin (ubi sup.) I think it was rightly decided, though perhaps Mathew, J. would not have used the language he did in speaking of Davies v. McVeagh if that case had not been so pressed upon him. So far as I can see at present, The Carisbrook (ubi sup.) seems to me to have been wrongly decided; it certainly is if it is inconsistent with our decision in the present case. As to the Scotch case of Dall'Orso v. Mason and Co. (ubi sup.) I need only say that I do not see how the language there used can be justified. In the charter-party we have now to deal with I am of opinion that no terminus for the carrying voyage was fixed other than the arrival of the vessel at the berth named by the charterers, and that the decision of the learned judge was right. The appeal will be dismissed.

Kay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and will add little. The real question we have to decide is the meaning of this charter-party. By it an option is given to the charterers to indicate the particular berth at which the ship shall discharge her cargo. That option must have been given for the benefit of the person to whom it was given, and it was an obvious way of giving the charterers a benefit to allow them to fix what was to be the end of the carrying voyage. If the vessel was to continue the carrying voyage until she reached the berth indicated by the charterers there is no difference between this case and one where the charter-party expressly fixes when the carrying voyage is to end. The particular berth selected by the charterers must be read into the charter-party as if it had been originally put there, so that the meaning of the charter-party is that the carrying voyage is to continue from Huelva to the particular berth in Garston Dock named by the charterers. I understand that all the berths in the dock were occupied when the vessels arrived, so that I reserve my opinion as to what action of the charterers in exercising their option might render them liable to pay damages. That question does not arise here.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Saturday, Nov. 28, 1891.

(Before Wright, J.)

The Castlegate Steamship Company Limited v. Dempsey and Co.(a)

Charter-party—Demurrage—Liability of charterer—Strike of dock labourers—Dilatoriness of dock company.

A charter-party provided that the vessel having been loaded should proceed to Garston, and deliver the cargo as customary on being paid freight, the cargo to be discharged with all despatch as customary, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days, at 6d. per net register ton per day, lay days to count from the day after the vessel is in her proper loading place and discharging berth.

The vessel arrived at Garston on the 10th Nov., and the discharge of her cargo began on the 14th Nov. On the 19th Nov. a strike took place amongst the labourers employed by the dock company to discharge the vessel, and in consequence the discharge of the cargo was not completed until the 3rd Dec.

It was found as a fact that the discharge of the cargo should in the absence of the strike have been completed in ten days, whereas it actually took twenty days, and that of the delay a portion equal to two days was to be attributed to actual cessation of work or short hours, and a portion equal to two more days to the inexperience of the men employed. The dock company who did the work of discharging the vessel on behalf of both the shipowner and the charterer were at all times unduly dilatory as a matter of habit.

Held, that the shipowner was entitled to demurrage in respect of four days' delay, but not in respect of the further delay caused by the habitual dilatoriness of the dock company.

This action was tried before Wright, J., without a jury at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, when his Lordship reserved judgment.

The plaintiffs claimed 342*l.* 6*s.* for twelve days' demurrage of their steamship Castlegate, whilst discharging a cargo of sleepers at Garston Dock, in Nov. and Dec. 1890.

By a charter-party dated the 18th Oct. 1890, it was agreed between the plaintiffs, as the owners of the steamship Castlegate, at that time at Revel, and the defendants that the said vessel should proceed to Riga, and there load as customary a full and complete cargo of sleepers, and that she should therewith proceed to Garston and deliver the same as customary on being paid freight at certain rates therein specified:

The act of God; the Queen's enemies; restraints of princes, rulers, or people, and the consequences of hostilities, loss or damage from fire on board, in hulk or craft, or on shore; collisions; any act, neglect or default whatsoever of pilots, master, or crew, in navigation of the ship; and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and rivers, and of navigation of whatever nature or kind excepted, subject to the regulations of the ports, and weather and ice permitting, and to the navigation being officially declared open, the cargo to be supplied alongside as fast as the steamer can take it in, Sundays and legal holidays excepted, and to be discharged with all despatch as customary, and ten days on demurrage, over and above the said lying days at 6*d.* per net register ton per day. Lay days to count from the day after the vessel is in her proper loading place and discharging berth, and notice in writing duly given, but three days' final notice to be given to the shippers of vessel being ready to load. Vessel to discharge in a dock and berth as ordered by charterers or their agents.

The Castlegate duly proceeded to Riga, and having there loaded her cargo sailed for Garston, where she arrived on the 10th Nov. She docked on the following day, but she did not get into a berth until the 14th Nov., and at 3.30 p.m. on that day the discharge of her cargo commenced. The docks at Garston belong to the London and North-Western Railway Company, who provide the men and appliances necessary to unload vessels arriving there.

At noon upon the 19th Nov. the men in the employment of the railway company at the docks struck, and declined to go on unloading the vessels. The railway company brought men from towns at a distance to do the work, but owing to the inexperience of these men, and to the shorter hours that they worked, the whole of the cargo of the Castlegate was not discharged until 10 a.m. upon the 3rd Dec.

Evidence was given at the trial that it was well known that cargoes were not discharged at Garston with the same expedition as at other docks, even when there was no strike among the men employed.

Barnes, Q.C. and Pickford appeared for the plaintiffs.

Kennedy, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 28.—Wright, J.—In this case the dispute is whether the shipowner or the charterer is to bear the loss, in the nature of demurrage, occasioned by a strike of labourers during the unloading of a cargo of sleepers at Garston. The charter-party was in the following form so far as material: The ship was to "proceed to Garston and deliver the cargo as customary on being paid freight, &c. . . . subject to the regulations of the ports, and weather and ice permitting, and to the navigation being officially declared open, the cargo to be supplied alongside as fast as the steamer can take it in (Sundays and legal holidays excepted), and to be discharged with all despatch as customary, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days, at 6*d.* per net register ton per day; vessel to discharge in a dock and berth as ordered by charterers or their agents. The usual custom of the wood trade of each port to be observed by each party in cases not specially expressed. The act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates, and thieves, arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and people, collisions, stranding, and other accidents of navigation excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner." In relation to the time for unloading, three forms of charter-party are in common use. One form specifies a limited period of days or other time within which the unloading is to be completed; and under that form it is settled law that the charterer must pay for detention by a strike or otherwise beyond that period unless a different intention has been expressed, or the detention is the fault of the shipowner himself or of persons for whose conduct he is to be held responsible: (Budgett v. Binnington, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 592; 63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 742; (1891) 1 Q. B. 35; Porteous v. Watney, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195; 3 Q. B. Div. 534; Thin v. Byers, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 526; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 147; 1 Q. B. Div. 244; Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599.) Another form is silent as to the time within which the unloading is to be completed, and under that form it seems equally well settled that the charterer is bound only to use reasonable despatch, and this has been held by the Court of Appeal in Hick v. Rodocanachi (65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 300; (1891) 2 Q. B. Div. 626), following Ford v. Cotesworth (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 468; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 544), to mean not that the charterer must unload within a time which would be reasonable under ordinary circumstances, but only that he must use proper diligence under the actual circumstances, and he is therefore not liable for delay by a strike, unless the strike is attributable to his own default. Compare Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.). The third form fixes a limit of time, not directly, but by some mode of reference to the custom of the port of discharge, and under this form it has been decided in the same case that the period so indicated is not necessarily the customary time under ordinary circumstances, and that impediments arising in the particular case from or out of the custom or practice of the port, which the charterer could not have overcome by reasonable diligence, may or ought to be taken into consideration in his favour.

In the present case the charter-party appears clearly to be of the third kind. The expression is "to be discharged with all despatch as customary," and in this expression the words "as customary" appear properly referable to the word "despatch" as a description of time and not to the mere manner of unloading. See Lord Justice Thesiger's judgment in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 603; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 4 Ex. Div. 158). The question is whether under such a charter-party the rule applied to the second form in Hick v. Rodoconachi (ubi sup.) is applicable; so that the charterer would be bound only to use proper diligence under the actual circumstances, and so would not be liable for the consequences of the strike, or whether he is not bound to discharge within the customary time except so far as delay may have resulted from impediments arising out of the custom or practice of the port itself. I am of opinion that the rule adopted by the Court of Appeal in Hick v. Rodoconachi (ubi sup.) is not applicable in the present case. That rule, if so applied, would in effect give to a charter-party which specifies that the unloading is to be done "with all despatch as customary" the same meaning as if it had contained no such words. An undertaking to unload "with all despatch as customary" necessarily involves something more than the ordinary obligation which would exist if that undertaking had been omitted. Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) decides that under a charter-party of this kind the charterer may be excused by impediments arising from, or out of, the custom and practice of the port itself, including probably impediments arising from the extent and nature of the accomodation and appliances of the port; but it does not decide that he is excused by extraneous impediments such as a strike, which in no way arises from or out of that custom or practice. It is, no doubt, the fact that in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.), Lord Blackburn appears to some extent to have treated decisions on charter-parties of the second kind as authorities in relation to charter-parties of the third kind; but I cannot discover any indication of an intention to lay down any different rule from that which is to be gathered from the other opinions delivered in that case. In this view of the construction of the charter-party, it remains to ascertain the time which would have been occupied in the unloading if the strike had not occurred. The actual time extended to twenty days, of which I find that a portion equal to two days is to be attributed to actual cessation of work or short hours, and a portion equal to two more days to inexperience, or want of organisation, in the strangers employed, and for these four days the charterers are liable. A further question arises in this way. It is said, and I find it to be the fact, that the dock company, who customarily and actually did the work of discharge both for the shipowner and the charterer, were unduly dilatory as a matter of habit, both at the time in question and at other times, and that with the ordinary appliances of the port the cargo should, in the absence of a strike, have been discharged in a period which I find to be ten days, and if the charterers are responsible for this the plaintiffs are entitled to ten days' demurrage, including the four days due to the strike. There is, however, evidence that the slackness of the dock company in doing the work was notorious, and was taken into account by persons chartering their ships for Garston. It was nevertheless customary to allow the dock company to do the work, and any delay so caused was attributable in part to them in their character as representatives of the shipowner in getting the cargo out of the ship. Under these circumstances, and having regard to the fact that the port is fixed by the charter-party, I think the shipowner is not entitled to insist upon a different and more energetic system of management, and that apart from the strike there is no sufficient evidence of less than "all despatch as customary." There will be, therefore, judgment for the plaintiffs for 114*l.* 2*s.*, being demurrage for four days at the rate agreed upon in the charter-party.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Tuesday, Jan. 20, 1891.

(Before the Right Hon. Sir James Hannen, assisted by Trinity Masters.)

The August. (a)

Carriage of goods—German ship—Law of the flag.

Where cargo was shipped by British subjects on board a German ship for carriage to England under English bills of lading, the Court, in an action for short delivery,

Held, that the master was entitled to deal with it according to the law of the flag; and hence, where he had sold part of the cargo at a port of distress without instructions from the shippers, such sale was justifiable by German law, as he had, after taking the best advice he could obtain, sold the cargo in the honest belief that he was acting for the best for all parties in the emergency which had arisen.

This was an action for non-delivery of cargo in which the plaintiffs claimed 3945*l.* 15*s.* and interest from the defendants, the owners of the German ship the August.

The cargo in question consisted of pepper, and was shipped in bags by the plaintiffs on board the August, at Singapore, to be carried to London under English bills of lading in the ordinary form by which the goods were to be delivered to the plaintiffs, Boustead and Co., the shippers, or their assigns, on payment of freight, the act of God, Queen's enemies, fire, all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature or kind soever, excepted. The words

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

"Queen's enemies" were altered in some of the bills of lading to "Emperor's enemies."

The August, which was a general ship, commanded by a German master, left Singapore on the 25th May 1889, and in June, July, and August met with a continuance of heavy weather which eventually caused her to be put into Table Bay, where she arrived on the 14th Aug. The ship was there put into the hands of the charterers' agents, and the charterers and the various shippers, including Boustead and Co., were informed of what had happened. The ship and cargo were then surveyed by three surveyors on the 16th, 19th, and 27th Aug. These surveyors reported that the ship was considerably damaged, and recommended discharge of some of the cargo (which was done) to enable the necessary repairs to be effected. They also reported that the cargo (including the pepper in question) was damaged by sea water, and recommended that it should be examined by competent merchants. Accordingly two general merchants (admittedly not specialists in pepper, but nevertheless the most competent persons that could be obtained at the Cape) examined the cargo on the 27th Aug., the 30th Aug., and the 2nd Sept. These gentlemen reported that the cargo was damaged, that it was unmerchantable, and recommended that it should be sold by public auction.

On the 3rd Sept. 500 bags of pepper were sold, and realised an average of 2*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.* per 100lbs. On the 10th Sept. 580 bags were sold, and realised an average of 1*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* per 100lbs. On the 11th Oct. 14 bags were sold, and realised an average of 2*l.* 6*s.* per 100lbs. Of the above 1094 bags sold in Cape Town, 346 bags were sent on by the vendees to London, and there sold, where they realised substantially the price of sound pepper, being sold at prices varying from 5*d.* to 5¾*d.* per pound, the market price for sound pepper being 6*d.* The remainder of the 1094 bags were resold at the Cape, at a profit of 15 per cent.

The surveys and sales took place with the authority of the German Consul-General at Cape Town.

On the 17th Nov. the August, having been repaired, left Cape Town, and reached London in Jan. 1890.

The plaintiffs based their claim on breach of contract of carriage, or alternatively in tort for wrongful deprivation of their goods.

The defence and counter-claim were as follows:

1. The defendants say that the plaintiffs are not the owners of the pepper or the holders of bills of lading in respect thereof, and that they are not entitled to maintain this action.

2. The defendants deny that there has been any breach of the contract contained in the bills of lading mentioned in the statement of claim, to which bills of lading the defendants crave leave to refer. By the said bills of lading the pepper therein mentioned was to be delivered to the plaintiffs only unless prevented by certain excepted perils, and the delivery of the said pepper to the plaintiffs was prevented by the said excepted perils.

3. To the alternative claim the defendants deny that they wrongfully deprived the plaintiffs of 1094 bags of pepper, or any bags of pepper, and say that, even if the said pepper or any part of it was the property of the plaintiffs, which the defendants do not admit, the said pepper was lawfully and necessarily sold in the interest of and on behalf of the plaintiffs, and that the defendants have always been ready and willing to account for the proceeds of the sale of the said pepper to the lawful owners thereof on being paid the money due to the defendants in respect of the carriage of the said pepper, and other charges in respect thereof, and the defendants have paid into court in this action to await further order of the court an amount far in excess of any balance due to the plaintiffs in respect of the said pepper, and on account of the sale thereof.

4. In the alternative the defendants say that the contract of carriage of the said goods was entered into by the master of the defendants' ship as the agent of the charterers of the said ship, and that the said ship is a German vessel, and entitled to fly the German flag, and to all the privileges of a German ship, and that the defendants and charterers of the said ship were German subjects resident in Germany, and that the master of the said ship was a German subject, and that the charter-party of the said ship is a German contract, and that the contracts contained in the bills of lading for the carriage of the said pepper were made and entered into subject to German law, and that by the laws of Germany the sale of the said goods under the circumstances at the place where and the time when the said goods were sold was lawful and right, and that the defendants incurred no liability by reason of the said sale, and that the defendants are entitled by the said laws to receive from the plaintiffs, or owners of the said goods, or holders of the said bills of lading, the freight agreed upon for the carriage of the said goods, and the defendants say they are entitled to set off the said freight and other charges incurred on and about the said goods against the proceeds of the said goods in their hands, and that the plaintiffs are only entitled to the excess (if any) of the realised value of the said goods (if such goods or any part of them belonged to the plaintiffs, which the defendants do not admit) over and above the amount of such freight, together with the said charges upon the said goods, and the defendants have always been ready and willing to pay over any such excess in value, and have paid into court to await further order a sum much greater than any such excess.

And by way of counter-claim:

5. The defendants claim to be paid for the carriage of the said goods, or any part thereof belonging to the plaintiffs. The defendants also claim to be paid for other charges incurred and disbursements made by them on account of the plaintiffs in and about the said goods, or such part thereof as belongs to the plaintiffs, and to receive from the plaintiffs their contribution to general average charges on account of the said goods, or such part thereof as belongs to the plaintiffs.

6. In the alternative the defendants claim freight for the carriage of the said goods and other charges incurred on behalf of the said goods, in accordance with the provisions of the law of the German empire, by which the contract to carry the said goods is governed.

7. And the defendants further say that subsequently to the commencement of this action, and subsequently to the payment into court by them referred to in the 3rd paragraph of the defence herein, at which time the accounts between the parties had not been stated, they have ascertained that the money so paid into court by them to cover all possible claims by the plaintiffs was in excess of all such claims to the amount of 217*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.*, and the defendants further say that the plaintiffs have received the whole of the money so paid into court, and taken it out of court and converted it to their own use, and the defendants claim in any event to be repaid by the plaintiffs the amount of 217*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.* paid in excess of their liability.

At the trial the defendants called a German advocate, by name Hermann Hildebrand, who stated that, according to German law, if the master, after taking the best advice he can obtain on the spot, honestly comes to the conclusion that a sale of the cargo is best for the interest of its owners, such sale is justified even though it subsequently turn out that there was in fact no necessity for the sale, and that it would have been better to have dealt with the cargo in some other way.

The plaintiffs cross-examined this witness, but called no evidence to contradict him.

The article in the German Commercial Code relied on by the defendants is set out in the judgment.

Barnes, Q.C. and Hollams for the plaintiffs.—The defendants have not justified the sale of the pepper, and hence are liable. The contract is to be determined by English and not by German law:

Re The Missouri Steamship Company Limited, 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 316; 42 Ch. Div. 321; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 423;
The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company v. Shand, 3 Moo. P. C. N. S. 272; Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherland Steam Navigation Company, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 10 Q. B. Div. 521; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65.

If so, the test of the validity of the sale is whether there was in fact necessity for it. In this case the master has acted unreasonably, and without a due regard to the interests of the cargo owners:

Notara v. Henderson, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 225; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278;
Australasian Steam Navigation Company v. Morse, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 222; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 407.

Even assuming the contract to be governed by German law, the conduct of the master would not justify the sale.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Dr. Raikes, and A. Pritchard), for the defendants, contrâ.—The propriety of the sale is to be determined in this case by the law of the flag:

Lloyd v. Guibert, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 283;
The Gaetano and Maria, 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 835; 7 P. Div. 137; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 470, 535;
Russell v. Niemann, 17 C. B. N. S. 163.

The master acted honestly and reasonably after obtaining the best advice he could on the spot. The mere fact that it subsequently turned out that the pepper was worth more than it realised at the Cape will not make the shipowners liable.

Hollams, for the plaintiffs, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 20.—The PRESIDENT (Sir James Hannen).—This action is brought in respect of pepper sold at Cape Town as damaged, it being contended for the plaintiffs that such sale was not necessary or justifiable. The defendants pleaded that the August was "a German vessel, entitled to fly the German flag, and to all the privileges of a German ship; and that the defendants and charterers of the said ship were German subjects resident in Germany; and that the master was a German subject; and that the charter-party was a German contract; and that the contracts contained in the bills of lading for the carriage of the said pepper were made and entered into subject to German law; and that by the German law the sale of the said goods was lawful and right." The question raised by this plea was first argued before me, it being agreed that the other questions arising in the case should stand over until I had determined whether the propriety or impropriety of the conduct of the master in selling the pepper was to be determined by English or German law. The broad distinction suggested to exist between the English and German law on the subject under consideration is that, by the English law, it is not sufficient to justify the sale of goods at a port of refuge that the master acted in good faith and in the exercise of the best judgment he could form, if it should be held by the tribunal before which the question may come that there was not in fact a real necessity for the sale; whereas, by the German law, the sale will be justified if the master, after taking the best advice he can obtain, honestly comes to the conclusion that a sale is best for the interest of the persons for whom he is called upon to act in the emergency which has arisen. This is not given as a complete statement of the German law on the subject, but merely as an indication of the nature of its difference from the English law for the purposes of the present inquiry. The argument for the defendants is based on the principle laid down by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.), that where the contract of affreightment does not provide otherwise as between the parties to the contract in respect of sea damage and its incidents, the law of the country to which the ship belongs must be taken to be the law to which they have submitted themselves. In the very learned judgment in that case delivered by Willes, J. on behalf of the Exchequer Chamber he says: "Exceptional cases, should they arise, must be dealt with upon their own merits. In laying down a rule of law, regard ought rather to be had to the majority of cases upon which doubt and litigation are more likely to arise; and the general rule that, where the contract of affreightment does not provide otherwise, there, as between the parties to such contract, in respect of sea damage and its incidents, the law of the ship should govern, seems to be not only in accordance with the probable intention of the parties, but also most consistent and intelligible, and therefore most convenient to those engaged in commerce." This subject has since been very fully considered by the Court of Appeal in the case of The Gaetano and Maria (ubi sup.). In that case goods were shipped by British subjects under a charter-party made in London for the carriage of goods to England in an Italian ship. The ship put into Fayal in distress, and the master entered into a bottomry bond, by which he hypothecated the cargo as well as the ship, without communicating, as he might have done, with the cargo owners, but which by the Italian law he was not bound to do. The question was, whether the captain was bound by the English law by which he would have had no authority to bind the owners of the cargo without communicating with them, or by the Italian law under which such communication was unnecessary. The present Master of the Rolls in giving judgment in that case says: "What is the principle which ought to govern this case? The goods are put on board an Italian ship, and the person to exercise authority is an Italian master. Is the authority of the Italian master to depend upon the law of the country of the shipper when that law is contrary to the law of his own country? Why should it? Is the master of the ship to be taken to know the law of the country of each shipper of the goods which are put on board his ship? It would be strange if that were so. If a merchant puts his goods into the power of an Italian master on board an Italian owner's ship, what is the meaning of the transaction but that he is to deal with the goods as an Italian master is to be taken to deal with goods on board his ship unless he is bound to another mode? Upon principle it seems to me that, he who ships goods on board a foreign ship, ships them to be dealt with by the master of that ship according to the law of the country of that ship unless there is a stipulation to the contrary." After reviewing the facts of the case of Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.) and pointing out that there the contract was one of affreightment, he continues: "Still, if the contract was there held to be a foreign contract because it was made with regard to the shipment of goods on board a foreign ship, the principle governs this case, and would authorise one saying that the authority which arises out of the contract of shipment is the authority which the law of the country of the ship would give to the master." Cotton, L.J. thus states the principle applicable: "When the owner of goods puts them on board a vessel he must authorise the owner of that vessel and his agent the captain to deal with those goods according to the law of the country to which that vessel belongs." This "rule is applicable, because no one who ships goods on board a vessel can be ignorant of the flag—that is of the country to which the ship belongs—whilst the master would be in a very difficult position if he had to inquire what was the law of the country of the goods—if, as regards one portion of the cargo, he had to deal with it when the necessity arose in one way, and as regards another portion of the cargo in another way." This appears to me to be a binding authority in the present case unless a valid distinction can be drawn between the law which is to govern the right of a master to hypothecate cargo, and that applicable to his right to sell it in circumstances of emergency. I can find no such distinction, and it will have been seen that the passages I have quoted from the judgments in Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.) and The Gaetano and Maria (ubi sup.) are perfectly general, and apply with equal force to the case of a master called upon in a position of difficulty to determine whether he should sell goods as to that of one having to determine whether he should pledge them.

It was urged also for the plaintiffs that a later case in the Court of Appeal, viz., The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands (ubi sup.) modified the decision in The Gaetano and Maria (ubi sup.), and supported their contention. I am of opinion, however, that it has no such effect. There is no suggestion throughout the judgments there delivered that there was any intention to vary the law as laid down in the earlier cases I have cited. The goods were shipped under a bill of lading containing among other excepted risks "collision." In the course of the voyage the carrying ship collided with another vessel belonging to the same owners, both ships being to blame. A question in dispute was whether both were Dutch. It was held that whether Dutch or not the defendants were liable in tort for the negligence of their servants on board the ship with which the carrying vessel collided. This case does not appear to me to throw any light upon the one now under consideration. It was held in that case that the contract was English, even though the ship in which the goods were carried was Dutch. Assuming that the contract in the present case was English, that does not govern the question of what law is to be applied to goods carried in a German ship, a state of facts not provided for and not contemplated by the contract having arisen. Such facts existing, we must consider what law it is just to apply in these exceptional circumstances, and for the reasons so forcibly stated in Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.) and in The Gaetano and Maria (ubi sup.), it appears to me that the master of the August could only be expected to act in conformity with the law of his flag.

Holding, therefore, as I do, that the captain, in dealing with the damaged cargo at the port of distress, was entitled to act in accordance with German law, I proceed to consider what is the German law applicable to such a case. Upon this point I have to rely solely on the evidence of Mr. Hildebrand, a witness called for the defendants. No witness was called on behalf of the plaintiffs to contradict Mr. Hildebrand's testimony, and that must be accepted by me as correct, judged of course in its entirety as modified by cross-examination. I may add that Mr. Hildebrand appeared to me to give his evidence with intelligence and candour, and without bias in favour of the party by whom he was called. He bases his evidence on the 504th article of the German Commercial Code. That article is thus rendered in Dr. Wendt's translation of the code, which the witness proved to be correct: "The master shall take every possible care of the cargo during the voyage in the interest of those concerned therein. When special measures are required in order to avoid or lessen a loss, it is his duty to protect the interest of those concerned in the cargo, as their representative, to take their instructions if possible, and so far as the circumstances admit to carry the same into effect; otherwise, however, to act according to his own discretion, and generally to take every possible care that those interested in the cargo are speedily informed of such occurrences, and of the measures thereby rendered necessary. He is particularly in such cases authorised to discharge the whole, or a portion of the cargo; in extreme cases, if on account of imminent deterioration or for other causes a considerable loss cannot be otherwise averted, to sell or hypothecate it for the purpose of providing means for its preservation and further transport." It was said by the plaintiffs that the translation should be "most extreme cases." I see no practical difference between the two phrases; but further I accept the witness's evidence that the words are explained by what follows them, namely, that the cases referred to are those where "on account of imminent deterioration or for other causes a considerable loss cannot be otherwise averted." The interpretation which the witness states the German courts put upon this article is that, if in the extreme cases referred to, the captain, in the exercise of his discretion, after taking the best advice he can get on the spot of experts or otherwise, comes to the honest conclusion that it is best in the interests of the cargo owner that the cargo or a portion of it should be sold, he is not bound to prove that it was in fact the best course, and in particular that the cargo owner cannot impeach the captain's conduct by proof that in the result his conduct turned out to be inexpedient or damaging to the cargo owner. In support of his evidence of what is the German law on that subject the witness referred to several decided cases, some prior to the promulgation of the code, others subsequent; the former, he stated, are relied on in German courts as authority in showing the interpretation to be put on the general language of the code. Assuming, as I am bound to do, in the absence of evidence contradicting the witness that his evidence is correct, I think that these decisions support the witness's statement of the law. The case in which the legal principles on this subject are best illustrated is that of Moeller Brothers v. Biacone, Busch, and Co., reported in Seebohm's Collection of Judgments in Maritime Cases, vol. 1, p. 257, decided in 1861. There the plaintiffs, the owners of rice, shipped at Moulmein, sued the owners of the ship for the alleged wrongful act of the captain in selling the rice at Moulmein, to which port the ship was compelled to return in distress. The court of first instance held that the plaintiffs could not recover, because the sale had been made with the concurrence of Apfel and Co., the shippers of the cargo. This decision was reversed on appeal on the ground that Apfel and Co. could not be treated as parties who could dispose of the cargo, bills of lading to order having been signed by the captain which were no longer in the possession of Apfel and Co. The Court of Appeal therefore held that on the facts the captain was not justified in selling the rice. But on appeal to the Highest Appeal Court this decision was reversed, and the judgment appealed from restored, but not on the ground relied on by the court of first instance. The Supreme Court of Appeal held that the captain could not justify his acts merely as having been done with the consent and advice of Apfel and Co., but that he could justify them as having been done in the exercise of his judgment in good faith on the best advice he could obtain. It is unnecessary to set out the facts of the case, which in many respects resemble those of the case before me; but the principles upon which the court acted are very clearly set forth in the following, the governing passage of the judgment: "The defendants must either justify the proceedings of the captain, or take on themselves the consequences of his acts to the extent of their fortune de mer. The obligation to give this justification may be understood in different ways. One would cast on the master as well as on the owners the necessity to prove the absolute expediency or usefulness of the proceedings of the master; or, on the other hand, one might consider it sufficient if he could be proved personally to have acted without blame; so that the consequences of inexpedient and damaging measures taken by the captain must be borne by the parties interested in the cargo so long as he the master was induced to take them without culpa. The judgment of the Appeal Court, taking the first line of argument, cannot be assented to; on the contrary, so far as the duty of the master or owners under circumstances such as existed in this case is concerned, the only question is whether the proceedings of the master attended by damaging results could be considered from his standpoint as being expedient. For the master who has the custody of the goods entrusted to him is, on the one hand, obliged, and on the other is authorised to take in extraordinary cases such measures regarding the goods as may be considered in the circumstances as being in the interest of the owner, and in doing this he may and must follow his own well considered discretion. It is true in doing this, he has to apply the greatest diligence; for in a contract of hiring, of which the contract of affreightment appears to be a species, there is such custody as diligentissimus paterfamilias suis rebus adhibet; but if the master acts with all necessary care, and yet the measures taken by him afterwards prove inadmissible or even damaging, yet he and consequently the owners cannot be rendered responsible." It is unnecessary to set out the other German decisions relied on. They were cases of the sale of ships, as to which there are particular provisions in the code in exoneration of the captain who employs experts though he may have been misled by them. It was contended for the plaintiffs that as there are no such provisions expressly applicable to the sale of cargo, they had no bearing on the present case. Mr. Hildebrand, however, stated that they were applicable by analogy. They seem to me to tend to support rather than to detract from the evidence of the witness on the main points that the captain who acts in good faith on the best advice he can get, and believing that the sale of cargo in a port of distress is best for the cargo owner, is exonerated as well as the shipowner from the responsibility, though it may ultimately turn out that the advice was bad.

I now proceed shortly to state the facts, and to examine whether the captain of the August did fulfil the obligations of the German law as stated in the code, and explained by Mr. Hildebrand. [The learned Judge then dealt with the facts relating to the surveys and sale of the pepper at Cape Town.] No suggestion of fraud was made before me against anyone. But it was contended that the pepper ought not to have been sold, but should have been dried and re-bagged, and re-shipped. From the evidence it appears that Mr. Knight considered the expense of this, and the surveyors advised that this should not be done. A commission was appointed for the examination of witnesses at the Cape, and many, including Messrs. Dickson and Brown, were so examined. They were both of them merchants of position and of long standing at the Cape, and they gave evidence of the condition of the pepper, and their reasons in justification of the advice they gave. I am satisfied, upon a careful examination of the whole evidence, that they acted in perfect good faith, and in the belief that there was, as Mr. Brown expressed it, "a commercial necessity for the sale as the best course open, and that it was the wisest thing to do for the benefit of all concerned." Looking at the matter ex post facto, there can be no doubt that much of the pepper might have been reshipped and sent on to London, and some of it was in fact sent on by the purchasers in steamers, and it fetched a good price in this country. But it was a matter of speculation in which the purchasers have been fortunate. The difficulties of the case arose from pepper not being an article frequently dealt with at the Cape, and this pepper was also of a kind not generally known, and of a quality which does not suffer so much by sea-water as ordinary pepper. But the captain and those employed by him acted to the best of their lights, and no better advice could be obtained by the captain than that upon which he acted. I think also that no other communication with the owners of the pepper than that which was made was practicable. On the whole I am of opinion that the captain and the defendants are not responsible for the loss which has been sustained by the plaintiffs by the sale of their cargo, and my judgment must be for the defendants with costs.

The learned President having omitted in his judgment to deal with the counter-claim, the plaintiffs ultimately submitted to a decree settled in the registry, whereby they were ordered to pay the defendants the freight and general average charges.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Jan. 27, 29, June 23, and July 23, 1891.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury), Lords WATSON, BRAMWELL, HERSCHELL, MACNAGHTEN, and MORRIS.)

LITTLE AND OTHERS v. PORT TALBOT COMPANY. THE APOLLO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Damage—Dock—Duties of harbour-master.

A ship of the appellants, while in a dock the property of the respondent company, fouled her propeller, and it became necessary to put her upon the ground to free it. By the authority of the deputy harbour-master, whose powers and duties were regulated by a private Act of Parliament, the ship was placed in the sea lock leading into the dock for the purpose of being put on the ground. The lock had been lengthened since its original construction, but an old sill had been left, which made the bottom uneven. When the water was let out, the ship grounded on this sill and sustained serious damage.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below, Lords Bramwell and Morris dissenting), that the harbour-master was acting within the scope of his authority in authorising the use of the lock as a dry dock, and that the respondents were liable for his negligence in allowing the ship to take the ground in an improper place.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Fry and Lopes, L.JJ., Lord Esher, M.R. dissenting), reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 402; 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 286, who had affirmed a judgment of Butt, J., reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 356; 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 112, in an action brought by the appellants, the owners of the steamship Apollo, against the respondents. The facts appear from the head-note above, and from the judgments of their Lordships, and also in the reports in the courts below.

Jan. 27 and 29.—The case came on for argument before Lords Bramwell, Herschell, and Macnaghten.

Sir H. James, Q.C., Barnes, Q.C., and Synnott, for the appellants, argued that there was no evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the captain of the Apollo, as found by Butt, J. in the court below; the deputy harbour-master was acting within the scope of his authority as prescribed by the respondents' private Act (4 Will. 4, c. xliii., sects. 51, 60, 71), and the respondents were liable for his negligent performance of his duties. The ship was using the harbour under the orders of the harbour-master, for reward to be paid to the respondents, and there was a contract on their part that all parts of the harbour were reasonably fit for use. The lock is a part of the harbour, which the ship was using in a proper manner. They cited

The Rhosina, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 140; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 350; 10 P. Div. 24; affirmed on appeal, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 460; 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 30; 10 P. Div. 131;

Indermaur v. Dames, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 293; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 311.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster, Q.C.), Bucknill, Q.C., and Macrae, for the respondents, contended that this could not be put as an invitation into a trap; there was no negligence on the part of the harbour-master, and, even if there was, the respondents are not liable for it, as he was not acting within the scope of his ordinary employment. The effect of the evidence is that the captain used the lock as a bare licensee. The Rhosina is distinguishable; in that case the disaster was caused by the harbour-master's own act. See Ivay v. Hedges, 9 Q. B. Div. 80.

Barnes, Q.C. was heard in reply.

June 23.—Their Lordships requiring further argument, the case was re-argued before the same noble and learned Lords, with the addition of the Lord Chancellor (Halsbury), Lords Watson and Morris.

Sir H. James (Synnott with him) argued for the appellants.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster, Q.C.), Macrae with him, for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 23.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case the owners of the Apollo, screw-steamship, sued the Port Talbot Company for injury to their vessel while in the dock of which the defendants are the owners. The vessel was injured by resting on an old sill that lay across the middle of the lock, and projected above the level of the bottom of the lock for some fifteen or eighteen inches. When the water was withdrawn, and the vessel, which was loaded with 400 tons, allowed to rest on this projection, such parts of her as were not supported entirely sank and seriously injured the vessel. With respect to the amount of the damages, which were very considerable, no question arises here. The ship had gone into the dock, under circumstances as to which I will say a word presently, and had paid or was to pay for proper dock accommodation, and was subject to the orders and supervision of the dock authorities. While in the dock her screw was fouled in some way not material to inquire into, and it became necessary, for the purpose of her prosecuting her voyage that a rope, which had entangled her screw, should be removed. Ineffectual endeavours were made to accomplish this object by a diver; but ultimately the vessel was placed in the lock with the object of allowing her to rest upon the bottom of the lock, and so enabling workmen to get at her screw and disentangle it. The question is, who was responsible, if anyone, for the injuries which undoubtedly took place by the vessel being placed in the lock and the water being withdrawn as I have described. As a matter of fact, I think there can be doubt that the vessel was placed there by the authority of a person named Johns. Neither can I doubt that Johns assured the captain of the Apollo that it was a safe operation. Unsatisfactory as is the mode in which Johns gives his evidence, yet it seems to me that his own admission of what he stated to the captain of the Apollo shows that he did give, and intended to give, an assurance to the captain of the Apollo that the operation might be safely performed. Johns admits that the captain came ashore and asked him "what sort of a bottom it was;" that in reply he told him "it was stone and brick he had to lay on." The captain asked him whether it was level, and he told him "it was level from gate to gate as far as he knew," and then he adds the words that "he had never seen the bottom." That the captain asked the question with reference to the level of the bottom of the dock, and that Johns answered it in some words which conveyed the assurance that it was so level that the vessel could safely rest upon it, I cannot entertain a doubt, since the object of the captain in asking is clear enough; in asking it that was plainly implied, and that the answer was something that implied safety is all but proved by the fact of the placing of the vessel in the dock for the purpose of the operation by the assent and under the direction of both the captain and Johns. I will deal presently with the question of what assurance was conveyed to the captain by the words used; but that they conveyed, and were intended to convey, an assurance that the captain might safely permit his vessel to be placed in the dock for the purpose of being grounded, I cannot entertain a doubt.

The question of course remains, what was the extent of Johns' authority; whether he was a mere lockman or a person having authority over the dock? And the more important question still, whether, assuming him to be harbour-master, and invested with the ordinary authority of a harbour-master, the act done by him, or permitted to be done by him, was one which would bind the company of which he was the servant? With the former of these questions we have not now got to deal. It is admitted that Johns was acting in Fitzmaurice's (the actual harbour-master's) place, and that his acts may be treated as the acts of Fitzmaurice. But it is contended that, even if Fitzmaurice had given the orders or permission which were given, the company would not be liable because the thing done, or permitted to be done, was, in the language of the Lords Justices, abnormal and extraordinary, and beyond the scope of Fitzmaurice's authority to permit. In dealing with that question, it is important to consider what is the nature of the dock undertaking, and what things may be reasonably expected to be done in a dock, the business of which consists in receiving vessels for hire, and supplying therein all ordinary dock accommodation. I cannot think that it is an unusual or extraordinary operation that a vessel should be grounded. In this particular case it was the fouling of the screw necessitating investigation and repair below the level of the water, but there are many things which may require a vessel to be grounded, and, I should think, must be in the contemplation of everybody dealing with vessels. An injury may not uncommonly take place below the level of the water of a kind that may necessitate the vessel being grounded. One of the instances given by Mr. Fitzmaurice, the harbour-master, himself, is that vessels may want to caulk their sternposts. For such purposes it was not unusual in this particular dock sometimes to use the hard in the river and sometimes the lock in question. But, speaking generally, I should think that, in the nature of such a construction as a dock and the use to which it is ordinarily put, there would be involved the ordinary accommodation, if it could be safely got, of allowing vessels to ground for the purpose of undergoing repair. Now, that Johns at least permitted this to be done, and in respect of this particular place, there can be no doubt; and a dock company, I think, must be taken to hold out their harbour-master, or the person who fills that character for the moment, as possessing sufficient authority to inform ships where they may safely ground. Apart, therefore, from the controversy, who first suggested this operation, and confining myself to the admitted fact that this thing was done by permission of Johns with such assurances of its being safe as induced the captain to act upon them, I am of opinion that the company would be responsible for the harbour-master's act and representations. I quote Jervis, C.J. in Giles v. Taff Vale Railway Company (2 E. & B. 829): "I am of opinion that it is the duty of the company, carrying on a business, to leave upon the spot someone with authority to deal on behalf of the company with all cases arising in the course of their traffic as the exigency of the case may demand." In that case the Chief Justice was dealing with a railway company, and with the question whether planting quicks and giving directions in respect of them was an act within the authority of the general superintendent of the line, and it was agreed that the company was a railway company for carrying goods, and not a market-gardening company for the purpose of planting "quicks." But the reply was given in the words which I have quoted, and I certainly adopt them. The Chief Justice continues: "I think he had authority in the exigency of the traffic to keep the quicks in the mode in which they were kept, and that consequently they were in the custody of the company in the course of their ordinary business." So here I think the grounding of the vessel in a place which it may be quite true was not, in the original construction of the docks, intended as a dry dock, but would, looking to the assurance from the person left in charge of the business of the dock company, be fit and appropriate for the purpose, would be an act which to my mind is neither abnormal nor extraordinary, if by those words it is intended to convey something outside anything that could be ordinarily and reasonably contemplated as part of the business which the dock company were carrying on.

Something has been argued with respect to the particular language in which Johns conveyed the assurance of security, and, in order to appreciate this, it becomes necessary to add a word or two upon the construction of the lock. It had originally been shorter. The process of lengthening it had left the sill already described across the middle of the lock. It is almost inconceivable that anyone who knew of such an inequality at the bottom of the dock could have permitted such an operation to be performed without seeing the danger to which it exposed a heavily-loaded vessel to ground there. Johns suggests that he did not know of the obstruction; but, singularly enough, Butt, J., while actually finding contributory negligence in the captain for not knowing or inferring that such an obstruction might be there, accepts the explanation of Johns, that he did not know of the obstruction in question. Johns had been there three years, and I am certainly not disposed myself to accept the statement that Johns did not know what was the nature of the bottom; but to my mind it is immaterial whether he did or did not. He, as acting harbour-master, was there for the express purpose of giving directions to vessels how and where they should dispose themselves in the dock of which he was harbour-master, and I think that the captain of the vessel might well be justified in accepting Johns' statement as to the nature and construction of the dock. Whether, as a fact, Johns knew it or not, it is not denied (indeed, Johns himself proves it) that he told the captain that the bottom was stone and brick to lie on; he uses words I have already quoted. And he was asked if it was level, and he told the captain it was level from gate to gate as far as he knew. I do not believe the words of qualification "as far as I know" could have passed. The language Johns admits himself to have used was such as presumed a knowledge of the nature of the bottom, and if there was any qualification which could reasonably have led the captain to suppose that the harbour-master did not know the nature of the bottom upon which he was about to place the ship, I do not believe he would have permitted it to be done. As I have said, I think it is immaterial whether Johns knew the condition of the bottom or not, because I believe, however conveyed, he did intend to convey, and did convey, an assurance of its security. Of course I do not mean to deny that if, instead of what I believe Johns did say, he had said something to the effect: "You may try the experiment if you like, but I personally do not know what the bottom of the lock is; it may be even or uneven for aught I know to the contrary"—I do not deny that, if this, or anything like this, had been the effect of the conversation, the captain would have tried the experiment at his own risk. The question of contributory negligence was faintly suggested, but, in fact, it is disposed of by what I have already said, even if insisted on, since whatever presumption might have arisen from seeing the intermediate lock gates (if the captain had seen them, which, as a matter of fact, he did not) would be entirely displaced by the assurance of the harbour-master, if it was given, as I believe it was, that the bottom of the lock was "level from end to end." For I entirely reject the explanation of what the harbour-master says was in his own mind, that he referred to the interior gates when he said "from gate to gate" in reply to a question which, so far as it was important and revelant to the inquiry, he must have understood referred to the safety of the bottom from one end of the lock to the other. I have, for convenience of statement, described Johns as the harbour-master. I have done so for one reason, because it has been admitted in the argument he was doing what Fitzmaurice would have done had Fitzmaurice himself been in health to perform his ordinary duties, and therefore, as between the company and the person applying for directions, he was the person held out by the company as the proper person to give directions. The question, it must be remembered, is not whether he was the regularly appointed harbour-master or not. As a matter of fact, I find he was performing the duties which he did perform by the authority of the company, and those duties were of such a character as, to my mind, to make the company responsible for the negligent performance of the particular duty which is here in question. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, and that the appellants (the plaintiffs in the action) are entitled to judgment and to the costs both here and in the courts below.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: I also am of opinion that, in permitting and superintending the use of the entrance lock by the Apollo for the purpose of clearing her screw, Captain Johns was within the scope of his authority as acting harbour-master and that the respondents are therefore answerable for his negligence. In coming to that conclusion I have been influenced by considerations which are fully explained in the opinions of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Herschell, which I have had the advantage of perusing. In these circumstances I do not think it necessary to occupy your Lordships' time, and have simply to express my concurrence in the judgment proposed, and in the reasons which my noble and learned friends have assigned for it.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: In this case I find that Johns had the power of harbour-master at the time the Apollo was in the dock, and that he had power to permit her to enter the lock as she did for the purpose for which she did. I do not think anyone doubts that Fitzmaurice could have given that permission; and I find Johns had his power at the time; that he had no power to make a contract making the company responsible for the fitness of the lock for a vessel to ground; that he did not do so, but only licensed the use of it tale quale; that he did not order the Apollo to go there as Lord Esher, M.R. says; that she was not in distress within the meaning of the statute; that the lock was, indeed, within the area of the Act of Parliament, and part of the dock; but that the Apollo had no right to go there for the purpose for which she did; that purpose was abnormal and extraordinary. She was not ordered or directed to do so, and did not in so doing obey orders of officers; nor do I believe that Johns did more than say he thought the lock was safe. What he said may have amounted to an assurance, but not to a warranty, that the lock was safe. If it did, he had no authority to give it. The circumstances did not make it necessary she should do what she did. She might have been towed outside and lain on the mud. This was at one time contemplated, but Johns, unfortunately for the defendants, for no profit to them or him, suggested out of goodwill it would be better for the Apollo and the owners that she should go into the lock. I entirely agree with Fry, L.J. It is manifest, from the evidence of Jenkins, that it was a licence. If only that, with an assurance that the lock was safe, on what principle are the defendants liable? Supposing that she went into the lock as part of the treatment she was entitled to, no doubt the defendants are liable, for they were bound to have every place to which a ship had a right to go in a fit condition to receive her when ordered there. So that, whether Johns was negligent or whether the Apollo's captain was negligent or not, the defendants would be liable in that case.

If it is taken that Johns contracted for the fitness of the lock, then there are two objections: first, he had no authority to do so; and next, there was no consideration for his so doing. I agree with what was said by Jervis, C.J., as quoted by the Lord Chancellor; but it would be as well also to look at what was said in that case by Parke, B. and Maule, J. In such a case as this, it is impossible that the word "negligence" should not appear. Now I think Johns was negligent. That he believed that the vessel might safely ground on the lock I feel sure. Why should he have let her in if he doubted it? Other vessels had done the same thing safely; but he ought to have made sure and seen if there was a sill, and told the captain of any ship and let him decide whether he would use the lock. I am satisfied he did not wilfully put the Apollo in danger. He was negligent. But what then? No one can complain of negligence unless there was a duty to him of care. Was there any to the owners of the Apollo? I say no. The question is the same as that I have discussed. Johns had no authority to undertake any duty of care, nor to undertake that the lock was safe. I do not believe he did so undertake. The judgment should be affirmed, in my opinion.

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: The Apollo, a vessel of the appellants, left Swansea on the 23rd Dec. for Port Talbot, laden with about 260 tons of cargo. She passed through the lock which forms the entrance to Port Talbot Dock during the night, and whilst proceeding across the dock to a loading berth her propeller got foul of a rope so that the shaft was jammed, and the engines could not be worked. She was hauled into a loading berth, and there took in 140 more tons of cargo. The vessel being thus disabled, it became necessary for steps to be taken to clear the propeller. Accordingly, on the morning of the 25th Dec., the vessel, with the assent of the acting harbour-master (I will presently discuss whether that consent is to be regarded as a mere licence or otherwise), entered the lock which served as the entrance to the dock, in order that the water might be drawn off and access thus obtained to the propeller. After the vessel had taken the ground in the lock and some feet of water had been drawn off, a cracking noise was heard, and it was afterwards found that her keel was broken and her bottom badly strained. It appeared that some years ago the lock, which had been originally only 150 feet long, was lengthened to 300 feet. The gates, which at that time formed one end of the lock, were put back to the wall on either side, but the sill against which the gates had closed was left lying across the middle of the dock projecting some sixteen or eighteen inches above the level of the bottom. It was owing to this circumstance that the disaster occurred, the vessel not being supported along her entire length upon an even bottom.

The question is, whether the defendants, who are owners of the dock, are liable for the damage which the Apollo thus sustained. At the trial it was strongly contended, on behalf of the respondents, that the person whom I have called the acting harbour-master was not discharging any such functions, that he was merely the lockman authorised to pass vessels in and out of the dock; and this view appears to have been adopted by the learned judge who tried the action. At your Lordships' bar this contention was abandoned, and it was admitted that he was the acting harbour-master, and that the respondents were as much responsible for his acts as if they had been those of the harbour-master himself, who was at that time confined to bed by illness. I shall therefore hereafter refer to Johns, the acting harbour-master, as the harbour-master. At the trial the further point was made by the respondents, which also found favour with the learned judge, that the master of the Apollo had been guilty of negligence in taking the vessel into the dock. I think this point is quite untenable. The negligence suggested was that the master ought to have seen that the gates still existed at the middle of the dock, and thus should have been led to suspect the presence of the sill across the bottom. There appears to me to be no foundation for this contention. The master of the Apollo was a stranger to the locality; he had passed through the lock during the night, and could not have been expected to notice the presence of the gates afterwards. And so far from there being anything to suggest a doubt to his mind as to the lock being fit for the purpose for which it was used, the original suggestion for its use had come from the harbour-master, who might reasonably be supposed to be acquainted with its condition. Moreover, before entering the lock the master of the vessel made inquiries of the harbour-master as to its fitness for the purpose, and received assurance which satisfied him, and with which I think it reasonable that he should have been satisfied. There is some conflict of evidence as to what passed on this occasion. The master of the Apollo states that, in reply to the question, "Are you sure that the vessel will take no harm?" the harbour-master said: "I am satisfied of that; there will be no damage to the vessel;" and in answer to a further question, "What is the bottom of your dock composed of; sand, mud, or stones?" replied, "The bottom of the lock is lined with bricks, and is as smooth as the back of my hand." He adds that the harbour-master mentioned that a vessel called the Gogo had been there a little time before under similar circumstances. Johns denied that he used this language. His version of the conversation is, that the master having asked him what sort of bottom there was to lay on, he replied that there was stone and brick to lay on; that the master then asked if it was level, to which he answered that it was level from gate to gate as far as he knew, that he had never seen the bottom. He asserts that, by the expression "from gate to gate," he meant from the inner gate to the disused middle gate, and not the whole length of the lock, and that he had never seen the bottom, because when the water is drawn off some eighteen inches still remain over the sill; but he admits that he knew that there must be either a sill or a chamber there. The learned judge who tried the action accepted Johns' version rather than the master's, which he thought improbable. I am unable to take this view, and I differ from the learned judge with the less hesitation, inasmuch as that which he accepts as a true statement of what passed does not seem to me to be at all an accurate representation of Johns' evidence. Taking Johns' own version, it is clear that the language he used was calculated to convey to the mind of the master of the Apollo that the bottom of the lock was level throughout from the inner to the outer gate; and the fact that, according to him, he intended to limit his statement to a part of the lock satisfies me that as to that portion he intended to convey the impression that it was level. Seeing that the suggestion to put the vessel into the lock came from him, I do not believe that he conveyed, or intended to convey, any doubt as to its being fit for the purpose. He perhaps overlooked the length of the vessel, or the fact that she was in part laden; but, however this may be, I think he gave the master of the Apollo assurances which led him as a reasonable man to place his vessel where he did.

But it is said that, even supposing that the master of the Apollo was guilty of no want of care in taking his vessel into the lock, the disaster was not due to the negligence of the harbour-master, for that there never can be negligence unless there is some duty to exercise care, and that no such duty was incumbent on Johns with reference to the vessel being grounded in the lock. It was argued further that, even if Johns were guilty of negligence, the acts complained of were not done by him in the course of his duty or within the scope of his authority, and that the respondents, therefore, cannot be held responsible. These are the real questions in the case, and that they present some difficulty cannot be doubted, seeing that there was a difference of opinion in the Court of Appeal, and that your Lordships do not all take the same view. In order to solve them we must consider the relative positions of the master of the vessel, the harbour-master, and the dock owners at the time of the incidents which gave rise to this litigation. It is contended for the respondents that, in using the lock, the master of the vessel was a bare licensee, to whom neither the harbour-master nor the owners of the dock owed any duty, except to abstain from fraud or from wilfully causing his vessel injury. I cannot think that this is a true view of the situation of the parties. The use of the harbour, which is the property of the respondents, is regulated by Act of Parliament, by which it is provided that it shall be lawful for the harbour-master to direct any person having command of a vessel entering or being within the port or harbour to moor, anchor, and place the same in such situation within the port or harbour as the harbour-master shall direct, and in case the master of the vessel refuses or neglects to remove the same when required and to anchor and place the same as the harbour-master shall order, he is rendered liable to a penalty, and the harbour-master is empowered to cause the vessel to be removed in such manner as he shall deem to be necessary, and the owners of the port or harbour are by the Act authorised to take certain tolls for its use. In view of these enactments let me consider what was the position of the master of the Apollo. His vessel was disabled, and, in order to restore her to a working condition, it was necessary to get at the propeller. If he wished to beach his vessel for this purpose he could only do so at a place indicated or permitted by the harbour-master. It is said that he was not entitled to enter the lock for that purpose; I agree. But it is equally true that he was not entitled to occupy any particular part of the respondents' dock or harbour. He could, as I have said, occupy only such place as the harbour-master might direct or permit. But when the harbour-master indicates any particular part of the dock or harbour as a place where a vessel, which for a reward is using the dock or harbour, may be grounded for the purpose of repairing damage or otherwise, I think it is at the least incumbent upon him to use due care not to indicate a place which cannot safely be used for the purpose by reason of some hidden condition of things of which he is or ought to be aware, but of which the master of the vessel is, without any want of care, ignorant. If the master of a vessel, which is using the dock, finds it necessary, owing to a misadventure, to put it on the ground, he has, I think, a right to rely on the judgment of the harbour-master as to what is a proper place in which to perform such an operation. The harbour-master was, of course, not bound to permit the vessel to enter the lock for the purpose. He might undoubtedly have refused permission and directed that the vessel should be grounded in some other part of the dock; or perhaps have refused permission for the vessel to take the ground anywhere within the limits of his jurisdiction. But inasmuch as he did not adopt this course, but expressly assented to the vessel being put in the lock that it might cease to be waterborne, and indeed himself suggested that this should be done, I find myself unable to concur in the view that he was under no obligation to the vessel if the condition of the lock was such that she would be injured by resting on the bottom of it; the more so as he gave the master of the vessel assurances which might reasonably lead him to believe that the bottom of the lock was level and a safe resting place for the vessel. I think that the harbour-master, before assenting to the vessel being so placed and giving that assurance, was bound to inform himself of the condition of the lock, and to ascertain that it was not such as to cause damage to the vessel. I think he knew, or ought to have known, of the danger, for he admits that he was aware, as he could hardly fail to be, of the existence of the gates, and that there must be either a sill or a cavity, against or by reason of which the gates could be closed, and it was just as likely to be the one as the other. It appears to me that, if he was under the obligation I have indicated, or if any care was, under the circumstances, due from him to the master of the vessel, he cannot escape the charge of negligence. If, indeed, he had told the master that he knew nothing of the condition of the lock, that if the vessel entered it for the purpose of clearing the propeller she must do so at her own risk, and that the master must make such investigation as was necessary to satisfy himself on the point, the case would have worn a different aspect; but nothing of the kind occurred. I entertain a strong conviction that, had he done this, the disaster would have been avoided.

It is said, however, that, even if Johns was guilty of negligence, the respondents are under no liability; that to sanction such a use of the lock was to permit an abnormal use of it, which he had no authority to do, and that it was an act beyond the scope of his employment. I cannot think so. The lock had not unfrequently been employed for the same purpose before. It was one of the conveniences of the port that a disabled vessel could thus enjoy some of the advantages of a dry dock. For a vessel of somewhat smaller dimensions than the Apollo, and perhaps even for one of her size, if unladen, the lock was quite a suitable place to take the ground in. That an accident might happen to a vessel, which should temporarily disable her and render it necessary to obtain access to a part of her which could not be reached whilst she was water-borne, was one of the ordinary incidents of navigation which must have been in the contemplation of the owners of the dock. And I do not think it can be beyond the authority of their harbour-master, intrusted as he is with the statutory power to which I have drawn attention, to permit the use by a disabled vessel of such conveniences as the harbour possesses for the purpose of repairing or ascertaining the extent of the damage. I think it must be within the scope of his authority to point out in what part of the harbour the vessel may ground; and the lock was within the ambit of the port and harbour, and just as much a part of it as any other, and it had, as I have said, been used on various previous occasions, extending over a considerable period, for that purpose. For these reasons, I think Johns was acting as harbour-master, and within the scope of his authority as such, on the occasion in question; that he was guilty of negligence; and that for this negligence the respondents are liable. Lord Macnaghten desires me to say that he has read this judgment, and entirely concurs in it.

Lord Morris.—My Lords: I assume that Johns was acting as harbour-master in consequence of the illness of Fitzmaurice, and that, as between the defendants and persons using the dock, he is to be considered the harbour-master. In that capacity he was the person to give directions and to bind the defendants in all matters within the scope of his employment and authority; consequently, if Johns, as harbour-master, ordered or directed the captain of the Apollo to place his vessel in the lock as the proper place for her to be moored or placed, I should be of opinion that the defendants would be liable for his negligence, if any, in so ordering or directing. I consider in concurrence with the learned judge who tried the case and heard the witnesses, that Johns did not direct the Apollo to be put into the lock, but only assented to the request made to him to permit it to be done; that in fact Johns granted as a favour permission to use the lock for the purpose of letting out the water from it, and thereby enabling the captain to disentangle the rope. In the port of Port Talbot there was no dry or graving dock, and the use of the lock for which permission was given was an extraordinary one; the normal use of the lock was for the passage of vessels, and the use of it as a substitute for a dry dock was an extraordinary and abnormal use of the lock. The captain of the Apollo was a mere licensee in the carrying out in the lock of his operations for disentangling the rope. Johns was not aware of the sill in the lock; he had no authority, and it would be outside the scope of his authority as harbour-master, to allow the use of the lock with any special liability affecting the defendants; he did not do so as a matter of fact. In giving licence to the captain to use the lock, Johns had no duty towards the captain upon which he could make his employers liable; nor did he make any contract on their behalf in giving permission that the lock might be used as it was used. The captain in using the lock did so at his own risk; it was no part of the accommodation to which the ship was entitled. The case is one of licensor and licensee; the licensor has not wilfully, or with knowledge of any danger, induced the licensee to incur it. Under these circumstances I fail to see how the defendants can be made liable for the damage suffered by the ship, and I am of opinion the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Conspiracy — Combination to keep up rate of freight—Exclusion of rival traders—Competition.

The respondents, who were firms of shipowners trading between China and Europe, with a view to obtaining a monopoly of the homeward trade, and thereby keeping up the rate of freight, formed themselves into an association, and offered very favourable terms to such merchants in China as would ship their goods exclusively in vessels which belonged to members of the association, and threatened to dismiss any agent of theirs who acted for competing shipowners. The appellants, who were also owners of ships engaged in the China trade, were excluded from the association, and their business suffered in consequence. There was no evidence of any obstruction of, or interference with, the appellants by members of the association.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the association being formed for the benefit of the respondents, and not with any desire to injure the appellants, or from any ill-will to them, was not unlawful, and that an action for conspiracy would not lie.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., Lord Esher, M.R. dissenting), reported 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 455, 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 820, and 23 Q. B. Div. 598, affirming a decision of Lord Coleridge, C.J., reported 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 514, 6 Asp.

(a) Reported by C. E. Malden, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mar. Law Cas. 320, and 21 Q. B. Div. 544, in a case tried by him without a jury.

The plaintiffs, the present appellants, were a shipping company, incorporated for the purpose of acquiring shares in certain ships, the Sikh, Pathan, Afghan, and Ghazee, which were employed in the China and Australian trades. The defendants, the present respondents, were an associated body of shipowners trading between China and London, who joined themselves into an association for the purpose of keeping up the rate of freights in the tea trade between China and Europe, and of securing that trade to themselves by allowing a rebate of 5 per cent. on all freights paid by shippers who shipped goods to Europe in their vessels only. They alleged that it was the large profits derived from the tea freights which alone enabled them to keep up a regular line of communication all the year round between England and China, and that without a practical monopoly of the tea trade they must cease to do so. They threatened to dismiss any agents of theirs who also acted for competing shipowners. On May 10, 1884, the defendants issued the following circular, which was widely distributed among the merchants engaged in the China trade:

Shanghai, May 10, 1884.

To those exporters who confine their shipment of tea and general cargo from China to Europe (not including the Mediterranean and Black Sea ports) to the Steam Navigation Company's, Messageries Maritimes Company's, Ocean Steamship Company's, "Glen," "Castle," "Shire," and "Ben" lines, and to the steamships Oopack and Ningchow, we shall be happy to allow a rebate of 5 per cent. on the freight charged.

Exporters claiming the returns will be required to sign a declaration that they have not made nor been interested in any shipments of tea or general cargo to Europe (except the above named) by any other than the said lines.

In May 1885 the defendants issued the following circular:

Referring to our circular dated May 10, 1884, we beg leave to remind you that shipments for London by the steamships Pathan, Afghan, and Aberdeen, or by other non-conference steamers, at any of the ports in China or at Hong Kong, will exclude the firm making such shipment from participation in the return during the whole six-monthly period within which they have been made, even although the firm elsewhere may have given exclusive support to the conference lines.

The effect of those circulars, by excluding the plaintiffs from the benefits of the association, was to inflict damage upon them, and they accordingly sued the defendants' association for a conspiracy and unlawful combination to bribe, coerce, and induce shippers to forbear from shipping cargoes by the plaintiffs' ships. Lord Coleridge, C.J. held, that the association, being formed by the defendants with the view of keeping the trade in their own hands and not with the intention of ruining the trade of the plaintiffs, or through any personal malice or ill-will towards them, was not unlawful, and that therefore no action for conspiracy was maintainable. This decision was affirmed by a majority of the Court of Appeal as above mentioned.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir. H. James, Q.C., Barnes, Q.C., and Sims Williams appeared for the appellants, and argued that the conduct of the respondents went beyond fair competition, and resolved itself into the offer of a bribe to merchants not to deal with the appellants. The acts of the respondents would have been actionable torts if committed by an individual, and even if they were not, yet the agreement amounted to a conspiracy and was actionable. The points we complain of are, the offer of the rebate of freight, the sending ships up to Hankow on purpose to oppose our ships, and the putting pressure on the agents not to act for us. It was in restraint of trade, and caused injury to us, and was therefore illegal. They cited

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., Sir H. Davey, Q.C., Finlay, Q.C., Pollard, and Box, for the respondents, argued that the grounds relied upon by the appellants were not sufficient to give them a cause of action; the offer of a rebate was not unlawful. See Bramley v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 458; 31 L. J. 286, C. P.

"Undue preference" is the creature of statute; a carrier is bound to charge reasonably, not necessarily equally. The appellants do not distinguish between absolute and qualified rights. See per Lord Penzance in Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. at p. 668; 7 App. Cas. at p. 766). The sending ships up the river to oppose the appellants' ships was lawful competition, and it was quite justifiable to put pressure on the agents not to act at the same time for principals who were opposed to each other. There is no authority for saying that the combination to do these things amounted to a criminal conspiracy, and was therefore actionable.

(a) This case was reversed on appeal, 58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 209.

A single shipowner might have done them. There must be mens rea to make them unlawful. See

As to the argument that this was in restraint of trade, see

We say it was only successful competition, but if it was in restraint of trade it is not indictable as contended; the only authority for saying so is the dictum of Crompton, J. in Hilton v. Eckersley. See Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181; 1 Smith's L. C., 9th edit. 430.

None of the American decisions cited are of great authority. It was said that the conduct of the respondents was illegal if it tended to injure the appellants; but there is no authority for this. A man may carry on his business as he pleases as long as he does not commit a nuisance, fraud, or acts of molestation, even if his object is to injure a rival. There is no personal animus here; the object was to benefit their own trade, though the result was to injure that of the appellants. All the elements of a criminal conspiracy are wanting, and many of the authorities cited have little bearing on the case. The facts show no actionable wrong. They also referred to Sir H. James, Q.C. was heard in reply.

Dec. 18, 1891.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The Lord Chancellor (Halsbury).—My Lords: Notwithstanding the elaborate examination which this case has undergone, both as to fact and law, I believe that the facts may be very summarily stated, and when so stated the law seems to me not open to doubt. An associated body of traders endeavour to get the whole of a limited trade into their own hands by offering exceptional and very favourable terms to customers who will deal exclusively with them; so favourable that, but for the object of keeping the trade to themselves, they would not give such terms; and if their trading were confined to one particular period they would be trading at a loss, but in the belief that by such competition they will prevent rival traders competing with them, and so receive the whole profits of the trade to themselves. I do not think that I have omitted a single fact upon which the appellants rely to show that this course of dealing is unlawful and constitutes an indictable conspiracy. Now it is not denied, and cannot be even argued, that primâ facie a trader in a free country in all matters "not contrary to law may regulate his own mode of carrying it on, according to his own discretion and choice." This is the language of Alderson, B. in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Hilton v. Eckersley (6 E. & B. 47), and no authority, and indeed no argument, has been directed to qualifying that leading proposition. It is necessary, therefore, for the appellants here to show that what I have described as the course pursued by the associated traders is a "matter contrary to law." Now, after a most careful study of the evidence in this case, I have been unable to discover anything done by the members of the associated body of traders other than an offer of reduced freights to persons who would deal exclusively with them, and if this is unlawful it seems to me that the greater part of the commercial dealings, where there is rivalry in trade, must be equally unlawful. There are doubtless to be found phrases in the evidence which, taken by themselves, might be supposed to mean that the associated traders were actuated by a desire to inflict malicious injury upon their rivals; but when one analyses what is the real meaning of such phrases it is manifest that all that is intended to be implied by it is, that any rival trading which shall be started against the association will be rendered unprofitable by the more favourable terms—that is to say, the reduced freights, discounts, and the like which will be given to customers who will exclusively trade with the associated body. And, upon a review of the facts, it is impossible to suggest any malicious intention to injure rival traders, except in the sense that in proportion as one withdraws trade that other people might get, you, to that extent, injure a person's trade when you appropriate the trade to yourself. If such an injury and the motive of its infliction is examined and tested upon principle, and can be truly asserted to be a malicious motive within the meaning of the law that prohibits malicious injury to other people, all competition must be malicious, and consequently unlawful—a sufficient reductio ad absurdum to dispose of that head of suggested unlawfulness. The learned counsel who argued the case for the appellants were pressed from time to time by some of your Lordships to point out what act of unlawful obstruction, violence, molestation, or interference, was proved against the associated body of traders; and, as I have said, the only wrongful thing upon which the learned counsel could place their fingers was the competition which I have already dealt with. Intimidation, violence, molestation, or the procuring of people to break their contracts, are all of them unlawful acts; and I entertain no doubt that a combination to procure people to do such acts is a conspiracy and unlawful. The sending up of ships to Hankow, which in itself, and to the knowledge of the associated traders would be unprofitable, but was done for the purpose of influencing other traders against coming there, and so encouraging a ruinous competition, is the one fact which appears to be pointed to as out of the ordinary course of trade. After all, what can be meant by "out of the ordinary course of trade?" I should rather think, as a fact, that it is very commonly within the ordinary course of trade, so to compete for a time as to render trade unprofitable to your rival in order that when you have got rid of him you may appropriate the profits of the entire trade to yourself. I entirely adopt and make my own what was said by Bowen, L.J. in the court below: "All commercial men with capital are acquainted with the ordinary expedient of sowing one year a crop of apparently unfruitful prices, in order by driving competition away to reap a fuller harvest of profit in the future; and until the present argument at the bar it may be doubted whether shipowners or merchants were ever deemed to be bound by law to conform to some imaginary 'normal' standard of freights or prices, or that law courts had a right to say to them in respect of their competitive tariffs, 'thus far shalt thou go and no further.'" Excluding all I have excluded upon my view of the facts, it is very difficult indeed to formulate the proposition. What is the wrong done? What legal right is interfered with? What coercion of the mind, or will, or of the person, is effected? All are free to trade upon what terms they will, and nothing has been done, except in rival trading, which can be supposed to interfere with the appellants' interests.

I think this question is the first to be determined. What injury, if any, has been done? What legal right has been interfered with? Because, if no legal right has been interfered with, and no legal injury inflicted, it is vain to say that the thing might have been done by an individual, but cannot be done by a combination of persons. I do not deny that there are many things which might be perfectly lawfully done by an individual, which, when done by a number of persons, become unlawful. I am unable to concur with the Lord Chief Justice's criticism, if its meaning was rightly interpreted, which I very much doubt, on the observations made by Bramwell, B. in Reg. v. Druitt (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 855; 10 Cox C. C. 593), if that was intended to treat as doubtful the proposition that a combination to insult and annoy a person would be an indictable conspiracy. I should have thought it as beyond doubt or question that such a combination would be an indictable misdemeanour. I cannot think the Lord Chief Justice meant to throw any doubt upon such a proposition. But in this case, the thing done, the trading by a number of persons together, effects no more and is no more, so to speak, a combined operation than that of a single person. If the thing done is rendered unlawful by combination, the course of trade by a person who singly trades for his own benefit and apart from partnership or sharing profits with others, but nevertheless avails himself of combined action, would be open to the same objections. The merchant who buys for him, the agent who procures orders for him, the captain who sails his ship, and even the sailors—if they might be supposed to have knowledge of the transaction—would be acting in combination for the general result, and would, whether for the benefit of the individual, or for an associated body of traders, make it not the less combined action than if the combination were to share profits with independent traders; and if a combination to effect that object would be unlawful, the sharers in the combined action could, in a charge of criminal conspiracy, make no defence that they were captain, agent, or sailors, respectively, if they were knowingly rendering their aid to what, by the hypothesis, would be unlawful if done in combination. A totally separate head of unlawfulness has, however, been introduced by the suggestion that the thing is unlawful because in restraint of trade. There are two senses in which the word "unlawful" is not uncommonly though, I think, somewhat inaccurately, used. There are some contracts to which the law will not give effect; and therefore, although the parties may enter into what, but for the element which the law condemns, would be perfect contracts, the law would not allow them to operate as contracts, notwithstanding that, in point of form, the parties have agreed. Some such contracts may be void on the ground of immorality; some on the ground that they are contrary to public policy; as, for example, in restraint of trade; and contracts so tainted the law will not lend its aid to enforce. It treats them as if they had not been made at all. But the more accurate use of the word unlawful, which would bring the contract within the qualification which I have quoted from the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, namely, as "contrary to law," is not applicable to such contract. It has never been held that a contract in restraint of trade is contrary to law in the sense that I have indicated. A judge in very early times expressed great indignation at such a contract (Hull, J., Year-book, 2 Hen. 5, fol. 5, pl. 26); and Crompton, J. undoubtedly did say in a case where such an observation was wholly unnecessary to the decision, and therefore manifestly obiter, that the parties to a contract in restraint of trade would be indictable (Hilton v. Eckersley (ubi sup.). I am unable to assent to that dictum. It is opposed to the whole current of authority; it was dissented from by Lord Campbell, C.J. and Erle, J., and found no support when the case in which it was said came to the Exchequer Chamber, and it seems to me contrary to principle. In the result, I think that no case whatever is made out of a conspiracy such as the appellant here undertook to establish; and it is not unimportant, for the reasons I have given, to see what is the conspiracy alleged in the statement of claim. The first count alleges the conspiracy to be "to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining cargoes for steamers owned by the plaintiffs." The word "prevent" is sufficiently wide to comprehend both lawful means and unlawful; but, as I have already said, in proof there is nothing but the competition with which I have dealt. The second paragraph alleges that in pursuance of the conspiracy people were "bribed, coerced, and induced to agree to forbear, and to forbear from shipping cargoes by the steamers of the plaintiffs." If the word "bribed" is satisfied by the offering lower freights and larger discounts, then that is proved; but then the word "bribed" is robbed of any legal significance. "Coerced" is not justified by any evidence in the case, and the word "induced" is absolutely neutral, and no unlawful inducement is proved. The third paragraph uses language such as "intention to injure the plaintiff," "threats of stopping the shipment of homeward cargoes," and the like. But I ask myself whether, if the indictment had set out the facts without using the ambiguous language to which I have referred in the statement of claim, it would have disclosed an indictable offence. I am very clearly of opinion it would not. I am of opinion, therefore, that the whole matter comes round to the original proposition, whether a combination to trade, and to offer, in respect of prices, discounts and other trade facilities, such terms as will win so large an amount of custom as to render it unprofitable for rival customers to pursue the same trade, is unlawful, and I am clearly of opinion that it is not. I think, therefore, that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lord Watson.—My Lords: At the hearing of this appeal in April last, your Lordships had the benefit of listening to a learned and exhaustive discussion of the law applicable to combination or conspiracy. It appeared to me at the time—and further consideration has confirmed my impression—that much of the legal argument addressed to us had a very distant relation to the circumstances of the present case, which are simple enough. The evidence, oral and documentary, contains an unusual amount of figurative language indicating a wide difference of opinion as to the legal aspect of the facts, but presents no conflict with regard to the facts themselves. The respondents are firms and companies owning steam-vessels, which ply regularly, during the whole year, some of them on the great river of China, between Hankow and Shanghai, and others between Shanghai and European ports. During the tea season—which begins in May and lasts for about six weeks—most shippers prefer to have their tea sent direct from Hankow to Europe; but it suits the respondents' trade better to have the tea which they carry brought down to Shanghai by their ordinary river service, and then trans-shipped for Europe. Accordingly, they do not send their ocean steamers up the river, except when they find it necessary in order to intercept cargoes which might otherwise have been shipped from Hankow in other than their vessels. The appellants are also a shipowning company. They do not maintain a regular service, either on the great river or between Europe and Hankow; but they send vessels to Hankow during the tea season, with the legitimate object of sharing in the profits of the tea-carrying trade, which appear in ordinary circumstances to have been considerable. The respondents entered into an agreement, the avowed purpose of which was to secure for themselves as much of the tea shipped from Hankow as their vessels could conveniently carry, which was practically the whole of it, and to prevent the appellants and other outsiders from obtaining a share of the trade. The consequence of their acting upon the agreement was that the appellants, having sent their ships to Hankow, were unable to obtain cargoes at remunerative rates, and they claim as damages due to them by the respondents the difference between their actual earnings and the freights which their vessels might have earned had it not been for the combined action of the respondents.

As the law is now settled, I apprehend that, in order to substantiate their claim, the appellants must show either that the object of the agreement was unlawful, or that illegal methods were resorted to in its prosecution. If neither the end contemplated by the agreement nor the means used for its attainment were contrary to law, the loss suffered by the appellants was damnum sine injuriâ. The agreement of which the appellants complain left the contracting parties free to recede from it at their pleasure, and is not obnoxious to the rule of public policy which was recognised in Hilton v. Eckersley (ubi sup.). The decision in that case, which was the result of judicial opinions not altogether reconcilable, appears to me to carry the rule no further than this: that an agreement by traders to combine for a lawful purpose and for a specified time is not binding upon any of the parties to it if he chooses to withdraw, and, consequently, cannot be enforced in invitum. In my opinion it is not an authority for the proposition that an outsider can plead the illegality of such a contract, whilst the parties are willing to act and continue to act upon the ground that they have agreed for a specific period. I venture to think that the decision of this appeal depends upon more tangible considerations than any which could be derived from the study of what is generally known as public policy. I have never seen any reason to suppose that the parties to the agreement had any other object in view than that of defending their carrying trade during the tea season against the encroachments of the appellants and other competitors, and of attracting to themselves custom which might otherwise have been carried off by these competitors. That is an object which is strenuously pursued by merchants great and small in every branch of commerce, and it is in the eye of the law perfectly legitimate. If the respondents' combination had been formed, not with a single view to the extension of their business and the increase of its profits, but with the main and ulterior design of effecting an unlawful object, a very different question would have arisen for the consideration of your Lordships. But no such case is presented by the facts disclosed in this appeal. The object of the combination being legal, was any illegal act committed by the respondents in giving effect to it? The appellants invited your Lordships to answer that question in the affirmative, on the ground that the respondents' competition was unfair, by which they no doubt meant that it was tainted with illegality. The facts which they mainly relied on were these: That the respondents allowed a discount of 5 per cent. upon their freight accounts for the year to all customers who shipped no tea to Europe except by their vessels; that, whenever the appellants sent a ship to load tea at Hankow, the respondents sent one or more of their ocean steamers to underbid her, so that neither vessel could obtain cargo on remunerative terms; and, lastly, that the respondents took away the agency of their vessels from persons who also acted as shipping agents for the appellants and other trade competitors outside the combination. I cannot for a moment suppose that it is the proper function or right of courts of law to fix the lowest prices at which traders can sell or buy for the purpose of protecting or extending their business without committing legal wrong which may subject them in damages. Until that becomes the law of the land it is, in my opinion, idle to assert that the legality of mercantile competition ought to be gauged by the amount of the consideration for which a competing trader thinks fit to part with his goods or to accept employment. The withdrawal of agency first appeared to me to be a matter attended with difficulty, but, on consideration, I am satisfied that it cannot be regarded as an illegal act. In the first place, it was impossible that any honest man could impartially discharge his duty of finding freights to parties who occupied the hostile position of the appellants and respondents; and, in the second place, the respondents gave the agents the option of continuing to act for one or other of them, and in circumstances which placed the appellants at no disadvantage.

In this case it has not been proved, and it has not been suggested, that the respondents used either misrepresentation or compulsion for the purpose of attaining the object of their combination. The only means by which they endeavoured to obtain shipments for their vessels to the exclusion of others was the inducement of cheaper rates of freight than the appellants were willing to accept. I entertain no doubt that the judgments appealed from ought to be affirmed. I am quite satisfied with the reasons assigned for it by Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., and the observations which I have made were not meant to add to those reasons, but to make it clear that in my opinion the appellants have presented for decision no question of fact or law entitling them to a judgment in their favour.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: The plaintiffs in this case do not complain of any trespass, violence, force, fraud, or breach of contract, nor of any direct tort or violation of any right of the plaintiffs like the case of firing to frighten birds from a decoy (Keeble v. Hickeringhill, 11 East, 574, n.; 11 Mod. 75, 131); nor of any act, the ultimate object of which was to injure the plaintiffs, having its origin in malice or ill-will to them. The plaintiffs admit that, materially and morally, they have been at liberty to do their best for themselves without any hindrance by the defendants. But they say that the defendants have entered into an agreement in restraint of trade — an agreement, therefore, unlawful; an agreement, therefore, indictable, punishable. That the defendants have acted in conformity with that unlawful agreement, and thereby caused damage to the plaintiffs in respect of which they are entitled to bring, and bring this action. The plaintiffs have proved an agreement among the defendants, the object of which was to prevent shipowners, other than themselves, from trading to Shanghai and Hankow. The way in which that was to be accomplished was by giving benefits to those who shipped exclusively by them, by sending vessels to compete with the plaintiffs, and by lowering their, the defendants', rates of freight so that the plaintiffs had to lower theirs to their great loss. There are other matters alleged, but they are accessory to the above, which is the substance of the complaint. The plaintiffs also say that these things, or some of them, if done by an individual would be actionable. This need not be determined directly, because all the things complained of have their origin in what the plaintiffs say is unlawfulness, a conspiracy to injure. So that if actionable when done by one, much more are they when done by several, and if not actionable when done by several, certainly they are not when done by one. It has been objected by capable persons that it is strange that that should be unlawful if done by several which is not if done by one, and that the thing is wrong if done by one if wrong when done by several; if not wrong when done by one, it cannot be when done by several. I think there is an obvious answer, indeed two: one is that a man may encounter the acts of a single person, yet not be fairly matched against several. The other is that the act when done by an individual is wrong though not punishable, because the law avoids the multiplicity of crimes—de minimis non curat lex — while if done by several it is sufficiently important to be treated as a crime. Let it be, then, that it is no answer to the plaintiffs' complaint that if what they complain of had been done by an individual there would be no cause of action. There is the further question whether there is a cause of action, the acts being done by several.

The first position of the plaintiffs is that the agreement among the defendants is illegal as being in restraint of trade, and therefore against public policy, and so illegal. "Public policy," said Burrough, J., I believe, quoting Hobart, C.J., "is an unruly horse, and dangerous to ride:" (Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 252.) I quote also another distinguished judge, more modern, Cave, J.: "Certain kinds of contracts have been held void at common law on the ground of public policy; a branch of the law, however, which certainly should not be extended, as judges are more to be trusted as interpreters of the law than as expounders of what is called public policy:" (Re Mirams, 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 117; (1891) 1 Q. B. 594.) I think the present case is an illustration of the wisdom of these remarks. I venture to make another. No evidence is given in these public policy cases. The tribunal is to say, as matter of law, that the thing is against public policy and void. How can the judge do that without any evidence as to its effect and consequences? If the shipping in this case was sufficient for the trade a further supply would have been a waste. There are some people who think that the public is not concerned with this—people who would make a second railway by the side of one existing, saying "only the two companies will suffer," as though the wealth of the community was not made up of the wealth of the individuals who compose it. I am by no means sure that the conference did not prevent a waste, and was not good for the public. Lord Coleridge, C.J. thought it was—see his judgment. As to the suggestion that the Chinese profited by the lowering of freights, I cannot say it was not so. There may have been a monopoly or other cause to give them a benefit, but, as a rule, it is clear that the expense of transit, and all other expenses borne by an exported article that has a market price, are borne by the importer, therefore ultimately by the consumer, so that low freights benefit him. To go on with the case, take it that the defendants had bound themselves to each other; I think they had, though they might withdraw. Let it be that each member had tied his hands; let it be that that was in restraint of trade; I think upon the authority of Hilton v. Eckersley (ubi sup.), and other cases, we should hold that the agreement was illegal—that is, not enforceable by law. I will assume, then, that it was, though I am not quite sure. But that is not enough for the plaintiffs. To maintain their action on this ground they must make out that it was an offence, a crime, a misdemeanour. I am clearly of opinion it was not. Save the opinion of Crompton, J., which is entitled to the greatest respect, but not assented to by Lord Campbell, C.J., or the Exchequer Chamber, there is no authority for it in the English law. It is quite certain that an agreement may be void, yet the parties to it not punishable. Take the case I put during the argument: a man and woman agree to live together as man and wife without marrying. The agreement is illegal, and could not be enforced, but clearly the parties to it would not be indictable. It ought to be enough to say that there is no case where there has been a conviction for such an offence as is alleged against the defendants. It is to be remembered that it is for the plaintiffs to make out the case that the defendants have committed an indictable offence, not for the defendants to disprove it. There needs no argument to prove the negative.

There are some observations to be made. It is admitted that there may be fair competition in trade, that two may offer to join and compete against a third. If so, what is the definition of fair competition? What is unfair that is neither forcible nor fraudulent? It does seem strange that, to enforce freedom of trade, of action, the law should punish those who make a perfectly honest agreement with a belief that it is fairly required for their protection. There is one thing that is to me decisive. I have always said that a combination of workmen, an agreement among them to cease work except for higher wages, and a strike in consequence, was lawful at common law. Perhaps not enforceable inter se, but not indictable; the Legislature has now so declared. The enactment is express, that agreements among workmen shall be binding, whether they would or would not but for the Acts have been deemed unlawful, as no restraint of trade. Is it supposable that it would have done so in the way it has had the workman's combination been a punishable misdemeanour? Impossible. This seems to me conclusive, that though agreements which fetter the freedom of action in the parties to it may not be enforceable they are not indictable. See also the judgment of Fry, L.J. on this point. Where is such a contention to stop? Suppose the case put in the argument: In a small town there are two shops sufficient for the wants of the neighbourhood, making only a reasonable profit. They are threatened with a third. The two shopkeepers agree to warn the intending shopkeeper that if he comes they will lower prices, and can afford it longer than he. Have they committed an indictable offence? Remember the conspiracy is the offence, and they have conspired. If he, being warned, does not set up his shop, has he a cause of action? He might prove damages. He might show that from his skill he would have beaten one or both of the others. See in this case the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., that the plaintiffs might recover for "damages at large for future years." Would a shipowner who had intended to send his ship to Shanghai, but desisted owing to the defendants' agreement, and on being told by them they would deal with him as they had with the plaintiffs, be entitled to maintain an action against the defendants; why not? If yes, why not every shipowner who could say he had a ship fit for the trade. but was deterred from using it. The Master of the Rolls cites Sir William Erle (the Law relating to Trade Unions) that "a combination to violate a private right in which the public has a sufficient interest, is a crime, such violation being an actionable wrong." True. Sir William Erle means that, where the violation of a private right is an actionable wrong, a combination to violate it, if the public has a sufficient interest, is a crime. But in this case I hold that there is no private right violated. His Lordship further says: "If one goes beyond the exercise of the course of trade, and does an act beyond what is the course of trade, in order, that is to say, with intent to molest the other's free course of trade, he is not exercising his own freedom of a course of trade, he is not acting in but beyond the course of trade, and then it follows that his act is an unlawful obstruction of the other's right to a free course of trade, and if such obstruction causes damage to the other he is entitled to maintain an action for the wrong." I may be permitted to say that this is not very plain. I think it means that it is not in the course of trade for one trader to do acts the motive of which is to damage the trade of another. Whether I should agree depends on the meaning to be put on "course of trade" and "molest." But it is clear that the Master of the Rolls means conduct which would give a cause of action against an individual. He cites Sir W. Erle in support of his proposition, who clearly is speaking of acts which would be actionable in an individual, and there is no such act here. The Master of the Rolls says the lowering of the freight far beyond a lowering for any purpose of trade was not an act done in the exercise of their own free right of trade, but for the purpose of interfering with the plaintiffs' right to a free course of trade; therefore a wrongful act as against the plaintiffs' right, and as injury to the plaintiffs followed they had a right of action. I cannot agree. If there are two shopkeepers in a village and one sold an article at cost price, not for profit therefrom, but to attract customers, or cause his rival to leave off selling the article only, it could not be said he was liable to an action. I cannot think that the defendants did more than they had a legal right to do. I adopt the vigorous language and opinion of Fry, L.J.: "To draw a line between fair and unfair competition, between what is reasonable and unreasonable, passes the power of the courts." It is a strong thing for the plaintiffs to complain of the very practices they wished to share in, and once did. I am of opinion the judgment should be affirmed.

Lord Macnaghten concurred.

Lord Morris.—My Lords: The facts of this case demonstrate that the defendants had no other, or further, object than to appropriate the trade of the plaintiffs. The means used were: first, a rebate to those who dealt exclusively with them; secondly, the sending of ships to compete with the plaintiffs' ships; thirdly, the lowering of the freights; fourthly, the indemnifying other vessels that would compete with the plaintiffs'; fifthly, the dismissal of agents who were acting for them and the plaintiffs. The object was a lawful one. It is not illegal for a trader to aim at driving a competitor out of trade, provided the motive be his own gain by appropriation of the trade, and the means he uses be lawful weapons. Of the first four of the means used by the defendants, the rebate to customers and the lowering of the freights are the same in principle, being a bonus by the defendants to customers to come and deal exclusively with them. The sending of ships to compete and the indemnifying other ships was "the competition" entered on by the defendants with the plaintiffs. The fifth means used, viz., the dismissal of agents, might be questionable according to the circumstances; but in the present case the agents filled an irreconcilable position in being agents for the two rivals, the plaintiffs and the defendants—dismissal under such circumstances became, perhaps, a necessary incident of the warfare in trade. All the acts done, and the means used by the defendants, were acts of competition for the trade. There was nothing in the defendants' acts to disturb any existing contract of the plaintiffs, or to induce anyone to break such. Their action was aimed at making it unlikely that anyone would enter into contracts with the plaintiffs, the defendants offering such competitive inducements as would probably prevent them. The use of rhetorical phrases in the correspondence cannot affect the real substance and meaning of it. Again, what one trader may do in respect of competition a body or set of traders can lawfully do; otherwise a large capitalist could do what a number of small capitalists combining together could not do, and thus a blow would be struck at the very principle of co-operation and joint-stock enterprise. I entertain no doubt that a body of traders, whose motive object is to promote their own trade, can combine to acquire, and thereby in so far to injure, the trade of competitors, provided they do no more than is incident to such motive object, and use no unlawful means. And the defendants' case clearly comes within the principle I have stated.

Now, as to the contention that the combination was in restraint of trade, and therefore illegal. In the first place, was it in restraint of trade? It was a voluntary combination. It was not to continue for any fixed period, nor was there any penalty attached to a breach of the engagement. The operation of attempting to exclude others from the trade might be, and was in fact, beneficial to freighters. Whenever a monopoly was likely to arise, with a consequent rise of rates, competition would naturally arise. I cannot see why judges should be considered specially gifted with prescience of what may hamper or what may increase trade, or of what is to be the test of adequate remuneration. In these days of instant communication with almost all parts of the world competition is the life of trade, and I am not aware of any stage of competition called "fair," intermediate between lawful and unlawful. The question of "fairness" would be relegated to the idiosyncracies of individual judges. I can see no limit to competition, except that you shall not invade the rights of another. But suppose the combination in this case was such as might be held to be in restraint of trade, what follows? It could not be enforced. None of the parties to it could sue each other. It might be held void because its tendency might be held to be against the public interests. Does that make, per se, the combination illegal? What a fallacy would it be that what is void and not enforceable becomes a crime; and cases abound of agreements which the law would not enforce, but which are not illegal, which you may enter into if you like, but which you will not get any assistance to enforce. I have merely summarised my views, because I adopt so entirely the principles laid down by Bowen, L.J. in his judgment, with such felicitous illustrations, and I concur in the opinion already announced by your Lordships, that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

Lord Field.—My Lords: I think that this appeal may be decided upon the principles laid down by Holt, C.J. as far back as the case of Keeble v. Hickeringhill, cited for the appellant (11 Mod. 73 and 131, and note to Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East, 574). In that case the plaintiff complained of the disturbance of his "decoy" by the defendant having discharged guns near to it, and so driven away the wildfowl, with the intention and effect of the consequent injury to his trade. Upon the trial a verdict passed for the plaintiff, but in arrest of judgment it was alleged that the declaration did not disclose any cause of action. Holt, C.J., however, held that the action, although new in instance, was not new in reason or principle, and well lay, for he said that the use of a "decoy" was a lawful trade, and that he who hinders another in his trade or livelihood is liable to an action if the injury is caused by "a violent or malicious act;" "suppose, for instance," he said, "the defendant had shot in his own grounds, if he had occasion to shoot it would have been one thing, but to shoot on purpose to damage the plaintiff is another thing and a wrong." But, he added, if the defendant, "using the same employment as the plaintiff," had set up another decoy so near as to spoil the plaintiff's custom, no action would lie, because the defendant had "as much liberty to make and use a decoy" as the plaintiff. In support of this view he referred to earlier authorities. In one of them it had been held that for the setting up of a new school to the damage of an ancient one by alluring the scholars no action would lie, although it would have been otherwise if the scholars had been driven away by violence or threats. It follows therefore from this authority, and is undoubted law, not only that it is not every act causing damage to another in his trade, nor even every intentional act of such damage, which is actionable, but also that acts done by a trader in the lawful way of his business, although by the necessary results of effective competition interfering injuriously with the trade of another, are not the subject of any action. Of course, it is otherwise, as pointed out by Lord Holt, if the acts complained of, although done in the way and under the guise of competition or other lawful right, are in themselves violent or purely malicious, or have for their ultimate object injury to another from ill-will to him, and not the pursuit of lawful rights. No doubt, also, there have been cases in which agreements to do acts injurious to others have been held to be indictable as amounting to conspiracy, the ultimate object or the means being unlawful, although if done by an individual no such consequence would follow. But I think that in all such cases it will be found that there existed either an ultimate object of malice or wrong, or wrongful means of execution involving elements of injury to the public, or, at least, negativing the pursuit of a lawful object. [His Lordship then dealt with the facts of the case, and concluded as follows:] Everything that was done by the respondents was done in the exercise of their right to carry on their own trade, and was bonâ fide so done. There was not only no malice or indirect object in fact, but the existence of the right to exercise a lawful employment, in the pursuance of which the respondents acted, negatives the presumption of malice which arises when the purposed infliction of loss and injury upon another cannot be attributed to any legitimate cause, and is therefore presumably due to nothing but its obvious object of harm. All the acts complained of were in themselves lawful, and if they caused loss to the appellants, that was one of the necessary results of competition.

It remains to consider the further contention of the appellants that these acts of the respondents, even if lawful in themselves if done by an individual, are illegal and give rise to an action as having been done in the execution of the conference agreement, which is said to amount to a conspiracy, as being in restraint of trade and so against public policy and illegal; but this contention, I think, also fails. I cannot say upon the evidence that the agreement in question was calculated to have or had any such result, nor, even if it had, has any authority (except one, no doubt entitled to great weight, but one which has not been generally approved) been cited to show that such an agreement, even if void, is illegal; nor any that, even if it be so, any action lies by an individual. For these reasons I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Lord HANNEN.—My Lords: It is not necessary that I should recapitulate the facts of this case; they have been fully stated in the opinions which have been already delivered. The charge against the defendants is that they conspired together to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining cargoes for their ships by bribing, coercing, and inducing shippers to forbear from shipping cargoes by the plaintiffs steamers; and it is further complained that the defendants, with intent to injure the plaintiffs, agreed to refuse, and refused to accept cargoes, except upon the terms that the shippers should not ship any cargoes by the plaintiffs' steamers. The means by which those alleged objects were sought to be attained were: (1) Offering to shippers and their agents a rebate of 5 per cent. on the agreed freight, to be made to those who, during a fixed period, shipped only by the defendants' steamers; (2) sending steamers to Hankow to compete with the steamers of persons not members of the defendants' conference or combination, so as to drive them from the trade of that place; (3) removing from the agency of defendants' steamers those persons who acted in the interest of non-conference steamers. It was contended that the agreement between the defendants to act in combination, which was proved to exist, was illegal as being in restraint of trade. I think that it was so, in the sense that it was void, and could not have been enforced against any of the defendants who might have violated it: (Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 E. & B. 47.) But it does not follow that the entering into such an agreement would, as contended, subject the persons doing so to an indictment for conspiracy; and I think that the opinion to that effect expressed by Crompton, J. in Hilton v. Eckersley is erroneous. The question, however, raised for our consideration in this case, is whether a person, who has suffered loss in his business by the joint action of those who have entered into such an agreement, can recover damages from them for the injury so sustained. In considering this question it is necessary to determine upon the evidence what was the object of the agreement between the defendants, and what were the means by which they sought to attain that object. It appears to me that their object was to secure to themselves the benefit of the carrying trade from certain ports. It cannot, I think, be reasonably suggested that this is unlawful in any sense of the word. The object of every trader is to procure for himself as large a share of the trade he is engaged in as he can.

