But there is a further ground, which to my mind is absolutely conclusive, and that is, that in point of fact the Bristol City was not owned by the same owners as the Jersey City at any material time. The question may well be raised which is the material time as to the ownership of the Jersey City. Is it the time of the original issue of the certificate, or the time of the last renewal, or the time of the collision? One of those three times must be taken; counsel for the plaintiffs contended, and with considerable force, that what you have to look at is the time of the last renewal of the certificate, because the certificate expires at the end of the year unless renewed, and, if renewed, it is not a new certificate but a renewal of the old. I think perhaps I ought to look at the ownership of the Jersey City at the time of the renewal; if not, then at the time of the original granting of the certificate. But, put either way, this certificate cannot be considered good, because the owners of the Bristol City were not, either on the 8th Dec. 1891, or at the time of the last renewal, owners of the Jersey City. I may add that it appears to me there are great difficulties connected with these certificates, because, as vessels are owned in sixty-fourths, and some of the owners of these shares may, nay must, continually change, it is very difficult to suppose it could have been intended that a single change in the ownership of one sixty-fourth should render the renewal of the certificate practically useless. With that, however, I have nothing to do. When the Act of Parliament was passed, I have no doubt it was contemplated that ships would be owned by companies or partnerships of a comparatively small number of persons, and it may have been supposed that a fleet of ships would go on being owned by the same persons; but the law does not leave me any option for I am bound to say that if the Act of Parliament talks of owners one must take that in the ordinary sense of the word; so that there cannot be the same owners unless all the sixty-fourths belong to the same persons, and that the change of the ownership of one sixty-fourth is a change of ownership of the ship. The result is that I hold the certificate bad; and therefore the Bristol City was, at the time of the collision, by compulsion of law in charge of a qualified pilot. I have already found that, so far as that vessel is concerned, the pilot is alone to blame; but, as the defence of compulsory pilotage was only an alternative plea, I follow the usual course, and dismiss the plaintiff's suit without costs.

There is no legal obligation on a person to contribute towards an expenditure incurred by another merely because he has derived a benefit from it.

A collision occurred between two vessels in consequence of which one of them had to be put into dry dock in order to be repaired.

The owners of the other vessel admitted liability for the collision and damages.

While in dry dock her owners took the opportunity of fitting bilge keels, and the work was done simultaneously with the collision repairs, but without interfering with them or causing the vessel to be detained in the dock for any time beyond what was necessary for completing the repairs.

Held, that the owners, being under no obligation to put their vessel into dry dock, were not liable for any portion of the expenses of so doing, and the owners of the wrongdoing vessel were liable for the whole of the demurrage while she was undergoing repairs.

Ruabon Steamship Company v. London Assurance (81 L. T. Rep. 585; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 2; (1900) A. C. 6) followed.

THIS was a motion in objection to a report of the Registrar of the Admiralty Division dated the 4th Nov. 1901.

A collision occurred on the 30th April 1901 in the river Mersey between the steamship Bohemian, which was on a voyage from Boston to Liverpool at the time, and the steamship Acanthus, in consequence of which the Bohemian was damaged, and in order that repairs should be effected it became necessary to put the Bohemian into dry dock.

The owners of the Acanthus admitted liability for the collision subject to a reference to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount of the damages.

Previous to the date of the collision the owners of the Bohemian, which was a nearly new ship, had contemplated fitting her with bilge keels, and tenders for the work had been obtained and a deposit of 5*l.* paid to secure the option of using a dry dock, but no contract had been entered into.

After the collision they decided to avail themselves of the vessel being in dry dock to fit on the keels. She went into dock on the 7th May, and remained there until the 16th May, when the repairs were completed and the bilge keels fitted on.

At the reference the bill for repairing the collision damage was not disputed, and it was not suggested that the fitting of the bilge keels in any way interfered with or caused delay in the completion of the repairs. Objection, however, was taken to the dock dues and other charges connected with dry docking on the ground that the vessel would have been put into dry dock in any event to have the bilge keels fitted, and the owners of the Acanthus disputed the amount of the demurrage claim on the same ground.

THE ACANTHUS.

[ADM.]

The registrar came to the conclusion that "the plaintiffs had not before the collision been absolutely committed to doing the bilge keel work at that time, and that justice would be done by apportioning the expenses consequent on dry-docking the vessel as well as the loss sustained through her detention between the bilge keel work and the collision repairs." Out of 1960*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, the total amount claimed, he therefore allowed 146*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.*

The owners of the Bohemian objected to the report on the ground that all the expenses of dock dues and dry docking ought to be borne by the owners of the wrong doing vessel, and that they were also liable for the whole of the demurrage claimed.

Aspinall, K.C. (Glynn with him) for the owners of the Bohemian.—No doubt the owners of the Bohemian have taken advantage of her being in dock to carry out the alterations, but it is not suggested that the work has in any way interfered with or delayed the completion of the repairs of the damage due to the collision. The case is within the principles of law laid down by the House of Lords in Ruabon Steamship Company v. London Assurance (81 L. T. Rep. 585; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 2; (1900) A. C. 6). It was there decided that where a shipowner took advantage of his vessel being placed in dry dock to do work on his own account, he was not required to give credit to the wrongdoer for the benefit he had thus derived. He also referred to

Scrutton, K.C. and Bateson for the owners of the Acanthus, contra.—Neither party is entitled to take advantage of the vessel being in dock, and therefore the expenses ought to be borne by each of them in proper proportion. Lord Brampton (whose judgment is approved of by Lord Davey) in Ruabon Steamship Company v. London Assurance (ubi sup.) lays down that "such contribution can only be insisted upon in those cases where work is done to the vessel itself, by two or more persons, each separately and simultaneously engaged under different obligations in doing portions of it, dry-docking being necessary for each." The facts in this case are analogous with the facts in the case of The Vancouver (Marine Insurance Company v. China Transpacific Steamship Company, 55 L. T. Rep. 491; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 68; 11 App. Cas. 573). That decision was distinguished in Ruabon Steamship Company v. London Assurance (ubi sup.), but not disapproved of, and counsel for the appellants, the shipowners, argued that in The Vancouver case there were two sets of repairs, owners' repairs as well as underwriters' repairs, which distinguished it from The Ruabon case. It is submitted that here there were also two separate sets of repairs, and therefore the case comes within the principles laid down in The Vancouver (ubi sup.). In The Normandy (Shipping Gazette, the 8th Aug. 1901) Barnes, J. held that where owners took advantage of painting a vessel while in dock for repairs rendered necessary by a collision, and where they would in any event have had to do the painting within a month or two, the defendants were entitled to be credited with something on that account.

Aspinall, K.C. in reply.—Bilge keels are, in a sense, a luxury and not a necessity, and there was at no time any obligation on the owners to dry dock their vessel.

The PRESIDENT.—The question in this case raises a point which, to my mind, has been decided in other cases. There is no doubt that it became necessary to repair the vessel in consequence of the collision, and that the owner was justified in putting the ship into dock and repairing her at the expense of the owners of the Acanthus. While she was in dry dock he took advantage of the occasion to add what is called a luxury—no doubt a correct enough expression, in the sense that it was not necessary for the repair of the vessel. He took occasion to add bilge keels, which could not be done without putting the vessel into dry dock. He had thought before the collision of putting on the bilge keels when occasion occurred, but I think the result of the evidence is that he was under no contract to do so, and had not retained the dock for that purpose. Therefore the state of things was that he had it in his mind to put them on when occasion arose, but he was under no obligation to do so, either as regards a contract towards anyone else, or as regards his duty towards the ship. It therefore comes to be a simple case of the owner taking advantage of the vessel being in dry dock to add bilge keels. That appears to me to bring the case within the principles laid down by the Lord Chancellor in the Ruabon Steamship Company v. London Assurance (ubi sup.). The judgment of the Lord Chancellor puts the matter in the broadest possible way. It comes to this, that a person is not bound to contribute unless there is some legal obligation on him to do so. The mere fact that he gets an advantage from the opportunity which he has taken, although it may give rise in some person's mind to a general idea of general justice or good sense, or one of those vague propositions, which are sometimes invoked—although it may be said on those grounds that a man who gets a benefit ought to pay for it, the Lord Chancellor points out that that is not sufficient to impose a legal obligation. The Lord Chancellor in putting it in these words, appears to me to lay down the principle in the broadest possible way. He says (81 L. T. Rep. at p. 587; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 5; (1900) A. C. at p. 12): "This is the first time in which it has been sought to advance that principle where there is nothing in common between the two persons except that one person has taken advantage of something that another person has done, there being no contract between them, there being no obligation by which each of them is bound and the duty to contribute is alleged to arise only on some general principle of justice that a man ought not to get an advantage unless he pays for it." The Lord Chancellor gives illustrations to show that that is not founded upon any principle recognised by the English law. Comment has been made upon the judgments of Lord Davey, and especially Lord Brampton, in that particular case. The case of The Vancouver (ubi sup.) has no bearing upon this case, because I think the question there was whether a particular average loss sustained by the respondents exceeded 3 per cent, within the meaning of the warranty contained in a policy of assurance. That was the only question to be decided, and it was quite possible to hold in that case what was held. There was no question there of a man taking advantage of an opportunity afforded by somebody else to benefit himself. It was really a different question altogether, but I quite agree that there are expressions in Lord Brampton's judgment (with which Lord Davey agrees) which seem to go a little further. But perhaps it only comes to this, that where there is an obligation, or where the case arises that the vessel has to be repaired—or to use Lord Brampton's phrase, where there are two things necessary to be done, one by one person and one by another—if they are done at the same time then the cost, so far as it is common to both, may well be shared by them. But the point is that the two things are obligatory by reason of contract or duty. I can easily understand if it had been shown in this case that the bilge keels were a necessity, and the vessel could not go to sea without them, it might be said that the owner was under an obligation to fit them, and if he had been under an obligation, and if at that time he had put the vessel into dry dock, it might be said it was as much on his own behalf as on behalf of the owners of the Acanthus. But this case is precisely the opposite. As I have said, there was no obligation on the shipowner at all, and the learned registrar and merchants have found in terms that he was under no obligation—that "he had not absolutely committed himself to do the bilge keel work at that time," which means, I suppose, that he had not made any contract which compelled him to do it. Therefore it seems to me to be, in these circumstances, the simple case of a man who when he is under no obligation to do a thing takes advantage of the opportunity. That appears to me to be practically the case decided on the principle laid down by Lord Halsbury in the Ruabon Steamship Company v. London Assurance (ubi sup.), and quite a different case from The Vancouver (ubi sup.), nor does it come within the principle laid down by Lord Brampton and Lord Macnaghten of common obligation. Therefore I see no reason why the principle of the case of the Ruabon Steamship Company v. London Assurance (ubi sup.) should not be applied, and why the owner of the Bohemian was not entitled to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the ship being in dry dock, to make the improvement of putting on bilge keels. The best course, perhaps, will be to allow the matter to go back to the registrar, to make an alteration of the figures so far as it is necessary to alter them. The appeal must be allowed with costs.

THE RHEIN.

[ADM.]

Collision—Gravesend Beach, River Thames—Vessel at anchor in fairway—Bye-laws 8 and 38 of Thames Bye-laws—Proper application of Bye-law 38.

Semble, that the obligation on steamers and sailing vessels under the 38th Thames Bye-law, when in the fairway and not under way, to ring a bell, does not apply in clear weather.

THIS was a collision action brought by the owners of the steamship Sitona against the owners of the steamship Rhein.