If, then, the object of the defendants was legitimate, were the means adopted by them open to objection? I cannot see that they were. They sought to induce shippers to employ them rather than the plaintiffs by offering to such shippers as should during a fixed period deal exclusively with them the advantage of a rebate upon the freights they had paid. This is, in effect, nothing more than the ordinary form of competition between traders by offering goods or services at a cheaper rate than their rivals. With regard to the sending of ships to Hankow to compete with the plaintiffs' ships, that appears to have been done in order that the defendants' customers might have the opportunity of sending their goods without forfeiting their right to a rebate. No obstruction was offered by these ships to the ships of non-conference owners, and by their presence at Hankow shippers were left simply to determine whether it was to their pecuniary interest to ship by the defendants' vessels or by others. The removing from the agency of the defendants' vessels those persons who acted in the interest of non-conference steamers appears to me a legitimate mode of securing agents whose exertions would be exclusively devoted to the furtherance of the defendants' trade. I arrive at the conclusion, therefore, that the objects sought and the means used by the defendants did not exceed the limits of allowable trade competition, and I know of no restriction imposed by law on competition by one trader with another with the sole object of benefiting himself. I consider that a different case would have arisen if the evidence had shown that the object of the defendants was a malicious one, namely, to injure the plaintiffs, whether they (the defendants) should be benefited or not. This is a question on which it is unnecessary to express an opinion, as it appears to be clear that the defendants had no malicious or sinister intent as against the plaintiffs, and that the sole motive of their conduct was to secure certain advantages for themselves. It only remains for me to refer to the argument that an act which might be lawful for one to do becomes criminal or the subject of civil action by anyone injured by it, if done by several combining together. On this point I think the law is accurately stated by Sir W. Erle in his treatise on the law relating to trade unions. The principle he lays down is equally applicable to combinations other than those of trade unions. He says (p. 23), "As to combination, each person has a right to choose whether he will labour or not, and also to choose the terms on which he will consent to labour, if labour be his choice. The power of choice in respect of labour and terms which one person may exercise and declare singly many after consultation may exercise jointly, and they may make a simultaneous declaration of their choice, and may lawfully act thereon for the immediate purpose of obtaining the required terms, but they cannot create any mutual obligation having the legal effect of binding each other not to work or not to employ unless upon terms allowed by the combination." In considering the question, however, of what was the motive of the combination, whether it was for the purpose of injuring others, or merely in order to benefit those combining, the fact of several agreeing to a common course of action may be important. There are some forms of injury which can only be effected by the combination of many persons. Thus, if several persons agree not to deal at all with a particular individual, as this could not, under ordinary circumstances, benefit the persons so agreeing, it might well lead to the conclusion that their real object was to injure the individual. But it appears to me that in the present case there is nothing indicating an intention to injure the plaintiffs, except in so far as such injury would be the result of the defendants obtaining for themselves the benefits of the carrying trade by giving better terms to customers than their rivals, the plaintiffs, were willing to offer. For these reasons I think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

IRRAWADDY FLOTILLA COMPANY v. BUGWANDASS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF THE RECORDER OF RANGOON.

Indian law — Common carriers — Liability — Carriers Act, No. 3, of 1865—Indian Contract Act, No. 9, of 1872.

The liability of a common carrier of goods for hire in India is governed by the English common law, and is not affected by the provisions of the Indian Contract Act 1872, and consequently owners of steamers carrying goods as common carriers on the Irrawaddy are liable for their loss except where caused by the act of God or the Queen's enemies.

Moothora Kant Shaw v. India General Steam Navigation Company (I. L. Rep. 10 Cal. 166) approved and followed.

Kuverji Tulsidass v. Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company (I. L. Rep. 3 Bom. 109) overruled.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Recorder of Rangoon (W. F. Agnew, Esq.), given on the 3rd Jan. 1890.

The respondent, who was a native merchant at Calcutta, carried on business at Rangoon and Myingyan, in Burmah, and had been in the habit of shipping cotton and other goods by the steamers of the Irrawaddy Flotilla Company, who carried merchandise for hire by inland navigation, and were common carriers within the meaning of the Carriers Act 1865 (No. 3 of 1865). The suit was brought to recover the value of certain cotton belonging to the respondent, and shipped on board the company's vessel Yomah, at Myingyan, for carriage to Rangoon, which goods were destroyed by fire while in transit. The Recorder of Rangoon held that the company were liable as common carriers on the authority of a decision of the High Court at Calcutta (Moothora Kant Shaw v. India General Steam Navigation Company (I. L. Rep. 10 Cal. 166). The defendant company obtained special leave to appeal.

Finlay, Q.C., R. Brown, and J. D. Fitzgerald appeared for the appellants, and relied upon a decision of the High Court at Bombay (Kuverji Tulsidass v. Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company (I. L. Rep. 3 Bom. 109), in direct conflict with the decision of the High Court at Calcutta relied on below.

Barnes, Q.C., Agabeg, and Ince appeared for the respondent.

The arguments appear sufficiently from the judgment of their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 4.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The question involved in this appeal is one which has given rise to a conflict of judicial opinion in India. In 1878 the High Court of Bombay held that the effect of the Indian Contract Act 1872 was to relieve common carriers from the liability of insurers answerable for the goods intrusted to them "at all events" except in the case of loss or damage by the act of God or the Queen's enemies, and to make them responsible only for that amount of care which the Act requires of all bailees alike, in the absence of special contract. In 1883 the same point was brought before the High Court of Calcutta, who came to the conclusion that the liability of common carriers was not affected by the Act of 1872. Their Lordships have now to determine which of those authorities is to be preferred. It is admitted that the present appeal must fail unless the decision of the High Court of Bombay can be supported. For the present purpose it is not material to inquire how it is that the common law of England came to govern the duties and liabilities of common carriers throughout India. The fact itself is beyond dispute, and it was recognised by the Indian Legislature in the Carriers Act 1865, an Act framed on the lines of the English Carriers Act 1830. The preamble of the Act of 1865 recites that "it is expedient not only to enable common carriers to limit their liability for loss of, or damage to, property delivered to them to be carried, but also to declare their liability for loss of, or damage to, such property occasioned by the negligence or criminal acts of themselves, their servants, or agents." The Act defines a common carrier as "a person, other than the Government, engaged in the business of transporting for hire property from place to place, by land or inland navigation, for all persons indiscriminately," and it includes under the term person "any association or body of persons, whether incorporated or not." The Indian Contract Act 1872 recites that "it is expedient to define and amend certain parts of the law relating to contracts." Sect. 1 repeals the enactments mentioned in the schedule, among which the Carriers Act 1865 is not included, and then proceeds as follows: "But nothing herein contained shall affect the provisions of any statute, act, or regulation not hereby expressly repealed, nor any usage or custom of trade, nor any incident of any contract not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act." Their Lordships may observe in passing, and indeed it was admitted by the counsel for the appellants, that the words "not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act" are not to be connected with the clause "nor any usage or custom of trade." Both the reason of the thing and the grammatical construction of the sentence—if such a sentence is to be tried by any rules of grammar—seem to require that the application of those words should be confined to the subject which immediately precedes them. Chapter 9 of the Act of 1872 treats of bailments. Sect. 148 defines bailments in words wide enough to include bailment for carriage. Sects. 151 and 152 are in the following terms: "151. In all cases of bailment the bailee is bound to take as much care of the goods bailed to him as a man of ordinary prudence would, under similar circumstances, take of his own goods of the same bulk, quality, and value as the goods bailed. 152. The bailee, in the absence of any special contract, is not responsible for the loss, destruction, or deterioration of the thing bailed if he has taken the amount of care of it described in sect. 151." The learned counsel for the appellants took their stand on those two sections. They pointed out that the rule then laid down extended to every description of bailment. They argued that one measure of liability, and one measure only, was to be applied to all cases in the absence of special contract. A special contract, they said, if not an expressed contract, must at least be a contract special to the occasion. It would be absurd to speak of a condition which the English common law attaches to all contracts of carriage by common carriers as a special contract. There was nothing in sect. 1 of the Act of 1872 inconsistent with that view. The Carriers Act 1865 was preserved intact; it was only the common law which was altered. No usage or custom of trade was affected; the only thing affected was the custom of the realm, and if the duty cast on common carriers by the custom of the realm could properly be described as an incident of the contract between the carrier and the owner of the property to be carried, it was, as they maintained, inconsistent with the provisions of the Act of 1872. In support of their arguments the learned counsel for the appellants turned to the Indian Railways Acts 1879 and 1890; but their Lordships think that no assistance is to be derived from either of those Acts, and notwithstanding the able arguments of the learned counsel for the appellants it seems to their Lordships that there are several considerations, not all of equal weight, but all pointing in the same direction, which lead irresistibly to the conclusion that the Act of 1872 was not intended to alter the law applicable to common carriers. The Act of 1872 does not profess to be a complete code dealing with the law relating to contracts. It purports to do no more than to define and amend certain parts of that law. No doubt it treats of bailments in a separate chapter. But there is nothing to show that the Legislature intended to deal exhaustively with any particular chapter or subdivision of the law relating to contracts. On the other hand, it is to be borne in mind that at the time of the passing of the Act of 1872 there was in force a statute relating to common carriers which, in connection with the common law of England, formed a code at once simple, intelligible, and complete. Had it been intended to codify the law of common carriers by the Act of 1872, the more usual course would have been to have repealed the Act of 1865, and to re-enact its provisions with such alterations or modifications as the case might seem to require. But nothing of the kind was done. There is no mention of common carriers in the Act of 1872. It is scarcely conceivable that it could have been intended to sweep away the common law by a side wind, and by way of codifying the law to leave the law to be gathered from two Acts which proceeded on different principles, and approached the subject, if the subject be the same, from different points of view. Their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the Act of 1872 was not intended to deal with the law relating to common carriers, and notwithstanding the generality of some expressions in the chapter on bailments, they think that common carriers are not within the Act. They are therefore compelled to decide in favour of the view of the High Court of Calcutta, and against that of the High Court of Bombay. Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal ought to be dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs of the appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

BAUMVOLL MANUFACTUR VON CARL SCHEIBLER v. GILCHREST AND CO. AND FURNESS; THE SULTAN. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Bill of lading—Goods shipped on board a chartered ship—No notice of charter-party to shipper—Action on bills of lading—Liability of owner—Principal and agent—Holding out master as agent — Registered managing owner—Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80), s. 36.

By an agreement in writing the defendant F. agreed to sell a ship to the defendant G., the purchase to be completed in four months on payment of the last instalment of the purchase money, the ship in the meantime to remain the property of F. By a charter-party of the same date F. chartered the ship to G. for the four months on the following conditions (inter alia): the charterers to provide for and pay the captain, officers, and crew, the owner to insure the vessel and maintain her hull and machinery in an efficient state; the charterers to provide and pay for coals, port charges, agencies, and other charges; the charterers to pay 750l. a month for the use of the vessel during the four months; the captain to be under the orders of the charterers, who should indemnify the owner from all liability arising from the captain signing bills of lading; the owner to appoint the chief engineer, who was to be paid by the charterers and might be dismissed by them for misconduct, the charterers at the expiration of the charter to purchase the vessel according to the contract. The charterers then took possession of the ship. The owner F. was registered as owner and as managing owner under the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, s. 36, and he insured the vessel. During the charter the plaintiffs shipped a cargo of cotton on board the vessel under bills of lading, some of which were signed by the captain and the rest by a firm who acted as the charterers' agents at the port of shipment. The plaintiffs had no knowledge or notice of the existence of any charter-party or of the relations which existed between the owner, the charterers, and the captain. The ship was abandoned at sea and the cargo lost. In an action by the plaintiff against the owner Charles, J. held the owner liable. On appeal:

Held (reversing the decision of Charles, J., 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 87; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 59; (1891) 2 Q. B. 310), that the owner had parted with all possession and control of the ship to the charterers for the four months covered by the charter-party, and that any stipulations in the charter-party which might be contrary to its general intention should be disregarded; that therefore the master of the ship was not in fact the owner's servant, nor were the shipping agents at the port of shipment; that, as the shippers did not know that F. was the owner, there was no holding out by him to the shippers of the master or shipping agents as his servants; that the registration of the owner of a ship as managing owner under sect. 36 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 does not alter his contractual relations and make him liable for the acts of one who is not his servant; and that the defendant F., the owner of the ship, was not liable to the plaintiffs for the loss of the cargo.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Charles, J. (reported 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 87; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 59; (1891) 2 Q. B. 310) at the trial without a jury of a preliminary question in an action.

The action was brought for damages for the loss of 1200 bales of cotton shipped by the plaintiffs on board the steamship Sultan in Dec. 1889 at New Orleans, to be carried to Bremen and there delivered to him. The ship was abandoned at sea in the course of the voyage and the cargo lost.

It was alleged by the plaintiffs that the loss was attributable to the unseaworthiness of the ship, but a preliminary question was raised on the pleadings whether, assuming that the goods were lost as alleged in the statement of claim, the defendant Christopher Furness, and the defendants Messrs. Gilchrest and Co., or either and which of them, were liable for the alleged breach of duty and contract in respect of such loss.

This preliminary question was accordingly heard before Charles, J., Messrs. Gilchrest and Co. not being represented on that occasion.

The facts of the case were as follows: By an agreement in writing the defendant Furness agreed to sell the ship Sultan to the defendants Messrs. Gilchrest and Co., for 13,500*l.*, part to be paid in cash, and the rest to be paid on the expiration of the charter-party of the vessel to Gilchrest and Co. for four months, which was executed on the same day as the agreement for sale.

By this charter-party, which is set out in full in the judgment of Charles, J. in the report of the case before him, Furness was described as the owner and Messrs. Gilchrest and Co. as the charterers, and the charter being for four months it was agreed (inter alia) that the charterers should provide and pay for all the provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew; that the owner should pay for the insurance of the vessel and maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for the service; that the charterers should provide and pay for all the coals, fuel, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, and other charges; that the charterers should pay for the use and hire of the vessel at the rate of 750*l.* a month; that the captain should be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other arrangements, and the charterers thereby agreed to indemnify the owner from all consequences and liabilities that might arise from the captain's signing bills of lading or in otherwise complying with the same; that the owner should have the option of appointing the chief engineer, who should be paid by the charterers; that, if the charterers should be dissatisfied with the engineer's conduct, the owner should, on receiving particulars of the complaint, investigate it, and, if necessary, make a change in the appointment when the vessel was in England; and that the charterers should at the expiration of the charter purchase the vessel for 13,500*l.*, according to the agreement.

Messrs. Gilchrest and Co at once took possession of the ship, and appointed the captain and crew, Furness exercising his option of appointing the chief engineer, and she sailed for New Orleans.

In the meantime Furness was registered as owner, and his name and address as managing owner were registered under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80), s. 36. He also insured the ship. At New Orleans the plaintiffs shipped the cotton in respect of the loss of which the present action was brought, under bills of lading not referring to any charter-party, some of which were signed by the master of the ship and others by Messrs. Ross, Keen, and Co., who acted as shipping agents at New Orleans for Messrs. Gilchrest and Co.

The defendant Furness knew nothing of the circumstances under which the goods had been shipped, or the bills of lading. The plaintiffs had no knowledge or notice of the charter-party, or of the relations which existed between Gilchrest and Co. and Furness.

The charter-party was in force when the loss took place.

Upon these facts Charles, J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs that the defendant Furness was liable for the breach of duty and contract (if any) which might have been committed.

The defendant Furness appealed.

Gorell Barnes, Q.C., Joseph Walton, and Synnott for Furness.—In the first place neither the master of the ship nor Messrs. Ross, Keen, and Co. were in fact servants or agents of Furness. As to Ross, Keen and Co. there is no question about this, as Furness knew nothing about them. As to the master of the ship, he was the servant of the charterers. The intention of the charter-party clearly was that this should be so, as the charterers were to have entire possession and control of the ship. The stipulations put in the charter-party which gave Furness any control of the ship were merely put in to enable him to protect the ship, which was his security for the purchase money, and were not intended to act in any way so as to show that the vessel was not in fact demised to the charterers. All the cases show that, if the owner has parted with all possession and control of his ship to the charterers, the captain is not his, but the charterers' servant. In any case that may be cited to the contrary it will be found that, in fact, the master has been admitted by the owner to be his servant. They cited

As to the question of the master and the shipping agents being held out by Furness to the plaintiffs as being his agents, that cannot arise, because neither Furness nor the plaintiffs knew anything about each other. Neither does the registration of Furness as managing owner under the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 affect this question. That Act was passed with the view of insuring the safety of the crew of a ship, and does not alter the position of the managing owner with regard to anyone else. This is the law as laid down by Bowen. J. in Frazer v. Cuthbertson, 6 Q. B. Div. 94.

Sir Walter Phillimore, Q.C. and Dr. Stubbs for the plaintiffs. — Furness is liable to the plaintiffs because he was owner of the ship. It is not clear from the charter-party that the charterers were to have entire possession and control of the ship; the many provisions in favour of the owner showed that he intended to keep the control to himself in reality. The fact that Furness insured himself against claims for loss or damage caused to goods on the vessel shows what he himself thought his position was. [Lord Esher, M.R.—He did that after the charter-party.] The charter is not a demise of the ship; it is only a grant to the charterers of a right to have their cargo brought home in her. A ship is usually sailed by the owner, and if she is not the owner must give notice if he wishes to escape liability for the acts of the master. The master is primâ facie the servant of the owner, and it is for the latter to remove that presumption. [Kay, L.J.—But if the master never was the servant of the owner, no primâ facie presumption of his continuing to be so exists to be removed. Lord Esher, M.R.—Dr. Lushington, in the case already quoted of the St. Cloud (ubi sup.), says: "I apprehend that primâ facie the owner of the vessel is the person responsible, but the cases decided at common law show that there are circumstances under which the owner will be divested of such responsibility, and that responsibility will be cast upon another. Such is the case of a vessel demised by charter to another so as to divest the owner altogether of possession; when the charterer is pro hac vice the owner."] The owner has allowed the charterers to use the ship, and he knows that they must employ agents; he must therefore be taken to have held himself out as employing them. The shippers, not knowing of the existence of the charter-party, are entitled to consider the master as having the ordinary authority from the owner to give bills of lading, and therefore are entitled to hold the owner responsible for the loss of the goods:

Sandeman v. Scurr, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 446; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 608; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 86.

There is no case in which it has not been brought to the knowledge of the shipper of the goods that there has been a demise of the ship when he has failed in his action. Hayn v. Culliford (ubi sup.) is in favour of the plaintiffs. [Barnes, Q.C.—In the report of that case in the court below (39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 288; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 48; 3 C. P. Div. 410) it is stated that the stevedore was employed by the ship.] The registration of Furness as managing owner is primâ facie evidence of his liability:

Lord Esher, M.R.—The first question for us to decide is, what was the relation between the defendant Furness and the other defendants with regard to this ship. What that relation was is contained in two written documents, the agreement and the charter-party, and appears to me to be plain enough. Gilchrest and Co. wanted to buy a ship, and a Spanish ship was brought to their notice, but, as they had not enough money to pay the price asked for her, they applied to Furness to help them in the transaction. It was then arranged between them, and a written agreement was drawn up, that Furness should buy the ship from the Spaniard and agree to sell her to Gilchrest and Co. The first document was a contract for the sale of the ship by Furness to Gilchrest and Co., a contract to sell, which, in my view, amounts to this: Furness said he would buy the ship, but, as she was wanted to be used as a registered British ship, he must have her registered in his name. He also agreed to sell her to Gilchrest and Co., and it was settled that part of the purchase money was to be paid at once, but that for the next four months she was to belong to Furness, and he was to charter her to Gilchrest and Co. for that time at the rate of 750*l.* a month, so that Gilchrest and Co. were bound to pay down an instalment of the purchase money, and to take a charter of the ship for four months. The effect of that was that, as between the two parties, the ship for the next four months was not Gilchrest and Co.'s either at law or in equity, but she was the property of Furness. One man could not sell a ship to another so that the latter became owner and yet chartered the ship; that would be the case of a man who is not owner chartering a ship to the man who is. Therefore for these four months Furness was the owner and Gilchrest and Co. were the charterers, and Furness was the registered owner and managing owner under the Act 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, s. 36. Now, the charter-party is also a written document. We know merchants are not very accurate in drawing up these contracts; but we must look at it and construe it subject to the relation in which the parties stood at the time with regard to the ship, and in order to get at what their intention was we must look at what is put in in addition to the printed form and at what has been struck out of it. The charter-party is drawn up in the ordinary form, and gives the possession and control of the ship for four months to Gilchrest and Co., and Furness binds himself by it that, after the four months, and on the rest of the purchase money being paid, the ship shall become the property of Gilchrest and Co. By that charter-party Gilchrest and Co. were intended to take absolute control and possession of the ship then and there, and, in order to give them that control and possession, Furness thereby divests himself of his control and possession. Gilchrest and Co. are to have the power of appointing the captain and crew and of paying and dismissing them; they are to order the ship where they choose, and to have the power of making any contracts with regard to her which they may like to make; they undertake all risks that the ship may run on her voyage as between themselves and Furness after the ship has passed an examination; and no doubt they would have to do any repairs that might become necessary in the course of their employment of the ship. During these four months Furness was to be the owner of the ship, and if she were lost he would lose his security for the purchase money that was to be paid at the end of that time; so that he had an interest in the ship which he might have insured, and, in fact, he did so. The ship being security to him for the payment of the rest of the purchase money, injury to the machinery would injure his security, and perhaps endanger the whole vessel, and he therefore arranged in the charter-party that he should have the option of appointing the chief engineer; though the charterers were to pay the engineer, and there is nothing in the charter-party to show that Gilchrest and Co. could not dismiss him for misconduct. I therefore come to a conclusion contrary to that arrived at by Charles, J. Some of the stipulations in the charter-party are idle, and should have been struck out; yet, taking the document as a whole, that construction being the true one, too much importance should not be attached to the parts that are futile. Some of the stipulations, such as that relating to the appointment of the captain and crew, are inefficient, and must be disregarded, as the charter-party clearly is a giving up by Furness to Gilchrest and Co. of all possession and control of the vessel for four months.

That being so, we come now to the question whether the plaintiffs have any right of action against Furness as owner of the ship. The first cause of action which is alleged is that there was a breach of the bills of lading, and the second cause is that there was negligence in sending the ship to sea from New Orleans in an unseaworthy condition. It is not enough to show that the ship went to sea in an unseaworthy condition, it must also be shown that the unseaworthiness was the cause of the loss; but for the purposes of this judgment I will assume that that has been proved. Now, as to the first point. The bills of lading were made between the plaintiffs on the one side and either Messrs. Ross, Keen, and Co., agents for the ship at New Orleans, or the master of the ship on the other. But who were these contracts really made with, because Messrs. Ross, Keen, and Co. and the master were acting as agents of and authorised by somebody in signing these bills of lading? It is clear that Gilchrest and Co. authorised them to do so. Did Furness, in fact, authorise them to do so? Clearly not; he had nothing to do with the bills of lading, he had no interest in them or knowledge of them. Then, it is argued, that may be so, but the captain must be taken to have been Furness's agent in signing these bills. Messrs. Ross, Keen, and Co. were certainly not his agents for this purpose, but it is said that the captain was. If the captain was Furness's captain, then, I think, any shipper taking a bill of lading signed by the master of a ship, and having no knowledge of any charter-party by which the ship and the right of giving bills of lading are handed over to the charterer and the master as his agent, might have the right of saying that the master of the ship is agent of the owner, and has from him the ordinary authority of such an agent. It is said that a shipper would have the right of assuming that the captain is the owner's captain unless it be first shown that he had knowledge of a charter-party taking away from the captain his agency for the owner. That law only applies in a case where the captain is the owner's captain. Then comes the question, when is the captain the owner's captain? The answer is, when the owner appoints him, and exercises over him the usual rights which an owner exercises over his captain as between themselves. I say "as between themselves" because the owner may have given a right to the charterer inconsistent with his exercise of those rights. If the captain is the owner's servant, and has been appointed by him on the ordinary terms, then the captain is bound to obey the owner's orders. Then was this captain the captain of the owner? After listening to all the cases which have been cited from the time of Lord Ellenborough downwards, it seems to me that it has always been assumed that the question depends on this: whether the owner has by the charter-party parted with all the possession and control of the ship, and given to the charterer, independently of himself, all powers and rights of appointing the captain and crew, and managing and employing the ship. When that has been done, it has been called a letting or a demise of the ship; but in reality it is a parting with all possession and control of the ship. In such a case the captain is not the captain of the owner, and therefore he is no servant or agent of the owner, and has no right to bind the owner by a bill of lading; he can only bind those whose servant he is. As I have said, this seems to me to go through all the cases, from the case of Frazer v. Marsh (13 East, 238), decided by Lord Ellenborough, downwards. All the other cases are to the same effect. Therefore it seems to me that Furness is not liable on these bills of lading.

Now, as to the other point, upon the question of negligence in the captain in taking the ship to sea, or keeping her at sea in an unseaworthy condition. How can the captain make the owner liable if he is not a servant of the owner? It is impossible that, when the captain is not a servant of the owner, the owner should be liable for the captain's negligence. The judgment of the Court of Appeal, delivered by Lord Bramwell, in the case of Hayn v. Culliford (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 128; 4 C. P. Div. 182) was cited; but that case can only mean that the defendants were held liable, whether on the bills of lading or for negligence, on the assumption that the captain was a servant of the owner. But then it is argued that, even if that be so, the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, by its provisions as to the registration of a managing owner, has altered the law, and gives contractual rights which formerly had no existence. That Act was passed with the object of insuring the safety of those people who go on board ships, and for that purpose it puts certain liabilities on the ship's manager, so that, as regards claims made under the Act, he is when registered prevented from saying that he is not managing owner. But that liability does not alter his contractual relations with other people, nor does it alter the general law so as to make him liable for the acts of some one who is not his servant. Such a result would be absurd. Bowen, L.J. has dealt with this point in his very capable judgment in Frazer v. Cuthbertson (6 Q. B. Div. 93). He says in that case, at page 99: "The 36th section of the Act nowhere creates new agents, new functions, or new capacities, nor clothes existing agents with enlarged powers. The section is part of the machinery designed to secure adequate protection for lives and property at sea; and provides, with that or a similar object, that a certain class of agents when they are appointed shall be registered, so that it may be known who in fact is managing the vessel. A managing owner registered under the Act is no more and no less than a managing owner before the Act. He binds those whose agent he is, he binds nobody besides." I am therefore of opinion that in this case Furness is not liable to the plaintiffs either under the bills of lading or for negligence of the master, or through his being the managing owner registered under this Act of Parliament, or for any cause of action that has been alleged. I disagree with the judgment delivered by Charles, J., and this appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant Furness.

Lopes, L.J.—In this action it has been sought to make the defendant Furness liable on a bill of lading. Whether he is so depends on whether the master of the ship was the servant of the charterers or of Furness. I am of opinion that he was the servant of the charterers and not of Furness, and I ground the conclusion I have come to on these reasons: The charterers appointed the captain, they paid him, and they could dismiss him; and it follows therefore that he was their servant. The result of the cases seems to me to be that, if the master is in possession of the ship as servant of the owner, a shipper of goods who is in ignorance of any charter-party is entitled to regard the owner as the person who has contracted to carry the goods, and to hold him liable for any breach of that contract. But that entirely depends upon whether the master is in fact the servant of the owner, and as I have come to the conclusion that, as I have said, the master of this ship was not the servant of Furness, Furness cannot be held liable under that proposition of law. Another proposition of law to be deduced from the cases is this: If the charter-party is such as to give the charterer the possession and control of the vessel so that she is in fact let to him and the master is his servant, then the owner is not in the position of a carrier, and the master is not either actually or presumptively his agent. Here it is plain that the defendant Furness had divested himself of the possession and control of the ship, and from this point of view also he cannot be held liable. But the plaintiffs contended that their not having had notice of the charter-party was sufficient to make the owner liable, notwithstanding the fact that the master was in fact the servant of the charterers. According to the cases, when an owner and a captain stand in the relation of master and servant, the owner of the ship, in the absence of notice of a charter-party to the shipper, no doubt holds out the captain as his agent with authority to sign bills of lading on his behalf, but only in such cases where this relationship exists. That is the result of the cases, and I do not think that Steel v. Lester (ubi sup.), which was cited in the argument, really controverts that view. In all the cases in which it has been held that there was a holding out of the master by the owner as his agent, there was also the fact that the master was the servant of the owner, appointed and liable to be dismissed by him, and that is the broad distinction between those cases and the present. As to the point made about Furness being registered owner, the Master of the Rolls has dealt fully with it. No doubt the register is primâ facie evidence of ownership, and it has been held also to be primâ facie evidence that the master is the servant of the registered owner, but subject to this that it may be explained; and it is evidence only until the contrary is made out. Here the contrary is made out. I am therefore of opinion that Furness is not liable in this action, and that the appeal must be allowed.

Kay, L.J.—I agree. The position of the parties in this case is a very peculiar one, and may perhaps never occur again; but the questions that have been argued are of great and general interest. By two documents, dated the same day, the defendant Furness, who had purchased this ship, sold her to Gilchrest and Co. upon the terms that a deposit of 500*l.* was to be paid at once, and a further sum within a certain time, and the rest of the purchase money by certain instalments. It appears on the face of the contract that the intention was to deliver the ship to Gilchrest and Co.,

and, though Furness was the vendor and Gilchrest and Co. the purchasers, the sale was not to be completed for four months, and during that time the ship was let to Gilchrest and Co. by a charter-party bearing the same date. That explains, I think, how it came to pass that Gilchrest and Co. were to have so large a control of the vessel during the four months. It was agreed by the charter-party that they were to appoint the master and crew, and have absolute control of the vessel for the four months preceding the completion of the purchase, and the circumstances being unusual, the usual form of a charter-party was somewhat departed from. The ship was then handed over to Gilchrest and Co. and sailed under their orders for New Orleans. She encountered bad weather, and on her voyage from New Orleans to Bremen with a cargo of cotton, she was abandoned and the cargo lost. The action now brought is on the bills of lading relating to this cotton, some of which were signed by Messrs. Ross, Keen, and Co., and some by the master. It seems clear beyond all doubt that Messrs. Ross, Keen, and Co. and the master were agents of Gilchrest and Co. only, and Furness had in no sense authorised them to act for him. But it is argued that, even if they were not agents of Furness in fact, he had held them out as such. The principles as to holding out are the same whatever the holding out be, and Lindley, L.J., in his book on Partnership, 4th edit., at page 40, thus states the doctrine: "The doctrine that a person holding himself out as a partner, and thereby inducing others to act on the faith of his representations, is liable to them as if he were in fact a partner, is nothing more than an illustration of the general principle of estoppel by conduct." And further on he says: "It also follows that no person can be fixed with liability on the ground that he has been held out as a partner, unless two things concur, namely, first, the alleged act of holding out must have been done either by him or by his consent; and, secondly, it must have been known to the person seeking to avail himself of it." Applying those words to this case, we find that the plaintiffs did not know that Furness was either the registered owner or the registered managing owner of this ship. Then, how can it be said that the mere fact of Furness having his name on the register as either owner or managing owner is a holding out by him which would enable the persons who took the bills of lading either from Messrs. Ross, Keen, and Co. or the master to make a claim against Furness as having held out to them that he had authorised Messrs. Ross, Keen, and Co. and the master of the ship to act as his agents? The answer to that is, that they did not know that Furness was on the register. It is then argued that the registration as managing owner or owner of a ship is notice to all the world; but it has never yet been held that such a public notice is enough to make a man liable for the acts of those who are not his servants as in such a case as this. The facts of the case show no such estoppel as the plaintiffs seek to rely upon. I think the defendant Furness is not liable in this action, and I agree entirely in the conclusions which the other members of the court have arrived at. The decision of Charles, J. will be reversed, and judgment entered for the defendant Furness.

Hedley v. The Pinkney and Sons Steamship Company Limited. (a)

APPLICATION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Injury to one of crew—Negligence of master of the ship—Fellow-servants of owners of ship—Common employment—"Seaworthiness" of ship — Duties of owners and master — Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80), s. 5.

The master and crew of a merchant ship are fellow-servants and engaged in a common employment, so that the owners are not liable for an injury to one of the crew caused by the negligence of the master.

For convenience in loading, a ship was built with a gap in her bulwarks, but movable iron stanchions with a wooden railing were provided as part of the ship's equipment for filling up the gap when she was at sea. The master negligently omitted to have the stanchions and railing put in their place, as he might have done at any moment after leaving the docks, and one of the crew, the plaintiff's husband, fell overboard in a storm through the unprotected gap and was drowned. It was admitted that if the stanchions and railing had been put in their place the ship would have been perfectly seaworthy.

Held, that, as the stanchions and railing might easily have been put in their place at any moment, there was no evidence to go to the jury that there had been a breach by the owners and master of the obligation imposed by sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 to keep the ship "in a seaworthy condition for the voyage during the same."

The definition of "seaworthiness" given by Parke, B. in Dixon v. Sadler (5 M. & W. 405) approved.

Ramsay v. Quinn (Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 322) dissented from.

This was an application by the defendant company for judgment or a new trial on appeal from the verdict and judgment at the trial of the action before Grantham, J. and a special jury at Durham.

The action was brought under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) by the widow and administratrix of a seaman for damages in respect of his death while employed on the defendant's ship.

The deceased was engaged as one of the crew of the steamship Prodano, which was owned by the defendants, on a voyage from London to Cardiff.

For convenience in loading, the ship was built with gaps in her bulwarks, but movable iron stanchions with wooden railings were provided as part of the ship's equipment, which could be fixed in the gaps when the vessel was at sea. The master of the ship omitted to have this done on the voyage in question, and during a storm in the Channel the deceased fell overboard through one of the unprotected gaps and was drowned. It was admitted that if the stanchions and railing had been fixed in this gap they would have afforded sufficient security for the crew against the ordinary risks of going overboard, and that the deceased in this particular case would not have gone overboard. The stanchions and railing were ready at hand to have been put in their places at any time if the master of the ship had given orders that it should be done, and it would have taken about twenty minutes to fix them all.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80) it is enacted:

Sect. 5. In every contract of service, express or implied, between the owner of a ship and the master or any seaman thereof . . . there shall be implied, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, an obligation on the owner of the ship, that the owner of the ship and the master, and every agent charged with the loading of the ship, or the preparing thereof for sea, or the sending thereof to sea, shall use all reasonable means to insure the seaworthiness of the ship for the voyage at the time when the voyage commences, and to keep her in a seaworthy condition for the voyage during the same; provided that nothing in this section shall subject the owner of a ship to any liability by reason of the ship being sent to sea in an unseaworthy state where, owing to special circumstances, the so sending thereof to sea is reasonable and justifiable.

Upon the direction of the learned judge at the trial, the jury found that the ship was not "in a seaworthy condition" within the meaning of sect. 5, and found a verdict for the plaintiff for 175*l*.

The defendants moved for judgment or for a new trial.

Finlay, Q.C., Cyril Dodd, Q.C., and A. Lennard, for the defendants.—At the trial of the action reliance was placed by the plaintiffs upon two matters. One was that the captain was negligent in not seeing that the stanchions and railings were put in their place when a storm was coming on, and that his masters, the owners of the vessel, are responsible for this negligence in their servant The other was that there had been a breach of the obligations imposed by sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 in that the vessel had not been "kept in a seaworthy condition" during the voyage because the opening in the bulwarks was not properly protected. As to the first point, the captain of a ship is a fellow-workman engaged in a common employment with the crew within the rule which exempts the master from liability to one of the crew for injury arising from the negligence of a fellow-servant. In Wilson v. Merry (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 30; L. Rep. 1 H. L. Sc. 326) Lord Cairns says: "I do not think the liability or non-liability of the master to his workman can depend upon the question whether the author of the accident is not, or is, in any technical sense the fellow-workman or collaborateur of the sufferer. . . . The case of the fellow-workman appears to me to be an example of the rule, and not the rule itself. The rule, as I think, must stand upon higher and broader grounds. . . . The master is not, and can not be, liable to his servant unless there be negligence on the part of the master in that in which he, the master, has contracted or undertaken with his servant to do." They also cited

Howells v. The Landore Siemens Steel Company, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 19; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 62; Johnson v. Lindsay and Co., 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; 1891) App. Cas. 371.

But the second point is the one which the plaintiff mainly relies upon. There is nothing in sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 to show that the word "seaworthiness" is used in any other sense than its well-known one. It is admitted that if the stanchions and railings had been put in their places the vessel would have been seaworthy. Therefore, the owners had done all that is required of them, and the negligence of the captain in not making use of the proper equipment of the ship is relied on as showing the ship's unseaworthiness. The ship was quite fit to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage. The meaning of "seaworthy" has been very well defined by Parke, B. in Dixon v. Sadler (5 M. & W. 405), and by Lord Blackburn in his judgment in Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72). This ship was seaworthy within those definitions. They also referred to

Gibson v. Small, 4 H. L. C. 353;
Couch v. Steel, 3 E. & B. 402.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C. and Raikes, for the plaintiff.—As to the first point, it is not denied that the captain of the ship ought to have seen the stanchions and the railing fixed when the storm was coming on. There is no case in England which lays down that the captain and the crew of a ship are fellow-servants within the rule which exonerates their master from liability to one of the crew caused by the negligence of the captain; they cannot be said to be fellow-workmen. [Lord Esher, M.R.—Is not the captain a servant of the owners?] Yes. [Lord Esher, M.R.—Is not a sailor a servant of the owners?] Yes. [Lord Esher, M.R.—Then why are they not fellow-servants, as they are both engaged in the navigation of the ship?] As soon as the ship sails the captain represents the owners for all purposes. The captain of a ship is in a very peculiar position; he is clothed, as Story says, "with the character of the owner." Though this point has never been decided in England it has been decided in Ireland in 1874, and in favour of our contention. That case was an action against the owner of a ship for injury to a sailor caused by the captain's negligence, and it was there held that the owner was liable.

Ramsay v. Quinn, Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 322.

In that case Wilson v. Merry (ubi sup.) was cited on behalf of the owners. They also cited Murphy v. Smith, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 605; 19 C. B. N. S. 361.

As to the second point on the construction of sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876. There is under that section an absolute undertaking by the owners that the master of the ship shall use all reasonable means to keep the ship in a seaworthy condition during the voyage. This obligation is quite apart from any question of negligence on the part of the master. It is clear that the master did not use all reasonable means to keep the ship safe, so far as the safety of the crew was concerned. Anything making the ship unsafe for the crew because of the perils of the sea makes the ship unseaworthy within the meaning of this Act. [Lord Esher, M.R.—"Seaworthy" is a well-known word, and does not mean the same as "safe."] The word is used here in this section in a special sense. The Act was passed with the object of ensuring the safety of the crew, and in construing this section this intention of the Legislature must be kept in view.

Finlay, Q.C. did not reply.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think that there was no evidence to go to the jury in support of the plaintiff's claim in this case. That claim was put forward as being based upon two grounds. In the first place it was argued that, supposing the Merchant Shipping Act were not in existence, the captain of the vessel was negligent, that his negligence was the cause of the death of the plaintiff's husband, and that the owners of the vessel were liable for the results of the captain's negligence under Lord Campbell's Act (9 and 0 Vict. c. 93). I think there was evidence to go to the jury of the captain's negligence, because it was obviously his duty, considering the ordinary height of the bulwarks and the small height of that part where the movable rails were unshipped, to have seen that this movable top was fixed in its position when the storm was coming on. I have no doubt too that there was evidence that the negligence of the captain in not having this top fixed in its position was the cause of the man's death. But then, admitting that, the question comes whether the owners of a ship are liable for the negligence of the captain with regard to the safety of one of the crew. The ordinary rule of law is that a person is liable for the negligence of his servant, and the plaintiff must therefore begin by proving that the captain is a servant of the owners. To my mind that is proved beyond a doubt, because the captain is appointed and paid by them and can be dismissed by them, so that he is in the ordinary sense of the word a servant If the owners were present on board he would be bound to obey their orders, even to the destruction of their property. But the seaman is also a servant of the owners, and is bound to obey their orders if they are present. The captain no doubt is a superior servant to the seamen, and the seaman is bound to obey his orders if the owners are not present, but they are fellow-servants, both employed by their common master on the same transaction, or, as it is often termed, in common employment. By the common law of England, when fellow servants are engaged in a common employment, whether one is superior to the other or not is immaterial, their master is not liable to one of them for an injury caused by the negligence of the other. There has at one time been some discussion as to how far that was the law in Scotland, but it was settled long ago that that is the law in England. An Irish decision was cited on behalf of the plaintiff (Ramsay v. Quinn, Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 322), for the purpose of showing that in the case of a ship the owner is liable for the negligence of his captain by which a sailor on the ship is injured; in other words, that the captain being a superintendent of the ship is not, in the ordinary sense of the word, a servant of the owner. Reliance was also placed on a passage in Story on Agency. No doubt the position which the captain of a ship stands in with regard to the owners is of a somewhat peculiar kind, and Story says he is treated "as in some sort and to some extent clothed with the character of a special employer or owner of the ship." All I say here is that a captain is not in that position to the extent which is now contended for. I decline to be bound by the judgment delivered in an Irish court in Ramsay v. Quinn (ubi sup.). I do not say that it may not be good law in Ireland, but I say distinctly that it is not law in England. As to this first point therefore, I say that to my mind it is obvious that the plaintiff can not rely on the negligence of the captain, because he was a fellow servant of the deceased employed in the same employment.

Then as to the second point. It was argued that, even if the first point fails, the action is maintainable by reason of sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80). That is a wholly different and distinct cause of action from that which I have just discussed, it gives the go-by to negligence, except so far as there may be a want of reasonable care to do something required by the Act in order that the vessel might be seaworthy. It was said that there was evidence on which the jury might find that the vessel was unseaworthy within the meaning of the Act, both when she started on the voyage and when the accident happened, and that the captain did not use reasonable care to make her seaworthy. The question is whether there was such evidence. The argument of Mr. Tindal Atkinson comes really to this, that "unseaworthy" is, for the purposes of this section, the same as "unsafe;" that the meaning of the section is that the owner is bound, in sending the ship to sea, to see that she is safe with regard to the crew and each one of them, and he and the master are also bound to use reasonable care at every point of the voyage that she is safe with regard to the crew. Now "seaworthy" is a term well known to nautical people. Unless there is something to the contrary in this Act of Parliament, the term must be intended to have its ordinary meaning as used in the language of nautical people. What that meaning is has been well expressed by Parke, B. in Dixon v. Sadler (5 M. & W. 405). At page 414 he says this: "In the case of an insurance for a certain voyage it is clearly established that there is an implied warranty that the vessel shall be seaworthy, by which it is meant that she shall be in a fit state as to repairs, equipment, and crew, and in all other respects to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage insured at the time of sailing upon it." That was a question of insurance; but the legal definition of seaworthiness is applicable in other cases, namely, that a ship must be in a fit state as to repairs, equipment, and crew, and in all other respects to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage. The limits of that definition are well expressed by Lord Blackburn in Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72), where a port-hole in a ship had not been properly shut. He says: "If, for example, this port was left unfastened so that, when any ordinary weather came on and the sea washed as high as the port, it would be sure to give way and the water come in, unless something more was done—if on the inside the wheat had been piled up so high against it and covered it so that no one could ever see whether it had been so left or not, and so that, if it had been found out or thought of, it would have required a great deal of time and trouble (time above all) to remove the cargo and get at and fasten it—if that was found to be the case, and it was found that at the time of sailing it was in that state, I can hardly imagine any jury finding anything else than that a ship which sailed in that state did not sail in a fit state to encounter such perils of the sea as are reasonably to be expected in crossing the Atlantic. I think, on the other hand, if this port had been, as a port in a cabin or some other place would often be, open, and when they were sailing out under the lee of the shore remaining open but quite capable of being shut at a moment's notice, so soon as the sea became in the least degree rough, and in case a regular storm came on, capable of being closed with a dead light—in such a case as that no one could, with any prospect of success, ask any reasonable people, whether they were a jury or judges, to say that that made the vessel unfit to encounter the perils of the voyage, because that thing could be set right in a few minutes, and there is always some warning before a storm comes on, so that they would have plenty of time to put it all right, and it would have been put right; if they did not put it right after such a warning, that would be negligence on the part of the crew, and not unseaworthiness of the ship." He says that if the port were left open under such circumstances that it could be shut when required that is not unseaworthiness, and he says that negligence in the crew is not unseaworthiness. Now, here it is said that the ship was not properly equipped at the time of the accident. But the movable railing that went on the top of the bulwark was there in the ship, and it is not denied that if it had been put in its place it would have afforded sufficient security for the crew against the ordinary perils of the voyage. That is exactly the case put by Lord Blackburn of a port being left open under such circumstances that it could be shut at any moment. In the case we have before us now the captain could have made his ship safe in a moment if he had done his duty when he saw the storm was coming on. Therefore, in the ordinary sense of the word this ship was not "unseaworthy;" the captain was negligent, but the ship was not "unseaworthy." But it was argued that "seaworthiness," as used in this Act, has a peculiar meaning, because it relates to other things than those which it relates to in a bill of lading or charter-party; that in those cases it is used with reference to the cargo, whereas in this Act it is used not in reference to the cargo, but to the crew and people on board the vessel. But that does not alter this fact, that "seaworthiness" relates to the condition of the ship, so that if she is "in a fit state as to repairs, equipment, and crew, and in all other respects to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage," she must be able to face the ordinary risks of the voyage with regard to the safety of the crew. This ship was in such repair and so equipped and provided with a crew as to be safe in all ordinary risks of the voyage with regard to the safety of the crew if the captain had taken proper care. So that the accident that happened was due not to any want in the equipment of the ship, but solely to the negligence of the captain in not using proper care to employ the means for the safety of the crew which had been supplied to him. That being so, it is unnecessary to consider what would be a failure of the captain to keep the ship seaworthy within the meaning of the Act, as that question does not arise in the present case. The case is governed by the considerations I have expressed, and I think that there was no evidence against the owners. The learned judge ought to have withdrawn the case from the jury, and we must order judgment to be entered for the defendants.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The Master of the Rolls has gone so fully into the case that I will only give my reasons because we are differing from the learned judge at the trial. I do not think this action can be maintained against the owners of the ship. In the first place, it is based on the alleged negligence of a servant of the owners, and no doubt such negligence was the cause of the accident; but the question is, whether the owners are liable to the plaintiff for this negligence. It seems clear to me that they are not liable, and upon a principle of law well-known since the case of Priestley v. Fowler (3 M. & W. 1) that a master is not liable for injuries to a servant caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant, as such negligence is considered to be one of the ordinary risks of service undertaken by a servant. We must then consider what is the position of a captain of a ship, and whether he is a servant of the owners. The owners appoint him, pay him, and are the only persons who can dismiss him, so that, unless there is any authority to the contrary, he is in the position of an ordinary servant. But it is said that the captain of a ship is an exception to the general rule, and an Irish case, Ramsay v. Quinn (ubi sup.), was cited with the view of showing that he is in the position of an alter ego of the owners rather than a servant to them. In England there is no authority for saying so, but Wilson v. Merry (ubi sup.), a decision on the position of a manager of a mine, is an authority against the proposition. In the argument in the case of Howells v. The Landore Siemens Steel Company (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 19; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 62) Lord Blackburn says: "Under the Merchant Shipping Act the captain of a ship must be certificated, but it never was suggested that that made any difference in the position of the captain as servant to the ship-owner," and afterwards in his judgment he says. "There have been several cases in which, whether vice-principal or manager, the person has been held to be a fellow-servant. In Scotland it seems that a vice-principal has been held to be in a different position from an ordinary fellow-servant. But the decision of the House of Lords is distinct, at least so far as this, that the fact that the servant held the position of vice-principal does not affect the liability of the master for his negligence as regards a fellow-servant." Again, in the recent case of Johnson v. Lindsay and Co. (65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; (1891) App. Cas. 371) Lord Herschell says, speaking of what Lord Cairns said in Wilson v. Merry (ubi sup.): "It is clear to my mind that when Lord Cairns used this language, he was only intending to repudiate the contention put forward by the appellant in that case that the rule applied exclusively to workmen of the same grade actually employed in a common labour, and had no application where the person whose negligence was complained of was in the position of a manager not taking part in manual labour, who was, in fact, the employer's alter ego." The Irish case that has been relied upon is therefore not good law, at any rate in England. The captain of the ship was a servant of the owners, and a fellow-servant with the plaintiff's husband, and consequently the owners are not liable in this action for the captain's negligence. This case does not come under the Employers' Liability Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), because seamen are excepted from it.

But there is another contention, that the case comes within the provisions of sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 by which it is enacted that, in any contract of service, express or implied, between the owner of a ship and the master, or any seaman thereof, there shall be implied, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, an obligation on the owner of the ship that he and the master shall use all reasonable means to insure the seaworthiness of the ship for the voyage at the time when the voyage commences, and to keep her in a seaworthy condition for the voyage during the same. The plaintiff says that this ship was not "in a seaworthy condition" at the time that the accident happened, and so raises the question as to what meaning is to be attached to the word "seaworthiness" as used in this section. It is argued that "seaworthiness" is there used as an equivalent to "safety." I cannot adopt that view. The term is well known in the law, and has received definitions from very competent judges. In Dixon v. Sadler (ubi sup.) Parke, B. says the word means that the ship must be in a fit state as to repairs, equipment, and crew, and in all other respects to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage. Now, for the purposes of this Act I should tell the jury that a ship to be seaworthy must be in the state described by Parke, B., following his words, and that her master must use all reasonable means in his power to keep her in that state during the voyage. The ship here was admittedly "seaworthy" at the commencement of the voyage in which the accident happened. She had a railing which, beyond all doubt, was enough for the protection of the seamen, but it was not in use when the accident happened. Surely that was due to the negligence of the master and nothing else. The railing was on board, and it was fit for use; the only reason why it was not used was that the captain was negligent in not having it shipped. The action is, therefore, based on the negligence of the captain, and the contention that unseaworthiness in the ship was the cause of the accident entirely fails. Consequently I agree that judgment must be entered for the defendants.

KAY, L.J.—I agree, and for the reasons that have been already expressed. I cannot see how the decision of the Irish court in Ramsay v. Quinn (ubi sup.) can be reconciled with Wilson v. Merry (ubi sup.) and Johnson v. Lindsay and Co. (ubi sup.) in the House of Lords. I have no doubt that the master of the ship was negligent in not having the railing of the bulwark put in its place when he saw that a storm was coming on. Are the owners liable, apart from the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, to the plaintiff for injury caused to one of the crew by this negligence on the part of the captain? Certainly not, if the doctrine of "collaborateur" applies, and the captain and the seaman are to be treated as fellow-servants engaged in a common employment. In the case of Wilson v. Merry (ubi sup.) the negligence which caused the accident was the negligence of the manager of a mine, who was in a much superior position to the man who lost his life; but the House of Lords held that the two men were fellow-workmen, notwithstanding the fact that the manager was in a superior position to the other, and had the control and direction of the other's labour. The owner of a mine does not usually attend personally to the working of it any more than the owner of a ship does to her management. Why should not the master of a ship be just as much a fellow-servant with a seaman employed under him as the manager of a mine is with a miner employed under him? Lopes, L.J. has read a passage from the opinion of Lord Herschell in the House of Lords in Johnson v. Lindsay and Co. (ubi sup.), and there is also a useful statement of Lord Watson in the same case quoting Lord Cairns, L.C. in Wilson v. Merry (ubi sup.). He says this: "In moving the affirmance of the judgment, the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns), after citing the opinion of Lord Cranworth in The Bartonshill Coal Company v. Reid (3 Macq. 266), went on to say: 'I would only add to this statement of the law that I do not think the liability or non-liability of the master to his workmen can depend upon the question whether the author of the accident is not or is in any technical sense the fellow-workman or collaborateur of the sufferer. In the majority of cases in which accidents have occurred, the negligence has no doubt been the negligence of a fellow-workman; but the case of the fellow-workman appears to me to be an example of the rule and not the rule itself.'" Now, in Johnson v. Lindsay and Co. (ubi sup.) it was sought to make the language of Lord Cairns have the meaning that if workmen were engaged in the same employment it did not matter if they had different masters. Lord Watson in his opinion continues thus: "That language appears to have been regarded by the Court of Session as justifying the inference that the rule ought not to be confined to fellow-servants of the same master, a construction which ignores the fact that the noble Lord was professedly speaking of the 'liability or non-liability of the master to his workman,' and was dealing with no other subject. I do not doubt that the language of the noble and learned Lord was simply intended to express his opinion that to hold that a fellow-servant who was in a sense the alter ego of the master, and who directed but did not labour in the common employment, was not a collaborateur was a strained and technical elaboration of the rule." In other words, the House of Lords is of opinion that a fellow-servant who is in a sense the alter ego of the master is a collaborateur for the purposes of the rule of law on the subject. How can this rule be said not to include the case of a master of a ship and one of the crew? The master is an alter ego of the owners, but he is also their servant, and therefore a fellow-servant with the crew. He is in a sense the alter ego of the owners, but he is not the less a fellow-servant with the crew for the purposes of the rule as to the liability of a master to his servant for injury caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant. For this purpose I cannot see much difference between the manager of a mine and the master of a ship, as in neither case does the owner take a practical part in managing personally the mine or the ship. I therefore think that, so far as the accident was caused by the negligence of the captain the defendants are not liable in this action.

But another point also was taken for the plaintiff on the words of sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, which provides that in a contract for the employment of a seaman an obligation shall be implied on the part of the owner that he and the master of the ship shall use all reasonable means to insure the seaworthiness of the ship for the voyage at the time when the voyage commences, and to keep her in a seaworthy condition for the voyage during the same. It is said that there has been a breach of this obligation by the master of the ship. There was a movable railing which could in a moment have been put in its place on the bulwarks, and it is admitted that if this railing had been put in its place the ship would have been perfectly seaworthy; but it is argued that the negligence of the master in not seeing that this was done made her unseaworthy. As an illustration of this argument, take the case of a door in the bulwarks which could be bolted but which was left not properly fastened, so that it opened when the vessel rolled, and a seaman was washed through this opening, would that make the vessel "unseaworthy" within the meaning of the Act? This provision in the Act was no doubt passed especially with a view to the safety of the crew, but the word "seaworthy" which is there used is a very familiar word in shipping matters. Is it to have a different meaning in this Act to that in which it is usually employed in the law of shipping? In the absence of anything to the contrary, I should say it is not. One of the best definitions of the word is that given by Parke, B. in Dixon v. Sadler (ubi sup.), which the Master of the Rolls has read. Most certainly the leaving open of a door, as in the case I have imagined, would not cause the ship to be "unseaworthy" within that definition, neither can the negligence of the master in not putting into their position the rails which he had at hand all ready to be put up at a moment's notice be said to have made this ship unseaworthy. I therefore agree that we must order judgment to be entered for the defendants.

REG. v. JUDGE OF THE CITY OF LONDON COURT AND PAYNE. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

County Court—Admiralty jurisdiction—Action of negligence against a pilot—County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction (Amendment) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 4.

Under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts 1868 and 1869 County Courts having Admiralty jurisdiction have no greater jurisdiction in respect of claims for damage to ships than that which was possessed by the Admiralty Court prior to the Judicature Act.

The Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction to entertain an action against a pilot for damage to a ship arising from a collision caused by his negligence or want of skill, and therefore the City of London Court cannot entertain such an action upon its Admiralty side. (a)

The Alina (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 517; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 257; 5 Ex. Div. 227) commented on.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Wills and Lawrance, JJ.) discharging an order nisi for a mandamus to the judge of the City of London Court to hear an action of Green v. Payne.

An action had been brought by the plaintiffs, the owners of a dumb barge, against the defendant Payne who was the pilot of a steamer, in personam, to recover damages for injuries caused to the barge resulting from a collision upon the Thames with the steamer upon which the defendant was acting as pilot by compulsion of law. It was alleged that the collision was caused

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a) Unless this case, or another similar case, is taken to the House of Lords, the question of County Court Admiralty jurisdiction over pilots will be now finally settled; but this decision will scarcely remove the doubts which have hitherto existed in the matter. It has been commonly understood in the Profession that The Urania (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 402; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 156), on which the subsequent cases proceeded, was really an application to enforce the pilot's bond given to the Trinity House, and that Dr. Lushington properly decided that he could not enforce such a bond, and that, although ambiguously reported, the case went no further. It is very difficult to understand why, if there is a jurisdiction ad personam against the master of a ship for collision and damage, why there should not be the like jurisdiction against a pilot who, pro hac vice, is in the position of a master. If the decision were put upon the ground that there is no personal jurisdiction in the Admiralty at all, it would be intelligible, if erroneous in fact. But the absence of such cases on the books probably arises from the fact that until recent years, when the shipping trade has so enormously increased, there were very few pilots worth suing, and not from the fact that pilots could not be, and were never, sued. The argument that the pilot's liability would be unlimited but for the provision of the Merchant Shipping Act as to his bond, scarcely holds good in the face of the fact that a master's liability is expressly left unlimited by the same Act and the amending Act where he is part owner, and the collision happens by his actual fault and privity. And again, assuming that the Admiralty rule as to division of damages would apply to the case of an action against a pilot, what is there more incongruous in the application of that rule to an action against a pilot, than to an action by an owner of cargo? In fact, in the latter case the rule acts quite as harshly as in the former, because the shipowner—the wrong-doer to the cargo—cannot set off any of his damage against half the cargo damage, any more than the pilot—the wrong-doer—can set off for damage which he has not sustained. In spite of the elaborate argument of the case, it may be worthy of further consideration. It is a fact worth noticing that in Rolle's Abridgment (p. 528) there appears an entry, dated 4 Hen. 4, of a petition by the commoners against the admiral "that the admirals use these laws solely according to the laws of Oleron and the ancient laws of the sea, &c." No one reading the laws of Oleron, and article 16 of the Inquisition of Queenborough, and the inquiries (No. 47) to be taken following such inquisition, could doubt that at that time the Admiral y Court exercised jurisdiction over and made pilots pay damages for injuries done by their negligence.—ED.

by the negligence of the defendant. The action was brought in the City of London Court, on the Admiralty side, and the plaintiffs claimed 300*l.* damages.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) provides:

Sect. 3. Any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes): (3.) As to any claim for damage to cargo, or damage by collision. Any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction (Amendment) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) provides:

Sect. 1. This Act . . . shall be read and interpreted as one Act with the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868.

Sect. 4. The third section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 shall extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*

The judge of the City of London Court refused to hear the action upon the ground that he had no jurisdiction, and the Divisional Court (Wills and Lawrance, JJ.) discharged an order nisi for a mandamus which had been obtained by the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cohen, Q.C. and Pyke for the appellants.—The City of London Court had jurisdiction to hear this cause, under its Admiralty jurisdiction, even if the Court of Admiralty would not have had jurisdiction, for the effect of sect. 3 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and of sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 is to confer on County Courts, having Admiralty jurisdiction, jurisdiction to try all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, where the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.* This case comes clearly within the words of those Acts, and the City of London Court has jurisdiction:

If, however, County Courts have no larger Admiralty jurisdiction than the Court of Admiralty has, yet the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction in personam in every case of tort committed on the high seas, or on a river (24 Vict. c. 10):

The Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction in personam against a pilot for torts committed on the high seas. In former times, no doubt, that court asserted a very wide and sweeping jurisdiction, but it was always denied and constantly restrained by prohibition.

Pyke replied. Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18.—Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case an application was made to the Divisional Court for a mandamus to the judge of the City of London Court directing him to hear and determine a certain action on the Admiralty side of his court, and a rule nisi was granted. The Divisional Court subsequently discharged the rule, without hearing any argument, because they considered themselves bound by the decision of a divisional court in a previous case. Thereupon this appeal has been brought before us, in which one party alleges, and the other party denies, that the City of London Court has Admiralty jurisdiction in such a case as this. The action was an action brought by the owners of a barge against a pilot, who was the compulsory pilot in charge of another ship, and the action was brought against the pilot, on the Admiralty side of the City of London Court, in respect of a collision, which was alleged to have been caused by the pilot's negligence, and by which the plaintiffs' barge was damaged. For the purpose of deciding this appeal we must assume that the collision was so caused. The question we have to decide is, whether the City of London Court has, on its Admiralty side, jurisdiction to try this action. It cannot be denied that, on the common law side, it has such jurisdiction. The great difference between the two jurisdictions is this, that, if the action is brought on the common law side, the jurisdiction of the court is limited to claims not exceeding 50*l*., whereas on the Admiralty side the court has jurisdiction unless the claim exceeds 300*l*., which is a very great difference. We can see, therefore, why the plaintiffs are anxious to bring this action on the Admiralty side of the court. The case has been argued before us with great ability and at considerable length, and we have been led into a wide inquiry and into the consideration of numerous cases. The question is, however, really a limited one, that is, whether the City of London Court has Admiralty jurisdiction in an action like this against a pilot. Whether it has jurisdiction in a similar action against a master we have not now to determine. The argument on behalf of the plaintiffs, in support of the jurisdiction, was that this was an action for a tort committed on the high seas, and was therefore an action which the Court of Admiralty would have had jurisdiction to try, because it had jurisdiction in case of all torts committed on the high seas; that the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty has, by statute, been transferred to the County Court where the claims do not exceed 300*l*, and that the City of London Court has that jurisdiction. It was further argued that, even if the Court of Admiralty had not jurisdiction in such a case, yet the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts of 1868 and 1869 have conferred upon the County Courts a jurisdiction which the Court of Admiralty did not possess. On behalf of the respondents it was argued that the Court of Admiralty never had, and has not, jurisdiction in such an action as this; that the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts have only given, with one exception, to the County Courts the same jurisdiction as the Court of Admiralty possessed, but limited to a certain amount; and that the City of London Court, therefore, has not this jurisdiction.

I will first consider the question, being a short one, whether the County Courts have the same Admiralty jurisdiction only except as to the limit of amount, which the Court of Admiralty has, with one exception, where it has been held that jurisdiction is given to the County Courts which the Court of Admiralty has not. I think that the cases have so decided, with the one exception I have alluded to. In Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.), which was an action brought in the City of London Court in respect of a collision between two barges propelled by oars only, it was decided that the jurisdiction of County Courts, in cases of collisions between ships, was not more extensive than that of the Court of Admiralty, and that the Court of Admiralty had never assumed or exercised jurisdiction in such cases, and that therefore the City of London Court had no jurisdiction. The judgments in that case were distinct and clear on the point. Keating, J. said: "I cannot satisfy myself that it was the intention of the Legislature to give the County Courts a jurisdiction over Admiralty causes other than those over which the Admiralty Court has jurisdiction." That case has never been overruled, and I cannot say that the reasons given in that case are not entirely satisfactory. That was the opinion of the courts of common law. Then in the case of The Dowse (ubi sup.), in the Court of Admiralty, it was held that the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 did not confer upon the Court of Passage a more extensive jurisdiction as to any claim for necessaries than that exercised by the Court of Admiralty, and Sir Robert Phillimore said: "It has been contended that there is no limitation which narrows the construction of the words 'any claim,' and, though it is admitted that the High Court of Admiralty would have no original jurisdiction in this matter, that it might, under the authority of sect. 6, order the cause to be at once transferred to this court, and so, in fact, exercise original jurisdiction . . . But I think I must construe the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 independently of these considerations. That statute, by sect. 2, professes to confer only an Admiralty jurisdiction upon certain courts, and then, by sect. 3, enacts that a court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall try and determine any claim for necessaries which may properly be tried by a court having Admiralty jurisdiction." He decided that the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction, and that therefore the Court of Passage had not, and cited and agreed with Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.). I therefore come to the conclusion that County Courts have no Admiralty jurisdiction, under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts, when the Court of Admiralty has not jurisdiction, those Acts also conferring jurisdiction only to a limited amount. There is, however, as I have said, one exception, which is to be found in the case of The Alina (ubi sup.). In that case there was a dispute upon a charter-party, and the Court of Appeal held that the words of sect. 2 of the Act of 1869 clearly gave to County Courts jurisdiction in such a case, although the Court of Admiralty had not such jurisdiction. I desire to speak with all proper respect of that case, but I venture to think that absolutely novel rules of construction were there laid down. It was a decision of the Court of Appeal which we must follow; but for my part I will not extend it one line beyond that which is there decided, namely, that County Courts have Admiralty jurisdiction in all cases of claims arising out of charter-parties or other agreements for the use or hire of ships. It seems to me that that case was decided upon this rule of construction of a statute, that where the words are clear and obvious they must be followed, unless doing so would lead to a manifest absurdity. But the real rule is, that clear words must be followed even if they do lead to a manifest absurdity. The proper rule of construction is, that, if the words of a statute are large enough to be capable of having two meanings, and it is not clear which is the real meaning, then, if the strict verbal construction leads to an absurdity, the other meaning will be adopted. If it was said in The Alina (ubi sup.) that the context cannot be looked at when there are two possible meanings of an enactment, that would be a quite novel rule of construction. Another ground of the decision in that case seems to have been expressed by Jessel, M.R. when he said: "An agreement in relation to the use or hire of a ship must include a charter-party. It would be very difficult to define a charter-party otherwise than as coming within those terms; in fact, it is very often so defined." I cannot follow that statement, when, in fact, most charter-parties do not give the use or hire of a ship or of any part of a ship; the charter-parties which do so are exceptional charter-parties; they are usually agreements for the carriage of goods, but occasionally they are agreements for the hire of the whole of a ship, though never for the use of part of a ship. I cannot help thinking that the late Master of the Rolls, in deciding The Alina (ubi sup.), placed rather an oblique construction upon the cases there dealt with which he did not like. I therefore follow that case only just so far as the actual decision goes, that is, that County Courts have Admiralty jurisdiction in cases of disputes upon charter-parties even when the Court of Admiralty has not. The result of that decision is peculiar, for the effect of it is that the Legislature has conferred upon County Courts the power to construe, when the claim does not exceed 300*l.*, a most difficult and intricate class of contracts, but in the case of all other contracts only if the claim does not exceed 50*l.* That case is only applicable to actions upon charter-parties, and not to such actions as this. I come therefore to the conclusion that no jurisdiction is given by these Acts to County Courts which is not possessed by the Court of Admiralty.

We must now deal with the argument of the appellants, that the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction in the case of every tort committed upon the high seas, and has had it from the earliest times, and that the fact that such jurisdiction has become obsolete does not take it away if it once existed. I will examine only the first part of that argument. Certain judges of the Court of Admiralty, and all practitioners in that court, have asserted at one time and another the widest possible jurisdiction, both in cases of torts and in cases of contracts, but there is not one single case bearing upon that point which I have not previously considered, except those in Mr. Marsden's book. The appellants say that there is a decision in their favour by Dr. Lushington in The Sarah (ubi sup.), where he said: "The court has original jurisdiction because the matter complained of is a tort committed on the high seas." That case was decided by Dr. Lushington in 1862, and how dangerous it is to rely on such isolated expressions in a judgment is shown by the judgment of Dr. Lushington in The Ida (ubi sup.), reported in the same volume, where he says: "The court, it must be remembered, has never exercised a general jurisdiction over damage, but over causes of collision only." Therefore the torts he was speaking of in The Sarah (ubi sup.) were clearly torts through collision, and not every tort committed on the high seas. Then there is the judgment of Story, J. in De Lovio v. Boit (ubi sup.). That case has always been cited in cases like this case, and has always been treated in the same way. Story, J. asserted for the Court of Admiralty the very largest jurisdiction which that court had ever at any time claimed. I am certain that Dr. Lushington would not have entertained such an assertion of jurisdiction, and I do not think that the judgment of Story, J. has ever been fully accepted, even by the American courts, or that the American courts exercise that large jurisdiction. In this country at any rate that judgment has been treated in one way only, that is, as an assertion in America of a far larger jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty than was ever exercised in this country, where such an assertion had been resisted always, and resisted by prohibition over and over again. Here the Court of Admiralty yielded to the inevitable, and gave up the claim to a jurisdiction which it could not exercise, because that claim had always been resisted and stopped by prohibition. This American case is of no binding force, and has never been followed in this country. What then is the law of England? The jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty extends over matters happening and arising on the high seas, but not over every matter happening on the high seas. With regard to what persons is that jurisdiction asserted? The locality, the subject-matter, and the persons affected must all be considered in determining the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty. Now it cannot be doubted that, in the case of owners of ships, the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction. Mr. Barnes argued that the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction in personam only when it had jurisdiction in rem; but I am not prepared to agree with that argument, and think that it goes too far. The Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction in respect of collisions between ships, and over owners of ships in respect of collisions. If the collision is on the high seas, then all the necessary conditions are fulfilled as to locality, subject-matter, and persons; if any one of those conditions is wanting, the Court of Admiralty may not have jurisdiction. If the court has jurisdiction, whether it be in rem or in personam is only a question of procedure. Suppose a complaint in respect of a collision when it is not sought to make the owner liable, but the master or crew; in that case the appellants assert that the jurisdiction exists, and cite cases to that effect of proceedings against a master in personam. With respect to certain complaints, it is clear that the Court of Admiralty has exercised jurisdiction over a master, but whether so as to make him liable for the full extent of the damage or not I do not decide, though I am strongly of opinion that it has not done so. There is no decided case upon that point, and we have not now to deal with the case of a master. This is the case of a pilot, and in two or three cases it has been decided that the Court of Admiralty, in the case of a pilot, has no jurisdiction over him in respect of a collision or of negligence. Whether he is a compulsory pilot or not makes no difference. If the collision was caused by the act of the pilot, he is liable at common law, and the fact that he was a compulsory pilot has nothing to do with his liability.

Can the Court of Admiralty entertain an action against a pilot for damages for loss caused by his negligence? That question arose in The Urania (ubi sup.), where Dr. Lushington held that proceedings in personam could not be taken in the Court of Admiralty against a pilot for damage to a ship caused solely through his negligence or want of skill. That is an express decision of Dr. Lushington, who thoroughly knew the limits of Admiralty jurisdiction, that such an action against a pilot was not within the cognisance of the Court of Admiralty. That case has since been followed in The Alexandria (ubi sup.), where a ship, by compulsion of law being in charge of a duly licensed pilot in the river Mersey, came into collision with and occasioned damage to another vessel, and the owners of the damaged vessel instituted an Admiralty suit in the Court of Passage against the pilot, and it was held that the Court of Passage had not jurisdiction to entertain the suit as an Admiralty suit. Sir Robert Phillimore, in that case, said: "The question raised is, whether that court, exercising Admiralty jurisdiction, had power to entertain a suit brought by the owner of a ship, which had been injured by collision on the high seas, against the pilot in charge of the wrong-doing vessel at the time of the collision. The court below held that it had not power to entertain such a suit. . . . This very question was distinctly raised before my predecessor, who, in The Urania (ubi. sup.), apparently without any doubt, decided the contrary. In the absence of any precedent, and remembering that the plaintiff has a remedy at common law, it would, I think, be wrong in me to reverse this judgment." Then came the case of Flower v. Bradley (ubi sup.), in which it was held that an action against a pilot for damage by a collision caused by his negligence was not an "Admiralty cause" within sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868. There is a series of decisions, which are uniform and have not been controverted, but on the contrary have been followed and acted upon. In all that long series, from end to end, there is not one which shows that the Court of Admiralty ever entertained such a claim as this against a pilot. I will now turn to the cases cited in Mr. Marsden's book. I have looked at the original books, and have come to the conclusion that they cannot be relied on; they are only equivalent to the notes taken by clerks of assizes of cases tried at assizes, and are not in any way reliable minutes of the actual decisions in the cases. Therefore, even if there was in those books any case which looked like a case against a pilot, it cannot be relied on as an authority. There is not then, as I have already stated, from the beginning until now, a trace of any such case against a pilot being entertained by the Court of Admiralty. Now there must have been hundreds of such cases which might have been brought in the Court of Admiralty if that court could have entertained them; but no such case is to be found. I have no doubt that the Court of Admiralty gave up all claim to have jurisdiction over such cases against pilots, in the same way as it gave up its claim in other cases. There is one very strong reason why such actions should not be brought in the Court of Admiralty. If a pilot is sued at common law, and the collision occurred through his negligence or want of skill, yet, if the persons claiming against him have themselves been guilty of contributory negligence, there is a perfect defence to the action; but in the Court of Admiralty the pilot would, even in that case, have to pay half the damage, and would have no right of set-off as to the other half, because no damage would have been caused to himself, whereas the owner of a ship has such a right of set-off. That I think is a very good reason why the Court of Admiralty should have no jurisdiction over pilots in such actions as this; and, further, there was for a long time no limitation whatever as to the liability of a pilot. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Court of Admiralty would have had no jurisdiction in this action; and that consequently the City of London Court has no jurisdiction. The decision of the court below was right and must be affirmed.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me impossible to add much to the exhaustive judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and therefore I will say but a very few words. The question on this appeal is, whether the City of London Court has jurisdiction in this case. If that court had jurisdiction, a mandamus ought to issue, but if it had not, the decision of the Divisional Court was correct. The appellants contended that the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction over all cases of torts committed on the high seas, but I will not enter upon that very large question. The only question here is, whether the City of London Court has jurisdiction in the case of a tort like this, where the defendant is a pilot, and it is alleged that a collision was caused by his negligence, through which a vessel of the plaintiffs was injured. It was argued on behalf of the appellants that the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts 1868 and 1869 had conferred upon the County Courts an Admiralty jurisdiction larger than that of the Court of Admiralty. In my opinion the cases which have been cited clearly show that the jurisdiction conferred upon the County Courts by those Acts was only the jurisdiction possessed by the Court of Admiralty, with a limitation to claims not exceeding 300*l.* The authorities which have been relied on for that proposition are clear and conclusive to that effect; they are Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.), Allen v. Garbutt (ubi sup.), and The Dowse (ubi sup.). Reference has been made to the case of The Alina (ubi sup.). I think that case has been well commented upon by Manisty, J. in Allen v. Garbutt (ubi sup.), where he says: "In support of that contention he cited the case of The Alina (ubi sup.), in the Court of Appeal, decided in Feb. 1880. Upon referring to that case it will be found that it was a decision as to the effect of the Act of 1869, with reference to an action for a breach of a charter-party, as to which jurisdiction was given to the County Court in express terms by sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, of the Act of 1869;" and he shows that the case is distinguishable from such a case as the present one, and that there is no larger jurisdiction in the County Court than in the Court of Admiralty. The Master of the Rolls has referred to certain words of Jessel, M.R. in The Alina (ubi sup.); the passage is: "The rule of construction as laid down in all the cases, and notably in the House of Lords, is this, that where you have plain terms used in the enacting part of an Act of Parliament, nothing less than a manifest absurdity will enable a court to say that the ordinary and natural meaning of the terms is not the true meaning." I cannot think that he has been there correctly reported; but if he has, I cannot agree with him. If the words of an Act of Parliament are clear, those words must be obeyed, however absurd the result may be; if any other rule than that were followed the courts would legislate instead of the Legislature.

The only question in this case, therefore, is whether the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction over a pilot in an action brought against him in respect of his negligence through which a collision was caused. I think that the authorities are clear upon that point also; the cases are The Urania (ubi sup.), The Alexandria (ubi sup.), and Flower v. Bradley (ubi sup.). It has, therefore, been an acknowledged fact that an action like this was not maintainable in the Court of Admiralty; there is not a single case to be found in the books, even in Marsden, in which it appears clearly that the Court of Admiralty ever entertained such an action as this. There is a very good reason; the position of a pilot, on the Admiralty side of the court, is this, that he can have no defence of contributory negligence as on the common law side, and that if both vessels are to blame, whereas the owners in the Court of Admiralty could set off their claim against that of the other vessel, the pilot could not do so, having nothing to set off. In my opinion, therefore, both upon authority and upon grounds of good sense, it is clear that such an action as this cannot be maintained on the Admiralty side of the City of London Court. This appeal must be dismissed.

Kay, L.J.—The Divisional Court have refused to issue a mandamus to the judge of the City of London Court to hear an action of Green and others v. Payne. It was an action by the owners of a dumb barge against a pilot who was navigating a steamer, for damage done to their barge by collision with the steamer caused, as is alleged, by the negligence of the pilot. It was a case of compulsory pilotage, so that by statute (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 388) the owners of the steamer could not be made liable. The collision occurred in inland waters, within the body of the county in which the judge of the City of London Court had jurisdiction in Admiralty causes. Assuming for the purpose of the argument that the damage was caused by the negligence of the defendant, there would be a remedy against him in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court; and I suppose, if the damages claimed were less than 50*l.*, the proper court to sue in would be the County Court in its ordinary jurisdiction. But the claim is for more than 50*l.* and not more than 300*l.*, and it is sought to bring the action on the Admiralty side of the County Court, which has jurisdiction up to 300*l.* It is argued (1) that by statute the County Court has this jurisdiction even if the Admiralty Court had not, and (2) that the Admiralty Court had such a jurisdiction. The statutes which gave jurisdiction to the County Courts in Admiralty cases are 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71 and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, passed respectively in 1868 and 1869. By the former of these statutes, sect. 2, if it appears expedient to Her Majesty that any County Court "should have Admiralty jurisdiction," by an Order in Council a district may be assigned to that court "for Admiralty purposes;" and by sect. 3 any County Court "having Admiralty jurisdiction" shall have jurisdiction to try the following causes "in this Act called Admiralty causes":—claims for salvage not exceeding 300*l.*, towage necessaries or wages not exceeding 150*l.*, and then "as to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision; any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*," or beyond that amount where the parties so agree in writing. This Act has no preamble, but the object being to give "Admiralty jurisdiction" to County Courts within specified districts up to certain limited amounts, primâ facie the meaning must be to give them jurisdiction similar to that of the Court of Admiralty; that is, in the case of collision, such jurisdiction as that court would have had if the collision had happened on the high seas. This construction seems to be confirmed by sect. 6, which enables the High Court of Admiralty to transfer a cause commenced in the County Court to the High Court. "Any cause" in the quotation I have made from sect. 3 would thus mean "any Admiralty cause" in a case of collision. The second Act, that of 1869, by sect. 1, is to be read and interpreted as one Act with the Act of 1868; sect. 2 expressly gives to the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction power to try causes as to any claim arising "out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship," not exceeding 300*l.*, and if the parties agreed where the amount claimed was larger. Sect. 3 provides that "The jurisdiction conferred by this Act and the Act of 1868 may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or in personam; sect. 4 provides that sect. 3 of the former Act, which relates to collision, "shall extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*" It was held by the Court of Appeal, in The Alina (ubi sup.), that the language of sect. 2 of the Act of 1869 was so express and clear that it gave to the County Court jurisdiction within its district in an action for breach of a charter-party, although the High Court of Admiralty had not such jurisdiction. This decision was in accordance with the view of the Privy Council in The Cargo ex Argos (ubi sup.), and overruled the two cases of Simpson v. Blues (ubi sup.) and Gannestad v. Price (ubi sup.). Both these decisions in The Cargo ex Argos and The Alina proceed upon the canon of construction of Acts of Parliament adopted by the House of Lords in The Sussex Peerage case (11 Cl. & Fin. 143), that if the words of a statute are "precise and unambiguous . . . the words themselves do in such case best declare the intention of the lawgiver." The language is that of Tindal, C.J., and he proceeds thus: "But if any doubt arises from the terms employed by the Legislature, it has always been held a safe means of collecting the intention to call in aid the ground and cause of making the statute, and to have recourse to the preamble, which according to Dyer, C.J. (Stowel v. La Zouch, Plow. 364) is a key to open the minds of the makers of the Act, and the mischief which they are intending to redress." There are no such precise and unambiguous words in either of these statutes as must compel us to come to the conclusion that it was intended by the Legislature to give to the County Courts a larger jurisdiction in cases of collision than was vested in the High Court of Admiralty. The words of the Act of 1868 are "damage by collision," not saying damage to what or by what; but no one could doubt that must mean damage up to 300*l.* in such a case of collision as the High Court of Admiralty could have entertained when the collision was on the high seas. The view of the Privy Council in The Cargo ex Argos (ubi sup.) was that the Act of 1868 "gave to the County Court no more than a portion, limited as to subject-matter and amount, of the jurisdiction then actually possessed by the High Court of Admiralty." In the Act of 1869, sect. 4 enacts that this provision as to damage by collision shall extend and apply to all "claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise," up to 300*l.* This expresses an intention to "extend" the relief for damage by collision; but how? It extends it, in the case of damage to "ships," to damage "whether by collision or otherwise." That might, as was suggested, include damage caused to a ship where there was no actual collision, but she was forced into a position of danger and injured, perhaps wrecked, by the negligent navigation of the other ship though they did not touch one another. The Court of Admiralty, by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, had jurisdiction under such circumstances. See cases collected in Marsden on Collision (101, n. j.); The Industrie (ubi sup.). This would be something beyond damage by collision, which is all that is mentioned in the Act of 1868, and would come within the words "or otherwise" in the Act of 1869, and thus satisfy the expressed intention to "extend" the former Act. It was decided in The Alina (ubi sup.) that this Act of 1869 does by express words in one case give to the County Court a larger jurisdiction than the Court of Admiralty had; but it would not be logical to infer from that a general intention to give a larger jurisdiction in all the matters to which the Act refers when the language does not necessarily bear that construction. If the action in this case could not have been maintained against the pilot in the High Court of Admiralty, supposing the collision to have happened on the high seas, I can see nothing in either of the statutes which compels us to hold that nevertheless these Acts give such jurisdiction to the County Courts. Reason as well as authority seems to point to the opposite conclusion.

Turning to the authorities, the point was so decided in Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.). The County Court judge had made an order, in the City of London Court, for seizure of a barge propelled by oars only which had damaged by collision another such barge in the river Thames. The Court of Common Pleas issued a prohibition, and Keating, J., referring to the two statutes from which I have quoted, said: "Notwithstanding the ingenious argument of Mr. Day, I cannot satisfy myself that it was the intention of the Legislature to give the County Courts a jurisdiction over Admiralty causes other than those over which the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction;" and the other judges agreed with him. The Alina (ubi sup.) was decided ten years later, and Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.) was not cited in it, but the two cases were decisions upon different sections of the statute, and The Alina is not inconsistent with this case; all it decided was, that the words of the 2nd section of the Act of 1869 expressly included an action for breach of charter-party, and therefore any argument that it was not intended could not be maintained. This was pointed out and decided in the case of an action in rem for necessaries brought in the County Court, that such a proceeding could not have been instituted in the Admiralty Court because the owners were domiciled in Great Britain (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 5), and the jurisdiction was denied, following The Dowse (ubi sup.), and a prohibition was issued, The Alina (ubi sup.) being distinguished as referring to another section of the Act of 1869, necessaries coming within sect. 3 of the Act of 1868—Allen v. Garbutt (ubi sup.). The same conclusion was come to by Sir R. Phillimore in The Alexandria (ubi sup.). The matter was elaborately argued upon an appeal from the Court of Passage at Liverpool. The judge of that court had held that he had no jurisdiction under these statutes to entertain a suit by the owners of a damaged ship against the compulsory pilot of the vessel which had come into collision with her; and Sir R. Phillimore, though apparently with some reluctance, upheld the decision. His doubt seems to have been whether sects. 7 and 35 of 24 Vict. c. 10 did not give such a jurisdiction to the Court of Admiralty, and whether therefore these later statutes ought not to have given a like jurisdiction to the County Courts. These cases were followed by the Court of Exchequer in Flower v. Bradley (ubi sup.). I think we should treat these decisions as conclusive that the statutes of 1868 and 1869 do not give to the County Court, in cases of collision, any larger jurisdiction than the Court of Admiralty would have had if the collision had taken place upon the high seas.

The important question therefore is, had the Court of Admiralty at the time when these Acts were passed jurisdiction to entertain such an action against a pilot? Upon this point a great number of cases have been cited, the result of which seems to be that the Court of Admiralty from ancient times asserted, and exercised in certain cases, a jurisdiction in personam as well as in rem. They did so in actions against the owners of ships for damage by collision. Several cases have been referred to in Mr. Marsden's collection from the Admiralty records. They consist of short notes apparently made by the registrar. I instance Pillans v. Sherbourne (ubi sup.), where the master and others were sued as owners for damage by collision; Wernam v. Churchwood (ubi sup.), an action in personam by the owners against the master and mate, in which it does not appear what was the cause of action; Strong v. Teesdale (ubi sup.), an action by the owners of one ship against the captain of another ship, in which again the cause of action is not stated, and the action failed; Feltham v. Godfrey (ubi sup.), an action by owners of a damaged ship against the owners and master of another ship for collision, in which the defendants seem to have been condemned in damages and costs; Cowton v. Cock (ubi sup.), a similar action dismissed without costs; Pigg v. Goldsburg (ubi sup.), a like suit against owners and master of the ship; Taylor v. Thompson (ubi sup.), a personal action by owners of one ship against the master of another, the cause of action not being stated; Ewer v. Thirkettal (ubi sup.), an action against the executrix of a deceased shipmaster by the owners of cargo, where the master was captain of the carrying ship, and it was not a case of collision; De Kromment v. Chevalier (ubi sup.), where owners of one ship sued the master of another for damages for collision, and the suit failed for want of proof. In The Volant (ubi sup.) Dr. Lushington mentions The Triune (ubi sup.), where the vessel had been arrested, and the master, who was the principal owner, appeared, the ship was sold, the proceeds were not sufficient to pay the damages recovered, bail had not been given, a monition was issued by Sir John Nicholl against the master for the balance, and he was imprisoned. He refers also to The Hope (ubi sup.), which came before himself; in that case bail was given, but he refused to make the master, who was a part owner, liable for the excess: The Triune (ubi sup.) was not cited. Treating the question as an open question upon these contrary decisions, Dr. Lushington says: "By the ancient maritime law the owners of a vessel doing damage were bound to make good the loss to the owners of the other vessel, although it might exceed the value of their own vessel and the freight. For the purpose of enforcing this obligation the owners of the damaged vessel might resort either to the courts of common law or to the Court of Admiralty, and if they preferred the latter they had their choice of three modes of proceeding, viz., against the owners, or against the master personally, or by a proceeding in rem against the ship itself. The Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction over the whole subject-matter of damage on the high seas, and the arrest of a vessel is only one mode of proceeding." The learned judge proceeds to say that there were cases in which the ship could not be arrested, as where she was sunk or had gone to a distant part of the world, and says he knows of no reason why in such cases an action might not be maintained in the Admiralty Court. Where the ship has been arrested the owners appear and intervene for their interest in her, and if bail could not be demanded beyond her value the owners in that proceeding could not be made further responsible. He decides, on the authority of Wilson v. Dixon (ubi sup.), that, where the master is sued as part owner, he cannot be made liable with the other part owners beyond the value of the ship and freight. He says: "To render a master, part owner, guilty of neglect responsible beyond the value of the ship and freight, you must sue him as master in the first instance, but then you must proceed by charging him with being the cause of the damage by his misconduct, and that cannot be done directly or indirectly in another suit. . . . The master is not personally sued at all in this form of proceeding;" and he declined to hold the master liable beyond the value of the ship and freight for which bail had been given because he was sued as owner. Other cases of personal actions in the Court of Admiralty were referred to. In The Ruckers (ubi sup.) a passenger brought a civil action in the Court of Admiralty for damages against the master of a ship for an assault upon the high seas; the question of the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court was raised. A search was made for precedents, and the registrar reported that, in the records which he had searched as far back as 1730, "many instances were to be found of proceedings on damage on behalf of persons described as part of the ship's company against officers and others belonging to the same ship and several against persons belonging to other ships;" in the margin is added "probably sailing in company and accidentally coming on board." Sir W. Scott would not refuse to entertain the suit, though he said that, if the precedents had been only such as related to persons in the capacity of mariners, he should have been unwilling to appear to extend the jurisdiction. This case shows the doubt that existed as to the personal jurisdiction even against the ship-master. In The Agincourt (ubi sup.), which was an action by a mariner against the captain for ill treatment, damages were awarded by Lord Stowell. In The Justitia (ubi sup.) an action by a mariner against owners for wages and for damages for bad food was sustained. In a learned judgment by Story, J. in De Lovio v. Boit (ubi sup.) he states, as the result of an elaborate research, that, "before and in the reign of Edward III. the Admiralty exercised jurisdiction . . . over torts, injuries, and offences in ports within the ebb and flow of the tide on the British seas and on the high seas." The learned jurist maintains that this jurisdiction was not affected by the statutes 15 Rich. 2, c. 3, or 3 Hen. 4, c. 11, which restricted the Court of Admiralty from cognisance of "contracts, pleas, and quereles, and of all other things done or arising within the bodies of counties as well by land as by water." But he shows that the courts of common law, by the use of a fiction, held cognisance over all personal causes arising on the high seas or in foreign realms, and this jurisdiction he considers only concurrent. Very much reliance has been placed upon the dictum I have quoted from this judgment and other like general expressions as to jurisdiction in case of torts, but it is easy to show that there must be a limit. If you read them literally they would include a case of slander upon the high seas. Counsel answered this by saying that they must be torts connected with maritime matters. It seems to me that there is considerable authority for holding that the Court of Admiralty did exercise a jurisdiction in personam in certain cases. It did so whenever there was a remedy by proceeding in rem, but then it limited the damages recoverable to the value of the res. It exercised a personal jurisdiction in the nature of a disciplinary authority, as for assaults by the officers of a ship upon the high seas where there was no jurisdiction in rem; but this, as in The Ruckers (ubi sup.), was done with hesitation where the plaintiff was not one of the ship's company but only a passenger, though the proceeding was against the master. There is, however, no case to be found of an action in the Admiralty Court against a pilot for damage occasioned by a collision. Again occurs the objection that his liability would be unlimited, except, indeed, the limit of the amount of his bond and pilotage: (see Merchant Shipping Act 1854, ss. 3, 372, 373.) One case only was referred to of an action of any kind against a pilot; that was by the master against a pilot for damage in 1724, Russell v. Hayes (ubi sup.) The pilot was pilot of the same ship of which the plaintiff was master; what was the cause of action does not appear, but after hearing evidence and counsel, and after mature consideration, the court decided for the defendant, and ordered the plaintiff to pay the costs, pronouncing that he had failed in proving his case. It has not been made out to my satisfaction that an action against a pilot could have been maintained in the Admiralty Court for damages for a collision upon the high seas caused by his negligence. The absence of any precedent in the books of any action of that kind seems to me conclusive that no such action could be maintained. It is said that there is no instance of an attempt to prohibit such an action. This seems to me to prove more strongly that no such action was ever brought. There was a long struggle between the Court of Admiralty and what were then the Superior Courts down to the time of Car. 2—see The Cargo ex Argos (ubi sup.)—in which the Court of Admiralty was asserting a large jurisdiction which the higher court was restraining by prohibition. But such an extent of jurisdiction as to give damages against a pilot for a collision seems never to have been attempted by them. There are express decisions upon the point. In The Urania (ubi sup.) Dr. Lushington decided that no action in personam would lie against a pilot in the Admiralty Court for damage by a collision occasioned by his default. This was followed in The Alexandria (ubi sup.) by Sir R. Phillimore, and again in Flower v. Bradley (ubi sup.) by the Court of Exchequer, and the same reasoning was adopted by the Court of Common Pleas in Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.). I am therefore of opinion that the action to which the mandamus relates could not be brought on the Admiralty side of the County Court, and that the decision of the Divisional Court must be affirmed.

MARGETSON AND OTHERS v. GLYNN AND OTHERS. (a)

APPLICATION FOR A NEW TRIAL.

Bill of lading—Contract contained in—Description of voyage—Clause as to deviation—Wide general words in—Construction of.

Oranges were shipped by the plaintiffs on a steamer belonging to the defendants, at Malaga, for conveyance to Liverpool. A bill of lading was given as follows: "Shipped . . . upon the Zena now lying in the port of Malaga and bound for Liverpool with liberty to proceed to and stay at any port or ports in any rotation in the Mediterranean, Levant, Black Sea, or Adriatic, or on the coasts of Africa, Spain, Portugal, France, Great Britain, and Ireland, for the purpose of delivering coals, cargo, or passengers, or for any other purpose whatsoever."

On leaving Malaga the steamer, instead of sailing for Liverpool, proceeded to Burriana, a port on the coast of Spain to the north-east of Malaga, and about two days' voyage from Malaga in the contrary direction to Liverpool, and sailed thence to Liverpool. Owing to the delay thus caused, the oranges were much damaged when they arrived at Liverpool.

Held (affirming the decision of Hawkins, J.), that the general words in the deviation clause must be construed with reference to, and be limited by, the voyage agreed upon, which was from Malaga to Liverpool, and would therefore only justify a deviation to any port fairly on the course of the agreed voyage, and that the defendants were therefore liable for the damage to the oranges.

Leduc v. Ward (58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 908; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; 20 Q. B. Div. 475) followed.

THIS was an application by the defendants, except Bevan and Co., for judgment or a new trial, on appeal from the verdict and judgment at the trial before Hawkins, J. and a special jury in Middlesex.

This was an action brought to recover damages in respect of injury to certain cases of oranges which were shipped on board the steamer Zena for the purpose of being carried from Malaga to Liverpool, and it was alleged that by breach of contract the oranges were damaged by being carried to Burriana before proceeding to Liverpool, whereby they were kept in the hold of the vessel for a longer period than they ought to have been, and many became rotten.

The plaintiff Margetson was a fruit merchant in London; the plaintiff Solis was his agent at Malaga for shipping oranges; and the other plaintiffs were three Spaniards who were the growers and owners of the oranges in question. The defendants Messrs. Glynn and Co. were managers of an association which owned a line of steamers, one of which was the vessel on which these oranges were shipped; the association were also defendants in the action The defendants Bevan and Co. were the agents at Malaga for this association. Margetson, through Solis, had made advances upon these oranges before they were shipped.

On the 4th April 1888 about nine hundred cases of oranges were shipped by the Spanish plaintiffs on board the Zena at Malaga. When the goods were shipped, a bill of lading, signed by the captain, was given to Solis, who forwarded it to Margetson, who indorsed it to brokers at Liverpool, who were to receive the goods. The bill of lading was as follows:

Shipped in good order and condition by F. Solis in and upon the good steamship called the Zena, whereof Jarvis is master for this present voyage, and now lying in the port of Malaga and bound for Liverpool with liberty to proceed to and stay at any port or ports in any rotation in the Mediterranean, Levant, Black Sea, or Adriatic, or on the coasts of Africa, Spain, Portugal, France, Great Britain, and Ireland, for the purpose of delivering coals, cargo, or passengers, or for any other purpose whatsoever.

On leaving Malaga, the steamer, instead of proceeding at once for Liverpool, went to Burriana, a port on the coast of Spain to the north-east of Malaga, and about two days' voyage in the opposite direction to Liverpool. This caused the voyage to be considerably longer than it would have been had the steamer proceeded direct for Liverpool. The plaintiffs alleged that there was a verbal contract made between Solis and Bevan, prior to the giving of the bill of lading, that the vessel should proceed direct to Liverpool.

At the trial before Hawkins, J. and a jury, in Middlesex, the jury found that Bevan and Co. had power to make a special contract as to the carriage of goods; that there was a verbal contract between Bevan and Co. and Solis as to receiving goods for Liverpool direct, and that the plaintiffs shipped their goods on that understanding; and they found a verdict for the plaintiffs for 589*l*. The learned judge subsequently gave judgment in favour of the defendants Bevan and Co., and against the other defendants, holding that the bill of lading was the contract between the parties, but that the provision as to calling at other ports did not justify the deviation to Burriana.

The defendants, except Bevan and Co., applied for judgment or for a new trial.

Bigham, Q.C. and H. F. Boyd for the defendants.—These words in the bill of lading, if read in their ordinary grammatical meaning, apply here, and justify the deviation to Burriana. They are clearly wide enough to cover such a deviation, and there is nothing whatever to show that they ought to be limited to ports on the way from Malaga to Liverpool. In the case of Leduc v. Ward (58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 908; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; 20 Q. B. Div. 475) it was held that liberty to call at any port in any order meant any port fairly within the line of voyage. The words in this case, however, are very much wider, and specify all ports which are such as a ship in the Mediterranean trade would call at, and cannot be limited to ports between Malaga and Liverpool. Even if these words are to be construed as in Leduc v. Ward (ubi sup.), yet it was not an unreasonable thing for this vessel to go to Burriana, when the objects of the voyage and the particular trade are considered, and that deviation is justified by the clause of the bill of lading. [The Court referred to Gairdner v. Senhouse, 3 Taunt. 419; Andrews v. Mellish, 2 M. & S. 277; 5 Taunt. 496; Hogg v. Horner, Marsh. Insurance, 144.]