The case is reported on the question of the proper application of bye-law 38 of the Thames Bye-laws, and the facts so far as material are as follows:—

The Sitona was a screw steamship of 1010 tons gross register, and was on a voyage from Skien, Norway, to Surrey Commercial Docks. The collision occurred about 8.30 p.m. on the 1st Jan. 1902, in Gravesend Reach, river Thames. The Sitona was at anchor at the time, in the anchorage-ground, it was alleged, heading up river, and exhibiting the regulation anchor lights.

The Rhein was a screw steamship of 1024 tons gross register, and was proceeding down the river on a voyage from London to the Tyne. The defendants' case was that her helm was ported for an upcoming steamer, and almost at the same time two white lights were seen nearly right ahead, which were taken to be the stern-lights of two vessels going down river. Owing to the strong wind blowing, she was slow in coming round, and, whilst still under a port helm, it was seen that the lights ahead were the lights of a vessel at anchor, and although every effort was made to avoid a collision, the Rhein collided with the Sitona.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with improperly anchoring in the fairway and with neglecting to ring their bell. It was admitted by the plaintiffs that the bell of the Sitona was not being rung.

Bye-laws 8 and 38 of the Thames Bye-laws are as follows:

All vessels navigating Gravesend Reach are to keep to the northward of a line defined by a skeleton beacon erected upon the India Arms Wharf or with the high chimney at the Cement Works at Northfleet, and all vessels intending to anchor in the Reach are to bring up to the southward of that line.

Bye-law 38. All steam and sailing vessels, when in the fairway of the river and not under way, shall at intervals of about one minute ring the bell rapidly for about five seconds.

Aspinall, K.C., Christopher Head, and Dunlop for the plaintiffs.

Laing, K.C. and Nelson for the defendants.

In the course of the arguments the following cases were referred to

The Warwick, 63 L. T. Rep. 561; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 545; 15 P. Div. 189.

BARNES, J., after dealing with the facts and finding that the Sitona was anchored a little outside of the anchorage ground, proceeded as follows:—The defendants contended that their vessel cannot be held to blame because the persons navigating her would, having regard to the rule requiring vessels at anchor to keep in the anchorage ground, be entitled to assume that the lights they saw were not the lights of a ship at anchor, or, at all events, that they would not be negligent in not thinking them the lights of a ship at anchor, and that they might be the lights of a vessel or vessels moving on the tide. That appears to me to be very much a matter for the opinion of the Elder Brethren. The question is, whether a competent person in charge of the downcoming steamer, when two anchor lights are properly exhibited and showing properly in weather in which they can be seen for an adequate and proper distance, is entitled to assume or is negligent in thinking that they are not the lights of a vessel at anchor, but the lights of something moving. The Elder Brethren are strongly of opinion that a per-on navigating with care and keeping a proper look-out ought, without any difficulty, to have been able to know that they were the lights of a vessel at anchor. It ought not to make any material difference that the person navigating has the rule about the anchorage ground in his mind, and would naturally suppose that vessels would be at anchor there and not in the fairway. The Elder Brethren say that for many reasons nobody navigating down Gravesend Reach can assume that no vessels will be at anchor in the fairway. They point out, for instance, that it may not always be possible to enter the anchorage ground owing to the crowd of vessels there already, and there are many other circumstances in which a vessel may be forced to bring up in the fairway. The view of the Elder Brethren is that it is improper to assume that because there are white lights ahead they are not the lights of a vessel at anchor because they happen to be in the fairway. That being so, and finding that the lights exhibited would adequately warn approaching vessels that they were the lights of a ship at anchor and therefore a ship to be avoided, then they ought to avoid it, and the mere fact that the vessel is at anchor in the fairway does not affect the question. This depends on the well-known principle that if there is an object which, even though it is not in a proper place, you can avoid by the exercise of reasonable care and skill, then you must avoid it. The conclusion of fact, therefore, to which I come is that the collision was really due to bad lookout on board the Rhein, and to not appreciating that the lights they saw were the lights of a vessel at anchor. With regard to the point raised that the Sitona was not ringing her bell, Mr. Laing referred to rule 38. I do not suppose that if she had been ringing her bell it would have made any difference, but, as at present advised, I cannot hold that this rule applies except in special circumstances where there is proper necessity for the application of it. If I were to hold otherwise I should be holding that every ship at anchor in the Thames, because it is practically all fairway, would have to ring her bell on the finest summer day, and there would be the clang of bells all the way down the river. I should not hold that view until I were forced to do so. It seems to me unreasonable to so hold, especially when I find that rule 38 is in the class headed "fog and steam-whistle signals," which would go to show that rule 38 only applies in cases of fog, mist, falling snow, and the like. The conclusion I have come to is that the defendants must be held alone to blame for this collision.

THE AUGUSTE LEGEMBRE. (a)

A steamship having fouled her propeller and become disabled was towed into port by the steam lifeboat H P. and two tugs, the V. and the D.; and the lifeboat E. H., which was required by the rules of the National Lifeboat Institution to accompany the H. P., remained fast astern of the steamship during the towage, but otherwise rendered no service. The D. assisted in the towage at the request of the master of the V., but against the wish of the master of the steamship. The employment of a third tug was, in the circumstances, reasonable and prudent, but turned out to be unnecessary.

Held, that the lifeboatmen in the E. H. and the tug D. were entitled to salvage remuneration.

Where a salvor at the request of a co-salvor, but against the wish of the master of the salvaged vessel, renders salvage services in such circumstances that they ought to have been accepted, he is entitled to salvage remuneration.

THIS was an action to recover salvage remuneration for services rendered by the lifeboats Helen Peele and Edmund Harvey, and the steam-tugs Victor and Dragon, to the steamship Auguste Legembre in Dec. 1901.

The facts were as follows: On the 12th Dec. 1901 the Auguste Legembre, a French screw steamship of 2603 tons gross register, whilst bound from Barrow-in-Furness to Port Talbot in water ballast, got her propeller entangled in a manilla warp washed overboard in a gale of wind off Cardigan Bay, and could not work her engines. She then drifted before the gale, and touched on the Barrell's Rocks off the Pembroke coast, where she sustained some damage, so that No. 2 hold filled with water up to the level of the sea outside, and some water got into the engine-room; but, owing to the watertight doors being shut down and the bulkheads between No. 2 hold and the engine-room being watertight, the pumps were able to keep down the water in the engine-room. She then drifted across the mouth of the Bristol Channel, and eventually on the night of the 13th Dec. was brought up with both anchors in twenty-six fathoms of water about fifteen miles to the westward of Trevoise Head. There she lay until the morning of the 15th Dec., and, though the wind throughout continued to blow a strong gale from the N.E. with a very heavy sea, she held safely to her anchors. Signals of distress were not exhibited, but she was seen from the shore to be in difficulties, and shortly before midnight on the 14th Dec. the Helen Peele, a twin-screw steam lifeboat belonging to the National Lifeboat Institution and stationed at Padstow, manned by a crew of eleven hands, and of the value of 10,500*l.*, came out to the steamer with the Padstow lifeboat in tow, which was manned by a crew of fifteen men. The master of the steamer told them he did not want assistance, but asked them to wait until the morning to see about taking her in tow.

On the morning of the 15th Dec., the weather having greatly moderated, the steamer got up her anchors with the object of being taken in tow by the Helen Peele. The steam-tugs Victor and Dragon, which had heard of the steamer's position and come round from Falmouth in very bad weather, then came up and offered their assistance. The Victor, which was the leading tug, was at once asked to assist in the towage, and she accordingly made fast ahead and began towing alongside the Helen Peele towards Cardiff, and the lifeboat Edmund Harvey made fast astern of the steamer. The Dragon also offered her services, which the master of the steamer declined, as he considered he had enough assistance without her. The Dragon, however, kept alongside for about an hour, and from time to time offered her services, which were as often refused. The weather was moderate but threatening, and the sea, though high, was going down as the wind fell. The steamer was sheering and difficult to tow and was making some water, and, thinking it was important that she should be towed into a place of safety as quickly as possible, the master of the Victor shouted to the steamer through the megaphone that he would not continue to tow without a third tug, and, not getting any audible answer from the steamer, he asked the Dragon to make fast ahead of the Victor. The Dragon accordingly made fast against the wish of the master of the steamer, and assisted to tow her until midnight.

ADM.]

THE AUGUSTE LEGEMBRÉ.

[ADM.]

On the morning of the 16th Dec. the steamer was safely brought to anchor in Cardiff Roads, having been towed a distance of nearly one hundred miles.

The value of the Auguste Legembre was 11,400*l*.

It appeared that by the rules of the National Lifeboat Institution the crews of the Helen Peele and Edmund Harvey were liable to make good any damage done to the lifeboats while rendering salvage services, and to pay for all stores consumed while employed for salvage purposes, and that the expenses to which they were liable amounted to about 60*l*. It was also proved that the steam lifeboat was not allowed to go out unless accompanied by the lifeboat.

Aspinall, K.C. and Stokes for the plaintiffs.

Laing, K.C. and Miller for the defendants.

BARNES, J. (after stating the facts, proceeded):—The real contest in this case is as to the amounts that ought to be awarded to the Victor and to the Helen Peele, and as to whether anything ought to be awarded to the men in the lifeboat Edmund Harvey and to the Dragon. The French steamer was undoubtedly placed in safety by the efforts of the salvors, and, though she had ridden out the severe weather and had never moved from her anchors, she could not get away from the place where she was at anchor without assistance, and it was absolutely necessary that she should be towed by someone. The tugs did it satisfactorily, and a reasonable and proper award must be given for that service. I need say nothing about the Victor, except to state later on the amount which I think is the proper sum to award to her. With regard to the Helen Peele, I do not think the case can be treated exactly as if the eleven men in the Helen Peele owned her. We are told that these men are to be treated in the same way as an ordinary lifeboat service is treated—that is to say, they take the salvage, and run the risk of paying for any damage to the tug or the lifeboat. I can understand an ordinary life-boat service being dealt with on that footing; but I confess that it seems to me hardly applicable to the case of a tug of this character, and that I must deal with this case on the footing of men who had rendered a service and were liable for any repairs that had to be done. In this case the liability was not very great, because, although they went out in very bad weather, the tug is built for the purpose, and after she got to the steamer there does not seem to have been any unusual risk in the towage, which did not commence until the weather had moderated. With regard to the lifeboat men, I think they are entitled to be considered in the salvage award because of the peculiar circumstances under which they had to render their services. We are told that the tug would not be allowed to go out without the lifeboat, as she is built expressly for that service, and the rule is that she has to tow out the lifeboat. Practically, therefore, the lifeboat men had to keep with her, and she had to keep with the lifeboat. It seems to me that this case ought to be treated as if the lifeboat men formed part of the crew of the tug, for, though not really part of the crew, their position is analogous to that. I cannot, therefore, come to the conclusion that they are not to be treated as in any sense instrumental in salvaging the property.