Barnes, Q.C. and C. C. Scott, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think that we are bound to construe this bill of lading according to the rule of construction laid down in Leduc v. Ward (ubi sup.), with which indeed I thoroughly agree. In this case we have to construe the well-known form of contract which is contained in a bill of lading. I have not the least doubt that here the contract of carriage between the plaintiffs and defendants is a contract in writing, namely, the bill of lading, and we cannot go outside that written contract. A bill of lading is a contract for the carriage of goods by sea on a ship. The first thing which the shipper of the goods and the shipowner agree upon is the voyage, as was said in Leduc v. Ward (ubi sup.), in order that the shipper may get his goods conveyed from one place to another by the required time, which is, of course, his object, while as regards the shipowner the freight he will receive depends upon the length of the voyage. The first thing, therefore, which is always settled between shippers and shipowners is the voyage. Now, we have here in this bill of lading the form in which the voyage was described, and it was said in Leduc v. Ward (ubi sup.) that, where you find words describing the voyage as being from a port to the place to which the goods are to be carried, that is to be taken to be the voyage agreed upon between the parties. The voyage is not always, of course, from the port where the goods are shipped direct to the place whither the goods are to be carried, because there may be a charter-party under which the vessel is engaged to go to some other port before proceeding to the port of destination of the goods. In the case of a bill of lading, however, given after the goods have been shipped, the voyage agreed upon between the shipper and shipowner must, in the absence of anything to the contrary, be taken to be from the port where the goods are shipped to the port of destination. The voyage in this case, therefore, was from Malaga to Liverpool, and, if there was nothing else in the bill of lading, the vessel was bound to go from Malaga to Liverpool according to the ordinary course which a steamer would take on such a voyage, and would not be entitled to call or stop at any port on the way. In this bill of lading we find the voyage described, and then this provision, "with liberty to proceed to and to stay at any port or ports in any rotation in the Mediterranean, Levant, Black Sea, or Adriatic, or on the coasts of Africa, Spain, Portugal, France, Great Britain, and Ireland, for the purpose of delivering coals, cargo, or passengers, or for any other purpose whatsoever." That provision follows after the description of the voyage, and is a liberty to do something with regard to that voyage as described. It has been held by the courts in mercantile cases that, where liberty is reserved to call at any port, it means liberty to call at any ports on the course of the agreed voyage, though they may not be ports exactly on the ordinary sea course which a vessel would take on such a voyage, and to call at them in geographical order. Then the shipowners made agreements that they should be at liberty to call at ports in any order so as to get rid of the effect of those decisions. In this case we find the words "in any rotation," but those words are used with regard to the voyage described, and mean any port on the described voyage. Is that the only reasonable and fair construction which can be placed upon those words coupled with the description of the voyage? They cannot reasonably mean that there is to be liberty to go anywhere to any port which has nothing whatever to do with the voyage described. They must mean such of the places named as are substantially on the course of the voyage described, and that was the rule laid down in Leduc v. Ward (ubi sup.). If that be so, the result is this: that the voyage agreed upon was from Malaga to Liverpool; that the vessel went in the contrary direction to Burriana about two days' voyage from Malaga, and the appellants admit that, if their argument is correct, she might have gone in that direction as far as the Black Sea. Now, can any reasonable person say that for the vessel to go from Malaga to Burriana, and then back again, was a voyage from Malaga to Liverpool; or that it was in the course of such a voyage? I think not; it was a wholly and absolutely different voyage from that described in the bill of lading. If a shipowner means to ship goods at different ports, some, say, at Malaga and some at ports further east, he should make up his mind at first, and begin at the ports furthest east before shipping goods at Malaga; or, if he does as in this case, he must take care to describe the voyage in the bill of lading given at Malaga as a voyage from Malaga to Burriana and thence to Liverpool, and then the shipper of goods would know where the vessel was going to and what he was agreeing to. I see no difficulty whatever in the way of shipowners doing their business in that manner. I am clearly of opinion that, according to the rules of construction laid down in Leduc v. Ward (ubi sup.), the true construction of this bill of lading is what I have stated, and that there was no liberty to go to places not on the course of the voyage from Malaga to Liverpool. The decision of the learned judge who tried the action was correct, and the decision of this question determines the action in favour of the plaintiffs. This appeal must be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A cargo of oranges was shipped on board a steamer at Malaga for Liverpool, under a contract contained in a bill of lading. Instead of proceeding from Malaga to Liverpool, the steamer proceeded in a north-easterly direction to Burriana, which was two days' sail from Malaga. Owing to the delay the oranges were spoiled, and the shippers claimed damages from the shipowners. The shipowners seek to justify that delay by the terms of the contract of carriage itself. The question now is whether the particular provision in the contract of carriage can be put forward to justify that delay. The bill of lading stated that the ship was on a voyage from Malaga to Liverpool "with liberty to proceed to and stay at any port or ports in any rotation in the Mediterranean, Levant, Black Sea, or Adriatic, or on the coasts of Africa, Spain, Portugal, France, Great Britain, and Ireland, for the purpose of delivering coals, cargo, or passengers, or for any other purpose whatsoever." The shipowner asserts that this clause gave liberty to go anywhere except to Asia, America, or Australia. The question is, whether these general words can be construed as giving that very large liberty, or whether there is not a rule of construction of such contracts as these which will give a more reasonable meaning to those words. The general words are thus large and wide in this bill of lading, because these ships in the Mediterranean trade, which coast around to collect cargo, have printed forms of bills of lading containing terms wide enough to apply at any port where they ship goods. As soon, however, as the voyage is described in the bill of lading, that description of the voyage must cut down the meaning of the general words to such as is reasonably applicable to the voyage which has been agreed upon. Any other construction is impossible, for otherwise shippers could not insure their goods, not knowing how long the voyage might be. The general words, therefore, must be limited by the voyage agreed upon. It would be contrary to any reasonable rule of construction to give to such general words their widest meaning after the insertion of the description of the voyage which limits the contract. There is, besides, the authority of the case of Leduc v. Ward (ubi sup.), with which I most emphatically agree, and the rules of construction laid down in that case show that our construction of this contract is the proper one. In the case of Gairdner v. Senhouse (ubi sup.) Lord Mansfield, C.J. adopted the same kind of limit of construction in construing the general words in a policy of marine insurance, a contract of a similar business kind as a bill of lading. The courts, therefore, have always insisted on limiting such general words as these by the context, and by the objects of the contract. The decision of Hawkins, J. was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Fry, L.J. — I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that, in this case, we have to apply an old and well-established rule of construction, which is illustrated by the recent case of Leduc v. Ward (ubi sup.). This rule of construction is applicable to all kinds of contracts, and not to this kind of contract only. Here the case is of this description: specific words are used as to the object of the contract, which are followed by words of such generality as to be inconsistent with, and destructive of, the special object of the contract if they are given their widest meaning. The principle to be applied in construing such a contract is, that the general words are to be limited so as to be consistent with, and not destructive of, the particular object. That rule must be applied here, and I agree with the Master of the Rolls in his application of it to this contract.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Bill of lading — Incorporation of terms and conditions of bill of lading into charter-party.

By a charter-party it was provided that the shipowners should fix, in a suitable place on board, proper refrigerating machinery and insulated chambers, and should during the voyage keep the insulated chambers at a temperature not exceeding 28 degrees Fahrenheit, any accident, breakdown, or mishap to the machinery, or cause beyond the owners' control not preventing; and it was further provided that "the performance by the owners of their part of the agreement is subject to the exceptions and perils mentioned in the bill of lading according to form attached hereto, and the agreement herein contained on the part of the owners shall be read as if such clauses and conditions were herein repeated; all cargo shipped by the charterers in pursuance of this agreement shall be received and carried subject to the terms and conditions in the said bill of lading, except as altered by these presents." By the terms of the bill of lading any loss or damage was excepted which might result from "the consequence of any damage, breakdown, or injury to, or defect in, hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, or their appurtenances, refrigerating engines, or chambers, or any part thereof, outfit, tackle, or other appurtenances, however such damage, defect, or injury, might be caused, and notwithstanding that the same might have existed at, or at any time before, the loading or sailing of the vessel . . . or by unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means had been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness."

(a) Reported by J. H. Williams, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The charterers sued the owners for damage to cargo shipped by them under the charter-party, alleging that the damage was caused by the refrigerating engines being unfit and insufficient, and by the insulated chambers not having been kept at the agreed temperature, though no accident, breakdown, or mishap to the machinery, or cause beyond the owners' control, prevented.

Held (affirming the judgment of Charles, J.), that the "exceptions and perils mentioned in the bill of lading" were not incorporated into the charter-party so as to lessen or qualify the obligation imposed by the charter-party upon the shipowners to provide proper refrigerating machinery and insulated chambers, and to keep the insulated chambers at the agreed temperature.

THIS was an appeal from the decision and order of Charles, J. upon a preliminary point of law raised by the pleadings in the action.

The action was an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract in regard to the carriage of certain frozen meat. By an agreement in writing, made on the 9th May, 1889, between the plaintiffs and the defendants, it was provided by clause 3, that the defendants, who were steamship owners, should provide a service of steamers for the carriage of frozen meat from South America to Liverpool, and should at their own cost fix in each of two steamers, in a suitable place on board, proper refrigerating machines and insulated chambers, the latter to be placed under the main deck, and that during so much of the voyages of the said steamers as such steamers should have meat carcases of the charterers on board, the owners should supply the steam necessary for working the said machinery, and should keep the insulated chambers, in which such meat carcases were, at a temperature not exceeding 28 degrees Fahrenheit. Any accident, breakdown, or mishap to the machinery, or cause beyond the owners' control, not preventing.

By clause 16 of the agreement it was provided that:

The performance by the owners of their part of this agreement is subject to the exceptions and perils mentioned in the bill of lading according to form attached hereto, and the agreement herein contained on the part of the owner shall be read as if such clauses and conditions were herein repeated. All cargo shipped by the charterers in pursuance of this agreement shall be received and carried subject to the terms and conditions of the said bill of lading, except as altered by these presents, and bills of lading in such form shall be given therefor.

The exceptions and perils mentioned in the bill of lading were:

The act of God, Queen's enemies, &c.; damage resulting from effects of climate, &c.; natural decay; leakage or breakage, or damage arising from stowage, or by contact with leakage; the consequence of any damage, breakdown, or injury to, or defect in, hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, or their appurtenances, refrigerating engine or chamber, or any part thereof, outfit, tackle, or other appurtenances, however such damage, defect, or injury might be caused, and notwithstanding that the same might have existed at, or at any time before, the loading or sailing of the vessel, and whether such perils, or the loss or injury arising therefrom, were occasioned by the wrongful act, default, negligence, or error in judgment of the owners, master, officers, mariners, crew, stevedore, engineers, or other persons whomsoever in the service of the ship, whether employed on the said steamer or otherwise, and whether before or after, or during the voyage, or for whose acts the shipowners would otherwise be liable, or by unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning, or at any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means had been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness.

The defendants received on board one of the steamers a cargo of frozen meat to be carried to Liverpool, and there delivered to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs alleged, in their statement of claim, that the frozen meat was delivered at Liverpool in a damaged condition, and that such damage was not caused by any peril excepted by the terms of the agreement; that the steamer was not, at the commencement of the voyage, in a fit and seaworthy condition to receive and carry the said cargo, owing to the refrigerating engines being unfit and insufficient; and that the defendants failed to keep the insulated chambers, in which the cargo was stowed, at a temperature not exceeding 28 degrees Fahrenheit, although not prevented by any accident, breakdown, or mishap to the machinery, or by any cause beyond the owners' control.

The defendants pleaded, in their statement of defence, that the failure to keep the insulated chambers at a temperature not exceeding 28 degrees Fahrenheit, and the damages complained of, were in each case caused by breakdowns or defects in the refrigerating engine and chambers, and in the outfit, tackle, and appurtenances within the meaning of the exceptions mentioned in the bill of lading; and that the alleged unfitness and unseaworthiness of the steamer existed notwithstanding all reasonable means had been taken to provide against the same, and lay wholly in defects which came within the exceptions mentioned in the bill of lading.

The plaintiffs replied (in paragraph 3 of their reply) that, upon the true construction of the agreement and bill of lading, the defendants were bound to keep the insulated chambers at a temperature not exceeding 28 degrees Fahrenheit, any accident, breakdown, or mishap to the machinery, or cause beyond the owners' control not preventing, and that failure to keep the said chambers at the temperature required as aforesaid was not excused or excepted by reason that it arose from defects in the refrigerating engines or chambers, or in the outfit, tackle, or appurtenances.

At the hearing before Charles, J., the learned judge decided this question of law in favour of the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., Bigham, Q.C., and Carver, for the appellants.

Barnes, Q.C. and Joseph Walton, for the respondents, were not heard.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I agree with the judgment of Charles, J. Here there is an agreement in the nature of a charter-party, and a bill of lading or a document in the nature of a bill of lading. This bill of lading is to be, to a certain extent, incorporated into the charter-party. It is necessary, therefore, to construe the charter-party, having first introduced into it all, or part of, the terms of the bill of lading. If the third clause of the charter-party contains an absolute undertaking by the shipowners to do the things therein mentioned, subject only to the exceptions therein provided, and if in the bill of lading there is a clause which would impose only a more limited liability upon the shipowners in respect of those things, then the charter-party and the bill of lading are conflicting. Under such circumstances, what must be the true reading of the contract? Are all the clauses of the bill of lading to be read into the charter-party, or not? Turning to the charter-party, clause 16 provides that cargo shipped under the charter-party is to be received and carried subject to the terms and conditions of the bill of lading "except as altered" by the charter-party. The bill of lading is, therefore, put first, and the cargo is to be received and carried under it "except as altered" by the charter-party. So far as the bill of lading is altered by the charter-party, it is not to be read into it. It has been argued that the words "subject to the terms and conditions in the bill of lading except as altered by these presents" do not apply in the present case. Upon whom is the liability imposed by the words "all cargo shipped by the charterers in pursuance of this agreement shall be received and carried subject to the terms and conditions of the bill of lading except as altered by these presents?" The cargo is to be received, and to be carried, by the shipowners under that agreement. Now, the bill of lading would relieve the shipowners from almost every liability if not controlled by the charter-party. Let us see then whether these exceptions mentioned in the bill of lading are not altered by the charter-party. The charter-party provides, in clause 3, that the owners "shall fix in the steamer, in a suitable place on board, proper refrigerating machinery and insulated chambers." There is an absolute liability to do that imposed upon the shipowners. The clause proceeds, "the owners shall supply the steam necessary for working the said machinery, and shall keep the insulated chambers at a temperature not exceeding 28 degrees Fahrenheit, any accident, breakdown, or mishap to the machinery, or cause beyond the owners' control, not preventing." That is an absolute liability imposed upon the owners to provide those things, and to keep the proper temperature "unless prevented" by the specified causes. It is not an agreement that the owners will take all reasonable care to do so, but an absolute undertaking to do so unless prevented as therein specified. In the corresponding clause of the bill of lading, the liability of the owners is the most limited which is possible. The two kinds of liability are at the opposite poles of liability. It is impossible to read the two clauses together. The terms, therefore, of the charter-party are different from the terms of the corresponding clause of the bill of lading, and, by clause 16 of the charter-party, those parts of the bill of lading which are altered by the charter-party are to be read as expressed in the charter-party. I think, therefore, that the judgment of Charles, J. was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The third clause of the charter-party divides itself into two parts: the first part deals with the obligation of the shipowners in respect of the machinery at the commencement of the voyage. That obligation is absolute. Then comes clause 16, which provides that "the performance by the owners of their part of this agreement is subject to the exceptions and perils mentioned in the bill of lading according to the form attached hereto, and the agreement herein contained on the part of the owners shall be read as if such clauses and conditions were herein repeated. All cargo shipped by the charterers in pursuance of this agreement shall be received and carried subject to the terms and conditions in the said bill of lading except as altered by these presents, and bills of lading in such form shall be given therefor." The appellants then say that the bill of lading must be looked at, where the obligation is not as in clause 3, but only to use all reasonable means to provide against defects, and that the generality of clause 3 must be cut down and limited by the terms of the bill of lading. The obligation of the shipowners under the bill of lading is very limited, but under clause 3 of the charter-party it is absolute. The bill of lading, therefore, must give way to the charter-party, pursuant to the terms of clause 16. The second part of clause 3 is similar to the first part, and deals with the obligation of the owners during the voyage. There is a certain limit placed upon their liability, but the bill of lading imposes a much narrower liability, and again the bill of lading must give way to the charter-party. It is argued that the words "terms and conditions" in clause 16 do not apply to the whole bill of lading, but to some only of its provisions. I can find no reason for any such distinction. Those words mean that the charter-party is to be subject to the entirety of the bill of lading "except as altered by" the charter-part.y The dominant document is the charter-party, and its provisions must prevail. This appeal fails.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Clause 3 is in two parts, and the first part is absolute, the other nearly so. Then the bill of lading, as to some of those matters, imposes a liability which is not absolute or unqualified. It is, therefore, impossible to read the charter-party and bill of lading together, and, by the terms of clause 16, the clauses in the charter-party are to be preferred to, and take precedence of, the bill of lading. It has been argued that the words "subject to the terms and conditions in the bill of lading except as altered by these presents" do not apply to the present case, but only to some terms and conditions of the bill of lading. I do not agree with that argument. The prevailing document is the charter-party, and it alters the terms and conditions of the bill of lading in this case.

THE ACCOMAC. (a)

Salvage—Appeal—Alteration of award.

In salvage cases, the Court of Appeal will vary the amount of the award, if, after carefully considering the evidence and giving every possible weight to the view of the judge below, it thinks that the amount is so large as to be unjust to the owners of the salved property, or so small as to be unjust to the salvors.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a salvage action from an award of the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division.

The plaintiffs were the owners, masters, and crews of the steamship Inverness, and the steam-tugs Flying Scud, Heather Bell, and Spurn. The defendants were the owners of the steamship Accomac, her cargo and freight.

The services were shortly as follows:—At about midday on the 2nd Nov. 1890 the Inverness, a screw-steamship of 2251 tons gross, manned by a crew of twenty-three hands all told, was in the North Sea on a voyage from Antwerp to the Tyne in ballast. The Inverness was between the North Hasboro' lightship and the Outer Dowsing, steering a N. by W. ½ W. course, when the Accomac was sighted about ten miles off to the northward flying signals of distress, and carrying three black balls. The Inverness at once proceeded towards the Accomac. On coming up to her, it was seen that she was at anchor, and was rolling heavily. Those on the Inverness were then informed that the Accomac's rudder was gone, and it was then arranged that the Inverness should tow her to Grimsby or Hull. With difficulty and danger, owing to the wind and sea, the Inverness made fast ahead, and at about 2 p.m. commenced towing, and brought her about three miles from the Spurn, when, owing to the sheering of the Accomac, both tow-ropes parted. The Accomac anchored. As the weather continued too bad for the Inverness to resume towing, she on the 3rd Nov. proceeded to Grimsby Roads to send out tugs to the assistance of the Accomac. At about 2.30 p.m. the Flying Scud, a paddle-wheel tug of 100 tons register, with engines of 80-horse power nominal, spoke the Accomac, and lay by her to render assistance. At about 5 p.m. the Heather Bell, a tug of 81 tons register and 40-horse power nominal, came up, and shortly after these two tugs commenced towing the Accomac towards the Humber. A little later on, the Spurn, a tug of 80 tons register and 31-horse power nominal, also assisted to tow, and after the Accomac had been towed six miles, the Flying Scud's tow-rope broke, and the Accomac again came to anchor. Shortly after three tugs, the Champion, the Torfreda, and the Sussex, which had been sent out by the Inverness, came up, but, as it was then about midnight and bad weather, nothing was done till next morning. Early next day, the 4th Nov., the tugs made fast, and, after towing four hours, the Accomac was safely brought into Grimsby Roads. The owners of the Inverness paid the tugs sent out by her 200*l.*

The Accomac was a screw-steamship of 2509 tons gross, and at the time of the said services was manned by a crew of twenty-eight hands all told, laden with a cargo of pitch pine timber. The value of the Accomac, cargo and freight, was in all 22,138*l.*

Sir James Hannen awarded the salvors 1000*l.*, and from this decision they now appealed.

Barnes, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The award is so inadequate as to justify this court in increasing it. The President has not sufficiently appreciated the danger of the services.

Sir Charles Hall, Q.C. and F. W. Raikes, contrà. — The court will not interfere unless the award is absolutely unreasonable. It is not enough that the court should think that had they tried the case they would have given more:

The Lancaster, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 705; 9 P. Div. 14; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 174.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—We are advised that, considering the time of the year, the place where the Accomac was, and her entirely disabled condition by reason of her having lost her rudder, she was in great danger of being lost. I do not say she would have been certainly lost, for, as the weather turned out, there was not, even in the absence of the salving tugs, danger of immediate total loss; but nevertheless there was danger, had she been left to her own resources, of being totally lost. We are advised that, considering her condition and size, and the lightness of the Inverness, the difficulty of saving the Accomac was very great. It was so difficult that there was danger to the Inverness, lest she being a light ship might through the steering of the other ship be driven on to the sands herself. The salvage operations were therefore of very great difficulty. When we look at the judgment, we come to the conclusion that the President cannot have appreciated to the same extent that we do the great danger in which the Accomac was, and the difficulty of the operation which had to be performed to save her. We have therefore come to the conclusion that the amount given by the President to the Inverness and the salving tugs is unjustly too small. It has been urged that we are to act in these salvage appeals upon the same rule that we act upon with regard to setting aside the verdict of a jury on a question of fact; viz., that we are not to interfere with it unless it is an amount so large or so small that no reasonable person could fairly arrive at that sum. That is not the rule. If, after carefully considering the facts, and after giving every possible weight to the view of the judge, we think it greatly in excess, and so greatly as to be unjust to the owners of the ship which had been in distress, we are bound to alter the amount by lessening it. In the same way, after giving that consideration to it which I have mentioned, and after giving all the weight which we think we can to the opinion of the judge who tried the case, we think that the amount awarded to the salvors is so small as really to be unjust to them, we are bound to alter the amount. We think that the award of 1000*l.* should be increased to 1800*l.* The appeal is therefore allowed with costs.

BELL AND CO. v. ANTWERP, LONDON, AND BRAZIL LINE (a).

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice—Service of writ out of the jurisdiction—Contract to be performed within the jurisdiction—Place of payment of lighterage and demurrage expenses—Order XI., r. 1 (e).

In order to bring a case within Order XI., r. 1 (e), the court must see, either in the written words themselves or in those words coupled with the surrounding circumstances, that the contract in question is one which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction. Where money is payable under a contract, and no place of payment is named in it, the case is not brought within the rule by the fact that the person to whom the money is payable is resident within the jurisdiction.

THIS was an appeal from an order of a divisional court (Cave and Day, JJ.) setting aside the order of a judge at chambers giving leave to serve notice of a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction.

The writ was issued by shipowners in England, against a foreign company carrying on business in Antwerp, to recover lighterage expenses paid by the shipowners at the port of discharge, and also for demurrage incurred at such port.

It appeared from the affidavits, that the defendants had chartered the Marana, one of the plaintiffs' ships, to load a cargo in the port of London and proceed therewith to Rio de Janeiro. By the charter-party, all lighterage was to be at charterers' expense, the charterers indemnifying the owners against lighterage expenses paid by them at the port of discharge. A portion of the freight was made payable at the port of discharge, and the balance in London. There was a clause providing for the payment of demurrage if the cargo should not be loaded and discharged in thirty-five days.

Robson (Aspinall with him) for the plaintiffs.—It was the duty of the charterers to forward the lighterage expenses and the demurrage to the shipowners here. The debtor must seek his creditor. The plaintiffs, who are the creditors, were entitled to be paid at their place of business, which is within the jurisdiction. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—The creditors in this case might have the right to insist upon payment in Antwerp.] If the plaintiffs are entitled to be paid in England, even if they are also entitled to be paid elsewhere, that is sufficient to bring them within the rule. In Reynolds v. Coleman (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 588; 36 Ch. Div. 453) Cotton, L.J. said: "The difficulty arises from the words 'according to the terms thereof;' but, in my opinion, those words mean, that you must look at the contract, and at the facts which existed at the time when the contract was made, and then determine whether, having regard to the terms, the contract was one which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, and do not mean that there must be an express provision that the contract is to be performed within the jurisdiction." In the present case, where the ordinary course of business does not apply, as with regard to payment of the balance of freight in London, there is an express stipulation for payment there; where the owners are in the ordinary position of creditors, and the charterers in the ordinary position of debtors, as is the case as to these expenses, no express stipulation for payment in London is necessary; it is the ordinary course of business.

James Fox for the defendants.—Where payment is to be made in London, that is expressly provided for, which shows that in other cases payment might be elsewhere. If payment of these expenses might be made anywhere the case is not within the rule. The following cases were also cited:

Robey v. Snaefell Mining Company, 20 Q. B. Div. 152;
Wancke v. Wingren, 58 L. J. 519, Q. B.;
Watson v. Dreyfus, 4 Times L. Rep. 148.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs, who are shipowners in London, have brought an action against the Antwerp, London, and Brazil Line, which is a foreign company carrying on business in Antwerp, and not carrying on business in London at all. The action is brought on certain stipulations in a charter-party. There is a stipulation as to lighterage and as to an indemnity to the shipowners against expense in respect thereof at the ports of discharge. The plaintiffs would have a right to take that stipulation by itself out of all the stipulations contained in the charter-party, and sue on that particular contract. Then there is a stipulation as to demurrage, and the plaintiffs would be entitled to sue separately on that also. I will take first the stipulation as to payment of and indemnity against expenses in respect of lighterage incurred at Rio. It was at first contended that the plaintiffs' claim was in respect of freight; but it really is in respect of lighterage or for an indemnity. If the plaintiffs are suing in respect of lighterage, that is to be paid to the people who did the work at Rio, and who would be entitled to be paid there. If the plaintiffs are suing for an indemnity, it must be by reason of the agreement of the charterers to indemnify the shipowners if they pay the lighterage. Then the liability to pay the indemnity is at the same place as the liability to pay the lighterage. There is no place named for payment either of the lighterage or of the indemnity. The lighterage is due the moment the work is done; the indemnity is due the moment the lighterage is paid. Where no place for payment is named, a debt is payable wherever demanded. Indeed, the creditor may bring his action without any demand. If he does demand his debt, he is not bound to go to the debtor's place of business for that purpose; he may demand it anywhere. This is an action brought against foreigners resident abroad; and the court is asked to give leave to serve a notice of the writ upon the defendants out of the jurisdiction under Order XI., r. 1 (e). The English courts have no power to give leave to serve their writs in any other country, as they do not run there. But the courts, without entering into the question of jurisdiction, may order notice of the writ to be given in a foreign country under the express authority of an Act of Parliament. The Rules of Court, which have the force of an Act of Parliament, provide that, in certain cases, a notice of a writ of summons may be served upon a foreigner out of the jurisdiction. One of those cases is "when the action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction of any contract wherever made, which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction." It is not when the contract ought, according to the course of business, or according to the surrounding circumstances, to be performed within the jurisdiction; it is when the contract, "according to the terms thereof," ought to be performed within the jurisdiction. The court cannot go beyond the words of the rule. A case was cited to us which was said to go beyond those words, and to lay down that, if the contract ought, according to the course of business, to be performed within the jurisdiction, that would be sufficient. That is the case of Reynolds v. Coleman (ubi sup.); but I do not think that the judgment lays down what it is argued that it does. The judgment of the court was delivered by Cotton, L.J., and he says: "The question we have to consider is this, what is the meaning of 'which according to the terms thereof ought to be performed within the jurisdiction?' It was said by the appellant to mean that it must be an express term of the contract that it should be performed within the United Kingdom. In my opinion that is not the true construction. The difficulty arises from the words 'according to the terms thereof;' but, in my opinion, these words mean that you must look at the contract and at the facts which existed at the time when the contract was made, and then determine whether, having regard to the terms, the contract was one which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, and do not mean that there must be an express provision that the contract is to be performed within the jurisdiction." That is to say, the court must look at the contract, and see whether, on the face of it, it is to be performed within the jurisdiction, looking at the existing facts for the purpose of construing the words used, according to the ordinary rules of construction with regard to contracts. Applying that to this case, if the shipowners had demanded payment by the charterers at Antwerp, i.e., out of the jurisdiction, could the charterers have refused to pay at that place? If they could not have refused, then this case is not within the rule. Where payment is to be either out of the jurisdiction or in the jurisdiction, the case is not within the rule, because it is not a contract which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction. This is not a contract which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction; it is a contract which may be performed anywhere. Exactly the same reasoning applies to the question as regards the demurrage. It would be payable at Antwerp or at the port of discharge, if demanded there. The case is not, therefore, brought within sub-sect. (e) of Order XI., r. 1. For these reasons, the decision of the Divisional Court was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—The Master of the Rolls has gone so fully into this case that I will only say a few words with regard to it. With regard to sub-sect. (e) of Order XI., r. 1, it is necessary for the plaintiffs to show, in order to bring the case within that sub-section, that the contract sued on is one which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction. There is nothing in this case to show that the sums sued for were payable within the jurisdiction. I should think that they were payable at Rio. But they were certainly not payable exclusively within the jurisdiction.

Kay, L.J.—I will only add a few words as to the meaning of sub-sect. (e) of Order XI., r. 1. That sub-section applies wherever "the action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction of any contract wherever made, which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction." Primâ facie, that would mean according to the written terms thereof. In the case that has been referred to, Cotton, L.J. pointed out, and I entirely agree with him, that you may find in the circumstances under which the contract was made an indication as to the place where it was to be performed which is of assistance in construing those terms. But, in order to bring the case within the rule, the court must see, either in the written words themselves or in those words coupled with the surrounding circumstances, that it is a contract which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction.

The Marpessa. (a)

Collision — Consequential damage — Jettison of cargo—General average.

Where in consequence of a collision cargo is jettisoned, the amount payable as general average contribution by the ship in respect of such jettison is not recoverable from the wrong-doing ship which caused the collision.

This was an objection to the registrar's report by the defendants in a collision action in personam.

The collision occurred on the 25th June 1890 between the plaintiffs' steamship the Prinz Frederik and the defendants' steamship the Marpessa. The Prinz Frederik was sunk. Subsequently to the collision the Marpessa, in order to enable her to reach a port of safety, was obliged to jettison part of her gear and cargo. This loss of cargo and the damage to the Marpessa formed the subject of general average. Accordingly a provisional adjustment was made by which 722*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.* was found due from the ship to the cargo, and

408*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.* from the cargo to the ship, the result being a balance of 314*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* due from the ship to cargo.

The Marpessa's cargo was carried under bills of lading which relieved the shipowners from liability for the loss of and damage to the cargo.

The action was brought by the owners of the Prinz Frederik, who were a Dutch company, and, as their ship had been sunk, the defendants counter-claimed and obtained bail under sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. The owners of cargo on the Marpessa were not parties to the action.

The Prinz Frederik was found alone to blame both by the Admiralty Court and the Court of Appeal, and the amount of the defendants' damages was referred to the registrar and merchants for assessment.

At the reference the defendants originally claimed (inter alia) an item of 884*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*, the value of the jettisoned cargo, but subsequently amended their claim by substituting for the 884*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.* an item of 722*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.*, being the ship's contribution in general average to the cargo.

The registrar disallowed this item, and the defendants now appealed from that decision, claiming to be allowed either 722*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.*, or in the alternative the sum of 314*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*, being the balance due from ship to cargo.

Barnes, Q.C. and Pyke, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The defendants are entitled to a restitutio in integrum. As a matter of fact they are liable to pay the cargo owners a sum of 722*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.* This liability was the immediate result of the collision. Subsequent salvage, loss of freight, and interest are allowed as against the wrong-doer, all of which are matters more remote than an immediate general average sacrifice:

The Argentino, 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 914; 13 P. Div. 191; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 348;
The Star of India, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 407; 1 P. Div. 466; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261;

The Betsey Caines, 2 Hagg. 28.

The possibility that in some circumstances the shipowner might get more than an indemnity is no answer to the claim:

The Pactolus, Swa. 173.

Whether the right to contribution arises ex contractu or from the sea law is immaterial.

Myburgh, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, contrâ.—Such a claim as the present is unprecedented. Either this is damage arising out of the collision, in which case the shipowners are protected by the bills of lading; or, if not, then the collision is not the direct cause of the loss, and the damages are too remote. The liability to make good the loss arises either out of contract or the sea law:

Burton v. English, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 768; 12 Q. B. Div. 218; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; Schmidt v. Royal Mail Steamship Company, 45 L. J. 646, Q. B.

It may well be that the defendants have been allowed by the registrar's report a large number of items of damage to ship for which they are getting credit in general average from the cargo-owners. Moreover the statement on the face of it is only provisional, and in the event of the defendants recovering this item from the plaintiffs the average statement will probably be altered. Had the balance in general average been in favour of the ship if the defendants' contention is right, then they should give the plaintiffs credit for that balance. There is no proof before the court that the owners of cargo are without legal remedy against the plaintiffs, and should they sue and recover from the plaintiffs the loss of their goods, the plaintiffs would, if the defendants' contention be right, be called upon to pay twice over for the same damage.

Pyke in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—JEUNE, J.—In a collision between the Prinz Frederik and the Marpessa the latter vessel was injured and the former vessel was sunk. After the collision, and by reason of the damages sustained in it, it became necessary to jettison part of the cargo of the Marpessa, and the ship also incurred loss which formed the subject of general average. The general average was provisionally adjusted, with the result that 722*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.* was found due to the cargo from the ship and freight, and 408*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.* from cargo to ship, leaving 314*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* as the balance due from ship to cargo. In an action in which the Prinz Frederik was plaintiff and the Marpessa counter-claimed, it was held that the Prinz Frederik was alone to blame. The amount of damages due to the Marpessa was referred in the usual way, and the question is whether, in estimating the damages due to the Marpessa, the sum of 314*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* is to be included. The argument for the claim is very simple. It is said that the general average loss was caused by the collision, and therefore the wrong-doing ship is liable to make good the sum which the Marpessa had to pay by way of general average contribution. It is admitted that there is no precedent of any such claim ever having been allowed. It is hardly suggested that such a claim has ever been made. It is said that it is made in the present instance because, the wrong-doing ship having been sunk, the cargo owners can bring no action against the owners in their country, as the law of the country does not permit it, and it is said that they are not likely to be able to sue the owners in this country. It is not probably, however, the first time that such a set of circumstances has arisen, and even if it were, the principle contended for is one of general application; nor, it is to be observed, was the present claim that first put forward in this proceeding. Originally the claim was for the total value of the cargo jettisoned, then an amendment was asked for to allow the 722*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.* to be claimed, as being the total sum due from ship to cargo. Before me the claim was limited to the sum of 314*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*, being the amount due from ship to cargo on the balance of account between them. The answer to the claim put forward appears to me to be not, as was suggested, that loss by collision is an exception in the bill of lading, because the bill of lading is not concerned with liabilities to contribution in general average (Schmidt v. Royal Mail Steamship Company, ubi sup.); nor, as was also suggested, that the court would be compelled in this and in all similar cases to determine the amount of the general average contribution, because the court is compelled to do this if the matter incidentally arise in a case properly before it (The Daring, L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 260); but that the loss sustained by the ship by having to make the general average contribution in question was not caused by the collision, though of course it would not have occurred had not the collision happened. Whether the rule that loss by general average must be borne proportionately by those interested arises from an implied contract to contribute inter se, as was suggested by Bramwell, L.J. in Wright v. Marwood (ubi sup.), or whether, as the Master of the Rolls held in Burton v. English (ubi sup.), "it does not arise from any contract at all, but from the old Rhodian laws, and has become incorporated in the law of England as the law of the ocean," or whether, as Bowen, L.J. said in the same case, "in the investigation of legal principles the question whether they arise by way of implied contract or not often ends by being a mere question of words," it seems to me clear that it is the relation between ship and cargo out of which the obligation to make general average contribution arises, and not the antecedent collision, that is the immediate cause of the loss to either ship or cargo by reason of the necessity of making such contribution. It is an instance of the old distinction between causa causans and causa sine quâ non. One consideration in particular appears to me to support this view. In this case the balance of contribution as between owners of ship and owners of cargo was against the owners of ship; but the balance might have been the other way, and there must always be a balance of contribution in favour either of ship or of cargo where the general average loss extends to both. I put, therefore, to the counsel for the Marpessa what appeared to me to be a crucial question, viz., if the balance on general average contribution had been due to the ship from the cargo, would it be reckoned in diminution of the damages? Mr. Barnes, I think, preferred to say that it would. If so, it appears to me that a principle similar to that on which it has been held that the benefit of an insurance cannot be claimed by a wrong-doer (Bradburn v. Great Western Railway Company, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 464; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 1; and Jebsen v. East and West India Dock Company, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 321; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 300; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 505) is fatal to his contention. Mr. Pyke, on the other hand, said unhesitatingly that such balance could not be brought in to lessen the damages, that the ship could recover the full actual loss to it, that the cargo could recover the full actual loss to it, and that besides, one or other could recover the amount of the payment which on the balance of account one or other must, in almost every case, have to make, and he did not shrink from the conclusion that the wrong-doer must thus in almost every case of the kind pay more than the total amount of the actual damage caused. I cannot think that that is the law; indeed, if it be, it is unaccountable that shipowners and cargo owners have since the institution of the Admiralty Court neglected so obvious a method of profiting by collision. I must therefore decide against the present claim.

THE COURIER. (a)

Practice—Collision—Counsel's fees—Refreshers—R. S. C., Order LXV., r. 27, sub-sect. 48.

Where a trial, which extended over seven and a half hours, commenced one day and was concluded the next day, the Court upheld the registrar in allowing refreshers to the counsel of the successful litigant, although it lasted less than five hours on the first day.

THIS was a summons adjourned into court in a collision action calling on the defendants to show cause why the taxation of the defendants' costs should not be reviewed.

The collision occurred between the two steamship Wild Rose and Courier. At the trial the court gave judgment for the defendants, and dismissed the action with costs.

The trial was commenced at 2 p.m. on the 8th July 1891, lasted till 4 p.m, of that day, was continued next day at 10.30 and concluded at 4 p.m., lasting in all for seven and a half hours.

In these circumstances the defendants paid their two counsel refreshers of seven and four guineas respectively.

On the costs being taxed the plaintiffs objected to the allowance of refreshers, but the assistant registrar allowed them, and the plaintiffs then took out the present summons.

Rules of the Supreme Court:

Order LXV., r. 27, sub-sect. 48. As to refresher fees, when any cause or matter is to be tried or heard upon viva voce evidence in open court, if the trial shall extend over more than one day, and shall occupy either on the first day only or partly on the first and partly on a subsequent day or days more than five hours without being concluded, the taxing officer may allow for every clear day subsequent to that on which the five hours shall have expired, the following fees: To the leading counsel from five to ten guineas; to the second, if three counsel, from three to seven guineas; to the third, if three counsel, or the second, if only two, from three to five guineas. The like allowances may be made where the evidence in chief is not taken viva voce, if the trial or hearing shall be substantially prolonged beyond such period of five hours, to be so computed as aforesaid, by the cross-examination of witnesses whose affidavits or depositions have been used. Provided that in the taxation of costs between solicitor and client the taxing officer shall be at liberty to allow larger fees under special circumstances to be stated by him.

Sub-sect. 30. As to work and labour properly performed and not herein provided for and in respect of which fees have heretofore been allowed, the same or similar fees are to be allowed for such work and labour as have heretofore been allowed.

Loehnis, for the plaintiffs, in support of the summons.—By the words of Order LXV., r. 27, sub-sect. 48, the registrar has in this case no discretion to allow refreshers. There is no clear day subsequent to that on which the first five hours expired:

Walker v. Crystal Palace District Gas Company, (1891) 2 Q. B. 300;
Collins v. Worsley, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 748;

Harrison v Waring, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 376; 11 Ch. Div. 206; Wicksteed v. Biggs, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 428.

Barnes, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, contrà.—The registrar's taxation is correct. The rule in question is not applicable to this case. It is not an exhaustive rule. It does not apply to appeals, nor to term refresher fees. If it has no application to this case, then the old practice should prevail, by which the registrar has a discretion to allow refreshers where the trial lasts more than five hours. The latter part of the rule in question as to trials where the evidence in chief has not been taken vivâ voce looks as if the rule meant to allow refreshers in accordance with the old practice, viz., where the trial lasts more than five hours. It is also submitted that subsect. 30 may be applicable to this case, and, if so, the registrar had a discretion. The decision in Walker v. The Crystal Palace District Gas Company (ubi sup.) is opposed to other decisions of courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, and ought not to be followed:

Svendsen v. Wallace, 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 565; 16 Q. B. Div. 27; 55 L. J. 65, Q. B.;
Harrison v. Wearing (ubi sup.);
Brown v. Sewell, 16 Ch. Div. 517;
Gibbs v. Barrow, 30 Sol. Jour. 538;
The Neera, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 743; 5 P. Div. 118; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 277.

The rule in question is meant to give the registrar power to allow a maximum fee of ten guineas for a clear day of five hours.

Loehnis in reply.

THE PRESIDENT.—This is a case not altogether free from difficulty. I have already made some remarks about what I consider is an undue cutting down of counsel's fees by statutory rules, and I will not repeat myself, as it is not pertinent to the present question. Now I am asked to decide this matter, not by such lights as I may find for myself, but upon authority, and although I have very considerable difficulty in agreeing with the reasons given by the learned judges who decided the case of Walker v. The Crystal Palace District Gas Company (ubi sup.), I certainly should have felt bound to defer and should have deferred to their authority, had there been no cases conflicting with that decision. But there is manifestly a conflict of authority upon the point. A case in direct conflict with the above decision is one in chambers, before Grantham, J., who decided it after consulting with another judge of the Queen's Bench Division. I know that the judges in Walker v. The Crystal Palace District Gas Company (ubi sup.) dispose of it with the remark that it was a decision in chambers. Now, although that is perhaps fair comment, I cannot fail to say that it would appear to me that in the case of Walker v. The Crystal Palace District Gas Company (ubi sup.) the attention was not drawn to an important part of the rule now under consideration. I refer to the last paragraph, which is in these words: "The like allowances may be made where the evidence in chief is not taken vivâ voce, if the trial or hearing shall be substantially prolonged beyond such period of five hours, to be so computed as aforesaid, by the cross-examination of witnesses whose affidavits or depositions have been used. Provided that in the taxation of costs between solicitor and client the taxing officer shall be at liberty to allow larger fees under special circumstances to be stated by him." That appears to me to tend strongly in the direction of the construction which the defendants ask me to put upon the rule. I have suggested to the plaintiffs' counsel, in the course of his argument, which has been of the greatest assistance to me, a point which I conceive not to be without difficulty in his way. It is this: that the argument put forward by him, if carried to its logical conclusion, leads to this, viz., that if the trial of a cause began on a Monday, and occupied four and a half hours on that day, then continued for six hours on the Tuesday, and for four hours more on the Wednesday, no refresher fee could, on the plaintiffs' view of the rule, be allowed at all by the taxing master or registrar unless the case lasted into the Thursday; and then only if the case occupied the whole of the Thursday. That I say is the logical conclusion to be deduced from the argument urged upon me on behalf of the plaintiffs. It seems to me to be so wholly irrational and unreasonable that I shall not give effect to it unless forced. The conclusion to which I have come is that, although I feel that the wording of the rule is doubtful, I shall, in the conflict of authority to which I have alluded, adhere to the view upon which the registrar has acted, and hold that he is entitled to allow a refresher fee in respect of any time during which the trial is substantially prolonged beyond five hours. I therefore uphold the registrar's taxation.

THE CAPELLA. (a)

Salvage—Misconduct—Forfeiture of award.

Where salvors having taken possession of a vessel which had got ashore and been temporarily abandoned by her master and crew in order to get tug assistance, refused to allow her master and crew on board, and remained in possession on board whilst the tugs provided by the master towed the ship into a place of safety:

The Court held that there had been such misconduct as to work a total forfeiture of award, although the plaintiffs had in the absence of the master and crew laid out two anchors which contributed to the vessel's ultimate safety.

THIS was a salvage action instituted by the coxswain and crew of the Worthing lifeboat against the German barque Capella.

The Capella, a barque of 505 tons register, while on a voyage from Marseilles to the Tyne in ballast, manned by a crew of twelve hands, was stranded on the Worthing beach on the 11th Nov. 1891. Shortly afterwards all of the crew safely landed, five in one of the Capella's boats, and the rest in the plaintiffs' lifeboat. The master of the Capella on landing requested the coastguard officer to watch the ship, and, as soon as it was practicable, to put her mate and crew on board of her, whilst he (the master) went to Shoreham to engage tugs to tow the Capella off. Between 9 and 10 p.m. the plaintiffs put off to the Capella and dropped her anchors ready to carry them out when she dried. Before going the plaintiffs were told by the coastguard officer that he and the mate had been left in charge of the ship, and that the plaintiffs' services were unnecessary. As the plaintiffs insisted on going out to the ship, the mate and some of the crew then got into the plaintiffs' boat to go out with them, but were forcibly ejected from the boat. When the Capella dried the plaintiffs carried out the port anchor and cable about sixty yards to the S.W., and then, with the assistance of three horses, they dragged the starboard anchor and cable out in the same direction, and fixed both anchors in the ground. As the tide rose the plaintiffs kept a strain on the cables, and brought the head of the Capella to the S.W.

At about 6 a.m. on the 12th Nov. the two tugs, Mistletoe and Stella, with the Capella's captain on board, arrived. The captain of the Capella had also brought with him some extra hands to work the ship in the event of his crew not having been able to get off to the vessel. A boat was at once launched, and the captain proceeded to the Capella, but the plaintiffs, although told who he was, refused to allow him on board, and when he tried to haul himself up by a rope hanging over the side, the rope was cast off by one of the plaintiffs, and the captain fell back in the boat, and was obliged to return to the tug. The tugs then made fast ahead of the Capella, and she was towed into Newhaven Harbour on the morning of the 13th Nov.

During the voyage an attempt was made to take the Capella into Shoreham Harbour, but it was unsuccessful owing to her grounding off the entrance. The defendants alleged that this was due to the negligence of the plaintiffs, they alleging that it was due to the negligence of the tugs.

The defendants by their defence pleaded that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any salvage award.

Gainsford Bruce, Q.C. and F. W. Raikes for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs rendered useful and beneficial services to the Capella, for which they are entitled to be rewarded. The salvors were justified in refusing to take the ship's crew off in their boat. They were also entitled in the circumstances to treat the Capella as abandoned. If the court should think there has been misconduct, it ought only to work a diminution and not a total forfeiture of award:

The Yan Yean, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 187; 8 P. Div. 147; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 135.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Dr. Stubbs, for the defendants, were not called upon.

SIR CHARLES BUTT.—The question I have to deal with is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to any salvage remuneration for the services alleged to have been rendered to the Capella after her crew had been brought ashore. Had there been a question of the amount of salvage award, I should have availed myself of the assistance of the Elder Brethren as to the extent of danger both to the property and to the lives of the salvors. But no such question arises, as I am clearly of opinion that the misconduct of the salvors was such as to disentitle them to any salvage remuneration. The ship grounded on the beach at Worthing sometime in the morning on the 11th Nov. During the day she moved some distance along the beach, and probably a little in towards the shore, and at about 9 or 10 p.m. she was hard and fast on the sand. The tide was ebb and at low water the vessel was comparatively high and dry, there being a considerable stretch of sand out beyond her on which the anchors were laid. There is no pretence for the allegation of the plaintiffs that this ship was a derelict. Such a proposition, as is well known, depends for one thing upon the fact whether there was an animus revertendi on the part of the officer in command of the ship. The evidence on this point is all one way. The crew and chief officer were left by the master at an inn in the vicinity, he having gone to Shoreham, having left instructions that as soon as it was practicable the crew were to go off to the ship. The reason of the captain going to Shoreham was to get tugs, as there were none available at Worthing. He accordingly went to Shoreham, where he engaged two tugs for 250*l.* to tow the ship off the beach. Not being certain whether his crew had been able to get back to the ship, he took the precaution of bringing in the tugs from Shoreham eight extra men to assist on board the Capella in case his own crew should not have got out to her. Meanwhile the plaintiffs had gone off to the ship in a boat, when, as I understand, there was rather a rough sea. There was absolutely no need to go off to the vessel at that time, the real object of the plaintiffs being, as they have admitted, to take possession of the ship and prevent other people doing so. What did they do? They could do nothing practical when they got to the ship. They waited till the tide ebbed and the ship was high and dry, and then they took out two anchors. It was a very simple operation. Can anyone doubt that, if they had not done it, the officer of the coastguard would have done it? But here comes what I consider to be the most important part of the story. As the plaintiffs were going off to the Capella the mate and two of the crew got into the boat to go off with the plaintiffs, but they were told they must not go, and were bundled out of the boat. It is argued that that is not misconduct which ought to affect the salvage. Whether of itself it is or is not is unnecessary to say; for see what follows. Next morning the captain arrived with two tugs from Shoreham. The Mistletoe, the tug in which he was, got up first. The master of the Capella and four men got into a boat and went to the Capella. The master told the plaintiffs who he was, and was answered by the plaintiffs that they would not have the captain or anyone else on board The captain was then rowed round to the other side of the ship, and was proceeding to get on board the ship by the assistance of a rope which was hanging down the side, when it was cast off by one of the plaintiffs, and he dropped down a distance of six or seven feet into his boat, and was refused admittance to his own ship. Moreover, it rather appears that the plaintiffs not only refused to allow the captain on board, but also refused to take the assistance of a pilot. The master of the tug Mistletoe, who was a pilot, offered to go on board, but the plaintiffs swore at him and threatened him. In the result the tug towed this vessel with neither her captain nor any of her crew on board of her; so that when little difficulties arose there was no one on board to give the necessary information. Whether or not that had anything to do with the danger which the ship afterwards incurred, the conduct of the plaintiffs was wholly and utterly unjustifiable, and I can scarcely speak too strongly in reprehension of it. I dismiss this suit, and order the plaintiffs to pay the costs.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

THE HESKETH. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT OF NEW SOUTH WALES.

Collision—Practice—Bail—Privy Council Rules—Vice-Admiralty Court Rules.

Rule 15 of the Privy Council Rules of 1865, regulating appellate procedure from Vice-Admiralty Courts, by which an appellant is required to give bail in 200*l. to answer the costs of appeal, is not impliedly repealed by rule* 150 of the Vice-Admiralty Court Rules of 1883, by which an appellant may be required to give security not exceeding 300*l. for the costs of the appeal, but the Judicial Committee has a discretion in fitting cases to dispense the appellant from giving security under rule* 15 of the P. C. Rules 1865.

THIS was a motion by the appellants, in an appeal pending in the Privy Council, asking to be relieved from giving certain security to answer the costs of the appeal.

The appeal was from a decision of the Vice-Admiralty Court of New South Wales, in a collision action, finding the plaintiffs' (the appellants) ship alone to blame. The collision occurred on the 14th July 1890, off Port Jackson. At the time in question the schooner Countess of Errol was in tow of the steamship Royal Shepherd, and both vessels collided with the defendants' steamship, the Hesketh.

Three actions were thereupon instituted against the Hesketh, by the owners of the Royal Shepherd, by the master and crew of the Royal Shepherd, and by the owners of the Countess of Errol, respectively. The defendants counter-claimed against the owners of the Countess of Errol. These three suits were consolidated. At the trial, which ended on the 9th Dec. 1890, the learned judge found that the collision was occasioned by the negligent navigation of the Royal Shepherd, and dismissed the claims, and pronounced for the counter-claim. On the 18th Dec. the plaintiffs gave notice of appeal.

On the 31st Dec. an order by consent was made in the Vice-Admiralty Court fixing the security for costs of appeal at 300*l.* That order was as follows:

Upon hearing the solicitor for the above-named plaintiffs, and upon reading the consent of the solicitor for the Australasian United Steam Navigation Company Limited, the owners of the above-named steamship Hesketh, I do order that the amount of security to be given by the above-named plaintiffs be fixed at 300*l.* —W. C. WINDER, Deputy Judge. Prosper Orleans Williams, solicitor for the plaintiffs.

I consent to this order, GEORGE JAMES SLY, solicitor for the defendants.

On the 7th Jan. 1891 bail was accordingly given in the sum of 300*l.* On the 8th June 1891 the respondents (the defendants) gave notice to the appellants as follows:

Take notice that you are hereby required, within two months from the date of this notice, to give bail by two sufficient sureties to answer the costs of this appeal in the sum of 200*l.*, and that in default thereof the appeal will stand dismissed, as provided by rule 15 of the Order in Council of the 11th day of Dec. 1865.

In these circumstances the appellants now moved to be relieved from giving the security of 200*l.* named in the above notice.

Rules made under Order in Council, dated the 11th Dec. 1865, under which the Judicial Committee make rules regulating the procedure in all appeals from Ecclesiastical and Admiralty and Vice-Admiralty Courts:

Rule 15. Where the appellant resides out of the United Kingdom he shall within two months after his solicitor has been served with a notice to that effect, give bail by two sufficient sureties to answer the costs of the appeal in the sum of two hundred pounds; and if he shall not do so, the appeal shall stand dismissed.

Rules for the Vice-Admiralty Courts in Her Majesty's possessions abroad, made under Order in Council, dated the 23rd Aug. 1883:

Rule 150. A party desiring to appeal shall, within one month from the date of the decree or order appealed from, file a notice of appeal and give bail in such sum, not exceeding 300*l.*, as the judge may order to answer the costs of the appeal.

L. E. Pyke, for the appellants, in support of the motion.—As my clients have given bail for 300*l.* under the rules of 1883, they ought not to be called upon to give further security under the earlier rules of 1865. It is contended that the later rule, as to security for costs, had impliedly repealed the earlier one: (Michell v. Brown, 1 Ell. & Ell. 267.) Where a statute directs a certain thing to be done in a certain way, and a subsequent statute directs the same thing to be done in a different way, the earlier provision is impliedly repealed. [Lord MACNAGHTEN.—These are not the same things. The earlier Order in Council is dealing with the case of the appellant residing out of the United Kingdom.] The later Order in Council is general in terms, and therefore embraces the first. It is further contended that, even if the earlier rule is in force, your Lordships may in fit circumstances dispense with its obligation. This is a fitting case to do so.

Carver, for the respondents, contrâ.—The earlier rule is still in force. The rule is obligatory, and your Lordships have no discretion, but must enforce it in all cases.

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Lord HOBHOUSE:—Their Lordships entertain no doubt that they have the power in fitting cases to dispense with the provisions of the earlier Order in Council. They think that the circumstances of the case make it a fitting case, and they therefore relieve the appellants from giving further security. Their Lordships therefore so order and direct the costs of this application to be costs in the cause.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, March 1, 1892.

Dixon and others v. Sir Henry Calcraft (Secretary to the Board of Trade). (a) Provisional detention by Board of Trade — No "reasonable and probable cause by reason of the condition of the ship"—"Compensation for any loss or damage"—Injury to owners' reputation—Delay of voyage—Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80), ss. 6 and 10.

Under sect. 6 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 the Board of Trade detained provisionally for survey for two days a ship of the plaintiffs as being unsafe, and the circumstances of the case were such as entitled the plaintiffs under sect. 10 to claim "compensation for any loss or damage sustained by them by reason of the detention or survey." The plaintiffs claimed damages for injury to their reputation as shipowners, and for the two days' detention from the 6th Oct. to the 8th Oct., but no evidence of any specific damage was given.

Held, that the plaintiffs could not recover for injury to their reputation, and that there was no evidence of any damage caused by the delay.

This was an application by the defendant for judgment or for a new trial on appeal from the verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs at the trial before Collins, J. with a jury at Liverpool.

The action was brought by the owners of the ship Reliance against the secretary to the Board of Trade for compensation for the detention of the ship under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80).

By that Act it is provided as follows:

Sect. 6. Where a British ship, being in any port of the United Kingdom, is, by reason of the defective condition of her hull, equipments, or machinery, or by reason of overloading or improper loading, unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life, having regard to the nature of the service for which she is intended, any such ship (hereinafter referred to as "unsafe") may be provisionally detained for the purpose of being surveyed, and either finally detained or released as follows: (1) The Board of Trade, if they have reason to believe on complaint, or otherwise, that a British ship is unsafe, may provisionally order the detention of the ship for the purpose of being surveyed.

Sect. 10. If it appears that there was not reasonable and probable cause, by reason of the condition of the ship, or the act or default of the owner, for the provisional detention of the ship, the Board of Trade shall be liable to pay to the owner of the ship his costs of and incidental to the detention and survey of the ship, and also compensation for any loss or damage sustained by him by reason of the detention or survey. . . . An action for any costs or compensation payable by the Board of Trade under this section may be brought against the secretary thereof by his official title as if he were a corporation sole.

The plaintiffs' vessel was about to sail on a voyage from Liverpool to Calcutta. The disc indicating the maximum load line was painted in a wrong place, and apparently she was improperly loaded; but, as a matter of fact, she was properly loaded, and, upon an undertaking that the disc should be put in the right place on her return, the Customs authorities at Liverpool had consented to allow her to proceed on her voyage. Through some mistake the Board of Trade ordered her to be provisionally detained under sect. 6, and she was detained from the 6th Oct. to the 8th Oct.

It was admitted by the board that there had been a mistake on their part, and that the circumstances of the case brought it within the provisions of sect. 10; and they accordingly paid to the plaintiffs their costs of and incidental to the detention and survey of the ship. In the action the plaintiffs claimed, under the words "compensation for any loss or damage sustained by him by reason of the detention or survey" in sect. 10, damages for injury to their reputation as shipowners, and general damages for the two days' delay. At the trial no evidence was given of any specific damage under either of these two heads, but the learned judge left the question of damages to the jury, and they returned a verdict of 100*l.* damages on each head. The defendant now moved for judgment.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. E. Webster, Q.C.) and Gully, Q.C. (H. Sutton and Carver with them) for the defendant.—No damages can be given at all under the first head, and there was no evidence of any damage under the second. "Compensation" is meant to apply only to an actual money loss by the owner. There is a distinction between "damages" and "compensation for loss or damage." Cockburn, C.J. has said: "neither in common parlance nor in legal phraseology is the word 'damages' used as applicable to injuries done to the person, but solely as applicable to mischief done to property." And he says that in the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 and 1862 the term "damage" is nowhere used as applicable to injuries done to the person; it is only applied to property and inanimate things:

Smith v Brown, 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 56; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 729.

As to the meaning of "compensation," the following cases were also referred to:

Blake v. The Midland Railway Company, 18 Q. B. 93;
Re An Arbitration between the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Company and the Trustees of Gower's Walk Schools, 62 L. T. Rep. N. S. 306; 24 Q. B. Div. 326;
The Skinners Company v. Knight, 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 240; (1891) 1 Q. B. 542.

The Board of Trade is a Government department, and not only were they acting lawfully on this occasion, but when they bonâ fide believe that a ship is "unsafe," it is their duty to detain her. It cannot be intended to give damages for a wrong inference that some one may draw from a lawful act being done by the board. In an action against an individual for a wrongful detention of a plaintiff's ship, damages could not be recovered for injury to reputation; it is unlikely, and there is nothing in the Act to show it, that a plaintiff should recover more under this section than he could in respect of a wrongful act done by an individual in a common law action. As to the other point, there is no evidence of any damage arising from the delay. If the plaintiff's contention is right, an owner will in every case of a detention of his ship be entitled to damages, in addition to the pecuniary loss which the Board is directed to make good. They cited also

The Parana, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 388; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399; 2 Prob. Div. 118;
The Notting Hill, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 241; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 67; 9 Prob. Div. 105.

Bigham, Q.C. and A. G. Steel for the plaintiffs.—The only question is the meaning of sect. 10. The object of the Legislature was to give the shipowner the fullest compensation for anything which he may suffer, whether in pocket or reputation, by what the Board of Trade may do without reasonable and probable cause. "Compensation" means more than "damages," it is the largest word that could be used. The argument for the defendant gives no effect to the words "or damage." It is obvious that an injury has in fact been done to the plaintiffs' reputation as shipowners, With reference to the second head of damages, if a voyage is delayed from the summer to the winter there will be greater risk in it. Two days' delay will not increase the risk much, but a line cannot be drawn as to how many days exactly will or will not make an appreciable difference in the risk.

The Attorney-General did not reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case a question of considerable importance has been raised, and we have now to decide whether the plaintiffs were entitled to have any question left to the jury in regard to the two heads of damage in respect of which they have brought this action. The defendant had the plaintiffs' ship seized and detained under the bonâ fide belief that she was overloaded, but it turned out in the result that there was no "reasonable and probable cause by reason of the condition of the ship" for seizing her, and, therefore, under sect. 10 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, the Board of Trade has become liable to her owners. In addition to what the defendant has already paid, the plaintiffs claim compensation or damages for the seizure upon a suspicion of the ship being overloaded as being an imputation on their character as shipowners. The judge at the trial ruled that it was for the jury to say whether such a seizure was an imputation on the character of the plaintiffs as shipowners, and that if the jury were of that opinion they should give the plaintiffs damages in respect of it. We must look at the Act of Parliament and see whether it has given a shipowner power to claim damages upon such a head as that. In the first place it must be observed that the Board of Trade has only detained the ship. If that had been done by a private individual it would have been a trespass, and even if that could have been supposed to cast an imputation on the plaintiffs' character, still at common law they could not in such a case get damages for that or for injury to their feelings. Then, what does the Act mean? The seizure was made under the provisions of sect. 6, sub-sect. 1. By that section a duty is imposed on the board, or at least an authority is given to them, that if they have reason to believe, or in other words if they really and honestly believe, that a ship is unsafe, then for reasons of public policy they shall detain her for the purpose of having her surveyed. So that, if the board honestly believed the ship to be unsafe, their detention of her was an act of duty on their part. If they failed to do their duty, they would, as a public department, be open to obloquy and disparagement. Having done a lawful act, we must be careful to see how far the Legislature has made them liable in damages for doing such an act. That depends on the construction of sect. 10. An action is given to the shipowner on the assumption that the board has been doing a reasonable act, but afterwards it has turned out that there was no reasonable or probable cause for it. In such a case it says that "the Board of Trade shall be liable to pay to the owner of the ship his costs of and incidental to the detention and survey of the ship, and also compensation for any loss or damage sustained by him by reason of the detention and survey." The costs are obviously definite sums capable of being calculated. "Compensation" is not an ordinary equivalent for "damages." The word is used in Acts of Parliament such as this because the thing for which it is given is something that has been lawfully done, and therefore I think it does not include damages at large. Then what does "loss or damage" include? It is unnecessary to say whether those words include anything more than mere pecuniary loss, but they certainly cannot include more than what could be recovered at common law against a person doing what the board has done, only without authority to do it. When an Act of Parliament imposes a duty to do something, and then gives compensation to a person who is injured thereby, it cannot be said that it is intended that the injured person shall be entitled to recover more than he could have done against an individual doing a similar act, only doing it wrongfully. Supposing for a moment that such a seizure could injure the plaintiffs' reputation, could they recover damages for such a thing in an action against an individual for the trespass to their chattel? Certainly not in English law. Damages could not be given for this by way of aggravation; such a thing was never heard of. Nor could they be given for injury to character, because no action will lie for libel or slander merely on account of seizure of chattels without anything being written or spoken. Damages cannot be obtained for injury to reputation under this Act of Parliament under any circumstances, and therefore, in my opinion, no question upon such a head of damages ought to have been left to the jury.

Then there is a second head upon which the plaintiffs claim, and they asked for damages because their ship was detained for two days from the 6th Oct. to the 8th Oct. It is said that by starting on her voyage later in the year the ship ran a greater risk of danger. But that is no evidence of damage; and, as the plaintiffs have not given any actual evidence of damage or shown that they have suffered any loss, on that head also I think there was no question to be left to the jury. I therefore think that the learned judge was wrong in his ruling on both heads of damage and that there was no question to be left to the jury. Judgment must therefore be entered for the defendant.

Fry, L.J.—The question we have to determine is what is the proper meaning to be put on the words "compensation for any loss or damage sustained by him" in sect. 10 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876. The plaintiffs' ship was detained provisionally under sect. 6, sub-sect. 1, and the Board of Trade admittedly were acting within the powers given to them. We start, therefore, with the admission that the act of the defendant was lawful. The question now is, what compensation is to be given under the section for that lawful act? Under the words I have read, can the plaintiffs recover damages for injury said to have been caused to their reputation as shipowners? I do not suggest for a moment that the action of the board did not throw some imputation on the plaintiffs' character as shipowners; it might well do so, because the board's power to seize only arises where there are some circumstances suggesting that the shipowners are acting wrongly. Nevertheless, I do not think that the plaintiffs can recover anything upon this head of damages: it seems to me that it cannot be said that any damage can be caused to reputation when the defendant is doing a lawful act. There are many lawful acts which a man may do which may cause pain or loss to his neighbours, and yet in law no damage is sustained by the person affected, and no action will lie.

As to the other head of damages for the two days' delay of the vessel, no evidence was given, but it is said that the conditions of the voyage were altered and changed to the worse. I shall say nothing as to what evidence might have been given, but there must be some evidence before the jury for damages to be given by them. We cannot say that a delay of two days, from the 6th Oct. to the 8th Oct., is in itself evidence of an alteration of the voyage to the worse. As there was therefore nothing which ought to have been left to the jury, I think judgment must be entered for the defendant.

Lopes, L.J.—With regard to the damages claimed by the plaintiffs as compensation for injury to their reputation, it is admitted by them that the Board of Trade was justified in detaining the ship. It is, on the other hand, admitted by the board that there was no reasonable or probable cause by reason of the condition of the ship, or the act or default of the owners, for the detention. Then, under sect. 10, the plaintiffs are entitled to "compensation for any loss or damage sustained by them by reason of the detention or survey." The question is, what is the meaning of these words. They cannot, in my opinion, be said to include any damage by loss of reputation. No such damage is known to the law in an action for trespass to goods; still less could such damages be allowed when the detention is lawful and there is no trespass. I do not think that it was intended by this Act to introduce any new principle such as is suggested; if it had been so intended, much more definite language would have been used.

As to the detention of two days from the 6th Oct. to the 8th Oct., the short answer is, that there is no evidence of any damage arising from it, and the jury cannot be allowed to conjecture damages without evidence. It is said that there was an increased risk in the voyage but that is not enough, unless some actual damage has been caused by the delay. As to both heads of damage, there was nothing to go to the jury, and judgment must therefore be entered for the defendant. Judgment for defendant.

O'Neill v. Everest. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Workman—Stevedore—Personal injury—Alleged negligence—Claim for compensation for personal injury in concealed danger—Barge—Remoteness of damage.

The defendant, who was a master lighterman, was employed to carry a cargo from a wharf to a ship for loading, for which purpose he supplied a barge. He sub-contracted with a third person to take his barge from the wharf to the ship and return it when unloaded.

The plaintiff, who was a stevedore's man, was employed by a master stevedore in unloading the barge. Stepping back to get clear of the crane which was hoisting the cargo, he fell backwards through the hatchway, which was uncovered, into the cabin of the barge. The accident occurred after dark. The defendant had not furnished the barge with a cover for the hatchway. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant for compensation for the personal injury which he had sustained.

Held, that the accident to the plaintiff did not directly result from any breach of duty on the part of the defendant, it being no part of his duty to see that the hatchway was kept covered; and that therefore the action failed.

Decision of Cave, J. affirmed.

This was an action to recover compensation for personal injury sustained by the plaintiff, Ambrose O'Neill, owing to the alleged negligence of the defendant, R. C. Everest.

The defendant, who was a master lighterman, was employed to carry a quantity of railway sleepers from a wharf to a ship with the object of their being put on board the ship.

Having supplied the barge for that purpose, he entered into a sub-contract with one Henry William Taynton to take the barge from the wharf into the dock where the ship was lying, to put it near the ship, and to return it after the barge was unloaded. Accordingly the barge was worked into the dock by Taynton himself and some men who assisted him.

On the 31st Jan. 1891, the day after the barge entered the dock, the plaintiff, who was a stevedore's man, was employed by a master stevedore in unloading sleepers from the barge to the ship. Having fastened a number of sleepers ready to be hoisted by a crane on to the ship, the plaintiff stepped back to get clear and fell backwards through a hatchway which was uncovered into the cabin of the barge and was seriously injured.

The accident occurred at 8.30 in the evening.

The negligence imputed to the defendant was in furnishing a barge in a dangerous and improper condition, and unprovided with a cover for the hatchway.

The trial of the action took place on the 2nd and 3rd Nov. 1891 before Cave, J. and a common jury.

The only question of fact which his Lordship left to the jury was, whether the defendant had provided a cover for the hatchway, there being a conflict of evidence on that point. This question the jury answered in the negative.

Points of law were then argued on both sides.

Lynden Bell for the plaintiff.

L E. Pyke, for the defendant, contended that there was no duty on the part of the defendant to the plaintiff; that the defendant was not bound to provide a cover for the hatchway; and that there was not an absence of reasonable care. Further, that the defendant was not interested in the operation that was being carried on when the accident occurred; and that, according to Heaven v. Pender (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357; 11 Q. B. Div. 503), joint interest, invitation, and absence of reasonable care were essential if the defendant was to be found responsible.

The learned judge reserved judgment, but the jury at his request assessed the damages at 75*l.* in the event of his Lordship deciding in favour of the plaintiff.

On the 5th Nov. 1891 the following judgment was delivered by Cave, J.—This case was tried before me the day before yesterday. It is an action brought by a stevedore's man who received injuries by falling down into the cabin of a barge, through the hatchway which had been left open. The question to be decided is, whether the defendant, who was in possession of the barge, is liable for the accident. The defendant was not actually in charge of the barge at the time the accident took place, because he had entered into a sub-contract with another man who was to receive the barge from him outside the dock gates, take it into the docks, put it near to the ship into which it was to be unloaded, and after being unloaded by the merchants' men to take it back again outside the dock gates. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that he was entitled to recover damages because there was no cabin top to be put on the top of the opening so as to prevent people falling down it. That was the only question of fact agreed by the parties to be left to the jury. The jury found that the defendant had not provided any such cabin top. Now, of course, that finding is the basis upon which the judgment must proceed. The question is, whether or not it is sufficient to warrant judgment being entered for the plaintiff. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant was bound to provide a cabin top. It was not suggested that he was bound to see that it was on. But it was said that he was bound to provide a cabin top, and that, as he had not done so, he was liable for the accident. I am of opinion that he was not bound to provide a cabin top. I do not see anything which can bind him to carry on his business in a particular way or to provide a cabin top if he thinks fit to carry on business without having a cabin top. I think moreover that it is impossible to say that the accident happened in consequence of the absence of the cabin top. The cabin top might be absent, and yet no accident happen; or, again, it might be present, and if it was not on the top of the opening the accident would happen all the same. Therefore I am of opinion that it is impossible to maintain a verdict for the plaintiff on the ground that the defendant was bound to provide a cabin top. That, however, does not of course exhaust all the arguments that might be raised in favour of the plaintiff. It may be that, although the defendant was not bound to provide a cabin top, he was bound, if he chose to carry on business without a cabin top, to give notice to persons likely to use the barge that there was no cabin top, and that consequently they must look out for themselves with regard to the danger of falling down into the cabin. The case is not unlike Indermaur v. Dames (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 484; 16 Ib. 293; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 274; L. Rep. 2 Ib. 311). There it was held that where a man was employed to go and do certain work on the premises of the defendant—not employed by the defendant, but employed by his landlord for a purpose in which the defendant was jointly interested—the defendant was bound not to have a trap-door on his premises. The defendant was bound, if he did have a trap-door—which was likely to act as a "trap" in the ordinary sense of the word—to inform persons in the position of the plaintiff coming on the premises for a purpose in which the defendant was jointly interested. And inasmuch as he had not vouchsafed the information as to the existence of the trap-door the defendant was held to be liable. That is undoubtedly the case nearest to the present; and the question is, whether the present case cannot be brought within the authority. It was contended on behalf of the defendant in the present case that the plaintiff was not engaged upon an employment in which the defendant was interested. I cannot hold that. I think he was. The defendant had contracted to carry certain sleepers to the dock in order that they might be put on board the ship. It was to his interest that the sleepers should be so loaded in order that he might get his barge back again. It cannot be said that the stevedore's men who went on board the barge for the purpose of unloading the sleepers were mere licensees. They were more than mere licensees. They were there in the performance of a duty, in the discharge of which the defendant, as it appears to me, had an interest. Therefore I cannot distinguish the case of Indermaur v. Dames (ubi sup.) on that ground. Then I come to the consideration of the trap-door. Was this a trap-door in the sense in which a trap-door existed in the case of Indermaur v. Dames (ubi sup.)? I come to the conclusion that it was not, for these reasons: in the case of Indermaur v. Dames (ubi sup.) the trap-door was not a trap-door which you would expect to find upon premises of the description existing in that case. There was no reason why the occupier should not have made a trap-door if he had wished to have one. Still, it was not the place where you would ordinarily expect to find a trap-door. Unless he were told there was a trap-door there, a man going about the premises would assume that there was no trap-door. Consequently he would be misled and possibly fall down the opening. In this case that is not so. Everybody accustomed to do anything on barges knows perfectly well that there is a cabin; knows perfectly well that there is an opening to which access is obtained to that cabin; and knows perfectly well that even if there is a cabin top it might not be on. Indeed, it was admitted on behalf of the plaintiff that it was no part of the duty of the defendant to see that it was on. The stevedore's men therefore had notice that there was an opening of this description. They also had notice that it might be unprotected. Under those circumstances, therefore, it seems to me there was no duty incumbent on the defendant to tell them that there was no covering to this hatchway because they happened to know that there was such a thing as a hatchway there. They knew perfectly well that the covering, if there was one, might be off. If, under those circumstances, they chose to take the risk of the hatchway being uncovered and not to look to see if it was uncovered, merely contenting themselves with putting it on when they noticed it was uncovered, it appears to me the plaintiff cannot bring himself within the case of Indermaur v. Dames (ubi sup.). Therefore my judgment must be for the defendant.

From that decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Lynden Bell, for the appellant, argued that the respondent was under a duty to the appellant to use care in supplying a cabin top, and that his personal injuries had been occasioned by the negligence of the respondent in having omitted to do so; the negligence of the respondent being in providing a barge in an improper condition with the knowledge that stevedore's men were likely to be working upon it. Although it was not contended that the respondent was under any obligation to see that the hatchway was covered, it being admitted that the hatchway must have been frequently uncovered, yet there was a duty on the respondent to see that there was a cover to the hatchway. He relied on

Smith v. London and St. Katherine's Dock Company 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 326; Heaven v. Pender, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357; 11 Q. B. Div. 503.

He referred also to

L. E. Pyke, Q.C. and Butler Aspinall, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

Lord HERSCHELL.—I think that the judgment of Cave, J. must be affirmed. [His Lordship then stated the facts of the case and continued as follows:] The plaintiff's case is, that the accident was the result of the defendant's negligence. Mr. Bell in his ingenious argument insisted that the negligence of the defendant lay in providing a barge in an improper condition with the knowledge that stevedore's men were likely to be working upon it. The plaiutiff, in order to succeed, must make out, first, that the defendant was guilty of negligence, i.e., some breach of duty owing by the defendant to the plaintiff; secondly that the injury was the direct result of that negligence. Mr. Bell relied on Smith v. London and St. Katherine's Dock Company and Heaven v. Pender as authorities most favourable to the plaintiff's case. But those cases are very different from the present case, because in both those cases there was a concealed danger in the condition of the premises which the defendants owned, and to which they invited people who carried on their business to come. In one case the injury was caused by an insecure plank; in the other case it was a rope which was rotten. In both those cases there was a concealed danger which could not have been avoided by the persons using the premises. I will assume, in the present case, that, if the barge itself had been in a condition inherently dangerous, this case would have come within those authorities and that an action would lie. But in the present case there is certainly no concealment about the danger which is said to exist. The negligence which is alleged is in not providing the barge with a cover for the hatchway. Well, of course, if the hatchway was open, that was a thing which would be obvious to everyone. It was not said that the defendant was under any obligation to see that the hatchway was covered. It is admitted that the hatchway must have been sometimes uncovered. The utmost that the plaintiff alleged, or could allege, was that there was a duty on the defendant to see that there was a cover to the hatchway. I am far from satisfied that that duty has been made out as a duty to the plaintiff existing at the time when the defendant handed over the barge to Taynton, because any risk arising from the absence of such a cover might be obviated in a variety of ways. During the daytime there was no risk at all; and at night the risk could have been obviated by providing sufficient lights. But, assuming the existence of such a duty, in my opinion the plaintiff has not made out his case He must show that the accident was the direct result of the defendant's breach of duty. If the cover had been there, and the hole was open, it is admitted that the defendant would not have been liable. But if there was no negligence on the part of the defendant in the hole being left open, supposing the cover to have been provided, it is difficult to see how there was negligence in not providing a cover for the hole. However the case is regarded it is impossible to say that the injury the plaintiff sustained was the direct result of any negligence which can be brought home to the defendant.

THIN AND SINCLAIR v. RICHARDS AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Seaworthiness—Voyage to be performed in stages — Seaworthiness at each stage of voyage — Unseaworthiness owing to negligence of master—Excepted perils.

A cargo of esparto grass was shipped at Oran upon a steamer of the defendants for a voyage from Oran to Garston under a charter-party, which reserved liberty to the owners "to fill up with ore or other dead weight cargo for owners' benefit," and contained a warranty of seaworthiness and an exception as to perils, one of which was "any act, neglect, or default whatever of the pilot, master, or crew." Ore or other weight dead cargo could not be obtained at Oran, and the vessel proceeded to Huelva, where she filled up with ore. On leaving Oran the vessel had not enough coal for the voyage to Garston, but had enough for the voyage to Huelva, and on leaving Huelva she had not enough for the voyage to Garston, and consequently was wrecked and the cargo of esparto grass lost. On leaving Oran the captain thought that there was an amount of coal on board which would have been sufficient for the voyage to Garston, and at Huelva the engineer reported an amount of coal sufficient for the voyage to Garston; this was owing to a mistake as to the actual amount on board.

Held (affirming the judgment of Day, J.), that the defendants were liable for the loss of the cargo because the voyage was either a voyage from Oran to Garston and the vessel was unseaworthy on leaving Garston, or it was a voyage to Garston to be performed in stages, and the vessel was unseaworthy at the commencement of the last stage, and the exception as to perils did not affect the warranty of seaworthiness.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Day, J. at the trial without a jury in London.

The plaintiffs sued the defendants to recover damages for breach of a contract, contained in a charter-party and bill of lading, for the conveyance and delivery by the defendants of bales of esparto grass, shipped on board the Westfalia at Oran, to be delivered at Garston Dock. The ship was lost on the coast of Spain, and the esparto grass was never delivered.

The bill of lading, so far as is material, was as follows:

It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. Richards and Co., of the good steamship Westfalia . . . whereof . . . is master and now on passage to Savona with cargo for owners benefit and Messrs. Thin and Sinclair, of Liverpool, merchants and charterers. That the said ship being tight staunch and strong and every way fitted for the voyage shall, with convenient speed, after discharge of cargo, as above, proceed to Oran, or so near thereto as she may safely get and there load from the charterers or their agents a part cargo—say 200 to 250 tons—of esparto grass (having liberty to fill up with ore or other dead weight cargo for owner's benefit) not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her cabin tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Garston Dock or so near thereto as she may safely get, and deliver the same agreeably to bills of lading, and so end the voyage—the said bills of lading to be signed at any rate of freight, but at not less than chartered rate, without prejudice to this charter-party.

The act of God, the Queen's enemies, loss or damage from fire on board, in bulk or craft, or on shore, arrest and restraint of princes, rulers, and people, collision, any act, neglect, or default whatever of pilot, master, or crew in the management or navigation of the ship, and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, canals, and rivers, and of navigation of whatever nature or kind always mutually excepted. The vessel is to have liberty to call at any ports in any order, to sail without pilots, and to tow and assist vessels in distress and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property.

The plaintiffs shipped a quantity of esparto grass on the Westfalia at Oran, under a bill of lading which referred to the charter-party and incorporated the negligence clause in the charter-party. The master thought that the vessel had on board at Oran fifty-five tons of coal more than she really had, and sufficient to take her to Garston. Ore or other dead-weight cargo could not be obtained at Oran. She sailed from Oran to Huelva on the coast of Spain, where she filled up with iron ore. On leaving Huelva she had on board, according to the engineer's report, about eighty tons of coal, which would have been sufficient for the voyage to Garston; in fact she had then only about thirty tons of coal; she took in no coals at Huelva, though coals might have been obtained there.

After sailing from Huelva for Garston, on the 29th Jan. she met with bad weather for several days; and on the 2nd Feb. the engineer reported that there was insufficient coal to take her to Garston. She turned back and tried to get to Ferrol or Santander, but was wrecked on the north coast of Spain on the 4th Feb.

The plaintiffs alleged that the vessel was unseaworthy at the time she sailed on the said voyage because she sailed from Oran, and subsequently from Huelva, with an insufficient supply of coals for her intended voyage.

The defendants alleged that the vessel was seaworthy when she sailed from Oran, having then a sufficient supply of coals for the voyage to Huelva, and that, if she was not seaworthy when she sailed from Huelva, it was owing to the negligence of the engineer and master, and that the loss was therefore occasioned by perils excepted in the charter-party.

At the trial before Day, J. without a jury in London, the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Barnes, Q.C. and Hollams for the appellants.—The charter-party, by providing that the vessel should be at liberty to fill up with ore or other dead-weight cargo for owners' benefit, contemplated that the vessel would have to call at some other port for that purpose on the voyage from Oran to Garston, because such cargo could not be obtained at Oran. She was, therefore, seaworthy on sailing from Oran if she had then sufficient coal to take her to such other port. She had sufficient coal to take her to Huelva. She left Huelva with insufficient coal owing to the negligence of the engineer and captain, and that was a peril excepted by the terms of the charter-party:

Biccard v. Shepherd, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 504; 14 Moo. P. C. 471;
Worms v. Storey, 11 Ex. 430.

Bigham, Q.C. and Arthur Russell for the respondents.—This was a voyage from Oran to Garston, and the vessel was not seaworthy when she left Oran. At any rate it was a voyage to Garston to be made in two stages, and the vessel was bound to be seaworthy at the commencement of each stage. In this case she was not seaworthy at either stage:

Dixon v. Sadler, 5 M. & W. 405.

Barnes, Q.C. replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This case seems to me to be governed by the definition of seaworthiness given by Lord Wensleydale in Dixon v. Sadler (ubi sup.). It must be taken that, as to the cargo shipped by the plaintiffs, this was a voyage from Oran to Garston. If there were nothing more the ship must be seaworthy on leaving Oran for a voyage to Garston, to encounter the ordinary perils of that voyage; and, to be seaworthy, she must have a sufficient supply of coal for the ordinary voyage from Oran to Garston. It is said by the defendants that, though the voyage was from Oran to Garston, yet the voyage was to be divided into stages; that one stage was from Oran to Huelva, the ship being at liberty to go there in order to load dead weight cargo; and that the ship could take in more coal there. I doubt whether this was a voyage to be divided into stages, but, if it was, it comes accurately within the definition given by Lord Wensleydale in Dixon v. Sadler (ubi sup.), where he says, "In the case of an insurance for a certain voyage, it is clearly established that there is an implied warranty that the vessel shall be seaworthy, by which is meant that she shall be in a fit state as to repairs, equipment, and crew, and in all other respects, to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage insured, at the time of sailing upon it. If the assurance attaches before the voyage commences, it is enough that the state of the ship be commensurate to the then risk; and, if the voyage be such as to require a different complement of men, or state of equipment in different parts of it, as if it were a voyage down a canal or river, and thence across to the open sea, it would be enough if the vessel were, at the commencement of each stage of the navigation, properly manned and equipped for it." If that is a true description of this voyage, this ship, even if she were not unseaworthy for the voyage from Oran to Huelva, yet, Huelva being a stage upon the voyage, she was bound to be seaworthy in respect of her supply of coals for the voyage from Huelva to Garston. She was not seaworthy in that respect. It has been argued that this was owing to the negligence of the engineer or captain at Huelva. That, however, has nothing whatever to do with a warranty as to the seaworthiness of the ship, which is not affected by any negligence of that kind. The decision of Day, J. was right and must be affirmed.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This voyage was either a voyage not divided into stages, or it was a voyage divided into stages. If it was the former, the ship ought to have been seaworthy for a voyage to Garston on leaving Oran, but she was not. If it was the latter, the ship ought to have been seaworthy on leaving Huelva, but she was not. The law imposes upon shipowners a warranty as to the seaworthiness of the ship for the entire voyage, and the shipowners cannot escape from liability under such warranty because the voyage is to be divided into stages. If the voyage is divided into stages, the warranty attaches at each stage of the voyage. In that way there is a warranty for the entire voyage; otherwise, because a voyage is divided into stages, the shipowner would be able to cut down the warranty to a warranty of seaworthiness for the first stage of the voyage only. I think the decision of Day, J. was perfectly right and that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree. There is always a warranty of seaworthiness by shipowners. In this case the ship was either not seaworthy on leaving Oran, or was not seaworthy on leaving Huelva, and therefore the warranty was broken. This appeal must fail. Appeal dismissed.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Feb. 4 and 27, 1892.

Re EDDYSTONE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY; Ex parte WESTERN MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY. (a)

Insurance (marine)—Policy of re-insurance—Construction—"To pay as may be paid" on original policy—Payment by re-insured, whether condition precedent to payment by re-insurers to re-insured.

The owners of a ship effected a policy of insurance thereon with the W. Company. The W. Company re-insured part of their risk with the E. Company, and duly paid them the premiums. The policy of re-insurance contained the following clause: "Being a re-insurance applying to the lines of the W. Company, policy No. , subject to the same terms and conditions as the original policy or policies, and to pay as may be paid thereon."

The ship sustained damage, and the W. Company became liable to pay on their original policy, but had not as yet paid anything thereon. Both companies were in liquidation.

On a claim made by the official liquidator of the W. Company in respect of the claim on the re-insurance policy issued by the E. Company, Held, that actual payment by the W. Company to their assured was not a condition precedent to payment by the W. Company to the E. Company.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

This was an application by the liquidator of the Western Marine Insurance Company, in the winding-up of the Eddystone Marine Insurance Company, for liberty to prove against the latter company in respect of a sum of 800*l.* alleged to be due on certain policies of re-insurance issued by the Eddystone Company which the liquidator of that company had refused to admit to proof under circumstances appearing in an agreed statement of facts.

A policy of insurance for 500*l.* for the period of twelve months from the 26th Jan. 1888 to the 25th Jan. 1889, issued by the Western Company in respect of a steamship called the Bonnington, and a policy of re-insurance on the same ship for the same period for 250*l.*, issued to the Western Company by the Eddystone Company were selected as a test case.

From the statement of facts it appeared that both companies were formed for the purpose of carrying on the business of marine insurance and re-insurance, and that the policies in question were issued in the ordinary course of business by the Eddystone Company, in order to re-insure the whole or part of the contingent liabilities of the Western Company under policies issued by the latter company to the original assured. The terms of these policies (in respect of which the re-insurances in question were effected) varied, and the policies of re-insurance were not copies of the original policies of insurance containing all their details; but the following clause, or a clause to a like effect, was inserted in all the re-insurance policies:

> Being a re-insurance applying to the lines of the Western Insurance Company Limited, policy No. , subject to the same terms and conditions as the original policy or policies, and to pay as may be paid thereon.

The statement of facts stated that it was to be assumed for the purpose of the decision of the question, but not further—(1) That all the premiums on the re-insurance policies were duly paid to the Eddystone by the Western Company; (2) that the vessel insured had sustained damage by perils insured against, and that the Western Company had become liable to pay a sum in respect of such damage; and (3) that had the Western Company actually paid the claim, the Eddystone Company would have been liable to pay under its re-insurance policy, the proper rateable proportion of the amount to the Western Company. The Western Company having subsequently to the effecting of the re-insurance gone into liquidation, had not at present actually paid to their assured the sum mentioned in the policy, or any part of it. The liquidator of the Eddystone Company contended that, having regard to the wording of the clause above mentioned, the Eddystone Company was liable to pay to the Western Company the proper rateable proportion of any dividend which might be paid by the Western Company to the original assured, only when, and not until, such dividend had been actually declared and paid. The liquidator of the Western Company, on the other hand, contended that, inasmuch as his company became liable to pay the said sum in respect of the said damage to the original assured immediately upon the occurrence of the loss, the Eddystone Company, in like manner, also became liable immediately upon the like event to pay the proper rateable proportion of such sum to the Western Company, irrespective of any question whether the Western Company had actually paid, wholly or in part, the claim under their policy or not; in other words, that the liability of the re-insurer accrued immediately upon the accruing of the liability of his re-assured.

Joseph Walton for the liquidator of the Western Company.—I submit that upon the construction of the clause in question actual payment by the Western Company to their assured is not a condition precedent to the Western Company recovering against the Eddystone Company. A contract of re-insurance is in effect a separate contract:

> Arnould's Marine Insurance, 5th edit., pp. 103-4; Phillips' Law of Insurance, 5th edit., sect. 404.

The contract here is in common form, and is similar to that in

> Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405; 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 789; 15 Q. B. Div. 11.

The words of the clause are not pay "when" payment is made thereon, but "as" may be paid thereon. The intention to be gathered from them is, that the terms of the original policy were to be incorporated in the policy of re-insurance. They point to a basis on which the payment is to be made. An insurer is not, I submit, to be driven into bankruptcy merely because the persons with whom he has effected a policy of re-insurance refuse to pay him until he has paid the claim on the original policy. There is nothing in the re-insurance policy which excuses the re-insurers from paying. The object of the clause was not to limit the rights of the insurer, but to impose a liability on the re-insurer. He also referred to > Marten v. Munich Assurance Company Limited (before Mathew, J., 1st June 1891, unreported); McArthur on Marine Insurance, p. 279.

Hastings, Q.C. and Rowden for the Eddystone Company.—The contract of re-insurance is, we submit, one of indemnity only, viz., that the Eddystone Company should pay the Western Company such a sum as might be paid on the latter's policy, and the object of the clause in question was to limit the liability of the Eddystone Company to such a sum as the Western Company might actually and in fact pay on their policy; in other words, the payment by the Western Company was to be regarded as a condition precedent to their recovering anything against the Eddystone Company. It would be manifestly unjust that a person who has entered into a contract to pay half of what should be paid by another should be called upon to pay his half notwithstanding the other has paid nothing.

Walton replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 27.—STIRLING, J. stated the facts and the contentions on either side as appearing in the statement of facts, and continued:—The words "to pay as may be paid thereon" do not stand in strict grammatical connection with those which immediately precede, but the effect of them is to impose an obligation as to payment on the re-insurers. The contention on behalf of the liquidator of the Eddystone Company comes to this—that those words make payment of the re-insured a condition precedent to payment by the re-insurer. Now, a main object of re-insurance is to relieve the re-insured from a portion of the risk previously undertaken by him, and the result of giving effect to the liquidator's contention would be, that before the re-insured obtains the benefit of his re-insurance he must himself have paid on the original insurance, even though bankruptcy might be the result. I think that this could not be intended, and that such a construction ought not to be put on the language of the policy unless it is clearly called for. In my opinion the words do not clearly require to be so construed. They would be satisfied if they were held to amount simply to this, that the payment to be made on the re-insurance policy is to be regulated by that to be made on the original policy of insurance. I am fortified in this view by the observations of Mathew, J. in the unreported case of Marten v. Munich Assurance Company Limited (ubi sup.), with the shorthand notes of which I have been furnished. The contention of the liquidator of the Western Company must accordingly prevail; and I hold that payment by his company is not a condition precedent to his recovering against the Eddystone Company.

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 167—Discharged seaman—Right to compensation.

The plaintiff entered into and signed an agreement with a shipowner, by which he engaged to sail at a monthly rate of wages, "on a voyage from Sunderland to Bilbao, or any port or ports, place or places within the limits of 73 degrees N. latitude and 60 degrees S. latitude, trading to and fro if required, and back to a final port of discharge in the United Kingdom. The term of employment may be for any period not exceeding six months." The voyage terminated in twenty-one days, when, the vessel having returned to Sunderland, the plaintiff was discharged.

Held (reversing the decision of the magistrates), that, under the circumstances stated, there was no evidence of improper discharge entitling the plaintiff to claim compensation under sect. 167 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The true meaning of that section is that, when a man has been improperly discharged, he is to have due compensation up to a month's wages in lieu of his right of action, unless he has earned a month's wages, in which case the section does not apply.

THIS was an appeal, by way of special case, stated by Ralph Milbanke Hudson and George Clifton Pecket, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the county borough of Sunderland. The facts and the material portions of the agreement are set out in the special case, which is in the following terms:—

1. On the 18th Sept. 1891 the appellant plaintiff, and the respondent defendant, with their respective solicitors, appeared before us on a summons under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), issued on the complaint of the plaintiff, wherein it was alleged that he had been hired to serve in the British ship or vessel Galveston as a seaman, at and for certain wages, and that he had duly performed his service and hiring, and that, although wages to the amount of 7*l.* were then justly due and owing to him for his services, the defendant neglected and refused to pay him the same, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided.

2. The facts laid before us, and taken as mutually admitted, were as follows: On the 21st Aug. 1891 the plaintiff was engaged as a seaman by the defendant, the master of the steamship Galveston, under written articles of agreement, made in accordance with the 157th section of the before-mentioned Act, at and for the wages of 4*l.* 15*s.* per calendar month. The agreement contained the following conditions:

On a voyage from Sunderland to Bilbao, and for any port or ports, place or places within the limits of 73 degrees north latitude and sixty degrees south latitude, trading to and fro, if required, and back to a final port of discharge in the United Kingdom. The term of employment may be for any period not exceeding six months.

3. The respondent entered upon his employment upon the Galveston on the 23rd Aug. 1891, on which date she left Sunderland for Bilbao, where, after discharging outward cargo, she loaded homeward cargo, and returned to Sunderland to discharge the same, at which latter port she arrived on Saturday, the 12th Sept. 1891. The defendant, treating the engagement of his crew (including the plaintiff) as having terminated with such arrival in Sunderland, informed the whole crew (including the plaintiff), when the vessel had been safely moored, that no further service was required of them, and appointed to pay the crew off before the Superintendent of Mercantile Marine on Monday, the 14th Sept. 1891. No further service was rendered by the plaintiff.

4. The statutory account of wages delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff, showed the date when the wages began to be the 23rd Aug. 1891, the date when the wages ceased to be the 12th Sept. 1891, and the total period of employment to be twenty-one days; the earnings to be, wages at 4*l.* 15*s.* per month, 3*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*—and the total deductions amounting to 2*l.* 10*s.*, leaving a final balance of 16*s.* 6*d.* due to the plaintiff, and that amount was tendered by the defendant to the plaintiff at the said Mercantile Marine Office, on Monday, the 14th Sept. 1891, but the plaintiff refused to accept payment thereof and to sign the statutory release, alleging that a further amount was due to him, and that he would accept 2*l.* 5*s.* the balance of one month's wages.

5. On these facts the plaintiff's solicitor contended that, although he had only been permitted to serve twenty-one days under the before-mentioned agreement, yet he was entitled under the 167th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 to compensation not exceeding one month's wages, he having been discharged without any fault on his part justifying such discharge, and, as was admitted by the defendant's solicitor, without his consent.

6. The defendant's solicitor, on the other hand, contended that the engagement was not a monthly one or for a month at least, but for a voyage at a monthly rate of wages to be calculated with regard to the actual duration of the said voyage only; that the voyage intended by the said articles of agreement was not necessarily (but only at the option of the defendant) to extend to any other port or ports than Bilbao, and that, whether the vessel returned with cargo to the United Kingdom direct from Bilbao, or after trading to any other foreign port or ports, the engagement of the plaintiff expired on such return, that the section above cited referred only to the unjustifiable and premature discharge or dismissal of a seaman, either before the commencement of or during the voyage or period contemplated by the engagement, and consequently it had no application to the present case, where it was contended that his engagement had come, lawfully and by virtue of the articles of agreement, to an end on the 12th Sept. 1891, when the vessel arrived in Sunderland to discharge her cargo.