With regard to the Dragon, the question is one partly of law and partly of nautical skill. Although the tug's services were not directly accepted, but were in fact refused by the master of the steamer, the tug did at the request of the master of the Victor make fast ahead, not that it was in fact absolutely necessary at that time to have more than two tugs towing, but because he at least wished to have a third tug in case it was wanted afterwards, and the Dragon rendered a towage service of a valuable character. It is a legal question in this sense, that if those services were rendered in such circumstances that they ought to have been accepted, then, although the master of the steamship, according to his evidence, did not wish to have them, an award of some amount should, as a matter of law, be made. It is also a nautical question, therefore, whether, having regard to the circumstances of the case, and what kind of weather might be anticipated at that time of year and in that locality, it was reasonably prudent and necessary to have a third tug. The Elder Brethren think it was, because, although the weather had moderated, it was in the middle of December, when the wind seems to have been flying about from quarter to quarter, and no one could be certain as to what would take place before they got to Cardiff. That is the reason why the Victor took this third tug ahead, and, although I think in fact it did not turn out to be necessary, it was a reasonable thing to do. For these reasons the Dragon must not be excluded, although her award should be of a moderate character. The award which I make to the various salvors is the sum of 1000*l*., which I propose to divide in this way: To the owners, master, and crew of the Victor, 500*l*.; to the crew of the Helen Peele, 325*l*.; to the owners, master, and crew of the Dragon, 100*l*.; and to the lifeboat men, 75*l*.

THE MYSTERY. (a)

The owners of a vessel are not liable for a collision solely due to the improper orders of a dock foreman which those in charge of her are bound by statute to obey and do properly obey.

The owners of a steamship damaged by collision with a barge instituted an action in the City of London Court against the owners of the barge, and afterwards joined as defendants the dock company to whose improper orders the owners of the barge alleged the collision was due. The dock company alleged the collision was due to the negligence of the barge. Judgment was given against both defendants, but, on appeal by both, the judgment against the owners of the barge was set aside. The court, following The River Lagan (58 L. T. Rep. 773; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 281), ordered the dock company to pay the costs of the plaintiffs and of the successful defendants both in the court below and of the appeal.

THIS was an appeal from the judge of the City of London Court in an action which arose out of a collision between the plaintiffs' steamship William Adamson and the defendants' sailing barge Mystery at the entrance of the Victoria Docks, London, about 2 p.m. on the 28th Oct. 1901.

The facts of the case were shortly as follows: The Mystery, which was bound into the Victoria Docks and was waiting for the dock gates to be opened, had made fast, by orders of a dock official, with a rope forward and aft to the outermost barge of four which were moored in tiers close to the dock wall. When the dock gates were opened the stern rope was, by orders of the lock foreman, taken to the pierhead, and the Mystery's head was allowed to swing round with the flood tide to get her into position to enter the dock. The barge to which the head rope was fast was also allowed to swing, with the result that the rope ceased to act as a check rope, and the Mystery, while swinging round, struck with her bowsprit the stern of the William Adamson, which was entering the dock. No charge of negligence was made against the William Adamson, but the case for the Mystery was that she was swinging as directed by the lock foreman, and that the stern rope was let go and the barges were allowed to swing by his orders, and that the collision was solely due to the carrying out of these orders. The London and India Docks Company were then added as defendants in the action, and they, both in their answers to interrogatories and at the trial, alleged that the collision was solely due to the negligence of those in charge of the Mystery. The learned judge found as a fact that the collision was due to the improper orders of the lock foreman, which the Mystery properly carried out, but held that although those in charge of the Mystery had not been guilty of negligence, her owners were not relieved from liability for the consequences of obedience to the orders of the lock foreman, and accordingly gave judgment against both defendants, with costs.

Both defendants appealed.

The following are extracts from the bye-laws of the dock company, made under the London and St. Katharine Docks Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii.), the dock company's private Act:—

Bye-law 2:

The order in which vessels are to enter any dock is in the absolute discretion of the dockmaster, his assistants or deputies; and all persons in charge of vessels must cause their vessels to pass into the dock as directed by the dockmaster, his assistants or deputies.

Bye-law 10:

All vessels must be transported to and from the river or any part of the dock premises by the persons in charge and their crews under the direction of the dockmaster, his assistants or deputies.

Bye-law 17:

The dockmaster, his assistants or deputies, may at any time give in such manner as he or they may think fit to the master or other person in charge of any vessel any other directions.

Bye-law 2 of the bye-laws of 1893:

The expression "dockmaster" shall include his duly authorised deputies and assistants.

The following sections of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 27), which is incorporated in the London and St. Katharine Docks Act, were referred to:

Sect. 51. The undertakers may appoint such harbour-masters as they think necessary (including in such expression dockmasters and piermasters, as hereinbefore defined).

Sect. 52. The harbour-master may give directions for (inter alia) regulating the time at which and the manner in which any vessel shall enter into, go out of, or lie in or at the harbour, dock, or pier; and its position mooring or unmooring, placing and removing whilst therein.

Sect. 53. The master of every vessel within the harbour or dock or at or near the pier shall regulate such vessel according to the directions of the harbour-master, made in conformity with this and the special Act; and any master of a vessel, who after notice of any such direction by the harbour-master served upon him, shall not forthwith regulate such vessel according to such directions shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds.

Scrutton, K.C. (with him Miller) for the owners of the Mystery.—On the facts found by the learned judge, the Mystery was not guilty of any negligence, and the action against her ought to have been dismissed:

The Bilbao, Lush. 149.

Pickford, K.C. (with him Bucknill) for the dock company.—The order to pass the Mystery's stern rope ashore was in the circumstances a proper order. The alleged order to the barges to swing was not given by the lock foreman, but, even if it was given, the Mystery could have checked her swing and avoided the collision by dropping an anchor, and was negligent in not doing so. If the collision was due to the improper orders of the dock foreman, the dock company are not liable, as the lock foreman had no authority to give such orders. The dockmaster was the only person who had power to regulate how vessels should come into the dock, and he was present directing the movements of the William Adamson. The duty of the lock foreman was merely to assist vessels with their ropes, and he was not a person whose orders the Mystery was bound by law to obey.

ADM.] WASTWATER STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v. T. B. NEALE AND Co., [ADM.]

Aspinall, K.C. and Balloch for the owners of the William Adamson.—The learned judge was right in finding that the orders were given by the lock foreman, and were in the circumstances improper; but the Mystery could have carried out his orders without accident if she had let go an anchor, as she ought to have done in the circumstances, on her own initiative.

Scrutton, K.C. in reply.—The lock foreman was an official of the dock company. He was acting as assistant of the dockmaster, and as such was a person who was authorised by the dock company's bye-laws to give orders, and whose orders the Mystery was bound by the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 under a penalty to obey.

The PRESIDENT.—I think that the findings of the learned judge in the court below cover the whole ground in this case, with the exception possibly of one point. With these findings I am not disposed to differ, and, after having heard the observations made in argument on the judgment of the learned judge, it appears to me his findings of fact are correct. On these facts it is quite clear that the dock company alone are liable, because he has found that the orders given by the lock foreman were wrong and mistaken, and that in carrying them out the Mystery did nothing wrong. If the Mystery only acted in obedience to the orders of the dockmaster or his assistant and obeyed them properly, then, assuming these orders were lawful, I am quite at a loss to see on what grounds the Mystery could be held to blame. The only point which has been raised and is not covered in terms by the judgment of the learned judge is the question of the authority of the lock foreman who actually gave the orders in question. On the evidence it appears to me that the learned judge must have held, and I think rightly, that the lock foreman was a person whose orders could bind the dock company. It is clear he was an official of the dock company and was there for the purpose of looking after the barges, and it appears to me to be quite clear that in the circumstances he was a person authorised to give the necessary orders to the barges going into the docks. By some mistake he gave a wrong order. It is impossible to say he was acting in these circumstances outside the scope of his authority. It is expressly provided by the dock company's bye-laws that not only are the regulations with regard to going into dock to be obeyed, but also any other order which is thought fit to be given by the dockmaster, or his assistants or deputies. In this case a deputy or assistant of the dockmaster gave such orders, and, that being so, it appears to me they were orders given by a person who was the assistant of the dockmaster within the meaning of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847. For these reasons the judgment of the court below should stand as against the dock company, but ought to be reversed as regards the Mystery.

BARNES, J.—I have nothing to add so far as the judgment of the learned judge against the dock company is concerned. But with regard to the judgment which he has given against the Mystery, it seems to be founded on a misapprehension that her owners were responsible because there was no statutory enactment relieving them from liability, as there is in the case of the compulsory employment of pilots. The decision of Dr. Lushington in The Bilbao (Lush 149) deals with this point, and lays down the principle that the ship-owner is not to be held responsible for obeying under compulsion of a statute any order of a harbour-master who is a stranger to him. The statute in this case is the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, incorporated in the defendant company's Act, which imposes the obligation of obeying the orders of the dockmaster or his assistant. The learned President has dealt with the question of the lock foreman's authority to give the orders he did. The dock officials were not in any sense the servants of the owners of the Mystery, and the owners cannot, according to the well-established principles of the common law, be held responsible for the acts of such persons. I think the principles upon which The Halley (18 T. L. Rep. 879; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 193; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 131) was decided are exactly analogous and applicable to the present case, and, according to those principles, the owners of the Mystery are not liable for the collision.

Aspinall, K.C., for the plaintiffs (respondents), asked on the authority of The River Lagan (58 L. T. Rep. 773; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 281) that the dock company should be ordered to pay the whole of the costs both of the plaintiffs and of the owners of the Mystery in the court below and of the appeal.

Pickford, K.C. (contra).—There is no hard-and-fast rule regarding costs in cases of this kind, and the question is always one for the discretion of the court in each case. The facts in The River Lagan are different from those in this case, as the plaintiffs in this case commenced their action against the successful defendants, got judgment against them in the court below, and sought to uphold that judgment here. In any case the dock company ought not to be made to bear the plaintiffs' costs of the appeal.

The PRESIDENT.—I think the plaintiffs acted reasonably in joining both parties as defendants, and, following the decision of Sir James Hannen in The River Lagan, the whole burden of costs should fall on the unsuccessful defendant. I do not see any reason for dividing the costs in the court below and the costs here, and I shall therefore order the dock company to pay both sets of costs, here and in the court below.

Judgment accordingly.

v. T. B. NEALE AND Co. (a)

Charter-party—Sub-charter-party—Right of ship-owner to sue indorsee of bill of lading for freight on cargo shipped under sub-charter-party.

The owners of the W. chartered her to G. under a charter-party, which provided that the master should sign bills of lading as presented, and that the charterers' liability should cease on shipment of the cargo, and gave the shipowners a lien for freight, dead freight, and demurrage.

G. rechartered the vessel to M. L. under a charter-party which contained provisions similar to the original charter-party.

M. L., who had no notice of the original charter-party, shipped a cargo in pursuance of the second charter-party, and bills of lading were signed by the master as presented by which the cargo was to be delivered to the order or assigns of the shippers on payment of freight without recourse to shippers as per the second charter-party.

Held, that the bills of lading were signed by the master as agent of the shipowners, and that in the circumstances the shipowners were entitled to sue the indorsees of the bills of lading for the freight due thereon and demurrage.

APPEAL of the plaintiffs from a decision of the judge of the County Court of Lancashire.

Action to recover a sum of 86l. 11s. 6d., being a balance of freight, and 61l. 8s. 9d., being a balance of demurrage alleged to be due from the defendants under the following circumstances:—

By a charter-party dated the 13th July 1899 the plaintiffs as owners chartered their steamship Wastwater to Goddard and Gilliland, of Sabine Pass, for three consecutive voyages from Sabine Pass, Galveston, or New Orleans to certain named ports in the United Kingdom and Continent at a freight of 16s. per ton on her dead-weight cargo capacity.

The charter-party contained the following amongst other clauses:

The freight to be paid in cash on unloading and right delivery of the cargo.

Owners shall pay at port of loading 2½ per cent. commission and also cost of insurance on the amount to be advanced by charterers or their agents for disbursements and charges at port of loading, and master shall give his draft on owners or consignees as required to cover said advances (which, together with drafts for difference of freight, shall be payable within three days after arrival or out of the first freight collected), or, if required, a bank credit to be furnished by the owners for amount of said disbursements.

Charterers have the option of loading lawful merchandise, paying freight on steamers d.w. capacity as above. All spaces to be placed at charterers' disposal which would be used for cargo if loading for owners' account.

The captain shall sign bill of lading as presented without prejudice to this charter-party, any difference between the amount of freight by the bills of lading and this charter-party to be settled at port of loading before sailing.

Eighteen running days (Sundays and holidays excepted) shall be allowed charterers for loading and discharging, and her days on demurrage over and above the said lay-days at the rate of 4d. per net register ton per day.

Charterers' liability to cease when the cargo is shipped, the owner or master having an absolute lien upon cargo for the recovery and payment of all freight, dead freight, and demurrage.

Subsequently Mr. Gilliland, of the firm of Goddard and Gilliland, by a charter-party dated the 18th Jan. 1900, purporting to act as agent of the steamer but without informing the plaintiffs, chartered her to the Morgan Lumber Company, who were ignorant of the original charter-party, for the carriage of a cargo of timber from Sabine Pass to Liverpool at a freight of 10.75 dollars per 1000 feet, payable on delivery of the cargo. This charter-party contained clauses similar to those set out above, except that it provided for a higher rate of demurrage than the charter-party of the 13th July, and it was doubtful whether it gave a lien for damages for detention at the port of loading.

A cargo of timber was shipped in April on board the Wastwater at Sabine Pass by the Morgan Lumber Company for which bills of lading were signed by the master as presented, by the terms of which the cargo was to be delivered at Liverpool to their order or assigns on payment of freight, without recourse to shippers, at the rate of 10.75 dollars per 1000 feet as per charter-party dated the 18th Jan. 1900.

Gilliland appointed Thin, a shipbroker, to act for the steamer in Liverpool as his agent, and Thin was also appointed by the plaintiffs to act as their agent.

The defendants were the indorsees of the bills of lading.

The whole of the time allowed for loading and discharging was used at the port of loading, and the vessel came on demurrage on her arrival at Liverpool.

The defendants took delivery of the cargo and paid part of the freight, withholding payment of part of the freight against a claim for short delivery.

They disputed the claim for demurrage altogether.

The master threatened to exercise a lien on the cargo for freight and the demurrage at the higher rate under the second charter-party, and after some negotiations the defendants agreed to pay Thin whatever freight was due under the bills of lading, and by a letter dated the 22nd May and addressed to Thin, agreed to pay "whatever demurrage may be due this steamer on final discharge under our charter-party."

The plaintiffs claimed the balance of freight under the bills of lading and the demurrage under the letter of the 22nd May and the charter-party of the 18th Jan. therein referred to.

The defendants resisted the claim on the grounds that they were only liable to Gilliland under the charter-party of the 18th Jan.; that the bills of lading were signed by the master as agent of Gilliland, and not of the plaintiffs; that the agreement in the letter of the 22nd May was made with Thin as agent of Gilliland, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs had no title to sue on the bills of lading or on the agreement with Thin for the freight or demurrage.

The County Court judge held that Thin could not equitably act as the agent of both the plaintiffs and Gilliland at the same time, and on the grounds relied on by the defendants nonsuited the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Horridge, K.C. and Leslie Scott for the appellants (plaintiffs).—The plaintiffs were entitled to sue the defendants for the freight as indorsees of the bills of lading. The July charter-party did not operate as a demise of the ship to Goddard and Gilliland. The ship remained in the possession of the owners, and the master signed the bills of lading as their agent, and not as the agent of Gilliland. Owing to the operation of the cesser clause in the July charter-party the consignees were the only persons to whom the owners could look for payment of the freight. The charter-party gave an absolute lien for freight and demurrage. Even if the January charter-party gave no lien for damages for detention at the port of loading it was contemplated by all the parties that the master would exercise a lien if the claims were not settled. The defendants agreed with Thin to pay the demurrage to prevent delay in getting delivery. The master was acting as the owners' agent throughout. Thin was authorised by the owners and by the master to collect the freight and demurrage for them, and the fact that he was also Gilliland's agent did not prevent his acting as the owners' agent at the same time. The interests of both principals were identical, as both wanted to get the freight and demurrage paid by the consignees. The defendants knew that Thin was the owners' agent when they wrote the letter of the 22nd May.

Hamilton, K.C. and Keogh for the respondents (defendants).—The January charter-party was entered into by Gilliland without the owners' authority. The freight due under that charter was due to Gilliland and not to the plaintiffs. It was under this charter that the cargo was shipped and the bills of lading were signed by the master as agent of Gilliland. The Morgan Lumber Company had no notice of the July charter-party, and were not bound by its terms. The bills of lading in the hands of the Morgan Lumber Company and of the defendants, who were their agents to receive the cargo at Liverpool, were merely receipts for the goods, and the only contract to which the Morgan Lumber Company and the defendants were parties was the charter-party of January to which the plaintiffs were no parties. There was no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants. [BARNES, J.—If the Morgan Lumber Company's goods were on board the ship without the plaintiffs knowing anything of the second charter-party they were taken on board by the plaintiffs on the terms of the first charter-party.] Neither the Morgan Lumber Company nor the defendants were bound by the terms of the July charter of which they had no notice:

Marquand v. Banner, 25 L. J. 313, Q. B.

This decision was approved by Lord Campbell in Schuster v. McKeller (26 L. J. 281, Q. B. at p. 288), and, though doubted in Gilkison v. Middleton (26 L. J. 209, C. P.), that case is not the present case:

Carver's Carriage by Sea, 3rd edit., s. 155.

The owners in the peculiar circumstances of this case, could only look for the freight and demurrage to Goddard and Gilliland, who are only relieved by the cesser clause to the extent to which it gives an effective lien. The owners could not exercise their lien, as it was not preserved by the second charter-party. A lien for freight can only be exercised in favour of the person to whom the freight is due, and here the freight claimed was due to Gilliland. As regards the arrangement made by the defendants with Thin, that was merely an undertaking by the defendants, as representing the Morgan Lumber Company, to pay to Goddard and Co. whatever freight and demurrage was due to them under the bills of lading, and the January charter-party. The only lien the master could exercise was the lien under the January charter-party as agent of Gilliland and not of the owners. [BARNES, J.—The owners had a lien under the first charter-party against Gilliland; Gilliland had a lien under the second charter against the Morgan Lumber Company. The master had a right against Gilliland which he could exercise against the Morgan Lumber Company, and the consignees as representing them.] The plaintiffs' claim for demurrage is based as to time on the first charter, and as to rate on the second. It was for the plaintiffs to show that there was an agreement by the defendants to pay the freight and demurrage to Thin as agent of the plaintiffs, and the learned judge in the court below came to a conclusion of fact which was warranted by the evidence, and his judgment ought not to be disturbed.

Baumwooll v. Furness, 68 L. T. Rep. 1; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 262; (1893) A. C. 8.

The PRESIDENT.—In this case the learned judge of the court below consulted the plaintiffs, but I think this nonsuit must be set aside both with regard to the claim for freight and with regard to the claim for demurrage. Those claims stand on rather different grounds. The learned judge appears to me to have decided the whole of the matter upon the ground that Thin was the agent only for Gilliland, and was not, and could not be, the agent for the plaintiffs as well. His view appears to have been that there was a conflict between the interests of the plaintiffs and those of Gilliland, and under these circumstances he could not act as agent for both without the consent of both. I am clearly of opinion that on the evidence Thin was appointed to act and did act as agent for the plaintiffs as well as agent for Gilliland. That point is not of first importance, because the plaintiffs' claim to freight rests on the broad ground of the defendants' liability under the bills of lading. No doubt there are cases where the master ceases to be agent for the shipowner and becomes the agent of the charterer, but I see no reason for saying that that was so in the present case. The master all through appears to have acted in the ordinary way as agent for the shipowners, and there is no reason why the shippers should not be liable to pay the freight to the shipowners under and according to the bills of lading, and apart from that the defendants are liable for freight, upon the ordinary law, on the bills of lading, the master having a lien which he was entitled to enforce.

With regard to the demurrage, the matter stands upon different grounds. The liability rests upon the agreement expressed in the letter of the 22nd May, and that agreement is quite clear in its terms. That agreement shows that Thin was then acting as the agent for the plaintiffs, and it shows that he was agent for the ship. It may be said with a good deal of force that Thin may have been agent for both the plaintiffs and Gilliland, and that the arrangement made by the defendants in their letter was that the demurrage should be paid to him as agent of Gilliland, and not as agent for the plaintiffs. But that does not appear to be the reasonable or businesslike way of looking at it. The result of the arrangement expressed in that letter appears to be that Thin was represented as the plaintiffs' agent to collect the whole of the demurrage, leaving him to arrange, as between Gilliland and the plaintiffs, how the demurrage was to be divided, and the fact that the master was pressing for the demurrage at that time, and considered himself entitled to enforce his claim for it, is sufficient explanation of such arrangement having been made. Under those circumstances I think the nonsuit of the learned judge of the court below cannot be maintained, and the case must go back to him in order that, if so advised, the plaintiffs may have an opportunity of calling any evidence they may desire.

ADM.]

HULTHEN v. STEWART AND Co.

[CT. OF APP.]

BARNES, J.—There are two claims in this case, one being for freight and the other for demurrage. As to both these claims the defendants say that the plaintiffs have no right of action against them, because there was no obligation on their part to pay either freight or demurrage to the plaintiffs. Dealing with the question of freight first, it appears to me that the position taken up by the defendants is erroneous, both in law and in fact. First of all because, having regard to the form of the charter-parties, and the course of business which it is necessary to follow in order to put those charter-parties into proper operation, I feel no doubt that the bills of lading were signed by the master as agent for the shipowners, and that they gave the shipowners a right to sue those who are responsible on the bills of lading. If the defendants are liable as holders of the bills of lading at all, they are liable to the plaintiffs in accordance with the view which I think is correctly stated in Carver on Carriage by Sea, 3rd edit., at s. 157, where it says that, when the bill of lading is in the hands of a shipper or indorsee, who is a stranger to the charter-party, the contract shown by it is one between him and the shipowner, and may be enforced by and against the shipowner accordingly, whether the shipper or indorsee had notice of the charter-party or not. But the case as regards the freight does not rest there, because there was, according to the evidence, an express contract, which was made afterwards, with the defendants, to pay the freight to Thin according to the bills of lading. The only question on that is whether Thin was acting as agent for the plaintiffs. There is not the slightest doubt that that was so, because Gilliland was no longer interested in the case at all. By the way in which this class of business works out, Gilliland having to pay so much freight to the shipowners, and having to get part of it out of his recharter, a draft is given at the port of loading for the difference of freight, and the shipowner remains the only person practically concerned in enforcing the claim for freight against the consignees. That being so, I have no doubt whatever that the contract, so far as it went, was made with Thin as an agent for the shipowner.

With regard to the demurrage, it seems to me that the only point that can be taken in favour of the defendants is that the contract contained in the letter of the 22nd May was in fact made with Thin as the agent for Gilliland only, or as joint agent for Gilliland and the plaintiffs. From the negotiations that took place beforehand, in which the position of the plaintiffs, who were interested in the demurrage, whatever rate or amount was to be paid, was known to the defendants, it is quite obvious that the contract with Thin was not made in the interest of Gilliland alone. [The learned judge referred to the evidence, and continued:] I do not think there is the least doubt on the evidence that the contract was in fact made by the defendants with Thin on behalf of the shipowners, and that they are entitled to the benefit of any contracts made by Thin on their behalf. The result is that, in my opinion, the judgment in the court below was wrong, and the nonsuit must be set aside, and the case go back to the learned judge.