7. We held, that the plaintiff having been discharged before one month's wages were earned, and without fault on his part justifying such discharge, and without his consent, was entitled to compensation under sect. 167 of the Act above cited, and we awarded payment by the defendant to him of the sum of 2*l.* 10*s.* as such compensation, being 2*l.* 5*s.* balance of a month's wages, and 5*s.* for not having been duly paid, together with 17*s.* 6*d.* costs.

8. We were asked by the defendant to state this case for the opinion of the court on the following point: Was the defendant under the hereinbefore cited agreement, entitled to discharge the plaintiff and pay him wages for the period of actual service only; or was the plaintiff entitled to compensation under the 167th section of the hereinbefore cited statute, for having been thus discharged?

The agreement was under the provisions of sect. 149 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) by which the master of every foreign-going ship is bound to enter into an agreement with every seaman whom he carries to sea from any port of the United Kingdom as one of his crew, and, among other things, the agreement must contain particulars of "the nature, and as far as practicable the duration, of the intended voyage or engagement." By sect. 167:

> Any seaman who has signed an agreement, and is afterwards discharged before the commencement of the voyage, or before one month's wages are earned, without fault on his part justifying such discharge, and without his consent, shall be entitled to receive from the master or owner, in addition to any wages he may have earned, due compensation for the damage thereby caused to him, not exceeding one month's wages, and may, on adducing such evidence as the court hearing the case deems satisfactory of his having been so improperly discharged as aforesaid, recover such compensation as if it were wages duly earned.

By sect. 188 of the same statute:

> Any seaman or apprentice, or any person duly authorised on his behalf, may sue in a summary manner, before any two justices of the peace acting in or near to the place at which the service has terminated, or at which the seaman or apprentice has been discharged, or at which any person upon whom the claim is made is or resides . . . for any amount of wages due to such seaman or apprentice, not exceeding 50*l.* over and above the costs of any proceeding for the recovery thereof, so soon as the same becomes payable; and every order made by such justices . . . in the matter shall be final.

By virtue of sect. 187 the seaman is enabled to sue in the same manner for damages for delay in payment, in case the master or owner neglects or refuses to make payment in the manner prescribed by the section without sufficient cause, the damages being

> A sum not exceeding the amount of two days pay for each of the days not exceeding ten days during which payment is delayed beyond the respective periods aforesaid, and such sum shall be recoverable as wages.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), sect. 7, enacts that:

> Any agreement with a seaman made under section one hundred and forty-nine of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 may, instead of stating the nature and duration of the intended voyage or engagement, as by that section required, state the maximum period of the voyage or engagement, and the places or parts of the world (if any) to which the voyage or engagement is not to extend.

Temperley appeared for the defendant appealing from the decision of the magistrate.—Sect. 167 of the statute of 1854 only goes to the remedy in case of improper discharge; it does not extend to introduce a time-minimum of a month into the employment of a seaman. The agreement was faithfully carried out, the voyage was over, and the plaintiff was properly discharged, and he can have no claim beyond the amount which has been already tendered to him.

Scott Fox for the respondent plaintiff.—In point of fact this agreement is a hiring for a month, and it contemplates monthly wages. This is the kind of agreement to which sect. 167 was intended to apply, and though the seaman should be discharged at a day's notice, he would be entitled to a month's wages. If he was discharged before the voyage commenced he would be entitled to compensation, even though he might be only engaged for a week. Sect. 167 is intended to add to the seaman's rights, and is for the protection of seamen entering into uncertain agreements. This agreement contemplates a duration of at least a month, and the plaintiff had a right to earn a month's wages. He must be discharged for his own fault or by his own consent, otherwise he would be improperly discharged, and might sue for compensation in a summary way. [WRIGHT, J.—He must be discharged before the commencement of the voyage, or before a month or such less period as he was engaged for.] It was possible for him under this agreement to earn a month's wages.

LAWRANCE, J.—This kind of case must occur every day—almost, indeed, every hour. The question for us to decide is on this agreement one between a shipowner and a sailor for sailing between Sunderland and Bilbao. It was entered into by both parties, and under it the defendant, the shipowner, had a right, if he chose, of voyaging to and fro, or of extending the voyage to six months. As a matter of fact the voyage terminated in twenty-one days. The wages were calculated at so much per month, and it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff, the sailor, that sect. 167 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 entitled him to at least a month's wages, and that, having been discharged before he had earned a month's wages, he was entitled to compensation. Now, that section says that, "any seaman who has signed an agreement and is afterwards discharged before the commencement of the voyage, or before one month's wages are earned without fault on his part justifying such discharge and without his consent," shall be entitled to compensation not exceeding a month's wages, and "on adducing such evidence as the court hearing the case deems satisfactory of his having been so improperly discharged as aforesaid, may recover such compensation as if it were wages duly earned." The meaning of that is that, in order to raise a claim such as this in the present case, it is necessary to show that the sailor was improperly discharged, as far as the section is concerned—that is, as far as the contract is concerned. According to this contract the engagement might last fourteen days, it might last six months; but, at the conclusion of the voyage, the contract was at an end. In my opinion, therefore, our judgment ought to be for the defendant, the shipowner.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. The agreement was for a voyage which might be for six months, but which might be, and as a matter of fact was, completed in twenty-one days. I express no opinion on the agreement by itself as to the rate of wages mentioned in the schedule to the Act. It is possible that evidence of custom might be given on either side as to that, and we leave it open. The question here is, assuming that the plaintiff was employed under an agreement which has come to an end, what is the effect of sect. 167? Is it that he is entitled to a month's wages? I cannot agree that that is so. The section requires evidence of his having been improperly discharged, and there is no such evidence here. The meaning of the section is that, when a seaman is improperly discharged, he is to have due compensation up to a month's wages in lieu of his right of action, unless he has earned a month's wages, in which case the section does not apply.

Judgment for the defendant, allowing his appeal.

CHALMERS v. SCOPENICH. (a)

Foreign ship—Overloading—Order for detention—Refusal to comply with order—Liability of master—Jurisdiction—Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80), ss. 13, 34, 37.

It is provided by the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, s. 13, that where a foreign ship has taken on board all or any part of her cargo at a port in the United Kingdom, and is, whilst at that port unsafe by reason of overloading, the provisions of this Act with reference to the detention of ships shall apply to that foreign ship as if she were a British ship; and by sect. 34, that if a ship after such detention proceeds to sea before it is released by competent authority, the master of the ship shall be liable to a penalty.

It is also provided by sect. 37, that whenever it has been made to appear to Her Majesty that the Government of any foreign State is desirous that any of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1876 shall apply to the ships of such State, Her Majesty may by Order in Council declare that such of the said provisions as are in such Order specified shall apply.

Held, that there was power to detain a foreign ship on the ground that she was unsafe by reason of being overloaded, although the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts with reference to detaining vessels for such a reason had not been applied by an Order in Council to the ships of the State to which such ship belonged.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of the court by the stipendiary magistrate of Cardiff, upon the application of Her Majesty's Board of Trade in the matter of a summons issued on the application of the Board of Trade against Captain Scopenich, master of the Austrian steamship the San Guisto, for an alleged contravention of sects. 13 and 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1878, namely, for that being master of a foreign ship, to wit, the Austrian vessel the San Guisto, which had taken on board her cargo at a port in the United Kingdon, namely, at Penarth, in the port of Cardiff, he at Penarth aforesaid, on the 23rd Oct. last, after service upon him of notice of detention of his vessel by the Board of Trade for being unsafe by reason of overloading, did proceed to sea before his said vessel was released by competent authority.

The case was stated as follows:—

1. On the 12th Feb. the summons above referred to, came on for hearing before me at the Cardiff Police-court.

2. The solicitor for the prosecution, appearing on behalf of the Board of Trade, stated that he should prove in support of the summons that the San Guisto was an Austrian vessel classed at Lloyds; that in October last a cargo of coal was shipped on board of her at a port in the United Kingdom, namely, Cardiff, and she, on the 23rd Oct. last, was observed by the surveyors of the Board of Trade to be then unsafe by reason of overloading; that an officer of the Board of Trade, duly empowered to do so, thereupon made a detention order conformably with the provisions of the said Act; that a notice of such detention order was duly served upon the defendant, and also upon the consul of his vessel's country, namely, the Austrian Consul of Cardiff; that the defendant declined to comply with such detention order, and sailed away to sea, forcing on shore the officer of Her Majestys' Customs, who had served the detaining order and who was on board his vessel.

3. The solicitor representing the defendant, after the opening statement of the solicitor appearing for the Board of Trade, and before evidence was called, submitted as a matter of law that, in addition to the above, it was necessary as a part of the case for the prosecution, conformably with the provisions in sects. 37 and 38 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1876, also to prove an Order in Council making the provisions of sects. 13 and 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1876 applicable to Austrian vessels. He contended that the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1876 as to overloading do not apply to the vessels of a foreign State, unless by an Order in Council they have been made applicable thereto.

4. I held that the existence of an Order in Council making the provisions of sects. 13 and 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1876 applicable to Austrian vessels was essential to the case for the prosecution.

5. The solicitor representing the Board of Trade submitted that an Order in Council made under sect. 37 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 was not an essential condition precedent to the application of sects. 13 and 34 of the said Act to foreign vessels, and admitted that such an order had not been made applicable to Austrian vessels.

6. I thereupon dismissed the summons issued against the defendant.

The question for the court is, whether an Order in Council is necessary to make the provisions of sects. 13 and 34 of the said Act applicable to foreign vessels. T. W. LEWIS.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80) provides by sects. 4 to 12 for the detention of British ships about to proceed to sea in an unseaworthy condition; and also enacts as follows:

Sect. 13. Where a foreign ship has taken on board all or any part of her cargo at a port in the United Kingdom, and is whilst at that port unsafe by reason of overloading or improper loading, the provisions of this Act with respect to the detention of ships shall apply to that foreign ship as if she were a British ship. . . .

Sect. 34. Where under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1876, or any of them, a ship is authorised or ordered to be detained, any commissioned officer on full pay in the naval or military service of Her Majesty, or any officer of the Board of Trade or Customs, or any British consular officer, may detain the ship, and if the ship after such detention, or after service on the master of any notice of or order for such detention, proceeds to sea before it is released by competent authority, the master of the ship, and also the owner, and any person who sends the ship to sea, if such owner or person be party or privy to the offence, shall forfeit and pay to Her Majesty a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds.

Sect. 37. Whenever it has been made to appear to Her Majesty that the Government of any foreign State is desirous that any of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1876, or of any Act hereafter to be passed amending the same, shall apply to the ships of such State, Her Majesty may by Order in Council declare that such of the said provisions as are in such Order specified shall (subject to the limitations, if any, contained in the Order) apply. . . .

Barnes, Q.C. (with him Raikes) for the defendant.—The stipendiary magistrate did not hear and determine the complaint against the defendant, and therefore it was not competent for him to state a case for the opinion of the court; a mandamus to the magistrate to hear and determine the case should have been applied for:

Wakefield Local Board v. West Riding Railway Company, 12 Jur. N. S. 936; Muir v. Hore, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 315; 47 L. J. 17, M. C.

[The Court held that it was competent for the magistrate to state a case upon the point of law raised before him.]

Sir R. E. Webster, A.-G. (with him Sutton), for the prosecution.—It is submitted that the magistrate was wrong in deciding that it was necessary to show that the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 had been applied to Austrian ships by an Order in Council. When a foreign ship comes into territorial waters she is subject to the laws of this country in the same manner as a foreign subject is who comes to this country. [SMITH, J. referred to The Parlement Belge, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 273; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234; 5 P. Div. 219.] It was held in that case that there was no power to seize the vessel in a suit in rem to recover redress for a collision because the vessel belonged to the sovereign of a foreign State, but it was not suggested that she was exempt on any other ground. Foreign vessels belonging to private owners are constantly being seized in this country. The provision of sect. 13 specifically states that a foreign ship may be detained in the same manner as a British ship for overloading; sect. 37 does not apply at all to the question of overloading, but is intended to apply to foreign ships the other provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts, such as the enactments with reference to the food and medicine to be provided for sailors, or the marking of the load-line on a vessel. By the Merchant Shipping Act 1890 (53 Vict. c. 9), sect. 4, it is enacted that if the laws of a foreign State, with respect to overloading, are equally effective with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and if a vessel of that State has complied with such laws, then she shall not be detained for not complying with the Merchant Shipping Acts.

Raikes (with him Barnes, Q.C.) for the defendant.—There is a distinction drawn in the Act between the case of a British ship and that of a foreign ship, and the penalty under sect. 34 can only be inflicted upon the master or owner of a British ship; there is no mention of a foreign ship in that section. Before the Act can be applied to a foreign ship there must be an Order in Council under sect. 37; and if such an order is made a foreign ship can only be detained under sect. 13, and no further proceedings taken.

DENMAN, J.—In this case the stipendiary magistrate has put a construction upon this Act that I do not think it was intended to bear. It appears that an Austrian vessel was detained under the provisions of sects. 13 and 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, but the magistrate has held that he had no jurisdiction to put in force the provisions of sect. 34 against the master of the vessel, because no Order in Council has been issued applying the provisions of this Act to Austrian vessels. Now, this Act was passed for the special purpose of dealing with unseaworthy ships, and that part of it which commences at sect. 4 is headed, "Unseaworthy ships;" then sect. 6 provides for cases of overloading in the case of a British vessel, and enacts that where a British ship being in any port of the United Kingdom is by reason of overloading, or improper loading, unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life, having regard to the nature of the service for which she is intended, any such ship may be provisionally detained for the purpose of being surveyed; then there follow a number of special provisions applicable to British ships, and until sect. 13 I think the sections all apply to British ships only, and have nothing necessarily to do with foreign ships. But sect. 13 enacts that where a foreign ship has taken on board all or any part of her cargo at a port in the United Kingdom, and is, whilst at that port, unsafe by reason of overloading or improper loading, the provisions of this Act with respect to the detention of ships shall apply to that foreign ship as if she were a British ship. It is essential therefore that, before a foreign ship can be detained, she must have taken the whole or part of her cargo on board at a port in the United Kingdom, and be unsafe by reason of overloading or improper loading at that port. We must assume, then, in this case that the ship was overloaded and not fit to go to sea, and that she had taken her cargo on board at this port. Then sect. 34 enacts that where under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1876, or any of them, a ship is authorised or ordered to be detained, any officer of the Board of Trade or Customs, or any British consular officer, may detain the ship, and if the ship, after such detention, or after service on the master of any notice of or order for such detention, proceeds to sea before it is released by competent authority, the master of the ship shall forfeit and pay to Her Majesty a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds. I do not myself see why the above section should not apply to foreign ships. It has been said that it would be a great hardship to a foreigner to treat him in such a manner; but I think it is no greater hardship to order a foreigner not to send a ship to sea in a dangerous condition than to make him amenable to the criminal and municipal laws of this country when he is within the jurisdiction of such laws, and it seems to me that there is nothing in the above section that is contrary to the general principles of law. There is nothing in this section to prevent it applying equally to both British and foreign ships.

But it has been contended, on behalf of the defendant, that the magistrate was right in dismissing this summons, because sect. 37 provides that whenever it has been made to appear to Her Majesty that the Government of any foreign State is desirous that any of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1876, or of any Act hereafter to be passed amending the same, shall apply to the ships of such State, Her Majesty may by Order in Council declare that such of the said provisions as are in such order specified shall apply. Now, there are many provisions in this and earlier Acts relating to merchant shipping, such as those which deal with the question of load-lines or signals and other matters of that description, which are not so comprehensive as the provision with which we are now dealing, and it is possible to construe sect. 37 as applying to those matters. The intention of the Act was clearly to give that same safeguard to persons sailing from a British port in a foreign ship as they would have if sailing in a British ship. It seems to me, therefore, that there was power under sect. 13 for the officer of the Board of Trade to detain this vessel, and that the magistrate was wrong in holding that it was necessary to prove that an Order in Council had declared that this provision applied to Austrian ships. The case must therefore be remitted back to the magistrate to be heard upon its merits.

Smith, J.—I am also of opinion that the magistrate was wrong, and that sect. 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 can be put in force against the master of a foreign ship without any Order in Council having been issued under sect. 37 applying the provisions of that Act to ships of that State to which the ship in question belongs. It seems to me that the Act of 1876 is quite clear; sects. 4 to 12 deal with the sending of British ships to sea in an unseaworthy condition, and each of those sections mentions "British ships" until we reach the third paragraph of sect. 11, where the word "British" is omitted; and therefore, as it seems to me, that part of the section applies to foreign as well as British ships. Then sect. 13 provides for the detention of a foreign ship if it is unsafe by reason of being overloaded or improperly loaded, and I think that the Attorney-General is right in the construction that he put upon that section. But then it is said that you must read into that section the provisions contained in sect. 37; that contention is, in my judgment, wrong. This sect. 37 of the Act of 1876 is taken from the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, and at the time that Act was passed there was no power to detain foreign vessels. It seems to me that there is an absolute power under sect. 13 of the Act of 1876 to detain foreign vessels, and that the provisions of sect. 34 can be enforced against the master of any foreign vessel. Strong corroboration of the intention of the Legislature is to be found in the Merchant Shipping Act 1890 (53 Vict. c. 90), which provides, by sect. 4, that when the laws and regulations of a foreign State as to overloading and improper loading are equally effective with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts with respect thereto, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty by Order in Council to direct that, on proof of a ship of that State having complied with those laws and regulations, she shall not be liable to detention for non-compliance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts. That section clearly shows that it was considered that a foreign vessel could be detained under the provisions of the Act of 1876. Case remitted.

The Dwina. (a)

Salvage—Negligence—Collision—Injury to salved ship—Reduction of award.

When salvors, whilst rendering the services, by want of skill, brought their ship into collision with the salved ship, and did her damage amounting to about 400l., the Court, in awarding salvage, deducted such sum from the award.

This was a salvage action by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Neva against the steamship Dwina, her cargo and freight.

The services consisted in towing the Dwina from the neighbourhood of Sandhammer Lighthouse, on the Swedish coast, into Copenhagen Roads. The services lasted from about 8.45 a.m. on the 20th Aug. 1891, to about 8 p.m. on the same day. The towage was about sixty miles.

When the Neva first came up to the Dwina the ropes were passed by the Neva's jolly boat, and towing commenced about 10.30 a.m. About midday the tow-rope parted, and the Neva, instead of launching her boat as before, manœuvred close to the Dwina and threw her a heaving line, but the hawser again parted. The Neva was then manœuvred on to the weather side of the Dwina, but, as she got near to the Dwina, she was set by the wind and sea on to the Dwina, and did damage to her estimated at about 400*l.*

The defendants counter-claimed in respect of this collision. The counter-claim, so far as is material, was as follows:—

7. The defendants say they have suffered damage from the collision which occurred between the Neva and the Dwina, which collision was only caused by the negligence and bad navigation of the Neva by the plaintiffs or some of them.

(a) Reported by Butler Aspinall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

8. Whilst the Dwina was lying disabled and the Neva was attempting to take her in tow, the latter vessel, instead of establishing communication by a boat or carefully approaching so near as to heave a line on board, did, whilst the sea was smooth and there was little or no wind, cross the bows of the Dwina, and so manœuvre as, instead of passing at a safe and reasonable distance, to strike the stem of the Dwina with her starboard side with such violence as to carry away the stem and do a great deal of injury to her bows on both sides, and caused her considerable delay to get the same repaired.

9. The defendants claim damages for the injuries they have sustained in consequence of the said collision; a reference to the registrar assisted by merchants to ascertain the amount of the same, and that the payment of any sum which the court may deem to be due to the plaintiffs in respect of their salvage services may be allowed in account by the registrar and merchants in ascertaining the said damages, but not otherwise paid to the plaintiffs.

The value of the salved property was in all 15,000*l.*

Sir Charles Hall, Q.C. and L. E. Pyke for the salvors.—The services have been very beneficial to the defendants, and are therefore deserving of considerable reward. The collision was unavoidable. Even if the plaintiffs did not perform the manœuvre which led to the collision in the best possible way, the court ought to take a lenient view and exonerate the salvors from blame:

The Cheerful, 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 56; 11 P. Div. 3; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 525;
Kennedy's Civil Salvage, p. 127.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Dr. Raikes, for the defendants, contrâ.—The amount of the award ought to be reduced by the amount of damage sustained by the Dwina. The collision was occasioned by the negligence of the salvors, which, under the circumstances, was inexcusable.

Sir Charles Hall, Q.C. in reply.

THE PRESIDENT.—I have consulted with the Elder Brethren, and I find that their view agrees with mine, viz., that, although I might have had some hesitation in pronouncing a decree which would render the salvors liable for the damage to the Dwina and disentitle them to salvage remuneration, I nevertheless think that there was in the performance of this service a want of skill and care which cannot be altogether excused. This does not depend entirely upon the collision, for it is clear that the Neva got into a position into which she ought never to have been allowed to get, and the hawser ought to have been cast off long before it got under the Dwina. The manœuvres of the Neva were therefore not skilful, and I think the master of the Neva did wrong in not establishing communication between his vessel and the Dwina by means of a boat as he had done before with the jolly boat and two men. Instead of that, the master of the Neva chose to adopt the course of starting from the port quarter of the Dwina and crossing her bows with the object of throwing the heaving line as he was going by, the suggested advantage being that from the position he was trying to get into he could throw the line with the wind instead of against it. He was warned that it was possible his ship might collide with the Dwina. He then put his engines full speed astern, and then attempted a similar manœuvre with the result that a collision took place. I am advised by the Elder Brethren that, the wind being as it was, it was an unseamanlike manœuvre and ought not to have been attempted. The result of this unseamanlike manœuvre was damage costing 400*l.* as well as certain delay to the Dwina. I do not intend to refer the question of the amount of this damage to the registrar and merchants, because I think it would needlessly add to the expense, and I am therefore going to form my estimate of the amount, though perhaps it may not be a very exact one. If these services had been skilfully performed, having regard to the fact that no danger was necessarily incurred, and having regard to the state of the weather, I should have given 800*l.*; but taking all the circumstances into consideration with reference to the damages arising out of the collision, I shall deduct the sum of 400*l.* and award 400*l.*

W. Raikes, for the defendants, applied for the costs of the counter-claim.

THE PRESIDENT.—No; the finding is not that there was negligence, but that there was such want of skill as to diminish the amount of salvage. The award will be 400*l.*, with costs.

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction—Appeal—Amount recovered—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 31 —County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 120.

Sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888, which gives a right of appeal on points of law, and rejection or admission of evidence where the amount claimed exceeds 20*l., applies to County Court Admiralty appeals, and hence a plaintiff in an action on the Admiralty side who claims more than* 20*l. and recovers only* 1*s. as nominal damages may appeal to the High Court notwithstanding the specific provisions of sect.* 31 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs in an action for breach of charter-party from a decision of the judge of the County Court at Durham. The plaintiffs, who were shipowners, sued the defendants to recover 67*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, the plaintiffs alleging that the defendants wrongfully cancelled a charter-party entered into between the plaintiffs and defendants. The judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs, but only gave them nominal damages of 1*s.* and costs.

On the appeal coming on the defendants took the preliminary objection that there was no appeal.

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71):

Sect. 31. No appeal shall be allowed unless the amount decreed or ordered to be due exceeds the sum of 50*l.*

County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43):

Sect. 120. If any party in any action or matter shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction, decision, or order of the judge may appeal from the same to the High Court in such manner and subject to such conditions as may be for the time being provided by the rules of the Supreme Court regulating the procedure on appeals from inferior courts to the High Court. Provided always, that there shall be no appeal in any action of contract or tort, other than an action of ejectment, or an action in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditament shall have come in question, where the debt or damage claimed does not exceed twenty pounds, nor in any action for the recovery of tenements where the yearly rent or value of the premises does not exceed twenty pounds, nor in proceedings in interpleader where the money claimed or the value of the goods or chattels claimed, or of the proceeds thereof, does not exceed twenty pounds, unless the judge shall think it reasonable and proper that such appeal should be allowed, and shall grant leave to appeal. At the trial or hearing of any action or matter in which there is a right of appeal the judge, at the request of either party, shall make a note of any question of law raised at such trial or hearing, and of the facts in evidence in relation thereto, and of his decision thereon, and of his decision of the action or matter.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, in support of the objection.—This is an action under the County Courts Admiralty Act, and is therefore governed by its provisions. By sect. 31 of the County Courts Jurisdiction Act 1868 no appeal is allowed unless the amount decreed or ordered to be due exceeds 50*l.* In the present case the amount decreed is 1*s.*, and therefore the plaintiffs have no appeal. [THE PRESIDENT.—The language of sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888 is general, and seems to apply to Admiralty as well as other actions. Is it not the manifest intention of the Act to give a right of appeal on questions of law where the claim exceeds 20*l.*?] It is submitted, no. Sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888 was never intended to repeal the special provisions of the Admiralty County Courts Act:

The Cashmere, 62 L. T. Rep. N. S. 814; 15 P. Div. 121; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515.

F. W. Raikes, for the plaintiffs, contrâ.—The language of sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888 is general, and there is no reason why it should not apply to Admiralty actions. This case is governed by the principle upon which the court acted in

The Hero, 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 86; (1891) P. 294.

To apply the section to Admiralty actions is not to repeal sect. 31 of the Admiralty County Courts Act 1868. Sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888 merely gives an additional right to litigants, viz., that where a party is dissatisfied with the decision in law or equity he may appeal irrespective of the amount decreed or ordered to be due.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, in reply.—The Hero (ubi sup.) is not in point. It deals with procedure only. This appeal is brought under the Admiralty County Courts Act 1868, and therefore the rights of the parties ought to be determined by the provisions of that Act.

Sir CHARLES BUTT.—I think that it is not competent for us to say that the express words of sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888 do not give the right to a suitor in an Admiralty County Court action to appeal, although the amount decreed or ordered to be due is under 50*l.* It is quite clear that there are other matters of County Court Admiralty jurisdiction, as well as of general County Court jurisdiction, dealt with in that Act. The question is, do not some of these sections, and amongst others this particular sect. 120, deal by implication with appeals in Admiralty actions? I think that, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the Act itself, we must give effect to sect. 120, and hold that an appeal may properly be brought on questions of law or evidence where the amount claimed is over 20*l.*

JEUNE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think we are only giving effect to our previous decision in The Hero (ubi sup.). My view to-day is what I there stated, namely, that where you have to construe positive general words, full effect ought to be given them.

Salvage—Practice—Writ—Indorsement—Amendment.

Where, in a salvage action in rem, the plaintiffs on their writ claimed 5000*l. and the defendants' solicitors gave an undertaking to put in bail for that amount, the Court, having awarded* 7500*l., allowed the plaintiffs, before the decree was drawn up, to amend their writ by altering the sum of* 5000*l. as therein claimed to* 8500*l.*

THIS was a motion after judgment, but before the decree was draw up, by the plaintiffs in a salvage action, for leave to amend the indorsement on the writ by increasing the amount cla med from 5000*l.* to 8500*l.*

The writ was in rem and was indorsed as follows:

The plaintiffs, as the owners, masters, and crews of the steam tugs Woodcock, Eagle, and Stormcock, claim the sum ef 5000*l.* for salvage services rendered to the steamship Dictator, her cargo and freight, during the present month of November.

The prayer at the end of the statement of claim asked for "such an amount of salvage as to the court may seem just."

The ship and cargo were not arrested, as the defendants' solicitors, on the institution of the action, gave an undertaking to appear and put in bail for 5000*l.*

At the trial of the action the judge awarded 7500*l.* and costs.

R. S. C., Order XXVIII., r. 1.—The court or a judge may, at any stage of the proceedings, allow either party to alter or amend his indorsement or pleadings in such manner and on such terms as may be just, and all such amendments shall be made as may be necessary for the purpose of determining the real questions in controversy between the parties.

Barnes, Q.C. and Nelson, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—The court should in the circumstances allow the amendment in order to give effect to its judgment. There is authority for such an amendment:

Sir Walter Phillimore, for the defendants, contrà. —The court ought not to allow the amendment. It has never been done before, and if allowed would not avail the plaintiffs, as they by accepting the defendants' solilitors' undertaking to give bail for 5000*l.*, have precluded themselves from recovering more. This being an action in rem the defendants' property was subject to a lien to the extent of the indorsement on the writ, but now that the plaintifis have accepted bail the lien is gone. The court has ordered defendants to pay costs when the res or the bail is all exhausted in paying the damages, but has never imposed a liability on defendants in an action in rem beyond the value of the res or the sum in which bail has been taken. If so, the plaintiffs are in this case limited to 5000*l.*, and can get no more:

Sir CHARLES BUTT.—I am quite satisfied that I have power to give leave to amend this writ, and that I ought to do so. The order will be that the indorsement be amended by altering the sum of 5000*l.* to 8500*l.* What the effect of that may be is another matter, which may have to be considered hereafter. THE HIGHLAND CHIEF. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF PASSAGE.

Wages — Engineer — Drunkenness — Disrating — Wages account—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 171.

Where a seaman's wages are reduced during the voyage for alleged drunkenness and incapacity, such alteration of wages is not a deduction therefrom within the meaning of sect. 171 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and need not appear on the wages account delivered by the master to the seaman before he is paid off.

Semble, the master has the power, and is the proper person under fitting circumstances, to disrate.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in an action for wages from a decision of the judge of the Court of Passage of the city of Liverpool.

The plaintiff shipped on the defendants' vessel, the Highland Chief, on the 26th Oct. 1890, as a refrigerating engineer, for wages agreed in the articles at 10*l.* per month. During the voyage the master, in consequence of the alleged drunkenness and incompetency of the plaintiff (which was denied by him), disrated the plaintiff, and reduced his wages from 10*l.* to 7*l.* a month.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The voyage terminated on the 12th Feb. 1891. The plaintiff claimed to be paid wages at the rate of 10*l.* a month. The defendants tendered the plaintiff wages at the rate of 7*l.* per month.

At the trial the account of wages delivered by the master to the plaintiff in compliance with sect. 171 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 was put in. The only deduction from wages shown in this account was the sum of 10*s.* 8*d.* for cash advanced during the voyage. The account showed a change in the rate of wages, the entry as to earnings being as follows: "Wages at 10*l.* and 7*l.* per month."

Counsel for the plaintiff then submitted that the account did not show all the deductions as required by sect. 171 of the Merchant Shipping Act, and asked for judgment for the amount of his claim.

The judge decided the point in the plaintiff's favour and gave him judgment. The judge's note was as follows:—"Although this account shows a change in the rate of wages from 10*l.* to 7*l.*, yet it does not state it to be a deduction, nor show on what account the change in the wages in the articles was made, whether by agreement or misconduct or otherwise. It was in fact a reduction for disrating for drunkenness, and without extrinsic evidence or explanation, no one reading it could ascertain for what the reduction or deduction was made. The plaintiff said he had never a word of explanation until a day or two before he arrived at Liverpool, and he was informed that he had been disrated on the homeward voyage when the ship was at St. Vincent to coal. The account ought to be such as should give to a seaman reasonable information, which I was of opinion this account did not."

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 171:

Every master shall, not less than twenty-four hours before paying off or discharging any seaman, deliver to him, or if he is to be discharged before a shipping master, to such shipping master, a full and true account, in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, of his wages and of all deductions to be made therefrom on any account, and in default shall for such offence incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds; and no deduction from the wages of any seaman (except in respect of any matter happening after such delivery) shall be allowed unless it is included in the account so delivered; and the master shall during the voyage enter the various matters in respect of which such deductions are made, with the amounts of the respective deductions as they occur, in a book to be kept for that purpose, and shall, if required, produce such book at the time of the payment of wages, and also upon the hearing before any competent authority of any complaint or question relating to such payments.

Joseph Walton, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The judge was wrong in holding that sect. 171 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 was not complied with. The reduction of wages from 10*l.* to 7*l.* a month is not a deduction from wages; it is merely an alteration in the rate of wages. As a matter of fact the account on the face of it shows the alteration of wages, and therefore, if this be a deduction, it does appear on the account.

Carver, for the plaintiff, contrd.—The object of the section was to protect seamen by giving them information of the reason of any diminution of their wages. In the present case the alteration of wages was a deduction, and essentially a matter within the spirit of the section. The entry in the account of "wages at 10*l.* and 7*l.* per month" is not a compliance with the Act. It by itself does not show a deduction, and even if it did, it does not say what it is in respect of. It is also submitted that a master has no power to disrate a seaman, and if so the plaintiff is for that reason entitled to hold the judgment. [The PRESIDENT. —I always thought that the master was the proper person to disrate.]

The PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion that the learned judge was wrong in holding that this was an insufficient account. The main question here, and the only question for us to decide to-day is, whether the defence fails by reason of the insufficiency of the account. Now it is conceded by the defendant's counsel that the question of the propriety of the disrating as it is called, that is to say, the sufficiency of the cause assigned and the question whether, if it could be made, it was made in proper form, are matters that cannot be finally decided by this court, because the evidence requisite to determine these points was not adduced before the learned judge below. All those matters will be open therefore to the plaintiff to raise upon this case going back to the court below, as we think it must. The only question therefore that I am called upon to decide, and intend to decide now, is whether this is a sufficient account. Now what happened? The plaintiff entered upon his duties. It is alleged that he was drunk and incapable of performing them. That is a very serious matter in the case of a man who has to deal with machinery, because it may at any moment occasion a disaster which may wreck the ship and sacrifice the lives of all on board. The master finding this state of things disrated the man, that is, reduced his wages—telling him so at the time—by 3*l.* a month. That is a matter which is contemplated in the articles of agreement between the parties. Mr. Carver has raised the question, who is to disrate. It is very true that the contract does not distinctly state the person who is to do it, but I have asked whether it can be said that anyone but the master or person in command of the ship ever does it. My belief is, and this is not denied, that the person who performs this duty is always the master. He has done it here, and done it, I think, in accordance with the contract, and I think it must prevail. I do not think that the 3*l.* off the 10*l.* is a matter of such deduction as the deductions mentioned in the printed form. I think that from the time of disrating, assuming it to have been properly done, the man's wages were 7*l.* a month, and not 10*l.* I do not think that the difference of 3*l.* a month comes within the meaning of deductions. I therefore hold that the learned judge was wrong in his decision as to this account.

JEUNE, J.—I am of the same opinion. What we have to deal with to-day arises on the question of disrating. It must be clearly understood that, when the case goes down, it will be open to the parties to show either that the disrating was not warranted by the form of the contract, or that on the evidence there was nothing to justify the master in disrating. The only question here is, whether the account that was furnished to the plaintiff was in compliance with sect. 171 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. That requires two things. In the first place, there is to be a "full and true account" of the wages. In this case there was, I think, a full and true account of the wages. The effect of the disrating was to reduce the wages. That reduction is shown in the account. In the second place, the section requires that all deductions from the wages are to be shown on the account. Now, the form of account issued by the Board of Trade divides the deductions referred to in sect. 171 into two heads, viz., forfeitures and other deductions. Forfeitures, it appears to me, point to the matters referred to in sect. 243. Deductions point to matters referred to in sect. 192, being sums deducted for relief to seamen's families, and to matters referred to in sect. 228, being medical expenses and other expenses of that kind. None of these matters appear to me to fall within the reduction of wages under this contract. Then it is said that the plaintiff cannot be disrated by the master. It seems to me to be clear that, if the disrating is to take place when incompetency is manifested, the only person who can do it is the master; subject, of course, to the plaintiff's right to question its propriety in a court of law. Under these circumstances it appears to me that there was a proper account delivered. The appeal is therefore allowed, and the case is remitted for a new trial.

WELCH, PERRIN, AND CO. v. ANDERSON, ANDERSON, AND CO. (a)

APPLICATION FOR A NEW TRIAL.

Contract—Breach—Damages — Natural result of breach — Ordinary course of business not followed by plaintiff in delivery of goods at docks—Defendant not entitled to rely on plaintiff following the ordinary course.

By the terms of a contract the defendants agreed with the plaintiffs to have a certain ship ready on a certain date, in the South West India Docks, to receive a cargo of tiles for shipment to Australia. The ship was not ready on the agreed day, and the tiles being kept waiting in the trucks in which the plaintiffs had had them brought into the docks, the plaintiffs were obliged to pay the railway company, the owners of the trucks, a certain sum for the detention, which sum they now sought to recover from the defendants as damages for their breach of contract. If the plaintiffs had followed the ordinary course of business at the docks, they would have employed the dock company to bring the tiles into the docks up to the ship's side, and the dock company's scale of charges, which were slightly higher than the railway company's, would have included storage of the tiles at the docks for three weeks without further charge. The time during which the trucks were actually detained was less than three weeks.

Held, that the defendants had no right to assume that the plaintiffs would follow the ordinary course of business in the mode of bringing their goods into the docks, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to deliver the tiles in any manner they pleased, and that the detention of the trucks was the natural and ordinary consequence of the defendants' breach of contract.

This was an application by the defendants that the verdict and judgment entered at the trial of the action before Lord Coleridge, C.J. and a jury at the Guildhall might be set aside, and judgment entered for the defendants on the ground that the damages recovered by the plaintiffs were too remote, or for a new trial.

The action was for damages for breach of contract, and the plaintiffs claimed the sum of 42*l.* 18*s.* under the following circumstances:—

The defendants were shipping brokers in London, and contracted with the plaintiffs, who were tile makers at Bridgwater, to ship 100 tons of tiles in the ship Hinemoa, lying at the South West India Docks, London, for carriage to Australia, and it was agreed that the Hinemoa should be ready to receive the tiles on the 16th Dec.

The plaintiffs sent the tiles from Bridgwater by the Great Western Railway to Poplar, and thence into the docks, where they arrived alongside the Hinemoa on the 16th Dec.

In the ordinary course of business at the docks persons sending goods employed the dock company to carry them to the ship's side, and the fixed scale of rates charged by the dock company for this included storage of the goods in the docks for three weeks.

The rates at which the plaintiffs agreed with the railway company that the 100 tons of tiles should be carried from Poplar to the ship's side were merely for carriage on to the quay, and were less than those which the dock company would have charged the plaintiffs according to their fixed scale.

The Hinemoa was not ready on the 16th Dec. to receive the tiles, which consequently remained in the railway trucks in which they had arrived on the quay for a period less than three weeks until the defendants were ready to receive them. For this detention of the trucks the railway company charged the plaintiffs 42*l.* 18*s.*, which sum the latter now sought to recover from the defendants as damages resulting from the breaeh of contract to have the Hinemoa ready on the 16th Dec. to receive the tiles.

The agreement between the plaintiffs and the railway company for the carriage of the goods to the ship's side was made without the knowledge of the defendants.

At the trial, before Lord Coleridge, C.J. with a jury, a verdict for 42*l.* 18*s.* was found for the plaintiffs, and judgment entered accordingly.

The defendants now applied that the verdict and judgment might be set aside on the ground that the damages were too remote, or for a new trial.

Murphy, Q.C. and J. G. Witt for the plaintiffs.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I think that this application must be dismissed. It is an attempt to introduce a new rule as to remoteness of damage which has not been laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Ex. 341). By the contract made between the plaintiffs, who are tile makers at Bridgwater, and the defendants, the latter agreed that the ship Hinemoa should be ready at the South West India Docks on the 16th Dec. to receive a cargo of tiles for shipment to Australia. The vessel was not ready on that date as she ought to have been, and there is no doubt that the defendants broke their contract; the only question which we have now to decide is, what is the proper rule for measuring the damages. It seems to me that the demurrage payable for the detention of these trucks was the natural, ordinary, and reasonable consequence of the defendants' breach. They must have known that the tiles would have to be brought in vehicles of some kind or other, whether barges, carts, or trucks. If they had been brought in barges and the ship had not been ready, demurrage would obviously have had to be paid for the detention. If the tiles had been brought in carts, the carts would have had to be kept waiting, and the same thing happened with the trucks in which the tiles came. It was therefore a natural result of the defendants' breach of the contract that the trucks were detained and that the plaintiffs had to pay for the detention. If this is the ordinary and natural result of the breach, the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (ubi sup.) as to the necessity which the plaintiff is under in certain cases of showing that the damages claimed may be reasonably supposed to have been in contemplation by both parties as a probable result of a breach, does not apply. That rule does not come into play when the damages asked for are, as here, the natural and ordinary result of the defendant's breach. But it is said that this case is a somewhat peculiar one, because the plaintiffs were at liberty, by paying a certain usual rate to the dock company for the carriage of the goods, to keep their goods in sheds for three weeks without further payment. If this had been done, say the defendants, if the plaintiffs had followed the ordinary course of business in bringing their goods into the docks, no damage would have been caused by the breach of contract that has taken place. It is argued that, though the plaintiffs were not bound to follow that ordinary course of business, yet they should have told the defendants so; and that the defendants relied, as it is alleged they had a right to do, on the plaintiffs following that course since they were not told by the plaintiffs that they did not intend following it, and that therefore the defendants are not liable for these damages. I am of opinion that the defendants had no right to suppose that the plaintiffs would have the tiles brought in any particular or accustomed way into the docks. The plaintiffs have the right of having their goods carried into the docks and kept there in any reasonable way that they and the dock company may agree to. The defendants had no right to require the plaintiffs to tell them that they had not followed the course of business usual in the docks. I think that the judgment must stand, and that the application must be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—By the terms of the contract between the parties to this action the defendants agreed that a certain ship was to be ready on the 16th Dec. to receive the cargo which the plaintiffs were to deliver on that date. The ship was not ready on that day, so that the contract was broken, and the question that now arises is, what damages are the plaintiffs entitled to recover. There is no doubt that the detention of the trucks was caused by the breach of contract, and the defendants would be liable in an ordinary case to pay for the detention as a natural and ordinary result of the breach. But it is said that there is a custom in the way of carrying on business at these docks which was well known both to the plaintiffs and defendants, and that if the plaintiffs had followed the ordinary course of business they would not have suffered the damage which they now seek to recover. The case of Hadley v. Baxendale (ubi sup.) has been referred to, but the rule that is relied on as laid down in that case does not apply to such circumstances as we have to deal with now, where the damages are the natural and ordinary results of the breach. The defendants had no right to assume that the plaintiffs would not adopt the cheapest mode of getting their goods to the ship's side, or that they would adopt any particular mode of carriage. The plaintiffs were at liberty to choose any way they liked, and since that is so, the appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—It is agreed that it was a term of the contract that the Hinemoa should be ready on the 16th Dec. to receive a cargo of tiles. That contract was broken, and by reason thereof the tiles were kept for some time in the docks in the trucks which they had been brought in. The railway company thereupon required demurrage of the plaintiffs, who paid 42*l.* 18*s.* This demurrage was the natural and almost necessary consequence of the breach. The tiles must have been brought in some kind of vehicle, and these trucks were an ordinary kind of vehicle for bringing goods into the docks, so that the demurrage payable for their detention was a natural result of a breach of the contract by the defendants which must have been contemplated by both parties. But it is argued that there is a scale of charges made in those docks which includes rent for storage for three weeks, that both parties to the contract knew of this, and that the defendants had a right to expect that the plaintiffs would have arranged with the dock company to bring in the tiles at a charge according to the fixed scale, so that the defendants would be entitled to have the tiles stored for three weeks without further charge. But, as was said on behalf of the plaintiffs, they had the right to bring their goods up to the ship's side in the cheapest way, or in any way that the plaintiffs liked, and there was no agreement by the plaintiffs that the defendants should have three weeks' storage of the tiles without further charge. The argument is ingenious, but the contract must be treated simply as what it was on the face of it without more. The defendants were bound to have the ship ready on a certain date; they broke their contract; and, as demurrage is a natural consequence of such a breach of contract, both parties must be taken to have had it in contemplation, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. The application must be dismissed.

FURNESS v. CHARLES TENNANT, SONS, AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — "Full and complete cargo" — Failure to load — Cargo improperly stowed — Dead freight.

By a charter-party made between the plaintiff, the owner of a steamship, and the defendants, her affreighters, it was provided that the ship should proceed to a specified port, and there load from the factor of the affreighters a "full and complete cargo of sugar in hogsheads and (or) bags, or other lawful merchandise," and being loaded should therewith proceed to another port and deliver the same at such place as the consignees might direct, on being paid freight at the rates therein mentioned.

The cargo of sugar, with which the ship was loaded, was not, the plaintiff said, a "full and complete" one, inasmuch as the parts of the ship known as the "lazarette" and the "alleyways" were not filled with bags of sugar as they ought to have been. The defence was, that the master of the ship did not stow the cargo properly; that the defendants tendered more hogsheads of sugar (which were too large to go into the alleyways); and that, if the bags had been put there, there would have been space for more hogsheads in the hold.

Held, that the defendants were not bound to send the cargo in any particular form; and that, as they sent part of it in bags and hogsheads, and the master chose to assume that the remainder would be in bags, and to leave stowage which was only suitable for bags, and not for hogsheads, which the defendants had an equal right to send, they could not be made liable for dead freight.

Whether a charter-party in this form would compel the charterers to provide a cargo for the "lazarette," or would oblige the shipowner to receive it there, quære.

Decision of Wright, J. affirmed.

BY a charter-party, dated the 24th March 1888, it was mutually agreed between Christopher Furness, of West Hartlepool, the owner of a steamship called the Gothenburg City, then at Boston, and Charles Tennant, Sons, and Co., of London, merchants, that the steamer should, after discharging with all convenient speed, steam and proceed to San Fernando, Trinidad, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and there load from the factor of the affreighters a "full and complete cargo of sugar in hogsheads and (or) bags, or other lawful merchandise, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture," and being so loaded should therewith proceed to Philadelphia, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and deliver the same at such place, or alongside such wharf, as the consignees might direct, provided she could always lie afloat, on being paid freight of 20 cents. per 100lb. net weight delivered for hogsheads and (or) tierces; and 18 cents. per 100lb. net weight delivered for bags and (or) barrels. Any other cargo was to be in full and fair proportion to sugar in hogsheads.

This action was brought by Christopher Furness against Charles Tennant, Sons, and Co., on the ground that the plaintiff had suffered damage by breach of the charter-party between the plaintiff and the defendants, in that the defendants did not load a "full and complete cargo;" and also because the steamship had been detained at the port of loading by the defendants.

The plaintiff's particulars of damage showed a claim for 128*l.* 11*s.* for dead freight on 1283 bags of sugar short of full cargo, and 4*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* for surveyor's fees. The sum of 90*l.* was also claimed in respect of two days' detention over and above the ten working days for loading as per the charter-party.

As regarded the claim for dead freight, the defendants alleged that the cargo loaded by them under the charter-party was, according to the custom of loading sugar at Trinidad, a "full and complete cargo" within the meaning of the charter-party; and that, if the cargo was not a full and complete cargo (which was denied), the defendants alleged that they were ready and willing to load a full and complete cargo within the meaning of the charter-party; but that the plaintiff and his servants were not ready and willing to receive the same on board the vessel.

As regarded the claim for demurrage, the defendants denied that the steamship was detained by them at the port of loading over and above the ten working days allowed for loading by the charter-party. They alleged that the loading was completed within the ten working days, and that if there was any detention of the steamship it was not by any act or default of the defendants.

On the 21st July 1891 the action came on for trial before Wright, J., sitting without a jury, in Middlesex.

WRIGHT, J.—I do not see that the evidence of the witnesses called for the defence adds very much to the matter except to this extent, that they do certainly, to my mind, show that the percentage of sugar in bags in this case was largely beyond what is considered usual and necessary in this kind of business. I am inclined to think that, on this charter-party, the defendants might have tendered a cargo consisting of nothing but hogsheads, or a cargo consisting of nothing but bags. I think that they might have done so on the mere words of the charter-party alone. There is also some evidence that there is a practice at the port of loading, which was San Fernando in Trinidad, that the shipper always has the option of loading entirely hogsheads or entirely bags, and, if the owner wishes to protect himself, he does so by means of a special clause stipulating that there shall not be less than a certain number of bags, by way of "dunnage" I suppose. But even apart from that, I doubt whether the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. It appears to me that under a contract of this kind, neither party can insist on the cargo being loaded in the lazarette. Now, here the captain had 400 to 500 bags in the lazarette, and the only way in which he makes up his deficiency is by saying, as I understand it, that he had not bags to fill the alleyway—I think the captain said he could have got 400 or 500 more into the hold, but I did not understand him to say that, apart from the alleyway not being filled, the cargo would not have been a reasonably "full and complete cargo." Now, if I am right in saying that the shippers need not have provided any cargo at all for the lazarette, that reduces the amount of deficiency very greatly. And it is quite clear that the defendants were always willing to tender as many hogsheads as the captain would receive, at any rate up to the capacity of his ship. But the captain refused, if my recollection is right, to receive any more. The captain himself writes thus, it is not immaterial to say, on the 23rd April 1888: "Doubtless you will also know we finished the loading on Saturday and have on board a good cargo. We only have space for about 450 bags, in the hold, but, as I cleared out my alleyway, I make the difference 1000 bags. We certainly have a large quantity of bags on board; and, as we fill, our lazarette materially adds to this large quantity as we take the 400 bags. But, as our charter calls for a 'full and complete cargo,' I am justified certainly in carrying all I can." It seems to me that, although that may not bind the shipowner in any way, it it is evidence to show that in fact there was, according to the ordinary understanding of skippers, and of shipowners, what a jury would be likely to find, and I should think ought to find, in this case, viz., a "full and complete cargo" within the meaning of the charter-party. I do not know that it adds very much to the matter; but it must not be lost sight of, that the captain himself represented to the defendants that, after the first delivery of the bags, 800 bags more would suffice. I mention it to say that I do not place any great reliance upon that, except as merely an element in the case, rather than for the purpose of putting it as one of the grounds of my decision. I think there must be judgment for the defendants here. As regards the demurrage, it appears to me clearly to follow from the view I have taken that there must be judgment for the defendants also on that point. I think that, even if the plaintiff had been entitled to succeed on the other point, he would not have been entitled to demurrage. There will be judgment for the defendants with costs.

From that decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Finlay, Q.C. and H. Holman for the appellant.

J. Gorell Barnes, Q.C., Joseph Walton, and A. B. Langridge, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

Lord HERSCHELL.—Under this charter-party the charterers were entitled to discharge their obligation by loading a cargo of sugar either in hogsheads or in bags, or partly in hogsheads and partly in bags. They offered to put more hogsheads on board, but the master said he had no room for more hogsheads, though he had room for more bags. The shipowner now says that there was room for 400 or 500 bags in the hold, and for 800 in the alleyways. Hogsheads never could have been stowed in the alleyways, for the alleyways were too narrow. A portion only of the space in the ship was suitable for stowing hogsheads. The master had no right to assume without inquiry that the cargo would come in the one form or the other. If, for his guidance in stowing it, he required information as to this, he should have inquired of the charterers. If they had misled him he would have ground for complaint; but there was no misleading. He did not know in what form the cargo was coming, and he chose to fill the hold with bags which would have gone in the alleyways, leaving the alleyways empty, and when the charterers tendered more hogsheads he had no room for them. Under those circumstances it seems to me impossible to hold that the shipowner has any cause of action against the charterers. They were not bound to send the cargo in any particular form. They sent part of it in bags and hogsheads, and the master chose to assume that the remainder would be in bags, and to leave stowage which was only suitable for bags and not for hogsheads, which the charterers had an equal right to send. I am not satisfied that a charter-party in this form would compel the charterers to provide a cargo for the "lazarette," or would oblige the shipowner to receive it there. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

DUNLOP AND SONS v. BALFOUR, WILLIAMSON, AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Cesser clause—Charterer's liability to cease on completion of loading — Lien for demurrage—Detention at port of loading.

By a charter-party it was agreed (inter alia): "All liability of charterers to cease on completion of loading, provided the value of the cargo is sufficient to satisfy the lien which is hereby given for . . . demurrage under this charter-party, . . . the ship to be loaded as customary and to be discharged as customary at the average rate of not less than 100 tons per working day (Sundays and legal holidays excepted) from the time the ship is in berth and ready to discharge, and notice thereof given by the master in writing. Demurrage to be at the rate of twenty pounds per day." In an action by the shipowners against the charterers to recover damages for detention of the ship at the port of loading, the defendants relied upon the cesser clause. The Divisional Court gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Held, in the Court of Appeal (affirming the judgment of the Divisional Court), that the lien for demurrage clause had reference only to delay at the port of discharge, and that the cesser clause did not relieve the charterers from liability for damages for detention of the ship at the port of loading.

Lockhart v. Falk (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8; Law Rep. 10 Ex. 132) approved.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Lawrance and Wright, JJ.) upon a point of law raised in the pleadings which was ordered to be argued and determined before the trial of the action.

The plaintiffs were the owners of a ship called the Clan Mackenzie, and the defendants were the charterers.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, the shipowners, against the charterers for damages for detention of the ship at the port of loading.

It was provided by the charter-party that the ship was to proceed to Sydney, and there receive a full and complete cargo of coals, and proceed therewith to San Francisco, and there make delivery on payment of freight at the rate of 15*s.* per ton, and the charter-party contained the following clauses:

All liability of charterers to cease on completion of loading, providing the value of the cargo is sufficient to satisfy the lien which is hereby given for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and average (if any), under the charter-party . . . to be loaded as customary and to be discharged as customary at the average rate of not less than 100 tons per working day (Sundays and legal holidays excepted) from the time the ship is in berth and ready to discharge, and notice thereof given by the master in writing; demurrage to be at the rate of twenty pounds per day . . . penalty for non-performance of this agreement, estimated amount of freight.

The ship was delayed beyond the customary time at the port of loading, and the claim by the shipowners was for thirty days' detention at 20*l.* per day—600*l.*

G. Barnes, Q.C. and Leek for the plaintiffs, the shipowners.—The cesser clause in the charter-party does not apply. This claim was for demurrage, as it was in respect of delay and detention before the loading was complete, and the cesser clause in the charter-party only applied after the loading was complete.

Bigham, Q.C. and Carver for the defendants, the charterers.—The cesser clause in the charter-party does apply, because this was a claim, if not strictly for demurrage, at any rate for the detention of the ship, for which there would be a lien. Strictly speaking, there could not be any claim for demurrage, as no number of days was fixed for the loading; but it was within the meaning of the charter-party in the nature of demurrage, and was therefore covered by the cesser clause. It must have been the intention of the parties to have regarded this as a claim for demurrage, because they used in the charter-party the following words, "demurrage to be at the rate of twenty pounds per day." That being so, the claim is within the cesser clause in the charter-party.

The cases cited are fully referred to in the judgments.

LAWRANCE, J.—The question raised on this special case turns on the cesser clause of a charter-party entered into between the plaintiffs, the owners of a ship called the Clan Mackenzie, and the defendants, who were the charterers. The question arises in an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for detention of the ship at the port of loading. The defence to that claim is that the defendants were relieved from all liability under the cesser clause of the charter-party. The question to be decided is, whether under this charter-party the liability of the charterer ceased upon the loading of the vessel. The words of the cesser clause are: "All liability of charterers to cease on completion of loading, provided the value of the cargo is sufficient to satisfy the lien which is hereby given for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and average (if any) under this charter-party." The question raised here is one which has been raised on many occasions, and our attention was called to a great number of cases, some of them apparently contradictory, and the difficulty has been to find the principle which underlies the whole of the cases. I am clear that, if all the cases were strictly looked into, they are not all consistent, but are apparently inconsistent. However, there are two or three cases which have been decided, one as far back as 1875—Lockhart v. Falk (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 132), Clink v. Radford (64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 10; (1891) 1 Q. B. 625), decided in 1891; and a Scotch case, decided in 1889, which, in my judgment, so far are undistinguishable from the present case. Those cases show that the liability of the charterers for damages for the detention of the ship at the port of loading does not cease unless it is so expressed in the charter-party. Now, the principle or the rule that underlies the decisions in those cases appears to be this. To use the words of the learned judge in Clink v. Radford, the lien must be equivalent to a release of liability. Fry, L.J. says: "The rule that we are primâ facie to apply to the construction of a cesser clause followed by a lien clause appears to be well ascertained. That rule seems a most rational one, and it is simply this, that the two are to be read if possible, as co-extensive." That is what was said in the same case, although in other language, by the Master of the Rolls. He says: "The question in this particular case as in every other case will depend upon this, whether, if we apply the cesser clause to the particular breach complained of and so hold the charterer to be free, the shipowner has any remedy for his lien. If he has, we should consider the cesser clause in its fullest possible meaning, and say that the charterer is released; but if we find that by so construing it the shipowner would be left without any remedy whatever for the breach, then we should say that it could not have been the meaning of the parties that the cesser clause should apply to such a breach. Primâ facie that is the way a cesser clause in a charter-party is to be read."

In this case, the words of the charter-party are almost identical with those in the three cases that I have mentioned. There are no words with regard to demurrage at the port of loading, there is no time at which the demurrage is to be charged at the port of loading, and there is no sum which is to be attributable to demurrage at the port of loading; but when you come to the port of discharge, there is the time mentioned and the average rate at which the discharge is to take place—not less than at the rate of 100 tons a working day; the time the ship is to be in her berth ready to discharge, and the demurrage at 20*l.* a day: thus you have an easy method of calculating what the sum payable may be, and so get rid of another inconvenience which was pointed out in Clink v. Radford, viz.: that there would be great difficulty is saying that the liability, if there was a lien for an amount, could not be ascertained without considerable trouble. Then comes another question which was much debated, and that is as to the meaning of the word "demurrage" in a case of this kind. The principle I extract from the cases is this, that "demurrage" does not include damages at the port of loading, but means demurrage as used in the charter-party. No doubt there are authorities the other way. One case which is always cited, and was relied upon in this case, is the case of Bannister v. Breslauer (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 418; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 490; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 497). That has been commented on in many cases, and, if I may use the expression, has been much "blown upon," although never reversed. The point in that case was, whether a lien was given for demurrage, but no demurrage was pointed at, either at the port of loading or at the port of discharge, and in order to give full effect to the words of the charter-party, it was held that demurrage did include detention at the port of loading. It does not seem to me that it can be boldly stated that Bannister v. Breslauer is no authority for the broad proposition that demurrage includes damage for detention at the port of loading. Each case must stand on its own facts. In that case there was no other damage pointed at in the charter-party—no amount, no number of days—nothing by which the intention of the parties could be ascertained. There the court held, giving effect to the words of the charter-party, that there was demurrage in the wide sense of the words in which "demurrage" is sometimes used, and damages were undoubtedly given for detention at the port of loading. I think the judgment of Bowen, L.J. deals with that. He says: "If Bannister v. Breslauer is to be supported at all, it must be upon the ground that no other meaning can be given to the word 'demurrage' in that charter-party, and no other extent to the lien to be created than by including in the word 'demurrage' damages for detention at the port of loading, so that such damages are covered by the lien." Then he also says in the same judgment: "So far as I know, all the cases, with the exception of Bannister v. Breslauer, where a lien has been held to cover damages for detention of a ship, are cases in which one can either directly or indirectly find in the charter-party some practical pecuniary measure by which the damages for such delay can be measured." Clink v. Radford seems to me to follow precisely Lockhart v. Falk, and Lockhart v. Falk has been followed in a case in the Scotch courts, Gardiner v. Macfarlane (26 Sc. L. Rep. 492), a case in which the same principle was involved and precisely the same conclusion was arrived at. Under the circumstances the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

WRIGHT, J.—This is an action by shipowners against charterers to recover damages for detention of the ship at the port of loading, and the question for consideration is, whether the defendants are relieved from liability by the clause usually known as the cesser clause. The charter-party provided that the ship Clan Mackenzie, of 1597 tons register measurement, should proceed to Sydney and there receive a full and complete cargo of coals and proceed therewith to San Francisco, and there make delivery on payment of freight at the rate of 15*s.* per ton, and it contained the following clauses, on which the question depends: "All liability of charterers to cease on completion of loading, provided the value of the cargo is sufficient to satisfy the lien which is hereby given for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and average (if any) under their charter-party . . . to be loaded as customary, and to be discharged as customary at the average rate of not less than 100 tons per working day (Sundays and legal holidays excepted) from the time the ship is in berth and ready to discharge and notice thereof given by the master in writing. Demurrage to be at the rate of twenty pounds per day. . . . Penalty for non-performance of this agreement, estimated amount of freight." The charter-party did not contain any other provision referring to demurrage, or detention, dead freight or average. It is unnecessary to recapitulate in detail the numerous cases from Pederson v. Lotinga (28 L. T. Rep. O. S. 267) in 1857 to Clink v. Radford (64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 10; (1891) 1 Q. B. 625) in 1891, in which clauses more or less similar have been considered. The effect of them seems to have been as follows: In the first place, the terms of the particular cesser clause are to be examined. If they are free from ambiguity it can rarely happen that their effect can be altered by any provision of the charter-party. Examples are Oglesby v. Yglesias (E. B. & E. 930; 27 L. J. 356, Q. B.); Milvain v. Perez (3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 736; 30 L. J. 90, Q. B.; 7 Jur. N. S. 336, Q. B.), where the cesser clause in express terms exempted the charterer from liability in respect of all matters and things before, during, or after the shipping of the cargo. If the cesser clause is expressly restricted to certain liabilities only, effect is given to it subject to the restriction, as in Lister v. Haansbergen (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 446; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 145; 45 L. J. 495, Q. B., C. P. & Ex.; 1 Q. B. Div. 269). The general principle is clearly stated in French v. Gerber (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 350; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; 1 C. P. Div. 737; 2 C. P. Div. 247). But it more usually happens that the cesser clause is ambiguous; for instance, where, as is commonly the case, the clause runs, "All liability of the charterer to cease on completion of loading," or "all liability of the charterer under this charter-party to cease on completion of loading" or to the like effect, it may be doubtful whether the intention is to exempt the charterer from liabilities accrued before the completion of loading, or only to prevent the accrual of further liabilities, and further, in either case whether it is to exempt him only from such matters as agreed freight, dead freight, or demurrage, or average, or is also to exempt him from liability to be sued for unliquidated damages. In such cases it may happen that the charter-party does not contain any lien clause or other clause from which help can be got, and that certain presumptions may be made. There is a presumption against an intention by the shipowner that any causes of action accrued before the loading shall be released, or, what is the same thing, that his right to sue for them shall be deemed contingent on a sufficient cargo not being loaded; and a presumption against an intention by the shipowner to leave himself wholly without remedy for unliquidated damages in respect of breaches before the completion of loading (see Christofferson v. Hansen, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 547; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 305; 41 L. J. 217, Q. B.; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 509; and Gray v. Carr, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522); and especially per Brett, J. at p. 537, and Bramwell B. at p. 548; Clink v. Radford (ubi sup.); but this latter presumption does not extend to liability for unliquidated damages incurred after loading. As to them the cesser clause in the ordinary form is absolute, whether or not a lien is given: (see French v. Gerber.) There rarely is any other clause in the charter-party which throws material light upon the meaning of the cesser clause, except the lien clause, which is most commonly to the effect that the shipowner is to have a lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage. Where there is such a clause there is a strong presumption that to the same extent to which the shipowner obtains a remedy by the lien, he consents to discharge the charterer from liability to action, and also a strong presumption that he does not intend to discharge the charterer from any liability for breaches before loading to which the lien does not extend; and the question, what is the proper construction of the cesser clause tends to become the question, what is the proper construction of the lien clause: (see Francesco v. Massey, L. Rep. 8 Ex. 101; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 594, n.; Kish v. Corry, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 593; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 670; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 553; French v. Gerber; Clink v. Radford.) In the construction of the lien clause for this purpose certain other rules or presumptions have been established. If the charter-party contains a provision for demurrage in the form of giving the charterer a right to detain the ship for a specified number of days beyond the lay days, at an agreed rate per day, either at the loading port or at the port of discharge, or at both, then the lien clause in its ordinary form extends to all demurrage of this kind, as in Francesco v. Massey (L. Rep. 8 Ex. 101). It is equally clear that in such a case it does not extend to mere detention of a kind for which no demurrage rate is fixed. It may be added with regard to a demurrage clause in this form, that if the charter-party specifies a number of days for loading, and also a number of days for discharging, and then a number of days on demurrage, this provision for demurrage has been held to refer to both ports (see Kish v. Corry), as it was so assumed in Francesco v. Massey. If the charter-party contains no provision for a fixed number of demurrage days in the first form, but contains a provision for demurrage in the form of fixing a demurrage rate, i.e. an agreed rate of payment for detention at one or both ports, without any express limit, then the lien extends to this kind of demurrage, and not to any other damages for detention, and the cesser clause consequently is construed to exempt the charterer from liability for that demurrage, but not from liability for unliquidated damages for detention at the loading port. This appears to be clearly settled by Lockhart v. Falk (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 132); French v. Gerber; Sanguinetti v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 658; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300; 2 Q. B. Div. 238); Gardiner v. Macfarlane (26 Sc. L. Rep. 492); Clink v. Radford, notwithstanding expressions to the contrary effect in Kish v. Corry and in Sanguinetti's case, and in the Restitution Steamship Company v. Pirie (61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 330; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 11, n.; and see note 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491). If, as in Kish v. Corry, the charter-party contains a demurrage clause in the first provision specifying a number of days, and also a provision for a demurrage rate for further detention at the loading port without limit of time, it does not appear to be clear whether the lien and cesser clauses will be held to extend to the latter: (see the judgment of Brett, L.J. in Sanguinetti v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company.) The facts in Kish v. Corry did not raise this question. If the charter-party contains no clause expressly providing for demurrage in either form, it has not yet been definitely settled whether the word "demurrage" in the lien clause extends to the liability to unliquidated damages for detention at the port of loading. In Bannister v. Breslauer the court thought that it does so on the ground that otherwise no effect would be given to the word "demurrage;" but this view has been questioned, especially by the present Master of the Rolls. As it is pointed out in Gray v. Carr, from the mere existence of a general word in a general printed form of a mercantile document, which is intended to be filled in or modified as the particular transaction requires, it is not necessarily to be implied that any effect must be given to that word. The proper construction may be to read in after such a word the qualification "if any," which, in the present case, is used and may be construed to refer to demurrage as well as to average.

It remains to apply these rules to the present case. The cesser clause is free from ambiguity as regards liabilities which might be incurred after the completion of the loading. As to all these there is a complete exemption of the charterer, even in respect of unliquidated damages for which no lien is given to the shipowner: (French v. Gerber, ubi sup.) But, as regards liabilities accrued before completion of loading, the cesser clause is ambiguous, and if it stood alone, the presumption would be that it does not deprive the shipowner of his accrued right of action against the charterer for unliquidated damages for detention before a sufficient cargo was loaded. But there is a lien clause for demurrage, and also a clause for payment of a demurrage rate in the second form. The lien clause, therefore, extends to this demurrage, and the presumption against the application of the cesser clause is therefore reversed, and the charterer is to be held exempt from any liability for such detention as is governed by this demurrage in lien clauses, and the only question is whether the demurrage clause does extend to detention at the port of loading. Lockhart v. Falk seems to be an express authority that it does not, and that case was cited and not disapproved in the Exchequer Chamber in Kish v. Corry and in Sanguinetti's case, and was approved and followed by the Appellate Court in Scotland in Gardiner v. Macfarlane, and was approved by Bowen, L.J. in Clink v. Radford. The only distinction between Lockhart v. Falk and the present case is, that in Lockhart v. Falk a specified number of lay days was allowed for discharge, whereas in the present case the stipulation is that the ship is to be discharged at the average rate of not less than 100 tons per working day. Whether for all purposes the two provisions are equivalent need not be determined. In Sanguinetti v. The Pacific Steam Navigation Company Mellish L.J. and Brett, L.J., do not seem to have entirely agreed on a similar question. But for the present purpose there does not appear to be any sufficient ground of distinction. When the loading is complete it is a simple matter of computation to find the number of days. The result therefore is, that in relation to the port of discharge there is in effect a specified number of days to which the demurrage rate is easily applicable, so that all concerned can know without difficulty the amount for which the lien attaches; whereas in relation to the loading port there is no similar definition, and it might be impossible to ascertain the amount for which a lien could be claimed on the cargo without an inquiry into the usages, appliances, and accommodation of the loading port, and all the circumstances on which the question of due diligence in loading or the amount of damages may depend. In Gardiner v. Macfarlane the damages claimed included damages for the fouling of the ship's bottom during the detention at the loading port, and, as is pointed out by the present Master of the Rolls in Gray v. Carr, at page 542, the negotiability of bills of lading would be seriously affected if their value depended upon liabilities of such a kind. There is therefore a strong practical reason for holding that the lien was not intended to be given for detention at the loading port, and for arguing back to the conclusion that the demurrage rate was not intended to apply to such detention. In one respect the facts in Lockhart v. Falk were less favourable to the shipowner's claim against the charterer than the facts in the present case. In Lockhart v. Falk it was proved at the trial that there was a customary rate of loading at the loading port, and therefore the force of the consideration last mentioned was less than in this case. The plaintiffs are entitled to maintain this action against the defendants for such damages as they can prove without reference to the demurrage rate, which is agreed only with reference to the port of discharge.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Feb. 23.—Bigham, Q.C. and Carver for the defendants.—The cesser clause protects the defendants in this action because the lien for demurrage, with which it is co-extensive, is applicable to delay at the port of loading. Demurrage in this charter-party at the port of discharge is used in the sense of damages for detention, because there is no specific time agreed to be allowed for unloading. There is no reason why this should not apply to the port of loading, as well as to the port of discharge. Lockhart v. Falk (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 132) has no application here, as the words of the charter-party were different there from what we have in this case. If it is not distinguishable, it is submitted that it was wrongly decided, and should be overruled. In that case it was held that the demurrage rate clause only applied to the port of discharge, that the lien for demurrage was not applicable to detention at the port of loading, and that consequently the cesser clause did not apply to such detention; the case has been approved only in respect of the two latter propositions and only in two cases:

Clink v. Radford and Co., 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 10; 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491; (1891) 1 Q. B. 625;
Gardiner v. Macfarlane, 16 Court Sess. Cas. 4th series, 658.

The first proposition has never been approved, and that is the only one that is really in the defendants' way in this case.

Gorell Barnes, Q.C. and Leek, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—If this were the first time I had to construe such a clause in a charter-party as we have now before us, I should construe it just in the same way as I am now going to construe it, when the meaning of the phrases we have to determine has been already settled by previous decisions. It is a wholesome, and I think necessary, rule to be observed in business affairs that when a document has been in daily use by all mercantile people in, nearly always, the same form, the court, in construing it, ought not to break away from what it has laid down in previous decisions, even though it would prefer to take a different view, because all similar documents, made since the first decision, have been made on the faith of the law then laid down. If the court were to vacillate in its construction of such documents, there would be no firmness in mercantile transactions. That is a doctrine that has often been laid down, and if in such a case as I have mentioned a decision has been many years ago given in a Superior Court, then the Court of Appeal will decline to overrule it, even though it may be of opinion that, if the question were then being raised for the first time, it would differ from the view that had been taken. If, then, Lockhart v. Falk (ubi sup.) is like the present case, and is not distinguishable from it, and even though we should have decided differently if the question were now before us for the first time, yet we ought not to overrule that decision. Let us now consider that case. The first phrase for us to construe now is "to be loaded as customary," and in Lockhart v. Falk the ship was to be loaded "in the customary manner." The court in that case held that the phrase had no application at all to any question about demurrage, and that it referred only to the manner of loading. That was held after the decision in Lawson v. Burness (1 H. & C. 396) had been cited to the court. In that case Pollock, C.B., at page 400, says: "By the charter-party the vessel was to load in the customary manner a cargo of Marley Hill coke, and in regular turn. It appears to me that the words 'customary manner' mean the mode of loading, whether by a lighter or at the wharf, and whatever was the customary manner was to be pursued on this occasion." The phrase does not apply therefore to the time to be taken in loading, nor to the penalty for not loading in a given time, but only to the manner of loading. If the vessel loaded in the customary manner, though she took an unreasonable time over it, there would be no breach of the agreement contained in that clause. There being then a contract to load, but no time fixed for the loading, a contract to load in a reasonable time is implied, and it is implied not from the words "in the customary manner," but simply from the agreement to load. Then, if the ship be not loaded in a reasonable time, damages may be obtained for this breach of contract. No amount has been fixed, so that the damages are at large, depending on what injury has been caused to the owner by the breach. Now, can such damages have anything to do with demurrage for which a lien will attach? When there is a lien, the person affected by it ought to be able to know how much money he must pay if he wishes to get rid of the lien; if he does not know he cannot get rid of the lien. That is one reason why damages for breach of agreement to load within a reasonable time cannot be brought within the term "demurrage." If there were in the charter-party only this stipulation as to loading, and the agreement for lien for demurrage, and nothing else to support such a lien, then possibly—I do not say it would be so—possibly the court might be obliged to say that the lien must attach to these damages at large, because there would be nothing else to which it could attach. But when there is something in the charter-party to which it can attach, as is the case here, it cannot be a proper mode of construction to make the lien attach to that which is not a proper subject of lien when there is a proper subject to which it can attach. Notwithstanding the criticism of Lockhart v. Falk (ubi sup.) I have no doubt of the correctness of that decision, and that case and Clink v. Radford and Co. (ubi sup.) seem to me to lay down what I have just said as a general rule of construction to be applied to charter-parties upon this point. In Clink v. Radford and Co (ubi sup.) it was clearer than it is here that the penalty or demurrage clause applied only to the port of discharge; but the decision in that case was intended to lay down a general rule of construction, that when there is a stipulation which gives a penalty or payment in the nature of demurrage at the port of discharge, but there is no such stipulation with regard to the port of loading, then the lien for demurrage clause applies only in the first case and not in the second, and that a cesser clause is to be taken if possible as co-extensive with the lien for demurrage. The reason of that is explained by the usual course of business matters; the charterers having control of the loading, it would only be natural that the cesser clause should not be intended to apply to their liability in respect of acts done only by them. At the port of discharge there is quite a different state of things. There the ship is generally unloaded by the owner in company with the consignee, as the cargo is very seldom received by the charterer; and, as it is received by persons over whom the charterer has no control, it is natural that he should put into the charter-party a clause providing for a cesser of his liability, so that a delay in unloading should give the owner a lien on the cargo instead of his having a claim against the charterer. Therefore from a business point of view, and from the meaning which we must give to the words of the contract, it is clear that a breach of an implied contract to load within a reasonable time is not a subject-matter for lien for demurrage. The cesser clause applies only to delay at the port of discharge, and does not protect the defendants, and we must therefore dismiss this appeal.

Fry, L.J.—The question which we have now to decide arises on a clause in a charter-party providing for a cesser of the liability of the charterer and creating a lien for demurrage in favour of the shipowner. The charter-party must be construed, if possible, so as to make the application of the cesser clause and the lien clause co-extensive, and the question is whether the lien clause applies to unreasonable detention at the port of loading. The latter part of the clause we have to consider divides itself into two parts. The first refers to the loading of the ship, which is to be "as customary," and that clearly means the same as "in the customary manner." There is no provision in the clause as to the time within which the vessel is to be loaded, and though in most cases such a provision is intentionally not made, yet here the intention is clearer than usual, because the provision as to loading is immediately followed by provisions as to unloading, containing words limiting the time for such unloading. It is clear, therefore, that the agreement that the loading shall be "as customary" must refer only to the manner of loading. Then, as no time is mentioned, a reasonable time must be implied in the contract. The clause as to discharge stipulates for the time of the unloading in this way: that the discharge shall begin from the time the ship is in berth and ready to discharge, and notice thereof given by the master in writing, and shall be at the average rate of not less than 100 tons per working day. Therefore, the time by which the unloading shall be completed is fully fixed. To my mind, demurrage is a term more easily applicable to a delay after a time that has been expressly fixed than to a delay after a time which is only implied as reasonable. That is the proper meaning of the word, and it is not applicable to delay after a reasonable time, unless there are words in the charter-party showing it to be used there in that sense. That, I think, is what was held in Lockhart v. Falk (ubi sup.). If so, the words as to demurrage in this charter-party relate only to the port of discharge. Now against that it is urged, first, that this case and Lockhart v. Falk are different, because the words in the two charter-parties are different. It is true that the time for discharge in that case was fixed at ten working days, while in the present case the time is fixed by providing that the discharge shall be at the average rate of not less than 100 tons per working day; but that distinction is entirely immaterial. Then it is said, secondly, that the position of the clauses as to loading and discharging are different in the two charter-parties; in one case they are separated, but in the other they are dealt with in the same clause. That difference also appears to me immaterial. I think that the principle of construction which was applied in Lockhart v. Falk applies here also. Then it is said that Lockhart v. Falk was wrongly decided, but for the reasons I have given I think it was rightly decided. So that, both on authority and principle I think that the judgment of the Divisional Court was right, and that we must dismiss this appeal.

Lopes, L.J.—If I were considering this charter-party, unassisted by authority, I should come to the conclusion that the clause giving a lien for demurrage applies only to delay at the port of discharge and not at the port of loading. The authorities favour that view, and I cannot distinguish Lockhart v. Falk (ubi sup.) from the present case. Then it is said that the decision in that case is wrong; but I agree with the Master of the Rolls and Fry, L.J. that the case was well decided; and further, it would be a strong thing to overrule it after it has stood for sixteen years. I will only add this, that not only is this construction of the contract favoured by the authorities, but also by a business view of the matter. The appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Demurrage—Cargo to be delivered "as customary"—Discharge to be "with all despatch as customary"—Custom of port for dock company to discharge—Strike of dock labourers—Non-liability of charterers.

By a charter-party it was agreed that the ship should deliver her cargo at a certain port as customary, and that the discharge should be "with all despatch as customary and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days at 6d. per net register ton per day." According to the custom of the port, the discharge was carried out by the dock company, and it was delayed for four days in consequence of a strike among the dock labourers. In an action by the shipowners against the charterers for damages for this delay:

Held, that no definite time was fixed by the charter-party for the unloading to take place in, and that therefore a reasonable time under the circumstances should be allowed, and that the delay was a circumstance which arose out of the application of a custom of the port, and that the charterers were not liable.

Judgment of Wright, J. (reported 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 755; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 108; (1892) 1 Q. B. 54) reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Wright, J., sitting without a jury, which is reported in 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 755; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 108; (1892) 1 Q. B. 54.

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Castlegate against the charterers for damages for delay in the discharge of her cargo at Garston Docks in Nov. and Dec. 1890.

By a charter-party, dated the 18th Oct. 1890 it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants that the Castlegate should load a full and complete cargo of sleepers at Riga, and should therewith

Proceed to Garston and deliver the same as customary

on being paid freight . . . the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes, rulers, or people, and the consequences of hostilities, loss, or damage from fire on board in hulk or craft or on shore, collisions, any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilot, master, or crew in navigation of the ship, and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and rivers, and of navigation of whatever nature or kind excepted, subject to the regulations of the ports, and weather and ice permitting, and to the navigation being officially declared open, the cargo to be supplied alongside as fast as the steamer can take it in, Sundays and legal holidays excepted, and to be discharged with all despatch as customary, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days, at 6d. per net register ton per day. Lay days to count from the day after the vessel is in her proper loading place and discharging berth, and notice in writing duly given, but three days final notice to be given to the shippers of vessel being ready to load. Vessel to discharge in a dock or berth as ordered by charterers or their agents . . . The usual custom of the wood trade of each port to be observed by each party in cases where not specially expressed . . . the act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates and thieves, arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and people, collisions, stranding, and other accidents of navigation excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners.

At the trial it was proved to be a custom at the port of Garston that the discharge of the ship should be carried out entirely by the dock company, and, in consequence of a strike among the dock labourers, a delay of four days was caused in the discharge of the Castlegate.

Wright, J. thereupon gave judgment for the plaintiffs for 114*l.* 2*s.* for this delay.

Kennedy, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the defendants.—Wright, J. has divided cases as to the time in which a ship ought to be unloaded, into three classes. It is submitted that this division is wrong, and that there are only two classes, namely, those in which the charter-party fixes a definite number of days within which the discharge is to take place, and those in which no definite number of days is fixed. In the first of these two classes the charterer is liable for any delay beyond the specified lay days; in the second he is only bound to use reasonable diligence under the circumstances. This is what was laid down by the Master of the Rolls (then Brett. J.) in Nelson v. Dahl in the Court of Appeal, which case was affirmed in the House of Lords:

Nelson v. Dahl, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 367; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 12 Ch. Div. 583.

No definite time is fixed in this charter-party, and a reasonable time is therefore to be allowed for the discharge. The words "as customary," do not refer to the time in which the discharge is to take place, but only to the manner. This has been recently held to be the meaning of these words:

Dunlop and Sons v. Balfour, Williamson, and Co., ante, p. 181; 66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 455; (1892) 1 Q. B. 507.

Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599;
Good and Co. v. Isaacs and Sons, 92 L. T. 410; W. N. 1892, p. 64.

If it is held that the discharge is to take place within the customary time for a discharge, then the circumstances of the case will not be taken into consideration. Customary time is said to mean average time, but there is no average time for discharging; ships and their cargoes, and the manner in which the discharge takes place, are so various that it would be impossible to say what average time would mean. Gorell Barnes, Q.C. and Pickford for the plaintiffs.—This charter-party has fixed a definite time within which the discharge was to take place, and in such a case whatever be the cause of the delay, the charterers are liable. In Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) there was nothing to show that a definite time was intended to be fixed. In this case there is a provision in the earlier part of the charter-party that the cargo should be delivered "as customary," which means in the customary manner. Then follows an agreement for the delivery "with all despatch as customary." The two last words would be useless if they are construed to mean "in the customary manner," because that has been already provided for as above. The only way in which those two words can be construed so as to give them some force is by making them refer to the despatch, so that the discharge is to be carried out with the customary despatch at that port. There is no difficulty in finding out what would be the usual time at Garston required for the discharge of such a vessel as this. Another clause showing that a definite time was intended to be fixed is the clause for demurrage days "over and above the said lying days." That clause must mean that the previous words have fixed the number of lay days. They cited

Ford v. Cotesworth, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 468; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 544.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The question in this case turns entirely on the true construction of the charter-party. If a definite time is there fixed, either expressly or by necessary implication, within which the discharge of the cargo must take place, the charterers must pay damages if the ship is for any reason detained for the discharge beyond that time. The question, therefore, is whether the charter-party fixes a definite time. Now, the meaning of such an expression as we have here, "to be discharged with all despatch as customary," when taken by itself, has been determined by many cases. In Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.), in the House of Lords, the words were "to be discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port," and it seems to me that "as customary" is exactly equivalent to "according to the custom of the port." So that, unless there is something else in this charter-party which alters the construction of these words, "as customary" must refer to the manner, and not to the time, of discharge. Two matters were relied upon to distinguish this case from Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.). The first was that the clause continues, "and ten days on demurrage, over and above the said lying days," and this, it was contended, shows that the charter-party fixed a definite time for the discharge. It has often been held that there cannot be demurrage days in the proper sense of the term, unless there is a fixed number of lay days, and in this charter-party there is no fixed number of lay days. Therefore, the demurrage specified is to commence after the time when the cargo ought to be discharged as customary if all despatch were used. The second matter relied on was the provision that the ship, after loading a cargo of deals, should proceed to Garston "and deliver the same as customary." It was argued that the words "as customary" in the later part of the charter-party must be construed differently from what they must mean in the earlier part, but I cannot see why that should be so. Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) seems to me to show that no definite time is fixed by this charter-party for the discharge of the cargo, and I adhere to what I said in that case in the Court of Appeal (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. at p. 605; 4 Ex. Div. at p. 164), which appears to have been affirmed by the House of Lords. I said that the clause in the charter-party in that case "seems to mean that the ship was to be discharged with all such despatch as was consistent with the manner and process wherewith every vessel going to that port is discharged." Therefore, as no definite time is fixed by this charter-party for the discharge of the cargo, it must be discharged within a reasonable time under the circumstances. The only circumstances which could be considered were, it was argued, those which were the ordinary result of the ship's being discharged according to the custom of the port. The cases seem to me to show that regard must be had to the actual circumstances under which the discharge took place, but if the only circumstances to be considered are those which arise out of the application of the custom of the port, then I think that this strike was such a circumstance. By the custom of the port the ship had to be discharged by the dock company, and the delay was caused by a strike among the men employed by the dock company. Therefore, it was by reason of the application of the custom of the port that the delay happened. So that, either way, the discharge took place with reasonable despatch under the circumstances, and the defendants are not liable in respect of the delay. The case of Good and Co. v. Isaacs and Sons (ubi sup.) appears to me to agree exactly with Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.). There the ship was to be discharged "at usual fruit berth as fast as steamer can deliver as customary," and it was held that the obligation to unload did not commence until she was berthed in a usual fruit berth, and that, when so berthed, she was to be discharged as fast as the steamer could deliver in the customary manner. The present case appears to me to be in one respect a stronger case than either Postlethwaite v. Freeland or Good and Co. v. Isaacs and Sons. In the ordinary course the discharge of a ship is the joint act of the shipowners and the charterers, the shipowners doing their part of the work by their crew. By the custom of this port, the dock company are put in the position of these two parties, and by reason of the strike the share of the work for which the shipowners would ordinarily be responsible was delayed, as well as the share for which the charterers would ordinarily be responsible. Under these circumstances, no definite time for the discharge being fixed, it seems to me impossible to say that the charterers ought to bear the whole burden of what has happened. If the shipowners had had to do their part of the work by their own people the result might have been the same, but the case is stronger where the same people do both the shipowner's and the charterer's share of the work, and a strike prevents both shares from being done. For these reasons I cannot agree with the decision of the learned judge in the court below, and I think that this appeal must be allowed.

Fry, L.J.—I agree. The question here arises on the construction of the words "to be discharged with all despatch as customary" in this charter-party. In Dunlop and Sons v. Balfour, Williamson, and Co. (ubi sup.), and in other cases, it has been held that in such expressions as these the words "as customary" mean the same as "in the customary manner." They, therefore, refer primarily to the manner of the discharge, and only secondarily to the time, because the customary manner may be one which expedites or delays the discharge of the cargo. I read the words as meaning that the discharge is to take place "in the customary manner and with all reasonable despatch," reasonable, that is to say, having regard to the actual circumstances of the case, the custom of the port being one such circumstance. That, I think, is shown by the decision in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) in the House of Lords to be the meaning of the words if they are taken unqualified by other words. But it is said that that case does not apply to the present, because there is a stipulation in the earlier part of the charter-party for delivery of the cargo "as customary," and it is argued that these words ought to have a different meaning in the later part of the document. I am of opinion that primâ facie we should treat the same words as meaning the same thing. It was also argued that the clause which provides for demurrage days "over and above the said lying days," fixes a definite number of days for the discharge. I do not agree with that argument. No lay days are really fixed by this charter-party. No definite time is fixed either expressly or by clear implication; "the said lying days" must be the days occupied by the discharge with all reasonable despatch, having regard to the manner customary at the port. I cannot help observing that the construction we are adopting seems to be the most reasonable in the result, having regard to the facts in this particular case. It does not seem reasonable to suppose that the charterers intended to make themselves liable for a delay in the discharge of the cargo beyond a particular time, although the delay might arise from a circumstance which prevented the shipowner's share of the work from being done—in other words, that they intended to make themselves liable for a delay which affected the shipowners as much as themselves.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question really depends upon whether certain words used in the charter-party do or do not fix a definite time for the discharge of the cargo. I adhere to what I said in the case of Budgett v. Binnington (ubi sup.) as to the essential difference between cases where a specific time is allowed for loading and unloading, and cases where the lay days are not defined. The words used in this charter-party, "to be discharged with all despatch as customary," do not define the time within which the discharge is to take place. The words are almost identical with those used in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) which were "to be discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port." In that case Lord Selborne, L.C. in giving judgment said: "There is no doubt that the duty of providing and making proper use of sufficient means for the discharge of cargo, when a ship which has been chartered arrives at its destination and is ready to discharge, lies generally upon the charterer. If, by the terms of the charter-party, he has agreed to discharge it within a fixed period of time, that is an absolute and unconditional engagement, for the non-performance of which he is answerable, whatever may be the nature of the impediments which prevent him from performing it, and which causes the ship to be detained in his service beyond the time stipulated. If, on the other hand, there is no fixed time, the law implies an agreement on his part to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time—that is, as was said by Blackburn, J. in Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.), 'a reasonable time under the circumstances.' Difficult questions may sometimes arise as to the circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration in determining what time is reasonable. If, as in the present case, an obligation indefinite as to time is qualified or partially defined by express or implied reference to the custom or practice of a particular port, every impediment arising from or out of that custom or practice which the charterer could not have overcome by the use of any reasonable diligence, ought, I think, to be taken into consideration." Applying those words here, what was it that prevented the discharge of the cargo in this case? It was a strike of the dock labourers. By the custom of the port the discharge was made by the dock company, and therefore the impediment to the discharge arose out of the custom or practice of the port. It is to be observed that the custom was for the dock company to do both the shipowner's and the charterer's share of the work of discharging the cargo, so that the strike prevented the shipowner's part of the work from being done, as well as the charterer's. For the reasons I have given I agree that the judgment of Wright, J. must be reversed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Wednesday, Jan. 27, 1892.

(Before Hawkins and Wills, JJ.)

Ismay, Imrie, and Co. (apps.) v. Blake (resp.). (a)

Cattle-carrying vessel—Cleansing and disinfecting of—Loading new general cargo before disinfecting vessel—Parts of vessel not used for carrying cattle—Right to put new cargo on board such parts of vessel before disinfecting vessel—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 74), s. 32, sub-sect. 21—Order in Council, the Animals Order of 1886, clause 100.

An Order in Council—clause 100 of the Animals Order of 1886—made under the powers given by sect. 32, sub-sect. 21, of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1878, required that a vessel used for carrying animals by sea should, after the landing of animals therefrom, and before the taking on board of any other animal or other cargo, be cleansed and disinfected by having all parts of the vessel with which animals or their droppings had come in contact scraped and swept:

Held, that the provisions of this order plainly required that before any new cargo could be put on board any part of the vessel, even those parts which had not been used for carrying cattle, the parts of the vessel with which cattle or their droppings had come in contact must be cleansed and disinfected according to the requirements of the order, and that as the appellants had placed new cargo on board, although on parts of the vessel where no cattle had been carried, before cleansing and disinfecting the vessel, they had been guilty of a breach of the order, and were properly convicted thereof.

Case stated by two justices of the peace for the borough of Bootle, in the county of Lancaster.

On the 10th Sept. 1891 the respondent, William Blake, the inspector of nuisances of the said borough, and an inspector appointed by the local authority under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1878, duly laid an information before a justice of the peace for the borough against the appellants, Messrs. Ismay, Imrie, and Co., of 10, Water-street, in the city of Liverpool. The following is a copy of the information:

The information of William Blake, of Bootle, in the county of Lancaster, inspector of nuisances, taken at Bootle, this 10th day of Sept. 1891, before me the undersigned one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the borough of Bootle, who saith that Messrs. Ismay, Imrie, and Co., of 10, Water-street, in the city of Liverpool, on the 9th and 10th days of Sept., at the borough of Bootle, did unlawfully neglect to cleanse and disinfect the steamship Cufic, belonging to them (the same being a vessel used for carrying animals by sea), after the landing of animals therefrom, and before the taking on board of any other animal or other cargo in contravention of an Order in Council made in pursuance of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1878, and contrary to the statute in such case made and provided.

In accordance with this information the appellants were summoned on the 15th Sept. 1891, and duly appeared by their solicitor. After hearing the parties and the evidence tendered by them, the justices convicted the appellants of the offence charged in the information, and adjudged them to pay the sum of 20*s.* and the sum of 9*s.* for costs, and thereupon the appellants requested the justices to state the present case.

The facts and grounds for the decision of the justices are as follows:

Article 100 of the Order of the Privy Council (3446) made in pursuance of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts 1878 to 1886, and cited as "the Animals Order of 1886," states as follows (coming under the heading disinfection, water traffic):

1. A vessel used for carrying animals by sea or on a canal, river, or inland navigation, shall, after the landing of animals therefrom, and before the taking on board of any other animal or other cargo, be cleansed and disinfected as follows:—(i.) All parts of the vessel with which animals or their droppings have come in contact shall be scraped and swept; then (ii.) the same parts of the vessel shall be thoroughly washed or scrubbed, or scoured with water; then (iii.) the same parts of the vessel shall have applied to them a coating of limewash except that (iv.) the application of limewash shall not be compulsory as regards such parts of the vessel as are used for passengers or crew.

2. The scrapings and sweepings of the vessel shall not be landed unless and until they have been well mixed with quicklime.

3. Except that in the case of a ferry boat or other vessel which makes short and frequent passages across a river, or an arm of the sea or other water, it shall be sufficient if the ferry boat or vessel be cleansed and disinfected once in every period of twelve hours within which it is so used.

The appellants are the owners of the steamship Cufic, the same being a vessel used for carrying animals by sea. The vessel arrived at Birkenhead on the 6th Sept. 1891, having on board a large number of live cattle which were carried on the upper deck and 'tween decks. There was also a general cargo of about 3000 tons on board, which was stowed in the lower deck or hold. The Cufic is built of steel, and is specially fitted for carrying cattle on two decks, that is on the main or upper deck, and in the 'tween decks; these decks are of steel. Besides these two decks the vessel has below them one other deck, the orlop deck, which is also of steel. The general cargo was carried on the orlop deck and in the lower hold beneath the orlop deck, which portions of the vessel are not fitted for carrying cattle, and cattle were not in fact carried in them on the voyage in question. There are six hatches in each of the three decks, the hatches in each deck being directly above those in the deck below.

The cattle were landed at Birkenhead on the 6th Sept., and the vessel was then brought into dock at Bootle, on the 7th Sept., with the remainder of the cargo still on board, but without having been cleansed or disinfected.

On the 7th and 8th Sept. respectively the vessel was inspected by an inspector appointed by the local authority under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1878, when he found that the appellants by their workmen were clearing away the manure from the vessel, but no new cargo was being taken on board.

The same inspector also inspected the vessel on the 9th and 10th Sept. respectively, when he found that before the parts of the vessel with which animals or their droppings had come in contact had been cleansed and disinfected in the manner directed by the said Order in Council, the appellants were removing the general cargo from the vessel, and were in fact taking on board other general cargo.

It was admitted on behalf of the appellants that general cargo was being taken on board by their servants on the 9th and 10th Sept. respectively, and that such cargo was being stowed on the orlop deck or hold, which had not been used for carrying animals on the previous voyage.

It was also admitted by a witness for the appellants who had charge of the men who were cleaning the upper deck on the 9th and 10th Sept., when the general cargo was being taken on board through the hatchways, that the deck round these hatchways had not been cleansed and disinfected.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that (a) inasmuch as they were taking on board other cargo, and stowing the same only on the orlop deck or hold of the vessel—which deck or hold had not been used for carrying animals on the previous voyage, and which were not parts of the vessel with which animals or their droppings had come in contact—and, notwithstanding the facts admitted herein, there was no offence committed under the said order or otherwise; (b) that the said order required only that no new cargo should be taken on board those parts of the vessel which had been used for carrying animals, and with which the said animals or their droppings had come in contact until such parts of the vessel had been cleansed and disinfected as therein provided.

The appellants also called witnesses to prove that it would be dangerous to remove the old cargo without taking on board new or other cargo to replace the same, inasmuch as the vessel had not sufficient ballast to float safely without cargo, but it was admitted that the vessel might have been cleansed and disinfected without first removing the old cargo, though this course would entail much inconvenience to the owners of the cargo, and loss of time to the owners of the ship. It was further admitted that the said vessel was made fast to the quay in the customary manner.

The justices were of opinion that by the said Order in Council the appellants were prohibited from taking on board any new cargo whatsoever, no matter where the same might have been stowed until the vessel was cleansed and disinfected in the manner thereby provided, and they found as facts that the appellants had so taken cargo on board in contravention of the said order, and they convicted the appellants of the said charge.

The question for the court is whether the appellants upon the evidence could be properly convicted of the offence charged. If so, the conviction is to stand, otherwise the conviction is to be quashed.

Sect. 32 of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 74), gives the Privy Council power to make from time to time such general or special orders as they think fit, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, for the following purposes, or any of them:

21. For prescribing and regulating the cleansing and disinfecting of vessels, vehicles, and pens and other places used for the carrying of animals for hire, or purposes connected therewith.

22. For prescribing modes of cleansing and disinfecting.

The Order in Council in question in this case—called the Animals Order of 1886 (No. 3446)—was made under the powers given by this section, and the material clause—clause 100—is set out in the special case.

Barnes, Q.C. (Joseph Walton with him), for the shipowners, the appellants.—This case raises, and, as I understand, for the first time, a question of considerable importance with regard to the cattle trade: the question whether it is an infringement of the Order in Council, not to take out cargo, but to put cargo into those parts of the ship with which the cattle have nothing to do, until those parts have been cleansed and disinfected. The Order in Council referring to this case is clause 100 of the Animals Order of 1886, and the section in the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1878 which gives the Privy Council authority to make the order is sect. 32, sub-sect. 21, and under this section this order was made. This order does not prohibit the discharge of cargo at all, because it is only to apply "before the taking on board of any other animal or other cargo," and the order refers only to those parts of the vessel which require disinfecting, as we see by the words "scraping and sweeping," which words can only apply to the vessel or those parts of the vessel which are used for carrying cattle. These requisites are confined entirely to those parts of the vessel used for cattle transit. The whole effect of the clause shows that we must read into it the words, "those parts of the vessel which require disinfecting, that is, those parts only with which the cattle or their droppings have come in contact." [HAWKINS, J.—The case finds that disinfecting could have taken place without removing the cargo.] Yes, certainly, but at great inconvenience and loss of time to the owners.

Finlay, Q.C. (T. G. Carver with him) for the respondent.—The appellants' contention is opposed to the plain language and meaning of the order. We do not seek to read any words into the order, as we are satisfied with the order as it stands. If the Privy Council had meant that only the parts of the vessel where cattle or their droppings were should be cleansed and disinfected, then they could very easily have said so. They have not done so, and they have not said so. If the appellants' contention be correct, then it means that you could divide every part of the deck into squares like squares on a chess board, and then say that every square where there were no cattle and no droppings did not require cleansing and disinfecting.

Barnes, Q.C. in reply.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of opinion that this conviction ought to be affirmed. By the 32nd section of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 74) it is thus enacted: "The Privy Council may from time to time make such general or special orders as they think fit, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, for the following purposes, or any of them: (xxi.) For prescribing and regulating the cleansing of vessels, vehicles, and pens and other places used for the carrying of animals for hire, or purposes connected therewith." Now, let us see what the order made under this section is. It is No. 3446, and is in these terms: "A vessel used for carrying animals by sea, or on a canal, river, or inland navigation, shall, after the landing of animals therefrom, and before the taking on board of any other animal or other cargo, be cleansed and disinfected as follows," that is, the vessel is to be disinfected, and to be disinfected in the manner afterwards stated, which is as follows: (1) All parts of the vessel with which animals or their droppings have come in contact shall be scraped and swept; then (2) the same parts of the vessel shall be thoroughly washed, or scrubbed or scoured with water; then (3) the same parts of the vessel shall have applied to them a coating of limewash, and (ii.) the scrapings and sweepings of the vessel shall not be landed unless and until they have been well mixed with quicklime. Leaving out the rest of the disinfecting order, I ask myself this one question, first of all, what is the object of the statute? The object is to give the Privy Council power to prescribe and regulate the disinfecting of vessels for the carrying of animals. It does not follow that every part of the vessel shall be disinfected; but in order to disinfect a vessel it shall be sufficient to do those things which are set out in the sections of the order. By doing these things to these parts of the vessel, the whole vessel shall be disinfected. "The whole vessel is to be disinfected," but this is to be considered to be done if these provisions are followed. That being the way in which a vessel is to be disinfected, let us see what is prohibited, and that is found in sect. 1 of the order: "A vessel used for carrying animals by sea," and "before the taking on board of any other animal or other cargo," shall be cleansed and disinfected. That is, you shall not put on board a vessel which is used for carrying animals any cargo until the vessel has been disinfected in manner provided by sub-sects. 1, 2, 3, and 4 of sect. 1 of the order. I think we ought to read the language of the order according to the ordinary intention and meaning of the words, and I can come to no other conclusion than that the whole vessel must be subject to the disinfecting process described before any new cargo can be placed on board. I think, therefore, that the justices came to a right conclusion, and that this conviction must be upheld.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The words seem to me to be so perfectly plain that I do not feel at liberty to strain them in order to place upon them the interpretation contended for by the appellants. Mr. Barnes argues that we ought to put a construction on the words so that the clause would be read that no new cargo should be put on board "those parts of the vessel which require disinfecting," that is, "those parts only with which the cattle or their droppings have come in contact." To put this construction on the words would be contrary to the plain meaning of the clause.

Conviction upheld. Appeal dismissed.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Saturday, March 12, 1892.

(Before JEUNE, J., assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE LEPANTO. (a)

Salvage—Beneficial services—Agreement—Right to remuneration—Derelict—Abandonment.

Plaintiffs in a salvage action left a vessel ultimately saved by other salvors in a worse position than that in which they picked her up. The Court having found that there was an agreement that the plaintiffs should endeavour to tow her to a place of safety for a remuneration to be fixed on shore.

Held that the plaintiffs, having performed the agreement, although not entitled to salvage, were entitled to remuneration for what they had done.

Where during the performance of salvage services the master and crew of the salved ship went and remained on board the salving ship which put men on the salved ship to steer her, the Court refused to treat the salved ship as a derelict and award salvage on that basis.

THESE were consolidated salvage actions by the owners, masters, and crews of the steam trawlers Tyne Fisher, Chindwin, and Florence, against the barque Lepanto, her cargo and freight.

The Lepanto, a barque of 862 tons register, laden with a cargo of coal, while on a voyage from South Shields to Genoa, collided in the North Sea about seven or eight miles from Seaham, on the 2nd Jan. 1892, with the steamship Lutetia. Next morning she was taken in tow by the steam trawler Florence, the two masters having agreed that the Florence should receive 80*l*. for towing her to the Tyne. The Lepanto when taken in tow was some six or seven miles east of Hartlepool light, the wind at the time being a strong north-westerly breeze. Towage continued for some hours, but, owing to the increasing strength of the wind and to the Lepanto losing her foremast, which caused a quantity of wreckage to hang over the side, the Florence found it impossible to make a N. N.E. course for the Tyne. The master of the Florence then hailed the barque to that effect, and it was then agreed (as alleged by the plaintiffs) that the Florence should endeavour to tow her to a place of safety, the remuneration to be settled on shore. The Florence then attempted to get the Lepanto into Hartlepool, but, owing to the ropes parting, the barque began to drift to leeward towards the coast near Redcar, and if the Florence had not at considerable risk made fast again, the barque would have got on the rocks. Next day, Jan. 4, the steamship Harraton's services were accepted, but after a short time she went away. At about 3.30 p.m. the Florence, having run short of coals, left for Sunderland, intending, as she said, to get coals and return to the Lepanto. The Lepanto, when left by the Florence, was about nine miles N. E. of Whitby. On the Florence leaving, a steam trawler called the Tyne Fisher, and shortly after the Chindwin, took the Lepanto in tow, and after a difficult towage got her into the Humber between 7 and 8 a.m. on the 8th Jan. During the services of the Tyne Fisher and the Chindwin, the crew of the Lepanto went on board the Tyne Fisher, and some of the salvors went on board the Lepanto to pump and steer her.

The defendants called no evidence. By their defence they admitted that salvage services had been rendered by the Tyne Fisher and Chindwin, but denied that the Florence had rendered salvage services. They also pleaded that the Florence left the Lepanto in a worse position than that in which she was when taken in tow, and that the agreement was that the Florence should tow the Lepanto into South Shields, which agreement she was unable to perform.

The value of the salved property was 1405*l*.

F. Laing for the owners, master, and crew of the Florence.—The Florence conferred beneficial services on the Lepanto. She certainly saved her from going on the rocks near Redcar. [JEUNE, J.—Even if that is so, would she be entitled to salvage for that, if she took her near the rocks and ultimately left her in a worse position than when picked up?] It is submitted, yes. In any event she is entitled to remuneration for carrying out her agreement to attempt to get the Lepanto to a place of safety. The defendants have called no evidence to contradict that agreement:

The Benlarig, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 238; 14 P. Div. 3; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall for the owners, masters, and crews of the Tyne Fisher and Chindwin.—The court should treat the Lepanto as a derelict and award the salvors a moiety of the saved property. The Lepanto had been abandoned by her crew.

Pyke, Q.C. and Butler Aspinall, for the defendants, contrà.—The Florence rendered no beneficial services to the Lepanto, and is therefore entitled to no salvage:

The India, 1 Wm. Rob. 406;
The Edward Hawkins, Lush. 515.

She has failed to establish her alleged agreement to endeavour to save the Lepanto. Something may have been said about her doing her best, but there was no binding agreement that she should be remunerated if unsuccessful. The Lepanto ought not to be treated as a derelict. Her crew, although on board the salvors' vessel, were on the scene all the time.

JEUNE, J.—In this case three claims for salvage, on behalf of the Florence, the Tyne Fisher, and the Chindwin respectively, are made against the Lepanto. The value of the salved property is 1405*l*. The services were rendered to the Lepanto after a collision with the Lutetia, in which she received considerable damage. That collision took place on the 2nd Jan., and after it she seems to have proceeded under sail until she reached a position about seven miles from Hartlepool light, which bore about W. by S. On the morning of the 3rd Jan. the Florence came up, and, after an agreement which I will discuss presently was made, she began to tow her in the direction of South Shields. She towed until about 11 a.m., when the Lepanto's foremast fell and various other misfortunes happened, the result being that in the evening the Lepanto was in dangerous proximity to Redcar, from which she was extricated by the Florence. Next day a steamer called the Harraton came up and helped to tow for a time, but left about 1.30 p.m. The Florence, having run short of coal, also went off about 3.30, by which time the Tyne Fisher had come upon the scene. I will first consider the Florence's services. One has to keep quite clear, first, the claim for salvage per se, and secondly, any claim that may be founded upon an agreement entitling to reward though not on strict salvage principles. Now, is the Florence entitled to salvage award apart from any agreement? To obtain salvage remuneration, two things appear to be clearly necessary: first, that the vessel should be eventually saved, which is the case here; and secondly, that the salvor should have done useful service towards that end. Was such service in this case rendered by the Florence? On this point what we have had to consider is, what was the Lepanto's position when found by the Florence as compared with her position when left by the Florence. On that point I have consulted the Trinity Masters, and they are clearly of opinion, I think I may say strongly of opinion, that the position of the Lepanto when left was, worse, and not better, than her position when found. Something depends, no doubt, upon my decision as to her exact position when left, as to which there is a conflict of evidence between the Florence and the Tyne Fisher. On this point we agree with the view of the Tyne Fisher rather than with that of the Florence. We think she was left nearer to the shore than the Florence admits. If that is so, it aggravates the case against the Florence; but I am inclined to think that, even accepting the story told by the Florence, and assuming her story to be true, it seems to us that the Lepanto being left so many miles away from the Tyne and the Tees was in a worse position than when originally picked up. In these circumstances it is impossible to say that the Florence benefited the Lepanto by salvage services, because I do not think I can take into consideration the intermediate service of getting her off Redcar. The reason of the Florence being unable to do better service is very clear. Her power was inadequate, and it was for that reason that her services were not useful to the defendants.

Then comes a further question, and on this I am referred to the case of The Benlarig (ubi sup.), where the circumstances were somewhat similar to the present, and which lays down principles applicable to this case. Was there any agreement, and if so, what was it? There were two agreements. In the first place, there was an agreement which is not very material, as it was rescinded by the substitution of another, an agreement to tow to South Shields for 80*l*. On the pleadings it is stated by the one side that it was an agreement to endeavour to tow, and in the defence that is contradicted, and it is put as an agreement to tow to a definite place. The evidence of the master appeared to me to point rather to an agreement to tow to a specified place, and the fact that the amount of remuneration was fixed seems, though not conclusive, to point to that. I am inclined, if necessary, to decide that it was an agreement to tow to a definite place, and that it was not fulfilled. What was the agreement afterwards? I cannot help thinking that it was a very different thing, and that, when the Florence found that she was unable to accomplish that which she had undertaken, there was an agreement with the Lepanto that she should endeavour to tow her and do the best she could for her, for a price to be fixed ashore. Such an agreement indeed is not denied in the pleadings; and on it I think I am justified in acting, but, in accepting that view of things, I can only accept it as a whole. That involves two consequences: first, that the services before the agreement are services which cannot be brought into account; secondly, that the remuneration cannot be considered at all on the salvage scale, because one of the main reasons why salvage remuneration is so high is, that unless the vessel is saved no remuneration is payable at all. Looking at all these considerations, I think, after consulting with the Trinity Masters, that the utmost we can give the Florence is 75*l*.

As regards the other two vessels, the considerations applying to them are more important as regards the amount, but otherwise much more simple. We have to deal with a vessel which was not derelict and not abandoned. In a certain sense perhaps she was abandoned; that is to say, she was left by her crew, who no doubt were thoroughly worn out, but she was not derelict in the sense that her crew had gone, to leave her to fare as best she might. Though they had left her in a certain sense in the hands of the salvors, they had not left the scene, and she cannot in the circumstances be considered as an abandoned vessel for the purpose of fixing an extreme measure of compensation against her. The services rendered by the Tyne Fisher and the Chindwin appear to us to be highly meritorious; but I do not think that the danger to the Lepanto was so great as has been suggested. Having regard to the direction of the wind, and also to the possibility of her anchoring, the Trinity Masters and I think that the Lepanto was in no very imminent peril of going ashore. She was of course in a position of danger. She had lost her foremast and her ropes were gone, and if she had not been rescued she would have been both in a position of danger to herself and also to navigation. At the same time, she was not in a position of imminent peril. She rode out the storm of the 6th, though none of her crew were on board, and there seems no reason to think that if the Tyne Fisher and Chindwin had not found her some other vessel would have done so, as the place is almost a highway of navigation. Still the services were highly meritorious, well performed under circumstances of considerable danger, and aggravated by the necessity of being obliged to send men on board the Lepanto after she had been left by her crew under circumstances of difficulty and danger. The service was successfully rendered, and the vessel was brought into port. We think, under these circumstances, that the Tyne Fisher and the Chindwin are entitled to a substantial sum, though not so large a sum as they would have been entitled to had the property saved been of much greater value than it is, or had there been imminent peril, or had the Lepanto been in the strict sense of the word abandoned. I award them 500*l*., of which I give 275*l*. to the Tyne Fisher, and 225*l*. to the Chindwin. Under the circumstances of this case I allow the Florence the cost of being represented by one counsel.

THE ROBIN. (a)

Costs—Higher scale—Damage—Ord. LXV., r. 9.

In an action against a port authority for damage to a ship owing to the alleged improper condition of the bed of the harbour, where a number of scientific witnesses were called to speak to the condition of the harbour and the strength of the ship, and several plans were used for such purpose, the Court, having given judgment for the plaintiffs, made an order for costs on the higher scale.

THIS was an action by the owners of the steamship Robin against the port authority of the harbour of Preston, to recover damages for injuries occasioned to the Robin, owing to the defendants not keeping the bed of the harbour in a proper state for her to ground on.

The defendants, among other defences, pleaded that the alleged damage was due to the inherent weakness and unfitness of the Robin to take the ground.

The trial extended over four days. Both sides called a large number of scientific witnesses to speak to the condition of the harbour and to the strength of the ship.

In the result the plaintiffs obtained judgment, the court holding that the damage was occasioned by a ridge in the bed of the harbour.

The plaintiffs asked for costs on the higher scale.

Order LXV., r. 9:

The fees set forth in the column headed "Higher scale" in Appendix N. may be allowed either generally in any cause or matter, or as to the costs of any particular application made or business done in any cause or matter, if on special grounds arising out of the nature and importance or the difficulty or urgency of the case the court or a judge shall at the trial or hearing or further consideration of the cause or matter, or at the hearing of any application therein, whether the cause or matter shall not be brought to trial or hearing, or to further consideration (as the case may be) so order, or if the taxing officer under directions given to him for that purpose by the court or a judge shall think that such allowance ought to be so made upon such special grounds as aforesaid.

Barnes, Q.C. and Joseph Walton, for the plaintiffs, in support of the application, cited

Finlay, Q.C., Sir Walter Phillimore, and F. W. Raikes for the defendants, JEUNE, J.—I shall, in the circumstances of this case, make an order for costs on the higher scale. It is a case of a special nature, and has involved the calling of a number of scientific witnesses and the preparation of plans. It has been presented in a manner which has greatly facilitated its trial.

THE N. STRONG. (a)

Collision—Steamer and sailing ship—Fog—Speed—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 12, 13.

A barque which is in a fog making four knots an hour in a moderate breeze in the English Channel five to six miles S.W. of the Longships, is going at a moderate speed.

A steamer approaching a fog ought, before entering it, to reduce her speed and blow her whistle.

THIS was a collision action by the owners of the barque Eulie against the owners of the steam-tug N. Strong. The defendants counter-claimed.

The collision occurred about 3.45 a.m. on the 12th May 1891 in the English Channel.

The Eulie, a barque of 335 tons register, was shortly before 3.40 a.m. on the 12th May 1891, while on a voyage in ballast from London to Appledore, about five to six miles S.W. of the Longships. The weather was foggy, and there was a light breeze from about E.S.E. to S.E. She was heading N.N.W. under all plain sail, except her mainsail spanker and light sails, and her foghorn was being sounded. In these circumstances those on board the Eulie heard the sound of a propeller, and very shortly afterwards saw the red and then the mast-head light of the screw steam-tug N. Strong about three points on the starboard bow, and distant about two ship's lengths. The Eulie's foghorn was blown three blasts, and the helms of both vessels were ported, but the jibboom of the Eulie struck the funnel of the N. Strong, and the stem of the Eulie then struck the port quarter of the N. Strong.

At the time of the collision the N. Strong had just run into the bank of fog, and had not on approaching it reduced her speed or blown her whistle.

Each vessel (inter alia) charged the other with going too fast in a fog. The learned judge in his judgment deals with this question of speed.

The plaintiffs also charged the defendants with not sounding their steam-whistle.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 12. In fog, mist, or falling snow, whether by day or night, the signals described in this article shall be used as follows; that is to say, (a) a steamship under way shall make with her steam-whistle or other steam sound signal at intervals of not more than two minutes, a prolonged blast.

Art. 13. Every ship, whether a sailing ship or steamship, shall in a fog, mist, or falling snow, go at a moderate speed.

Barnes, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—The N. Strong is alone to blame. The Eulie was going at a moderate speed:

The Elysia, 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 840; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 540.

The N. Strong was going too fast, and ought to have reduced her speed and sounded her whistle before entering the fog.

Pyke, Q.C. and H. G. Farrant, for the defendants, contra.—The Eulie was carrying too much sail, and was going too fast:

The Beta, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 154; 9 P. Div. 134; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 276;

The Dordogne, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 650; 10 P. Div. 6; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 328.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The regulations only require a vessel to whistle and reduce her speed when in a fog. She is not required to do so when approaching it:

The Milanese, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 107; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 318.

JEUNE, J.—One of the main points in this case is the speed of the sailing vessel, and it is a matter upon which I have consulted the Trinity Masters. Her speed is a matter of inference from the facts proved before us. We know, according to her own account, what sails she was carrying, and we quite agree with Mr. Pyke's contention that at least the topgallant sail might have been lowered, which would, according to the mate, have reduced her speed as much as three-quarters of a knot. What then was her speed without that sail being lowered? I am asked to infer that from a certain distance traversed by her in a certain time. Hence the force of the wind and the operation of the tide enter into the calculation. There has been considerable discussion as to the force of the wind, and I have to gather it from the varying statements of the witnesses. We also have the lighthouse reports, to which I attach more importance. Putting all these things together, one is led to suppose that the wind was in force something between three and four. I have also considered the question of tide, with the result that I am going to leave it almost out of account, because its effect with and against the sailing ship work out nearly equal. But, on the whole, the opinion of the Trinity Masters is that the tide would be rather with than against her. Taking the distance which the vessel traversed from a point nine miles off the Lizard to the place of collision, it seems to me that, on the whole, the rate of speed to be attributed to the sailing ship is something about four knots. Now, if that is so, was that too much? The law on the subject is quite clear. A sailing ship is entitled to move at such a rate of speed as will enable her to be kept properly under command; and I agree with and accept the decisions to the effect that what is enough to keep a vessel properly under command varies, and that under some circumstances a vessel may be entitled to go at a higher rate of speed than in others. I agree that, whether the position of the vessel is in the open sea, or in a river like the Thames, or off a difficult coast, is a matter which has to be taken into consideration. This is a matter on which the advice of the Trinity Masters is of great value. I do not profess myself to be able to say at what rate of speed a sailing vessel should go in order to keep well under command; but the Trinity Masters, having considered the matter, tell me that if the speed of the barque was about four knots, as I have found it to be, they do not think that any blame attaches to the vessel for that rate of speed. In dealing with this matter I am not taking into consideration the question of the state of the vessel's bottom. No doubt some of the copper was off, but I am not satisfied that that made any material difference. It is true that the tug says that the barque's speed was something like seven or eight knots, but that appears to me to be out of the question.

The other point to be considered is as to the use of the foghorn. I gather from the evidence that the foghorn was blown several times; it may be three, or it may be four or five times. Now, if the tug had only heard one blast so late as to be useless to her, that would be a very important fact in her favour; but the tug never heard any foghorn at all, and therefore she appears to me to be hardly in a position to say that the absence of the foghorn being blown contributed so far as she was concerned to the collision. What I strongly suspect is, that the foghorn was blown perhaps not so soon as it should have been, but within something like four or five minutes before the collision, which would have been in ample time to avert the collision if the tug had heard it at all. Assuming that the fog-horn was blown at some such period, I think that was time enough to indicate to the tug the presence of the barque if those on the tug had heard it. In the result I do not think that the barque can be held to blame. As to the steamer, it is very clear that her speed was excessive. Several indications appear to point conclusively to that. At the time she had stopped seeking, and had set her course for the fishing ground to which she tells us she usually goes at the rate of eight or nine knots, and there seems no reason why she should not have followed her usual practice on this occasion. The blow is also inconsistent with moderate speed on the part of the tug. The tug also admits that when she approached this bank of fog she neither eased nor whistled—an admission which is dangerous; indeed, to my mind, fatal. I agree that it is not an infraction of the regulations which refer in terms only to what is to be done in a fog; but the Trinity Masters are clear that, as a matter of precaution, the tug on approaching this thick bank of fog should have eased and also whistled to give notice of her position to any vessel which the curtain of the fog might be concealing. In these circumstances I come to the conclusion that the N. Strong is alone to blame.

COURT OF APPEAL.

May 21, 27, 28, and July 22, 1892.

THE LONDON ASSOCIATION OF SHIPOWNERS AND BROKERS (LIMITED) AND THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY v. THE LONDON AND INDIA DOCKS JOINT COMMITTEE AND THE LONDON AND ST. KATHARINE DOCK COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Dock company—Bye-laws and regulations—No confirmation—Validity — Ultra vires—Injunction—London and St. Katharine Docks Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii)—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27).

The statutory powers conferred by the Legislature upon dock companies and other bodies created for public purposes, and authorised to acquire land for such purposes, are inserted in order to define—i.e., limit—the rights conferred, and as implying a prohibition against the exercise of more extensive rights which such companies might have by virtue of their ownership of property.

The power of making bye-laws differs from the power which every owner of property has of making agreements with those persons who desire to use it. A bye-law is not an agreement, but a law binding on all persons to whom it applies, whether they agree to be bound by it or not.

All regulations made by a corporate body, and intended to bind not only themselves and their officers and servants, but members of the public who come within the sphere of their operation, may be properly called "bye-laws" whether they be valid or invalid in point of law, for the term "bye-law" is not restricted to that which is valid in point of law.

Under the two statutes—the London and St. Katharine Docks Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxviii) and the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27)—the public have certain rights to use the docks belonging to the London and St. Katharine Dock Company, including the wharfs, quays, and warehouses, and the company are empowered to make bye-laws and regulations and charges for their use; but such regulations and bye-laws are not valid and binding until made, confirmed, and published as bye-laws in the manner prescribed by the Act of 1847.

The plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, alleged that the defendants, the London and St. Katharine Dock Company, were, under certain Acts of Parliament, the owners of certain docks, called in the statement of claim "the defendants' undertaking," and that the defendants, the London and India Docks Joint Committee, were at all material times the responsible managers of the defendants' undertaking; that the London Association of Shipowners and Brokers Limited was a company incorporated under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1890 with the object, amongst others, of protecting shipping and maritime interests, especially in regard to the regulation, management, customs, and usages of the port of London, and of the docks, warehouses, wharves, and Custom-house therein; that the association and all the members thereof were largely interested in ships using the defendants' undertaking, in particular the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company being the owners of a large number of ships habitually using the defendants' undertaking.

The plaintiffs also alleged that in Dec. 1890 the defendants issued certain regulations, dated the 1st Jan. 1891, with which owners of ships using the defendants' undertaking were required to comply, and which applied to all vessels entering the docks of the defendants' undertaking after the 1st Jan. 1891, but that the coming into operation of such regulations was subsequently postponed till the 1st Feb. 1891, when the regulations were put into force against all ships of the plaintiffs using the defendants' undertaking.

The plaintiffs further alleged that the regulations had not been confirmed in manner prescribed by the statutes regulating the defendants' undertaking, and were invalid and void; but that the defendants still required shipowners using their docks to comply with such regulations, and insisted that they were binding upon such shipowners.

The plaintiffs accordingly brought this action against the defendants, claiming (1) a declaration that the regulations of the 1st Jan. 1891 were invalid until confirmed in the manner prescribed by the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847; and (2) an injunction restraining the defendants until such confirmation from enforcing the regulations.

The matter in dispute, which turned on the construction of several Acts of Parliament, arose indirectly out of the dock strike in 1889. For many years it had been the practice of the London dock companies to themselves discharge, by men in their own employment, the cargoes of ships entering the docks. At the time of the strike it was alleged by the shipowners that the work of discharging would be much better done by their own servants, and that the risk of strikes would be thereby diminished, or, at any rate, that the shipowners could deal much more satisfactorily with men employed by themselves. The shipowners, indeed, asserted that, under the provisions of the various statutes relating to the docks, they had a legal right to discharge their own ships. The joint committee of the docks recognised the validity of this claim, and determined to accede to it, and for the purpose of carrying the change into effect they issued the regulations of 1891. To some of the provisions of these regulations the plaintiffs objected, and particularly to the charges and rates thereby imposed, and this led to the present action.

The defendants objected that the plaintiffs' statement of claim disclosed no cause of action, and that the plaintiff association had no locus standi as plaintiffs in the action.

The defendants stated that the regulations contained the terms upon which the defendants were willing to afford certain facilities to owners of ships using the defendants' undertaking, and afforded notice to such owners of such terms, and were not "bye laws" within the meaning of sect. 85 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847.

The plaintiffs moved for an interlocutory injunction until the trial of the action, and the motion came on for hearing before North, J. in Feb. 1891. The learned judge, however, declined to grant an injunction, and he expressed a doubt whether the plaintiff association had any locus standi. His Lordship was satisfied that the damage caused by granting the injunction would be infinitely greater than by refusing it. Therefore, on the balance of convenience and inconvenience, he thought it better to refuse it. His Lordship also expressed his opinion that, whilst there was in the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 power to make bye-laws, the word being "may," there was no compulsion to make bye-laws, and that these were regulations which were not of the character of bye-laws, because there was no penalty for their non-performance; and that if the defendants were making charges which were excessive or unreasonable, the plaintiffs had their remedy. His Lordship did not think that the scope of the Act was to prevent the defendants from making regulations otherwise than by bye-laws, even as to matters with respect to which they had powers to make bye-laws. He did not, therefore, think that there was anything so utterly illegal in the new regulations that the defendants ought to be at once restrained from enforcing them, and he accordingly refused the motion.

On the 20th, 22nd, and 23rd Feb. 1892, the action came on for trial with witnesses before Smith, L.J. (then Smith, J.) sitting for Romer, J.

Sir R. E. Webster (Attorney-General), J. Gorell Barnes, Q.C., Chadwyck-Healey, Q.C., and T. E. Scrutton for the plaintiffs.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., Finlay, Q.C., Neville, Q.C., F. W. Hollams, and G. S. Barnes for the defendants.

Smith, J. in accordance with a previous judgment of North, J. in the same case, gave judgment for the defendants.

From that decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 22.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

Lindley, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Smith, J. dismissing the plaintiffs' action with costs. The object of the action and of the appeal is to obtain a declaration to the effect that a new code of regulations made by the defendants, and dated the 1st Jan. 1892, is invalid and in excess of the defendants' statutory powers. The plaintiffs also seek to obtain an injunction to give effect to such declaration; but their counsel stated that they would be content with a declaration and liberty to apply, and that an injunction was a matter of comparatively small importance. The defendants maintain that their so-called regulations are not, and cannot fairly be taken to be, rules binding on anyone who does not agree to observe them. The defendants further contend that, even if the public have a right to complain of the regulations as made by the defendants in excess of their statutory powers, yet that the plaintiffs do not represent the public, and suffer no special damage, and are not entitled to maintain the action. Such being the general nature of the controversy, it becomes necessary to consider (1) The true nature of the regulations which have given rise to this controvery; (2) The authority of the defendants to make them; (3) Their legality or illegality; (4) The position of the plaintiffs and their right to maintain an action in respect of them. 1. As to the nature of the regulations themselves. They are contained in a pamphlet. I will not stop to read that pamphlet; most of it is important. The title page is this: "London and India Docks Joint Committee. Rates on Shipping;" then follow "Using the (various) docks;" then "The attention of captains of vessels is especially directed to the regulations regarding fires, lights, and smoking, as well as to the penalty for any breach thereof." Then follow five pages headed "Dues and Rent on Shipping." Then come a number of paragraphs headed "Discharge of Vessels," and numbered 1 to 18; some of these impose rates and charges, others do not. These eighteen paragraphs are followed by some more paragraphs with various headings and imposing charges. Then come some regulations headed "Labour in Docks." Then come these words: "Under authority given by Acts of Parliament the schedule of rates is subject to revision from time to time." Last of all there are printed in large letters "By order, Dock House, 109, Leadenhall-street, E.C." It is impossible to read this new code, and especially the paragraphs 1 to 18, without coming to the conclusion that the defendants who issued the code intended its contents to be understood, and that those who would read them would understand them, or the bulk of them, at any rate, as rules or orders to be obeyed, and as imposing charges which must be paid apart from any agreement to that effect. No one reading the code would regard the regulations and charges simply as terms offered for acceptance by those who might use the docks to which the code relates. There is nothing optional in the wording of paragraph No. 1, "Shipowners will be required to comply with the following regulations, &c., &c.," and the same imperative tone runs through the whole. I am not now discussing the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the regulations or of the charges; their character in that respect does not affect their authoritative tone. I cannot regard them as anything short of rules or orders and charges emanating from, and imposed by, the defendants, and made by them in the exercise of some authority claimed by them under their statutory powers. 2. I pass, therefore, to the consideration of the authority of the defendants to make such regulations and charges. The defendants, the London and St. Katharine Dock Company, are merely the owners of the docks. The regulations and charges are made and imposed by the defendants, the London and India Docks Joint Committee. This joint committee is a corporate body created by the London and St. Katharine, and East and West India Docks Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. clxiii.) for the purpose of working eight large docks in London as one undertaking (see the preamble and sects. 4, 9, and 10). The powers of the joint committee are enumerated in sect. 31, and are shortly the same as those which were previously vested in the London and St. Katharine Dock Company and the East and West India Dock Company respectively. These dock companies were, and indeed continue to be, the owners of the docks alluded to, some of the docks belonging to one company and some to the other. The dock which is more particularly in question in this action is the Royal Albert Dock, belonging to the London and St. Katharine Dock Company. Whatever regulations this company could have made for the use of that dock can now be made by the joint committee. Sect. 57 authorises the defendants to make the same tonnage rates on vessels using the docks of the London and St. Katharine Dock Company as the East and West India Dock Company were empowered by sect. 25 of their Act of 1882 to make. The power of the defendants to make regulations for the use of the Royal Albert Dock and of the other docks belonging to the London and St. Katharine Dock Company must be sought for in that company's special Act of 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii.), and in the General Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 27), which is incorporated in it. Under these two Acts the public have certain rights to use the docks, including the wharfs, quays, and warehouses, and the company are empowered to make bye-laws and regulations and charges for their use. The rights of the public to use the docks, including the wharfs, quays, and warehouses, all of which, it must be borne in mind, belong to the company, are conferred by sects. 2 and 33 of the general Act. Sect. 2 is the definition clause, and by it the "expression harbour, dock, or pier means the works connected therewith by the special Act authorised to be constructed." These works, I apprehend, include the quays, wharfs, and warehouses, all of which are constructed under the powers of the special Acts, and are essential to the use of the harbours, docks, and piers more especially mentioned in them. This was certainly the case with the warehouses constructed under the powers of the Victoria (London) Docks Act 1853 (see 16 & 17 Vict. c. cxxxi.), sect. 28, which is set out in the 4th schedule to the special Act 1864 (page 2396 of the Queen's printers' copy). Moreover, the expressions "the London Docks," "the St. Katharine Docks," and the "Victoria Docks," are expressly declared by the 5th section of the special Act 1864 to mean and to include (inter alia) warehouses, wharfs, and quays; and it is very difficult to read that Act and the general Act together without attributing the same meaning to the word docks which constantly occurs in both. Sect. 33 of the general Act of 1847 entitles the public to use the harbour, dock, and pier as defined in sect. 2 for shipping and unshipping goods and embarking and landing passengers; but this right of user is subject to the payment of the rates made payable by the general and special Acts, and is subject to the other provisions thereof, i.e., of both Acts. These other provisions include those specially relating to warehouses as well as those relating to bye-laws and regulations, all of which will be examined presently. The special Act is silent as regards the rights of the public, except that by certain former Acts referred to in schedule 4, and not repealed, the docks of the company are to be deemed to be situate in and part of the port of London, and that the rights and privileges which belong to that port extend to these docks; and the company's quays and wharfs are made legal quays and wharfs within the same port: (see 9 Geo. 4, c. cxvi., sects. 112, 113, page 2368; 6 Geo. 4, c. cv., sects. 92, 93, page 2389; 16 & 17 Vict. c. cxxxi., sect. 49, page 2397.) The powers of the company to regulate the use of the docks, quays, and warehouses and to make charges for their use depend partly on the fact that the company is the owner of them and partly on the fact that the company's rights as owner are largely governed by special provisions rendered necessary for the protection of the public. Subject, however, to the restrictions expressly or impliedly imposed by statute, the company can exercise the ordinary rights which are incidental to the ownership of their docks, quays, and warehouses. As owner the company could make any regulations it might think proper for the use of its property. It could charge what it liked, and could shut its docks altogether if people would not comply with its demands. These powers, however, are not unchecked by statute. The Legislature has expressly conferred upon the company many powers which the company as the owner of property could have exercised without any express statutory authority. Whenever this is the case, the powers expressly given must be treated either as superfluous or as purposely inserted in order to define—i.e., limit—the right conferred, and as implying a prohibition against the exercise of the more extensive rights which the company might have by virtue of its ownership of property. That the latter is the true mode of regarding statutory powers conferred on bodies created for public purposes, and authorised to acquire land for such purposes, cannot, I think, admit of any doubt.

Bearing this observation in mind, let us see what powers are expressly conferred upon the company by statute. It will be found necessary to distinguish the power of imposing rates and charges from the power to make regulations or bye-laws, and it will be convenient to consider the last power first. The general Act of 1847 expressly enables the company to lease for not more than three years, or grant the use or occupation of its warehouses, buildings, wharves, yards, cranes, machines, and other conveniences, on such terms as shall be agreed upon between the company and the persons taking the same (sect. 23). This section is a clear instance, not of an enabling, but of a restrictive clause. It is necessary, not to enable the company to make agreements with respect to the use of its own property, but to enable it to derogate from the rights which the public would otherwise have over that property. Sect. 23 limits the rights which the public could otherwise claim under sect. 33, and enables the company to set apart for the exclusive use of an individual part of the property which the public would otherwise have a right to use. The power conferred by sect. 23 cannot, however, be properly used to force any person to come to terms with the company for the use of any property which the public has a right to use on terms applicable to all persons alike. The clauses relating to the powers of the harbour master, and various offences by persons using the docks, &c., may be passed over as irrelevant to the present inquiry. Sect. 83 enables the company to make bye-laws under its common seal for a great variety of purposes, which may be summarised as for the use of its docks and property. Penalties may or may not be imposed for infringment of the bye-laws (sect. 84), but no bye-laws (except such as relate solely to the company or their officers or servants) have effect unless confirmed as required by sect. 85. Moreover, notices have to be given before they are confirmed (sects. 86, 87), and when confirmed they have to be published as directed by the Act (sect. 88). When duly made, confirmed, and published, the bye-laws become binding on all parties (sect. 89), and they can only be altered by other bye-laws similarly made and confirmed. This power of making bye-laws is something very different from the power which every owner of property has of making agreements with those persons who may desire to use it. A bye-law is not an agreement, but a law binding on all persons to whom it applies, whether they agree to be bound by it or not. All regulations made by a corporate body, and intended to bind not only themselves and their officers and servants, but members of the public who come within the sphere of their operation, may be properly called "bye-laws," whether they be valid or invalid in point of law, for the term "bye-law" is not restricted to that which is valid in point of law. The exception in sects. 83 and 85 warrants the use of the word bye-law in the sense of a regulation binding only on the company, its officers and servants; but these same sections show that a bye-law in this more limited sense can be made and unmade at the will of the company, and requires no confirmation and publication. This double use of the word bye-law is apt to create confusion, and is perhaps to be accounted for by a desire to make use of one term for all regulations for a breach of which penalties may be imposed under sect. 84. The company's special Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii.) also contains a power to make bye-laws (see sect. 113). This is a more detailed power than that conferred by the general Act, and relates not only to the use of the docks, but also to the management and conduct of the business and affairs of the company, to the management of its warehouses, and various other matters for which, however, fresh power was hardly necessary, considering that the general Act was incorporated in the special Act. The special Act is silent as to the mode of making bye-laws; they must therefore be made as directed by the general Act. Sect. 99 of the special Act directs the company, in accordance with and subject to its regulations in that behalf, to afford to merchants and others entitled to or having charge of any goods deposited in or upon any of the warehouses, sheds, wharfs, quays, or premises of the company proper and sufficient access to the goods so deposited. The use of the word regulations in this section is perplexing. The bye-law section enables the company to make bye-laws to the same effect as any regulations which can be made under this section, and I am by no means clear that by regulations in sect. 99 are meant anything different from bye-laws. The object of the section is not to enable the company to make regulations, but to compel the company to afford proper access to goods on their premises subject to proper regulations. The power to make such regulations must be sought for elsewhere. They must necessarily affect merchants and other persons besides the officers and servants of the company, and I can find no power to make regulations as distinguished from bye-laws for the conduct of any persons other than the company, its officers and servants. Even regulations for the conduct of the company's officers and servants are called "bye-laws" by the general Act, although they do not require confirmation or publication. Assuming, however, that sect. 99 refers to some regulations which are not bye-laws, they are confined by this section to the access to goods on the property of the company. By no legitimate process of construction or reference can sect. 29 be stretched so far as to justify such rules and regulations as are in controversy in this action.

The only remaining sections to which it is necessary to allude are those which relate to the power of levying tonnage and other rates on ships and goods. The general Act 1847 does not contain any clause authorising the imposition of rates, but it contains several (viz., sects. 25 to 50) relating to the payment and collection of such as may be authorised by special Acts. The most important of these are sects. 30, 46, and 47. Sect. 30 enables companies to vary their rates provided they do not exceed the maximum sums mentioned in the special Acts, and provided all persons are charged alike; sect. 46 provides for the settlement of disputes by justices; sect. 47 provides for the publication of tables of the rates payable. The authority for imposing tonnage rates on ships entering the docks of the defendants is conferred by sect. 27 of the special Act of 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. clxiii.), which apparently replaces sect. 132 of the special Act of 1864. The section relating to rates on goods is sect. 134 of the last-mentioned Act; and this section authorises the company to levy rates on goods brought into, or landed or deposited within, or delivered or shipped from the docks and works for and in respect of their wharfage, unshipping, landing, relanding, piling, housing, weighing, coopering, sampling, unpiling, unhousing, watching, shipping, loading, and delivering, and generally in respect of any work to be performed in respect of the goods. Tables of these rates are to be made and printed and published as directed by the section. The tonnage rates on ships, and the import and export rates on goods, must not exceed the maximum amounts fixed by statute (see in addition the sections in the general Act of 1847, already noticed, sect. 57 of the Act of 1888, and the provision in sect. 134 of the Act of 1864); but the only limit to the other rates is that they must be reasonable (see sect. 134 of the Act of 1864). It is to be observed that the power to make rates is distinct from and in addition to the power to make bye-laws. Bye-laws are not necessary for the imposition of rates, nor, indeed, do the bye-law sections authorise their imposition. The rates may be varied from time to time. 3. Having ascertained the powers of the joint committee, it remains to consider the legality or illegality of the provisions of the new code. First, I will take the rates and charges by themselves. The tonnage and other rates on ships are not disputed, and may be passed over. The rates mentioned in regulations 2 and 3 are not rates on goods within the meaning of sect. 134 of the Act of 1864; nor can they be imposed by authority under sect. 23 of the general Act 1847, which relates to letting on terms to be agreed upon. The rates in 2 and 3 can only be defended, if at all, on grounds which will be further considered presently. The rate of 1*s.* 6*d.* per ton in regulation 10 is not authorised by sect. 134 of the Act of 1864, for that section applies to rates payable to the dock company, and not to rates payable by it. The rates mentioned in regulations 13, 14, 15, 17, and 18 are not quarrelled with, although other parts of some of these regulations are. The regulations contained in the code are not binding as orders, rules, regulations, or laws. Imperative in form, they bind no one to obedience. They are not, and do not purport to be, bye-laws; but no other orders, rules, or regulations made by the defendants can be binding simply as orders, rules, or regulations. They may, of course, be expressly or impliedly assented to, and so become binding by agreement. But an agreement is one thing; a regulation which has to be obeyed whether assented to or not is quite another thing, and these regulations can only be regarded as binding on those persons who in fact assent to them and agree to conform to them. It is said that there never have been any bye-laws for the regulation of the docks. That is, however, to be accounted for by the fact that until the new code came into force the dock authorities themselves did all the work in the docks except loading outgoing ships. Under those circumstances no one cared to test the legality of the regulations. When, however, the practice was changed and the shipowners unloaded their own ships, and when the dock authorities sought to force them to do a great deal more than discharge their own cargoes, regulations which previously had produced no inconvenience became galling, and their legality was naturally questioned, and, being questioned, must be decided.

The great dispute turns on regulation 2, and the terms on which shipowners are entitled to have berths appropriated to their ships. I can find nothing in the statutes relating to these docks which entitles any shipowner to demand that a particular berth shall be kept for him; nor is there anything which entitles the dock company to make any special charge for such a convenience if granted. Under these circumstances, if the convenience has been enjoyed and a dispute arises about the terms of payment, a court of law must decide in each particular case—first, whether the shipowner who has had a berth kept for him has agreed to pay the rate demanded; and, secondly, if not, then what is a reasonable price for the accommodation which he has enjoyed. This is the view contended for by the defendants, and so far they are right. For similar reasons the defendants are right as to all those regulations which refer to special accommodation and facilities, viz., 4, 13, 14, 15, 17, 18. The real truth is, that shipowners who want special accommodation cannot force the defendants to give it them, even on payment of reasonable compensation. Special accommodation must be made the subject of special agreement. Regulation 2 contains the pecuniary terms on which the defendants are willing to give the accommodation; the other terms are in the other regulations. If the plaintiffs will not assent to those terms the defendants can refuse the special accommodation. The effect of this no doubt may be to drive the plaintiffs to other docks in other ports where more favourable terms can be made, if any such can be found. The only safeguard against this is the defendants' own view of their own interests. Regulation 3 is also quarrelled with, but it is not open to the remarks made on Regulation No. 2, for Regulation 3 does not apply to cases in which exceptional facilities are afforded. The first part of Regulation 3 is unobjectionable; it is a mere notice that the dock master's orders as to berths must be obeyed. The second part, however, is not warranted by any statutory enactment. It is an attempt by the defendants to force shipowners to pay for what they do not want, and to compel them to hire quay and shed space in order to do work formerly done by the dock company, and which the shipowners object to have forced on them. This must be taken in conjunction with Regulations 9 and 10, which purport to bind all shipowners, and not only those who desire special accommodation. For reasons already given, I am of opinion that these regulations can only be made binding by being passed and confirmed as bye-laws, although, of course, those persons who choose to agree to them may do so, and may thus become bound by them. The same remark applies to all the other regulations not confined to special accommodation and special facilities which the dock company are not bound to afford, i.e., to all the regulations except Nos. 2, 4, 13, 14, 15, 17, and 18, which do relate only to special accommodation and facilities. The general Act 1847 contains a sect. 22 binding the company to supply cranes and labourers to work them; but Regulation 14 applies to specially large cranes, and not to such as the company is bound to supply under the section to which I have referred. 4. I come now to the last head, viz., the position of the plaintiffs and their right to maintain this action. The London Association of Shipowners and Brokers Limited is a trade protection society. It has no ships or goods of its own. Its members have, and it really sues on their behalf; but the society itself is only their agent, and this is not a case in which an agent can sue in his own name. This society therefore has no locus standi. This objection is purely technical, for any one of the members of the society can sue on behalf of himself and other shipowners in the same interest, and an action so constituted would be free from objection in point of form. Liberty to amend might probably have been obtained if applied for in time. It is too late, however, now to amend in this respect. The other plaintiffs are the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, an incorporated company owning a large fleet of steamers using the defendants' docks. The Peninsular and Oriental Company, if aggrieved by the defendants' regulations, has a clear locus standi as plaintiff in an action brought to have its grievances redressed. At the same time, the Peninsular and Oriental Company is not like the Attorney-General, and is not entitled to sue on behalf of the public for the purpose of preventing the defendants from exceeding their statutory powers irrespective of any particular injury to any particular individual. The Peninsular and Oriental Company must show that it is itself aggrieved before it is entitled to any declaration or relief in an action brought by itself. Had this action been an information by the Attorney-General there would be no difficulty in declaring the regulations complained of not to be binding on the public and in granting an injunction to restrain the joint committee from enforcing them, for I regard the new code as an imposition on the public. The difficulty in the way of the Peninsular and Oriental Company maintaining this action is as follows: The Peninsular and Oriental Company always, in fact, requires berths to be appropriated to its ships, and the Peninsular and Oriental Company is not concerned with and is not affected by regulations which relate to the owners of ships not having fixed discharging berths. As regards appropriated berths, the terms on which they can be had in future must be settled by agreement, and the company has nothing to complain of in point of law. And as to the past, the company must pay either the sum demanded, or a reasonable sum as may be determined in one or more actions brought for determining that particular question in the case of each ship to which a discharging berth has in fact been appropriated. On these grounds it is contended that no right of the Peninsular and Oriental Company has been infringed, and that this action is not maintainable by the Peninsular and Oriental Company. The only answer to this contention is as follows: It is true that the Peninsular and Oriental Company always has required berths to be appropriated to its ships, and will in future find it very inconvenient not to have such berths; but the company is entitled to have unappropriated berths unfettered by illegal restrictions, and is entitled to exercise its option to have such berths or to have appropriated berths on terms which may be agreed upon. The joint committee has deprived the company of its rights in this respect, and offers the company an alternative which the joint committee has no right to insist upon, and consequently the Peninsular and Oriental Company is aggrieved by the alternative presented to it, because, if it could have unappropriated berths subject only to proper bye-laws, it might prefer them, with all their inconveniences, to appropriated berths on the terms insisted on by the joint committee. This argument would, in my opinion, be a sufficient answer to the technical objection that the Peninsular and Oriental Company has no sufficient interest in the suit if the Peninsular and Oriental Company did in truth want unappropriated berths, but it does not. The company is not claiming the option suggested, and does not care to have it. The Peninsular and Oriental Company claims appropriated berths on terms which the joint committee will not concede. The Peninsular and Oriental Company has, in fact, failed to establish its alleged rights, and the order appealed from must therefore stand. But the joint committee has rendered it necessary, or, if not necessary, at least expedient, that the rights of the Peninsular and Oriental Company on the one side and those of the joint committee on the other should be ascertained and declared. This can be done under Order XXV., r. 5 (a), and under the peculiar circumstances of this case, and having regard to the contentions raised on both sides, the proper order on the appeal will be to declare that the regulations of the London and India Docks Joint Committee, contained in the printed exhibit H. W. W. 3, and therein numbered 1 to 18, and also the regulations therein contained, and headed "Labour in the Docks," not having been made and confirmed as bye-laws, are not binding on the plaintiffs, the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, save so far, if at all, as the said company may have agreed or may agree to be bound by the same, and to declare that the said company is not entitled to have berths appropriated to its ships, nor to have other special accommodation or conveniences except upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the company and the aforesaid joint committee. With this declaration the appeal must be dismissed, but without costs. We have not reversed the order of the court below; we leave that order alone. The action stands dismissed; therefore we do not interfere at all with it.

BOWEN, L.J.—The defendants in this case are responsible for the issue of a book of regulations, none of which are bye-laws made under the authority of their statutes, and none of which have passed the statutory ordeal of an examination by a judge of the High Court. They do not profess on their face to be statutory bye-laws, nor have they ever been presented as such to the plaintiffs. The regulations, on the other hand, are drawn in a tone of peremptory insistance. Shipowners to whom they are issued are informed that it is to these regulations that ships entering the docks are "required" to conform. The dock company and the defendant committee have indeed a right, as the price of extra facilities which they are obliged by law to afford to all vessels entering the dock, to insist on compliance with any conditions or regulations which they may choose to impose. But no such clear line of demarcation between what is to be the price of precarious favours and what is the reasonable demand in respect of legal duties which the docks are bound to discharge is to be found in these regulations. They have a louder and more imperious sound than is justified by the strict legal rights of the defendants as against the maritime public at large. To say the least of it, it is arguable that an unwary shipowner hailing from some primitive quarter of the commercial world where innocence as to the powers of London dock companies prevails might be deceived by the tone of superior authority into a belief that these regulations were in truth statutory bye-laws. And as some of them go certainly beyond what can lawfully be imposed as of right upon an ordinary ship seeking exceptional favours, but merely access to a public dock, so far as the shipowning public, or any portion of it, could reasonably be misled into thinking that the regulations were statutory bye-laws, the Attorney-General, on behalf of the public, might have a right to interfere. No corporate body has a right to impose on that portion of the public which is likely to deal with it as bye-laws, judicially sanctioned and confirmed, regulations which have no such legal sanction. Nor can it be denied that it is one of the functions of the High Court to prevent public bodies incorporated by Act of Parliament from exceeding their statutory powers to the injury either of the public or of individuals. No such corporate body has a right to deceive. Whether the regulations in question do or do not pass this clear and simple line, as perhaps they may, is a question which it will be time enough, in my opinion, finally to decide when it is raised; that is to say, when the Attorney-General, on behalf of the public, or a really aggrieved individual thinks it necessary to raise it. When invoked on behalf of the public by the Attorney-General or by aggrieved persons the court on similar principles will always interfere to restrain, not merely untrue language which is calculated to deceive, but all unlawful acts which are calculated to injure. The present case is not one in which the Attorney-General seeks the interposition of the court. It is an action by private individuals—incorporated companies who either are shipowners themselves, or who represent a collective number of particular shipowners. In order to succeed the plaintiffs are bound to show that the defendants have either (a) No action or proceeding shall be open to objection on the ground that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby, and the court may make binding declarations of right whether any consequential relief is or could be claimed or not.

infringed some legal right of the plaintiffs or of some one or more of the plaintiffs, or that the defendants threaten to infringe some such right. The question is no longer accordingly whether the action of the defendants in the issue of these regulations is justified as against the public, but whether the plaintiffs or any of them have been actually aggrieved in a manner that entitles them or any of them to relief by way of injunction. One thing appears to me to be tolerably clear, namely, that whatever shipowners have been simple enough to be imposed on by the dictatorial style of these regulations, the Peninsular and Oriental Company have not been the victims of any such innocent delusion. They have known from the first, they have been told from the first, all the negotiations and controversy have proceeded on the footing that these are not statutory bye-laws, and have never been submitted to the review or approval of any judicial authority. As against the Peninsular and Oriental Company the defendants have never professed the contrary. If the publication of the regulations amounts to a grievance against which in this action the Peninsular and Oriental are entitled to complain, the grievance must be classified under some other category or head than that of deception or misrepresentation. This renders it necessary to pursue accurately and in such detail as to prevent confusion of thought the inquiry, what actual wrong has been done to the Peninsular and Oriental Company, or what actual wrong is threatened and intended to be done? Even if the Peninsular and Oriental Company were shipowners who simply sought access to the docks without asking for exceptional facilities which the dock company are entitled to grant or refuse at pleasure, I should feel myself some difficulty in holding that the Peninsular and Oriental were entitled on such materials as are before us to ask for an injunction from the court. An injunction against what? Is it to be an injunction against representing to the Peninsular and Oriental as bye-laws sanctioned by a judge a book of regulations which are not so sanctioned? The Peninsular and Oriental have never for a single hour supposed that any such pretence or profession was put forward. Is it an injunction against making such a representation to the public? But the Peninsular and Oriental do not represent the public. Are we to be asked for an injunction because the defendants will persist that all incoming ships must be taken to admit themselves to be bound by these bye-laws by the mere act of coming into the dock? No authority has been produced in favour of the proposition that a court of equity can interfere to prevent a corporate body from making in the course of its own business immoderate and unwarrantable assertions about its intended legal claim. Can any case be found in which, as distinct from the modern jurisdiction created by railway legislation, any court of equity has been successfully appealed to by a trader to prevent either a corporate body or a common law carrier, whose duties are defined by common law as a corporate body's are by statute, from saying that he intends to charge his customers too much? Down to the date of Sutton v. The South-Eastern Railway Company (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 221, 438; L. Rep. 1 Exch. 32) no such precedent was in existence, and no such precedent has been cited to us since. The usual course in the case of alleged overcharges or threats of extravagant demand has always been to leave the complaining party to his common law action, one reason, though not the only reason, being that demands may well have been made which in the last resort never will be enforced, and which it is not seriously intended to enforce in the face of resolute resistance. His proper course, if the worst comes to the worst, is either to refuse compliance or to submit under protest, and to bring his action for the wrong. I do not, indeed, doubt that where the threat by a corporate body or by any other person is a threat to do that which will actually violate a legal duty, that which will, in other words, constitute a tort or a breach of contract, this court will and ought to intervene; but an assertion of an exorbitant business claim, however loudly made, does not constitute a tort unless it is intended to be enforced by some wrongful act. The ordinary shipowner who wanted access to the dock without exceptional facilities would no doubt be entitled to an injunction if he could fairly extract from this book of regulations a threat to exclude his ship from the dock unless he submitted to some illegal provision, but I doubt whether any such menace could be found here except by a stretch of vivid imagination. The ordinary shipowner would equally be entitled to complain if he could reasonably discover in these regulations an intention to trespass in defiance of all prohibition by an owner on the decks of any of his ships (see Regulation No. 9). Whether the regulation in question (No. 9) amounts to such a violent intimation may be doubted, nor is it necessary in this action to decide the point. A mere statement, however (to take an obvious instance), that the dock company will not be liable for negligence, or for the custody of the cargo after discharging the ship, may be a proposition wholly worthless and baseless in law, may be a brutissimum fulmen as against all who do not choose to agree to it. But the assertion constitutes no legal wrong until it is enforced or threatened to be enforced by some wrongful act, or unless it is calculated reasonably to deceive and does deceive, with which latter hypothesis I have already sufficiently dealt. In these latter observations I have assumed (for the purpose of argument) that the Peninsular and Oriental is in as favourable a condition in this action as an ordinary shipowner desiring merely access to the docks; but whatever might be the relief to which an ordinary shipowner who sought nothing beyond legitimate access to the docks might be entitled in respect of such a book of regulations, the Peninsular and Oriental are not in truth in any such position as he. They neither want, nor do they propose to accept, the ordinary accommodation offered to casual vessels. Their trade cannot be carried on at all unless accommodation is given them at the docks of a wholly exceptional kind, and one which they cannot claim as of right either at common law or by statute. Nothing except agreement and convention can obtain for the Peninsular and Oriental the privileges which alone they desire, and such privileges the dock company cannot be compelled to grant except on their own terms. The answer to the complaint of the Peninsular and Oriental is accordingly this: that, as far as they are concerned, the Book of Regulations (as they are well aware) is not put forward as a book of judicial bye-laws, but as the only conditions on which the Peninsular and Oriental can obtain appropriated berths. The Peninsular and Oriental can take these appropriated berths or leave them, as they please, but they can have them on the terms of submitting to these regulations. The Peninsular and Oriental have no more right under such circumstances to relief from this court than a gentleman who chose to complain that some lady of his acquaintance had declined to marry him except on conditions which were highly unreasonable. The course adopted by the Peninsular and Oriental has been ingenious enough. In order, if possible, to drive to terms a commercial body who were in a vantage position, and who refused to abate some merciless demands, they have sought to utilise for their own benefit in this controversy the fact that the regulations in question have a weak spot in them viewed from the point of view of the law officers of the Crown, or of persons who are in a totally different business position from themselves. But the Peninsular and Oriental, for the purposes of this action, do not represent the mercantile world at large or shipowners in general. In this suit they represent simply themselves, that is to say, individual customers who only want appropriated berths, and who are utterly unaffected by, and indifferent to, what may happen to ships which do not need such indulgencies. An attempt was made, certainly, in argument to bolster up the case of the Peninsular and Oriental by representing that the wrong done to them consisted in depriving them of the true alternative option to which by law they could lay claim, an option, namely, either to accept appropriated berths, or else to insist on simple access to the docks without any exceptional facilities, and therefore without any terms of an extraordinary kind. The short business answer to this business complaint, and the short legal argument, is that the ordinary access to the docks to which all ships are entitled would be of no use at all to the Peninsular and Oriental. They do not wish it; they do not ask for it; they never have asked for it, and have never been refused it, and they cannot by any stretch of legal ingenuity reasonably complain that they have been denied an option which they never intended to use, or have been injured in respect of a theoretical alternative which nobody but a pleader could suppose they ever desired to enjoy.

As for the other plaintiffs, they have, as it seems to me, no locus standi at all. They are not shipowners. They are an association of shipowners incorporated for the protection of the interests of shipowners, but the incorporated body own no ships. They do not want to use the docks at all. It seems to me, therefore plain (as North, J. has said) that they are not entitled to come to this court for any relief. If a number of individuals are injured, all of them may sue. In some cases one or more of them may sue as representing the rest; but the individuals cannot, before they are injured, form themselves into a joint-stock company for the purpose of bringing actions on their own behalf, or give to such an incorporated body a legal locus standi to sue for them. We were asked, if we felt any difficulty as to the character of the plaintiffs, to allow some shipowner to be added whose ship had simply desired access to the docks and nothing more, and who might be deemed to be aggrieved by the imperious tone of these regulations. It is too late to make such an amendment. We should have to begin de novo in the case of any shipowner to investigate his exact title to relief, and to decide whether it depended on his having been deceived, or else whether he had been refused admission to the docks, or subjected to some other distinct threat of actual wrong. If any such case can be made, it is too late to make it now in this action. The learned judge (Smith, J.) accordingly seems to me to have been well advised in dismissing this action. I do not know that I myself should have dismissed it with costs, but this was a matter which was in his discretion, and if we affirm his judgment we cannot interfere with his view about the costs. It must not be supposed, as far as I am concerned, although I think the Peninsular and Oriental are in no way injured by these regulations, that I also consider the publication of these regulations in their present form justifiable or right. It appears to me that the dock company and the joint committee ought to have more clearly and lucidly defined on the very face of these regulations what they are and what they do not profess to be. It ought surely to have been explained on their face that they are not statutory bye-laws at all, and that many of them, at all events, are merely binding on such shipowners as may consent to be bound by them. The shipowning public (if any), which may have observed the peremptory tone of the regulations, would have been somewhat astonished at the comparatively modest level to which the defendants' advocates before this court brought down the legal pretensions of the joint committee in the argument before us. To prevent mistakes upon the subject, justice will be best done by embodying in the order dismissing this appeal a declaration which does no more than record the concessions made at the bar, and the admissions to which the defendants' counsel were prepared to consent; and the defendants will, in my opinion, do what is just and right if they reform at once this book of regulations. To mark one's sense of the excess of legal pretension which the book of regulations carries on its face, and which has been to a considerable extent the cause of this litigation, I think that we ought to say that there must be no costs of this appeal, although it fails for the reasons I have given.

Kay, L.J.—This action is brought to obtain a declaration that certain regulations, dated the 1st Jan. 1891, issued by the defendants are invalid unless confirmed as provided by the Harbours, Docks, or Piers Clauses Act 1847, and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from enforcing or requiring the plaintiffs to comply with such regulations until so confirmed. The general statute of 1847 enacts by sect. 83 that bye-laws may from time to time be made for all or any of the purposes mentioned in that section, and by sect. 84 penalties may be imposed for breach of them. But sect. 85 provides that no bye-laws made under the authority of that Act or of the special Act shall come into operation until the same shall have been confirmed in the prescribed manner, or, if no manner be prescribed, until they be allowed by a judge of the Superior Court, or, in England, by the justices or the quarter sessions, and, by sect. 86, notice of the intention to apply for confirmation is to be given in the county newspaper a month before, and any person desiring to object may give notice of the nature of his objection ten days before the hearing of the application, and "may by himself, or his counsel, attorney, or agent, be heard thereon." None of these formalities have been observed with respect to the regulations in question, and it is not and could not be contended that they have the power or effect of bye-laws, under this statute or the special Act relating to the docks of the defendants. Sect. 33 of the general Act runs thus: "Upon payment of the rates made payable by this and the special Act, and subject to the other provisions thereof, the harbour, dock, and pier shall be open to all persons for the shipping and unshipping of goods, and the embarking and landing of passengers." Sect. 23 enables the dock company to lease or grant the use of any warehouses, buildings, wharfs, yards, cranes, machines, or other conveniences, at such rents and on such terms as may be agreed on for any term not longer than three years. The special Act of the London and St. Katharine Dock Company of 1864 incorporates this general statute, and sect. 113 describes what their bye-laws may include. Such bye-laws by sect. 114 are to be subject to the provisions of the general Act of 1847, no other manner of confirming them being prescribed by the special Act. By this and the general Act the payments to be made for the use of the docks are a tonnage rate on ships and certain rates on goods specified in a schedule to the special Act. Any other payments must, it would seem, be by agreement under sect. 23 of the general Act to which I have referred. In 1888 an Act was passed authorising a working union between the London and St. Katharine Dock Company and the East and West India Dock Company. By sect. 31 of this Act all the powers and duties of both companies were vested in the joint committee who were defendants to this action. Up to the present time the business of these docks has been carried on without bye-laws. None have ever been made. The practice has been until recently for shipowners to load their ships, but for the dock company or the joint committee to undertake all the work of discharging vessels that come into the docks; and for the services thus rendered, and also for the use of their quays, and of warehouses built by the dock companies, it is said, at great expense, payments were made to the dock company as arranged with the shipowners. In Aug. 1889, a strike having occurred among the dock labourers, Sir Thomas Sutherland, chairman of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, in a letter to the Times, suggested that shipowners should be left to discharge as well as to load their own ships. This suggestion was practically adopted by the joint committee, and the new regulations were adapted to this change in the mode of using the defendants' docks. The regulations complained of were issued in Dec. 1890, after an attempt to frame bye-laws with the concurrence of the Peninsular and Oriental Company had been made and abandoned. Their operation was postponed until the 1st Feb. 1891. They were to apply to all ships entering the docks after that date. They begin thus: "Discharge of vessels.—Shipowners will be required to comply with the following regulations and the regulations of Her Majesty's Customs, of the fire insurance offices, and of the joint committee from time to time made." Speaking generally, all the regulations are provisions for the mode of using the docks, quays, and warehouses. Except as bye-laws, or except by special agreement with each shipowner, they could not be made compulsory or enforced. The first sentence which I have quoted shows that the joint committee give shipowners to understand that if they use the docks they must comply with these regulations. Anyone reading that prefatory sentence who did not know the provisions of the statute, or that these regulations had not been duly confirmed as bye-laws, would suppose that they were binding. The meaning of provisions of this kind is that which an ordinary reader would understand to be their meaning. I am clearly of opinion that it is not a proper proceeding on the part of the joint committee to publish in this manner as binding regulations a set of rules which they know are not binding. Counsel on their behalf have stated that they have never refused to allow persons to use their docks who dissented from these provisions, and have never threatened to do so, and that, so far as these rules are represented as compulsory, that is a mere brutum fulmen, because, in the absence of agreement express or implied, the rules are not binding on anyone. But I think that the answer to that argument is that the defendants have had large powers granted to them by Parliament on the terms that these docks are always to be open to the use of the public owning ships. They are empowered to regulate the manner of using such docks by framing bye-laws as to the provisions of which the shipowners have a right to be heard, and have their objections considered before such bye-laws receive judicial sanction. It is not a proper act for a public body like the defendants to attempt to impose upon the public as compulsory regulations rules which they have no power to enforce. If the Attorney-General were suing on behalf of all shipowners who have a right to use the docks, I should have no doubt that it would be the duty of the court to make a declaration that these regulations have not the force or effect of bye-laws, and are not binding on any shipowner who has not agreed to be bound by them. In such a suit the court in its discretion might restrain the defendants from attempting to enforce these regulations against any shipowner who had not agreed to them, and also, I think, from representing to the public that they are in any way binding in the absence of agreement. Probably an injunction would not be necessary; the declaration would effect all that was requisite. But I refer to the injunction because it seems to me a case in which relief might be granted in that form so that no technical difficulty as to making a declaratory decree could possibly arise. In Pinchin v. The London and Blackwall Railway Company (5 De G. M. & G. 851) an injunction was sought by the owner of a manufactory to prevent the defendants from taking it under their compulsory powers. They had given him notice that they intended to throw a bridge over a yard belonging to the manufactory. The plaintiff gave a counter notice to the company requiring them to take the whole manufactory. After a delay of nearly twelve months the company proceeded to take the whole. The injunction was refused under the circumstances because of the counter notice, although the original notice to treat was probably invalid. In the course of his judgment, Lord Cranworth, justifying the granting of an ex parte injunction, said that it then appeared to him "that the only ground upon which such an injunction as that asked could be granted was not any personal equity on the part of the plaintiffs but a ground upon which this court is very much in the habit of acting, namely, that it will not suffer persons, and more particularly powerful corporate bodies with whom it is very difficult to deal, to take proceedings which are of an illegal, or even of a doubtfully legal, character under their Acts of Parliament, if by so doing they place those against whom they are proceeding in a condition from which it may be very difficult for them to extricate themselves; to grant an injunction in such circumstances is a course which has been repeatedly adopted by Lord Cottenham and other judges." One of the cases before Lord Cottenham most commonly referred to is The River Dun Navigation Company v. The North Midland Railway Company (Railway and Canal Cases, 135), in which he points out how necessary it is to interfere with a public company which is exceeding its powers to the injury of individuals, and that it is "most essential to the interest of the public" that the extraordinary remedy by injunction "should exist and should be exercised" in such cases. That case has been followed and treated as a leading authority on the subject from the year 1838 to the present time.

The main difficulty in the case before us is one of a rather technical character. The Attorney-General is not a party to this action. His right to sue on behalf of the public to restrain a company from committing illegal acts without giving any evidence of damage has often been maintained. The cases on this point are collected in the recent decision of The Attorney-General v. The Shrewsbury (Kingsland) Bridge Company (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 687; 21 Ch. Div. 752). An individual or body of individuals suing for an injunction against a public company for committing some excess or breach of its statutory powers is required by a most necessary rule to show that he or they have incurred or may incur special damage by the acts complained of. In Spencer v. The London and Birmingham Railway Company (8 Sim. 193) and in Sampson v. Smith (8 Sim. 272) the Vice-Chancellor of England held that when an individual suffered special damage from a public nuisance he might sue for an injunction without making the Attorney-General a party. In the former of these cases a railway company were interfering with a public street without providing an alternative route as required by their statutes, and the plaintiff, being specially damaged, was allowed to sue. The first-named plaintiffs in this action are a joint-stock company limited and formed, according to their memorandum of association, for the protection of the shipping and maritime interests, especially with respect to the regulation, management, customs, and usages of the port of London, and the docks, warehouses, wharves, and Custom-house therein. But this company does not possess any ships, and does not use the docks in any way, and no unauthorised act of the dock company or of the joint committee can occasion any direct damage to these plaintiffs. Accordingly the pleader has joined as co-plaintiffs the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company. These are large shipowners, the nature and size of whose steamers make it necessary to their business to use the defendants' docks. They use them by having certain appropriated berths and warehouses and quay space in those docks, and the point on which the defendants rely as to them is that only those parts of the regulations which relate to the occupiers of appropriated berths apply to them. They do not sue in form on behalf of themselves and all other shipowners using these docks, nor would it obviate the technical objection if they did, because they must still show that the regulations inflicted damage on their own company. They do not sue in respect of any possible use of the docks by themselves without having appropriated berths, warehouses, and quay space, and practically do not use, and probably never will use, these docks without such special privileges. The particular regulation which applies to shipowners who require appropriated berths, quay or warehouse room, is the second. It provides in effect that, for the convenience of shipowners who wish it, the joint committee will appropriate a berth, including the use of specified quay or shed space, "at the rate of 2*s.* 6*d.* per square yard of quay and shed space per annum, or such other rate as may from time to time be made." Regulation 4 enables the joint committee to use or grant the use of any appropriated berth when not actually occupied; and 5 provides that such berths shall only be used for discharge of cargo, not for lying-up purposes. These are the principal provisions as to appropriated berths; but it is not accurate to say that they are the only ones. 6 provides against competition in wharfage or warehousing with the joint committee, and restricts the use of appropriated quay and shed space to receiving, sorting, and delivering goods to barges and consignees. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 14 apply as well where berths are appropriated as not, and so also does the provision as to labour in the docks at the end of the regulations. However, undoubtedly the joint committee might have a stronger case of implied agreement against shipowners who, with knowledge of these regulations, required and accepted an appropriated berth and warehouse room, and their argument is that the Peninsular and Oriental have made such an implied agreement. The regulations, they admit, are not otherwise binding, but they urge that the court cannot in this action declare that there is no implied agreement to observe them. That will be a question for a jury when an action is brought against the Peninsular and Oriental Company for breach of their alleged agreement. As to the actual effect of the regulation, it appears from the correspondence that the Peninsular and Oriental Company were informed on the 7th Jan. 1891 that these regulations were not bye-laws. The action is intended to be brought on behalf of all shipowners using the docks. The question is the effect of these regulations, and whether it is a proper exercise by the joint committee of their statutory powers to issue such regulations in this authoritative form, and then to say, "We know they are not binding unless agreed to, but we insist that all shipowners using the docks with knowledge of them should be taken to have agreed to them by implication." Order XXV., r. 5, in terms empowers the court to make declaratory judgments "whether any consequential relief is or could be claimed or not;" but it is suggested that to make such a decree in this case if the plaintiffs have no cause of action would be an excess of jurisdiction, and it has been doubted whether this order gives the court any new jurisdiction. I refer to the case of Brooking v. Maudslay (58 L. T.

Rep. N. S. 852; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 296; 38 Ch. Div. 636). By Order XVI., r. 11, at any stage of a cause the court may order a party to be added as plaintiff "who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter." If any shipowner or company had been suggested whose name, if added as a co-plaintiff, would have enabled the court to decide the question and make the required declaration, I should have been disposed to make such addition; but no one is put forward. However, I should be extremely reluctant to refuse to make a declaration in this case upon this ground. The strongest mode of stating the objection seems to me to be that the present plaintiffs, even if the defendants are committing a wrongful act, are not damaged by it, and therefore have no cause of action against the defendants, and that Order XXV., r. 5, to which I have referred, does not enable the court to make a declaratory decree in such a case, or if it does it would be ultra vires. The Peninsular and Oriental Company, who are the plaintiffs, are shipowners, At present they are using the docks by taking an appropriated berth, protesting all the while that they are not bound by these regulations. They may at any time require to use the docks for ships for which no berth is appropriated. I think that, without adding any other plaintiff, as the suit is now constituted, it is right that the court should declare to what extent these regulations are proper, and can have any effect in law so far as the Peninsular and Oriental Company are concerned. I concur in making the declarations which have been formulated by Lindley, L.J., that these regulations, not having been made or confirmed as bye-laws, are not binding on the Peninsular and Oriental Company, save so far, if at all, as the said company may have agreed to be bound by them, and also, on the other hand, that the Peninsular and Oriental Company are not entitled to have berths appropriated for their ships, nor to have other special accommodation or conveniences except upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the Peninsular Company and the joint committee. With this declaration the appeal must be dismissed, but without costs.

The P. Caland. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision — Steamship — Accident to engines — "Not under command"—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 5.

A steamship which owing to an accident to her engines cannot reverse them as quickly as under ordinary circumstances, and may have to stop them suddenly, but is still capable of making three to four knots an hour, and has good steering power, is not out of command within the meaning of art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and is therefore not justified in exhibiting three red lights.

This was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action from a decision of Jeune, J., holding their vessel, the P. Caland, alone to blame: (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 83; 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 496; (1891) P. 313.)

The collision occurred between the steamships P. Caland and the Glamorgan, in the Straits of Dover, on the night of the 15th April 1891.

On the night of the 15th April 1891 the P. Caland, a screw-steamship of 2584 tons gross, propelled by engines of 350-horse power nominal, was in the Straits of Dover, laden with a general cargo on a voyage from New York to Amsterdam. At about 8 p.m. she had passed the Varne Light, at a speed of about eleven knots. At about 8.15 p.m. a nut in the slide of the valve of the high-pressure cylinder worked loose, but, in consequence of the ship's proximity to the Varne Shoal, she could not be stopped to allow the engineer to repair the accident. Accordingly the slide of the high and low pressure cylinders were worked by hand, and an average speed of three to four knots was obtained. It was also stated by the defendants' witnesses that there was reasonable apprehension that the engines might stop at any moment, and that it took longer time than usual to reverse them. In these circumstances the starboard anchor of the P. Caland was got ready to let go if necessary, her masthead light was taken down, and three red lights indicating a vessel "not under command" were substituted for it. There was a conflict of evidence between the plaintiffs and defendants as to what was done with the side lights, the plaintiffs alleging that the red light (the material light) was not exhibited till just before the collision, the defendants alleging that they had never been taken in, and were kept exhibited to indicate that the P. Caland was under way.

In these circumstances the steamship Glamorgan, while on a voyage from Antwerp to Cardiff, was in the English Channel, when those on board of her sighted an unsteady white light on board the P. Caland, and shortly after the three red lights were seen on the starboard bow, when the white light disappeared. The Glamorgan's engines were thereupon eased to slow, and he helm was starboarded. But when the three red lights bore about five points on the Glamorgan's starboard bow, the red light of the P. Caland came into view, and she was seen to be coming ahead so as to cause risk of collision. The helm of the Glamorgan was at once hard-a-starboarded, and her engines were reversed full speed, but the P. Caland came on and with her stem struck the starboard side of the Glamorgan, causing her to sink.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 5. (a.) A ship, whether a steamship or a sailing ship, which from any accident is not under command, shall at night carry in the same position as the white light which steamships are required to carry, and if a steamship in place of that light three red lights in globular lanterns, each not less than ten inches in diameter, in a vertical line one over the other not less than three feet apart, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere at a distance of at least two miles; and shall by day carry in a vertical line one over the other not less than three feet apart in front of, but not lower than her foremast head, three black balls or shapes, each two feet in diameter.

(c.) The ships referred to in this article when not making any way through the water shall not carry the side lights, but when making way shall carry them.

(d.) The lights and shapes required to be shown by this article are to be taken by other ships as signals that the ship showing them is not under command, and cannot therefore get out of the way.

Barnes, Q.C., F. W. Raikes, and A. Pritchard, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The cause of the collision was the Glamorgan coming too near a crippled ship. The P. Caland's red light was exhibited, and in the circumstances she was justified in putting up the three red lights, and treating herself as a ship out of command. There was no certainty that her engines might not stop at any moment, there was difficulty in reversing them, and all the manœuvres necessarily took longer than they usually do:

The Buckhurst, 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108; 6 P. Div. 152; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 484.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Holman, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The only question of general importance in this case is the construction of the rule. The question is, when can it be within the meaning of art. 5 that a ship is not under command? Now, was this ship in a position in which she was not under command? A ship may be not under command although her steering apparatus, not her steering, is in perfect order. For example, the rudder and the apparatus which is to turn it may be perfectly right; the wheel may be capable of acting properly; but it is of no use if she cannot go ahead owing to something happening to her engines, and if she can only float with the tide. It is of no use having her steering apparatus in order, because it will not steer her. You cannot steer a ship which is a mere floating log. She must be moving through the water before her steering apparatus will have any effect. Therefore a ship, though her steering apparatus may be in perfect order, might not be under command if her engines break down; that is, if she is a steamer without sails. She is in such circumstances not under command, for she can only float with the tide. But, if the steering apparatus is in order, and if the vessel can go ahead through the water, then the steering apparatus will have effect upon her, though it may not do so so quickly as if she is capable of going fast through the water. It is proved that this vessel could go ahead, and that her steering apparatus was in order. She could go to starboard, or to port or astern. But she could not perform these manœuvres so quickly as she could if her engines were in order.

Mr. Barnes' argument comes to this, that there was risk at any moment her engines might cease working, and then she would be brought to a stop, and her steering apparatus would have no effect upon her, and so she would not be under command. He says that the reasonable apprehension of that happening in a moment is the same as if it had happened for the purposes of this statute. That raises a question. Now, looking at the words of the rule—the first part of which speaks of her not being under command, and the second of her not being under command so as to be unable to get out of the way—taking these two parts together, it seems to me that the true construction of the rule is that the ship must be in such a state that she is not under command in this sense, that she cannot keep out of the way of another vessel coming near her. If she can be steered and stopped and go ahead, which is necessary in order that she may be steered, then she is under command, and the apprehension, however well-founded, of her being likely in a few moments to be out of command, does not show that she is out of command at the earlier moment. This vessel therefore up to the moment of this collision was not a vessel not under command at the time, although she put up the three red lights to show that she was a vessel not under command. She was a vessel under command, and therefore the three red lights ought not to have been put up at all. The evidence shows that the one vessel was coming down channel and the other vessel going up, and that at one time they were as nearly as possible on opposite courses, but that the Glamorgan got as she went on on the port side of the P. Caland. If the red light of the P. Caland was exhibited, then she ought to have known that the vessel was a crippled vessel, but going ahead. I think the Glamorgan got very far down before she made up her mind to go ahead of this other vessel, and if that red light had been exhibited I should have thought as a matter of seamanship she ought not to have gone ahead of that ship. She ought to have seen that that vessel was going ahead. As it was, she made up her mind to go ahead of her when she was too close to do it. If she had done that it would have been bad seamanship, and she would have been to blame as well as the other; but if the red side light was not exhibited, if it were turned in, then the other vessel would have the right to suppose that this vessel showing the red lights, her side lights being taken in, was out of command, and to such an extent that she was not going ahead. If that was the state of her lights, then a vessel approaching her has a right to suppose that she was out of command, and not going ahead. She is bound to get out of the way; but she can do it in whatever way she pleases—by going ahead or astern, by any manœuvre short of bad seamanship. If she had a right to suppose that the other ship was stationary, then we have the opinion of the gentlemen who assist us, which coincides with the opinion of the assessors below, that she might easily have gone ahead of her without coming into collision. Can her action be accounted for? To my mind it can. She said she thought the disabled ship might want assistance, and therefore wished to get to her to see what she wanted. Consider how natural it was for her to think so, for when the master of the P. Caland saw her coming to him he thought she was a tug coming to offer assistance. That speaks for itself. One might have thought she did want assistance. Where she was in the channel was near to the sands, and she would be in danger unless she anchored. Therefore this case depends upon this, whether we can overrule the learned judge on the fact he has found, namely, that the red light was not shown at the time when the other vessel determined to cross. There is evidence of the strongest kind that the red light was in its proper place; but then it is equally clear that those on board the Glamorgan were keeping a good look-out. If so, is it probable that, if the red light was shown, they would not have seen it. But is it improbable that, when the three red lights were run up, someone should take the red side light in? If those on the P. Caland thought that their ship would shortly come to a standstill, their duty when she did so was to take the side light in. If she was going to anchor, it would equally be their duty to take the side light in. The learned judge has seen the witnesses, he has balanced the probabilities, and has come to the conclusion that the probability of that side light being taken in prevails. I cannot say that I think he was wrong, and that is what I must say before I can overrule him on that question of fact. If he was not wrong, then it follows that the one ship having broken the rule was in fault, and that the other ship, as we are advised, did nothing wrong in attempting to cross the bows of the P. Caland, and that there would have been no collision if the P. Caland had been stationary. The judgment of the court below is therefore right.

Fry, L.J.—The most material question in this case is the construction of art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. The article deals with a ship which from an accident is not under command. From the rule itself we learn something of the meaning of the expression "not under command." We find that it refers both to vessels which are making way through the water and which are not. Therefore the mere fact of making way through the water does not decide the question. But we find in the latter part of the rule that a vessel not under command is said therefore to be "unable to get out of the way." In the present case the P. Caland was able to move through the water. She could steer, she could stop, she could reverse. It is quite true that she could not perform all these manœuvres, probably none of them, with the rapidity she could if her engines had been in perfect condition; but still she was able to perform these manœuvres. It follows, in my judgment, that she was in a condition which enabled her to get out of the way, and if she could do that it cannot be said that she was not under command. We are asked to hold that the words "not under command" mean "likely to be not under command." I do not think we can hold that. The question is not the expectation of being out of command, but the present condition in which the vessel is. That being so, we have to consider the question of fact in this case. On that I have nothing to add to what the Master of the Rolls has said. I cannot bring myself to say that I differ from the learned judge. I think most probably the P. Caland did take in her side light, and that therefore she was taken by the Glamorgan to be a vessel not moving through the water, that she approached her and then found that she was actually moving through the water.

Lopes, L.J.—I have only a few words to add with regard to the regulation. Having regard to the language of the article, I am of opinion that, if a steamship can go ahead, reverse, and steer, she is not a ship not under command within the meaning of art. 5. In such circumstances the ship can get out of the way, and is under command. I think that is the correct construction, and that is practically what the learned judge has decided. I also concur in his view of the facts, and therefore I think this appeal ought to be dismissed.

The Merchant Prince. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Inevitable accident—Vessel at anchor—Steam steering gear—Burden of proof.

Where the owners of a ship which in consequence of her steam steering gear failing to act runs into and damages a vessel at anchor, her owners to establish the plea of inevitable accident must show that the cause of the accident was one which could not be avoided, and they do not do so by proving that the gear was a good patent in extensive use, that it was properly overhauled from time to time, and that competent persons subsequently to the collision were unable to discover the cause of its failure to act.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem from a decision of Sir Charles Butt, dismissing the action with costs.

The collision occurred about 10.30 a.m. on the 4th March 1891, in the river Mersey, between the plaintiffs' steamship the Catalonia and the defendants' steamship the Merchant Prince.

At the time of the collision the Catalonia, a steamship of 3093 tons register, was at anchor in the Mersey, a little to the south of Tranmere Ferry. The wind was a fresh breeze from N.W. The tide was low water slack, and the weather was fine and clear. In these circumstances the Merchant Prince, a steamship of 1074 tons net, fitted with steam steering gear, while proceeding down the river ran into and damaged the Catalonia.

The defendants did not charge the plaintiffs with negligence, but denied that the collision was caused or contributed to by the negligent navigation of the Merchant Prince.

The defence, so far as is material, was as follows:

3. In these circumstances those on board the Merchant Prince observed a steamship, which proved to be the Catalonia, about a mile distant, and about half point on the port bow of the Merchant Prince. As the Merchant Prince approached the Catalonia the pilot ordered the helm of the Merchant Prince to be ported, and shortly afterwards to be hard-a-ported, but it was found on trying to get the wheel over to port that the steering gear would not act, and although the engines of the Merchant Prince were at once put full speed astern, she came into collision with the Catalonia, the stem of the Merchant Prince striking the port quarter of the Catalonia.

4. The steering gear of the Merchant Prince had been tried before she left her anchorage to proceed on the said voyage, and was found to be in good order, and it failed to act as hereinbefore mentioned in consequence of some latent defect or obstruction which could not have been ascertained or prevented by the exercise of any reasonable care or skill on the part of the defendants or their servants, and the said collision and damage were caused by inevitable accident.

At the trial the judge ruled that, as there was no charge of negligence against the Catalonia, the defendants ought to begin.

The defendants, in addition to calling the master and certain of the crew of the Merchant Prince, also called their marine superintendent and certain engineers, to speak to the efficiency of the steam steering gear. The result of the evidence was, that it was a good patent in extensive use, that it had been thoroughly overhauled by competent persons from time to time, that it had never failed before this accident, that it had never failed since, and that although carefully examined by experts since the collision, they had never been able to discover the reason why it failed to act on the occasion in question.

The wheel was connected with the rudder by a chain, part of which had been renewed a short time before the collision. The vessel was also fitted with a hand wheel aft. The plaintiffs only called the pilot who was in charge of the Merchant Prince at the time of the collision.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Bateson for the defendants.

Sir Charles Butt.—This is a case in which a vessel at anchor in the Mersey was run into in broad daylight by the steamer Merchant Prince. In such circumstances one is not predisposed towards the defendants' plea of inevitable accident. It will be necessary to consider the evidence given by both sides, although the law, it appears to me, is clear enough. The Catalonia being at anchor, and the Merchant Prince running into her in broad daylight, the onus of proving negligence, which is ordinarily on the plaintiff averring it, is upon the admission of the facts in the pleadings shifted. The admitted facts cast the onus of proving on the defendants that they were not guilty of negligence. The question is, have the defendants satisfied that onus? At the outset of this case it occurred both to me and to the Trinity Brethren that the story of the jamming of this steam steering gear was possibly not true, but was a mere excuse set up by the defendants for the negligent navigation of those in charge of their vessel, and as a matter of fact one of the expert witnesses says that after having examined the machinery subsequently to the collision, and knowing what he does of the facts of the case, he does not now believe that the wheel jammed. That is rather a strong conclusion in the face of the evidence adduced, and I do not think that there can be a reasonable doubt that this machinery did jam, and that it was the jamming which caused the collision. The evidence as to this is too strong to be discarded, and it is not merely the evidence of the defendants, because the defendants' pilot who was called by the plaintiffs, and who was certainly not disposed to benefit the defendants' case if he could help it, admitted that there was no doubt that the wheel was jammed, and that that was the cause of the collision. The evidence of the defendants was, that immediately it was jammed the officer working it called out, "The wheel is jammed, I can't get it a-port further, or hard-a-port." If this had not been true, the pilot would have taken very good care to tell us so; and further, if it is true that the officer called out that remark, then one cannot doubt the fact that the machinery was jammed.

Now comes the question, was it jammed through some negligence on the part of the defendants' servants? A great many suggestions have been made to account for the way in which this gear got fixed. Among other things it has been suggested that some one or more of the stop-valves were shut when they ought to have been left open. The direct affirmative evidence of the defendants upon this point is strong enough, and would of itself I think have satisfied me that that was not the cause of the accident; and, as one of the Elder Brethren has pointed out, you may shut all the valves, but it will not jam the machinery. It will keep the steam out of the steering gear, and the rudder will not act, but the machinery will not be jammed; and therefore it appears to me clear that the real cause of the collision was not the shutting of one of these stop-valves. Then another suggestion is, that the cause of the collision probably was that the chains, either those on the bridge or those aft, were not properly tightened up. We have considered that, and I must say that the effect produced upon my mind by the evidence is that there was no negligence in that respect, that the officers did their duty, and that there was no jamming of the chains and stopping of the machinery in that way; or even, if there were, that there was no negligence at all events on the part of the officers in the matter. [The learned Judge then discussed the pilot's evidence.] I therefore do not place implicit confidence in the story told by the pilot, although I do not think it a material matter, as there is really no reliable evidence to support the suggestion that the jamming of the machinery was due to the negligence of the defendants' servants. It has been asked over and over again during this case what was the cause of the jamming. Sir Walter Phillimore argues that the machinery should be so perfect that it could not be jammed. I do not think that can be rightly said or proved of any machinery. It was a good patent. The defendants had taken all care and precaution to have it properly repaired by competent persons, but nevertheless it jammed from what may be called a latent defect. For some reason or other the machinery at the critical moment, having answered perfectly well in the river on the day before and on the day of the collision until the accident, got fixed or jammed, the wheel would not move, and so the accident occurred. It is very true that the defendants have not done what has been done in many of these cases, they have not laid their finger upon the defect or upon the precise cause of the refusal of the machinery to act. In most cases that I recollect, where a defendant has been absolved from the consequences of some latent defect in the machinery which he has employed, the defect has been discovered after the accident; but that is not a necessary part of the defendants' case if he satisfies the court that there were causes which he cannot put his finger upon. There are many cases where such would be the fact; for instance, the case of a vessel with a defect in her machinery going to the bottom in consequence of the accident. It does not follow that there was no latent defect or irregularity because the defendant has not been able to put his finger upon it. Upon the whole the conclusion I have come to is this: that this machinery being a good patent, and being put in by competent and responsible workmen, failed at the critical moment, and so brought about the collision. In other words, I think the defendants have met the presumption of negligence that was cast upon them by the admission in the pleadings, and have established that there was no negligence on their part. I therefore dismiss the suit with costs.

From this decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The defendants have not discharged the onus of proof the law casts upon them. They have not shown the court the cause of the accident, and proved that they were powerless to prevent it:

The European, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 868; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 417; 10 P. Div. 99.

Myburgh, Q.C. and A. D. Bateson, for the defendants, contrâ.—The defendants have exhausted all the possible causes for this collision which could impute negligence to them. The fact that they have not been able to discover the cause of the machinery failing to act ought not to render them liable. Assume a case like the present in which the defendant ship was sunk at sea, so that the defendants could not ascertain the cause of the accident. It would be manifestly unjust in such a case to condemn them because they could not show the court the exact cause of the accident.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the ship under way, which is a steamship, has collided with a ship which was at anchor. The ship which was at anchor sues the one which was under way, and which came into collision with her, in the Admiralty Court. The circumstances of the collision depend a good deal upon the place where it occurred. That place was the Mersey. They also depend upon the time when it occurred. Anyone who knows the Mersey will appreciate what it means when there is a north-westerly wind blowing nearly a gale. It means that there are a great many ships brought up in the river, and they are nearly all wind-rode; that is to say, that they are lying across the river just as this ship was. In such circumstances the Merchant Prince, which was above Liverpool, gets under way to go down the river. She was bound out to sea. Those in charge of her know what the state of the morning is, they know what the wind and stream are, and know that in all probability there will be a great many ships at anchor in the river. Now what are we told about this ship? She had come out of the Brunswick Dock the day before. She was fitted with machine steering gear, of which the chain is a very important part. This chain goes over a cog-wheel, and then, in order to take it to the stern of the ship to work the rudder, it goes round a leading wheel on each side of the ship. The ship had two other means of steering. There was a wheel underneath the bridge, and another wheel aft. She therefore had these three means of steering. The quickest working gear which was the patent was the most complicated, but was if feasible the most capable of the three, and in a river like the Mersey it would be the best. But unfortunately the chains, which as I said before are a very important part of the machinery, wear out, and want renewing. If you put new chains on they at first stretch. The chain goes over a cog-wheel, and then round the leading wheels. It must be clear to everybody that the chain must not be quite tight, or it will not work; neither will it work if it be too loose. Therefore it must be known to all skilled seamen who have to deal with such matters that you must not make it quite tight, and must not make it too loose. But then there is another fact quite plain to anyone who thinks about it. If the chain is quite tight the links of the chain cannot kink—it is impossible. If you make it just as loose as these chains ought to be when in proper order, then they are not so loose as to cause the links to kink; but if you make them too loose or leave the chain loose, and at the same time move it, then everybody must know that it is not an unlikely thing that the links will kink. If you try the experiment with your watch-chain what I mean is obvious, and we do not need experts to instruct us. That being the case, therefore, it would occur to any thinking man that if the chain is too tight it will not work; if I loosen it to the right amount it will work, but if I loosen it too much it will not work so quickly as it otherwise would, and the links may kink. There being a new chain on this ship, the master and officer would know, or ought to know, before they left Brunswick Dock that the links of this new chain would probably stretch on being used. Now, what they ought to have expected did in fact happen. The links of the chain did stretch. I care not how much they stretched. They did stretch, and the officers of the ship by their conduct showed that this stretching ought to be remedied, because they tightened the chain up. Had they thought the matter out they would have said, "It is true we have tightened it up now, but it is liable to stretch, therefore it may stretch when going down the river, and if it does on such a morning as this, it will be awkward." I dare say they never thought about the kinking of the chain at all. What might they have done if they had thought the matter out? They might have said, "We will watch the chain, and if it stretches so as to seem loose, we will immediately stop the ship if necessary, and screw it up." But that is not all. It is said that they cannot use the wheel under the bridge without disconnecting it from the other. Very well then; if they cannot, why do not they disconnect it, and use that wheel as they go down the river? They were not obliged to use the patent wheel, and might have waited till they got outside the river before using it. They might also have stationed a man to watch the chain and disconnect the wheel if he saw the chain getting loose. Then again, there was the steering wheel aft. Why did they not have a man there so that, if anything happened, the ship could in a moment be steered by that wheel? That was not done. It is said that ordinary sailors would not think of these things; but these sailors, who, I have no doubt, were expert and skilful sailors, might have thought that there were means of taking that ship down the river without causing danger to other craft.

Now, what has happened? This vessel while under way has run into a ship at anchor. It is said by counsel that I am about to change the law by what I am going to say. It has been laid down by this court that, where a ship under way runs into a ship at anchor, that is primâ facie evidence of negligence on her part. The ship at anchor has only to state the fact, and that it was daylight; or, if it was night, she must show that her light was up and properly burning. That is all she has to say; the mere fact of the collision is evidence of negligence against the other ship. What is the reason for that? It is because after long experience the courts have come to this conclusion, that as a matter of truth and fact the one ship ought to be under perfect command, and therefore able to get out of the way of the other ship, if she sees her, which is in a helpless state and can do nothing. The great object of the judges in Admiralty cases has been to lay down a plain rule to govern the acts of sailors, and not to have niceties of argument about what they are to do. The plain rule they have laid down is this: Unless you can get rid of it, it is negligence proved against you that you have run into a ship at anchor. They have used some variation of phraseology, but if you look into the cases you will find that the only way a man can get rid of liability for the accident, the circumstances of which prove negligence against him, is to show that it occurred by an accident which was unavoidable by him—that is, an accident the cause of which was such that he could not by any act of his have avoided the result. He can only get rid of that proof against him by showing inevitable accident; that is, by showing that the cause of the collision was a cause not produced by him, but a cause the result of which he could not avoid. Inevitable means unavoidable. Unavoidable means unavoidable by him. That being so, there comes the proposition which Lopes, L.J. has put into form, that a man has got to show that the cause of the accident was a cause the result of which he could not avoid. If he cannot tell you what the cause is, how can he tell you that the cause was one the result of which he could not avoid? That appears to me to be good reasoning. But when the defendants come to show the circumstances of this case they cannot show, they say, the cause of the accident, although the court can see a probable cause—I do not say it is clearly proved—and also means by which its result might have been avoided. Therefore not only do the defendants not satisfy the burden which is upon them, but they have shown by evidence a probable cause, and have shown that, if that was the cause, there were means by which its result could without difficulty have been avoided. What was the cause, the probable cause? I do not say it is proved. Is there a probable cause? Yes, this chain refused to act. That must have been the reason why the wheel would not turn. It refused to act for a moment, and yet got right immediately after. If two of the links did kink as they went round the leading wheel, that would explain the accident. The gentlemen who advise us say that that is probably the way in which the accident happened, and that it was in all probability the cause of the accident. Now, how did it happen? Why because the chain became too loose. If that is so, is not that stretching of the chain a thing which the defendants could have foreseen, which they ought to have foreseen, and which, if they had foreseen—not that it would do it, but that it might do it—ought not they at the time in question to have taken means to have had the other steerages ready to act in a moment, even if they ought not to have used those other steerages, and those other steerages alone? It seems to me, from what one sees of the facts, that a probable cause is shown, and a cause the result of which could have been avoided. But the defendants either have not shown any cause, and then they cannot have shown a cause the result of which was one that they could not avoid; or they have shown a probable cause, which, if it was the real cause as seems most likely, was one the result of which they could have avoided. I am of opinion, therefore, that we must disagree with the judge of the Admiralty Court, and hold that the defendants have not satisfied the burden of proof which lay upon them.