COURT OF APPEAL.

March 12 and 13, 1902.

(Before COLLINS, M.R., ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ.)

HULTHEN v. STEWART AND Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Discharge of cargo—Demurrage—“Customary steamship dispatch”—“As fast as steamer can deliver”—“According to custom of port”—Delay through unavoidable causes—Obligation of receiver of cargo.

By a charter-party it was provided that a steamer should proceed to London and there deliver a cargo of timber, the cargo to be discharged with customary steamship dispatch, “as fast as the steamer can deliver . . . according to the custom of the port”; and there was an express exception in respect of delay in discharging the cargo caused by a strike or lock-out.

The vessel arrived at London and was ready to deliver the cargo, but the dock to which the defendants, the receivers of the cargo, directed her to proceed was so crowded that she could not enter the dock for some days, and further delay arose in obtaining a berth for discharging. The vessel could not have been more quickly discharged elsewhere in the port, and the defendants used all reasonable means to procure the discharge of the cargo, which could not in the circumstances have been discharged more quickly. Held (affirming the judgment of Phillimore, J.), that the obligation of the defendants was only to use all reasonable means to procure the discharge of the cargo as quickly as was possible in the circumstances, and that, as they had performed that obligation, they were not liable for demurrage.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Phillimore, J. at the trial of the action as a commercial cause, without a jury.

The plaintiff in this action claimed demurrage

[CT. OF APP.]

HULTHEN v. STEWART AND CO.

in respect of his steamer Anton, and the defendants were sued as indorsees of bills of lading which incorporated the provisions of a charter-party, and as receivers of the cargo under those bills of lading.

The charter-party was made on the 22nd Aug. 1900 and provided that the Anton should proceed to Heret, in the White Sea, and there load from the agents of the charterers a full and complete cargo of battens, and therewith proceed to London and deliver the same always afloat, on being paid freight as provided.

The charter-party provided, in clause 3, as follows:

The cargo to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports, Sundays, general or local holidays (unless used), in both loading and discharging, excepted. Should the steamer be detained beyond the time stipulated as above for loading or discharging, demurrage shall be paid at 30l. per day, and pro rata for any part thereof. The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary.

And clause 5 was as follows:

If the cargo cannot be loaded or discharged by reason of a strike or lock-out of any class of workmen essential to the loading or discharge by reason of epidemics (a strike or lock-out of the shippers' or receivers' men only shall not exonerate them from any demurrage for which they may be liable under this charter if by the use of reasonable diligence they could have obtained other suitable labour), and in case of any delay by reason of the before-mentioned causes, no claim for damages shall be made by the shippers, the receivers of the cargo, the owners of the ship, or by any other party under this charter.

A cargo was duly loaded under the charter-party, and the Anton arrived at Gravesend on the 12th Oct. On that day the captain received a notice from the defendants directing him to discharge the cargo in the Surrey Commercial Dock.

Owing to the crowded state of the dock at that time it was impossible to get the vessel into the dock immediately, and she therefore remained at Gravesend.

On the 18th Oct. the vessel was able to get into the dock, and did enter the dock on that day; but, the dock being still crowded, she was unable to obtain a berth for discharging alongside the quay until the 20th Oct., which was a Saturday.

The discharge of the cargo commenced on the 22nd Oct., and, some further delay being caused by the crowded state of the dock, the discharge was completed on the 29th Oct.

The plaintiff alleged that the vessel arrived and was ready to discharge on the 12th Oct., and that the discharge of the cargo according to the terms of the charter-party ought to have been completed on the 18th Oct.

At the trial evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiff that, if it was impossible to commence the discharge of the cargo in the Surrey Commercial Dock on the 12th Oct., the vessel might have been discharged at that date either in the Millwall Dock, or at a tier in the river. Evidence was, however, adduced on behalf of the defendants that the Millwall Dock was at that time as much crowded as the Surrey Commercial

Dock; that the vessel could have entered the West India Dock, but that it was impossible to discharge in that dock at that time owing to a strike of lightermen; and that it was impossible for a vessel of the size of the Anton to discharge at a tier in the river.

The action was tried before Phillimore, J. without a jury as a commercial cause. The learned judge found as a fact that the defendants had used all reasonable means to procure for the vessel an opportunity to discharge as quickly as she could; that they were not liable for the short delay which took place after the vessel was alongside the quay; and that, with the appliances which were available at the time, the vessel could not have been discharged more quickly than she was in fact discharged; and judgment was given in favour of the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and D. C. Leek for the appellant.—The judgment of the learned judge was wrong, and ought to be reversed. Upon the true construction of clause 3 of the charter-party the time allowed for the discharge of the cargo ought to be calculated from the time when the vessel arrived and was ready to discharge, that is, from the 12th Oct. The construction of this charter-party is not governed by the series of cases which decide that the obligation of the receiver of the cargo is to discharge as quickly as he can with the appliances which are available, and to use all means to procure for the vessel an opportunity to discharge as quickly as can be done:

Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 42 L. T. Rep. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599;

Lyle Shipping Company v. Cardiff Corporation, 83 L. T. Rep. 329; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 128; (1900) 2 Q. B. 638;

Pyman v. Dreyfus, 61 L. T. Rep. 724; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 444; 24 Q. B. Div. 152;

Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morel, 65 L. T. Rep. 659; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 106; (1891) 2 Q. B. 647;

Hick v. Raymond, 68 L. T. Rep. 175; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1893) A. C. 22.

In those cases the charter-party was either entirely silent as to the time for discharge, or the obligation was to discharge as fast as possible under the circumstances with the special appliances available at the port. In the present case the obligation is to discharge as fast as the vessel is able to discharge without any reference to her ability to find a discharging berth, or to procure the use of special appliances:

Maclay and others v. Spillers and Baker Limited, 6 Com. Cas. 217.

This vessel was an arrived ship as soon as she got to Gravesend and was ready to go into dock:

Pyman v. Dreyfus, 61 L. T. Rep. 724; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 444; 24 Q. B. Div. 152.

She was then ready to go to a discharging berth, and the obligation of the receivers of the cargo was to find then a clear quay berth for her to discharge at, and their inability to do so does not absolve them from that obligation and from liability for the delay. Upon the proper construction of clause 3 of the charter-party the time for discharge is to be measured solely by the ship's capacity to deliver the cargo, independently of the state of the docks or quays. This is not in any sense a case in which the discharge is to be effected by special port appliances of limited quantity. In this charter-party there is, in clause 5, an express exception of liability for delay caused by strikes or lock-outs, and that shows that there are not any other exceptions in respect of other matters which may prevent the receiver of cargo from taking the cargo as fast as the vessel is able to deliver. The receiver of cargo takes the risk of every matter, except that expressly specified, which may prevent him taking delivery of the cargo as fast as the vessel can deliver.

HULTHEN v. STEWART AND Co.

Robson, K.C. and Loehnis, for the respondents.—The judgment of Phillimore, J., was right and in accordance with all the authorities. The contention of the appellant is that the respondents by this contract undertook the obligation to procure the discharge of the cargo as fast as the ship could deliver, whatever obstacles there might be to prevent that being done, strikes and lock-outs only excepted. That is not the proper business view of this contract. This particular charter-party has already been construed in several cases, besides the present case, by Barnes, J., Mathew, J., Bigham, J., and Kennedy, J.

The Jaederen, 68 L. T. Rep. 266; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 260; (1892) P. 351;

Rodenacker v. May and Hassell, 6 Com. Cas. 37;

Wallenberg v. Payne, unreported;

Reid v. Lee, 17 Times L. Rep. 771.

And in all those cases the learned judges have construed this charter-party in the same way as Phillimore, J. has construed it in the present case. Ever since the case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) was decided in 1888 the construction of the clause in a charter-party that the cargo shall be discharged "as fast as steamer can deliver" has always been that, looking at the circumstances of the port at the time, the discharge must be made as fast as it can reasonably be made. The appellant, however, is now contending that this provision means that the cargo must be discharged as fast as the steamer can deliver under the most favourable ordinary conditions of the port. It is now too late to contend for that construction, for the proper construction of this clause is now settled by a series of authorities and a continuous practice. The express exception in this charter-party in respect of strikes cannot alter the well settled construction of the previous clause; it was merely introduced ex majore cautela, and was not really necessary. This vessel had not performed the obligation to carry the cargo to the port of London until she had reached a place where, in the ordinary course and with the ordinary appliances which were available, she was ready to discharge, and could discharge, the cargo:

Nielsen v. Wait, James, and Co., 54 L. T. Rep. 344; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 553; 16 Q. B. Div. 67.

The learned judge has properly construed the charter-party, and has come to a right conclusion upon the facts.

Leck in reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Phillimore, J. at the trial of the action upon a claim by a shipowner for demurrage.

The question in this case really turns upon the construction of the charter-party, the material clause of which (clause 3) is in these terms: "The cargo to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports, Sundays, general, or local holidays (unless used) in both loading and discharging excepted. Should the steamer be detained beyond the time stipulated as above for loading or discharging, demurrage shall be paid at 30*l.* per day, and pro rata for any part thereof. The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary." It was also provided, in clause 5 of the charter-party, as follows: "If the cargo cannot be loaded or discharged by reason of a strike or lock-out of any class of workmen essential to the loading or discharge of the cargo, or by reason of epidemics (a strike or lock-out of the shippers' or receivers' men only shall not exonerate them from any demurrage for which they may be liable under this charter, if by the use of reasonable diligence they could have obtained other suitable labour), and in case of any delay by reason of the before-mentioned causes, no claim for damages shall be made by the shippers, the receivers of the cargo, the owners of the ship, or by any other party under this charter." The vessel arrived at the port of London and came, in effect, to the gates of the dock indicated by the defendants as the place of discharge. The state of that dock was such that it was impossible for the vessel to get into the dock for some time. Eventually the vessel did get into the dock, but there was then a further delay in getting a berth for discharging the cargo, owing to the crowded state of the dock. The same difficulty existed in the case of the other dock at which the vessel might have been unloaded, the West India Dock, because it was impossible to get lighters in that dock. The learned judge has found as a fact that when the vessel arrived at Gravesend there was no place to which she could have been ordered so as to be discharged without any delay; that Millwall Dock was full; that there was no tier at which this vessel could have safely discharged; and that the discharge could not have been carried out any more quickly at the West India Dock. He has also found that the defendants used all reasonable means to procure for the vessel an opportunity to discharge as quickly as she could; and that, with the appliances available at the time, the ship could not have discharged her cargo more quickly than she in fact did. Upon those findings the charterers did all they could reasonably be expected to do in order to get the cargo discharged as quickly as possible.

Then the question arises whether the defendants are liable for demurrage under the terms of the charter-party, although they have done all that it was reasonably possible for them to do. The only point made by the appellants is that, on the terms of clause 3, inasmuch as the cargo is to be discharged "as fast as the steamer can deliver," the proper time for the discharge of cargo can be ascertained in all ordinary cases, and that the proper time in this case would be six days. If the appellants can fix the time in that way, then there was an absolute burden upon the charterers to discharge within that time, and to pay demurrage if they did not unload within that time. Therefore the question is whether that clause in the charter-party is equivalent to a clause which expressly fixes the time for discharging the cargo. It is clear that it is not, and there is a clear line of authorities which show that it is not. It does not impose the same absolute unconditional obligation on the charterers as is imposed where a fixed number of days is allowed for discharging the cargo. There is, as I have said, a long line of authorities to that effect. The first is the case in the House of Lords, Hick v. Raymond (68 L. T. Rep. 175; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1893) A. C. 22), in which it was decided that, where a bill of lading is silent as to the time within which the consignee is to discharge the ship's cargo, his obligation is to discharge within a reasonable time; and that obligation is performed if he discharges the cargo within a time which is reasonable under the existing circumstances, assuming that those circumstances, in so far as they involve delay, are not caused or contributed to by him. That case really only followed the decision in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (42 L. T. Rep. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599), in which the words of the charter-party were, "the cargo is to be discharged with all dispatch according to the custom of the port," and those words were held not to be equivalent to a provision for discharge within a fixed number of days, and evidence of the circumstances of the case was admitted in order to show what was a reasonable time. It appears to me that the special difficulties which existed in those cases are not really material to the question. It seems to me that there was not anything particular about the actual difficulties in discharging the cargo in those cases. When once it appears that the receiver of the cargo is outside of the absolute obligation to discharge within a fixed number of days, the question then is whether he did all that he reasonably could do to procure the discharge of the cargo. The particular facts of the case are not really material. With respect to the words which were used in the different cases, the words in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup) were "with all dispatch," and stronger words than those could not be used. In the case of Lyle Shipping Company v. Cardiff Corporation (83 L. T. Rep. 329; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 128; (1900) 2 Q. B. 638), the words were, "the ship to be discharged with all dispatch as customary"; in the Scotch case of Wyllie v. Harrison (13 Court Sess. Cas. 4th series, 92) the words were, "as fast as the steamer can deliver after having been berthed, as customary"; and in Good v. Isaacs (67 L. T. Rep. 450; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212; (1892) 2 Q. B. 555) the words were, "to be discharged at usual fruit berth as fast as the steamer can deliver, as customary, and where ordered by the charterers." The only way in which the appellant in the present case tried to distinguish this case from those cases was by showing that the particular conditions existing in those cases were not the same as those in the present case. But in the present case the learned judge has found that the defendants exercised all reasonable means to procure for the vessel an opportunity to discharge as quickly as she could, and the evidence clearly justifies that finding. There is, therefore, authority that this evidence can be admitted in cases where it is stipulated that the cargo is to be discharged "as fast as the steamer can deliver." That concludes the whole case. This vessel got to the dock gates and, if the cargo had to be discharged within a fixed number of days, she was then an arrived ship, and the lay days would have begun from that time. But as the number of days was not fixed, assuming that she was an arrived ship, the question has to be considered whether she was detained beyond a reasonable time. Upon the finding of the learned judge she was not so detained, because it was impossible for the consignees to discharge the cargo more quickly than they did. It remains to observe that a charter-party in this form has come under the consideration of Barnes, J. in The Jaederen (68 L. T. Rep. 266; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 260; (1892) P. 351), of Mathew, J. in Rodenacker v. May and Hassell (6 Com. Cas. 37), of Bigham, J. in Wallenberg v. Payne (unreported), and of Kennedy, J. in Reid v. Lee (17 Times L. Rep. 771), and that all of those learned judges have taken the same view of the question.

I think that I ought to refer to the argument of the appellant based upon the existence of the strike clause in this charter-party, for I think that it does found some argument for the appellant. According to the argument of the respondents that clause was really unnecessary. In some of the cases to which I have referred there was a strike clause, but the existence of that clause did not alter the construction of the clause as to the discharge of the cargo. The words of this clause as to the discharge of cargo are clear of themselves, and it would not be fair to use the fact that the common strike clause has been inserted so as to alter the meaning of the clear words as to the discharge of cargo and prevent the application of the series of authorities as to its meaning. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the learned judge was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Upon the question of the construction of clause 3 of the charter-party, in my opinion it cannot be distinguished from the clause in the charter-party in the case of Lyle Shipping Company v. Cardiff Corporation (ubi sup). In that case all the authorities were considered, and they have all been referred to again to-day, and I adhere to what I said in that case as to the settled result of the authorities. This case, therefore, is really governed by the decision in Lyle Shipping Company v. Cardiff Corporation (ubi sup), except only as to the argument founded upon the strike clause. No doubt that clause was unnecessary, considering the construction which has been placed upon the other clause as to discharge of cargo. It would, in my opinion, be wrong to say that the strike clause was a necessary clause so as to give a different effect to the well settled construction of the earlier clause which has been established by the authorities. Such a construction ought to be avoided in the case of charter-parties; additions to and alterations in a charter party are made from time to time without duly considering what effect they may have upon other clauses in the charter-party, and it would be rash to say, in the case of a charter-party, that every clause must be taken to be necessary and upon that hypothesis to hold that they affect other clauses which have a well-settled construction and meaning. The construction of this clause is well settled, and therefore this appeal must fail because it is impossible to differ from the judgment of Phillimore, J., who came to the conclusion that the discharge of the cargo had been taken with all reasonable dispatch. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I should have thought that by this time the meaning of this common clause in charter-party was well known and settled. We have, however, been once more brought to the consideration of this clause and of all the authorities. The clause in this charter-party is as follows: "The cargo to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the customs of the respective ports. . . . The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterer's risk and expense as customary." It is contended that "customary steamship dispatch" in this case means five days because the cargo could be discharged from this steamer within five days. I cannot so construe this clause. The vessel had arrived at the dock gates. What then is the meaning of "the cargo to be discharged with customary steamship dispatch as fast as the steamer can deliver?" In Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) light was thrown upon the meaning of this provision, and in the numerous cases which followed—Good v. Isaacs (ubi sup.), Lyle Shipping Company v. Cardiff Corporation (ubi sup.), The Jaederen (ubi sup.), Wallenberg v. Payne (ubi sup.), and Reid v. Lee (ubi sup.)—the same principle was adopted, and it was held that the shortest time within which the cargo could be discharged applied in ordinary circumstances but not in extraordinary circumstances. In my opinion we must put the same construction upon this clause as was put upon similar clauses in the numerous decided cases. So much for the construction of the clause. A further argument was urged that, because of the existence of the strike clause, the charterers were made liable for anything else which might prevent the discharge of the cargo. That would, I think, be an utterly unreasonable construction. This strike clause was not intended to deprive the charterer of the protection to which he is entitled upon the ordinary meaning of the well-known clause as to discharge of cargo. I agree that this appeal fails, and must be dismissed. Appeal dismissed.

MONTGOMERY AND Co. v. INDEMNITY MUTUAL MARINE ASSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—General average—Assured owner of both ship and cargo—Insurance on cargo—Sacrifice of mast—Right of assured to recover under policy—Liability of underwriter on cargo.

The fact that the assured under a policy of marine insurance on cargo is owner of the ship as well as owner of the cargo does not prevent him from recovering under the policy from the underwriters on the cargo in respect of a general average loss, as a general average act does not depend on the consideration whether there can be any contribution or not as between the respective interests.

The Brigella (69 L. T. Rep. 834; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; (1893) P. 189) disapproved.

A loss caused by the cutting away of the mast of a ship, which by the master's orders is cut away for the safety of the whole adventure, but which at the time it is cut away is not hopelessly lost and might be saved, is a general average sacrifice for which underwriters of a policy on the cargo against perils of the seas are liable to contribute, and they are none the less liable because the assured are owners of both ship and cargo.

Decision of Mathew, J. (84 L. T. Rep. 57; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 141; (1901) 1 K. B. 147) affirmed.

THIS action was brought by the plaintiffs, the owners of the ship Airlie and her cargo, to recover from the defendants a general average loss under a policy of marine insurance on cargo effected by the defendants; alternatively, to recover the defendants' proportion of suing and labouing expenses to avert a total loss of the insured cargo.

The insurance was against perils of the seas and other losses of the same character, and the policy contained the ordinary sue and labour clause, and a provision that general average was payable as per foreign statement or York and Antwerp rules, if so made up.

During the voyage the ship encountered very bad weather, and the main mast, which was of iron and hollow, settled down. The mast, however, was secured and remained in its position.

As the ship continued to roll, the master, fearing that the mast would break and so cause the loss of the vessel, ordered it to be cut away, and it was cut away and fell over the side.

The plaintiffs sought to recover, under their policy on the cargo, a general average loss incurred by the cutting away of the mast, as they contended that the cutting away of the mast was under the circumstances, a general average sacrifice, rendered necessary by the perils of the seas insured against.

The defendants said that the cutting away of the mast was not a general average sacrifice, and gave rise to no general average claim; that, as the plaintiffs were owners of both ship and cargo there could be no contribution to general average as between ship and cargo, and therefore the plaintiffs could not claim under the policy on the cargo, and that the sue and labour clause did not apply.

(a) Reported by W. C. BISS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case was heard by Mathew, J., who held (84 L. T. Rep. 57; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 141; (1901) 1 K. B. 147) that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover a general average loss, thus differing from the opinion of Barnes, J. in The Brigella (69 L. T. Rep. 834; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; (1893) P. 189).

The defendants appealed.

Scrutton, K.C. and Loehnis for the appellants.—When the master ordered the mast to be cut away he believed it to be a wreck, and it was cut away to avoid the loss of the ship. There was, therefore, no general sacrifice in this case. The plaintiffs have no claim for general average loss against the underwriters on the cargo. They are the owners of both ship and cargo, and have not as cargo owners paid, and are not liable to pay, contribution to general average. The right to general average depends on the right of contribution as between ship and cargo. Where the same person is the owner of both, there can be no claim for general average. General average assumes separate persons whose property is at stake sharing the loss of one whose property was sacrificed for the benefit of the others, and that gives him a right of contribution from the other persons. Where there is no right of contribution the loss is not a general average loss, but a particular average loss. This case is within the judgment of Barnes, J. in The Brigella (69 L. T. Rep. 834; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; (1893) P. 189). The decision of Moran v. Jones (7 Ell. & B. 503) was considered in Walthev v. Mavrojani (22 L. T. Rep. 310; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 382; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 116), and Bovill, C.J. says it was decided on the special facts of that case. A general average loss cannot be recovered under the sue and labour clause:

Carver, K.C. and J. A. Hamilton, K.C. for the respondents.—This is not a question of general average pure and simple. The question is what is the bearing of the doctrine of general average on this policy, what risk does the underwriter take? The cutting away of the mast was an act done for the safety of the whole adventure, the crew, cargo, and ship, and was therefore a general average sacrifice. A right of contribution is not essential to a claim to general average. The decision of Barnes, J. in The Brigella (ubi sup.) is wrong. The right to general average does not depend upon the right to contribution, and the right to recover here is not under the sue and labour clause. The obligation of the underwriters to contribute to general average is not under that clause but under the law maritime: (per Lord Blackburn in Aitchison v. Lohre, 41 L. T. Rep. 323, 326; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 168; 4 App. Cas. 755, 764; and Oppenheim v. Fry, 8 L. T. Rep. 385, 387; 3 B. & S. 873, 884). The same principle is laid down in two American cases, Potter v. Ocean Insurance Company (3 Sumner, 27) and Greely v. Tremont Insurance Company (9 Cushing, 415), and also in the text-books, Emerigon (Meredith's edition), c. 12, s. 39; Phillips on Insurance, sects. 1274, 1412; Benecke on Marine Insurance, p. 473. The practice of average staters has always been to adjust general average irrespective of whether or not the different interests are owned by the same person. The dictum of Lord Campbell in Moran v. Jones (7 Ell. & B. 523, 533) is in favour of the respondents. They also referred to