Fry, L.J.—I find myself unable to agree with the decision of the learned judge. It is a case in which a ship in motion has run into a ship at anchor. In the case of The Annot Lyle (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 576; 11 P. Div. 114; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 50) it was laid down by Lord Herschell that in such a case the cause of the collision might be an inevitable accident, but unless the defendants proved it to be so they were liable. The burden rests on the defendants to show inevitable accident. To sustain that the defendants must do one or the other of two things: they must either show what was the cause of the accident, and show that the result of that cause was inevitable; or they must show all the possible causes, one or other of which might produce the effect, and must further show with regard to every one of those possible causes that the result could not have been avoided. Unless they show one or other of these two things, it does not appear to me that they have established the plea of inevitable accident. In the present case the defendants have not shown the cause. They have left that entirely undecided. In fact, their evidence has largely gone to show that the event never did happen; but unfortunately for them it did happen. Nor have they enumerated all the causes which might have produced the effect, and shown that they were inevitable. In fact, it is impossible it seems to me, on the evidence before us, to enumerate what might have been the probable causes of this accident. How can we say? It may be that, if we knew its real cause, we should find some simple piece of negligence on the part of some of the defendants' servants in not doing something which would have avoided the collision. Therefore on that simple ground the defendants fail in this case. But I go a step further. An inevitable accident is, according to the law laid down in the case of The Marpesia (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 212), that which cannot be avoided by the exercise of ordinary care and caution and maritime skill. Now the cause of the present accident was one which probably might have been avoided. It appears to me that these people were using a new chain known to be likely to stretch, that it had stretched, and that it might easily kink or jam in one of the wheels. It follows that there was a danger which any person who had applied his mind to the matter might have avoided by the use of the hand-steering apparatus instead of the steam. If that was the state of things, it ought to have been avoided. I therefore feel myself unable to agree with the learned judge.

Lopes, L.J.—In this case a moving vessel has come into collision with a vessel at anchor. As I understand it, the law is perfectly clear that in such circumstances the defendants are bound to show that what happened was inevitable. Now, it is admitted that the defendants are unable to tell what the cause of the accident was, or how or why it happened. That being so, it cannot be said that they have discharged the burden cast upon them of showing that what happened was inevitable. Can they say that they could not avoid a thing when they do not know what the thing to be avoided was? I think not. In this case the steering gear failed. How is that to be accounted for? It appears to me that it can only be accounted for in two ways. It must have arisen from a defect in the machinery, or from bad management of the machinery. The defendants have not satisfied me that what happened did not proceed from the kinking of the chain. I rather think it did proceed from that cause. If that is so, how does the matter stand? The defendants were using a new chain, and they ought to have known that a new chain was liable to stretch. They ought to have known that a chain that stretched was liable to kink. Knowing these things, they ought to have provided against that which happened by being prepared to use one of the other of the modes of steerage with which they were supplied. In these circumstances I am unable to see that what happened was inevitable. I am unable to agree with the learned judge below, and I think the appeal ought to be allowed

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Demurrage — Charter-party —Delivery at usual fruit berth—Delivery retarded by port regulations.

By a charter-party a vessel was to proceed to H, with a cargo of oranges "to be discharged at usual fruit berth as fast as steamer can deliver as customary, and where ordered by charterers." When the vessel arrived at H. the fruit warehouses were full, and neither of the usual fruit berths was available until after the expiration of four days. The warehouses on the quay, as well as the appliances for unloading there, were under the control of Government officials, who regulated the unloading of the vessels, and determined the quay at which a vessel should be moored.

Held, that the obligation of the charterer to unload did not commence until the vessel was berthed at a usual fruit berth, that the words "as customary" meant that the discharge delivery must be as fast as the custom of the port would allow, and that the charterer was not liable to pay for the demurrage which was occasioned by the custom of the port.

Decision of Charles, J. reversed.

This was an action for breach of a charter-party, and was brought by the owners of a steamship called the Artemis, to recover from the defendants, who were fruit merchants, and the charterers of the vessel, certain sums of money claimed by them in respect of an alleged failure to load a full and complete cargo, in accordance with the terms of the charter-party, and also for 80*l.* for four days' demurrage.

The action was tried by Charles, J. without a jury, and his Lordship decided the first claim in favour of the defendants; but held that the plaintiffs had proved their claim for demurrage, and from that judgment the defendants appealed.

The charter-party, which was entered into on the 2nd Feb. 1889, provided that the vessel should proceed to certain ports in the Mediterranean and there load a full and complete cargo of oranges, and, being so loaded, should therewith proceed to certain named ports, one of which was Hamburg. The provision with regard to the discharging of the cargo was in these terms:

To be discharged at usual fruit berth as fast as the steamer can deliver, as customary, and where ordered by the charterers.

The particulars of demurrage given by the plaintiffs stated that the ship was moored at the quay at Hamburg ready to deliver at 5 p.m. on the 6th March 1889. No work was done on the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th. At 6 a.m. on the 11th March the discharge commenced, and it was finished at 12.30 on the 12th, and they claimed 80*l.* for four days' demurrage at 20*l.* per day. In their defence the defendants stated that, "by reason of the usual fruit berth at Hamburg being fully occupied, and there being no other available space or accommodation for the ship" on the days in question, she was not able to commence discharging her cargo until the 11th March 1889, when she was discharged as fast as she could deliver her cargo.

From the evidence it appeared that the berths usually occupied by fruit ships at Hamburg are two berths opposite certain warehouses upon the quay, the practice being to discharge fruit by means of cranes into these warehouses. The warehouses on the quay, as well as the appliances for unloading there, are under the management of Government officials, who regulate the unloading of vessels, and without whose permission the cranes cannot be used, and it rests with the official having the management of the quay to determine where a vessel is to be moored, The Artemis arrived at Hamburg on the afternoon of the 6th March, and was moored near to, or in front of, the fruit warehouses at a place proper for unloading, but the court considered that this was done without the authority of the officials having the management of the quay. At 6 a.m. on the next morning, the Artemis was ordered to remove from this place, and moved a short distance from it. She appears to have been moved once or twice, but was moved to the place where she ultimately discharged on the morning of the 8th March. The reason the discharge of the vessel was not commenced until the 11th March was, because the warehouses, or that part of them into which fruit was discharged, were full, and there was no room for the fruit forming the cargo of the Artemis until the day the discharge commenced, viz., the 11th March. Although a part of the warehouses had been, by arrangement between the Government authorities and the fruit merchants, allotted to fruit and assigned to the fruit merchants, the control of the warehouses and of the appliances for discharging into them is in the hands of Government officials, without whose sanction the cranes cannot be used for the purpose of effecting the discharge of the cargo. When it appeared on the arrival of the Artemis that some delay would ensue before the cargo could be discharged into the warehouses, the consignee offered to take discharge into lighters, pointing out at the same time that such a mode of discharge from the vessel would occupy some days. The master refused to give discharge in that way.

April 2.—Lord Herschell, after stating the facts, continued:—I take it to be clear that, under the terms of the charter-party, the obligation of the charterer to unload did not commence until the vessel was berthed in a usual fruit berth. If authority for this were needed, the judgment of this court in the case of the Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morel Brothers and Co. appears to me to supply it; and I do not think that a vessel can be properly said to be so berthed unless she occupies the berth by the direction or with the assent of the harbour authorities. If, though she has arrived there, she is not permitted to remain for the purpose of unloading, but is directed by the port authorities immediately to remove to another place, I do not think she can be said to have arrived at her place of discharge so as to impose upon the charterers the obligation forthwith to unload. I am therefore unable to agree with the learned judge who tried the action, in thinking that this obligation arose on the evening of the 6th March. In my opinion it commenced at the earliest on the morning of the 8th. Inasmuch, however, as the discharge was not commenced until the 11th, and terminated on the 12th, the question still remains whether the plaintiffs have not made good a part of their demurrage claim. [His Lordship then stated the evidence upon this part of the case, and continued:] I do not think that it was possible for the vessel to be discharged by means of cranes opposite the warehouses, without the sanction of the authorities, and I do not think that there is any evidence that such sanction could have been obtained earlier than it was. Nor am I able to find evidence proving that there was any other usual fruit berth where the ship would have been allowed by the port authorities to effect her discharge earlier than she did, except by putting the cargo into lighters. Under these circumstances, are the defendants liable for demurrage? The plaintiffs assert that they are. The charterers they say were bound to take discharge of the cargo "as fast as the steamer could deliver, as customary." The customary mode of delivery was to discharge by means of cranes into the warehouses. This took but two days, which they assert is the measure of the time allowed for discharging the vessel. Even if it be established that, according to the custom of the port, the use of these cranes could not be obtained earlier than it was, that they allege is wholly immaterial; the ship must take the risk of it. Now it is to be observed, that the plaintiffs themselves rely on the fact that the vessel was to be discharged in the customary manner. They refused to permit the discharge into lighters, and insisted that no longer time was to be allowed for the discharge than would have been occupied had the discharge been effected by means of the cranes upon the quay. Yet, whilst claiming the benefit of this speedier mode of discharge, because it was the customary one, they maintain that they were entitled to disregard the restrictions which the custom of the port places upon the use of those appliances. I do not think that it is possible to sustain this contention. Supposing that at a particular port the customary mode of discharge was by certain appliances belonging to the harbour authorities, and that the use of these appliances was restricted to particular days or hours, could it possibly be argued that, under a charter-party worded like the present one, the time for the delivery was to be measured by ascertaining in what time a vessel could be discharged if those appliances were used every day, and at all hours, without regard to the port restrictions? I can see no real distinction between that case and the present, where the cranes could only be used according to the custom and regulation of the port, provided that there was room in the warehouses to receive the goods as they were discharged.

Although it was suggested in the course of argument that the circumstance that the fruit department of the warehouses was full was due to the act of the consignees of the cargo by the Artemis, I do not think that this was proved to be the case, even supposing that it would be material. There can be no doubt that under a charter-party such as the present the charterers or consignees would be bound to do all in their power to procure discharge of the cargo as quickly as possible. It appears that by the regulations of the port the director of the quay has power to require the removal of goods from the warehouses on giving twenty-four hours' notice, although they are often left for a longer period. I think, under such circumstances, it would be the duty of those who were to receive the cargo to require such notice to be given, and the only doubt I have entertained is whether there may not have been default on their part in this respect. The director says that he thinks he gave such a notice about the 7th March. He does not seem quite certain about it, and one may suspect that, if more active steps had been taken by the consignees of the cargo, the warehouse might have been earlier ready, and the quay authorities in a position to permit unloading. But I cannot say that any such case was proved; and if it was to be relied on it was for the plaintiffs to meet by proof of this the evidence of the charterers that they took discharge as fast as possible in the customary manner. No authority was cited which, in my opinion, conflicts with the view I have indicated. On the contrary, it receives, I think, support from the reasoning of the Lords who took part in the judgment of Postlethwaite v. Freeland, and the very point appears to have been decided by the Court of Session in Scotland in the case of Wyllie v. Harrison. The charter-party there provided that the cargo was to be discharged "as fast as the steamer can deliver after having been berthed as customary." It was the custom at the port of discharge that, on notification by the consignees or charterers of the arrival of a vessel to one of the two railway companies whose lines ran along the quay, the company should provide trucks, into which the cargo was to be discharged by means of steam cranes provided by the harbour authorities. It was a rule of the port that pig iron should not be laid down on the quay. On the arrival of the vessel due notice was given to the railway company by whose line the cargo was to be forwarded, but delay was occasioned through the failure of the railway company to supply trucks. The Lord President and three other judges of the Court of Session held that under the circumstances the consignees were not liable to demurrage. For the reasons I have given I think the judgment of the learned judge in the court below as regards the question of demurrage cannot be supported.

Lindley, L.J.—I have read the judgment which has just been delivered, and I have nothing to add.

Kay, L.J.—This is not a case in which the charter-party stipulated that the ship should be discharged within a specified time. Neither does it leave the time for discharging entirely unprovided for. It is a case between those two. The charter-party contains this provision: "To be discharged at usual fruit berth as fast as the steamer can deliver as customary, and where ordered by the charterers." The circumstances which must be regarded in construing this charter-party are that the cargo was perishable, consisting of oranges. The port of discharge was Hamburg. The time of the year when the ship arrived was March. The extreme cold then prevailing practically prohibited any discharge except into certain warehouses belonging to the port. If discharged upon the quay the cold would have spoilt the fruit. There were two usual fruit berths in front of these warehouses. I think, under the circumstances, one or the other of these berths must be taken to be the usual fruit berth within the meaning of this charter-party. The steamer arrived and took up a position at one of these berths on the 6th March 1889. She had not obtained leave to moor there, and she was ordered away. She moved away, and another ship, the Barcelona, discharged at the warehouse. The Barcelona completed her discharge on the 7th; this ship then moved to her berth on the 8th. The warehouse was full. The 9th was Saturday; she was ordered to discharge on Monday, the 11th, and did so without any delay after that time. The charterers have been charged demurrage for four days, that is from the 6th to the 11th. I do not think it can be maintained that she was at the usual fruit berth before the 8th. It has been argued that the word "customary" in this charter-party does not excuse the charterers for a delay in receiving the cargo occasioned by the custom of the port. The charterers, it is said, directly the ship was at the proper berth were bound to take delivery as fast as the ship could give it. One, or at most two, days were enough to unload her, and for four of the six during which she was there demurrage should therefore be paid. No doubt, in a case where the words were "the cargo is to be discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port," the House of Lords, in Postlethwaite v. Freeland, held that the word "customary" applied to despatch, and meant such despatch as the custom of the port permitted. But here it is said "customary" refers only to the mode of taking delivery, with which the shipowner has no concern. I cannot concur in this argument. I think that "as customary" in this charter-party relates directly to the discharge and delivery by the ship rather than to the taking delivery by a consignee. "To be discharged as fast as steamer can deliver as customary" means that the discharge and delivery is to be as the custom of the port would allow, and that the shipowner took the risk of a delay in that discharge and delivery owing to the custom of the port. It was argued that those words refer only to the mode of delivery, the means and appliances for actually taking the cargo out of the ship—and not to the time within which it was to be done, which is fixed by the words "as fast as the steamer can deliver." I will assume that, by using the cranes at the warehouses, the discharge would be facilitated and be more rapid and would take a shorter time than by any other method. The shipowner would by the terms of this charter-party be bound to use the customary mode if it were more expeditious. Why not also if it involved some little delay?

Then it was said with some force that the real reason for the delay was that the warehouses were full, and the shipowners had nothing to do with that. The charterers or consignees should have arranged that room should be found in them, or that some other mode of taking delivery should be substituted. On the 6th March, Desmold, consignee of a large part of the fruit, wrote in answer to a letter of the captain, that the warehouses were full, that there were no quays available, and he offered to take delivery in the harbour, which he said would take three or four days, if not more, whereas if the ship waited till the 11th she could discharge at the warehouse by that night. The captain states that discharging in the harbour meant into lighters, which would take more time. The warehouses were under the management of the harbour authorities, said to be the Government, and the consignees were not responsible for their being full at the time. By the usual rule goods were removed in twenty-four hours, and if Sunday was not a working day this was done on Saturday the 9th, so that on Monday the 11th the warehouses were ready to receive this cargo. The captain, having the alternative of discharging in the harbour into lighters which would possibly have taken longer, elected, very prudently I should think, in the interests of the shipowners, to proceed by the customary mode of discharging, and waited till Monday the 11th, thereby possibly saving time for the ship and precisely following the terms of the charter-party. I think the true result of the evidence is, that there was no delay except what was occasioned by the custom of the port, and for this the charterers are not responsible.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

County Court—Admiralty jurisdiction—Demurrage—Action by shipowner—County Court of district in which owner resides—Vessel or property to which the cause relates—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 21, sub-sects. (1) and (2)—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), ss. 1 and 2, sub-sect. (1).

By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 2, jurisdiction in Admiralty is given to the County Courts up to a specified limit "as to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship."

Held, that an action for demurrage brought upon a bill of lading is within the above-mentioned section.

The Alina (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 517; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 257; 5 Ex. Div. 227) followed.

By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 21, "proceedings in an Admiralty cause shall be commenced (1) in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction within the district of which the vessel or property to which the cause relates is at the commencement of the proceedings; (2) if the foregoing rule be not applicable, then in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction in the district of which the owner of the vessel or property to which the cause relates, or his agent in England, resides. . . ."

An action was brought in a County Court by shipowners against the indorsees of a bill of lading which incorporated the terms of the charter-party, for demurrage for detention of the plaintiffs' ship at the port of discharge. At the commencement of the proceedings the vessel was on the high seas, and the cargo to which the bill of lading referred was within the district of another County Court.

Held, that the cause related to the vessel only, and proceedings were therefore rightly commenced under sub-sect. (2) of sect. 21 of the Act of 1868 in the court in the district of which the owners of the vessel resided. (b)

(b) cf. The case of The County of Durham (1891) P. 1; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 606), where Sir Jas. Hannen and Butt, J. decided that an action for breach of charter-party was rightly instituted by the shipowner in the Admiralty County Court within the district of which his ship was.—ED.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Pollock, B. and Williams, J.) dismissing an application for a writ of prohibition to the judge of the County Court of Monmouthshire holden at Newport.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Irwin and resided at Newport, Monmouthshire, and the defendants carried on business as timber merchants at Wisbeach.

The Irwin was detained for two days at Wisbech while discharging a cargo of timber which the defendants received under a bill of lading which incorporated the terms of the charter-party.

The action was brought for 40*l.* for this detention against the defendants as indorsees of the bill of lading, and was commenced in the County Court of Monmouthshire holden at Newport.

At the commencement of the proceedings, the Irwin was on the high seas and the cargo was within the district of King's Lynn County Court.

By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), it is provided by sect. 21

> Proceedings in an Admiralty cause shall be commenced—(1) in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction within the district of which the vessel or property to which the cause relates is at the commencement of the proceedings; (2) if the foregoing rule be not applicable, then in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction in the district of which the owner of the vessel or property to which the cause relates, or his agent in England, resides. . .

By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), it is provided by sect. 1 that the Act shall be read and interpreted as one Act with the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868.

By sect. 2 it is provided:

> Any County Court appointed, or to be appointed, to have Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine the following causes: (1) as to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship . . . provided the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

The defendants took out a summons asking that a writ of prohibition might be directed to the judge of the Monmouthshire County Court on the ground that that court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the action.

Denman, J. referred the summons to the court.

The Queen's Bench Division (Pollock, B. and Williams, J.) dismissed the application.

The defendants appealed.

Arthur Pritchard for the defendants.—This action has been brought in the Monmouthshire County Court under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts. It is submitted that the cause is not within those Acts. Lord Esher, M.R., in a recent case, said that a County Court has no jurisdiction, except to a limited amount, in regard to matters in which the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction, and that (with one exception) if the Admiralty Court has no jurisdiction, the County Court Acts have not given any jurisdiction to the County Courts:

Reg. v. The Judge of the City of London Court, 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 140; 66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 135; (1892) 1 Q. B. 273.

The Alina; Brown and Sons v. The Alina, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 517: 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 257; 5 Ex. Div. 227.

That case was decided by the Court of Appeal, and Lord Esher, M.R., in Reg. v. The Judge of the City of London Court, said it should not be extended to anything but what it actually applied to. The present case is not on a charter-party, but on a bill of lading, and the decision in The Alina is therefore not applicable. If the Court should hold that the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts apply to this case, then it is submitted that the action has been brought in the wrong County Court. The action relates in substance to the cargo, no question arises about the vessel. The matter therefore comes within sub-sect. (1) of sect. 21 of the Act of 1868, and the proceedings should be commenced in the County Court in the district of which the cargo is. If the cause relates to the vessel as well as the cargo, then, since the vessel was on the high seas, the proceedings should be commenced in the court in the district of which the cargo is:

The County of Durham, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 606; 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 146; (1891) P. 1.

Joseph Walton, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that there is nothing which gives a County Court jurisdiction in Admiralty in the case of an action on a bill of lading, unless the decision in the case of The Alina (ubi sup.) compels us to hold that the Act of 1869 gives such jurisdiction. My opinion of The Alina is that it was a wrong judgment, and one founded on wrong reasons; nevertheless we are bound by the decision. It is true that that case had reference to a charter-party, but to distinguish that matter from a bill of lading with regard to the question now before us is too much of a refinement. As long as that case stands it must be held to apply to a bill of lading as much as to a charter-party. The present action must therefore be taken, according to that case, to be one in which the County Court has Admiralty jurisdiction. It seems to me a very unsatisfactory piece of legislation to give an English County Court jurisdiction to decide questions on charter-parties and bills of lading which may involve difficult matters as to the mode of dealing at foreign ports. The question therefore comes to this: assuming that it is an Admiralty action and that it is within the County Court jurisdiction, which County Court is it given to? The action now before us is on a bill of lading in respect of a failure to discharge a ship in the time stipulated in the bill of lading which incorporates a stipulation in the charter-party for the discharge of the vessel "as fast as steamship can deliver as customary." The claim is, that she did not discharge her cargo as fast as she could deliver as customary, and the owners have therefore brought this action. The cause of action is the detention of the ship, not the mode of discharge of the cargo. The mode of the discharge is of no consequence to the owners, though no doubt it is the cause of the detention; but the cause of the detention is different to the cause of action, which relates to the ship alone. The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 does not deal with the point we have now to consider, but the Act is to be read as one with the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and by sect. 21 of the earlier of these two Acts it is provided that "proceedings in an Admiralty cause shall be commenced (1) in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction within the district of which the vessel or property to which the cause relates is at the commencement of the proceedings." Now, this action is about a vessel; so we may leave out of consideration the words "or property." The vessel to which the cause relates was on the high seas when the action was brought. Therefore the provision does not apply here. Then the section goes on thus: "(2) if the foregoing rule be not applicable, then in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction in the district of which the owner of the vessel or property to which the cause relates, or his agent in England, resides." As sub-sect. (1) does not apply here, sub-sect. (2) is brought into play, and the action was rightly brought therefore in the Monmouthshire County Court, and this appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—This is an action for demurrage for the delay of the plaintiffs' ship during her discharge at Wisbech. At the time when the action was brought the ship was on the high seas, but the cargo was at Wisbeach, which is within the district of the Norfolk County Court. That being so, the first question raised before us was, whether the claim made by the plaintiffs is within sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, which gives jurisdiction "as to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship." Under these words it would seem that this claim must be included, but a question was raised whether the section was not intended to apply only to such claims as were within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty. Now, it was decided by the Court of Appeal in The Alina (ubi sup.) that these words apply to a claim made upon a charter-party, and from that decision it seems to me that the words must equally apply to a claim made upon a bill of lading. Then it was said that the decision in Reg. v. The Judge of the City of London Court (ubi sup.) shows that the decision in The Alina must be limited so as to apply only to the case of a charter-party; but, as the Master of the Rolls has already pointed out, it would be most unreasonable to confine the effect of the decision to the case of a charter-party only.

The second question arises under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and has regard to the place where the action is to be brought. Now by sect. 21, sub-sect. (1), of that Act, it is provided that proceedings in an Admiralty cause shall be commenced "in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction within the district of which the vessel or property to which the cause relates is at the commencement of the proceedings." That language appears to me to apply to causes which relate either to a vessel or else to property. It is not necessary to determine what would happen if a cause related both to a vessel and to property, because in my judgment this cause relates to a vessel, and to a vessel only. The claim is merely for the detention of the ship. Now, the vessel in this case being abroad when the action commenced, sub-sect. (1) is not applicable, and therefore sub-sect. (2) is applicable. The Monmouthshire County Court was the right one in which to bring this action, and this appeal must consequently be dismissed, Lopes, L.J.—In the case of Reg. v. The Judge of the City of London Court (ubi sup.) the court had no intention of drawing any distinction between charter-parties and bills of lading in the question that came before it. The Alina (ubi sup.) has laid down the law that a County Court has Admiralty jurisdiction in the case of a charter-party, and the conclusion must follow that it has jurisdiction also in questions arising on a bill of lading. So much for the Act of 1869. Now the Act of 1869 is to be read as one with the Act of 1868, and under that Act we must consider what is the cause of action here. It is solely the detention of a vessel, and as that vessel was on the high seas when this action commenced it seems to me to be perfectly clear that sub-sect. (1) of sect. 21 of the Act of 1868 is inapplicable. Therefore sub-sect. (2) must be applied. Consequently the Monmouthshire County Court had jurisdiction, and the prohibition was rightly refused by the Queen's Bench Division.

Appeal dismissed.

The Assicurazioni Generali and Schenker and Co. v. The S.S. Bessie Morris Company Limited and Browne. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Non-completion of voyage — Excepted perils—Perils of the sea—Disablement of ship—Duty to complete voyage.

A shipowner who has agreed that his ship shall proceed to a certain port and there deliver the cargo, unless prevented by the perils of the sea, is not justified in abandoning the voyage, unless the excepted perils have made it, either physically impossible to complete the voyage, or so clearly unreasonable, as to be impossible from a business point of view.

Held, therefore, that where a vessel had gone ashore but had been got off and repaired, so as to be capable of proceeding to the port of discharge, within a reasonable time, the shipowners are liable to the charterers for any loss that they may sustain by reason of the shipowner not carrying out the charter-party.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Collins, J., at the trial without a jury in Middlesex.

This was an action by the charterers of a ship, against the shipowners and the master, to recover the sum of 424*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.* alleged to be due from the defendants under the written instruments signed by the defendant Browne, as master of the steamship Bessie Morris, of which the defendant company were owners.

By a charter-party made between the plaintiffs, Schenker and Co., as charterers, and the defendant company as owners, it was agreed that, for an agreed sum, the ship should proceed to Fiume, and to one, two, three or four Adriatic ports, and there load a full and complete cargo, and thence proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom; and that freight should be paid by as much cash as the master might require for ship's disbursements at port of loading, not exceeding 200*l.*, to be advanced subject to 3 per cent. for interest and insurance, and remainder at port of discharge on unloading and true delivery of the cargo, in cash, at current rates of exchange; but, should the total freight shown by bills of lading amount to less than the freight stipulated by the charter-party, the difference should be paid to the captain before sailing; and should the freight shown by bills of lading amount to more than the freight stipulated in the charter-party, the difference should be paid before sailing to charterers by captain's promissory note payable forty-eight hours after arrival at discharging port.

The ship proceeded to Fiume and other ports, and was there loaded by the plaintiffs, Schenker and Co., who paid for ship's disbursements at those ports the sum of 244*l.* 15*s.* The freight payable under the bills of lading exceeded the stipulated freight by 151*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.* The defendant Browne, in respect of these sums, gave two written promises to pay, the one for 124*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* and the other for 272*l.* 6*s.* 11*d.*

These two instruments were subsequently indorsed and assigned to the plaintiff company.

The ship proceeded on her voyage to London, the port nominated by the charterers, and, when near Gibraltar, on the 2nd March she went ashore and was partially submerged. Of her cargo, some was jettisoned, some was washed out, and the rest had to be taken out of her. Some of the cargo was properly sold at Gibraltar, and some was sent on to London in two other ships at a cost of 66*l.*, the original freight thereon being 113*l.*, which was paid by the consignees. A contract was made with salvors to get the ship off, at an expense of 40 per cent. of her value, delivered at Gibraltar. This service the salvors succeeded in accomplishing, and they accepted the sum of 2900*l.* as their remuneration in respect thereof. The vessel was then temporarily repaired at Gibraltar at an expense of 750*l.* These repairs were completed on the 25th April, and on that day the vessel left Gibraltar for Oran, whence she procured a cargo for Garston, where she arrived on the 10th May, earning a freight of 572*l.*

After the vessel had been repaired at Gibraltar she could have proceeded to London with part of the cargo which was sold at Gibraltar, together with the remainder of the cargo, which was forwarded in other vessels to London.

The action was tried before Collins, J., without a jury, when the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Bigham, Q.C. and Hurst, for the appellants, argued that the vessel became a constructive total loss, and that the defendants were therefore justified in abandoning the voyage to London. They cited

Moss v. Smith, 9 C. B. 94;
Benson v. Chapman, 2 H. of L. Cas. 696.

Sir Walter Phillimore, Q.C. and Joseph Walton, for the respondents, were not heard.

Lord Esher, M.R.—By the charter-party in this case it was agreed that the vessel should proceed to Fiume, and to one, two, three, or four Adriatic ports, and there load, and thence proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom, and the charterers were given an option to nominate the port in the United Kingdom. The charterers did nominate a port, namely London, and there was therefore an absolute contract to carry the goods to London. The charter-party contained the ordinary exception that the voyage was to be performed unless prevented by perils of the sea. We must therefore consider whether the shipowner, who did not bring either the cargo or the vessel to London upon that voyage, was prevented by perils of the sea from so doing. The vessel took the ground at Gibraltar, and the plaintiffs' cargo was then on board. If the vessel had been so stranded as to be unable to get off the ground, it is obvious that she would have been prevented from completing the voyage by perils of the sea. The vessel, however, was got off. If she had been got off as a mere wreck, as in the case illustrated by Maule, J. in Moss v. Smith (ubi sup.), and if she could not have been repaired so as to perform the voyage in fulfilment of the contract, that is to say, within such a time as to make the voyage after repair really the voyage contracted to be made, then she would have been prevented from fulfilling the contract by perils of the sea; and, similarly, if she was at a place where she could not have been repaired. In this case nothing of that sort happened. The vessel was got off and taken into port at Gibraltar, where repairs were possible. That being so, what was the duty of the shipowner? Under such a charter-party as this it was his duty to repair if he could possibly do so. That he could repair the vessel at Gibraltar cannot be denied. The possibility of repairing must, however, be a business possibility, as was said by Maule, J. in Smith v. Moss (ubi sup.), where he explains what is a business possibility, and says that if the vessel cannot be repaired so as to continue and complete the voyage without the cost of the repairs being more than the value of the ship when repaired, then it is impossible, in a business sense, to repair her, because a reasonable man would not repair her under such circumstances. Now what are the facts of this case? The vessel was repaired at Gibraltar sufficiently to carry her to Liverpool, a longer voyage than to London, at a cost of 750*l.* in addition to the salvage expenses, which were 2900*l.* The vessel therefore could be repaired, and it is clear that any reasonable shipowner would have done what this shipowner did, for the vessel was repaired at a cost far less than the value of the vessel when repaired. No reasonable shipowner would, in my opinion, have failed to do what this shipowner did, and therefore he was not prevented from completing the voyage by perils of the sea, but by his own misconduct. He ought to have brought the cargo to London, but, for purposes of his own, he did not do so, and broke his contract. This seems then to be a perfectly clear case, and the only colour for the appeal has been given by the introduction of the argument as to a constructive total loss. That has nothing whatever to do with this case. There is no underwriter concerned in this case, and the question of constructive total loss only arises when an underwriter is concerned.

Then there is the question as to what are the damages. The charterer had the use of the ship as to his goods on board the ship, and for that he was to pay a lump sum for freight. What is the law applicable to that state of facts? If the vessel arrives, although part of the cargo is not brought into port, yet, if any part of the cargo is brought, the shipowner is entitled to the lump freight. Lump freight is, however, freight, and is to be earned by the carriage of goods on the voyage to the end of the voyage. But, if the voyage is never performed at all and the performance is not prevented by perils of the sea, then no freight at all is due. This shipowner, therefore, by refusing to perform the voyage and not bringing the vessel to London at all upon that voyage, has earned no freight at all. He is not entitled to any freight whatever. The result then is this: that the shipowner borrowed money from the charterers on commencing the voyage for the purposes of the voyage, and that money was a mere loan and not prepaid freight. This money was advanced to the master, with the authority of the shipowner, for disbursements, and was disbursed for payments which the shipowner was bound to make, and the shipowner is bound to repay that money, and the charterers who lent it are entitled to recover it back. The charterers are also entitled to recover for the breach of contract as to the voyage any damages naturally resulting from the non-completion of the voyage. I am of opinion that, if the goods which were loaded on board this vessel were taken to some other port, the charterers are entitled to have their goods back or to be paid their full value, and also to recover any profits which they would have made upon those goods at the proper market. The judgment of the learned judge at the trial was quite right, and this appeal fails.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There was in this case a contract to perform a particular voyage unless prevented by perils of the sea, and the only excuse made by the shipowner is that he was prevented by perils of the sea. The vessel went aground, and the shipowner had then to consider whether the ship would complete the voyage. The vessel was bound to complete the voyage unless she was unnavigable, and unnavigable either because she could not be got afloat at all, or because she could be got afloat but the expense of getting her afloat would be so great as to make the attempt unreasonable. Here, however, the vessel was got afloat, and was repaired in time to perform the voyage under the charter-party. If the shipowner acts upon the view that it is possible to repair the vessel and proceed, it is then clear that it is not impossible to do so, and it becomes absurd to discuss the question of constructive total loss, and to say that the performance of the voyage was prevented by perils of the sea. The law upon this subject is perfectly clear, and has been laid down in Moss v. Smith (ubi sup.). In that case Maule, J. says:

"However damaged the ship may be, if it be practicable to repair her, so as to enable her to complete the adventure, she is not totally lost. The ordinary measure of prudence which the courts have adopted is this: if the ship, when repaired, will not be worth the sum which it would be necessary to expend upon her, the repairs are, practically speaking, impossible, and it is a case of total loss." It is obvious that the learned judge is there only discussing the measure of prudence which would justify a shipowner in abandoning the voyage, or would make him repair the vessel, and that he is not discussing the law when a ship has been made navigable. In the same case (Moss v. Smith) Cresswell, J. says: "Now, when is a shipowner said to be prevented by the perils of the sea from fulfilling his contract? Why, when the ship is so much damaged by perils of the sea as to be rendered incapable of performing the voyage. That is the case when the perils of the sea are the only exception introduced into the contract. When a ship has sustained sea damage to a certain extent, she is not therefore incapable of performing the voyage because she wants repairs. . . . If a ship sustains so much sea damage that she cannot be repaired; if she is at a place where she cannot be repaired and rendered competent to navigate, then she is prevented fulfilling the voyage by perils of the sea. If the ship is totally lost, sunk, submerged, destroyed, she is, again, prevented by perils of the sea. The courts have also engrafted this further qualification, that if the owner can show that the damage sustained by the perils of the sea is so great that he could not prudently and reasonably be called upon to repair the damage, that he is then prevented from fulfilling his contract by perils of the sea." He also is discussing the question as to when it is reasonable to repair a vessel, and not the case when the repairs have been actually done. In this case the ship never was unnavigable or incapable of performing the voyage. Perhaps the shipowner might have been justified in treating the ship as incapable of being repaired, but he did not do so. It is absurd to argue that the shipowner can say that he was prevented from fulfilling his contract by perils of the sea by reason of the great expense of repairing, when he did in fact repair and proceed upon a voyage. Here, therefore, the completion of the voyage was not prevented by perils of the sea, and the abandonment of the contract was unjustifiable, and the lump freight which was paid in advance cannot be retained by the shipowner. The judgment of Collins, J. must be affirmed, and this appeal be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—This is in effect an action by the charterers of a ship to recover damages from the shipowner for non-completion of the voyage. The voyage never was actually completed, and the defence is that the voyage was not completed because it was prevented by perils of the sea within the meaning of the exception contained in the charter-party. There are several answers to that contention. The first is, that the voyage to this country was in fact completed, though it was made to Liverpool and not to London, and it is clear that it could have been made to London. The voyage therefore was not in fact prevented at all. It has been argued that the cost of complete repairs would have been so great that the master of the vessel could have excused himself from carrying the cargo to London upon the ground that there was a constructive total loss. That contention is ridiculous when the vessel did in fact make a voyage to Liverpool. It has been said that the ship was salved and repaired at a cost of 2900*l.*, but there is no evidence that she was not worth more than that sum after she had been repaired. The test as to a constructive total loss which has been laid down is whether the cost of repairs would be more than the value of the ship when repaired. There is no evidence here that it would be so. The ship was taken from Gibraltar to Liverpool, and there a large outlay was made upon her, which the defendants seek to add to the expenses incurred at Gibraltar in order to make out that the cost of repair was more than the value of the ship. There is no evidence even of that. On all these points the appellants' contentions fail. As to the other point, in reference to the money borrowed by the master from the charterers for disbursements, as to which it is said that under the terms of the charter-party it was advances made from freight, the advances actually made were more than the 200*l.* stipulated in the charter-party, and were made upon written contracts to repay. This money therefore was advanced upon the terms that it should be a loan. No freight at all was earned, and the shipowner seeks to refuse to repay the loan by repudiating the condition as to repayment. Even if this money is to be considered as freight, no freight was earned and the shipowner cannot retain it. The case, therefore, breaks down at every point, and the appeal must be dismissed.

It appeared from the bills of lading that the voyage was not to Seville at all, and the bill of lading of the goods in question was made out to Cartagena. The ship was lost with the goods while on that part of the voyage which was common to vessels going to the western ports of Spain, and those going to the eastern ports. Consignors, on discovering the change of voyage after the loss, offered to pay the extra premium to Cartagena, but it was refused. In an action upon the policy by the consignors, the assured, against the underwriters:

July 23.—The following judgment was read by

WRIGHT, J.—The action was brought upon a policy of insurance on merchandise "as interests may appear or be hereafter declared at and from the Mersey or London to any port in Portugal or Spain this side of Gibraltar, and thence by any inland conveyances to any place in the interior of Spain or Portugal, including all risks whatever from the time of leaving the warehouse in the United Kingdom, and all risk of every kind until safely delivered at the warehouses of the consignee, with liberty to touch or stay at any ports or places whatsoever for any purpose, necessary or otherwise." There was a marginal note in these terms: "Deviation and (or) change of voyage and (or) transshipment not included in the policy to be held covered at a premium to be arranged." In other respects the policy was in the usual marine form. The goods in question were despatched on or before the 2nd March from Leeds to Madrid. On former occasions the goods of the same consignor for Madrid had been shipped at Liverpool for Seville, and carried thence by land to Madrid. The consignor intended the same course to be followed in this case, and supposed it would be followed; and on the 3rd March he caused the goods to be "declared" on the policy. On the 7th March he learned that the goods would go by the ship Lope de Vega, and on the 10th he caused the name of that ship to be inserted in the declaration, instructing the insurance broker that the voyage was to Seville. The ship had cleared from Liverpool on the 6th March, and she was lost with the goods in question while on that part of the voyage which was common to vessels going to the western ports of Spain, and to those going to the eastern ports. It was then discovered from the bills of lading that the voyage of the Lope de Vega was not to Seville at all, but only to Carril and Huelva on the west coast, and Cartagena and other ports on the east coast, and that the bills of lading of these goods had been made out for Cartagena. The plaintiffs immediately informed the underwriters of the mistake, and offered the proper extra premium for Cartagena, but this offer was refused, not on the ground of insufficiency of premium offered, but absolutely and on the ground that the voyage to Cartagena was not one of the voyages covered by the policy.

These being the facts, I think that in substance this is a marine insurance from the Thames or Mersey to a port on the west coast of Spain. Terminal risks, including risks of land transit in Spain, are included, but the substance of the risks undertaken appears to me to be the voyage as above described, and the other risks are undertaken only as supplementary to that. If this is so, then it is clear that there was not in this case any intention to deviate, nor, if the voyage had been completed, would there have been a mere deviation. The ship, so far as these goods are concerned, sailed on a different voyage, and one for which the assured had no right under the policy to "declare" them. Any different construction would bring a voyage to Havre or Marseilles within the policy, and would entitle and bind the assured to "declare" under the policy any goods forwarded to Spain viâ those ports. Then comes the question, what is the effect of the deviation clause in such a case? It is contended for the underwriters that the words "change of voyage" in that clause apply only to a change after the policy has once attached by commencement of a voyage of such a kind that, if not changed, it would have been within the policy, and that an initial declaration and shipment of the goods on any other voyage is outside the contract, and that the clause, therefore, never comes into operation at all. The contention for the assured is that, when the goods left the warehouse, they being then intended by the consignors to proceed by a route covered by the policy, the declaration was rightly made, and the policy attached, and the clause applied, and the assured were entitled to change the voyage on the terms of paying the extra premium to Cartagena, the amount of which is not in dispute. The point is a nice one, but I think that the contention of the underwriters must prevail. If the substance of the policy is the maritime risk, I think that the character of the preliminary conveyance before the ship is reached must be determined by that of the voyage on which the goods were actually shipped, and that the goods must, until shipment, be taken to have started for the voyage for which they were afterwards in fact shipped; and, if so, the voyage for which these goods were started was not a voyage for which they could be declared, and the policy and deviation clause never attached. There must, therefore, be judgment for the defendants with costs.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury), Lords WATSON, HERSCHELL, MORRIS, and FIELD.)

RENEY v. MAGISTRATES OF KIRKCUDBRIGHT.(a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE FIRST DIVISION OF THE COURT OF SESSION IN SCOTLAND.

Damage — Negligence of harbour-master — Contributory negligence.

Where a harbour-master acting under statutory powers is directing the course of a ship within his jurisdiction, the persons in charge of the ship are not at liberty to disregard his orders because they believe (rightly) that he is making a mistake, except in the last resort, when the danger of strictly obeying them is fully obvious.

A ship of the appellant was entering the harbour of the respondents under the directions of their harbour-master, whose orders those in charge of the ship were legally bound to obey. The master was in charge of the ship, and he was assisted in the navigation by two local fishermen. In consequence of a mistake of the harbour-master as to the state of the tide, the vessel ran upon a bank, and was damaged. The master was not aware of the existence of the bank, but the fishermen were aware of it, and of the true state of the tide.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the accident was caused by the negligence of the harbour-master, for which the respondents were liable, and that there was no contributory negligence on the part of those in charge of the ship.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, consisting of the Lord President (Inglis), Lords Adam, McLaren, and Kinnear, who had reversed a judgment of the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) in an action brought by the appellant against the respondents, in respect of damage sustained by the stranding of his vessel, the Janet and Ann, in consequence of the alleged negligence of their harbour-master.

The case is reported in 18 Court Sess. Cas. (4th series) 294. The First Division of the Court of Session held that the negligence of the harbour-master led to the stranding, but that the persons in charge of the ship were in fault, that their negligence contributed to the collision, and that the defendants were therefore assoilzied.

At the time of the alleged negligence the plaintiff's ship was entering Kirkcudbright Docks in charge of her master, who was assisted by two local fishermen. The tide had just begun to ebb, and it appeared to be unusual to take vessels in on the ebb without bringing them to anchor first. As the ship approached the dock, the harbour-master was hailed by one of the fishermen to know whether the vessel was to come to anchor; but the harbour-master, not knowing that the tide was ebbing, ordered the vessel to come on, and, in consequence thereof, she went aground.

The facts appear sufficiently from the head-note above, and from the judgments of their Lordships.

Kennedy, Q.C. and Witt, Q.C. appeared for the appellant.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (A. Graham Murray, Q.C.) and Crole (of the Scotch Bar) for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: The facts of this case are extremely clear, and I entertain no doubt as to the party upon whom the responsibility for the accident rests. This vessel, as I understand the matter, was hindered in her approach to the dock to which she was intended to proceed by going over a bank which is not obvious to anybody not familiar with the place, but it was perfectly familiar to the harbour-master. We start with this concession, about which there can be no doubt, because it is proved by the person who is principally interested in denying it, that the harbour-master was under the impression that the tide was either flood tide or slack water. The next proposition which is established by the harbour-master is that the manœuvre which he had intended the vessel to execute was not to anchor at all, but to come straight into the dock. Now that immediately raises this question: it is clear that if the tide had been flood tide the operation of it would have kept the vessel away from the shore, even although she was under a port helm. The question is a question of yards, so that a yard or two one way or the other would make the whole difference. The harbour-master's own account of the transaction is that he saw the vessel, and he would know that she was under a port helm. Now the harbour-master says: "I intended her to be in the middle channel, and to keep her so that she would be perfectly safe, and therefore what I intended to do was to tell her to keep off, and I afterwards intended to give her further directions when she should be sufficiently level with the entrance to the dock; my intention was to make her keep off." He carries out that intention by directing her to come on. I omit for the moment the particular direction which he gave. I do not think that anybody (unless you have the situation of all the persons concerned perfectly crystallised, so that it cannot be altered) is able to give a proper verbal description of the way in which the harbour-master's hand waved—whether it was right and left, or backwards or forwards; but that everybody on board understood it to be a direction and an obligation to them to come on, to come nearer to the dock, is certain—in fact, there is no denial of it at all. The result was, as a matter of fact, that the vessel, being steered by the master, who knew nothing of the particular obstruction which was ultimately caused to the vessel, was steered in the appropriate and proper way to bring her into the dock, assuming that no such obstruction existed; and the accident happened by reason of the vessel grounding on the bank through that wrong steering. It is said in the first place that the two persons who were on board (I decline to dignify them with the name of "pilots," for that is not an appropriate description of them, inasmuch as they were merely fishermen who came on board to assist the captain by their local knowledge) knew of the difficulty. Then comes this question: the original blunder was on the part of the harbour-master, who did not know what the state of the tide was, it being admitted that the state of the tide makes a considerable difference in the directions which ought to be given by the person in charge of the operation. He gave directions which would have been appropriate to one state of the tide, in which the tide was not, but were perfectly inappropriate to the state of the tide at that time.

It is said that the two local pilots (I give them their dignified appellation) ought to have seen that there was danger. Now we must see upon what hypothesis the two local pilots were proceeding. One was under the impression (there can be no doubt about it, not only because they say so, but also because the acts of the persons at the time show what was thought to be intended) that so far from the vessel being sailed straight into the dock, she was being brought up as near as she could be safely got to the pier head, and was then to drop her anchor, so as to keep her in a proper position for afterwards entering the harbour. One of them called out twice, and the last time in a tone which indicated some anxiety or impatience, I think, "Tell me when I am to drop my anchor." Now upon what hypothesis was the harbour-master acting? If, as he says himself, he was under the impression that the vessel was to sail straight in, what was his duty then? Surely when these local men, upon whom the counsel for the respondents relied, and as to whom they urged that we were entitled to consider that they would know what the difficulty was, called out to the harbour-master, he must have known from their words that the idea in their minds, in respect of which they must be supposed to have been acting, was first to anchor, and then to work the vessel in. Instead of acting upon that idea, he twice used the words, "Come on." I do not care with what gesture they were accompanied, for everybody concerned was under the impression that he meant the vessel to come on, and she did come on. Under these circumstances there appears to me to be no doubt as to what was the cause of mischief, and as to who was responsible for it. The harbour-master gave the direction which he did, as he was entitled to do. It is admitted that the vessel at that time was under the orders of the harbour-master. His effort is to show that until the vessel has actually got into the dock his authority does not arise, and that all the functions up to that time belong to those who are on board the vessel. It is not necessary to show, because it is admitted, and even if it were not admitted it is quite manifest, that the harbour-master was then, in the exercise of his vocation and duty, giving directions to the vessels which were coming into the harbour. He did give directions to this particular vessel, and, as it appears to me, those directions were implicitly obeyed. I do not understand what direction is supposed to have been disregarded, or what negligence is supposed to have been committed. The Solicitor-General said that the direction to come on was negligently obeyed, because they came on under a port helm. What was the thing which was being done? It was what anybody might suppose from the harbour-master's statement and directions was intended to be done. I do not see any negligence. The witness said that the place where he expected to anchor, which was within a few yards of the place where they did actually anchor, was the usual place to anchor. But, as the Lord President very pertinently observes, if the harbour-master had even then called out in time and had ordered the vessel to be anchored, no accident would have happened. I think that the judgment of the Lord President is confirmatory of the view which I take, because in his judgment he says that the harbour-master eventually gave that direction, but that he ought to have given it sooner than he did. If that be the true view of the facts, there does not seem to me to be room for the defence of contributory negligence. The Solicitor-General rather repudiated the notion of the matter being decided upon the question of contributory negligence at all. In truth there is no question here of contributory negligence. The question is, who is responsible for what was ordered? Taking one view, the cause of the accident was the negligence of one set of people; and taking the other view, the cause of it was the negligence of the other set of people, there being no contributory negligence upon either hypothesis.

Under these circumstances it appears to me that the cause of the accident is abundantly clear; and the only proposition made here on the other side is a sort of suggestion that the harbour-master had a limited authority by reason of his being aware that those persons who were on board the vessel were more familiar with the local circumstances of the place, and with the navigation, being fishermen, than he was. I think that that would be a very dangerous proposition to lay down. Of course no one supposes that this is a case of wilfully running against an obstruction; but to say that the harbour-master's authority is limited, or that a person is at liberty to disregard the orders of the harbour-master, who has by law power to give orders, because that person may have an idea in his mind that the harbour-master is making a mistake, would be, to my mind, a most dangerous principle to establish. A double authority would probably be in many cases fatal. Those who have the power to give orders have the right to consider that they will be obeyed. It would to my mind be a very strong thing to say that a particular direction of the harbour-master in reference to what a vessel shall do, when he is within his right in giving it, shall be disobeyed. I therefore move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary be restored.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: I am also of opinion that the judgment of the Inner House in this case must be reversed, and the decision of the Lord Ordinary restored. The mistake which caused damage to the ship arose from the vessel porting her helm, in consequence of which she ran on the bank, and there stranded. The question is, who was responsible for that mistake? Now when the vessel stranded she was confessedly within the harbour-master's jurisdiction, her own captain being in charge. In the performance of his duty he was assisted by two local fishermen. It seems to me to be clearly proved, and to have been assumed by the learned judges in both courts below, that the line upon which the vessel was steered by her captain was the very course which the harbour-master, by his words and gestures, had invited her to pursue. It was suggested in argument by the Solicitor-General that, although the captain was ignorant of the danger which following that course as far as the pier would necessarily entail, yet it was known to two persons on board, namely, the fishermen to whom I have referred; and he further argued that the owner of the vessel was affected by the knowledge of these men. I consider that, to say the least of it, to be a very doubtful and dangerous proposition. But I do not think it necessary to consider that point, because these two men were not in charge of the vessel at that time. If they had known or understood that the harbour-master intended the vessel to sail straight along the course which I have indicated into the harbour, I think it would have been their duty, seeing the knowledge which they had, to take some steps to prevent that order from being followed out. Although they were not in charge, I think it would have been their duty to inform the captain. I do not suggest that their failure of duty in that respect, the captain being in charge, would have absolved the harbour-master, or the respondents in this appeal, whose servant he was, from the consequences of his neglect. But these two fishermen were under the impression, a very natural one, that the captain of the vessel had been directed as to the course which he was meant to pursue, but that the vessel would come to an anchor before reaching the pier, in order that she might subsequently be worked into the harbour. Accordingly, when they reached that point, they made an earnest appeal, or rather a series of earnest appeals, to the harbour-master to give them directions, and to let them know when they were to drop their anchor. The harbour-master made no response to these appeals, for this very obvious reason, that at the time when they were made it was his intention that the vessel should proceed, and enter the harbour under her own sail. He did entertain that intention, and intended to give directions to that effect, because he was negligently ignorant of the state of the tide at the time. He discovered his own ignorance just a moment too late, and then he changed his plan and gave the order which he ought to have given before, to drop anchor; and the consequence of his having been too late is one for which I think the respondents are clearly responsible.

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. According to the account which the harbour-master himself gives, for whom the defenders are responsible, he was on the occasion in question inviting this vessel to enter the harbour. He was so inviting her under the impression that the tide was a flood tide, or at all events in ignorance that it was an ebb tide; and it appears clear upon all hands that for a vessel to enter the harbour otherwise than upon a flood tide is a dangerous operation, and one which ought not to be attempted. According, therefore, to the showing of the harbour-master himself, he was giving an invitation which, under the circumstances, he ought not to have given, because it was one which could not be followed without danger. Now that is the case put forward by the defenders' own main witness, on whose action everything turned so far as they are concerned. It seems to me impossible to doubt that the learned judges in the court below were right in thinking that there was ample evidence to warrant the conclusion (indeed that only one conclusion was possible) that there had been negligence on the part of the harbour-master, and that for that negligence the defenders were responsible. This was the conclusion of the Lord Ordinary at the close of his judgment in favour of the appellant. But the learned judges in the Inner House came to the conclusion that, although negligence was established, the defenders must be assoilzied because there was contributory negligence on the part of the appellant, without which this accident would not have happened. Now that contributory negligence is alleged to have been the contributory negligence of those in charge of the ship. I think that expression is an unfortunate one, because it seems to me that, when it is sought to impute negligence to the owner of the vessel, it is necessary to inquire who is the particular person for whose negligence you seek to make him responsible. To speak in this way of "those in charge of the ship" is calculated to lead to misunderstanding, and, I think, to mistake. At the critical time, according to the view which I take, the person in charge of the ship was the master. These fishermen (local pilots if you will), who had been taken on board by him for his assistance and guidance, were not at that time in charge of the ship. The evidence is this, that when a vessel comes to a certain point, she must from that point obey the instructions of the harbour-master. The master was himself at the helm, and so far from these men assuming any command or control of the vessel, they were looking for instructions, as is clear from the request which they made to the harbour-master to direct them what to do. Therefore, if they ever had charge of the ship, they had abandoned it; and there was no obligation that they should have charge of her. The master himself was steering the ship, and was looking to the harbour-master for directions. I am therefore quite unable to take the view that these two men were in any sense in charge of the ship; the master was in charge of her. It may still be that, if there had been any failure to give information which the master ought to have received from them, they might have been to blame, and a question would then have arisen, whether that blame could under the circumstances be imputed to the master of the vessel. But it is unnecessary to give any opinion upon that point.

Now, who was guilty of the contributory negligence which is alleged? Was it the master? The master of the vessel no doubt was the person who ported the helm, which is said to have been a wrong manœuvre. But it appears to me obvious that the master of the vessel was led to port the helm by the act of the harbour-master; and if the tide had been a flood tide, as the harbour-master supposed that it was, my impression is that the accident would not have happened, and that the vessel would have passed the bank in safety. The witnesses all say that the set of the ebb tide was towards the bank, and that the set of the flood tide was from the bank, and that on the flood tide there would be no danger in the manœuvre. The porting of the helm, though no doubt erroneous on an ebb tide, was erroneous only to a person who knew the condition of the river. There was nothing in the state of the river, so far as it could be seen, to indicate to a person not acquainted with it any danger in coming on in the course which the Janet and Ann was taking. The master was ignorant of the state of the river; he had only been there once before, I think nine years before. How is it possible to say that he was guilty of any negligence, with a direction from the harbour-master to come on, whatever the gesture connected with it may have been, and to come on, as the master of the vessel says, and there is no contradiction of it so far as I can see, in a course which was appropriate for entering the harbour according to ordinary navigation but for the existence of a bank of which he was ignorant? How it can be said that under such circumstances he was guilty of any negligence at all, I am entirely at a loss to see. But then it is said that there was negligence on the part of the two pilots, and that their negligence may be imputed either to the master or to the owner of the vessel—I do not quite know in which way the case is put. I think that there is very great difficulty in imputing the negligence of these men either to the master or to the owner of the vessel. But was there any negligence on their part at all? They, it is quite true, knew of the bank; but because they knew of the bank they very naturally interpreted the manœuvre suggested by the harbour-master in a different way from that in which it was interpreted by the captain. He, not knowing of the danger, understood that he was to make the best of his course into the dock. It was natural enough that they, knowing of the danger which there would be if the vessel came too near in towards the pier, should understand that she was merely being brought near the pier for the purpose of anchoring in order to be worked in. Therefore they called out to the harbour-master, "Let us know when we are to let go our anchor," imagining that he would give that order so as to save her from going on the bank; and if he had given that order in time no accident would have happened. Was there any negligence on their part in doing so? It is quite true that he let them go on too long. It is quite true that they were apprehensive that if he let them go on too long danger would ensue. But when did the time come at which these men ought to have disregarded the orders of the harbour-master, and have taken upon themselves to anchor instead of obeying his orders? It is obvious that by disregarding his order danger might have followed. If it had followed, that would have thrown the entire responsibility upon them. I fully agree with the Lord Chancellor in his statement that, when a vessel is within the jurisdiction of the harbour-master, and he is giving his orders as to the place of anchorage, it is only in the last resort, and when the danger is fully obvious, that any rational man would think that the harbour-master's orders should not be strictly attended to. I very much doubt whether the negligence of these men should, under the circumstances, be treated as negligence of the person in charge of the ship for which the owner was responsible; but even assuming that it could, I cannot see that there was any negligence at all. I should add this further, that the harbour-master saw the vessel coming under a port helm, which is said to have been a wrong manœuvre, and seeing her coming under a port helm, he called out again, "Come on." That was not done in a way which would unmistakably and unequivocally indicate to her that she was in the direction of danger, and must change her course, and carry out an entirely different manœuvre. Under these circumstances I think that the defenders are responsible for the negligence of the harbour-master, and that there was no contributory negligence negativing that responsibility.

Lord MORRIS.—My Lords: In the view which I take of this case, I consider that the pursuer is affected by the knowledge of Smith and Poland, the pilots, and that, if contributory negligence could be brought home to Smith and Poland, it would affect the pursuer. The captain took those two men on board as pilots. I see that at the trial it seems to have been the object of the defenders to disparage Smith. It was suggested that he was rather a poacher than a pilot. Now, it would appear that it was rather the object of those on the part of the pursuer to show that Smith was only a fisherman. He was accepted by the captain as a pilot. The captain in his evidence says that because of this he took these men on board. He took their directions right through. He allowed Smith to hail the harbour-master, while he was standing on the deck. The answer of the harbour-master was to the hailing of Smith, who was the pilot at all events on that particular occasion. He was accepted by the captain, and an observation was made by the harbour-master by which he was really as much affected as the captain himself. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that the captain must be affected by the knowledge of Smith and Poland, and if so, the pilot was in the place of the owner of the ship on that occasion; and if contributory negligence is brought home to Smith and Poland, I think that the case ought to be decided in favour of the defenders. But, on the assumption that that is so, I am still of opinion that the judgment which has been moved is the proper one. What exactly did the harbour-master say? "Come on" was admittedly his phrase. I leave out of consideration his gesture, or the wave of his hand; but at the time when he was asked, "When are we to anchor?" he said, "Come on." Ordinarily, speaking to one who is not a nautical person, that means come on in the direction of the person who is making the observation—that is to say, "Come on in the course that you are going." The harbour-master saying that, whoever is in charge of the vessel is under the impression that "come on" means that he is to port his helm, and come in the direction of the speaker—that is, a distance of 150 yards. The case now of the harbour-master is, that by "come on" he intended that the vessel should sail right through into port. In answer to the question, "When shall we anchor?" which appears to be a very natural question, the harbour-master says, "Come on." Anchoring is not a mode of progression. Even taking the most favourable view of it, it appears to me, looking at the captain's story, that he was never under the impression at that time, when this observation was addressed to him in answer to the question, "When are we to anchor?" that the vessel was to sail right through into port. Those words would bear, to him, a totally different character. The question being, "When are we to anchor?" the reply would not convey to him the idea that "come on" meant "come right on into port." I am under the impression that the harbour-master, it being a flood tide, thought that the vessel could advance with safety under a port helm. They did not see the danger till one of the pilots, Smith, again hailed the harbour-master, and said, "Be sure to tell us when we are to anchor." Smith said that seeing the approaching danger; but neither Smith nor the harbour-master, who had as much knowledge of the bank as these two pilots had, could have come to the conclusion that they were tilting up against the bank, or why should they have pursued a course which led them towards the bank? Both Smith and the harbour-master, in my opinion, thought that the vessel was approaching the bank. Smith seems to have been more wary than the harbour-master, and to have seen that the vessel was getting into danger. The harbour-master, as it appears to me, did not at first think so; but at last he said, "Now let go the anchor." That would not have been the observation of a man who intended the vessel to sail right through, and not to port her helm. In addition to that, it seems to me that, seeing the vessel going along the river about 150 yards, which would occupy three or four minutes, if the harbour-master had seen that to be the wrong course he would have remonstrated, instead of which he encouraged those on board to keep their course. In my opinion there is no contributory negligence established against Smith. He hailed the harbour-master twice at least, and put the question to him which I have stated; and he acted under the impression that, although he might have apprehended danger, that danger was not of a manifest and plain character, and he thought that he might stop in time to avoid actual danger, he taking the course which was prescribed to him.

Lord Field.—My Lords: I am also of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. The question is one of fact. The Lord Ordinary and the learned Lords of Session have all been of opinion that the act of porting the helm, when and where the helm was ported, was directly due to the act of the harbour-master, and I see no reason whatever to differ from that conclusion. The only point which seemed to me capable of being argued with any prospect of success was whether or not the master and those on board the ship were guilty of such negligence themselves, directly conducing to the accident, as to absolve the defenders from blame. I have followed with great care the observations which have been made by my noble and learned friends who have preceded me, and I cannot help concurring in the view which has been expressed by Lord Herschell upon the question whose negligence it is that is alleged to be contributory, so as to afford protection to the defenders. It must be the negligence either of the master, or of the two so-called pilots who were on board. I agree in thinking that the ship, at the time when she ported her helm, was in charge of the master. It is true that he had the two men on board who were acquainted with the river; but it seems to me that he is the person upon whom the negligence ought to be fixed, if it can be fixed at all. Now, was he justified in doing what he did? He himself was a stranger to the river. The harbour-master was the person whose orders, in my judgment, he was bound to obey. The bye-law is very express: it points out that so soon as a ship arrives at the Moat Brae she is not to proceed, if the harbour-master's orders are that she is not to do so. Now, was the master guilty of any negligence? or did he act reasonably in what he was then doing? It is difficult, of course, with a considerable conflict of evidence as to what did take place, to decide upon what is the exact truth; but there is evidence that the harbour-master said, "Come on." It is also said that he waved his hand, and that the master of the ship was himself ignorant of the state of the water, or of the conditions of the river. It seems to me, therefore, that the harbour-master certainly acted in such a way as that the master and everybody concerned thought that he was inviting the ship to come on, both by his language and by his gesture; and that under these circumstances it is impossible to impute to the master of the ship such negligence as to destroy the pursuer's right to sue. Then with regard to the two persons who are called pilots, they certainly did know of the danger which the ship was running; but, looking to the terms of the bye-law, and also to the power of the harbour-master, and the ordinary course of practice in the river, it seems to me that they might not unreasonably act upon the view that the harbour-master was going to stop them, and to answer their inquiry, made twice, "When shall we anchor?" and "Let us know when we are to anchor," in time to prevent any injury. Therefore I think that they did not act unreasonably in proceeding as far as they did.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Damages for wrongful detention of goods—Effect of consent order—Appointment of receiver.

In an action by plaintiffs claiming as consignees named in a bill of lading delivery of certain cargoes and damages for their detention, the defendants, who claimed the goods under a contract with the consignor, were allowed to receive and retain the cargoes pending trial, under a consent order, without prejudice to any question between the parties. Ten months later a receiver was appointed. The Court subsequently held that the plaintiffs were entitled to the cargoes, and directed an inquiry to ascertain what damages the plaintiffs had sustained by the defendants' detention, but refused to allow the defendants to be reimbursed freight and landing charges paid by them on account of the cargoes. On appeal the House of Lords varied this judgment by allowing the defendants the freight and landing charges, but, as no application was made to vary the terms of the inquiry, it remained undisturbed. Upon the inquiry as to damages the chief clerk awarded damages on the basis of the detention being wrongful from the arrival of the cargoes until the decree of the court of first instance. Upon a summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate, it was held that the previous decision of the House of Lords as to the right of the defendants to be reimbursed the freight and landing charges was consistent with the order for the inquiry as to damages; that the consent order did not make the detention after that date lawful, but that after the order for the appointment of a receiver the cargoes were in the possession of the court, and that the period of illegal detention for which the defendants were liable in damages was from the arrival of each cargo up to the order for the appointment of a receiver.

Per Lords Watson and Macnaghten: On general principles, and independently of the terms of the consent order, the defendants, notwithstanding that they had illegally detained the plaintiffs' cargoes, were entitled to repayment of the expenses properly incurred by them in respect of freight and landing charges.

THESE were cross-appeals from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Cotton and Fry, L.JJ., Bowen, L.J. dissenting), reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 492; 62 L. T. Rep. N. S. 518; 43 Ch. Div. 316, who had affirmed a decision of Kay, J., reported in 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 180; 42 Ch. Div. 66.

The action was originally commenced in April 1880 by Dreyfus Brothers to obtain possession of certain cargoes of guano which the Peruvian Guano Company claimed to be entitled to as against them. There was a previous appeal to the House of Lords (not reported) in July 1887. The main question in the case was decided in favour of the claim of Dreyfus Brothers, and the subsequent proceedings related only to the damages.

The facts are fully set out in the reports in the court below, and in the judgment of Lord Watson.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., Moulton, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce appeared for Dreyfus Brothers.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster, Q.C.), Rigby, Q.C., Haldane, Q.C., and E. Moon for the Peruvian Guano Company.

The appeal of Dreyfus Brothers only raised questions of account, as to which the counsel for the company were not called upon.

At the conclusion of the arguments in the cross-appeal by the company their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Feb. 15.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: In order to appreciate the points which are raised for decision in these appeals, it is necessary to refer to the course which this litigation has taken. On the 27th April 1880, a writ was issued from the Chancery side of the High Court at the instance of Dreyfus Brothers against the Peruvian Guano Company, and the captains of eight vessels laden with guano, which had sailed from Lobos in Dec. 1879. The plaintiffs claimed delivery of the cargoes of these vessels; an injunction to restrain the defendant company from demanding or receiving, and the other defendants from delivering or transferring, except to the plaintiffs, the whole or any part of these cargoes; and the appointment of a receiver. On the 30th April 1880 the plaintiffs moved for an injunction and the appointment of a receiver in terms of the writ; when Jessel, M.R. pronounced an order, the defendant company, by their counsel, consenting thereto. By its terms, the action was dismissed as against the eight defendant captains; and the plaintiffs were allowed to amend their writ by extending their claim to the cargoes of three other vessels, which had been dispatched from Lobos in December preceding. The concluding part of the order, which has given rise to much controversy, and the effect of which must be again considered in disposing of these appeals is thus expressed: "And the Peruvian Guano Company Limited, by their counsel undertaking that the receipt by them of the cargoes of guano in question in this action, including those to be added by amendment, shall be without prejudice to any question between the parties, and that they will keep separate accounts of their expenditure and receipts in respect of such cargoes, and abide by any order which this court shall make with respect to said cargoes, or any of them, or the proceeds thereof respectively." Of the eleven vessels whose cargoes were in dispute, two were chartered to Valencia and Bordeaux, which they reached respectively on the 11th May and 1st June. Nine were destined to a port of call, and thence as ordered, to a safe port in Great Britain or Ireland, or (within certain limits) on the continent of Europe. On arrival at their ports of call, these vessels were directed by the defendant company to their several ports of discharge, at which two arrived on the 22nd and 23rd April, four in May, two in June, and the last of them on the 27th July 1880. The plaintiffs delivered their statement of claim on the 16th July 1880, amended on the 10th March 1881, in which they averred that the cargoes in question had been duly assigned and transferred to them by the Peruvian Government; but that the defendant company, as the vessels arrived at their ports of call or discharge, had claimed and taken possession of the cargoes as their property. They also alleged that "the defendant company had wrongfully detained all the said cargoes from, and prevented their delivery to, the plaintiffs." In these circumstances the plaintiffs claimed (1) delivery; (2) damages for detention of cargoes; (3) if necessary and proper, an injunction; and (4) a receiver. The company's statement of defence, delivered on the 9th Nov. 1880, sets forth that they were consignees for value of all the cargoes in question, under an agreement between them and the Peruvian Government, dated the 7th June 1876, and known as the Raphael contract. It concludes with this allegation: "The defendant company took possession of the said several cargoes, but the defendant company denies that such possession was wrongfully taken. The defendant company denies that the said cargoes, or any of them, are the property of the plaintiffs, and that the company has wrongly, or in fact, deprived the plaintiffs of the use and possession thereof, and that the plaintiffs have suffered great or any damage or loss." Then followed an amended reply by the plaintiffs, with amended rejoinder, sur-rejoinder, and rebutter. I shall not refer to those pleadings in detail, because they do not appear to me to alter, in any material respect, the issues raised by the statements of claim and defence; with this exception, that in their rejoinder the company took the plea that in any event they were entitled to repayment of the sums disbursed by them for freight and landing charges. On the 17th Dec. 1880, the late Master of the Rolls, on the motion of the plaintiffs, ordered that a proper person should be appointed receiver, and in pursuance of that order, a receiver was duly appointed upon the 23rd Feb. 1881; to whom the company delivered the unsold cargoes in their possession, and also the proceeds of the cargoes which they had disposed of. The case was tried before Bacon, V.C., who came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had a right to all the cargoes in question. By his formal judgment, which is dated the 13th Jan. 1885, the learned judge found that the Guano Company were not entitled to reimbursement of any expenses incurred by them, or in their behalf, with the exception of the expenses attending the sale of two cargoes. He directed "an inquiry what damages have been sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the detention by the defendant company of the cargoes of guano in question in this action." His decision was carried by the company to the Court of Appeal, where, in the course of argument, they gave up their claim to the cargoes, and merely insisted on 4*l.* 15*s.* per ton of guano being the sum payable for commission and charges under the Raphael contract, and alternatively for repayment of the sums actually paid by them for freight and landing charges. The court upon the 12th Feb. 1886 affirmed the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor with costs. The company then presented an appeal to this house, complaining of the judgments of the courts below in so far as these disallowed either their claim under the Raphael contract, or their actual disbursements. That part of the Vice-Chancellor's order, which directs an inquiry as to the amount of damages caused by the company's detention of the cargoes was not appealed from, and was not made the subject either of argument or of comment at the bar of the House. Your Lordships, on the 18th July 1887 reversed the orders appealed from in so far as these related to the disallowance of the appellants' claims for freight and landing charges; and quoad ultra affirmed the same, subject to the declaration that the company were entitled to receive, out of the proceeds of the eleven cargoes, "all sums properly disbursed by them in connection with the said cargoes on account of freight and landing charges, with interest at 4 per cent from the date of disbursement, so far as the same have not been already repaid to them, or allowed to them in account with the Peruvian Government." Thereafter, there was an inquiry before the chief clerk, (1) as directed by this House with respect to freight and landing charges; and (2) with respect to damages arising from detention of the cargoes, as ordered by the decree of the Vice-Chancellor. The chief clerk made his certificate in March 1889. Upon the first point he found that the items disbursed by the company amounted, with interest at 4 per cent from the dates of disbursement to the date of the certificate, to 59,060*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*; but that all of these items had, upon the principle of Clayton's case (1 Mer. 572), been already allowed to the company in account with the Peruvian Government. Upon the second he found that the detention of the eleven cargoes "commenced on the arrival of such cargoes respectively in Europe in 1880," and, upon the footing that that illegal detention continued until the Vice-Chancellor's decree, he allowed interest at 5 per cent upon the proceeds of the cargo of each vessel, from the time of its arrival in port to the date of the decree, under deduction of the interest which had accrued on these proceeds in the hands of the receiver. It was admitted by the parties that, in consequence of eight cargoes having been sold by the receiver under orders of the court, their proceeds were less by 2148*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* than would have been obtained if the cargoes had been sold by Dreyfus Brothers; and that, from the same cause, the expenses of sale were increased by 351*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* These two sums together amounting to 2500*l.* with interest calculated in like manner to the date of the decree of 1885, were allowed by the chief clerk. The sums thus found to be due at the date of the decree, with interest at 4 per cent. to the date of his certificate, amounted to 34,111*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*, at which sum he assessed the damages then due by the company. The company took out a summons to vary the certificate (1) by striking out the finding that their disbursements had been allowed to them in account by the Government of Peru; (2) by deleting the finding that the detention commenced on the arrival of the cargoes in Europe and finding in lieu thereof that the detention, if any, commenced at Lobos, or about the departure of the cargoes; and (3) by striking out the finding that the plaintiffs had sustained damages to the amount of 34,111*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* and substituting a finding to the effect that they had sustained no damage. The summons was heard before Kay, J., who held that the company's disbursements had not been allowed to them in account. Accordingly, the order of the learned judge varied the certificate to that extent, and left undisturbed the chief clerk's findings as to damages. Cross-appeals were taken, the result of which was, that on the 20th Jan. 1890, the Court of Appeal, consisting of Cotton, Bowen, and Fry, L.JJ. dismissed both appeals, Bowen, L.J. differing upon the question of damages.

The original appeal at the instance of Dreyfus Brothers, raises for your Lordships' decision, the question whether the company's disbursements have been repaid by their receiving credit for them in account with the Government of Peru. The cross-appeal, at the instance of the company, is confined to the question whether the findings of the chief clerk with regard to the detention of the cargoes, and the amount of damages due by the company in respect thereof, which have been affirmed by both courts below, ought to be sustained. At the close of the argument addressed to us in support of the original appeal, I had no difficulty in agreeing with your Lordships that the decision of the courts below was right, and that it was unnecessary to hear counsel for the company. [His Lordship discussed the evidence as to the accounts, and continued as follows:] The question for decision in the cross-appeal is attended with some difficulty. It depends upon the construction of that part of the Vice-Chancellor's order of the 13th Jan. 1885, which has now become final, directing an inquiry as to the damages sustained by Dreyfus Brothers. The order contains no declaration that the company had detained the cargoes without legal title, but that inference is implied in the findings which it does contain, negativing the right of the company to reimbursement of the expenses incurred by them for freight and other charges, either under the Raphael contract or otherwise. The terms of the order are equivalent to a finding that there had been wrongful detention of these cargoes by the company, and that Dreyfus Brothers were entitled to recover from the company the pecuniary loss, if any, which they had suffered by reason of such detention. But the order does not, either expressly or by implication, define the period of time during which that illegal detention existed, Its terms are consistent with the duration of illegal detention for such longer or shorter periods as might be otherwise ascertained. I can hardly doubt that, in directing an inquiry, the Vice-Chancellor had satisfied himself that the illegal detention of the company had been so long continued that it might have occasioned substantial loss to Dreyfus Brothers. But I do not think that consideration is, of itself, sufficient to compel the court to give damages for that which does not constitute illegal detention. At the same time, I hold it to be not only competent,but necessary,to refer to the pleadings of the parties and to the other orders of court for the purpose of ascertaining the precise issues raised in the action with respect to detention, and the extent to which these were dealt with by the court, either affirmatively or negatively. If, on reference to these sources of information, it were matter of reasonable inference that the learned judge had, however wrongly, in substance decided that certain acts constituted illegal detention, and had allowed an enquiry into the damage resulting from these acts, it would be too late now to correct his error. The chief clerk, as I have already pointed out, supplied the lacuna in the terms of the reference to him by assuming that the illegal detention of the company lasted from the arrival of the cargoes at their respective ports of discharge until the date of the Vice-Chancellor's decree. If that had been expressly decided by the Vice-Chancellor, or if it had been matter of fair inference from the pleas submitted by the parties, and the mode in which these were disposed of by his judicial orders, that the Vice-Chancellor had so ruled, the decision of this appeal would have been attended with very little difficulty. In dealing with the arguments addressed to us upon this branch of the case, it will be convenient to divide the time during which, according to the view taken by the chief clerk, the illegal detention continued into three periods. The first ends with the date of the consent order of the 30th April 1880; the second commences from that date and terminates either with the appointment of a judicial receiver or with the order for his appointment; and the third covers the period from such date until the decree of the 13th Jan. 1885. The question whether there was illegal detention during each of those periods depends upon different considerations, which I shall deal with separately and in their order of time. That the detention by the company was in its inception illegal, does not seem open to doubt. In their pleadings the plaintiffs aver, and the defendants admit that the latter had assumed such possession of or control over all the cargoes in question, as would necessarily have defeated any extra-judicial demand made by the Dreyfus Brothers for delivery of the guano to them at the several ports of discharge. Accordingly the main issue raised by the pleadings was this, whether such possession as the company had admittedly taken and insisted on their right to retain was wrongful or not. The company now maintain that their detention ceased to be illegal whenever their actings in relation to the eleven cargoes became subject to the consent order of April 1880; and in support of that contention they placed great reliance upon expressions used by members of this House when the present case was before it upon the question of disbursements for freight and landing charges. It does not appear to me that anything which was said by your Lordships on that occasion could affect, or did affect, the question whether the company at the time when they made these disbursements were rightfully or wrongfully in possession of the cargoes. No such issue was raised in the appeal which the House had then to consider. The only issue before the House was, whether certain outlays made by the company in relation to the cargoes in their possession—outlays which would have been equally necessary and expedient if the cargoes had been in the possession of a judicial receiver or of Dreyfus Brothers—ought to be disallowed to the company as expenditure incurred by them in prosecution of a legal wrong. All of their Lordships held that the terms of the consent order were sufficient to deprive the action of the company in making these outlays of any wrong aspect, and to imply their right to be repaid. Lord Macnaghten expressed an opinion that, apart from the consent order, the action of the company was of such a complexion that they were entitled to repayment of their expenditure; and that opinion had my entire concurrence. (a) I shall only add that our

(a) Judgments on that appeal were delivered on the 18th July 1887, by Lords Watson, Fitzgerald, and Macnaghten. The judgment of Lord Macnaghten was as follows:—

My Lords: I agree with the Court of Appeal on the point upon which that court was unanimous that the claim of the appellants to be allowed the amount of freight and charges paid by them stands, I think, on a different ground. The argument on this branch of the case was presented by the appellants' counsel in two ways. In the first place, your Lordships were invited to examine the general law applicable to the question, and then to consider the effect of the consent order of April 1880. The learned counsel for the respondents followed the same line of argument. As your Lordships entertain no doubt as to the effect of the order, it is not necessary to express my opinion upon the larger question. But, as I am unable to concur in the view of the Court of Appeal on this point, I desire out of respect for their judgment to state some of the reasons which lead me to doubt the soundness of their conclusion. The argument of the learned counsel for the respondents, which was adopted by the majority of the Court of Appeal, may be found stated in so many words in several cases at common law. In itself the argument is perfectly sound. The appellants it is said had no right to this property, it belonged to the respondents. They could not therefore obtain a lien by expending money in connection with it. How then can they claim to be allowed their expenditure? They cannot surely set up their own wrong. But, although the courts of law not unfrequently put forward that argument, they seem to have been in the habit of escaping from its logical consequences by the convenient instrumentality of a jury more concerned to administer what they thought justice than to maintain the strict rules and rigorous maxims of the common law. In cases of trover and in cases of trespass, where there were no circumstances of aggravation, juries were told that they might take into consideration in mitigation of damages payments which the plaintiff himself would have had to make if the defendant had not made them. For instance, in Doe v. Hare (2 C. & M. 145), in an action for trespass for mesne profits tried before Lord Lyndhurst when Lord Chief Bacon, the defendant, who had been wrongfully in decision did not proceed upon the assumption that, by reason of the consent order, the detention by the company had ceased to be in any sense illegal. It therefore becomes necessary to consider whether the consent order of Feb. 1880 had the effect of converting the detention by the occupation of land, was allowed by way of deduction a payment for ground rent which he was obliged to make as occupier. On motion to increase the damages by the amount deducted, the court refused to disturb the verdict, Bayley, B. saying, "The defendant only paid what the plaintiff must have paid, and if so, the plaintiff is not hurt." Doe v. Hare was approved and followed in Barber v. Brown (1 C. B. N. S. 121). So in Clark v. Nicholson (6 C. & P. 712; 1 C. M. & R. 724), in an action of trover for goods belonging to the assignees of a bankrupt wrongfully seized, and wrongfully sold by the sheriff, the sheriff was allowed the expenses of sale, because the goods must have been sold by the assignees if not sold by the sheriff. On appeal in the Court of Exchequer, the Lord Chief Baron (Lord Abinger) said: "We do not lay it down as a matter of law in any case, but we say that the jury are entitled to make these deductions if they think them fair." Another case which seems to me to throw some light upon this question is the case of Reid v. Fairbanks (13 C. B. 692). The case was this: An unfinished ship was wrongfully taken out of the possession of the plaintiffs, and completed by the defendants. The plaintiffs sued in trover, and claimed in damages the value of the ship as increased by the defendants' expenditure. Maule, J. said: "It may be that the wrongdoer who acquires no property in the thing he converts acquires no lien for what he expends upon it, and the owner may bring detinue or trover, but it does not follow that if the owner brings trover he is to recover the full value of the thing in its improved state. The proper measure of damages, as it seems to me, is the amount of the pecuniary loss the plaintiffs have sustained by the conversion of their ship." Jervis, C.J. added, "That is, what she was really worth when the defendants converted her; the plaintiffs had lost the value of the vessel before the defendants began to lay out money upon her." And when it was urged that there was no ground for saying that the plaintiffs' right was limited to the value of the ship only after deducting what the defendants had wrongfully laid out in completing her, the Chief Justice answered, "In strictness that may be so, but no jury would give such damages, and they would always give what they conceive the plaintiffs justly entitled to." Perhaps, however, the most instructive cases are those relating to coal trespass, from Martin v. Porter, which was decided in 1839, to a Scotch case recently before this House. They indicate the current of modern authority, and show the way in which courts of equity dealt with the subject when they were empowered to award damages. The rule of the court of equity in cases of coal trespass has lately been adopted in your Lordships' House. The result is, that in these cases at any rate every court must now recognise and apply that measure of justice which courts of law formerly declined to admit as a matter of law, but left to juries to apply when the equity of the case required it. Martin v. Porter (5 M. & W. 351) was an action for trespass for working the plaintiff's coal. It was held that the proper estimate of damages was the value of the coal when gotten, without deducting the expenses of getting it, but allowing the cost of bringing the coal to bank. At the trial Parke, B. pointed out that, if the action had been in trover, and the plaintiff had demanded the coal at the pit's mouth, or on the canal bank, he would have been allowed the value of it at the place of demand, without making any allowance either for working or bringing it there. However, the same learned judge in Wood v. Morewood (3 Q. B. 440), which was an action of trover for coal tried at the summer assizes in 1841, directed the jury that, if the defendant was not guilty of fraud or negligence, but acted fairly and honestly in the full belief that he had a right to do what he did, they might give the fair value of the coals as if the coalfield had been purchased from the plaintiff. The jury in that case acted on the suggestion of the learned judge; and so the claim, which would have been 10,000*l.* or 11,000*l.* according to the rule in Martin v. Porter, was reduced to 2310*l.* There was no motion for a new trial in that case. But in the following year the rule in Martin v. Porter was twice reaffirmed: in Wild v. Holt (9 M. & W. 672); and Morgan v. Powell (3 Q. B. 278), Parke, B. being one of the court in Wild v. Holt. However, when the same question was raised in equity after Lord Cairns' Act, the view of Parke, B. in Wood v. Morewood was preferred and adopted by Malins, V.C. in Hilton v. Woods (L. Rep. 4 Eq. 432), and afterwards by Lord Hatherley, when Lord Chancellor, in the well-known case of Jegon v. Vivian (L. Rep. 6 Ch. 742), and it was finally approved in your Lordships' House in Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Company (5 App. Cas. 25). In that case, after pointing out that there was no element of wilful trespass or bad faith on the part of the defenders, and that the minerals were not of special value as support to the surface, Lord Cairns expressed himself as follows: "Of course the value of the coal taken must be the value to the person from whom it was taken, because I do not understand that there is any rule in this country or in Scotland that you have a right to follow the article which is taken away, the coal which is served from the inheritance, into whatever place it may be carried, or under whatever circumstances it may come to be disposed of, and to fasten upon any increment of value which from exceptional circumstances may be found to attach to that coal. The question is, what may fairly be said to have been the value of the coal to the person from whose property it was taken at the time it was taken?" These observations, which are in accordance with the principles laid down in Reid v. Fairbanks, seem to me to be of the greatest importance, because I do not understand that they are necessarily confined to the case of coal trespass, and it cannot be denied that the payment of freight in the present case was at least as exceptional a circumstance as the bringing to bank of the coal in the case which Lord Cairns was considering. I took the liberty of asking Sir Horace Davey during the argument if he would contend that, if the owner of coal wrongfully severed happened to find it at the pit's mouth, he could recover it in specie without making any allowance for hewing or bringing it to bank. The learned counsel said he should certainly so contend. Indeed it was necessary for him to do so in order to support the proposition for which he was contending. At present I am not satisfied that the learned counsel is right. It certainly would be somewhat strange that the wrongdoer should be entitled to allowances if the wrongful act is completed by sale, but denied these allowances, however just they may be, when the wrongful act is not complete. In order to account for the supposed distinction between the two cases the learned counsel argued that it might be that these allowances would be made in an action of trespass or trover, but that they would necessarily be excluded in an action of detinue. I am not sure that this proposition is well founded. The old writ under a verdict in an action of detinue authorised the sheriff to distrain the goods and chattels of the defendant if he did not return the goods, or pay a sum of money which was the assessed value of the goods. "This," Mellish, L.J. says, in Re Scarth (L. Rep. 10 Ch. 234), "gave the defendant a choice whether he would give up the goods, or pay the money and drive into equity all who wanted the actual goods." But I need not point out that equity would not interfere unless the goods were of special value; nor would it, I apprehend, assist the claimant if he refused to do equity by making just allowances. The Common Law Procedure Act 1854 enabled courts of common law to make an order for the return of the goods if they saw fit to do so. The effect of that provision, as pointed out by Maule, J. in Chilton v. Carrington (15 C. B. 730), is not to take away the option in all cases, but it enables "the court or judge to make an order for delivery where it would be unjust to allow the defendant to have the option, and where he can and in the opinion of the court or judge ought to restore the chattel in specie." I am not aware of any authority upon the point, but I should doubt whether it was incumbent upon the court to order the defendant to return the goods in specie where the plaintiff refused to make a fair and just allowance, and so claimed the interposition of the court under the Common Law Procedure Act, for the purpose of obtaining an advantage company, which before its date was admittedly illegal, into lawful detention. If that were the plain import of the order I should be prepared to hold that there is nothing to be found in the pleadings or elsewhere which could prevent its receiving effect in the present question. That the company from and after the date of the order continued to detain the cargoes, in the same sense in which they had been detaining them before it was pronounced, is plain enough. I am unable to find anything in its terms which, by reasonable implication, suggests that their continuing to withhold possession from Dreyfus Brothers was to be regarded as other than a wrongful act, if they failed in substantiating their right. The order sanctions certain administrative acts in relation to the cargoes detained, acts of which the party ultimately successful would reap the benefit; but that sanction does not, in my opinion, imply that the detention of the cargoes, which could hardly be in the interest of Dreyfus Brothers, was also to be treated as legal. That inference appears to me to be excluded by the condition that the acts sanctioned were to be "without prejudice to any question between the parties." The meaning of that condition was that the company, on the one hand, were not to be at liberty to found upon the permitted acts, either as fortifying their title to the guano, or as justifying their detention of it; and that, on the other hand, Dreyfus Brothers were to be precluded from founding upon these acts as in themselves wrongful, for the purpose of depriving the company of any claim for reimbursement, or for any other purpose.

In so far as they allow damages for detention during the third period, I have come to the conclusion that the judgments appealed from are wrong. The order of the 17th Dec. 1880 for the appointment of a receiver had the immediate effect of making the company bare custodiers for the court; and the appointment of the 23rd Feb. 1881 transferred the actual possession of the cargoes or their proceeds from the company to an officer of the court. In my opinion, detention by the company, whether it had been legal or illegal, ceased at the first of these dates. That circumstance would not affect the quantum of damages due by the company, if it could be shown that the law regards loss arising to the party ultimately successful from the possession of the court as stakeholders, as loss directly and naturally resulting from the previous wrongful acts of his adversary. I know of no principle, and of no authority for that proposition. It appears to me that from the time when the order of the 17th Dec. 1887 was not consistent with the justice of the case. I do not think that the cases relating to policies of insurance referred to in argument have a bearing upon the present question. They were, with one exception I think, cases in which persons who had voluntarily expended money in keeping up policies which did not belong to them, claimed actively a lien on the moneys secured by the policies. Nor do I think that any assistance is to be derived from the two cases at common law referred to by Sir Horace Davey, Nicholson v. Chapman (2 H. Bl. 254), and Lempriere v. Pasley (2 T. R. 485). Those were cases of trover, and the question was whether the plaintiff was bound before he brought his action to tender the amount of expenses claimed by the defendants. Of course he was not. My Lords, I have dwelt at some length on this part of the case, because it appears to me that this question ought to be left entirely open and unprejudiced by anything that has fallen from the Court of Appeal. If the question should ever arise, it will in my opinion require much consideration, and a fuller argument than has been addressed to your Lordships. I do not think that it can be disposed of in a summary way by saying that the defendants have no lien, and are therefore not entitled to any allowance. It will have to be determined whether there is any rule founded on principle or authority which compels the court to enforce, as against a defendant who has acted honestly though mistakenly, extreme legal rights at the instance of a plaintiff who seeks to avail himself of the assistance of the court for the purpose of obtaining an unjust and unfair advantage. I now come to the order of the 30th April 1880, and I must say, speaking for myself, that, if it had not been for the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal, I should have thought the appellants' case too clear for argument. Putting aside for a moment the case of the two vessels whose cargoes had been discharged, though apparently the parties were not aware of the fact, the position of things was this: The respondents came forward alleging, and alleging correctly as the result proved, that the cargoes are theirs by right, and that they are entitled to prevent the masters from delivering them to the appellants, and to prevent the appellants from receiving them. Accordingly, by their writ issued on the 27th April, they asked for an injunction against the masters and against the guano company. They apply at once for an injunction against the company and a receiver. The masters of course could not be served in time for the motion. The order of the 30th April is then made by arrangement. Now the object of the respondents' application was of course to keep matters in statu quo till the question between the parties—the question to whom the cargoes belonged, the only question which had arisen—could be determined in due course. To keep matters in statu quo it was necessary to provide at once for the delivery of the cargoes. That was provided for by permitting the appellants until further order to receive and deal with the cargoes on certain undertakings. It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the order was not a consent order on their part. It was pointed out that the consent expressed in the order was the consent of the appellants, and of them only. It may be so; but it only makes the case clearer against the respondents. If the appellants alone consented, what did they consent to? Not to a proposition of their own; that would be absurd. Not to a suggestion of the court; the court did not interfere in the matter. It must have been to a proposal or suggestion made by the respondents. The proposal could only have been a proposal that the appellants should take delivery. The order proceeded on that footing. It is consistent with no other view. Having regard to the surrounding circumstances, it seems to me that the order is equivalent to an invitation by the respondents to the appellants to take delivery, and an authority to them to do so, so far as the authority of the respondents was required. On this footing, too, it seems to me that the action against the masters was dismissed. Coupled with their dismissal the order amounted to an authority to them to deliver the cargoes to the appellants, and it would have been a complete justification to them for doing so if their conduct in the matter had afterwards been questioned. Qui non prohibet quod prohibere potest assentire videtur is an old maxim of law. Here the case is far beyond non-prohibition. The respondents first prohibit, and then by arrangement withdraw the prohibition, and so sanction the act which they were minded originally to prevent. I agree with Bowen, L.J. in thinking that the case of the two vessels whose cargoes had been delivered cannot be separated from the case of the other nine, and that all the cargoes must be dealt with in the same way. It was urged by the counsel for the respondents that, if this order is to be treated as altering legal rights on a matter not pointedly referred to in the order, it would lead to prevent arrangements being made between counsel. It might, I think, be retorted with equal justice that, if the order is to operate as a trap and a pitfall, no counsel who did not feel perfectly sure of his ground, and a match for his opponent in astuteness, would ever venture to make any arrangement at all. For these reasons I agree with the judgment of Bowen, L.J., and I think the order of the Court of Appeal must be reversed.

made, the company and Dreyfus Brothers stood towards each other in the same position in which they would have been placed if the eleven cargoes had never come into the possession of the company, and had been thrown into court by the captains of the carrying vessels. When possession of the subject of controversy is with the court, the competing parties are simply preferring their claims in the ordinary course of law; and any damages which the successful party may suffer from the continuance of litigation are due to the law's delay, and not to any legal wrong perpetrated by his unsuccessful competitors. Your Lordships were referred to the case of Williams v. Peel River Company (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 689) as an authority qualifying the doctrine that damages are not due for injury merely arising from delay in litigation. The case, when rightly understood, has no bearing whatever upon that point. Certain bonds were alleged and were ultimately found to be illegally detained; and in the course of the action the plaintiffs obtained an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling the bonds during its dependence. The plaintiffs, who eventually succeeded, claimed damages on the footing of what they, if the bonds had not been illegally detained, would have realised at a time when their injunction was in force; and the Court of Appeal gave damages on that footing. But the decision was an assessment of damages for detention, the illegality of which was not in dispute, and went upon considerations of fact which it is unnecessary to examine. The defendants did not plead that their possession was not illegal; the only plea they set up was that the plaintiffs could not complain of their own inability to sell at a time when they held an injunction against sale. For these reasons I am of opinion that in the original appeal at the instance of Dreyfus Brothers the orders complained of, relating to the question of disbursements for freight and landing charges, and the costs attending that question ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs. In the cross-appeal I think the orders complained of, relating to the question of damages and its attendant costs, ought to be varied, and the cause remitted, with the declaration that the eleven cargoes of guano in question were illegally detained by the Peruvian Guano Company until the order for the appointment of a receiver; that the damages thereby occasioned to Dreyfus Brothers ought to be ascertained by charging the company with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. upon the proceeds of each cargo from the date of its arrival at the port of discharge until the 17th Dec. 1880, with interest at 4 per cent. upon the principle sum so ascertained until payment; and that neither party ought to have the costs incurred by them in relation to the question of damages either before the chief clerk, or in subsequent proceedings before the courts below. There ought, in my opinion, to be no costs of the appeal.

Lord Bramwell concurred.