March 25.—The written judgment of the court was delivered by WILLIAMS, L.J.—This case raises a question of great importance. The circumstances of the case are such as, it is admitted, would give rise to a general average claim if the ship and cargo belonged to different owners; but it is said that there can be no general average claim, because the ship and cargo both belonged to the plaintiffs, and as there could be no contribution there was no general average loss. Mathew, J. has held that a general average act is not affected by the consideration whether there will be a contribution or not. This holding is contrary to the opinion expressed by Barnes, J. in The Brigella (ubi sup.); and we have now to consider which view is the right view. We agree with the view of Mathew, J. (now Mathew, L.J.), and, moreover, agree so entirely with the reasons he has given for the conclusion at which he has arrived that we should not feel it necessary to add a word to those reasons if it were not that we think we ought to deal particularly with the reasons expressed by Barnes, J. in his judgment in The Brigella, and ought to state the principles upon which we think the law of general average loss should be based. As we understand the judgment of Barnes, J., he is of opinion, first, that there cannot be a general average act, or a general average loss, unless there are separate interests in the maritime adventure, because contribution is of the essence of the maritime law of general average; and there cannot be contribution unless there is diversity of interests; and we understand him to go further and say that even if there be a general average act in a case where ship, cargo, and freight belong to one adventurer only, yet the law of contribution cannot be applied, for the right of contribution only belongs to the adventurer who had an interest at risk against an adventurer whose goods have been saved by the general average act, and that it is impossible for an adventurer to enforce by legal proceedings a claim against himself in respect of the salvage of one part of his property by the sacrifice of another. It is said that such a right, if it existed, could only be enforced by the adventurer suing himself, which is impossible. It is said, further, that the fact that the ship, freight, and cargo have been insured with different underwriters can make no difference, because the only interest which the underwriters have is a subrogated right which they must enforce, if at all, in the name of the assured, as the owner of the property sacrificed, by the general average act against the same person, as the owner of the property saved by that sacrifice. It is said that the obligation to contribute in general average exists between the parties to the adventure, whether they are insured or not, and that the circumstance of a party being insured had no influence upon the adjustment of the general average. It seems to us that the question whether contribution is of the essence of a general average loss or a mere incident of it must depend upon the occasion which is a condition of such an act. It is not, we think, true to say that it is only the danger to the ship, freight or cargo, which necessitates and justifies sacrifice by the master of either a portion of the cargo or a portion of the ship. This may be done in fear of death, and if it is done upon a proper occasion all must contribute to the loss. If there be one owner of ship, freight, and cargo he will bear it all. If there be several, each will contribute according to the value of his interest. The object of this maritime law seems to be to give the master of the ship absolute freedom to make what sacrifice he thinks best to avert the perils of the sea, without any regard whatsoever to the ownership of the property sacrificed; and in our judgment such a sacrifice is a general average act quite independently of unity or diversity of ownership.

Assuming that the general average act and the general average loss can occur independently of contribution, there still remains the question whether the underwriters on a policy on cargo can be held liable to pay to an owner of ship and cargo, by reason of his insurance of cargo, the contribution which the cargo owner, if he had been another person than the shipowner, would have had to pay the shipowner in respect of the general average loss incurred by cutting away the mast. It is said that the shipowner could not have recovered against himself as cargo owner this contribution, and that, as the only liability of the underwriter on cargo is to pay as a general average loss a contribution which the cargo owner could be compelled to pay, he has no obligation to recoup the cargo owner a contribution which he has not paid and could not be compelled to pay. In other words, it is said that, as the cargo owner has suffered no loss he can therefore claim no indemnity. If this is the true view, the converse view would also seem to be true—viz., that the underwriter on a policy on the ship must pay the whole of the ship's loss by the general average sacrifice without getting the benefit of any contribution from cargo belonging to the shipowner which had the benefit of the sacrifice. But we do not think that this is the true view. We will take first the case of the shipowner who has insured his ship, and there has been a general average sacrifice and loss by cutting away the masts to avert the instant perils of the sea. We will assume there is cargo on board belonging to the shipowner. What is the liability of the underwriter on the policy on the ship? It seems to us that his liability is to pay the loss incurred by cutting away the masts less the contribution by the shipowner on account of the cargo. I see nothing in Dickenson v. Jardine (ubi sup.) to prevent this, because the shipowner has already in his pocket his own contribution as cargo owner, and his loss is ascertained to be the costs of replacing the masts less his own contribution as cargo owner. It will be observed that in Dickenson v. Jardine jettison was expressly covered by the policy, and the assured had not received the contributions of the other owners, and that therefore the underwriters could, upon indemnifying the assured, recover the contributions in his name, whereas in a case like the present the assured has in his pocket his own contribution, so that there is no contribution to be recovered, and the assured's loss has been pro tanto reduced before he makes any claim on the underwriters. But suppose he has effected a policy on cargo. What is the liability of the underwriters of the policy on cargo? Surely they are liable to pay the loss of the shipowner by reason of the deduction made by the underwriters of the policy on the ship in respect of the shipowner's contribution as the owner of the cargo; and mutatis mutandis a similar result is arrived at if the general average sacrifice is by jettison of cargo, and ship and cargo have a common owner. With regard to the right of the underwriter, when the assured is owner of ship and cargo, to deduct the contribution due from the ship or cargo, as the case may be, we will quote the words of Shaw, C.J. in Greeley v. Tremont Insurance Company (9 Cushing, 419), who, after stating that the underwriter is liable directly to the assured for a loss in its nature a general average loss, that is, resulting from a voluntary sacrifice, without waiting to collect the contributory shares from other persons, says: "But the rule does not apply where the assured is owner of the vessel and cargo. Then, as owner of the cargo, being bound to contribute, he is deemed to have the contribution in his own hands, and therefore is clearly pro tanto indemnified, and cannot collect of the underwriters a sum of money to be recovered back by the underwriter himself." It seems to us that this passage is quite right and a working out of the principle on which the law of the general average is based. This view seems to us to obviate any difficulty arising from the fact that a man cannot sue himself and from the legal proposition that the only right of the underwriters in respect of collection of contributions is to sue in the name of the assured. There is nothing in this conclusion contrary to any English authority. It is true that no English case expressly decides the point. But there is a dictum of Lord Campbell in Moran v. Jones (ubi sup.), and an opinion of Blackburn, J. in Oppenheim v. Fry (ubi sup.). In the former case Lord Campbell said (7 El. & B. 533): "And, where there are separate insurances on ship and freight, the calculation must be made as to the amount of the contribution by each, although the whole freight which was in peril is to be received by the owner of the ship, and without insurance the whole of the loss would fall upon him." And in the latter case Blackburn, J. said (8 L. T. Rep. 387; 3 B. & S. 884): "I think it is not necessary for the decision of this case to say whether the extraordinary expenditure was general average or not, though I have a strong impression that, where a voluntary sacrifice is made for the benefit of the whole adventure, it is general average; whether the ship and cargo and freight belong to one only or to different adventurers." Against this there is the opinion of Barnes, J. expressed in The Brigella (ubi sup.). American authority, as we have already said, is strongly in favour of the view expressed by Mathew, J., and the whole question is well discussed by Story, C.J. in his judgment in Potter v. Ocean Insurance Company. He says (3 Sumner, 39): "But the argument is that here there was no cargo on board, and that there can be no contribution by freight or cargo; but the whole is to be borne by the ship; and that therefore it is a particular average on the ship and not a general average. The argument proceeds upon the ground that what is and what is not a general average, does not depend upon the nature and objects of the thing done, or sacrifice made, for the general good; but solely upon the point whether there are in fact different contributory subjects. I do not so understand the law. As I understand it, the rule as to what constitutes a general average or not, is founded upon the consideration whether it is for the benefit of all who are or may be interested in the accomplishment of the voyage; or only for the benefit of a particular party. Suppose a person to be owner of the ship and cargo, and, of course, ultimately of the freight also, and he should insure the ship, cargo, and freight in three different policies by different offices, if a jettison should be made or a mast be cut away, or any other sacrifice be made for the common benefit of all concerned in the voyage, there can be no doubt that this would be a case of general average, and the underwriters on ship, cargo, and freight must all contribute as for a general average. What possible difference in such a case could it make that the same underwriters were underwriters in one policy on the ship, cargo, and freight; or that the owner singly had no insurance at all, or an insurance upon one only of the subjects put at hazard? Must not the loss still be treated in the contemplation of the law as a general average or in the nature of a general average? As I understand it, the phrase 'general average,' as found in our policies of insurance, is used in contradistinction to particular average. It means a voluntary sacrifice for the benefit of the voyage, and not merely an involuntary encounter of a loss without action or design. It looks to the efficient cause of the loss, and not to the effects of it. It looks to the consideration, whether the act is intended for the benefit of all concerned in the voyage, and not in particular to the consideration who are to contribute towards the indemnity.

To be sure, if the owner stands as his own insurer throughout, the question degenerates into a mere distinction, for it is a pure speculative inquiry. Not so when there is an insurance; for in such a case the underwriters are pro tanto benefited by the sacrifice or other act done, and they are in a just sense bound to contribute towards it." We have only to add generally that, in our judgment, the underwriters have throughout the adventure such inchoate property and liability to loss as to make it right, within the true principle of the law of general average, that upon the adjustment their right to contribution and their loss as underwriters, as the case may be, should be taken into consideration in the final account. Moreover, it is further worthy of observation that the view of the law which we have taken agrees with the practice of average-staters and underwriters, both before and since the decision in The Brigella and this practice is, in my opinion, really essential if the spirit of the law of general average is to be applied to the conditions of navigation of the present day. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN TYRER AND CO. AND HESSLER AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Time charter at periodical payments in advance—Power reserved to owners on default of payment to withdraw vessel—Waiver—Estoppel—Evidence.

By a charter-party a ship was let for nine months, the charterers to pay for the hire of the ship at an agreed rate, fortnightly in advance, and in default of such payment the owners to have the faculty of withdrawing the ship from the service of the charterers. The owners were to pay the wages of captain and crew, but the charterers were to pay for coals, port-charges, &c., and the captain was to be under their orders and directions as regarded employment. After the charterers had had the use of the ship for two months they made default in making the fortnightly payment due on the 21st June. The ship was then on a voyage to S. where she arrived on the 25th, and while there the captain telegraphed to H. to order the cargo to be ready. After lying two days at S. the ship started on the 27th for H. On the 28th the owners gave notice to the charterers of their withdrawal of the ship by reason of the charterers' default in the payment due on the 21st.

Held, reversing the judgment of the King's Bench Division (84 L. T. Rep. 653; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 186), that upon these facts there was no evidence of any waiver by the shipowners of their right to withdraw the vessel, nor of any conduct on their part estopping them from insisting on their right.

CT. OF APP.] Re ARBITRATION BETWEEN TYRER & CO. AND HESSLER & CO. [CT. OF APP.]

This was an appeal by Hessler and Co. from a judgment of the King's Bench Division (Kennedy and Phillimore, JJ.) upon an award in the form of a special case stated by arbitrators for the opinion of the court.

By a charter-party dated the 13th Feb. 1900 and made between Hessler and Co., as owners, and Tyrer and Co., as charterers, the steamship Lagom was let by the owners to the charterers "for the term of about nine calendar months."