Lord Macnaghten. — My Lords: The only question remaining to be determined on the appeal of Dreyfus and Co. is whether the appellants have succeeded in showing that certain payments made by the Peruvian Guano Company, on account of freight and landing charges in respect of the cargoes of guano, which formed the subject-matter of this action, have already been allowed by the company in account with the Peruvian Government. The plea of repayment, which was also set up, and which was supposed to rest upon the rule in Clayton's case (ubi sup.) as to appropriation of payments was very properly abandoned during the argument. [His Lordship discussed the evidence, and continued as follows:] It appears to me, therefore, that the appellants have failed to establish the proposition for which they contended. The appeal must, I think, be dismissed with costs. My Lords, as regards the cross appeal by the Peruvian Guano Company, at the risk of repeating what has been said already I must recapitulate briefly the proceedings in the action, and the circumstances which led to the litigation. There is no other way that I can see of dispelling the difficulties which have gathered round a case in itself neither complicated nor difficult. [His Lordship went through the facts of the case, and continued as follows:] In the argument before your Lordships the learned counsel for the company pursued the line of argument which perplexed and divided the Court of Appeal. They said, and said truly, that it had been held in this House on the question as to reimbursement of the sums paid for freight and landing charges, that in view of that question the possession taken under the order of the 30th April 1880 was not wrongful; that in fact it was held that the order was an invitation to the company to take delivery. How, then, it was asked, could possession under that order be a wrongful detention giving rise to damages? I must confess that I am unable to see the difficulties which appeared so formidable to the Court of Appeal. I think the arrangement embodied in the order of the 30th April 1880 did amount to an invitation to the company to take delivery of the guano, and an authority to the company from Dreyfus and Co., if and so far as any authority from them might be required, to do whatever might be necessary and proper to be done in order to entitle the company as consignees to delivery of the cargoes in question. But the invitation was addressed to people who were insisting both by word and deed that the cargoes which they were invited to receive on terms were their own to deal with as they pleased without leave or licence from anybody, and the acceptance of the invitation was guarded and qualified by an express condition in the form of an undertaking on the part of the company that no question in the action should be prejudiced by the order or by the receipt of the cargoes. The result, therefore, is simply this: The company remain in the position which they took up originally, and which they avowed in their pleadings; they cannot deny that they obtained possession of each and all of the cargoes in question; they cannot deny that possession was taken by them under the Raphael contract and the bills of lading; and they cannot set up the qualified permission which was granted to them by the order of the 30th April 1880 as an answer to the claim for damages for detention. I do not think that the company can dispute the finding of the chief clerk that the detention of the eleven cargoes for which the company are answerable in damages began on the arrival of such cargoes respectively in Europe. But it appears to me that the detention of these cargoes by the company came to an end when the order was made for the appointment of a receiver. From the date of that order possession was taken out of the hands of the company. Thenceforth the possession was the possession of the court. I do not think that the possession of the court can be regarded as a detention by the company, nor do I think that any loss or diminution of profit which may be attributable to the circumstance that the property in question in the action was placed in the custody of the court is the direct or natural result of the detention by the company.

It appears to me therefore that Dreyfus and Co. are only entitled to damages for detention by the company as from their respective dates when the cargoes arrived in Europe down to the 17th Dec. 1880; and as there are no materials before the House for a more accurate computation of damages, I am disposed to think that the measure adopted by the chief clerk ought not to be disturbed, except that damages should not be computed for any time after the 17th Dec. 1880. On the amount so arrived at I think interest ought to be allowed at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the 17th Dec. 1880 down to the day of payment. It is not necessary to say anything with regard to the supposed contradiction between the inquiry as to damages directed by Bacon, V.C. and the order of this House as to the reimbursement of sums paid for freight and landing charges. In my opinion the inquiry is not in the slightest degree inconsistent with the order of the House. It appears to me that if the attention of the House had been called to the inquiry when the former appeal was under consideration the order for the inquiry could not have been discharged or varied. I have felt considerable difficulty as to the proper order to be made on this appeal with respect to costs. The company have succeeded in cutting down the claim of Dreyfus and Co., but in my opinion, they were altogether wrong in trying to get rid of the inquiry as to damages, and they were also wrong in trying to shelter themselves under the order of the 27th April 1880. In the result, therefore, I am of opinion that the orders under appeal ought to be varied in the manner proposed by my noble and learned friend, and I agree there ought to be no costs of the appeal and no costs of the various orders, consequent on the inquiry as to damages, except so far as costs have already been awarded to the company.

Lord FIELD.—My Lords: There are two appeals in this case. In the one brought by Messrs. Dreyfus the question remaining to be decided is, whether the claim of the company for reimbursement of payments made by them of the freight and landing charges in question has been allowed in account by the Peruvian Government, and the other is a cross appeal by the company complaining of the principle upon which the damages payable by them have been assessed. The first appeal presents no question of any difficulty. For the reasons which have already been given by my noble and learned friends, the evidence adduced by the appellants satisfies me that no such allowance has been made. I think, therefore, clearly, that this appeal should be dismissed with costs. It does not appear to me that any great difficulties present themselves in the consideration of the cross appeal. The Vice-Chancellor having correctly held that the respondents were entitled to receive and deal with the eleven cargoes in question as their own property, necessarily directed a consequential inquiry as to damages, and apparently with the assent of all parties, directed the inquiry to be, what damages had been sustained by the respondents "by reason of the detention by the appellants." His order assumed, what indeed the pleadings and evidence showed to have been the case, that there had been a detention of all and a detention by the appellants, but it did not lay down any principle upon which the damages should be ascertained, or define the periods of detention over which they should range; and both these requisites had to be supplied by the subordinate tribunal. With regard to the first, the chief clerk in his certificate has taken a percentage upon the net proceeds realised by the sales as the unit of damages. No complaint has been made of the certificate upon this ground, and I do not see any more convenient measure. But great complaint is made of the period over which the interest is calculated, both as to its commencement and termination. The effect of the adoption of this principle is to give the respondents compensation for the loss to them of the net proceeds of the cargoes for longer periods than would have been the case had the respondents not been prevented from receiving them in due course in their own business, and as their own property. But it assumes that if the respondents had sold the cargoes the net proceeds would have been at the respondents' bankers on the dates of the arrival of each ship, and may be in this respect open to the appellants' complaint, for it is urged that the realisation of the cargoes must have occupied some time after arrival. But it does not appear to me that this was necessarily the case, for it may be that the cargoes could have been realised upon the market before arrival by cash or bills against shipping documents. I do not know how this is, but it appears from the judgment of Cotton, L.J., that no point was raised upon this, either at chambers or before Kay, J., nor indeed was it much, if at all, pressed before your Lordships. It is not probable that any great, if any, injustice has been done in this respect; and I am certainly not prepared to advise your Lordships to send the same back to the chief clerk for further inquiry upon this point. That course might involve a long and expensive inquiry. As to the period of termination adopted by the chief clerk, it was first said that the inquiry should be limited to the date of the order of the 30th April, and confined to any prior wrongful acts that might be proved in reference to the vessels that had then arrived, nominal damage only being given in respect of the subsequent dealings by the defendants. It was argued that these dealings were not only not unlawful in themselves but had been held not to be so by this House, and the judges below seem to have been very much impressed with this argument. This contention is, however, based upon what appears to me to be a very erroneous view of the effect of the agreement carried out by the order of the 30th April and of your Lordships' order. The state of things was this: the appellants were in the de facto possession of the cargoes. The charters had been effected by them in their own names; and as each ship arrived they directed its movements and discharge as they thought best, and they claimed a right to do this under the Raphael contract, and in order to realise their 4*l.* 15*s.* per ton. They were also practically in a position to do it from their influence with the masters, at all events in the majority of cases, whereas the respondents could only render their claim to possession effective by the intervention of a receiver, which would have been productive of cost and delay. It was to the interest of everybody that the receipt of the cargo and discharge of the ship, necessary acts to be done by somebody, should not be rendered difficult and expensive by the active intervention of the respondents with the masters of the ships, and the striking out of their names as parties to the action shows that one of the objects of the agreement was to remove this cloud, as it were, upon the title. The respondents were therefore willing to stand aside as to the receipt and landing of the cargoes so long as the appellants dealt with them and conducted the sales fairly as between both sides. No doubt the calculated effect was that the appellants would, if they persisted in their claim, as they did, have to receive the cargoes and make the necessary disbursements. But that was all; and this is the construction which, as I understand the case, your Lordships put upon the agreement and order. I have, of course, very carefully considered as well the order of this House of the 18th July 1887 as the reasons given by my noble friends who advised your Lordships on that occasion. In the result I am unable to find anything in any of them to show that the receipts and dealings by the appellants were made lawful in the sense that the respondents' right of action in respect of them was affected. They were treated, as it appears to me, throughout as payments made within the contemplation of the parties to the agreement of the 30th April, although no doubt it was pointed out by Lord Macnaghten, that they might in any view well be considered as made under exceptional circumstances, so as to prevent the application of the alleged general rule as to the disallowance of a claim by a wrong-doer of compensation for acts done in the execution of his wrong. I think, therefore, that the liability of damages continued at least up to the order for the appointment of the receiver, the 17th Dec., but I agree with my noble friends, for the reasons which they have given, that it cannot be carried beyond. As to so much therefore of the item B, in the chief clerk's certificate as extends to the subsequent period, and also to the two other heads of damage, A and C, I am of opinion that the certificate ought to be varied. In no view, as it appears to me, can the items A and C be regarded as so consequential upon the wrong done as to entitle the respondents to claim them as damages. They are said to have resulted from the acts of the court by its receiver, but I know of no authority for saying that that was a direct and natural consequence of the previous wrongful acts of the company. At one time I entertained some doubt whether the respondents were not entitled, so far as the interest was concerned, to have it calculated down to the order for payment out of court, but on consideration it appears to me that the language of the order of the Vice-Chancellor directing the inquiry, cannot include the detention by the receiver. It may be that the appellants have in fact sustained damage by being deprived of their property up to the full date, and it might be argued that the company's refusal to part with their unlawful possession except upon terms of transferring it to the court to hold for them as well as for the respondents, was, in a sense, the cause of the deprivation. But here also I think that it cannot be treated as so direct and natural a consequence as to justify an award of damages in respect of it. I have come to the conclusion, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed to the extent I have indicated, and I think that the justice of the case will be met by dealing with the costs in the way proposed by Lord Watson, in whose proposed order in other respects I concur.

In the original appeal, order appealed from affirmed and appeal dismissed with costs. In the cross-appeal, orders appealed from varied and cause remitted with directions as to the ascertainment of damage, and no costs allowed to either party in the courts below, or in this House, with the exception of those expenses which relate to competency.

HICK v. RAYMOND AND REID. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Bill of lading—Demurrage—Obligation to discharge in reasonable time — Delay caused by strike—Liability of consignee.

Where no period is fixed for the performance of a contract of carriage in a bill of lading the obligation is to perform it within a reasonable time under the existing circumstances, and there is no liability for delay, however protracted, if such delay is attributable to causes beyond the control of the party on whom the obligation rests, and he has not acted negligently nor unreasonably.

Goods consigned to the respondents were shipped on board a ship of the appellant under bills of lading which contained no stipulation as to the time within which the cargo was to be discharged. The ship duly arrived at her port of discharge, and the unloading was commenced, but before it was completed a strike took place among the dock labourers, and the completion of the unloading was delayed for a considerable time. It was admitted that during the continuance of the strike it was impossible to obtain the necessary labour to complete the discharge of the ship.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell).— My Lords: This action was brought by the plaintiff, who is a shipowner, against the defendants, who were consignees and holders of the bills of lading of a cargo carried on board the plaintiff's steamship Derwentdale, to recover damages for the detention of the vessel during her discharge at the port of London. By the bills of lading the cargo was to be delivered in good order and condition "at the port of London." On the 14th Aug. 1889 the vessel arrived in the Millwall Dock, and was reported to the Custom House. The discharge of the wheat, of which the cargo consisted, commenced on the 16th Aug. On the 20th Aug. a strike of dock labourers began in the port of London, and some of the labourers engaged in the discharge of the Derwentdale then ceased to work. A few days after the strike became general, and no work was done in the discharge of the vessel until the 16th Sept., when it was recommenced, and finished on the 18th. Evidence was given that, apart from the strike, the discharge of the vessel would have been completed in six days. The dock company were employed by the respondents to discharge the vessel. Only the trimming of the cargo was to be the work of the shipowner, otherwise the entire obligation to discharge the vessel rested on the consignees. At the commencement of the trial, in the course of the discussion which took place as to whether the case should be heard with or without a jury, certain admissions were made by the learned counsel, and I think it well to state at the outset what I take to be the facts, either proved or admitted. I think it must be taken that, throughout the whole of the time during which the discharge ceased, and the dock company were unable to supply labour to effect it, it was not possible for the respondents either to find any other person to provide the labour or themselves to obtain the necessary labour in any other way. If the terms of the bills of lading had required the discharge to be effected in any particular number of days, it is quite clear that the burden of the delay caused by the difficulty of obtaining labour would have fallen upon them, and it would have been no answer to a charge that they had failed to fulfil their obligation to say that the circumstances had rendered it impossible for them to do so. The bills of lading in the present case contained no such stipulation, and therefore, in accordance with ordinary and well-known principles, the obligation of the respondents was that they should take discharge of the cargo within a reasonable time. The question is, have the plaintiffs proved that this reasonable time has been exceeded? This depends upon what circumstances may be taken into consideration in determining whether more than a reasonable time was occupied. The appellant's contention is, that inasmuch as the obligation to take discharge of the cargo, and to provide the necessary labour for that purpose, rested upon the respondents, the test is what time would have been required for the discharge of the vessel under ordinary circumstances, and that, inasmuch as they have to provide the labour, they must be responsible if the discharge is delayed beyond that period. The respondents, on the other hand, contend that the question is not what time would have been necessary, or what time would have been reasonable under ordinary circumstances, but what time was reasonable under existing circumstances, assuming that, in so far as the existing circumstances were extraordinary, they were not due to any act or default on the part of the respondents.

There appears to me to be no direct authority upon the point, although there are judgments bearing on the subject to which I will presently call attention. I would observe, in the first place, that there is of course no such thing as a reasonable time in the abstract. It must always depend upon circumstances. Upon "the ordinary circumstances," say the learned counsel for the appellant. But what may without impropriety be termed the ordinary circumstances differ in particular ports at different times of the year. As regards the practicability of discharging a vessel they may differ in summer and winter. Again, weather increasing the difficulty of, though not preventing, the discharge of a vessel may continue for so long a period that it may justly be termed extraordinary. Could it be contended that, in so far as it lasted beyond the ordinary period, the delay caused by it was to be excluded in determining whether the cargo had been discharged within a reasonable time? It appears to me that the appellant's contention would involve constant difficulty and dispute, and that the only sound principle is that the "reasonable time" should depend on the circumstances which actually exist. If the cargo had been taken with all reasonable despatch under those circumstances, I think the obligation of the consignee has been fulfilled. When I say the circumstances which actually exist, I, of course, imply that those circumstances, in so far as they involve delay, have not been caused or contributed to by the consignee. I think the balance of authority, both as regards the cases which relate to contracts by a consignee to take discharge and those in which the question what is a reasonable time has had to be answered when analogous observations were under consideration, is distinctly in favour of the view taken by the court below. In Postlethwaite v. Freeland (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599) the law was stated by Lord Selborne, L.C. thus: "If, on the other hand, there is no fixed time, the law implies an agreement to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time; that is, as was said in Ford v. Cotesworth (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 544), a reasonable time under the circumstances."

In the same case Lord Blackburn clearly indicated that this view of the law was, in his opinion, correct and in accordance with the current of previous authority; and he not only quoted with approval the law laid down in Taylor v. Great Northern Railway Company (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 385), that "a reasonable time" meant what was reasonable under the circumstances as distinguished from "the ordinary time," which it had been contended was the same thing as a reasonable time, but stated that in his opinion the law so laid down was applicable to the case then under consideration. It is true that, in the case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland, the point which has now to be determined did not directly arise, inasmuch as in that case the charter-party contained the stipulation that the cargo was to be discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port, and I cannot agree with what appears to have been the view of Lord Blackburn, that this was necessarily the same as the implied obligation to discharge within a reasonable time. In that case it was proved that the mode of discharge customary in the port was by means of a warp and lighters, and that these were under the absolute control of a company to which the Government authorities had transferred all their powers, and that the company allowed vessels the use of the warp and lighters in turn. The result was that, owing to the presence of a considerable number of ships, the turn of the appellant's vessel did not come for a considerable time. It appears to me that, under these circumstances, the judgment was inevitable that the cargo had been discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port, and also that Postlethwaite v. Freeland cannot be taken as a decision concluding the question arising on this appeal. The dicta are undoubtedly of great weight, and I concur with the result at which Lord Blackburn arrived, that so far as there was prior authority it pointed in the direction of the view adopted in the present case by the Court of Appeal. Lord Blackburn excepted the case of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 413; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 118; 4 Ex. Div. 165, n.), regarding the decision there as conflicting with that of the Court of Appeal in Postlethwaite v. Freeland. Now it is to be observed that Thesiger, L.J., who had been a party to the judgment in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company, was also a party to the decision in Postlethwaite v. Freeland in the Court of Appeal. He manifestly did not intend to lay down the law differently in the two cases, nor do I think there is any necessary conflict between them, although, no doubt, expressions are to be found in the judgments in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company which favour the contention of the appellant in the present case. Cotton, L.J., in his judgment in that case, in terms says that he will not attempt to lay down an exhaustive rule, but will speak chiefly with reference to the case then before the court. The facts there were, that the cargo was to be delivered into lighters alongside, or at the wharf, as charterers' agents might direct, no time being fixed within which the discharge was to take place. At the port of discharge there were only two firms of lightermen for discharging cargoes, one of which worked solely for the defendants, the charterers, and the captain was compelled to employ that firm alone to discharge the vessel. At the time when the vessel arrived the port was unusually crowded by a "rush" of vessels, and about twenty vessels were lying there, of which one half either belonged to or were chartered by the defendants. The number of lighters was small, and it was proved that after the arrival of the vessel preference in discharging cargoes was shown to vessels with "round" charters. The learned judge who tried the case, in summing up, told the jury that they were to take into consideration the circumstance that the port was full of vessels, but he did not directly tell them not to consider the deficiency of lighters caused by the large number of ships, so far as that state of things had been produced by the defendants themselves; nor did he tell them that the defendants were bound to provide the means of unloading within a reasonable time; nor that they were bound to allot the lighters proportionately among the vessels, or to use the lighters for them in the order in which they arrived. The jury found in favour of the defendants, and the appeal was against the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division making absolute a rule for a new trial. It will thus be seen that the circumstances which prevented the vessel being discharged within the ordinary time were not beyond the control of the defendants. It was not shown that they could not by reasonable precautions or exertions have procured the necessary lighters elsewhere or earlier and so have avoided the delay which took place. Under these circumstances I think the decision was perfectly right, and a new trial properly granted. In my opinion the cases referred to by the appellant's counsel in which it has been held that there was a breach of the obligation on the part of a charterer to supply a cargo do not involve the assertion of any doctrine in conflict with that which has been laid down in the present case by the Court of Appeal. For these reasons, my Lords, I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below was correct, and ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: Although the question raised in this appeal is submitted for the first time to the determination of an English court, the principles which must govern its decision are as old as the law of contract. When the language of a contract does not expressly, or by necessary implication, fix any time for the performance of a contractual obligation, the law implies that it shall be performed within a reasonable time. The rule is of universal application, and is not confined to contracts for the carriage of goods by sea. In the case of other contracts the condition of reasonable time has been frequently interpreted, and has invariably been held to mean that the party upon whom it is incumbent duly fulfils his obligation, notwithstanding protracted delay, so long as such delay is attributable to causes beyond his control, and he has neither acted negligently nor unreasonably. In the face of the admission given by him at the trial, it is in vain for the appellant to suggest that the delay which occurred in unloading the Derwentdale's cargo, was owing to causes under the respondents' control, or to their failure to do anything which could possibly or reasonably have been done in order to avoid that delay. In that state of the law and of the facts, it is, in my opinion, impossible that the appellant can prevail unless he is able to show that the rule as administered in the case of other contracts is subject, when the contract is constituted by bill of lading, to the singular exception that the owner of the goods must be held to have acted unreasonably, and to be liable for the delay, whenever the operation of unloading is stopped by an unforeseen obstacle which he did nothing to create and is powerless to remove. A proposition of that character requires some authority to support it, but none has been produced. In none of the cases cited at the bar does it appear to me that the point now raised was present to the minds of the learned judges. But it is sufficient for the purposes of this appeal, that, whilst nothing was said in any of them which lends the least countenance to the proposition maintained by the appellant, much was said pointing in an opposite direction. These cases, in so far as they were founded on by the appellant as authorities in his favour, have been carefully examined in the opinion just delivered by my noble and learned friend, to whose reasons for affirming the judgment of the Court of Appeal I have really nothing to add.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—My Lords: The question raised in this appeal is important, and is up to this not covered by any express authority. Having regard to the admissions of the parties, the sole question is, Who is to bear the loss caused by the strike? Who is to bear the risk of the strike, assuming each party to be innocent, that each party did what he could, and that the happening of the strike was entirely beyond and outside the control of either? The contract not naming any time for unloading, the obligation of the defendants was to unload within the time implied by law, that is, a reasonable time. What is the meaning of this expression, "reasonable time?" It is obvious that "reasonable" cannot mean a definite and fixed time. It would not be "reasonable" if it was not sufficiently elastic to allow the consideration of circumstances which all reason would require to be taken into account. The appellants accordingly admit that the consignee has a right to have all ordinary circumstances taken into account, but insist that all extraordinary circumstances are to be excluded from consideration. Is this distinction sound, and does it rest upon any real principle? If the consignee does all he can, is not his conduct reasonable? If by circumstances absolutely outside his control he can do nothing, is his inaction unreasonable? If it is reasonable to consider some circumstances outside his control in favour of the consignee, why are not all circumstances in the events which actually happen, and he cannot control, also to be taken into account? In considering how to ascertain "reasonable time," must not the question come in, whether the consignee, in the circumstances which eventuated, acted unreasonably? If throughout the consignee acted reasonably, if he did all he could, if he omitted nothing that he should have done, why should all the circumstances be arbitrarily divided into ordinary and extraordinary for the purpose of putting a narrow and artificial meaning upon the words "reasonable time?" Unless lex cogit ad impossibilia, I think, when the parties have used a form of contract which names no day, and leaves the discharge of the cargo to be made within the reasonable time implied by law, that reasonable time should be ascertained by a consideration of all circumstances which eventually happen, and are outside the control of the consignee. It is somewhat strange that this important question has not heretofore been clearly and finally settled by direct authority, and it is manifest, from the arguments addressed to your Lordships, that the decisions in somewhat similar cases are conflicting, and the opinions of eminent judges would appear not to harmonise. The particular point involved in this appeal has never, I believe, been expressly discussed or decided, although the decisions which have been referred to deal with topics and considerations most apposite to the case before your Lordships. The case of Ford v. Cotesworth (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 468; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 544) is worthy of attention. The contract was silent as to time, and therefore the freighter was bound to unload within a reasonable time. Owing to threats of bombardment the cargo could not be landed in the usual time, and it was held that the charterer was not liable for the delivery. Cockburn, C.J., in his summing up, said: "There would be a point of law whether this case was to be decided with reference to the ordinary state of things at the port, or whether any extraordinary circumstances that prevented the unloading might be taken into account." The questions left to the jury were, whether, looking to the ordinary state of things at the port, there was any unreasonable delay; whether, looking to the extraordinary circumstances, there was any unreasonable delay; whether there was any delay caused by political circumstances over which the consignees had no control; was any delay caused by the default of the consignees, and to contingently assess the damages for the time during which the ship was kept at her berth doing nothing by the action of the Government of the place and the threats of bombardment. The jury, in answer to the first two questions, found that there had been no unreasonable delay, and they assessed the damage if any was to be allowed. The plaintiff applied to the Queen's Bench to enter the verdict for him; and that court held that the contract implied by law was that each party would use reasonable diligence in performing their part of the delivery, which, by the custom of the port, fell upon him; and that there was no implied contract that the discharge should be performed in the time usually taken at the port (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 634; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 127). Blackburn, J., in pronouncing the judgment of the court, said: "We are aware of no authority for saying that the law implies a contract to discharge in the usual time, except what is said in Burmester v. Hodgson (2 Camp. 488), in which case it was not necessary for the decision. We think that the contract which the law implies is only that the merchant and shipowner should each use reasonable despatch in performing his part. That such was the opinion of Lord Tenterden, C.J. appears to be implied from his ruling in Rogers v. Hunter (M. & M. 65) as to what was the obligation of the holder of a bill of lading. If this be so, the delay having happened without fault on either side, and neither having undertaken by contract, express or implied, that there should be no delay, the loss must remain where it falls." The Exchequer Chamber also, on appeal, upheld the verdict for the defendant (ubi sup.). Martin,

B., in giving judgment, said: "I am not aware of any case which goes to impose by mere implication of law, without any stipulation whatever, so unreasonable a liability as that which the plaintiffs seek to impose on the defendants, that they are to be answerable for the delay caused by vis major." Ten years later, in the year 1878, came the case of Wright v. The New Zealand Shipping Company (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 413; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 118; 4 Ex. Div. 165, n.) which has been so much relied on by the appellant. There the charter-party was silent as to time, and therefore it was implied that the ship should be unloaded within a reasonable time. Bramwell, L.J. said "a reasonable time for doing an act is a time within which it may be done by a person working reasonably;" and Thesiger, L.J. said "a reasonable time means a reasonable time under ordinary circumstances." This decision is naturally relied on by the appellant, although it was not intended in that case to lay down any general rule, and the circumstances were not at all outside the control of the defendants. The case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599) is most important in consequence of many of the dicta, although the precise point involved in this case did not actually arise. The Earl of Selborne, L.C., in giving judgment in the House of Lords, said: "If there is no time fixed the law implies an agreement to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time, that is, as was said by Blackburn, J., in Ford v. Cotesworth, within a reasonable time under all the circumstances." Lord Blackburn's own judgment in this case is the strongest decision in favour of the contention relied on by the respondents, and presents the topics against the appellant's contention with great force. These cases and others cited during the argument show that there is a conflict of judicial opinion on the question involved; but, in my opinion, the preponderance of authority and reasoning is against the appellant.

Besides, the authorities by way of analogy (as forcibly pointed out by Fry, L.J.) are also against the appellant, and in favour of the view that reasonable time must be determined by reference to the actual events which occur. In the case of Taylor v. The Great Northern Railway Company (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 385) it was held that a common carrier was only bound to carry within a reasonable time, looking at all the circumstances of the case. Erle, C.J. says plainly: "I take reasonable time to mean a time within which a carrier can deliver, using all reasonable exertions." The case of Hall v. Wright (27 L. J. 345, Q. B.) also shows an effort to apply a liberal construction of "reasonable time" in an action of breach of promise of marriage. And the American case of Cross v. Beard (26 New York Rep. 85), decided thirty years ago, shows that a breach in a canal and a storm on a lake were taken into account in measuring what was reasonable time. But it is not upon analogies or upon conflicting authorities alone that the decision of your Lordships can rest, although they are most valuable and important to elucidate the position. Principle and reason, in my opinion, alike oppose the contention of the appellant. It is somewhat hard to make either party suffer, but there is no help for it. It must be remembered that there are forms of bills of lading which expressly name strikes and such contingencies, and cast the responsibility upon the consignees. If the shipowner wishes the merchant to be answerable for such events he can stipulate for it expressly. It is no doubt hard on the shipowner in this case, but I do not apprehend any disturbance in mercantile contracts, as parties can readily, if they please, change the terms of future contracts, and prevent the possibility of misunderstanding or surprise. On the grounds that I have referred to, I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed. Lord Morris has requested me to say that he concurs in the conclusion at which your Lordships have unanimously arrived.

COURT OF APPEAL.

TURNER v. MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD; THE ZETA. (a)

Damage—County Courts Admiralty jurisdiction—Collision between ship and dockhead—Costs—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 4.

A County Court has no jurisdiction on its Admiralty side under sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, giving Admiralty jurisdiction "over all claims for damage to ships whether by collision or otherwise" over a claim in personam by shipowners against a dock company for damage occasioned in the dock to their ship through contact with the dock wall caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants; and hence, where such a claim is successfully instituted in the High Court, the judge is wrong in disallowing the plaintiff's costs on the ground that the action might have been brought on the Admiralty side of the local County Court.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a damage action against the decision of the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (Sir Charles Butt), refusing to give them the costs of the action.

The action was instituted in personam by the owners of the steamship Zeta against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, to secure compensation for damage caused by the Zeta by the alleged negligence of the defendants.

The Zeta at the time in question was being moved under her own steam from the Stanley Dock, Liverpool, into the Sandon Graving Docks, under the orders of the dock officials, who were the servants of the defendants. During the operation her propeller struck the wall of the pierhead, and sustained damage, which according to the plaintiffs' particulars amounted to 221*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*

The learned President decided that the defendants were liable for the reason that the damage was caused by the negligence of their servants, but refused to give the plaintiffs costs on the ground that the action might and ought to have been brought on the Admiralty side of the Liverpool County Court: (65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 230; (1891) P. 216.; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 64.)

From the decision as to costs the plaintiffs now appealed.

The following Acts of Parliament were referred to in argument, and are material to the decision:—

3 & 4 Vict, c. 65:

Sect. 6. And be it enacted that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to, or damage received by any ship or sea-going vessel, or in the nature of towage, or for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or sea-going vessel, and to enforce the payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time when the services were rendered, or damage received, or necessaries furnished in respect of which such claim is made.

Admiralty Court Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 78):

Sect. 13. In all cases in which a party has a cause or right of action in the High Court of Admiralty of England against any ship or freight, goods, or other effects whatsoever, it shall not be necessary to the institution of the suit for such person to sue out a warrant for the arrest thereof, but it shall be competent to him to proceed by way of monition, citing the owner or owners of such ship, freight, goods, or other effects, to appear and defend the suit, and upon satisfactory proof being given that the said monition has been personally served upon such owner or owners, the said court may proceed to hear and determine the suit, and may make such order in the premises as to it shall seem right.

Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10):

Sect. 7. The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship.

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71):

Sect. 3. Any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes): (3.) As to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision. Any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51):

Sect. 4. The 3rd section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 shall extend and apply to all claims to damage for ships, whether by collision or otherwise, where the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

Barnes, Q.C. and Joseph Walton, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The President was wrong in refusing the plaintiffs their costs. [Fry, L.J.—Can you appeal as to costs only?] Yes. This is not an appeal from the judge's discretion, but from the principle of law upon which he acted, viz., that this action could have been brought on the Admiralty side of the County Court:

The City of Manchester, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 521; 5 P. Div. 221; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261.

We contend that the County Court had no jurisdiction on its Admiralty side to entertain this action. With the one exception of charter-parties, the County Court has no greater jurisdiction than the Admiralty Court had:

Reg. v. Judge of the City of London Court, 66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 135; (1892) 1 Q. B. 273; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 140.

The Admiralty Court never had, and never attempted to exercise, jurisdiction over a case of this sort. This is a case in personam arising out of contractual rights in respect of negligence happening within the body of a county. It was not until 1854 that the Admiralty Court could exercise jurisdiction in personam in respect of collisions happening within the body of a county: (17 & 18 Vict. c. 78, s. 13.) That Act of Parliament did not give the court a greater jurisdiction than it had before, but merely allowed it to exercise in personam jurisdiction it already had. The general words used in 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, and 24 Vict. c. 10, dealing with the cases of damage received and done by a ship, must have some limitation put upon them:

The Urania, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 402; 10 W. R. 97; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 156;
Flower v. Bradley, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 702; 44 L. J. 1, Ex.; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 489;
Everard v. Kendall, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428;
The Alexandria, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 565; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 574; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 464.

The construction put by the courts upon sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 as to the meaning of the words "damage done by any ship" supports the contention that a limited meaning is to be put upon the language of the Admiralty County Courts Acts, and that in dealing with statutory Admiralty jurisdiction it is necessary to inquire into the old jurisdiction of the court:

The Excelsior, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 87; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 268; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 151;
The Malvina, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403; Lush. 493; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 341;
The Uhla, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 89; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 292; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 148;
The Sinquasi, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 768; 5 P. Div. 241; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 383;
The Albert Edward, 44 L. J. 49, Adm.; 24 W. R. 179;
The Industrie, 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 446; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 17; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 303;
The Robert Pow, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 237; Br. & Lush. 99.

Were this case to be tried as an Admiralty case, the defendants could not raise the plea of contributory negligence. Difficulties would also arise as to the division of damages in the event of a judgment holding both to blame. Assuming this to be treated as an Admiralty cause, it could not have been instituted in the Liverpool County Court. By sect. 21 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, proceedings in an Admiralty cause are to be commenced either in the district in which the ship is, or in which her owners reside. In this case when the suit was commenced the ship was on the high seas, and her owners reside in London.

Carver and Hyslop Maxwell, for the defendants, contrâ.—The suggested difficulty about bringing this suit in the Liverpool County Court, by reason of the provisions of sect. 21 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 is got over by the decision of the Admiralty Court in The Hero (65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; (1891) P. 294; 7 Asp.

Mar. Law Cas. 86), holding that sect. 74 of the County Courts Act 1888 applies to Admiralty actions. [Lopes, L.J.—At present I feel a difficulty in seeing how the County Courts Act applies to Admiralty causes. Lord Esher, M.R.—Is it correct to say, where there is an earlier Act of Parliament dealing with a special and particular subject, that a later general Act which does not purport to repeal it can overrule it?] The words of the later Act are general, and apply to all classes of action. [Fry, L.J.—I doubt if it is correct to say that the later Act overrules the provisions of the earlier Act. They are not inconsistent with one another, and may be regarded as cumulative.] If the decision in The Hero be correct, then, inasmuch as the defendants reside in Liverpool, the action, if an Admiralty action, might be brought in the Liverpool County Court. Assuming sect. 21 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 to be applied to this case, the property to which the cause relates is the dock wall, and therefore the Liverpool County Court would be the proper tribunal. [Lord Esher, M.R.—I doubt that. The cause here relates to the ship.] The words of sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 give Admiralty jurisdiction over cases not only of collision, but also over all classes of damage to ships. To limit the section to cases of collision known to the High Court of Admiralty is to give no effect to the words "or otherwise." The intention of the Legislature was to extend Admiralty jurisdiction :

May 7.—Lord Esher, M.R.—This case was tried by the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division. He gave judgment for the plaintiffs, but refused to give them costs on the ground that the case ought to have been brought in the County Court. The case, according to the learned judge's language, was so difficult in point of fact, that he for a long time was of a contrary opinion to that which he finally came; and he only came to his final opinion under the advice of the Trinity Masters. It seems, therefore, going a considerable length for him, in such circumstances as those, to deprive the plaintiffs of their costs on the ground that they ought to have brought such an action in the County Court. We have no jurisdiction to interfere on that ground. The case was tried by the judge without a jury; he had power to deal with the costs, and the question for us, therefore, is whether he had jurisdiction to deprive the plaintiffs of costs upon the ground on which he did deprive them. He deprived them of costs solely on the ground that the plaintiffs might have brought the action in the County Court. It is clear that the County Court, having regard to the amount of the claim, could not have entertained the case on its common law side. He has therefore deprived the plaintiffs of costs on the ground that they might have brought this action on the Admiralty side of the County Court. Now the action was an action by a shipowner for damage done to his ship in an inner basin of the Liverpool Docks, by reason of the servants of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board having given a negligent order to the captain, which he was bound to obey, and did obey without any unreasonable default of his own. Therefore the learned judge found that the captain had not been guilty of any contributory negligence. He had obeyed an order which was within the authority of the dock officials to give. It was a negligent order. The question then is, whether this was a case which the learned judge himself could have tried as an Admiralty action? We have already decided in this court certain rules of law which govern this case. We have held that the statutes giving jurisdiction to the County Courts do not give them jurisdiction which the Court of Admiralty itself cannot exercise. We have also held that the Acts which extend the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court itself beyond what it used to be, have extended its jurisdiction only in respect of matters which, if they occur in inland waters, could have been tried if they had happened on the high seas. The Admiralty Court in olden days had jurisdiction in certain matters—not in all—occurring on the high seas. It had no jurisdiction in respect of anything happening in what are called inland waters, i.e., in rivers or in parts of the sea which are within the boundaries of points of the land. That therefore reduces the present case, in my opinion, to this question : Is this an action which could have been maintained by the Court of Admiralty at any time? Is it a cause of action which arises upon the high seas at all, which could possibly have arisen on the high seas? It is really an action against the defendants for having negligently exercised powers given to them in respect of their property within the borough of Liverpool and the county of Lancaster, given to them by Act of Parliament. Therefore the cause of action is a cause of action arising—and which can only arise—at the place where the property is fixed, in respect of the use of this property, and the property is not only not on the seas, it is not in the river; it is in an inside basin of the system of the Liverpool docks, which basin is not upon any navigable waters at all. It is inside a basin which is situated on the land, in the county of Lancaster, and within the borough of Liverpool. The question is, whether any such action could have been maintained in the Admiralty Court in old days. It is obvious that this action could not. But could any similar action, in such a state of things, arise on the high seas. There is no property that I ever heard of in the open ocean. There is no property fixed there, absolutely fixed, always fixed, part of the land, because that is what it is in this action, part of the land, which property is managed by the servants of the owner or by the owner himself. I know that in Burrell's Admiralty Cases, edited by Mr. Marsden, there are two cases. You have an action entertained by the owner of one ship against the owner of another ship on the ground that the plaintiff's ship was injured by an anchor belonging to the other ship left fixed for a time at the bottom of the river. Both these cases occurred in the river. It may be that they occurred within such part of the river as was within Admiralty jurisdiction, within the hovering part of the river as it is called. In the case of Reg. v. Judge of the City of London Court (ubi sup.), I stated that these cases in Mr. Marsden's book are not authorities for any decision. They are mere notes taken by the registrar of the court, but still they may be cited to show that such actions were maintained. But were those actions like the present case? I have not the least doubt, if those actions were maintained, that the ground was this: that the action was by one ship against the other ship for improperly managing her tackle, that is to say, her anchor. I have no doubt that what happened was this, that the defendant's ship had come to anchor in this place, had dropped her anchor, and for some reason or other had let go her moorings, and was herself away at the time of the accident. She left her anchor with a small buoy or some such means by which when she came back she would get her anchor again. Everybody who has been on board a ship knows what may happen. If you go into Cowes roads you find it constantly happening. Therefore, if these cases were entertained and went to judgment, it was merely a suit against the defendant's ship for negligently leaving her anchor and part of her tackle for a time, until she came back to take it up again, and leaving it without any mark to indicate its position on the bed of the river. Whether one would think that that was a cause of action now I know not; whether it proceeded to judgment I know not. But if it did, it must have been for the reasons I have stated. I do not forget the case of injury done to the Plymouth breakwater. I have already dealt with several of those cases. For a time after the passing of these Acts under consideration the decisions in the Court of Admiralty vacillated. Dr. Lushington for a time was inclined to give the full literal meaning to this legislation, and say that anything done at sea, or anything done anywhere by a ship, was to be considered as within the Admiralty jurisdiction. But, in my opinion, he changed his views on this point; and if he did, this court has overruled his views. I know that Sir Robert Phillimore was more imbued than any man that has lived in my time with the idea that the Admiralty Court had all the jurisdiction which it ever had. He was of opinion that that court had jurisdiction over every tort committed on the high seas, and his opinion has in some cases gone to what I call extreme lengths. We have recently had to consider the cases on this point, and in the recent case of Reg. v. Judge of the City of London Court (ubi sup.) every case that industry could find was cited to us. But our judgment was this: that the Admiralty County Court Acts have given no greater jurisdiction to the County Courts than the Admiralty Court had, and I think it is equally distinctly decided that the Admiralty Court Acts only give to the Admiralty Court jurisdiction within inland waters which the Admiralty Court had upon the high seas. To say that there ever was known in all the long course of Admiralty jurisdiction, in all the disputes between Admiralty and common law, a case of some building, some rock, or some piece of land on the high seas with somebody on it to whom it belonged, who did something negligent in regard to its management and thereby injured a ship—to say that any such action ever was heard of in the Admiralty Court, to my mind seems impossible. Take this case: Can anyone imagine that in the times when there were these disputes between the Admiralty and the common law, if this action had been brought in respect of this damage in the county of Lancaster in the borough of Liverpool, whether there would not have been a prohibition of the most stringent kind following it?

The importance of the matter is this: that if this case were tried at common law the rules of law are clear that, if there were mutual negligence, it would be a good defence to the action. Whereas, if the case is tried in Admiralty, that court would, in my opinion, in this case, as in every case of damage which they entertained, apply the rule where there is contributory negligence of adding the damages together and dividing them. So, in this case, if both the dock and the ship had been injured, and there had been mutual negligence, the damages would have been divided. We therefore come shortly to this: I think the President had no jurisdiction to try this case as an Admiralty case. He had jurisdiction to try it as a common law case, because he is a judge of the High Court—rather, I should say he had jurisdiction to try this case at common law. Whether he had intended, had he found mutual negligence, to apply the Admiralty or the common law rule I cannot say. If he had applied the Admiralty rule, I should have thought that he was wrong. I think he had common law and not Admiralty jurisdiction to try this case. Therefore, although he had the power to deprive the plaintiffs of their costs, the ground upon which he did so was a wrong one, inasmuch as this was not an Admiralty case. I therefore cannot agree, and I think the appeal ought to be allowed.

Fry, L.J.—The question we have to determine in this appeal depends upon the construction to be given to the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts 1868 and 1869. The Act of 1868 by sect. 3 provides that any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction to try amongst other causes any claim for damage by collision when the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l*. The amount claimed in this case did not exceed 300*l*.; therefore the only question is whether this is a claim for damage by collision within the meaning of this section. This section was enlarged by the subsequent Act of 1869, and it was provided that the section should extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by "collision or otherwise," when the amount claimed did not exceed 300*l*. It is to be observed, in the first place, that the earlier statute gave jurisdiction in the cases named. It does not give Admiralty jurisdiction in the cases named; but in the most explicit terms it gives jurisdiction. Now it appears to me, reading those clauses, it is impossible to say that the claim in the present case—a claim by the owner of a ship for injury done to his ship by collision with the wall of a dock—is not a claim for damage to a ship by "collision or otherwise;" and, therefore, primâ facie one would suppose within the jurisdiction of the County Court under those statutes or one of them. But then it is said we are bound by the previous decision of this court to hold that the jurisdiction so given by these Acts is confined to Admiralty jurisdiction. It is said that the recent case of Reg. v. Judge of the City of London Court (ubi sup.) gives colour to that argument. I therefore feel myself driven to inquire whether in the years 1868-1869 Admiralty jurisdiction existed which would cover a case of a claim of this sort. The Admiralty jurisdiction which existed in the year 1868 was of a double character. There was the original jurisdiction which existed in the ancient Court of Admiralty, the jurisdiction of the Lord High Admiral, and there was the enlarged jurisdiction given by the statute 3 & 4 Vict. and by the statute 24 Vict. Those statutes professed to enlarge, and did enlarge, the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. The first provided, amongst other things, that the Court of Admiralty should have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of damage received by any ship, whether such ship may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time the damage was received; and the Act of 24 Vict. gives jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship. The one case provides for damage received by the ship, the other case provides for damage done by the ship. Those statutes for the first time gave Admiralty jurisdiction within the body of a county. This appears to me to be a case of damage received by a ship. But then it is said that these statutes were only intended to give within the body of a county the same jurisdiction as existed before on the high seas. Now, yielding to this argument for the purpose of the present inquiry, it follows that I am bound to inquire whether the High Court of Admiralty would have had, before 3 & 4 Vict., jurisdiction in respect of damage done on the high seas to a ship by a fixed object on the high seas. It will be said that such objects are rare, and that cases of collision would never have been the subject of litigation. It requires no very great stretch of imagination to imagine rafts of timber or some such structure getting permanently attached to a coral reef, or rocks, or a sand bank, and to imagine a collision between that object upon the high seas and some vessel. Supposing such an occurrence had happened, would it have been within the jurisdiction of the Lord High Admiral? In the first place, it is to be observed that no case of prohibition of jurisdiction in any such case can be found in the books. On the other hand, it is to be observed that the undoubted jurisdiction of the Lord High Admiral was over everything happening upon the high seas. It has been described as a general power taking cognisance of all maritime cases. That would in itself go a considerable way towards showing that the court must have had jurisdiction in these cases; but in my judgment other considerations lead to the same conclusion. It has been doubted whether the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court or of the Lord High Admiral arose in the reigns of Edward III., or Richard I., or Henry I.; but whenever it arose, it arose at a time when the distinction between local and transitory actions did not exist, and the courts of this country had no jurisdiction to entertain actions which did not arise within a county. In what court, then, could such an action as I have mentioned have been tried? The answer appears to me that it would be tried in the court of the Lord High Admiral or in no court at all.

That consideration leads me to say that there are two authorities to which the Master of the Rolls referred. There is one case in 1663, which is to be found in Mr. Marsden's collection of Admiralty cases, and which is not a note of a judgment given by the registrar, but is an actual decree of the delegates, and is given in full by Mr. Marsden. In that case the delegates condemned the Susan in the amount of the loss of the Warewell and her cargo caused by a collision between the Warewell and the unbuoyed anchor of the Susan. A somewhat similar case, but of which the report is less full, occurred in the year 1703—it is also reported by Mr. Marsden—the case of Munday v. The Mary (p. 284), where a similar decree of the Admiralty Court was made. The collision was in the Thames within the ebb and flow of the tide, and within the jurisdiction of the court. Without saying those cases are decisive of the point, they are distinctly in the direction of the conclusion to which I have arrived. They do not purport in any way to find that the anchor was part of the tackle of the ship. It appears to me, therefore, that the Court of the Lord High Admiral must have had jurisdiction if such a case had occurred on the high seas. To say that he had not jurisdiction in a case occurring in the county of Lancaster is perfectly true; but that does not decide the question. Since those statutes to which I have referred were passed, there is a decision of Dr. Lushington upon 3 & 4 Vict. in The Sarah (Lush. 549), a case of damage received by a ship. The schooner Gleaner sued the steam-tug Secret and the keel Sarah. The Sarah was not a sea-going vessel—she was not a ship within the meaning of the term; she was a river boat propelled by a pole or oar. The Gleaner sued the Secret for damage received by a collision with the Sarah whilst towed by the Secret on the high seas, and the learned judge maintained to the fullest extent the jurisdiction of the court over such a case, basing it upon the original jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty. Now, take the other case, that arising on 24 Vict. c. 10, of damage done by any ship. In respect of that matter there are no less than four or five decisions which go to show that damage done by a ship to a fixed body is within the jurisdiction of the court. For instance, damage done by a ship to a barge was the case of The Malvina, tried by Dr. Lushington. There are two cases of damage by a ship to a breakwater before Sir Robert Phillimore, The Uhla (ubi sup.) and The Excelsior (ubi sup.), and the case of a telegraph cable, The Clara Killam (ubi sup.) also before the same judge. Therefore it appears to me that we have legislation which seems to have been intended to give reciprocal rights in cases of damage done by a ship and to a ship, and that in both those cases it has been determined that it is not necessary that the body receiving or doing the damage shall be a ship. I think, therefore, that the decisions upon those statutes strongly confirm the conclusion to which I have arrived.

But then it is said there is a difficulty caused by the rule of the Admiralty Court with regard to the cases of common negligence. That rule has never been applied, so far as I am aware, to any case except to a collision between ships. Furthermore it is to be observed that the Legislature, in stating the rule in the Judicature Act 1873, s. 25, sub-sect. 9, has stated that the rule applies to collisions between two ships, and therefore to state that it should be applied to a case of this sort seems to me to be a gratuitous assumption. In the view the Master of the Rolls takes, this case has already been covered by previous decisions of this court. If it appeared to me to be so, I should at once agree; but I am not able to find that the point which has been raised on the present occasion has ever received the decision of this court; and, according to my view, the learned President of the court below did right to say that under the statutes he had jurisdiction. If the matter rested with me, I should give my voice in favour of the decision of the learned judge; but I have the misfortune to differ from the majority of this court.

LOPES, L.J.—In this case I feel compelled to take the same view as that expressed by the Master of the Rolls. It appears to me most material, in the first place, to consider what was the decision in the case of Reg. v. Judge of the City of London Court (ubi sup.). Putting it shortly, what I understand to be decided in that case is this: that no greater jurisdiction than that which is possessed by the Admiralty Court is conferred upon the County Court except with regard to charter-parties. The jurisdiction, except with regard to charter-parties, conferred on the County Court is a jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court limited to 300*l.* It is no larger jurisdiction than the Court of Admiralty would have had if what happened had happened on the high seas. That being so disposes of the County Court Acts, and we therefore look to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court independently of the County Court. If what happened in this case had happened on the high seas, the question then is, could this action have been maintained in the Admiralty Court? What kind of action would it have been? It would have been an action in personam for damage done to a ship on the high seas arising from the negligence of somebody who managed a fixed object on the high seas. To my mind such a case is almost inconceivable. My brother Fry has referred to the case of rafts and other matters; but it seems to me highly incredible that that would happen. I am of the same opinion therefore as the Master of the Rolls, that the Lord High Admiral had no jurisdiction in a case of this kind. It has been said that there is no case of prohibition. I think the answer to that is obvious, viz., that no attempt, as far as I know, has ever been made to exercise any jurisdiction of this kind, and therefore it is easy to understand why no case of prohibition can be found. Then, again, if the case had been tried at common law, contributory negligence would have been an answer. It would have been a good plea in bar. If a case like this had been tried in the Admiralty Court, there would have been a division of the damages. The whole procedure would have been entirely different. I am therefore unable to agree with the learned President, and think that this appeal ought to be allowed.

THE CARL XV. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Qualified pilot—Licence—Order in Council, May 1, 1855—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 2, 388.

Where a vessel requiring a compulsory pilot in the London district and drawing more than 14*ft. takes a Trinity House pilot whose licence limits him to conducting ships of not more than* 14*ft. draught, because no other pilot is available, the effect of the pilotage provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act* 1854, and of the Order in Council of the 1*st May* 1855 forbidding a pilot restricted to conducting vessels of 14*ft. draught to conducting vessels of greater draught, "unless there shall be no qualified pilot to be obtained who has passed the said examination for ships drawing more than* 14*ft. water," is to make the pilot in such circumstances a qualified pilot, and to relieve the shipowners under sect.* 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 from liability for loss occasioned by his fault.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action from a decision of Sir Charles Butt, by which he relieved the defendants from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage.

The collision occurred in the river Thames on the 12th Jan. 1891 between the plaintiffs' steamship the Angelus and the defendants steamship the Carl XV., a Swedish steamship bound from Gothenburg to London laden with cargo and carrying passengers.

The defendants by their defence, besides alleging that the collision was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Angelus, pleaded compulsory pilotage and also counter-claimed.

At the time of the collision it appeared that the Carl XV. was in charge of a Trinity House pilot who had boarded the ship at Gravesend.

The pilot's licence, omitting immaterial points, was as follows: We, the Trinity House, . . . do hereby appoint and license the said Joseph James Acland Mitchell to act as a pilot for the purpose of conducting ships from London Bridge down the river Thames to Gravesend, and back again to London Bridge . . . provided always that this licence shall not authorise or empower the said Joseph James Acland Mitchell to take charge as a pilot of any ship or vessel drawing more than 14ft. water in the river Thames or Medway or any of the channels leading thereto or therefrom, until it shall be certified hereon that the said Joseph James Acland Mitchell has acted as a licensed pilot for three years, and has been, on re-examination, approved of in that behalf by us, the said Trinity House."

The Carl XV. was drawing 12ft. 3in. forward and 16ft. 9in. aft, giving a mean of 14ft. 6in. when

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mitchell took charge of her at Gravesend; there was no pilot for ships drawing more than 14ft. obtainable.

The judge found that the cause of the collision was the improper navigation of the Carl XV. for which her pilot was alone responsible.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104):

Sect. 2. Qualified pilot shall mean any person duly licensed by any pilotage authority to conduct ships to which he does not belong.

Sect. 388. No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law.

Order in Council relating to pilotage within the pilotage jurisdiction of the Trinity House, dated the 1st May 1855:

Regulation 4. No person licensed as a pilot for the London district (except freemen of the said waterman's company to be licensed as hereinafter provided) shall take charge as such of any ship drawing more than 14ft. water in the river Thames or Medway or any of the channels leading thereto or therefrom, until such person shall have acted as a licensed pilot for three years, and shall have been after such three years on re-examination approved of in that behalf by the said Trinity House, on pain of forfeiting ten pounds (10*l.*) for every such offence, unless there shall be no qualified pilot to be obtained who has passed the said examination for ships drawing more than 14ft. water.

Barnes, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—The defendants have not established the plea of compulsory pilotage. They were not bound to take the pilot. He was by the very terms of his licence limited to piloting vessels drawing 14ft. and under. If so, he was not a qualified pilot within the meaning of sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. In other words, his employment was voluntary. By sect. 2 a "qualified pilot" is one who is "duly licensed." This man was admittedly not "duly licensed:"

The Yorkshireman, Shipping Gazette, March 10, 1891;
Hammond v. Blake, 10 B. & C. 424.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Stubbs, for the defendants, contrà.—This pilot was in the circumstances qualified to conduct the Carl XV. The Order in Council is to be read together with the licence and the Merchant Shipping Act. If so, he had authority to take charge of the vessel, and her master was bound to accept his services. He was therefore a compulsory pilot:

The General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Navigation Company, Br. & Lush. 199.

Barnes, Q.C.—The only effect of the Order in Council is to relieve a pilot from penalties if he takes charge in the absence of a qualified pilot. It does not make his employment compulsory.

Sir CHARLES BUTT.—This is a case of collision occasioned by the negligent navigation of the defendants' vessel. The ship was bound to take a pilot by compulsion of law if one was obtainable. The plaintiffs contend that the pilot in question was not qualified, and that therefore the defendants were not bound to employ him. Sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 relieves shipowners from liability for damage occasioned by the fault of a qualified pilot who is in charge of their ship by compulsion of law. The defendants contend that, having regard to that section as explained by sect. 2, which says that the words "qualified pilot shall mean any person duly licensed by any pilotage authority to conduct ships to which he does not belong," the pilot in question was a duly qualified pilot. Without entering upon that discussion, with reference to which much may be said on each side, I think, having regard to those sections of the Act of 1854 and to the Order in Council of the 1st May 1855, that the pilot of the Carl XV. was a "qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship" within the meaning of sect. 388 of the Act, it being admitted that, when the pilot went on board the Carl XV., there was no pilot to be obtained licensed to conduct ships drawing more than 14ft. of water. The material part of the Order in Council is as follows: "No person licensed as a pilot for the London district . . . shall take charge as such of any ship drawing more than 14ft. water in the river Thames or Medway or any of the channels leading thereto or therefrom, until such person shall have acted as a licensed pilot for three years, and shall have been after such three years on re-examination approved of in that behalf by the said Trinity House, on pain of forfeiting 10*l.* for every such offence, unless there shall be no qualified pilot to be obtained who has passed the said examination for ships drawing more than 14ft. water." I am of opinion that the Order in Council not only exempts him from the penalty, but, taken in conjunction with the other enactments referred to, qualifies him pro hac vice to conduct ships of a greater draught than 14ft. My judgment must, therefore, be for the defendants.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed

Cohen, Q.C. (with him J. P. Aspinall), for the appellants, in addition to the arguments used below, cited

The Maria, 1 W. Rob. 95.

Witt, Q.C. and Stubbs, for the respondents, were not called on.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think that the late President's decision is right. In order to understand the matter the Order in Council and the statute must be read together, for the court cannot suppose that the Order in Council was meant to supersede the Act of Parliament. If it was so intended, wherever it tried to do so, to my idea it would be ultra vires. You cannot by an Order in Council supersede an Act of Parliament. They must be read together. Under sect. 369 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 the Trinity House is empowered to provide for the appointment in the districts there referred to of qualified pilots. By sect. 370 provision is made for licensing pilots in the London district after due examination by the Trinity House. If the pilot is being examined so as to be appointed a qualified pilot within the London district, he is examined by the Trinity House for the purpose of seeing whether he is fit to conduct ships within that district. When is a man fit to conduct ships within a district as pilot? He must know how to handle and steer a ship; he must know the shoals and sands and all the difficulties of the navigation of the district. How a particular ship steers under particular circumstances is a matter within the knowledge of the master and crew. The pilot, therefore, gives the requisite orders, but the master carries them out. The master or other officer is bound to be there to assist the pilot. But in regard to the knowledge of the sands, shoals, currents, and such like matters, they are things about which the master may know nothing. Take the case of a foreign ship or a ship whose navigation has not been in the London district. Her master may be one of the most competent masters in the mercantile marine, but he has not been in the Thames before. He knows nothing about its shoals, sands, or currents. The pilot knows all about them. No one is allowed to be appointed a pilot who has not this peculiar knowledge which the master lacks. The Act of Parliament deals with the matter thus: Sect. 2 of the Act of 1854 says: "Qualified pilot shall mean any person duly licensed by any pilotage authority to conduct ships to which he does not belong." By sect. 365 a qualified pilot is bound under a penalty "to take charge of any ship within the limits of his licence upon the signal for a pilot being made by such ship." By sect. 376 the master of a ship, not otherwise exempted navigating within the London district, is bound under a penalty to take a "qualified pilot" who "has offered to take charge of such ship or has made a signal for that purpose." By sect. 388, "No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law." Hence, if a master in the London district takes a qualified pilot on board to conduct his ship, he is exempt from any default or incapacity of the pilot. That seems only reasonable. I have pointed out what the pilot is presumed to know, what he is held out by the authorities to know. To say in such circumstances that the master or owner shall be answerable for anything which is the fault of the pilot alone simply shocks the conscience.

According to the Act of Parliament this pilot was a qualified pilot. There can be no doubt on that. He had been examined by the Trinity House and held a licence to conduct ships within the district. Is there anything in the Order in Council which says that he was not a qualified pilot within the meaning of the statute? It is to be read with the statute. It is to be read, therefore, as applying to a man who has passed his examination. The Order in Council was not meant to contravene anything in the statute. The language of the Order in Council is this: "No person licensed as a pilot," that is, no person who has passed the examination before the Trinity House and has obtained his licence, that is, a qualified pilot "within the London district," and therefore licensed to conduct ships while within that district, "shall take charge as such of any vessel drawing more than 14ft. water in the river Thames or Medway or any of the channels leading thereto or therefrom, until such person shall have acted as a licensed pilot for three years and shall have been, after such three years, on re-examination approved of in that behalf by the said Trinity House, on pain of forfeiting 10*l.* for every such offence, unless there shall be no qualified pilot to be obtained who has passed the said examination for ships drawing more than 14ft. of water." What is the meaning of the word "unless?" When you use the word "unless," it means that, if something happens, then what has been said before will not apply. The meaning here is, that such a pilot is not to take charge if there is one of the other pilots available. If there is no other pilot available, then he is to take charge, and he must take charge. Therefore the pilot was entitled to take charge of this ship; and the master was bound to take him if he offered himself. He was a compulsory pilot within the meaning of the statute, and by that statute the shipowner is not liable for any accident which is the result of the fault of the pilot. I therefore think that the judgment is right, and that this appeal must be dismissed. It is said that, by affirming the decision, we may give rise to a difficulty, should a pilot of the higher class attempt to take a ship out of the hands of one of the lower class who, in the first instance being the only pilot available, has taken charge of the ship. In my opinion, although it is not necessary to decide it, I am inclined to think that the later pilot, the one qualified to navigate ships drawing more than 14ft., would have a right to take charge, and the master would have to give him charge, but the first pilot would be entitled to a fair proportion of the pilotage fees. I should think so, but it is not necessary to decide it in this case.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion Sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 provides that "No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law." If this pilot was a qualified pilot, the ship was bound to employ him, and he was bound to serve. Was he a qualified pilot? I am of opinion that, on the true construction of the Order in Council and of his licence read by the light of the Act of Parliament, this person was a qualified pilot, I think that all pilots in his capacity and in his condition are qualified pilots for the purpose for which this person was acting, unless there is another pilot obtainable who possesses superior qualifications. That is the short sense of the matter. This man was not unqualified. He was qualified, but he would cease to be capable of acting if there was a more qualified pilot present, and capable of being obtained. I think he was a qualified pilot, because in the first place he was a licensed pilot. A qualified pilot by sect. 2 of the Act of 1854 is defined as "any person duly licensed by any pilotage authority to conduct ships to which he does not belong." Next let us consider whether the Order in Council and his licence prevent him from being a qualified pilot under the circumstances. The Order in Council does not appear to me to do anything except prevent qualified pilots from acting in particular circumstances, that is to say, when somebody better can be had. If the master cannot get anybody better, it leaves the pilot free and compellable to act. The Order in Council provides as follows: "No person licensed as a pilot for the London district shall take charge" who has not been three years a licensed pilot and has not been re-examined, "unless there shall be no qualified pilot to be obtained who has passed the said examination." Reading that in the ordinary sense in which language is to be read, it means that there are two kinds of qualified pilots. There is the qualified pilot who is capable of acting; there is also the qualified pilot who is liable to be superseded if you cannot get a better. The qualified pilot who is liable to be superseded if a better can be obtained, becomes disqualified if a better can be obtained, or rather becomes incapable of acting lawfully if a better can be obtained. Such is the true construction of the Order in Council. But it is argued that the licence, apart from the Order in Council, shows that this pilot only had a qualification of a limited kind which prevents him from being a qualified pilot. That, to my mind, is not the true construction of the licence. In the first place, I think that the licence must be read by the light of the Order in Council. It is unintelligible otherwise. It is a licence under the seal of the Trinity House appointing Mitchell to act as a pilot for conducting ships from London Bridge down the river to Gravesend and back; and unless it be revoked or suspended in the way provided, it is to continue in force till the 31st Jan. after the date on which it is given, and then it may be renewed from time to time by indorsement. It contains a proviso which limits the action of the pilot under the licence. It is not to be deemed to authorise him to take charge as a pilot of a vessel drawing more than 14ft. until he has acted for three years as a licensed pilot. If that stood alone there might be a difficulty; but I do not think it is intended to stand alone. The licence issued by the Trinity House must be read with the Order in Council, and it must mean, I think, that the modification which the Order in Council introduces in its last clause, beginning with the word "unless," does empower a man to take charge in the case indicated. Accordingly, on the true construction of the law, I think this pilot was a qualified pilot whenever there was nobody better to take charge. I do not know whether there is a good reason for it; but unless there is it is unfortunate that the licence does not refer to the Order in Council. What the reason of that is I do not know.

KAY, L.J.—It is said that this pilot was not qualified within the meaning of sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The Order in Council makes him qualified under the circumstances, because, notwithstanding the language of his licence, it enables him to take charge of a vessel drawing more than 14ft. where no pilot with a superior qualification is available. I think the statute, the Order in Council, and the licence, must be read together. If so, this pilot was qualified and the ship was in charge of a compulsory pilot.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Policy—"Deviation" clause—Change of voyage—Goods declared on policy for certain voyage—Loss of goods—Right of assured to recover on policy.

A policy of marine insurance was stated to be "at and from the Mersey and (or) London, both or either, to any port or ports in Portugal and (or) Spain this side Gibraltar, and (or) at and from thence by any inland conveyances to any place or places in the interior," including all risks whatsoever from the time of leaving the warehouse in the United Kingdom, and all risks of every kind until safely delivered at the warehouses of the consignees. The policy contained this clause: "Deviation and (or) change of voyage and (or) transhipments not included in the policy to be held covered at a premium to be arranged." Goods of the assured were despatched from Bradford to Madrid, and the consignors intended the goods to be shipped, as on former occasions, at Liverpool for Seville, and carried thence by land to Madrid, and they instructed the insurance brokers that the voyage was to Seville. It appeared from the bills of lading that the voyage was not to Seville at all, and that the bills of lading of the goods in question were made out to Cartagena. The ship was lost with the goods while on that part of the voyage which was common to vessels going to the western ports of Spain and those going to the eastern ports. The consignors on discovering the change of voyage after the loss offered to pay the extra premium to Cartagena, but it was refused.

In an action upon the policy by the consignors against the underwriters:

Held, that in substance the policy was a policy of insurance from the Thames or Mersey to a port on the west coast of Spain; and that, as in this case there was not a mere intention to deviate, and as the ship, so far as the goods were concerned, had sailed on a different voyage, and one for which the assured had no right to "declare" them, the policy and deviation clause never attached, and the assured had no right to recover on the policy.

Decision of Wright, J. (67 L. T. Rep. N. S. 352; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 219) affirmed.

THE plaintiffs were interested to the amount of 425*l.* in four packages of merchandise which were sent from Bradford, in the county of York, under a policy of marine insurance effected on their behalf by their brokers, dated the 18th Feb. 1891, subscribed by the defendants, the underwriters, on merchandise and (or) on sundries as interest might appear or be thereinafter declared, value to include invoice cost charges and 10 per cent. advance thereon, or in accordance with instructions received from consignees, average payable on each package separately or as was customary.

The policy was expressed to be in respect of goods lost or not lost

At and from the Mersey and (or) London, both or either, to any port or ports in Portugal and (or) Spain this side Gibraltar and (or) at and from thence by any inland conveyances to any place or places in the interior, including all risks by rail and (or) steamer between Lisbon and Oporto, including all risks by any conveyances whatsoever from the time of leaving the warehouse in the United Kingdom until on board, in craft to and from the vessel or vessels, of lighters on the rivers or elsewhere, of fire whilst waiting shipment in docks, warehouses, hulks, or elsewhere, and (or) in transit, of transhipment, of steam navigation, and all risks of every kind until safely delivered at the warehouses of the consignees, and including all liberties as per bills of lading.

There was a marginal note as follows:

Deviation and (or) change of voyage and (or) transhipments not included in this policy to be held covered at a premium to be arranged.

In other respects the policy was in the usual form.

The goods were despatched on or before the 2nd March 1891 to Madrid.

On former occasions the goods of the same consignors for Madrid had been shipped at Liverpool for Seville, and carried thence by land to Madrid, and the consignors intended the same course to be followed on the present occasion.

On the 3rd March 1891 they caused the goods to be "declared" on the policy.

On the 7th March 1891 they learnt that the goods would go by the ship Lope de Vega, and on the 10th March 1891 they caused the name of that ship to be inserted in the declaration and instructed the insurance broker that the voyage was to Seville.

The ship had cleared from Liverpool on the 6th March 1891, and she was lost with the goods in question while on that part of the voyage which was common to vessels going to the western ports of Spain and to those going to the eastern ports.

It was then discovered from the bills of lading that the voyage of the Lope de Vega was not to Seville at all, but only to Carril and Huelva on the west coast and Cartagena and other ports on the east coast, and that the bills of lading of these goods had been made out for Cartagena on the east coast.

The plaintiffs immediately informed the underwriters of the mistake and offered to pay the underwriters the proper extra premium to Cartagena, but that offer was refused, not on the ground of insufficiency of premium offered, but absolutely and on the ground that the voyage to Cartagena was not one of the voyages covered by the policy.

Thereupon the plaintiffs brought this action against the defendants, seeking to recover on the policy.

In July 1892 the action came on for trial before Wright, J., sitting without a jury, in Middlesex.

It was decided by Wright, J. (67 L. T. Rep. N. S. 352; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 219) that, as the ship, so far as the plaintiffs' goods were concerned, had sailed on a different voyage, and one for which the assured had no right under the policy to "declare" them, the policy and deviation clause never attached; and that therefore the plaintiffs had no right to recover on the policy.

From that decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

Cohen, Q.C. (English Harrison with him), for the appellants, contended that, as the goods were intended by the consignors to proceed by a route covered by the policy, the declaration was rightly made, and the assured were entitled to the change of voyage. They referred to Rodocanachi v. Elliott, 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 840; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399; 31 Ib. 239; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 649; 9 Ib. 518.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton, for the respondents, contended that the words "change of voyage" applied only to a change after the policy had once attached by commencement of a voyage of such a kind that, if not changed, it would have been within the policy; and that an initial declaration and shipment of goods on any other voyage was outside the contract.

Cohen, Q.C. replied.

Lindley, L.J.—This is an action on a policy of marine insurance. It is a policy insuring goods lost or not lost at and from the Mersey and (or) London, both or either, to any port or ports in Portugal and (or) Spain this side Gibraltar." Then it goes on thus: "and (or) at and from thence by any inland conveyances to any place or places in the interior, including all risks by rail and (or) steamer between Lisbon and Oporto, including all risks by any conveyances whatsoever from the time of leaving the warehouse in the United Kingdom until on board, in craft to and from the vessel or vessels, of lighters on the rivers or elsewhere, of fire whilst waiting shipment in docks, warehouses, hulks, or elsewhere, and (or) in transit, of transhipment, of steam navigation, and all risks of every kind until safely delivered at the warehouses of the consignees, and including all liberties as per bills of lading." Then there is in the margin this clause, which may be important: "Deviation and (or) change of voyage and (or) transhipments not included in the policy to be held covered at a premium to be arranged." Now, the real question which we have to consider is, whether this policy ever did, or whether it never did, attach to goods sent by the person for whom the policy was effected from Bradford under the circumstances which I will mention. These goods were intended by the merchants—that is to say, the plaintiffs—to go to Madrid, and I think the correspondence showed that they were intended to go by the mode in which similar goods had gone before—that is to say, viâ Liverpool and Seville. That seems to have been the way in which these merchants had sent goods to Madrid before. Unfortunately these goods were not shipped from Liverpool to any port west of Gibraltar; but, by a blunder, I suppose, they were shipped to a port east of Gibraltar, viz., Cartagena, one of the places to which the ship was going. That port was not a port such as is described in the words which I have read, that is to say, it is not a port in Portugal or Spain "this side of Gibraltar." That is where they were lost. The ship was going first to Carril, and then I understand to a port in the south, which would be the place for discharging the goods if they were going to Seville, and then the ship was going on through the Straits of Gibraltar to Cartagena and other places. Now, Mr. Cohen says that, upon the true construction of this policy, this is a policy from Bradford to Madrid. If it is, then I think it is not denied by his opponents that the underwriters would be liable. But it is contended that this is not a policy from Bradford to Madrid at all. And, after some little consideration, I am disposed to come to the conclusion that the view of the underwriters is right, and that the way in which it appears to me their position is established is this: We must ask ourselves what is the voyage that includes the risks to which I have alluded. What is to include them? It is an insurance from the Mersey to some port in Spain this side of Gibraltar, and unless these goods were insured for that voyage there is nothing which brings in this extra risk. You have got your starting point. First, were the goods insured from Liverpool to some place this side of Gibraltar? They never were on that voyagn; and that being the case, you cannot extend the policy to cover the risks not included in the voyage for which these goods were insured. That appears to me to be the short answer and the conclusive answer to Mr. Cohen's argument. In other words, this policy is not a policy from Bradford to Madrid, and the plaintiffs are unable, by reason of the blunder which has been committed, to bring themselves within the risks which are included in the policy, I think, therefore, that the view taken by the learned judge in the court below is right. I did not see it at first, but I see it now, that this policy never attached, and, that being so, neither the clause as to deviation or change of voyage affects the matter. The appeal must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

BOWEN, L.J. — I am entirely of the same opinion. The real fate of the appeal depends upon the answer we give to the question whether this policy ever attached. Now if we take the policy and construe it, it seems to me that its meaning becomes tolerably clear. We start with this, that the policy is a marine policy to begin with. A land journey is superadded to it, but forms part of the journey which the goods are to make and the duration of the risk becomes applicable accordingly to the entire journey. The first thing we have to do is to discover what the voyage or journey is which is to be insured, in order to see to what voyage or journey the duration of the risk is applicable in order to consider what risks are included by enumeration under the policy. The voyage is a distinct thing altogether from the enumeration of the risks. The voyage here seems to me to be fixed by words which it is impossible to extend, and which it is impossible to misunderstand. It is "At and from the Mersey and (or) London, both or either, to any port or ports in Portugal and (or) Spain this side Gibraltar." So much as to the words which define the initial marine transit to which is superadded the land transit, "and (or) at and from thence by any inland conveyances to any place or places in the interior, including all risks by rail and (or) steamer between Lisbon and Oporto." It seems to me that the terminus with which the voyage or journey begins is "the Mersey and (or) London both or either." Then there is a terminus with which the marine transit is to end, which is an essential part of the definition of this journey "to any port or ports in Portugal and (or) Spain this side Gibraltar." Again there is a further terminus which is fixed for the land journey which is superadded "any place or places in the interior." Now the policy remains to a great extent a marine policy. It is not a marine policy which ends so soon as the sea is crossed, but a marine policy to which is superadded a land transit which is intended to be covered by the period during which the goods are to be protected. But the voyage is defined as clearly as a voyage can be defined. Now we all know by this time the general history of the extension of the protection which the policy provides for the goods by the enumeration of risks slightly outside the transit. Mr. Hamilton referred to that, and I think his recollection was correct, that it has been by slow growth that risks outside the sea journey have been swept, so to speak, under the shelter of the policy, and it has been by degrees that the extension has been made. In fact, as no one can recollect better than Mr. Cohen, at the time of the French and German war twenty years ago the common form of policy was a matter which gave rise to the greatest interest on the part of the profession, and I suppose there was hardly a lawyer in England who was not consulted about that particular form of policy and the liabilities which it was supposed to create. But the truth is that in construing the whole of the obligations and protections to which the policy applies you must first get distinctly in your mind the voyage and the definition of the risks. One arrives at a definition of the voyage, and then applies the definition of the voyage to the enumeration of the risks. Now here the goods started from Bradford, and it has been contended that the moment they started from Bradford they were upon the insured voyage. If the goods had ever been upon the insured voyage it seems to me the risks during the time that they were between Bradford and Liverpool would have been covered as incidental to and supplementary to the insured voyage. But we have here a conclusive fact that the goods never were upon the insured voyage. Accordingly the risks between Bradford and Liverpool never could be incidental or supplementary to it. It is not necessary to decide what would have been the case supposing the goods after having been specifically appropriated by a contract of carriage to the insured voyage were injured or lost during the transit between Bradford and Liverpool. It is not necessary to decide that case. In this case the facts show conclusively that the goods were never specifically appropriated to the insured voyage because the persons who had the control of the goods—the persons who had the power of fixing the voyage on which the goods were ultimately to go—fixed the voyage outside the policy. If tha is so the policy never attached, and it follows that the clause as to deviation and change of voyage cannot affect it. Now it has been said that this is a technical point. This particular case certainly seems a hard case. But it is a most important point of business. I cannot conceive a more important point, nor can I conceive one which might lead to more mischief than might follow if we were to loosely construe this contract in order to assist a particular owner of goods. We cannot do that, particularly when we are dealing with an insurance contract. Men of business depend upon a correct interpretation of the law, and we shall be adopting a course which in the long run is more conformable to justice and fair dealing if we keep it to its channel than if we in any particular case stretch the law in order to protect a particular plaintiff.

SMITH, L.J.—This is an action brought under a Lloyd's policy to recover for a total loss of goods at sea. That is the claim. The defence is that the goods never were upon the voyage insured by the policy. They were never covered by the policy, and the policy therefore never attached. That is the issue. My learned brother Wright has held that the defendants are right, and that, although at first sight this does appear, considering the facts of the case, a somewhat technical defence, I quite agree with what has fallen from Bowen, L.J. That does not make it any less incumbent upon us to put this construction upon a Lloyd's policy. Now a good deal of this policy is in the old form so far as I can gather, and the point to ascertain first of all is, what is the voyage covered by the policy, in order to ascertain whether the policy attaches to the goods in question. Now this policy begins that the plaintiffs are insured at and from the Mersey to the west coast of Spain and at and from the west coast of Spain to places in the interior of Spain. That is the voyage which is contemplated in this policy at and from the Mersey, leaving out London, to the west coast of Spain and to the interior of Spain. Then how does the policy go on? When you ascertain what the voyage is, then come the risks which are to be included in that voyage. And, as I read this policy, when you once get the goods upon the voyage in question, then the risks which the underwriters undertake are the risks from the warehouse to the ship in this country, and from the ship to the warehouse in the other country. But unless you get the goods started upon—or allocated by contract, as Bowen, L.J. said, and I adopt that phrase—to go upon the insured voyage, in my judgment, this policy does not attach. Now it is said here that the policy attached, no matter what voyage the goods ultimately might go upon, immediately the goods started off at Bradford. I do not read the policy in that way at all. Until you get the contemplated voyage and the goods upon that contemplated voyage, in my judgment this policy does not attach, and it is a mistake to read in here that this policy is at and from Bradford to the east coast of Spain. It is at and from the Mersey to the west coast of Spain, and when you get that voyage there, it is then that the risks attached to the goods between Bradford and the Mersey. It seems to me that until this policy attached—and this is conceded on both sides—the marginal note about deviation and change of voyage does not apply at all. In my opinion, my learned brother Wright was right when he held that the underwriters' defence was correct in saying that these goods never were at risk upon the insured voyage; and that, therefore, the policy never attached.

Appeal dismissed.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Friday, Nov. 4, 1892.

(Before POLLOCK, B. and HAWKINS, J.)

GOSLING v. GREEN. (a)

Navigation—River Thames—Steamboat—"Proper look-out to be kept"—Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 133), bye-law 99—Thames Conservancy Act 1864, bye-law 36 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 113).

An information was laid against the master of a steamboat on the Thames, charging him with having navigated the said steamboat without causing a proper look-out to be kept from the bow of such vessel contrary to the bye-law in that case made and provided. It was proved that there was no person in the bow of the vessel.

The magistrate convicted the defendant under the bye-law 99 of the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 133), holding that that Act was good and valid as regards the matter before him.

Held, on appeal, that the decision of the magistrate was right, and that bye-law 36 of the Thames Conservancy Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 113) did not repeal bye-law 99 of the Watermen Act of 1859.

THIS was an appeal, on a case stated, from the decision of Mr. De Rutzen, one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis, who convicted the appellant for a breach of bye-law 99 of the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act 1859.

The facts are sufficiently set out in the following stated case:—

In this case a summons was taken out by one Harry Gosling on the 17th June 1892, under the 99th bye-law of the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act (22 & 23 Vict. c, 133).

The said summons was as follows:

In the Metropolitan Police District.—To Mr. George Green, of 7, Church-lane, Battersea.—Information has been laid this day by Harry Gosling for that you, on the 17th day of June, in the year One thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, between Southwark Bridge and Westminster Bridge, within the district aforesaid, being the master or person in charge of the steamboat Rifleman, did navigate the same without causing a proper look-out to be kept from the bow of such vessel, contrary to the bye-law in that case made and provided. You are therefore summoned to appear before the Court of Summary Jurisdiction, sitting at the Westminster Police-court, on Wednesday, the 29th day of June, at the hour of two in the afternoon, to answer to the said information.—Date the 22nd day of June, One thousand eight hundred and ninety-two. — (Signed) A. DE RUTZEN.

The summons was returnable before me on the 29th June 1892, and was heard before me on the 29th June 1892 and the 6th July 1892. I reserved my decision, which I delivered on the 13th July 1892, and I convicted the said George Green, and fined him in the sum of 5*s*., and allowed three guineas costs.

On the hearing of the summons it was contended before me by counsel for the said George Green: Firstly, that I had no jurisdiction to grant or hear the summons; secondly, that bye-law 99 of the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act

(a) Reported by T. R. BRIDGWATER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 133) was bad, being inconsistent with bye-law 36 made under the authority of the Thames Conservancy Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 118).

Bye-law 99 of the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act 1859 is as follows:

(99.) That if the master or other person having the command or management of any steamboat or vessel navigated as last aforesaid, shall not (when practicable) remain, continue, and be on one of the paddle-boxes, or on the bridge of such steamboat or vessel, or shall permit or suffer any other person except the crew of such steamboat or vessel to be and remain on such paddle-box, or on the deck cabins thereto adjoining, or bridge of such steamboat or vessel, or shall not cause and procure a proper look out to be kept from the bow of such steamboat or vessel, he shall incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds; and any passenger or other person who shall be and remain upon the bridge, or the paddle-box, or on the deck cabin of any such steamboat or vessel, after having been warned by the master or other person having the command or management thereof to remove therefrom, shall incur a penalty not exceeding forty shillings.

Bye-law 36 of the Thames Conservancy Act 1864 is as follows:

The master of every steam vessel navigating the river shall be and remain on one of the paddle-boxes, or on the bridge of such steam vessel, and shall cause a proper look out to be kept from the said steam vessel during the whole time it is under way, and shall remove, or cause to be removed, any person other than the crew who shall be on the bridge or paddle-boxes of such steamer.

It was proved, and I find as a fact, that there was no person in the bow of the vessel on the day charged in the summons.

The questions of law respectfully submitted to the court for their opinion are: Firstly, had I jurisdiction, sitting as one of the magistrates of the police-courts of the metropolis, to issue the said summons, and to hear and determine the matter therein complained of? Secondly, is bye-law 99 of the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act Act good and valid so far as regards the matter decided by me in this case?

If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information is to be dismissed.

J. P. Grain appeared on behalf of the appellant. —The magistrate's decision was wrong, and the conviction ought to be quashed. The whole question is whether the master of a steamboat on the Thames is governed by bye-law 99 of the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act of 1859. It is submitted that he is not. Bye-law 36 of the Thames Conservancy Act 1864 overrules and repeals bye-law 99 of the aforesaid Act. Therefore the magistrate had no jurisdiction to grant or hear the summons under bye-law 99.

Avory, who appeared in support of the conviction, was not called upon.

Pollock, B.—Bye-law 99 of the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 133) enacts among other things, that the master of a steamboat or vessel shall incur a certain penalty if he do not "cause and procure a proper look-out to be kept from the bow of such steamboat or vessel." Now, in the case before us the magistrate finds as a fact that the appellant had no person in the bow of his vessel on the day charged in the summons. The only question for us to decide—viz., that left by the magistrate—is whether the bye-law of the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act, under which the information was laid, is a valid one. This is bye-law 99. Now, there are two things required by this bye-law. Firstly, the master shall remain, continue, and be on one of the paddle-boxes or the bridge of the vessel; secondly, he shall cause some person to be in the bow of the vessel in order to keep a proper look-out. This involves the necessity of two persons being on the watch or look-out while the vessel is being navigated. One object of this bye-law is to protect persons who are on the Thames, and the other is to provide the manner and means by which such persons shall be protected. Bye-law 36 of the Thames Conservancy Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 113) requires that the master of every steam-vessel shall remain on the paddle-box and cause a proper look-out to be kept from the vessel. We see that these two provisions are, up to a certain point, the same. The Watermen's Act requires a person to be kept in the bow; the Thames Conservancy Act, that a proper look-out shall be kept, whether at the bow or not is immaterial. The Thames Conservancy Act was passed in 1864, and by that Act the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act 1859 is dealt with, and it is provided that these two Acts are to be read as one. Bye-law 99 is left alone, however, not being dealt with at all. It was not repealed, it is not inconsistent with the Conservancy Act, and therefore this conviction must be affirmed.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION, IN BANKRUPTCY.

Wednesday, Oct. 27, 1892.

(Before Williams, J.)

Re Gurney; Ex parte Hughes. (a)

Bankruptcy — Stoppage in transitu — End of transit.

Certain goods were ordered from R. and Co. by G. and were delivered at the docks, marked, as required by G., J. H. A. and Co, Trinidad. With the goods were forwarded shipping instructions from G. directing the goods to be placed on board the s.s. MacGarel. A receipt signed by the dock superintendent was given for them to R. and Co. as follows: "Bought of R. and Co., J. H. A. and Co., 500 boxes. S.s. MacGarel, on account G., Trinidad."

The goods were shipped for Trinidad, and while on their way, G. having become bankrupt, R. and Co. gave notice to stop them in transit. The goods were afterwards delivered under the orders of the Trinidad Court to J. H. A. and Co., who paid the trustee in bankruptcy of G. 75l. for them. R. and Co. claimed this money.

Held, that the transit was determined when the receipt was given; that there was no stoppage of the goods in transit, and that therefore the trustee and not R. and Co., was entitled to the 75l.

This was a motion by Hughes (trading as H. E.

(a) Reported by Walter B. Yates, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Reynolds and Co.), to have it declared that they were entitled to receive the sum of 75*l.*, the price of certain goods purchased from them by Gurney, trading as Barrow and Gibson.

On the 27th May 1891 Messrs. Reynolds received from Barrow and Gibson the following order:

From Barrow and Gibson, 23, Lime-street, E.C.—To Messrs. H. E. Reynolds and Co.—London, 27th May 1891.—Please send invoice in duplicate by 2nd June.—J. H. A. and Co., Trinidad.—500 boxes, two gross Reynolds' pipes.—By 2nd June.

With the above order were handed to the vendors the following instructions to be handed to the superintendent of the London Docks with the goods:

Superintendent, London Docks.—Please receive the undermentioned packages to be shipped on board the MacGarel.—Capt. ——

Mark.
J. H. A. and Co., Trinidad. May 26, 1891.	500 boxes clay pipes. Barrow and Gibson, 23, Lime-street, E.C.

On the 27th May 1891 the said goods were invoiced to Messrs. Barrow and Gibson at the price of 75*l.* net, marked "J. H. A. and Co., Trinidad, for s.s. MacGarel, London Docks."

On the 1st June 1891 the goods were delivered to the London Dock Company, together with the shipping instructions, and a receipt drawn up by the vendors was signed by the superintendent of the London Docks. The receipt was as follows:

The Original Manufacturers of Asbestos Fuel, London, June 1, 1891.—London Dock Company.—Bought of H. E. Reynolds and Co. Established 1770. Tobacco pipe manufactory and fire clay works. Office and works, 245, 243, Old Ford-road, Bow, E.—J. H. A. and Co., Trinidad. 500 boxes pipes. Five hundred. S.s. MacGarel. P. Billing, on account Barrow and Gibson, Lime-street.

In their affidavit Messrs. Reynolds swore they knew that the mark to be placed on the invoice and goods meant that the goods were for Messrs. Archer and Co., Trinidad, and were to be shipped to them, and that they knew that the goods were purchased on commission for Messrs. Archer by Barrow and Gibson.

On the 13th June 1891 a receiving order was made against Barrow and Gibson.

The goods were invoiced by Barrow and Gibson to Messrs. Archer for net 75*l.*, adding freight, insurance, and commission after Barrow and Gibson had filed their petition. The goods were in June 1891 shipped on board the MacGarel, which was due to arrive at Trinidad on the 25th June.

On the 15th June notice was given by Messrs. Reynolds to Messrs. Scrutton, Sons, and Co. the managing owners in London of the MacGarel, to hold the goods to the order of Messrs. Reynolds, as the goods had been sold by them to Barrow and Gibson, and Barrow and Gibson had stopped payment.

On the 20th June Messrs. Scrutton cabled to Trinidad to stop the goods on receiving an indemnity from Messrs. Reynolds.

On the 29th June the MacGarel arrived at Trinidad, and Messrs. Archer, as holders of the bill of lading of the goods, obtained an order from the court for delivery to them of the goods, and on the 11th Aug. the goods were delivered to Messrs. Archer, who paid for them to the trustee in bankruptcy of Barrow and Gibson the sum of 75*l.*

This was a motion by Messrs. Reynolds for a declaration that they were entitled to the 75*l.*, and that the trustee of Barrow and Gibson might be ordered to pay the same to them.

Daniel Jones for the applicant. — Messrs. Reynolds are entitled to this 75*l.* The vendors, by the buyers' directions, deliver the goods to the forwarding agents to ship to a destination named; the transit does not end until the goods reach the destination. That destination was Trinidad, and the goods were stopped before they reached there:

Bethell v. Clark, 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 346; 20 Q. B. Div. 615.

The instructions here were given of a final destination, and there was no further intervention by the buyer. The bills of lading are in the buyer's name. The instructions define the ship by which the goods are to go, and the place to which they are to go. He referred to

[WILLIAMS, J. referred to Ex parte Miles; Re Isaacs, 15 Q. B. Div. 39.]

Hansell for the trustee.—There was no right to stop the goods in transitu. The transit ended when the goods were delivered at the docks, when the vendee got possession of them either personally or by his agent. The instructions are to deliver to the superintendent of the London Docks, and the receipt is signed on behalf of Barrow and Gibson. This was the only destination named. The name of Archer is not mentioned. In Bethell v. Clark the order distinctly stated what was to be the destination of the goods, i.e., Melbourne. [WILLIAMS, J.—No; this was in the subsequent instructions.] The destination named here was the docks, and the transit ended on delivery there. The goods were delivered by the ship agents under an order of the Trinidad court to Archer and Co., and the court thereby declared that the goods had not been stopped in transitu. He cited

Jones in reply.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am much obliged to both the learned counsel for their assistance. The question in very nearly all cases of stoppage in transitu is, speaking generally, one of fact. The law, speaking generally, as applicable to cases of this kind is, that the right of the unpaid vendor is a right which continues in him, notwithstanding that he has parted with the property in the goods during their transit, until they reach the possession of the purchaser. The first thing to be ascertained is, what was the transit of these goods; and the next is, whether that transit has been determined by the purchaser taking possession. In order to arrive at the conclusion as to what was the transit, one must look back to the rule as laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Dixon v. Baldwin (5 East, 175), e.g., "that the goods had so far gotten to the end of their journey that they waited for new orders from the purchaser to put them again in motion, to communicate to them another substantive destination, and that without such orders they would continue stationary." That rule was alluded to by Lord Esher in Ex parte Miles (ubi sup.), and also in Bethell v. Clarke (ubi sup.), in both of which cases Lord Esher affirms Lord Ellenborough's rule as being still in force. I have to apply this rule, and to see whether these goods are on one side of the line or on the other. Now, what is the rule? It is that the goods will not continue in transit, so as to be the subject of stoppage in transitu, if they have arrived at a break of such a kind that there will be required new orders of the purchaser to put them again in motion, to indicate to them another substantive destination, without which they would continue stationary. That rule is expressed by each judge in Bethell v. Clark (ubi sup.) as follows: Lord Esher repeats the rule in the words of Lord Ellenborough; Fry, L.J. says: "If the delivery be to an agent to hold for the vendee, or to await further instructions for the despatch of the goods, then no doubt, the transit is at an end; but where it is only to an agent or agents whose sole duty it is to transmit the goods, then, however many agents' hands the goods pass through, while they are in the hands of any such agents the transitus continues." Lopes, L.J. says: "If the goods have so far reached the end of their journey that they wait for new orders from the purchasers to put them again in motion to communicate to them another substantive destination, and that without such orders they would remain stationary, the transitus is at an end. But where a place is fixed by the directions given by the buyer to the seller as the ultimate destination of the goods, and à fortiori if there is an express stipulation as to their destination in the contract of sale, the transit is not at an end until the goods reach that place."

The first thing then one has to ascertain is, whether or not there was a destination fixed by the instructions to the vendors at any time before the transit commenced. These directions may be given at the time of the order, or at some later period prior to the commencement of transit. There is some difficulty about saying there was any destination here other than the docks, as the order fixes no destination. It says: "Please send invoice or duplicate by the 2nd June.—J. H. A. and Co., Trinidad." That is, send duplicate invoice to the purchasers, the bankrupts, to deal with as they like. It was suggested that the second document, which was of even date with the order, is an indication to the vendor of the destination of the goods. That document is addressed "Superintendent, London Docks," and is signed by the purchasers, Barrow and Gibson. "Please receive the undermentioned packages to be shipped on board the MacGarel. Capt. ———" It is difficult to suppose but what there must have been some further instructions from someone fixing the destination. The mere statement that they are to be shipped on board the MacGarel is totally insufficient from a business point of view. I think there must have been further instructions, and that the onus of showing what those instructions were rests rather upon the purchasers than upon the vendors. In any case I have not to decide this case upon any such unsatisfactory grounds. It seems to me that, whatever may be the true view of the facts of this case, whether there was a destination fixed beyond the London Docks, or whether the goods would have had to wait there for new orders from the purchaser to put them again in motion, and to indicate to them another substantive destination, the purchasers did, in fact, get possessed of these goods in such a way as to determine the originally intended transit, if it was intended that that should be Trinidad, and not merely the London Docks, as they thought fit to send to the vendors the above-mentioned directions, not addressed to the vendors, but to the superintendent of the London Docks, and they had to admit that, if that document had been sent direct to the docks instead of being sent through the vendors, this case would not have been arguable. The vendors, upon receipt of these directions, themselves prepared the document marked D., which runs as follows: "London Dock Company.—Bought of H. E. Reynolds and Co., &c.—J. H. A. and Co., Trinidad.—500 boxes pipes.—S.s. MacGarel.—Five hundred.—P. Billing, on account Barrow and Gibson, Lime-street," and they prepare that form for signature by the superintendent of the docks. That document was signed by the superintendent. The meaning is, that the vendors read the directions as asking them to forward the goods to the superintendent of the docks, with instructions to hold the goods on account of the purchasers. I do not know whether the ship was then in port; I doubt it. The bills of lading were on the 9th June forwarded by the purchasers (I was not perhaps accurate in saying there was no evidence of any fresh instructions). It is clear that, if the ship was not there, the Dock Company would have charge of these goods as warehousemen, and so the form of the receipt was a proper one. Under these circumstances, I do not think I should be right in drawing the conclusion that the superintendent of the London Dock Company was merely one of a series of agents concerned in the transmission of these goods; the proper conclusion is, that the London Dock Company were agents to take charge of these goods for the purchasers until they were shipped. Whatever the arrangement was, the transit, in my opinion, was in fact determined the moment the receipt had been given. There was therefore no stoppage of the goods in transitu, and the motion must be dismissed with costs.

Motion dismissed.

THE DICTATOR. (a)

Salvage—Action in rem—Bail—Award in excess of claim—Writ—Personal liability of defendants.

Where in a salvage action in rem claiming 5000*l.*, in which the defendants' solicitors gave a written undertaking to appear and put in bail in an amount not exceeding 5000*l.*, the Court awarded 7500*l.*, and subsequently ordered the indorsement on the writ to be amended by altering the claim from 5000*l.* to 8500*l.*, the plaintiffs were allowed to issue execution against the defendants personally for the amount of the award, and were not restricted to the amount named in the undertaking to put in bail.

THIS was a summons by plaintiffs in a salvage action for particulars of the names and addresses of the defendants,

The plaintiffs by their writ claimed 5000*l.* for salvage services rendered to the steamship Dictator, her cargo and freight.

The defendants' solicitors gave the following written undertaking:

We undertake to appear for the defendants in due course, and to prove values in the usual manner and put in bail whenever required in an amount not exceeding 5000*l.*

At the hearing of the action on the 26th Nov. 1891 the President (Sir Charles Butt) awarded the plaintiffs 7500*l.* From this decision the defendants appealed, but the Court of Appeal upheld the award.

On the 16th Dec. 1891 the writ was amended by order of the President, increasing the amount claimed from 5000*l.* to 8500*l.*

The present summons was, by order of the judge, adjourned into court, when it was agreed between the parties that the application should be treated as one to determine whether execution could be issued against the defendants for more than 5000*l.* and costs.

Rules of the Supreme Court 1883:

Order XLII., r. 3. A judgment for the recovery by or payment to any person of money may be enforced by any of the modes by which a judgment or decree for the payment of money of any court whose jurisdiction is transferred by the principal Act might have been enforced at the time of the passing thereof.

Rule 17. Every person to whom any sum of money or any costs shall be payable under a judgment or order shall, so soon as the money or costs shall be payable, be entitled to sue out one or more writ or writs of fieri acias or one or more writ or writs of elegit to enforce payment thereof.

Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10):

Sect. 15. All decrees and orders of the High Court of Admiralty, whereby any sum of money or any costs, charges, or expenses shall be payable to any person shall have the same effect as judgments in the Superior Courts of common law, and the persons to whom any such moneys or costs, charges, or expenses shall be payable shall be deemed judgment creditors, and all powers of enforcing judgments possessed by the Superior Courts of common law, or any judge thereof, with respect to matters depending in the same courts, as well against the ships and goods arrested as against the person of the judgment debtor, shall be possessed by the said Court of Admiralty with respect to matters therein depending; and all remedies at common law possessed by judgment creditors shall be in like manner possessed by persons to whom any moneys, costs, charges, or expenses are by such orders or decrees of the said Court of Admiralty directed to be paid.

Sect. 22. Any new writ or other process necessary or expedient for giving effect to any of the provisions of this Act may be issued from the High Court of Admiralty in such form as the judge of the said court shall from time to time direct.

Barnes, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, in support of the application.—The plaintiffs having got judgment against the defendants as well as against the res, ought to get the benefit of such judgment. The defendants by appearing submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the court. If their contention be correct, the court will be unable to give effect to its own judgment, merely because the plaintiffs instituted the proceedings in rem instead of in personam. Order XLII., rr. 3 and 17, and sects. 15 and 22 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, give the court the necessary powers to enable it to order execution against the defendants for the whole amount of the award.

Sir Walter Phillimore, for the defendants, contrâ.—The defendants' limit of liability is the bail, or in this case the sum specified in the undertaking, viz., 5000*l.* The actions in rem and in personam are distinct, and have different results. The writ in rem is directed to the owners and parties interested in the res. Owners by appearing in an action in rem only do so to protect their interest in the res. The judgment is against the res. If no appearance is entered by the owner, the court's jurisdiction is limited to the res. The mere fact of appearance cannot give the court any greater jurisdiction. The exception which proves the rule contended for, is the power of the court to issue a monition in personam for the payment of costs, where the damages recovered and costs exceed the amount in which the suit was instituted. The court has also, under sects. 15 and 22 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, ordered a re-arrest of the res. But there is no authority for the present application:

The Staffordshire, L. Rep. 4 P. C. 194; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 365; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 46.

The Hope, 1 W. Rob. 154;
The Volant, 1 W. Rob. 383.

The Judicature Acts and the Admiralty Court Act 1861 have only altered procedure, and not the rights of parties. Judgment can only be drawn up according to the writ, i.e., against the owners appearing to protect their interest in the res to the extent of 5000*l.* If the plaintiffs' contention be right, mortgagees by appearing in an action in rem to protect their interest would render themselves personally liable to the judgment of the court. The plaintiffs' remedy is to institute fresh proceedings in personam:

The Orient, L. Rep. 3 P. C. 696; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 108.

Barnes, Q.C. in reply.—The cases relied on by the defendants were prior to the Admiralty Court Act 1861. On the authority of The Five Steel Barges (63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; 15 P. Div. 142; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 580), these proceedings might have been in personam, and had they been so, there would have been no difficulty in granting the present application. The plaintiffs have a maritime lien for the value of their services, which the court has fixed at 7500*l.*, and amended the writ in accordance with such award. The res has been re-arrested where insufficient bail has been taken:

In the case of The Zephyr (11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 351; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 146) Dr. Lushington made an order against the defendant personally to pay a balance of damages not satisfied by the bail. Cur. adv. vult.

May 10.—JEUNE, J.—In this case, which is an action in rem of salvage, the claim on the writ was for 5000*l.* The owners of the ship and cargo appeared as such, and by consent the ship was released on bail for 5000*l.* being given. At the hearing on the 26th Nov. 1891 before the President, the salvage was fixed at 7500*l.* On the 16th Dec. the writ was amended by order of the President by increasing the amount claimed to 8500*l.* On the 10th March 1892 the Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of this court as to the amount of the salvage award. The motion came before me on an application that particulars may be given of the names and addresses of the owners of the Dictator, the salved ship, and her cargo, with the value of the cargo belonging to such cargo owner opposite to his name. But it was agreed that the real object of the resistance to the application is to try the question whether execution can be issued against the owners of the ship and cargo for more than 5000*l.* and costs. If this had been an action in personam, as it might have been (The Five Steel Barges, ubi sup.), no doubt execution could be levied for the full amount of the award, it being within the value of the property salved. But it is an action in rem, and the contention is, that in such action, even when the owners of the res appear, there cannot be execution for any greater amount than that originally claimed, or at least, than the amount for which bail has been given and costs. The question therefore is, what—when the owners of the res have appeared in a salvage action in rem—is the limitation (other than the value of the property salved) on the powers of the court to award salvage, or the power of the plaintiff to enforce its payment if awarded. It is necessary to consider first whether in an action in rem, where a personal action would lie against the owners, judgment can be enforced for more than the value of the res, because, if it can, no doubt it can be enforced for more than the amount of the bail. In a salvage action in rem the question so stated has probably seldom arisen, although the case of The Jonge Bastian (5 Ch. Rob. 322) is an instance of it, because the property salved is generally identical with the res, and the salvage award never goes beyond the value of the property salved. But in actions of damage the question may readily arise now that the limit of liability may exceed the value of the ship by which the damage was caused and probably arose before the limit of the value of the ship was imposed by statute, as the limit of the amount to be recovered. It is one upon which the highest authorities are in conflict, and I think it can be solved only by considering the practice, and especially the early practice of the Admiralty Court and the different views which at different times have been taken of the effect of an action in rem. There can, I think, be no doubt that the courts of common law always clearly drew the distinction between the case of the Court of Admiralty having jurisdiction by reason of hypothecation or lien, or other reason, over a res, and it seeking to exercise jurisdiction against individuals personally, with regard to whom no such jurisdiction in the view of the common law courts existed, and while they allowed the action to proceed in regard to the former matter, prohibited it as to the latter (Johnson v. Skippen, 2 Ld. Ray. 983, affirmed by Blackburn, J. in Castrique v. Imrie, 4 H. of L. 431), and probably the Court of Admiralty, in cases such as The Ruby Queen (Lush. 266), recognised that the court might have jurisdiction quoad the res, though not quoad its owners. But the Court of Admiralty, it would appear, did not in early times treat the action in rem as a specific and distinct form of action. If we turn to whom Lord Hardwicke described (1 Atk. 296) as "an author of undoubted credit," and select an edition of Clerke's Praxis, published in the middle of the last century (I take Simpson's, published in 1743), we find a complete sketch of the procedure and causes in the Court of Admiralty in force at that time, and probably for a long period before. In all actions in that court the respondent, if he appeared (tit. 12), had to find bail for the amount in which the action was instituted, or go to prison, and then the action proceeded against him in personam, and if judgment went against him he was monished to pay the amount ordered (tit. 63), or if he failed to do so his bail (tits. 64, 65), the consequence of default being attachment (tit. 67, 68). If he did not appear (tit. 28) his appearance could be enforced by seizure of any ship or any goods belonging or supposed to belong to him within the Admiralty jurisdiction, the real owner being able to intervene and claim them. If after such seizure he appeared and gave bail (tit. 37) the ship or goods were delivered over to him, and the case proceeded ut in actione instituta contra personam debitoris. It would seem clear that the arrest in such cases was not limited to any particular property of the defendant on the seas; that the object of the arrest was to secure appearance and bail or provide a fund for securing compliance with the judgment, and that, whatever was the value of the property or the amount of the bail, the defendant would be liable to pay and liable to be attached if he did not pay the full amount of the sum decreed against him. No doubt the main object of arrest, whether of person or property, was to secure that bail should be given to satisfy the judgment. In Ridley's "View of the Civile and Ecclesiastical Law," published in 1639, "The proceeding in all these civil matters is by libel concluding to the action, the party agent giving caution to prosecute the suite and to pay what shall be adjudged against him if he faile in the suite; the defendant on the contrary part securing his adversarie by sufficient suretie or other caution as shall seeme meet for the present to the judge that he will appeare in judgment and will pay that which shall be adjudged against him, and that he will satisfie and allow all that his proctor shall doe in his name: for to all these ends satisdation (or security) in judgment is, which is nothing else but a course to secure the adversary of that which is in debate before the judge, that on what side soever the cause shall have an end, the clients may be seen to get that which by law shall be adjudged unto them." A similar view of the action in the Admiralty courts is to be gathered from Godolphin writing towards the end of the seventeenth century. In enumerating the modes of procedure he speaks of arrest of property only as a means to compel appearance. Similarly the table of fees at the end of Spelman's treatise left by him at his death in 1641 contains the item "Pro relaxatione navis aut bonorum ab arresto," which I think refers not merely to ship and cargo, but to any property of the defendant. And that the action in rem was not then regarded by Admiralty practitioners as a peculiarity existing in Admiralty procedure seems to me clear from the fact that Prynne in 1669, in his answers to Lord Coke's Articuli Admiralitatis, while enumerating the advantages which that procedure possessed over the common law, makes no mention of any such special form of action.

It would appear, therefore, that under the earlier practice the distinction between actions in personam and actions in rem depended on whether the person or the property of the defendant was arrested in the first instance, but if the defendant appeared the procedure and effect of an action in rem became those of an action in personam. But several changes in law or practice took place. When actions beginning by arrest of the person became obsolete in the last century, as Dr. Lushington, in The Clara (Swa. 3) says they did, the last being in 1780, and the arrest of the property other than the res to compel appearance, which must always have been unusual, became obsolete also, the result was that the only action beginning by arrest at all was one beginning by arrest of the res; though in theory arrest of the person would still seem permissible (per Fry, L.J. in The Heinrich Bjorn, 10 P. D. 44); on the other hand, arrest of property over which a lien could be enforced became more common as the idea of a pre-existing maritime lien developed, and arrest of property, in order to arrest for the creditor that legal nexus over the proprietary interest of his debtor as from the date of the attachment of which Lord Watson speaks in The Heinrich Bjorn (11 App. Cas. 270; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1) grew up. The result was, that arrest became the distinctive feature of the action in rem, such arrest having primarily for its object the satisfaction of the creditor out of the property seized. But there seems no reason to suppose that the action beginning by arrest of the res altered the course or character it had hitherto assumed as to the appearance of the debtor in it; and if that be so, it would seem clear that the full amount of a judgment—if a defendant who might himself have been arrested appeared—could be enforced by the only means available in the Admiralty Court, monition and attachment (The Victor, Lush. 72), whatever the value of the property arrested. Nor when we come to a later period can it, I think, be doubted that the view of a defendant's liability, which I have endeavoured to express, was the view of Lord Stowell. In The Dundee, decided in 1823 (1 Hagg. 109), Lord Stowell said (p. 120): "The quantum of reparation due in such cases" (that is of damage) "has been differently measured in the maritime law of different commercial countries and of the same commercial country, amongst others our own, at different periods. The ancient general law exacted a full compensation out of all the property of the owners of the guilty ship upon the common principle applying to persons undertaking the conveyance of goods, that they were answerable for the conduct of the persons whom they employed, and of whom the other parties who suffered damage knew nothing, and over whom they had no control. To this rule our own country conformed." And at p. 124: "It is an admitted fact that this mode of initiating a suit by arrest of ship, tackle, apparel, and furniture is the ancient formula of the court, though leading to a full remedy affecting all the property of every kind belonging to the owners. The same formula has existed and operated its remedy under all the variations by which the remedy has been modified. It has been no further restricted than as the statutes restrict it. But the initiatory terms, tackle, apparel, and furniture, founded the suit sufficiently to embrace all the objects which the statutes left subject to its operation. These restrained them only by their own particular restrictions. The same words went as far as the general law went, notwithstanding the narrowness of those terms, and they must now go as far as the general law, limited only by that statute, extends." There can, I think, be no doubt from these words what was the view of Lord Stowell. In the case of The Khedive (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 198; 7 App. Cas. 813; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 567), Lord Blackburn, after quoting them, says: "Lord Stowell treats it as quite clear that, though the mode in which the Court of Admiralty founded its jurisdiction was by seizure of the ship, the recompense in damages decreed by the court could be enforced against the owners out of all their property of every kind, so that the result was that by the general law the owners might be made to pay to their uttermost farthing the recompense in damages decreed by the Court of Admiralty, however small the value of their ship, when seized, was. Parke, B., in Brown v. Wilkinson (15 M. & W. 398), says: "From the practice of the Court of Admiralty no light could be derived on this question, for that court proceeds in rem, and can only obtain jurisdiction by seizure and the value, when seized, is the measure of liability." It is not, I think, necessary to decide between those very high authorities. If it were, I should wish to make further search amongst the cases on prohibition. But, primâ facie, one would say Lord Stowell was more familiar with the subject, and therefore more likely to be accurate,"

It is unfortunately now necessary to decide between these high authorities to which Lord Blackburn refers. I am not quite sure that prohibition affords a complete test, because, given the liability of the owner to make full compensation to be enforced by the Court of Admiralty, the rest seems to be a question not of jurisdiction but of procedure; but, if prohibition be the test in this case it certainly supports Lord Stowell's view. Although, as I have said, prohibition was granted as to the owners when the Court of Admiralty proceeded against them having jurisdiction to proceed only against the res, I cannot discover any prohibitions to the Admiralty Court either for proceeding against res and owners where there was a jurisdiction against the owner personally, or for issuing attachment against owners to enforce payment of an amount exceeding the value of the res, and certainly no trace of any such appear in the Articuli Admiralitatis or in the replies to Lord Coke's opinions where one would have expected to find it. I would further remark that, though the case of The Dundee (1

Hagg. Adm. 109) was referred to in Brown v. Wilkinson (ubi sup.), attention does not appear to have been drawn in argument to the Admiralty practice. The dicta of Parke, B., are mistaken in asserting that the Court of Admiralty can obtain jurisdiction only by seizure, and appear altogether to ignore the Admiralty jurisdiction in personam. There can be no doubt that Dr. Lushington's opinion expressed in The Volant (1 W. Rob. 388) that "the jurisdiction of this court does not depend on the existence of the ship, but on the origin of the question to be decided and the locality," correctly represents the law. See per Story, J. in De Lovio v. Boit (2 Gallison, 461, 464). The view of Sir John Nicoll was, I think, in harmony with that of Lord Stowell. In the case of The Triune (3 Hag. 114), which was an action for damage by collision, against the master who was also part owner, the value of the ship arrested falling short of the damage which was assessed at 400*l.*, Sir John Nicoll treating the defendant as master, and so not protected by 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 1, monished him to pay that sum of 400*l.* and, failing to do so he was imprisoned. The argument before me turned chiefly on the decisions of Dr. Lushington. It must, I think, be admitted that they are not consistent, and it is this inconsistency that has necessitated a more general view of the subject than would otherwise have been necessary, but, in view of the authorities I have referred to, I am, I think, justified in giving the preponderance to those expressions of his opinion which support them, and I think it will also be found that the earliest and latest views of Dr. Lushington seem in harmony with those of Lord Stowell and Sir John Nicoll. In The Aline, decided in 1839 (1 W. Rob. 111, 116), Dr. Lushington said: "Independent of any municipal regulation, it is, I apprehend one of the great principles of justice that in cases of this description, where the wrong is done by the servants of the owner, the owner ought to make good the whole loss occasioned by their default. In the courts of common law, where the proceedings are in personam, the operation of this principle would be carried out in its fullest extent, unless restrained by Act of Parliament. In these courts, however, when the proceedings are in rem, a mode of remedy not originally given as the measure of the damage, but as the best security for indemnity that could be obtained as the owner might be beyond the reach of the law" (a statement I venture to think historically correct), "the application of this principle has been modified by municipal regulation, and a restriction is imposed," not, Dr. Lushington says, by the nature of the action, but by "limiting the liability of the owner of the ship doing the damage to the value of the vessel itself, and of the freight where the freight can be attached. Under this modification, therefore, the rights of a person in possession of a decree of this court in a cause of damage are co-extensive with the rights of the owner in the vessel against which the decree has been awarded." This is almost an echo of the words of Lord Stowell. I do not think that the case of The Hope (1 W. Rob. 154), decided in 1840, asserts any contrary principle. It decided that the owners of a ship having been sued as owners and so entitled to avail themselves of the protection of the statute (53 Geo. 3, c. 157, s. 1), judgment could not be obtained against the master who was also a part owner beyond the value of the res; and so far it perhaps differed from the case of The Triune (ubi sup.), which was not cited in argument. But, although Dr. Lushington said that he was not aware of any case in which the court in a proceeding of that kind had ever had engrafted upon it a further proceeding against the owners upon the ground that the proceeds of the vessel proceeded against have been insufficient to answer the full amount of damages pronounced for, this falls short of saying that apart from the statute the owners were not liable in an action in rem for damages beyond the value of the res. In The Volant, decided in 1842 (1 W. Rob. 383, 388), it cannot be doubted that Dr. Lushington departed from the view of Lord Stowell, basing his opinion on this very inference from the style of the court which Lord Stowell had deprecated. He said: "In a case in which the owner has appeared the question is to what extent he has appeared to the process against the ship. It is material to see how the process is worded. It decrees the ship to be seized, and it cites all persons having, or pretending to have, any right, title, or interest therein to appear in this court on certain days and hours, there to answer in a cause civil and maritime. The owners are only called in respect to any right, title, and interest, in order that they may appear and intervene for their interest in the vessel and not further. Now, if it were possible on such warrant to demand bail beyond the value of the ship, or if the process against the owners went to make them responsible beyond the value of the ship, there could be no reason why bail should not be commensurate with the damage where the amount is not restricted by statute; but, if bail could not be demanded beyond the value of the ship, I do not see how the owners in that proceeding can be made further responsible; the warrant of arrest is confined to the ship, it goes no further. It appears to me therefore that there is no personal liability beyond the value of the ship, for this obvious reason, that the original process would not justify any such proceeding; the appearance given by the individual himself would not justify such proceeding; he has appeared only to protect his interest in the ship." It is true that it was not necessary for the decision of this case to say more than Dr. Lushington said later in his judgment, that to render a master part owner, guilty of neglect, responsible beyond the value of ship and freight he must be sued as master in the first instance; and it is true also that in a later case (The Temiscouata, 2 Spks. 208, 210) Dr. Lushington places his decision on the restriction of liability effected by the Acts of Parliament, and not by the nature of an action in rem; and he seems to explain his decision in The Volant very much as he had expressed himself in The Aline; but I do not think that on those grounds we can refuse to acknowledge the weight of Dr. Lushington's opinion expressed in the words I have quoted. A similar expression of opinion is to be found in the case of The Kalamazoo (15 Jur. N. S. 885). Again, the actual decision is not in point, because all that was decided was that a ship having been released on bail could not be re-arrested in a further action where the compensation found due exceeded the bail. But Dr. Lushington took occasion to say; "It is said that the party ought to receive the whole amount of the damage done to the full extent of the value of the ship in fault. To this there are two answers. First, it was their own fault if they did not arrest her to the full value of the ship; and secondly, there is no authority to show that, having obtained bail for the ship, you can afterwards proceed against the owners to make up the amount of the loss. I cannot think I can engraft a personal action upon an action in rem." But in the case of The Zephyr, decided in 1864 (11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 350; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 146), Dr. Lushington gave a decision, the reason for which appears to me not in accordance with his view as expressed in The Volant (ubi sup.) and the Kalamazoo (ubi sup.), and which, if correct, is conclusive in favour of the present application. The action for damage in that case was entered for 700*l.* and the Zephyr was arrested. The liability of the owners under the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 was 712*l.*, and exceeded the value, 400*l.*, of the ship for which bail was given. The application made was to amend the præcipe by inserting the names of the owners and for a citation in personam against them. Dr. Lushington refused the application on the express ground that it was unnecessary. He said: "I have only known of one instance in which a personal action has been engrafted on a suit in rem. There is some difficulty in altering the præcipe as prayed, and such a course appears to the court unnecessary, inasmuch as the 15th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 gives the court power to effect the object with which the motion has been made. That section puts decrees of the Court of Admiralty upon the same footing as judgments in the Superior Courts of common law, and gives a remedy as well against the ship and goods arrested as against the person of the judgment creditor. If, therefore, the occasion should arise, a monition might issue to compel the owners of the Zephyr to pay the amount of damages not covered by the bail bond." I confess I am unable to attribute to the 15th section of the Act of 1861 the effect which Dr. Lushington is reported to give to it. It seems to me only to arm the Court of Admiralty, which then could only enforce its orders for payment by attachment, with the same powers of execution as were possessed by the Superior Courts; and if the objection to proceeding against the owners in that action for any sum over 400*l.* really depended on its being impossible to graft an action in personam on an action in rem (the phrase employed by Dr. Lushington in The Hope and The Kalamazoo, and in argument in The Victor, Lush. 92) it appears to me that that objection would equally apply whether the proceeding was by way of fi. fa. or by way of monition and attachment. I cannot help thinking that the fallacy lies in considering that to enforce a judgment beyond the value of the res against owners who have appeared, and against whom a personal liability enforceable by Admiralty process exists, is the grafting of one form of action on another. The change, if it be a change, in the action is effected at an earlier stage, viz., when the defendant, by appearing personally, introduces his personal liability. It appears to me that the meaning of Lord Stowell's opinion, as above quoted, is that the judgment can be so enforced in the action in which the ship is arrested, and that in the case of The Zephyr (ubi sup.) Dr. Lushington really intended to follow that opinion, and to adhere to his own opinion in The Aline. I do not think that the opinion of the Privy Council in The Bold Buccleuch (7 Moo. P. C. C. 267) militates against this view. In that case the Privy Council, disapproving the decision of Dr. Lushington in The Volant and The Johann Friederich (1 W. Rob. 35), that the arrest of the res operated only to compel appearance in a manner analogous to the procedure in foreign attachment, and to furnish security for prompt and immediate payment, and also the decision in The Aline that a lien attached only upon action brought, held that a maritime lien attached from the time of damage done, that a maritime lien was the foundation of proceeding in rem, and that an action in rem was a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attached. In The Parlement Belge (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 273; 5 P. Div. 218; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234) it was said that The Bold Buccleuch decided that "the action in rem is a different action from the action in personam, and has different results." But I do not think that it follows on that that the Privy Council or the Court of Appeal intended to lay down that an action in rem could affect only the res. It may well be that, if the owners do not appear, the action only enforces the lien on the res; but that when they do the action in rem not only determines the amount of the liability, and in default of payment enforces it on the res, but is also a means of enforcing against the appearing owners, if they could have been made personally liable in the Admiralty Court, the complete claim of the plaintiff so far as the owners are liable to meet it. It appears to me consonant with common sense that, if the owners have had no personal notice, and are not, save in the sense indicated in The Parlement Belge (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 273; 5 P. Div. 197; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234), before the court, the effect of its judgment should be limited to the res in its hands; but that, if the owners appear to contest or reduce their liability, they should be placed in the same position as if they had been brought before the court by a personal notice.

It was argued by Sir Walter Phillimore that the fact that a mortgagee is entitled to appear shows that appearance is limited to the interest in the res, but a mortgagee has no interest in or connection with the action beyond his interest in the res, nor can he by any process be fixed with any further liability. It was admitted in argument that an owner, by appearing, renders himself liable to costs over and above the value of the res. It is clear, however, that the authorities which decide that this liability for costs undoubtedly exists distinguish between that and liability for damages: (The John Dunn, 1 W. Rob. 159; The Volant, 1 W. Rob. 383; The Temiscouata, 2 Spks. 208; The Freedom, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 495.) I do not forget that modern text-writers (Williams and Bruce, edit. 1886, pp. 81, 82, 302) have adopted the view that the remedy afforded by proceedings in rem cannot extend beyond the property proceeded against. But it appears to me that the point was not specially considered, and that the opinion expressed proceeded chiefly, if not entirely, on the decisions in the Hope, Volant, and Kalamazoo. Even if, however, it be held that the remedy in actions in rem is limited by the value of the res, it is necessary for the defendants in the present case, in which the value of the res far exceeds the salvage award, to maintain either that when bail has been given the limit is the amount of the bail, or that limit is fixed by the original claim in the action. With regard to the first of these propositions, it may well be that for certain purposes the bail represents the released res. This would appear to be so with regard to conferring freedom from re-arrest, according to the opinion expressed by Dr. Lushington in The Wild Ranger (Br. & Lush. 87) and The Kalamazoo (ubi sup.), though even this must be understood, as Dr. Lushington explained in The Hero (Br. & Lush. 448), to apply only to applications made for re-arrest after final judgment, which the cases of The Freir (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 572; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 589), and The Miriam (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 259; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 537) show to mean final judgment after an appeal, and not even then to be an invariable rule, as the judgment of the same learned judge in The Flora (L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 45; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 324; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 191) shows, or to extend to re-arrest for the purpose of obtaining costs, as the judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore in The Freedom (ubi sup.) suggests. Again, it would seem that, if the res is of less value than the bail, the bail is so far identified with the res that the bondsmen are liable only up to the value of the res: (The Staffordshire, L. Rep. 4 P. C. 211; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 365; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 46). Again, as held by Fry, L.J. in the Christiansborg (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 612; 10 P. Div. 155; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 491), "bail is the equivalent of the res, and that whilst the bail has been given for the thing, it is, if not impossible, highly improper that another action should be allowed to go on against the res in another place." In these senses and for these purposes bail stands in the place of the res. But it is quite another thing to say that the liability of the owners is confined to the same amount as the liability of the bail, and that the ship or any other goods of the defendant cannot be taken in execution under the provisions which continue the powers given to the Admiralty Court by the Act of 1861, as Sir Robert Phillimore, in The Freedom (ubi sup.) thought was possible as regards costs. The very form of the bail bond in the present day as given in Williams and Bruce's Practice, p. 636, and the early practice I have referred to in Clerke's Praxis seem to show that the bail is liable in a specified amount for the payment by the defendants of the whole amount of the judgment. Then, further, the case of The Jonge Bastian (5 Ch. Rob. 322) seems to me to be in point, and indeed to be on all-fours with the present case. There a salvage action in rem having been entered for 800*l.* and bail given, which I presume was for the same amount, Lord Stowell held that the court was by no means limited by any particular demand of the parties, and he awarded two-thirds of the value of the property salved, which was stated to be 3400*l.* Lord Stowell clearly in this case did not consider a fresh action necessary, though in another case, probably under different circumstances, Dr. Lushington is reported as saying that he had done so: (see, per Dr. Lushington, Silver Bullion, 2 Spks. 75.) The Zephyr is of course a further authority to the same effect.

There remains only the question whether the amount of the original claim limits the amount of the enforceable judgment. I have no doubt that it does not. I think that, under the former practice, although Dr. Lushington in The Zephyr appears to have doubted it, the claim in the præcipe could be exceeded without actual formal amendment. The Jonge Bastian (ubi sup.) is a clear authority on this point. I regard The Hero (Br. & Lush. 447) and The Johannes (L. Rep, 3 A. & E. 127) as decisions to the same effect. But, whether or no a præcipe could be so dealt with, the original claim now appears on the writ, and there is no doubt that a writ can be, and in this case has been, amended before final judgment. I should have regretted if I had been unable to accede to the present motion, because, as it is clear that if a plaintiff's claim is not satisfied by one kind of action, he can resort to another (cf. The Clara, Swab. 3, and The Orient, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 696), the only result of refusal would be to drive the plaintiffs to bring another action. But for the reasons I have given I think the present application may be granted in order to enable the plaintiffs to issue execution in the present action for the full amount of the decree which they have obtained.

THE J. R. HINDE. (a)

Collision—Anchor—Stock awash—Thames Navigation Rules 1872, art. 20.

It is not an infringement of art. 20 of the Thames Navigation Rules 1872, providing that no vessel shall be navigated with its anchor hanging perpendicularly from the hawse "unless the stock shall be awash," to carry it with the shackle or ring awash, as the rule only requires it to be carried as low as stock awash, and does not prohibit it from being carried lower.

THIS was a collision action by the owners of the screw steamship Refulgent against the owners of the screw steamship J. R. Hinde. The defendants counter-claimed.

The collision occurred on the 3rd March 1892, in Woolwich Reach of the river Thames.

At the time in question the Refulgent, a steamship of 619 tons register laden with coals for London, was proceeding up Woolwich Reach; the Refulgent was carrying her port anchor from the hawse with the shackle or ring awash.

In these circumstances, the J. R. Hinde, a steamship of 414 tons register laden with coals for the derricks in Bugsby's Reach, collided with the Refulgent, her starboard side striking the port bow and anchor of the Refulgent.

The defendants (inter alia) charged the plaintiffs with carrying the anchor in an improper position, and also with failing to lower the anchor when it was seen that a collision would occur.

Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames 1872.

Art. 20. No vessel shall be navigated or lie in the river with its anchor or anchors hanging perpendicularly from the hawse unless the stock shall be awash, except during such time as shall be absolutely necessary for cutting or fishing the said anchor or anchors, or during such time as may be absolutely necessary for getting such vessel under way.

JEUNE, J.—I think there is no doubt that the J. R. Hinde was in fault; and I do not propose to deal with the facts that lead to that conclusion. Two charges are made against the Refulgent. The first is, that she was carrying her anchor, which was suspended either shackle or ring awash, too low. It is argued that art. 20 of the Thames Rules 1872, which deals with the mode of carrying the anchor, was infringed by the Refulgent, as the rule means that it shall be carried stock awash and nothing else. That to my mind is not a sound conclusion. It appears to me that the anchor must be, according to the rule, as low as stock awash, and may be as much lower as is thought proper. I think the intention of the rule is, that stock awash is the minimum. I therefore hold that the Refulgent violated no rule in having the anchor where it was. Then it is said that the Refulgent's anchor should have been lowered. I agree that, if the anchor had been lowered in time, the injury might probably have been averted; but the Trinity Masters advise me that it would have been a very smart thing to have lowered the anchor when the collision was imminent, and was not a thing that could reasonably be expected to be done under the circumstances. For these reasons I hold the J. R. Hinde alone to blame for the collision.

THE ZANZIBAR. (a)

Limitation of liability—Collision—Double bottom—Gross tonnage—Register tonnage—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 21, sub-sect. 2—Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 43), s. 5.

The owner of a steamship constructed with a double bottom for water ballast is entitled, in calculating the gross tonnage upon which his limit of liability is based, to exclude the space between the inner and outer plating.

THIS was an action for limitation of liability instituted by the owners of the steamship Zanzibar, in respect of a collision between her and the steamship Venus.

The plaintiffs claimed to limit their liability to 22,943*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.*, being 8*l.* per ton on an alleged gross tonnage of 2867·98 tons, without deduction for engine-room space. The Zanzibar had a double bottom, between which was a space used for water ballast, and not for the carriage of cargo or stores. This space the plaintiffs excluded in calculating their gross tonnage. The plaintiffs had in the statement of claim also excluded 26·64 tons navigation space under the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889, but admitted by their counsel that they were not entitled to do so. These figures appeared on the ship's register, according to which her gross tonnage was 2964·27 tons.

The defendants by their defence alleged that the gross tonnage included the navigation space, and the space between the double bottom of the ship.

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104):

Sect. 21. The tonnage of every ship to be registered with the exceptions mentioned in the next section, shall, previously to her being registered, be ascertained by the following rule, hereinafter called rule 1, and the tonnage of every ship to which such rule can be applied, whether she is about to be registered or not, shall be ascertained by the same rule. . . . (2) Measure the depth at each point of division, from a point at a distance of one-third of the round of the beam below such deck, or in the case of a break below a line stretched in continuation thereof, to the upper side of the floor timber at the inside of the limber strake.

Sect. 22. Ships which requiring to be measured for any purpose other than registry, have cargo on board, and ships, which requiring to be measured for the purpose of registry, cannot be measured by the rule above given shall be measured by the following rule, hereinafter called rule 2.

The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63):

Sect. 54. The owners of any ship whether British or foreign shall not . . . be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury either alone or together with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things, to an aggregate amount exceeding fifteen pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage; nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury, or not to an aggregate amount exceeding eight pounds for each ton of the ship's tonnage; such tonnage to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships the gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine room.

Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 43):

Sect. 5. In the case of a ship constructed with a double bottom for water ballast, if the space between the inner and outer plating thereof is certified by a surveyor appointed by the Board of Trade to be not available for the carriage of cargo, stores, or fuel, then the depth required by sect. 21, paragraph (2) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, shall be taken to be the upper side of the inner plating of the double bottom, and that upper side shall, for the purpose of measurement, be deemed to represent the floor timber referred to in that section.

Dr. Raikes for the cargo owners.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to exclude from their gross tonnage the space between the double bottom. This space is used by the shipowner for ballast, and forms part of the gross tonnage, for which he ought to pay. The language of sect. 21 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 is wide enough to cover the case of ships constructed with a double bottom. The Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889, sect. 5, deals with this class of ships, but is limited in terms to the measurement of register tonnage, and does not affect gross tonnage:

The Franconia, 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 57; 3 P. Div. 164; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1;
The Palermo, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 390; 10 P. Div. 21; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 369.

Reliance is also placed upon sect. 22 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which, if applicable shows that the space in question ought to be included.

Newson for the owners of the Venus.

Holman, for the plaintiffs, contrâ.—The plaintiffs are entitled to exclude the space in question. Ships of this class were not built in 1854, and hence the Legislature could not have meant to legislate for them in the Merchant Shipping Act of that year. This class of ship has been built for about fifteen years, and this is the first time it has been suggested shipowners are not entitled to exclude the space between the double bottom:

The John McIntyre, 6 P. Div. 200;
Burrell v. Simpson, 4 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 177.

Sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889 was expressly meant to apply to a case like the present, and is not limited in its application to registered tonnage.

JEUNE, J.—I think the answer to the question raised in this case is clear. I start with sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862. By that section, in order to ascertain the amount of the liability of the owners of a steamship, you have to ascertain the gross tonnage without deduction of engine-room space. To ascertain the gross tonnage you have in the first instance to refer to sect. 21 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. As was pointed out during the argument the construction of vessels contemplated in that Act is not the construction which has become common in recent times. According to sub-sect. 2 of sect. 21, in order to make the calculation, you have to measure the depth down to the upper side of the floor timber. At the time when the Act was passed that was perfectly simple, because the floor timber would be no substantial distance from the actual bottom of the ship. In later days ships have been made differently, and the floor upon which the cargo is placed has been raised higher. It was found I suppose that there was a waste of space below, inasmuch as you had to put dunnage in case water should get in and damage the cargo. The best plan was found to be to put the floor somewhat higher which enabled water to be put into the vacant space, and serve as water ballast. Then comes the question—is that space to be measured for the purpose of ascertaining the gross tonnage? I confess I should have thought that the construction of the Act of 1854 was, that where you had to go down to the upper side of the floor timber, it meant going down to the top of this double bottom, and no lower. Of course what is said is true that this gives an advantage to the shipowner, because before he had a space which he could only fill with dunnage, and which he had to pay for. Now I suppose he has a space for which he does not have to pay, and which is used for water ballast. No doubt that is an advantage: and I daresay that is a reason why this construction of ships was adopted.

The question is, how do the words of the Act of 1854 apply to the new mode of construction? It appears to me that the effect is, with the new mode of construction, that measurement down to the floor on which the cargo is placed satisfies the terms of the Act of 1854. It does seem remarkable that nobody has ever before thought of claiming to include that space in the measurement for purposes of liability. It certainly does look as if the common sense of shipbuilders and surveyors told them that substantially a steamer constructed in this way ought to be measured down to the floor, and no further. Possibly doubts may have existed about it; but then came the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889. It seems to me that the object of that Act was to make matters clear owing to the new mode of construction which had been introduced. The Act of 1889, sect. 5, provides in terms that a certain interpretation is to be put for certain purposes on the Act of 1854. It says that where a ship is constructed with a double bottom for water ballast, if the space between the inner and outer plating is certified as not available for the carriage of cargo, stores, or fuel, then the depth required by sect. 21 of the Act of 1854 shall be taken to be the upper side of the inner plating of the double bottom. If that is so, I need no longer consider what would have been the true construction to place on the Act of 1854. The later Act explains what the upper side of the floor timber means, and I must now, I think, look to the Act of 1854 as if these words had been part of it. But it is said that the Act of 1889 only deals with the question of ascertaining the register tonnage, and that the object here is to ascertain the gross tonnage. That is true of some of the sections, but not of all of them. It is true of sects. 1 and 3, but not of 5, which is simply an interpreting section giving further meaning to the words in the Act of 1854, and containing no limitation as to whether it is for the purpose of ascertaining the register tonnage or not. That I think distinguishes the case of The Umbilo (64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 328; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 26; 1891 P. 118) heard before the late president, Sir Jas. Hannen. There the question was whether certain navigation spaces were to be deducted, and the learned judge refers to sect. 1 of the Act of 1889, in which it is enacted that in the measurement of a ship for the purpose of ascertaining her register tonnage, no deduction is to be allowed in respect of any space which has not first been included in her gross tonnage. But, as I have already pointed out, the gross tonnage forms the measure of the ship's liability, and therefore The Umbilo (ubi sup.) does not affect the question of the amount of tonnage to be taken for that purpose. If that be so, it simply comes to be a question of the interpretation of a section of the Act of 1854, to which The Umbilo does not apply. Then it is said that Sect. 22 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 affects the question, because it provides that a ship which, requiring to be measured for a purpose other then registry, has cargo on board, shall be measured under a different rule. But I do not think that applies to the present case. What I think that means is that if you cannot get the measurement under sect. 21 by reason of the cargo being on board, then you may take the rough and ready method under sect. 22. If so, sect. 22 does not apply here, because there was no reason to resort to it. Then it is said that the cases of The Franconia (39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 57; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 3 P. Div. 164), and The Palermo (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 390; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 369; 10 P. Div. 21) affect the question. It seems to me that those cases confirm the view I have taken. What The Franconia (ubi sup.) decides is that where the crew were berthed, not on the upper deck, but on a deck between the open deck and the tonnage deck, the owners could not claim to exclude that space. They could not exclude it under the Act of 1854, because they were not within it, nor under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1867, because they had not fulfilled its conditions. But in the subsequent case of The Palermo (ubi sup.), where the crew were placed on a deck which came within the provision of the Act of 1854, it was held that they were entitled to claim the provisions of the Act in their favour, because they complied with them, and did not have to rely on the Act of 1867, and were not subject to the conditions precedent to the Act. That brings me back to the short point in this case, whether the space is to be reckoned under the Act of 1854 interpreted by sect. 5 of the Act of 1889. I think it is, and therefore what I understand to be taken as the measurement in this case is correct, and it is right to exclude this space used for water ballast. The result is that the deduction for master's room, chart room, and boatswain's store-room will be disallowed, but the space occupied by the double bottom will not require to be added. The plaintiffs will pay the costs of the suit, except any occasioned by the objection as to the double bottom.

THE JAEDEREN. (a)

Charter-party — Demurrage — Discharge of cargo —Custom of port.

Where, in compliance with the terms of a charter-party, a vessel proceeded to a dock as ordered where she was to be discharged "as fast as she could deliver," but owing to the crowded state of the dock discharging—which, according to the custom of the port, was done solely by the dock company both for the shipowner and the charterer —was delayed several days, the charterers were held not liable for such delay, as the ship had in the circumstances existing been discharged as fast as she could deliver.

THIS was an action for demurrage by the owners of the steamship Jaederen against the charterers, claiming eight days' demurrage at 14*l.* a day.

By the terms of the charter-party the ship was to load at Dunkirk a cargo of sugar, and therewith "proceed to Liverpool, to the Albert, Stanley, or Wapping dock, as ordered by the consignees, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and there deliver the same." Three working days were allowed to the charterers "for loading, steamer to be discharged as fast as she can deliver. . . . If required, ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days, at fourteen pounds per day, or in proportion per hour."

On the Jaederen's arrival in the Mersey, at 3 p.m. on Saturday, the 29th March, she had orders to discharge in the Albert Dock. She waited till Monday, the 31st March, and then went into the Albert Dock, when her master delivered to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, on a printed form, a copy of the manifest of the ship's cargo containing the following declaration:

> I declare the above to be a true copy of the manifest of the cargo of the ship herein named, and hereby request and authorise the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board to discharge the said cargo, and deliver the same to the order of Messrs. Walsh Brothers, the consignees of the vessel.

In consequence of the berths in the dock being occupied, the Jaederen did not get alongside till Thursday, the 3rd April, but, in consequence of the quay being blocked with cargo, and the next day being Good Friday, discharging did not begin till 8 a.m. on Saturday, April 5th, and continued till 4 p.m. The next two days being Easter Sunday and Monday, discharging was not resumed till Tuesday, the 8th April, and was carried on next day, when it was completed about 3 p.m.

It was an agreed fact between the parties that under ordinary circumstances two days of ten hours each would be a reasonable time to discharge the Jaederen's cargo.

In the Albert Dock, which is the property of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, the discharging is carried out by the dock company's servants, who for the sum of 9*d.* per ton paid by the shipowner get the cargo out of the hold and place it on the quay. They then act as agents for the consignees, and as such deal with it as directed.

The defendants by their defence alleged (inter alia):

> If there was any delay in connection with the discharge of the said vessel the same was due not to the defendants but to the Liverpool Dock Company, which, according to the custom of the port of Liverpool, does the work of discharging both for shipowners and charterers, and for whose delay it was an implied term in the said charter-party that the defendants should not be responsible.

The plaintiffs by their reply (inter alia) alleged:

> As to the custom alleged, the plaintiffs say that it is wholly irrelevant and immaterial by reason of the failure on the part of the defendants to secure or provide a discharging berth for the said steamship (as the defendants were bound to do under the said charter-party) on her arrival in the said Albert Dock.

Pyke, Q.C. and Holman for the plaintiffs.—The Jaederen was an arrived ship as soon as she got in the Albert Dock. The defendants are liable for subsequent delay:

In that case the ship's destination was a fruit berth, and until she got there demurrage would not run. In this case it was the duty of the charterers to have a berth ready on the ship's arrival:

fast as she can deliver. The defendants did so, and have performed their part of the contract:

BARNES, J.—This action is brought by the owners of the steamship Jaederen against the charterers for eight days' demurrage at 14*l.* per day in respect of delay at the port of Liverpool. The action is brought on a charter-party made on the 10th March 1890 between the plaintiffs and the defendants which provided that the vessel should load sugar at Dunkirk and proceed therewith to Liverpool to the Albert, Stanley, or Wapping Dock as might be ordered by the consignees. The vessel proceeded to Liverpool, and was there ordered into the Albert Dock, which is a closed dock. She entered that dock about 6 a m. on the 31st March, and was compelled in consequence of the berths being occupied to moor alongside another steamer. She laid there on that day, Monday, the 31st, and on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. The vessel alongside which she had been moored having completed her discharge, the Jaederen was hauled to the quay at about mid-day Thursday. The quay then appears to have been so blocked with cargo discharged from the other steamer that no work was done on that day, or on the next which, being Good Friday, was a holiday. Discharging began on Saturday at 8 a.m.. and went on till 4 p.m. Sunday no work was done. Monday, being a Bank holiday, no work was done. On Tuesday discharging was continued, and was finished on Wednesday. The discharge on the Saturday, Tuesday, and Wednesday was delayed by the fact that the quay was still blocked with cargo, and that only one gang of men could be used in the discharge of the Jaederen. It appears to me to be an important point in this case to consider what is the course of discharge adopted in accordance with the custom of the port of Liverpool at this dock. It seems that the master on entering the dock delivers to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board on a printed form a manifest of his ship's cargo, and he signs at the end of this document a declaration in which he declares it to be a true copy of the manifest of the said ship, and thereby requests and authorises the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board to discharge the cargo and deliver the same to the order of Messrs. Walsh Brothers, the consignees of the vessel. The discharge, in pursuance of that request, took place in the way with which reported cases and the ordinary course of business make one familiar; that is to say, the dock company's servants performed the whole operation of discharging the vessel and placing the goods in the warehouse. They act in two capacities, partly for the shipowners and partly for the consignees or charterers. So far as they represent the shipowners, or do work which is to be done by the shipowners, they take the cargo from the ship, hoist it up out of the hold, place it on trolleys on a stage or stages which run to the edge of the hatch, and then wheel it on shore and tip it off on to the edge of the quay. For these services, as I understand, the shipowners pay the dock company a tonnage rate of 9*d.* per ton. From that point the dock company appear to act in the capacity of agents of the receiver of the cargo. They convey it from the edge of the quay and store it or deal with it in any other way in which they are directed. The breach alleged in the statement of claim is, that "the steamer was ordered by the consignees to the Albert Dock; but the said vessel was not discharged as fast as she could deliver, and was detained for a long time by the defendants." The defence substantially, except so far as it is matter of formal traverse, at any rate when dealt with by the defendants' counsel, admits practically the facts of the case, and no evidence was called for the defendants, except the putting in during the plaintiffs' case of a request signed by the master to the dock board. The defence suggests that the work is done according to the custom of the port by the dock company, who do the work of discharging for both shipowners and charterers, and that if it result in delay beyond the time in which the vessel might have been discharged, assuming the dock free and that there is no obstruction, this is a delay for which the defendants ought not to be held responsible. In effect what they say is this, that the vessel was discharged as fast as she could deliver, having regard to the customary way in which that discharge has to take place. There is no reference whatever in the charter-party to custom of the port, but I do not think that is of any very great importance, because it is obvious that the discharge of a vessel under such a charter-party as this at such a dock must take place in accordance with that which is the usual way of performing that operation, and as Lord Blackburn says in Postlethwaite v. Freeland, when commenting upon the charter-party there under consideration, "The only other reference to the discharge of cargo is 'the cargo is to be discharged with all despatch, according to the custom of the port.' I do not think that that alters the question, as the express reference to the custom of the port of discharge is no more than would be implied, for I take it that a charter-party in which there are stipulations as to loading or discharging cargo in a port is always to be considered as made with reference to the custom of the port of loading or discharge, as the case may be." In the nature of things it seems to me that it must always be so. Now, I have described the customary and ordinary mode of discharging at the port, and it appears that shipowners when they enter a dock of this character and place themselves, as they have done in this case, in the hands of the dock company to carry out the discharge in accordance with what appears to be, upon the evidence, the invariable practice of the port, must in so doing leave these agents to deal with the matter of the discharge in the customary manner; and that when the shipowners assert that the vessel has not been discharged as fast as she can deliver, it rests upon them to show, having regard to the way in which the discharge must be done, that she has not been discharged as fast as she could deliver; in effect, that she could have delivered under the circumstances in which she was placed at a greater rate than in fact she was. As has been said, I think by Mr. Walton, this discharge is a joint operation, and could only be carried out in the way in which the master of the vessel requested that it should be done. A great many cases have been referred to in argument. In fact, the number of novel points that may arise as to the construction of charter-parties seems inexhaustible; but I think no case has been cited which governs the present case. Every case cited by the plaintiffs as applicable to an arrived ship appears to be a case in which a limited time has been fixed for the purpose of the discharge, and no case has been cited in which the precise language of this charter-party has been used. Therefore I must construe this charter-party, having regard to the principles laid down in the cases, but having regard also to the course of business to be adopted in carrying it out. The conclusion to which I have come is, that the plaintiffs fail to make out a case of a breach by the defendants in not discharging this vessel "as fast as she could deliver." Shortly stated, the case is this: the steamer could not deliver any quicker than she did, and for that reason the defendants, in my judgment, have not committed any breach of contract, and I must therefore pronounce in their favour.

THE HORNET. (a)

Collision — Steamship and barge — Contributory negligence.

Where a collision occurred at night in a dock lighted by electric light between a steam-tug under way and a moored barge, the Court, while holding the tug to blame, refused to hold the barge also to blame on the ground that at the time of the collision there was no one on board of her, as the absence of a man had nothing to do with the collision, or the subsequent sinking of the barge.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action, from a decision of the judge of the City of London Court, holding the defendants' vessel alone to blame.

The collision occurred between 7 and 8 p.m. on Oct. 27, 1891, in the West Tilbury Dock, between the plaintiffs' sailing barge Security and the defendants' steam-tug Hornet.

The barge was, at the time in question, moored head and stern to two rings in the dock wall; she had no one on board of her. The dock was lighted by electric light.

The plaintiffs' witnesses alleged that they saw the tug Hornet, which was employed in shifting craft in the dock, strike the barge with her stem and cause her to sink.

The defendants admitted that a dumb barge whilst in tow of the Hornet, at about 6 p.m. touched the Hornet, but did her no damage, and they denied that the Hornet had been in collision with the plaintiffs' barge.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The judge of the City of London Court held that the Hornet was alone to blame, and that the plaintiffs were not guilty of contributory negligence by reason of there being no one on the plaintiffs' barge at the time of the collision.

Hollams, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The Hornet is not to blame, but, assuming she is, the plaintiffs are also to blame. There ought to have been a man in charge of the barge. If there had been he might have prevented the collision, or minimised the damage by beaching the barge:

Pyke, Q.C. and Laing, for the respondents, were not called on.

THE PRESIDENT.—I have no doubt there was considerable contradiction between the witnesses in this case, and it is exactly the sort of contradiction of which a court hearing the witnesses could best judge, as it would be able to take account of the demeanour of the witnesses as well as of the actual words. I come to the same conclusion as the court below. There were two witnesses who say positively that they saw the collision take place. It is quite true that there is some discrepancy between them as to the speed of the Hornet as she came down the dock; but still it seems impossible that they could be mistaken as to what they saw. The evidence of the witnesses on the other side is open to criticism in respect of similar contradictions, and put at the highest it is negative evidence, and further it is doubtful whether at the time of the collision these witnesses were in a position to see. It is said that the damage could not have taken place in the way it is alleged on account of the fender. That is open to question, as the witnesses differ as to whether it came below the water line. The barge was sunk by a blow from some vessel, and no other way has been suggested in which the accident could have occurred. On the whole we have come to the conclusion that the decision of the court below must be upheld.

There remains a question which is partly one of law and partly one of fact. It is said that there was no one on board this barge, and that if she had been properly moored her stern would not have come out and so presented an obstacle against which the Hornet ran. Assuming, however, that there was no one there, and that the stern did come out, we cannot bring ourselves to think that that raises any case which would render the barge liable as well as the tug on the ground of contributory negligence; for whichever way it is put it appears to be clear that the absence of anyone on the barge had nothing to do with the collision. There was plenty of light, and the Hornet could see perfectly well where the barge was. In the cases of The Scotia (ubi sup.) and The Dunstanborough (ubi sup.) it is clear that if a man had been on board he could have prevented the accident altogether; and further, in the case of The Scotia (ubi sup.), a man could have prevented the consequences of it by beaching the barge. It has been suggested that in this case the barge might have been beached if some one had been in charge of it. That point was not taken in the court below, and the Trinity Masters are of opinion that from the nature of the sides of the dock such a course would have been impracticable. I therefore do not think that either of the authorities mentioned in argument are applicable to this case. The Trinity Masters also think, in which we agree, that there is a broad distinction between leaving a barge in a dock where there is no tide and no rise and fall, and leaving it in a tideway where the ropes require tending. It is also to be remarked that in this case the barge was only left for two or three hours in the evening. She was not left all night. The result is, that the decision below will be affirmed.

BAUMVOLL MANUFACTUR VON CARL SCHEIBLER v. FURNESS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party—Bill of lading—Loss by unseaworthiness — Liability of registered owner—Principal and agent—Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80), s. 36.

The respondent, who was the owner of a ship, and also registered as managing owner, chartered her for a period of four months, and at the same time agreed to sell her to the charterers upon certain terms, the sale to be completed on the expiration of the charter-party. The charter-party reserved to the owner only sufficient space for ship's officers, crew, tackle, and stores, and provided that the captain, officers, and crew should be appointed and paid by the charterers; but the owner had the option of appointing the chief engineer, to be paid by the charterers. The owner was to insure the ship, and maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state for the service, the charterers paying all other charges. It was also provided that the captain was to be under the orders of the charterers, who should indemnify the owner from all liability arising from the captain signing bills of lading. The owner was to have a lien upon all cargoes and sub-freights for freight or charter money due under the charter.

The appellants, during the currency of the charter-party, shipped goods on board the vessel under bills of lading signed either by the captain or by the charterers' agents at the port of shipment. Neither the captain nor the agents had authority to sign bills of lading on behalf of the owner, but this fact was not known to the appellants, who were not aware that the ship was under charter. The goods were lost, in consequence, as was alleged, of the unseaworthiness of the ship.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the effect of the charter-party was to free the shipowner from liability, and that his position was not affected by the fact that he was registered as managing owner under the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80).

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.), reported in 66 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 130; and (1892) 1 Q. B. 253, who had reversed a judgment of Charles, J., reported in 65 L. T. Rep. N. S. 87; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 59; and (1891) 2 Q. B. 310.

The action was for damages for the loss of 1200 bales of cotton shipped by the plaintiffs under bills of lading on board the steamship Sultan, at New Orleans, for carriage to Bremen. In the course of the voyage the ship was abandoned at sea and the cargo was lost. It was alleged by the plaintiffs that the loss was attributable to the unseaworthiness of the ship, but a preliminary question was raised on the pleadings whether, assuming that the goods were lost as alleged, the defendant Christopher Furness was liable for the breach of duty and contract in respect of such loss, and this question was ordered to be tried first. The other defendants, Gilchrest and Co., did not defend the action. At the trial before Charles, J. without a jury, it was proved that prior to Oct. 1888 the ship Sultan was a Spanish ship called the Asia. Negotiations took place for the purchase of the Asia by Furness, and at the same time for her sale by Furness to Gilchrest and Co., who were about to form a company, to be called the Mexican Gulf Steamship Company. Accordingly on the 13th Oct. 1888 Furness bought the ship, and on the same day agreed to resell her to Gilchrest and Co., for the Mexican Gulf Steamship Company. The agreement stated that Furness "has this day sold, and the Mexican Gulf Steamship Company have this day purchased, the screw steamer Asia, to be renamed the Sultan," for 13,500*l*., 500*l*. to be paid in cash, the balance to be paid on transfer of the steamer after expiration of charter, dated the 13th Oct., in cash or by bills; to secure the due payment of the bills the buyers to execute a mortgage of the ship to the seller, and deposit policies on ship; and, on payment of the purchase money as above, a legal bill of sale to be executed to the buyers at seller's expense, and the vessel to be delivered to the buyers. This agreement was signed by Furness, and by Gilchrest and Co. for the proposed Mexican Gulf Steamship Company (Limited). The charter-party was made between Furness, who was described as "owner of the good screw steamship Asia," and Gilchrest and Co., on behalf of the proposed Mexican Gulf Steamship Company (Limited), who were described as "merchants and charterers." The charter-party is sufficiently referred to in the judgment.

Gilchrest and Co. at once took possession of the ship, and appointed the captain and crew, the owner exercising his option of nominating the chief engineer. 500*l*. was paid to Furness in cash. Gilchrest and Co. converted the ship at their own expense from a passenger to a cargo ship. On the 30th Oct. Furness was registered as the owner of the ship and his name and address as managing owner were registered under 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, s. 36. On the 14th Nov. Furness insured the ship. Early in Nov. 1888, the ship sailed for New Orleans, and in Dec. 1888, the plaintiffs shipped the cotton in question at

New Orleans under bills of lading, some of which were signed by the master and some by Messrs. Keen and Co., who were Gilchrest and Co.'s agents at New Orleans. Furness knew who the captain was and who the agents at New Orleans were, but he knew nothing of the circumstances under which the goods had been shipped; and the plaintiffs had no knowledge or notice of the charter-party or of the relations which existed between Furness and Gilchrest and Co. Charles, J. held that the defendant Furness was, under the circumstances, liable to the plaintiffs, and accordingly decided the preliminary question in their favour. On appeal the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and reversed Charles, J.'s decision, being of opinion that the captain was the servant not of Furness but of the charterers who both appointed and paid him and alone had the right to dismiss him.

Sir R. Webster, Q.C., Sir W. Phillimore, and Stubbs appeared for the appellants, and argued that the fact that the captain was not appointed by the respondent was not conclusive as to his liability on the bills of lading. There is nothing in the charter-party to oust the owner's warranty of seaworthiness. Primâ facie the receipt of goods on board a ship binds the owner in the case of unseaworthiness, unless there is express notice, the master having signed bills of lading. Here the respondent insured against loss by unseaworthiness, which raises an inference that he did not intend to divest himself of his liability; besides he had a right of entry to do repairs. The charter does not amount to such a demise of the ship, or complete handing over of possession, as to oust the warranty of seaworthiness, or to make the master the servant of the charterers only. The owner holds out the master as his servant, and by the simple receipt of goods on board under a bill of lading signed by the master the owner warrants the seaworthiness. There should be notice to the shipper of any variation from the ordinary practice. He is entitled to consider the master as the agent of the owner in the absence of an express statement to the contrary. He is not bound to make inquiries. A bill of lading is a known commercial document, and a receipt under it implies a receipt for the owner. There is no such complete handing over of possession to the charterers here as to exonerate the owner from all responsibility for unseaworthiness. This was not a case of negligent navigation, but of structural unseaworthiness, for which the respondent is liable as registered managing owner under the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80). The following cases were referred to in the argument:

Fraser v. Marsh, 13 East, 238;
Mitcheson v. Oliver, 5 E. & B. 419;
Colvin v. Newberry, 8 B. & C. 166; 7 Bing. 190; 1 Cl. & F. 283;

Bigham, Q.C., J. Walton, Q.C., and T. F. D. Miller, who appeared for the respondent, were not called upon to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellants their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell).—My Lords: The facts which give rise to the controversy in this case may be very briefly stated. An arrangement was entered into upon the 13th Oct. 1888 between the respondent Furness and Gilchrest and Co. for the purchase of a vessel named the Asia (which was to be renamed the Sultan) by Gilchrest and Co. from Furness. The vessel had not been in use by Furness, and the arrangement in reality was one by which Gilchrest and Co., being desirous of purchasing this vessel, obtained the assistance of Furness in carrying out that scheme. The price was to be 13,500*l.*, to be paid by a deposit of 500*l.* in cash on approval of a supplementary mortgage, and the balance by certain instalments on the transfer of the ship after the expiration of a charter-party of even date and made between Furness and Gilchrest and Co., signing as agents for the Mexican Gulf Steamship Company Limited, a company which Gilchrest and Co. were forming or intending to form, the charter-party being entered into for the purpose of bridging over the time until the Mexican Gulf Steamship Company or Gilchrest and Co. were in a position to carry out the purchase. In my opinion, everything turns upon the true construction of this charter-party. By the charter-party Furness agreed to let, and the steamship company to hire, the steamship for four calendar months. She was to be employed in such lawful trades between ports in the United Kingdom or on the Continent, and in the United States, West Indies, and Gulf of Mexico, and within the limits of ordinary Lloyd's warranties, but not Suez Canal, as charterers or their agents shall direct, on the following conditions: That the charterers shall provide and pay for all the provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew; owner shall pay for the insurance on the vessel; maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for the service. That the charterers shall provide and pay for all the coals, fuel, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, and all other charges whatsoever, except those before stated. The charterers to "pay for the use and hire of the vessel at the rate of 750*l.* per calendar month," commencing on the 19th Oct. There are certain other provisions in the charter-party, upon which reliance is placed, to which I will advert presently, the only one that I need mention for the moment is that the owner had the option of appointing the chief engineer, who, however, was to be paid by the charterers. Now the question is, what was the relation created between the parties with regard to this ship by that charter-party? Was it, or was it not, what has been called a demise of the ship, or if not strictly speaking a demise, an agreement which put the vessel altogether out of the power and control of the then owner, and vested that power and control in the charterers, so that during the time that this hiring lasted, she must properly be regarded as the vessel of the charterers, and not as the vessel of the owner? In order to create what has been called a demise, it is obvious that the use of the word "demise" is not necessary. But in the present case when this charter-party was entered into, the vessel was let by the one party, and hired by the other for a term at a lump sum to be paid month by month during that term. The use which was to be made of the vessel during that term rested entirely with the charterers. The then owner had no voice whatever in it. The charterers might go such voyages as they pleased; and the only right which the owner had to object was that he had limited and restricted to a slight extent the use of the vessel by the terms of the charter-party. The master of the vessel and the crew were to be appointed as well as paid, by the charterers. The owner had no voice in this at all. All that he had a voice in was the nomination of the chief engineer, but even that officer was to be paid by the charterers. Now how would it be possible so far (I will come to the other clauses which are relied on presently) more completely to let and hire this ship—demise it, if you will—put it out of the power and control of the owner, and put it in the power and control of the charterers, than by such provisions as these? It is said that the charterers could not use the vessel for all voyages, and that there was a certain restriction placed on their right so to use her. That certainly is not conclusive against a demise, otherwise there would be no demise of half the houses in London which are subject to restrictions as to the uses to which they can be put. Then it is said there are other provisions which show that the owner was not entirely parting with his possession or control of the vessel, inasmuch as he was to insure her. The remark which I have just made applies equally to that provision. But in addition to that, he was to keep the hull and machinery in thoroughly efficient repair for the service. Would it be the less a demise of a house or of a chattel, because the owner who demised it undertook to keep it in repair during the term for which it was demised?

What are the other stipulations which are relied upon? There is a provision that "the charterers hereby agree to indemnify the owners from all consequences or liabilities that may arise from the captain signing bills of lading, or in otherwise complying with the same." It is said that the insertion of that clause shows that the parties contemplated that the signing of the bills of lading by the captain might impose a liability upon Furness. I think a just observation was made with regard to some of these provisions by Lord Esher, M.R., namely, that this is a document which is not prepared specially for this purpose; a good deal of it is in print, altered in writing to suit the particular arrangement; but some of the provisions that have been left standing no doubt were not specifically inserted with a view to this agreement, but have been left standing it may be more or less through an oversight. I do not of course for a moment dispute that in reading this document you must construe together the written and the printed parts. But it is not a question of the liability which is imposed by this clause that I have just read. It imposes no liability at all. It says the charterers shall indemnify the owners from all liability. So they do, no doubt, and effect must be given to it, if such a liability is imposed. But to infer from the presence of such a provision in the charter-party that the parties must have had it in contemplation that a liability was imposed, inasmuch as otherwise they would not have provided for an indemnity against it, appears to me to be straining the effect of a printed provision in a document of this sort much beyond the extent to which it is legitimate to do so. The only other provision I think on which reliance is placed is this, "that the owners shall have a lien upon all cargoes, and all sub-freights, for freight or charter money due under this charter." It does not appear to me that there is anything in that provision, which is a provision as between charterer and shipowner, which stands in the way of the view which I have suggested to your Lordships, that this is a case in which by the charter-party the charterer has become pro hâc vice and during the term of the charter the owner of the vessel, when one is considering the rights and liabilities which arise with reference to the acts of the master and the crew of the vessel, who, during that time, are the servants of the charterer, appointed and paid by him. Having thus dealt with the position of the parties as created by this instrument, let me advert to the fact upon which it is sought to establish the liability of the defendant. The vessel proceeded upon a voyage under the direction of the charterers. At New Orleans she was to commence another adventure. She there took on board certain bales of cotton belonging to the plaintiffs. These bales of cotton were lost, as is alleged, through the vessel being unseaworthy, not fitted for the voyage at the time she started upon it, and that, it is said, establishes the liability of the defendant. It cannot be disputed as a general proposition of law, that a person who does not himself enter into a contract can only be made liable upon the contract if it was entered into by one who was his agent or servant acting within the scope of his authority, and it is equally indisputable that a liability by reason of a wrong or a tort, can only be established by proving, either that the person charged himself committed the wrong, or that it was committed by his servants or his agents acting within the scope of their authority. In the present case the right of the plaintiffs to complain of the loss of their goods by reason of the facts alleged, may be regarded as arising as a matter of contract out of the bills of lading that were signed. Is it established that the persons who signed those bills of lading, with whom in the first instance the contract was made—the master, or Messrs. Ross and Keen, the agents at the port—in making that contract were acting for the defendant Furness? It seems to me impossible to contend that these were contracts made either with the master or the agents on behalf of the defendant Furness. Then supposing it is regarded as an action of tort, it is not suggested that Furness himself committed the wrong complained of. Was it committed by those who were Furness's servants or agents within the rule which I have stated? I imagine there can only be one answer to that question, and that is that it was not. But then it is suggested that the liabilities which arise as between the shipper of goods and the shipowner may be regarded as to some extent exceptional, that although, looking at the matter apart from the relationship to which I have just referred, there might be a difficulty in establishing liability, the liability nevertheless may be made out where the relationship of shipper and shipowner is found to exist. But there may be two persons at the same time in different senses not improperly spoken of as the owners of a ship. The person who has the absolute right to the ship, who is the registered owner, the owner (to borrow an expression from real property law) in fee simple, may be properly spoken of, no doubt, as the owner; but at the same time he may have so dealt with the vessel as to have given all the rights of ownership for a limited time to some other person, who, during that time may equally properly be spoken of as the owner. When there is such a person, and that person appoints masters, officers, and crew of the ship, pays them, employs them and gives them their orders, and deals with the vessel in the adventure; during that time all those rights which are spoken of as resting upon the owner of the vessel, rest upon that person who is, for those purposes, during that time, in point of law to be regarded as the owner. When that distinction is once grasped it appears to me that all the difficulties that have been raised in this case vanish. There is nothing in your Lordships' judgment, as I apprehend, which would detract in the least from the law as it has been laid down with regard to the power of a master to bind an owner, or with regard to the liabilities which rest upon an owner. The whole difficulty has arisen from failing to see that there may be a person who, although not the absolute owner of the vessel, is, during a particular adventure, the owner for all these purposes.

Is there anything in the authorities which runs counter to the view which I have just expressed? I can find nothing. Not a single authority has been cited in which the owner of a vessel has ever been held liable on a bill of lading or as for a tort in the improper navigation of or dealing with a vessel in any case in which the master of the vessel, or those who were guilty fo the negligence, have not been properly described as the servants of the owner. No doubt a vessel may be chartered, and the charterers may have, during its continuance, full power to deal with the vessel, to determine her voyage, and to direct the course that she shall take, where nevertheless the master and crew remain truly the servants of the owner. In that case I apprehend it is perfectly clear that by reason of the relationship still subsisting, the owner becomes bound by such a contract as a bill of lading, and by all the contracts which a master can ordinarily make, and which persons therefore have a right to presume he is authorised to make, binding the owner. The law seems to me to have been settled for a very long time. The case of Fraser v. Marsh (13 East, 238) which was decided so long ago as 1811, appears to me directly to bear out this view. In that case it was sought to render the registered owner liable for stores furnished to the vessel, the fact being that by a charter-party the vessel had been let for a certain number of voyages at a certain rent to the captain, who ordered stores for her use. Lord Ellenborough, C.J. said: "The Registration Acts were passed diverso intuitu; but to say that the registered owner, who divests himself by the charter-party of all control and possession of the vessel for the time being in favour of another, who has all the use and benefit of it, is still liable for stores furnished to the vessel by the order of the captain during the time, would be to push the effect of those Acts much too far." There your Lordships will observe that he does not rest the decision upon any doubt as to the person registered as owner being really the owner, inasmuch as under those earlier Acts the same security was not taken as is now taken to see that this was certain to be the case; but he rests his judgment upon the fact that the registered owner has divested himself of all control and possession of the vessel in favour of another, and that that person has all the use and benefit of it; and he puts the question to be determined thus: whether the captain in this instance who ordered the stores, was or was not the servant of the defendant who was sued as the owner. He makes that the test of liability, and he says that if he has so divested himself of the vessel and of its use and benefit as that it is in the possession of another, whose servant the master is, then the owner ceases to be liable in respect of stores ordered by the master. What distinction is there between the case of stores and the case of liability in respect of any other matter which the master has a right to do on behalf of his owner whoever he may be? I am at a loss to see any ground for the distinction. There is no authority for it, and I do not see any sound basis for it. A contract of affreightment is only like any other contract; and if you seek to render liable upon it someone who was not in name a party to it, you can only do so by establishing a relationship between the party making it and the party whom you seek to make responsible, which the law recognises as creating that responsibility. No such relationship is established under the circumstances which exist here. Again, as I said before, if you seek to render a person liable as for a tort, if he has not personally committed it, it can only be established by proving it to have been committed by some servant of his. In Newberry v. Colvin both in the Exchequer Chamber (7 Bing. 190) and in your Lordships' House (1 Cl. & F. 283), the law seems to have been regarded as I have submitted it to your Lordships to be. It is quite true that in that case the shipper had notice of the charter and therefore knew of the relation which existed between the shipowner and the charterer. But I do not gather from the judgments either in the Exchequer Chamber or in your Lordship's House that that was considered an essential part of the defendant's case. It was alluded to rather as meeting an argument which had no doubt been suggested, that the master of the vessel, who was in that case himself the person to whom the vessel had been let, might have been properly regarded by those who dealt with him as acting not merely on behalf of himself, but as acting on behalf of some owner or other, if they had not had notice that he was in fact at the time being the owner. But certainly it seems to me that it would not be correct to say that the decision in that case, either in the Exchequer Chamber or in your Lordships' House was rested solely or mainly upon the fact that such notice existed. It is not necessary to refer to several cases which were cited before your Lordships. The St. Cloud (Br. & Lush. 4), Hayn v. Culliford (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 48, 128; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 288; 3 C. P. Div. 410; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536; 4 C. P. Div. 182), and Sandemann v. Scurr (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 608; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 446; 2 Q. B. 86), were all ordinary cases of charter-party where there was no pretence for saying that there had been any demise or anything in the nature of a demise of the vessel, but where the vessel had been chartered, the master of the vessel still remaining the servant of the owner.

I have only to notice now the argument which has been based upon the Merchant Shipping Acts. Although the Legislature has now taken greater security to see that the person registered as owner is properly registered than it had done before, all it has done is to make the register primâ facie evidence of ownership. In fact it assumes that anybody may displace altogether the statutory effect which has been given to it, by proving what the facts really are. But then Sir Walter Phillimore relies upon the subsequent legislation under which the defendant Furness is registered as managing owner. It seems to me that in order to determine the effect of legislation one must look at the object which it had in view. I cannot think that this legislation altered in any way the liabilities or the rights of a person who was registered as the managing owner, or in fact was the managing owner, except so far as the Legislature created new liabilities. It did, no doubt, so create them, because it rendered the person registered as managing owner liable to penal consequences in case of the unseaworthiness of the vessel and his inability to prove that he had taken proper precautions. That burden it imposed upon him, and it was for the purpose of effectively carrying out the protection of the lives of those who went to sea on board British vessels, that this legislation was enacted. But beyond that it seems to me that it would be improper to impose any liability which the Legislature has not by enactment clearly shown its intention to impose. I do not see how, upon any sound or proper principle, it would be possible to do so. For these reasons I think that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed and this appeal dismissed with costs, and I so move your Lordships.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: I also am of opinion that the judgment of the Appeal Court in this case ought to be affirmed. At the time when the bills of lading were signed, and at the time when the goods of the appellant suffered damage, the ship was in the possession, and under the control, of the charterers, who employed their own master and crew in her navigation. That point once fixed, it appears to me that there is really no substantial question which can arise upon this appeal. We have heard a very lengthened and a very able argument from the Bar, and a great deal of authority has been cited, upon points which I think it quite unnecessary to discuss at large. They have been sufficiently dealt with in the opinion or the judgment which has just been delivered by the Lord Chancellor. The master, who signed the bill of lading, was the servant and agent of the charterers and not the servant and agent of the respondent Furness. In that state of facts, the appellants, in order to succeed here, must establish that the present case forms an exception from the general rule that a man is not liable upon a contract, or in respect of the negligence of other persons who are neither his agents nor his servants, and that the respondent remains liable for contracts made by the charterer's agent with shippers who had no notice of the terms of the charter. For that proposition no authority whatever, so far as my understanding could go, was produced. All the decisions that have been cited at the Bar, so far as they had any bearing whatever upon such circumstances, appear to me to point very distinctly to the opposite conclusion. No doubt when a shipowner who enters into a charter without parting with the possession and control of his ship seeks to limit the powers assigned by law to his captain, the limitation will be altogether ineffectual in any question with shippers who are ignorant of the terms of the charter. That, however, is a question as to the limitation of the powers of an actual agent who has known powers according to law. Notice must be given to those who deal with the agent upon the footing of fact that he is the agent; there must be notice in order to disenable them from contracting with him. But where you are dealing with a person who is not an agent I know of no authority applicable to a case like this, which requires that notice shall be given when a man parts with the possession and control, even temporarily, of a ship of which he is the registered owner. As to the Merchant Shipping Acts it appears to me that the managing owner is registered and the register is carried about with the vessel for statutory purposes only, and that when these statutory purposes are examined in the provisions of the Acts themselves, it becomes abundantly clear that it was not the intention of the Legislature to effect any change whatever in the relations existing at the time when the Acts passed between owners and charterers and the shippers of cargo.

Lord MORRIS concurred.

Lord FIELD.—My Lords: I also agree. It appears to me that the learned counsel for the appellants have entirely failed in establishing either of the propositions which they have made for the purpose of asserting the liability of the respondent. With regard to the first proposition it seems to me that looking at the very substance and nature of the transaction between the respondent and Gilchrest and the terms of the charter, the Sultan was not, at the time when the contract of carriage was entered into, in any sense in the possession or under the control of the respondent so as to make him a party. With regard to the second ground, that the mere delivery and bailment of the ship to the charterer amounted to a holding out of the master as the agent of the shipowner, I know of no authority whatever for that proposition, and I am certainly not prepared to make one. I think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Order of the Court of Appeal affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL

Nov. 21 and 30, 1892.

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN KEIGHLEY, MAXTED, AND CO. AND BRYAN, DURANT, AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Arbitration—Award — Remitting for reconsideration—Grounds for remitting—Discovery of new evidence since the award—Carriage of goods—Arbitration Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 10.

The discovery of new evidence since the award, which the arbitrator may consider material to the matter in dispute, is a ground upon which the court may properly remit the matters referred to the reconsideration of the arbitrator under sect. 10 of the Arbitration Act 1889.

Burnard v. Wainwright (19 L. J. 423, Q. B.) followed.

THIS was an appeal by Keighley, Maxted, and Co. from an order of the Divisional Court (Mathew and Bruce, JJ.) remitting an award to the appeal committee according to the rules of the London Corn Trade Association.

Messrs. Keighley, Maxted, and Co. contracted, in writing, to purchase from Messrs. Bryan, Durant, and Co., 3000 tons of Karachi wheat, more or less, to be delivered to one safe floating port direct in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, both included, but Calais and Rouen excluded.

Messrs. Ralli and Co. shipped 3800 tons of Karachi wheat on the steamship Bombay, and Messrs. Bryan and Co. wrote to Messrs. Keighley and Co. informing them that they had appropriated 3000 tons of this wheat to their contract with them.

By the terms of the charter-party, under which Messrs. Ralli and Co. had chartered the Bombay, the Bombay was to discharge at any safe port in the United Kingdom, except at Sharpness and Bristol Old Dock. Messrs. Keighley and Co. gave notice to Messrs. Bryan and Co. to discharge the 3000 tons of wheat at Sharpness. An arrangement was thereupon made by Messrs. Ralli and Co. with the shipowners by which the charter-party was modified so as to enable the Bombay to discharge at Sharpness, the shipowners reserving the full right to claim for all extra expenses, loss, or damage which might be occasioned by reason of the vessel going to Sharpness, and the charterers undertaking to pay the same. This arrangement was indorsed upon the charter-party.

Messrs. Keighley and Co. refused to accept delivery.

By the contract it was provided that

All disputes from time to time arising out of this contract . . . shall be referred according to the rules indorsed on this contract, and this stipulation may be made a rule of any of the divisions of the High Court.

On the back of the contract was indorsed:

All disputes arising out of this contract shall be from time to time referred to two arbitrators, one to be chosen by each party in difference, the two arbitrators having power to call in a third in case they shall deem it necessary.

The dispute was referred under that rule, and the arbitrators made their award in favour of Messrs. Keighley and Co. upon the ground that the alteration in the charter-party threw fresh liabilities upon the purchasers of the wheat.

By the rules indorsed upon the contract it was provided that the award of any two arbitrators in writing (subject only to the right of appeal thereinafter mentioned) should be conclusive and binding upon all disputing parties; that in case either party should be dissatisfied with the award an appeal should lie to the committee of appeal elected for that purpose, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of the London Corn Trade Association; that the committee of appeal should confirm the award unless four of the members appointed to hear such appeal decide to vary the award; and that such committee should consist of five members to hear such appeal. If one of such five members died, &c., before a final award was made, another might be appointed in his place.

Messrs. Bryan and Co. appealed to the committee of appeal, who confirmed the award of the arbitrators.

Messrs. Bryan and Co. applied to Barnes, J., at chambers, for an order remitting the matter for reconsideration by the appeal committee, upon an affidavit by Mr. Durant, which stated that, since the award of the appeal committee he had discovered that, after the making of the award, the shipowners had written to the charterers saying that by the indorsement upon the charter-party it was not intended that the consignees of the cargo, other than the charterers themselves, should be liable for any of the extra expenses, &c., the charterers being personally liable to the steamer for such extra expenses, the cargo's liability being limited to freight, and that the shipowners' solicitors had written confirming this statement, and that the charterers had replied confirming and accepting such statement. The affidavit also stated that some of the members of the committee of appeal had stated that if such evidence had been before them their decision would have been in favour of Messrs. Bryan and Co.

Barnes, J. refused to make the order, but the Divisional Court (Mathew and Bruce, JJ.), on appeal, made an order remitting the matter to the reconsideration of the committee of appeal.

The Arbitration Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49) provides:

Sect. 10, sub-sect. 1. In all cases of reference to arbitration the court or a judge may from time to time remit the matters referred, or any of them, to the reconsideration of the arbitrators or umpire.

Messrs. Keighley and Co. appealed.

Cohen, Q.C. and Carver for the appellants.—The order of the court below was wrong upon two grounds: first, the court had no jurisdiction under sect. 10 of the Arbitration Act 1889 to remit this award, because this was not an arbitration within the meaning of that Act; secondly, the ground upon which the award was remitted was not a good ground for remitting an award. The "appeal committee" were not arbitrators within the meaning of the Arbitration Act, and therefore the matter cannot be remitted to them.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Even if it could, it cannot now be remitted, because one of the five members who heard and determined this dispute has since died, and the matter cannot be remitted to the same persons who first determined it. The court had no power to remit this award upon the ground upon which they did remit it. The discovery of new evidence since the award is no ground for remitting the award; it certainly is not unless the arbitrator himself comes forward and asks that the award may be sent back to him. Before the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 the court had no power to remit an award at all unless the submission contained a clause giving the court that power. Sect. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 provided that the court should, in any case where reference was made to arbitration, have power to remit the matters referred to the reconsideration of the arbitrator. Sect. 10 of the Arbitration Act 1889 is in effect a re-enactment of sect. 8 of the earlier Act, and therefore the same construction must be given to sect 10 of the later Act as was given to sect. 8 of the earlier Act. It was decided in Morris v. Morris (6 E. & B. 383) that sect. 8 applied not only to compulsory references, but to references by agreement. The case of Hodgkinson v. Fernie (3 C. B. N. S. 189) shows that the jurisdiction to remit awards is to be exercised, since the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, only upon the same grounds as it was exercised before that Act. The grounds upon which that jurisdiction ought to be exercised are, corruption or fraud on the part of the arbitrator, excess of jurisdiction, where the award is bad on the face of it, or where the arbitrator himself comes forward and admits that he has made a mistake of law or fact, and himself asks that the award shall be remitted:

Mills v. The Bowyers' Society, 3 K. & J. 66;
Dinn v. Blake, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 489; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 388;
Re Huntley, 1 E. & B. 787.

There is one case, relied upon by the respondents, in which the court remitted an award upon the ground that new material evidence had been discovered since the award:

Burnard v. Wainwright, 19 L. J. 423, Q. B.

In that case, however, the arbitrator himself came forward and said that the new evidence might influence his decision, and that he was willing to reconsider the matter. Here the arbitrators have not done so. The new evidence alleged to have been discovered in this case consists of letters written since the award, and are not evidence which would be received in a court of law, and therefore afford no ground for remitting the award.

Finlay, Q.C. and Pollard, for the respondents, were not heard.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the parties to an arbitration were related to each other by a contract for the purchase and sale of wheat, which was the only contract between them. A dispute arose in connection with that contract, which was whether the purchasers were bound to accept a cargo of wheat on board ship at Sharpness. In the contract of purchase and sale the parties had agreed to refer all disputes to certain persons, that is, to certain arbitrators chosen from the corn trade, and under certain conditions, which were that their award should be final and conclusive between the parties, but that if either party wished to go further and be heard before certain umpires he could do so by way of appeal; those umpires were to be the committee of the London Corn Trade Association. This case went before the arbitrators, who gave their decision; one of the parties desired to go before the umpires, the committee of the Corn Trade Association. The parties had, by their contract, agreed to that, and that the committee should act according to its usual rules; by these rules a committee of five was to act as umpires, and if one of those five died before a final determination was made, another was to be put in his place. These were the terms agreed to by the parties. The case then went before five members of the committee acting as umpires; one of those five has died, but another can and will be put in his place. There was a determination by this committee of five, that is, by the umpires. Primâ facie, and to a very great extent, that determination must be treated as final and conclusive between the parties, and not subject to any revision by a court of law. One party has, however, asked the court to remit this award back to the umpires, under the provisions of sect. 10 of the Arbitration Act 1889. In my opinion, this was an arbitration, and there were arbitrators, and there was an umpire, and the whole thing was an arbitration. The case, therefore, comes within the Arbitration Act, and we have to see whether the circumstances will justify a remittal to the umpires to reconsider the case. Now, the Arbitration Act 1889 has, in a great measure, followed the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 as to arbitrations. If any part of the later Act is enacted in the same terms as the earlier Act, then, according to the ordinary rules of construction, if any cases have been decided as to the true construction of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, the same construction must be given to the same words in the Arbitration Act 1889. The provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, and of the Arbitration Act 1889, as to referring back the awards of arbitrators, arose, as has been pointed out in the decided cases, in this way: there were submissions to arbitration which contained a provision that the award might be referred back to the arbitrator, and there were submissions which did not contain such a provision: if the submission did not give such power, the court could not refer an award back to the arbitrator; but if the submission did contain that power, then the court could refer back the award, but only upon certain grounds. The effect of the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, and consequently of the Arbitration Act 1889, has been stated to be, and obviously is, that all submissions to arbitration, whether they are by agreement or are compulsory, are to be treated as if they contained a power to refer the award back to the arbitrator, and it is therefore necessary to construe this Act in the same way as the old submission to arbitration which gave power to refer back the award. The decisions upon the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 put a construction upon them that the power of the court to refer back an award was only as large as that formerly given by a submission, and the effect of the Act was held to be that it contained the well-known ordinary law as to the decision of an arbitrator and umpire that it was final and conclusive both as to matters of law and matters of fact, and that where there had been a mistake of law or of fact, the parties alone could not set up such a mistake as a ground for referring back the award. Formerly where there was a power to refer back, if one party came forward and alleged that a mistake of law or fact had been made, the courts construed the submission thus, that the parties had taken the arbitrator for better or for worse, and must submit to his mistakes; but if the arbitrator himself came forward and told the court that he had made a mistake of law or fact, and asked that his award might be referred back, then the court would refer the award back, but the court would not refer the award back upon the mere assertion or allegation of a party alone that a mistake had been made; that law also was continued under the Common Law Procedure Act. It seems to me that the case of Dinn v. Blake (ubi sup.) adopts that law, and it is said in that case that "the exceptions are where there has been corruption or fraud, and where it appears on the face of the award that there has been a mistake of law or fact. . . . The latter case was decided on the authority of Mills v. The Bowyers' Company (ubi sup.), in which case it was said that the court could refer back the award if the arbitrator himself stated that in his opinion he had made a mistake of law or fact, and was desirous of the assistance of the court and willing to review his decision on the point on which he believed himself to have gone wrong. These cases have apparently established another exception in addition to those mentioned by Williams, J. But the exception depends on the admission of the arbitrator himself." Unless the arbitrator so states, the award will not be referred back to him. This rule of the court or of law applies, however, only to the allegation that there has been a mistake of law or fact, and the case of Dinn v. Blake (ubi sup.) applies only to such a case and is no authority beyond it. Now, this is not a case in which it is alleged that the arbitrators made a mistake of law or fact upon the case as it was laid before them, but is a case in which it is alleged that the whole case and evidence was not laid before them, and that material evidence has been discovered since the award. The case before us now is only the case where evidence has been discovered since, and we are not called upon to say whether there are other cases which may justify the court in sending back an award; e.g., where evidence has been purposely kept back. When other cases do arise the court will give their opinion upon them. Here the only question is, whether new evidence has been discovered since the award, and whether that is a good ground for referring the award back when the arbitrator himself does not come forward to ask that it may be referred back. Upon that point there is the case of Burnard v. Wainwright (ubi sup.), which was decided before the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, but upon a submission which contained a power to refer back the award, and was therefore the same as is now the case with regard to all submissions to arbitration. In that case it was decided by Wightman, J. in express terms that, if evidence is discovered since the decision of the arbitrator, that is a ground upon which the court may send back the award for reconsideration by the arbitrator, even if there were no request by the arbitrator to do so. That being held, then, in the case of a submission containing a power to refer the award back, we ought to adopt the same rule now under the Arbitration Act 1889. Has, then, any new evidence been discovered in this case? It is said that we ought not to send this award back unless the alleged new evidence is such as would be admitted as evidence in a court of law. The parties, however, have agreed to take their dispute before umpires who are not bound by the rules of evidence which are observed in a court of law, and the court therefore ought not to bind the parties by its own rules of evidence, but ought only to consider whether something has been discovered since the award which an arbitrator might consider material. We cannot say whether this alleged evidence would be considered material by the arbitrator or not. If it is something relating to the matter in dispute, whether it is evidence according to the rules of a court of law or not, the court may send back the award to the arbitrator for reconsideration, though the court is not bound to do so. Here it seems to me that that which has been discovered does relate sufficiently to the matter in dispute to justify the court in sending back the award to the arbitrator for him to consider the matter, leaving the decision as to the effect of this alleged evidence to the arbitrator. The judges of the Divisional Court in the exercise of their discretion did think that they ought to send back this award to the arbitrators for reconsideration, and I do not disagree with their view, but on the contrary agree with it. The appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the decision of the Divisional Court was right, and must be affirmed. This case arises under sect. 10 of the Arbitration Act 1889, and the words of that section are, "In all cases of reference to arbitration the court or a judge may from time to time remit the matters referred, or any of them, to the reconsideration of the arbitrators or umpire." Those words are very large and general, but I am not prepared to say that they are larger or more comprehensive than the words of sect. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, which were, "in any case where reference shall be made to arbitration as aforesaid, the court or a judge shall have power at any time and from time to time to remit the matters referred, or any or either of them, to the reconsideration and redetermination of the said arbitrator, upon such terms as to costs and otherwise as to the said court or judge may seem proper." It appears to me, then, that all the cases decided upon sect. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 are applicable to sect. 10 of the Arbitration Act 1889. It becomes material, therefore, to consider what was the law under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, and before that Act. Now the first case which has been cited, a case of great importance decided in 1850, was Burnard v. Wainwright (ubi sup.), which, in my opinion, governs this case. That case raised the same point as that which has been raised in this case, and the headnote to the report of that case is as follows: "After an award made in favour of B. against W. on a submission to reference between them, which contained a clause empowering the court to remit the matters to the reconsideration of the arbitrators, W. moved to send back the award to the arbitrators, on the ground that since the award he had discovered a letter in the handwriting of B. which contained material evidence in his favour. The arbitrators deposed that, had such a letter in the handwriting of B. been produced at the reference, their decision would have been materially affected. B. in answer swore that the letter was not in his handwriting, but was an absolute forgery. The court remitted the case to the arbitrators for them to say if the letter were in B.'s handwriting, and if they found that it was, then for them to reconsider the matters in difference." Now it is to be observed that the submission in that case contained a power to send back the award, and also that the arbitrators stated that their decision would have been materially affected by the new evidence. That case, therefore, is very similar to the present case, because it has been decided that under the Common Law Procedure Act the law upon this matter was the same as before this Act, and because there has been in this case a statement by the arbitrators in respect of the new evidence. The judgment of Wightman, J. was as follows: "It seems to me that, according to a fair construction of the affidavits, this letter was a new piece of evidence, discovered after the award was made. I think it reasonable that the award should be sent back to the arbitrators for them to determine on the genuineness of this letter and its effect if genuine." He did not seem to attach any importance to the statement made by the arbitrators that the new evidence would have materially affected their decision. It is material, however, to observe that there was not in that case any affidavit by the arbitrators asking the court to assist them, or any intimation from them to that effect. That case, therefore, is most material in the consideration of this case. Then followed a case, important to the consideration of this case, which placed a construction upon sect. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, that the effect of that statute was to make it no longer necessary to insert in a submission a power to remit the award. That was the case of Mills v. Bowyers' Society (ubi sup.), in which Wood, V.C. says: "It appears to me that the 8th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 in no way authorises any such course of proceeding as that which I understood was endeavoured to be pressed on the court in the argument of this case. It does not appear that there is anything in that statute which would authorise the court to send back an award for the reconsideration of the arbitrators upon any other grounds than those which have hitherto prevailed to invalidate an award . . . This 8th section is nothing more or less, as it appears to me, looking back to the history of what took place before the passing of the Act, than the introduction of a statutory enactment enabling the court to do that which experience had shown it was convenient it should have the power of doing, and which had frequently before been specially provided in orders of reference by the court, and in submissions by consent between the parties, namely, that there should be a special power in the court to remit the matters in question, or any of them, to the consideration of arbitrators, rather than set the whole award aside." That decision makes it perfectly clear that, since the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, a submission without that clause has precisely the same effect as a submission containing that clause previously had.

In 1875 a case of Dinn v. Blake (ubi sup.) was decided, which is very material, because it was there pointed out precisely under what circumstances an award may be sent back to arbitrators. The head-note to that case is as follows: "An award will not be sent back to the arbitrator on the ground that he has made a mistake in the legal principle upon which his award is based, except where the arbitrator himself admits the mistake;" and Archibald, J. stated the law shortly and clearly, saying: "The general principle is that an award is final; and, assuming that it is good on the face of it, there can be no appeal from it. The only exceptions are where there is corruption on the part of the arbitrator, or excess of jurisdiction, or where the arbitrator himself admits that there is a mistake, and, as it were, craves the assistance of the court in setting it right." This case is quite distinct from the case of Dinn v. Blake (ubi sup.), and is governed by Burnard v. Wainwright (ubi sup.). There is power to remit an award, not upon the ground of any mistake of law or fact, but upon the ground of the discovery of new evidence since the hearing by the arbitrators. It is clear to me that the court has jurisdiction to remit this award. It has been argued that this is not a case in which the court ought to exercise that power, but I think that it is a case in which the court may properly exercise such jurisdiction. I think that new evidence has been discovered in this case. It is said that it is not such evidence as would be received in a court of law, and that we ought not, therefore, to remit this award on the ground that this evidence has been discovered. That argument entirely fails; these are lay arbitrators who are not bound by legal rules of evidence. We must look at this matter as an arbitrator would, and, if this is evidence which he might receive, then it is evidence in respect of which the award should be sent back to him for reconsideration. I am not, indeed, prepared to say that this is not legal evidence, but I express no opinion upon that question. The conclusion to which I come is, that the court has jurisdiction to remit an award upon this ground, and that the alleged evidence which has been discovered since the hearing is such evidence as to justify the court, in the exercise of its discretion, in remitting the award for reconsideration. This appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Kay, L.J.—This appeal raises one question of great importance, as to the remitting of awards for reconsideration. The question is, whether sect. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, which has been, in effect, re-enacted by sect. 10 of the Arbitration Act 1889, gives the court any larger power to interfere with awards than it had before those Acts. I am strongly of opinion that neither Act intended to give any appeal from an arbitrator; that is, to give the court power to set aside an award simply because the court thought that the arbitrator was wrong. What, then, was the effect of that Act? It is difficult to say what is the limit of the power of the court to remit an award. We cannot, however, do better than follow those decisions which show with what caution the courts acted in exercising the power to set aside an award. An award should be, generally speaking, final and conclusive, because the arbitrators have been chosen by the parties themselves to settle their disputes. I think that the cases have laid down with sufficient clearness the rules upon which the court should act in exercising the power to remit, to enable us to say that the facts of this case bring it within those rules. From the judgment of Archibald, J. in Dinn v. Blake (ubi sup.), a case decided since the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, it appears in what cases the power to remit an award should be exercised, and that such power should be exercised in narrow limits. There is one case, Burnard v. Wainwright (ubi sup.), in which another case was added to those in which an award will be remitted, namely, where after an award has been made new evidence has been discovered which might affect the decision of the arbitrators, and was not before them at the hearing. That, it was held, may be a ground for remitting an award, and certainly may be so if the arbitrators themselves say it might have affected their decision. A statement to that effect seems to have been made by the arbitrators in Burnard v. Wainwright (ubi sup.), and something much the same has been said by the arbitrators in this case. I think, therefore, that this case is brought exactly within Burnard v. Wainwright (ubi sup.). That case was decided before the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, and in the submission in that case there was contained a power to remit the award to the arbitrators. That clause was not treated as giving the court an absolute discretion whether it would remit the award or not, but, in the exercise of that power, it was thought to be a proper case to remit because new evidence had been discovered after the award which the arbitrators might consider material. I think that the present case comes within that decision, and that we shall not be extending the jurisdiction of the court to remit awards by doing so in this case, because we are simply following a previous case. I am not prepared to go one step beyond those cases, and I think that sect. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, and sect. 10 of the Arbitration Act 1889, did not give any right of appeal from the decision of arbitrators. It is not, I think, too much to say that the case of Mills v. Bowyers' Society (ubi sup.) decided that one object of sect. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 was to obviate the necessity of inserting in a submission a power to remit the award, and to give the court that power which it did not previously possess. Before the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 the court acted very cautiously in exercising the power to remit given by submissions. Perhaps the Act gives the court a little larger power, but very little, I think, than the clause formerly inserted in submissions. We should, in my opinion, hold that it would not be right to remit an award if it would not have been remitted by the court, previously to the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, under a power to remit contained in a submission.

Another important point has been raised. It is said that the evidence here is of such a nature that a court of law would not receive it; that, according to the rules of evidence observed in the High Court, this evidence would not be admitted: and that, therefore, the court would go too far if it said that, upon the discovery of such evidence, it was right to remit the award for reconsideration. It is difficult to lay down any strict and definite rule upon this point. If something were alleged to have been discovered, which it might be grossly unjust to admit contrary to the legal rules of evidence, the court might refuse to remit. Here, however, I am not satisfied that this evidence would be inadmissible in the High Court, and therefore I have no hesitation whatever in saying here, that the subsequent discovery of this evidence, which perhaps would be admissible in the High Court, is a good ground for sending back the award for reconsideration. I do not say that the court would not have jurisdiction to remit, even if the evidence were plainly not admissible in a court of law, but only that the court ought not to do so. That, however, is not the case here. A further point has been raised; it is said that one of the five arbitrators has died since the award was made, and that the award cannot on that account be remitted to those five arbitrators. The rules, however, provide for the supplying of a vacancy. If this award is remitted it cannot be said that there has been any final award, and the power to fill up a vacancy can still be properly exercised by appointing another arbitrator. There is no difficulty, therefore, upon that ground. For these reasons I am not prepared to disagree with the decision of the court below, and think that this appeal must be dismissed.

HARRIS v. BEST, RYLEY, AND CO. (a)

APPLICATION FOR A NEW TRIAL.

Charter-party — Demurrage — Loading — Delay in loading — Stevedore servant of owners — Duty of owners as to loading—Stowage—Liability of charterers.

By a charter-party it was agreed that the ship should proceed to Leith and to London and there load cargo to be shipped by the charterers; and that a stevedore should be "appointed by the charterers in London only, but employed and paid for by owners."

Cargo was loaded at Leith by the charterers, no information as to the London cargo being then asked for by the captain. On the voyage to London, owing to bad weather, some of the cargo was damaged and some was shifted. After the arrival of the vessel at London it was necessary to land the damaged cargo to be re-conditioned, and to re-stow the cargo which had shifted. It also became necessary to shift some of the cargo to enable the London cargo to be properly stowed. Owing to these matters, and to some delay on the part of the stevedore who had been appointed under the terms of the charter-party, three days more than those allowed by the charter-party were occupied in loading at London.

Held (allowing the appeal), that the stevedore was the servant of the owners, and that the charterers were not liable for demurrage arising either from his delay or from the necessity of moving the cargo; and that the charterers were not liable for any of the expenses of moving the cargo because they were either expenses of stowage or of work done for the benefit of the cargo without the authority of the charterers.

THIS was an application by the defendants for judgment or for a new trial upon appeal from the verdict and judgment at the trial before Grantham, J., and a jury.

The plaintiffs, who were the owners of the steamship Dalbeattie, sued the defendants, who were the charterers of the ship, to recover a sum of 60*l.* for three days' demurrage, and also a sum of 28*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* for expenses incurred in shifting some of the cargo.