The charter-party provided that the owners should pay the wages of the captain and crew, and that the charterers should pay for the hire of the vessel at the rate of 425*l.* per calendar month, commencing on the day of delivery, and at the same rate for any part of a month, "payment to be made in cash fortnightly in advance to owners in West Hartlepool, and in default of such payment or payments, as herein specified, the owners or their agents shall have the faculty of withdrawing the said steamer from the service of the charterers"; and that the charterers should provide and pay for all the coals, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, expenses of loading and unloading, and that the captain, although appointed by the owners, should be under the orders and directions of the charterers as regarded employment.

The ship was handed over to the charterers on the 6th April 1900, and on that day the first fortnight's payment in advance was duly made. The second payment was due on the 20th April, and was paid on the 27th April. The third payment was due on the 6th May, and was paid on the 10th May. The fourth payment was due on the 20th, and was paid on the 26th May. The fifth payment was due on the 6th, and was paid on the 11th June.

No complaint was ever made by the owners about the hire not being paid on the day when it was due, and no suggestion was ever made that, if the hire was not paid on the actual date when it became due, the vessel would be withdrawn from the service of the charterers.

On the 21st June another fortnight's hire became due in advance. No application for payment thereof was made, and no debit note was sent therefor, and no intimation was given that if the hire was not paid the vessel would be withdrawn from the charterers' service.

On the 21st June the vessel had just commenced a voyage from Burntisland to Stockholm on the charterers' account. She arrived at Stockholm on the 25th June, and lay there until the 27th, when she proceeded to Hernösand to load her homeward cargo on the charterers' account. While at Stockholm the master telegraphed to Hernösand to order the cargo for the steamer to be ready.

On the 28th June the owners telegraphed to the charterers that, as they had not received the hire due on the 21st, they withdrew the steamer in accordance with the charter.

Prior to this telegram the owners never demanded payment of the hire or sent a debit note.

The dispute between the owners and the charterers as to the right of the owners to act in this way was referred to arbitration.

The arbitrators found as a fact that the owners had waived the immediate and punctual payment of the hire, and ought to have demanded payment of the hire before withdrawing the vessel from the service of the charterers; and that the withdrawal was not bonâ fide for the purpose of enforcing payment of the hire, freights at the time of the withdrawal having greatly increased; and that the withdrawal was an unlawful act on the part of the owners for which the charterers were entitled to damages.

The award was stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court, the question being whether, under the facts above stated, the owners were entitled to withdraw the ship from the service of the charterers.

The King's Bench Division (Kennedy and Phillimore, JJ.) were of opinion that the withdrawal was unlawful, and gave judgment for the charterers.

The owners appealed.

J. A. Hamilton K.C. (Bigham with him) for the owners.—The arbitrators have not found, nor is there in the facts any evidence that the owners waived their right to rescind. Nor have the owners done anything which could be construed as an intimation to the charterers that punctual payment would not be required so as to induce the charterers to alter their position by incurring expenses in dealing with the ship. The charter-party contains no provision that the owners shall give any notice to the charterers before demanding payment. The captain, so far as his employment is concerned, is, by the terms of the charter-party, under the orders and disposition of the charterers, and the fact of his continuing the voyage after the 21st June cannot be made use of as though he were for that purpose the "owner's" agent. The charterers chose to continue the voyage, knowing that they were in default with the payment; and what they did they did at their own risk. In the court below reliance was placed upon two cases:

Nova Scotia Steel Company Limited v. Sutherland Steam Shipping Company Limited, 5 Com. Cas. 106;

Williams v. Stern, 42 L. T. Rep. 719; 5 Q. B. Div. 409.

Carver, K.C. (Bateson with him) for the charterers.—The owners have waived their right to withdraw the ship. If they intended to exercise their right they should have given notice to the charterers on the 21st June. They allowed the ship to continue her voyage when they could by telegraphing have stopped her at once, and in consequence of their refraining to do so the charterers incurred expenses in dealing with the ship. Even if they were not bound to exercise their option on the 21st June, they ought to have exercised it within a reasonable time after. The master of the ship was their servant, and they were bound by his acts in continuing the voyage after the charterers had made default. A forfeiture clause such as this one on which the owners rely should be construed strictly against them. The same principles should be applied as those which at common law apply to a forfeiture for nonpayment of rent.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment this appeal must succeed. I agree with the decision of the Divisional Court in so far as the learned judges there held that there was no necessity for a demand of payment being made by the shipowners before they were entitled to exercise their power of rescinding the charter-party. The sole question is whether on the facts stated in the special case there is any evidence of a waiver by the ship-owners of their power of rescission. In my opinion there is none. It was contended on behalf of the charterers that the owners' power of rescinding the contract ceased to exist unless the owners exercised it the moment they became entitled to it. There are no words in the charter-party requiring any such immediate exercise of the power, but it was argued that the owners' failure to exercise the power was evidence that they waived their right. I cannot agree to that. The argument involves this, that if the owners held their hand at all, while the expenses of the ship were going on, that of necessity operated as a waiver of their right to rescind. Reliance was placed upon the way in which the ship was employed between the 21st and the 28th June, and it was said that because the master of the ship was for some purposes the servant of the shipowners, the employment of the ship in that week amounted to a waiver by the shipowners of their right to withdraw the vessel. To my mind the facts show nothing of the sort. The charter-party expressly provides that the captain is to be under the orders and directions of the charterers as regards employment, so that what was done by him in prosecuting the voyage from the 21st to the 28th June was done under the orders and directions of the charterers. There is no ground whatever for relying on the mere lapse of time during which the owners held their hand as showing that the charterers were induced to alter their position by the conduct of the owners. The charterers were in default, and they must have known that they were in default, yet they ran the risk, and chose to go on and take the course they did. For these reasons I think that the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is possibly a hard case upon the charterers, but to my mind the question as it arises on this charter-party is perfectly clear. There is no provision in the charter-party that the owners, before exercising their right to rescind on default being made in payment of the hire, must give notice to the charterers and demand payment. Nor can any such term be implied in this agreement. The charterers knew that the owners had a right to rescind the moment default was made in paying the hire. In a mercantile contract of this sort the court cannot imply a term that the owners must take any such steps as those which the charterers suggest before insisting on their right to rescind, which arises in consequence of the charterers' default. I think that the owners were entitled to exercise their right without giving any prior notice to the charterers requiring payment. The charterers therefore can only succeed here by showing that the shipowners have waived their right or have estopped themselves from exercising their right. In my opinion there is nothing in the facts before us to justify the court in taking either view. The shipowners have done nothing at all. The master of the ship, in carrying out his duties as master and continuing the voyage of the vessel in accordance with the orders of the charterers, has not done anything which can be considered as an active step on the part of the owners bearing any relation to the question before us. The owners themselves have done nothing except to give the charterers a week's time in which to pay the money due from them. That is not such a delay as to justify the court in holding that the owners intended to abandon or waive their right of rescinding the charter-party. In my opinion, as at present advised, it would not be unreasonable for a shipowner, in a case like the present, to allow the charterers some little time in which to pay the money due before exercising a right to determine the charter-party. I should be sorry to hold that the owner lost his right unless he acted with absolute promptitude.

Then it is said that when the owners gave time to the charterers they must have known that the charterers would probably go on making use of the ship and incurring expenses in her management. The owners are therefore, it is argued, estopped from now insisting on their right. But, as the owners had given time to the charterers to pay, the charterers must be taken to have known that what they did in that time was done at their own risk. How can the charterers now say that their continued working of the ship during a period when they knew that the charter-party was liable to be determined by reason of their own default has given them a right of depriving the owners of their power of rescission? I see no ground for saying that the owners lost their power of rescinding the charter-party, and I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the words of the charter-party I think that the matter is clear. Nothing could have been easier than to have inserted in the agreement a clause that the power of withdrawing the ship should not be exercised except within so many hours after a demand for the hire in arrear. But no such provision is to be found in the agreement, so that on the plain construction of the document no notice on the part of the shipowners was here necessary before they exercised their right of rescission. That right was simply one given to the owners to put an end to the charter-party. It is a misdescription to talk of "forfeiture," and it is out of place to discuss the law as to the forfeiture of a lease for non-payment of rent with the view of explaining a mercantile contract of this kind. The intention of the parties as shown by the agreement clearly is that, without giving any notice, the owners were to have the right of determining it in case of default by the charterers in paying the hire. Then it was said that the circumstances set out in the special case are evidence of a waiver, and an estoppel of the owner's right. Reliance was placed on the fact that after the charterers had made default the master of the ship went on with the voyage, and it is said that the master was the agent of the owners. The answer to that is that by the express terms of the charter party the master was under the orders and directions of the charterers as regards his employment. I see no evidence on which we could say that the owners waived, or were estopped from exercising their right, and I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

THE OIVINGDEAN GRANGE.

Wednesday, June 18, 1902.

(Before COLLINS, M.R., MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.J.J., and NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.)

THE OIVINGDEAN GRANGE. (a)

Collision—Contributory negligence—Thames Bye-laws, 1898, bye-law 47.

The steamship F., proceeding down the river Thames against the tide, committed a breach of bye-law 47 of the Thames Bye-laws in neglecting to wait at B. point until the steamship O. G., which was coming up with the tide, and which at the time was turning in the river preparatory to entering a dock, had passed clear. A collision occurred.

Held, that although the O. G. was to blame for not keeping a proper look-out and for turning without proper care, the F. was also to blame for hindering the manœuvres of the O. G. by not obeying the rule, and so contributing to the collision.

The judgment of the President (Sir F. Jeune) affirmed.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs, the owners of the Norwegian steamship Forsete, from a judgment of the President (Sir F. Jeune) pronouncing that vessel partly in fault for a collision between the Forsete and the defendants' steamship Ovingdean Grange.

The case is reported 85 L. T. Rep. 344; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 242; (1901) P. 127.

The Forsete was a wooden steamship of 526 tons gross register, and at the time of the collision was on a voyage from London to Grimsby in ballast.

The Ovingdean Grange was a steamship of 2413 tons gross register, and was on a voyage from Antwerp to Buenos Ayres, via London, with a general cargo and two passengers.

The collision occurred about 8.30 a.m. on the 22nd Aug. 1900 off Blackwall Point, Blackwall Reach, river Thames. The weather at the time was clear, the wind a fresh breeze from the S.W., and the tide one-third flood of the force of about two knots an hour.

The Forsete was coming down the river keeping to the southward of mid-channel, making four to five knots through the water. The Ovingdean Grange, having previously sounded four blasts on her whistle as a signal that she was about to turn in the river, and then three more as her engines were put astern, was swinging under a port helm with a tug towing on her starboard bow preparatory to entering the West India Dock.

The movements of the Forsete were hampered by a sailing barge coming up river, which passed close under her stern and struck her, and prevented the Forsete from porting and going under the stern of the Ovingdean Grange as she might otherwise have done. The Forsete struck the Ovingdean Grange on the port side about the main rigging.

It was admitted that the Forsete had neglected to stop and wait above Blackwall Point in breach of bye-law 47 of the Thames bye-laws.

Bye-law 47 of the Bye-Laws for the Regulation of the River Thames 1898 is as follows:

Steam vessels navigating against the tide shall before rounding the following points, viz.: . . . Blackwall Point, wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear.

The President (Sir F. Jeune) found both vessels to blame.

Pickford, K.C. and Stubbs (Aspinall, K.C. with them) for the appellants.

Laing, K.C. (Dawson Miller with him) for the respondents.

Pickford, K.C. in reply.

The following cases were referred to

Cayzer, Irvine, and Co. v. Carron Company; The Margaret, 52 L. T. Rep. 361; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 371; 9 App. Cas. 873;

The Sanspareil, 82 L. T. Rep. 606; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 78; (1900), P. 267.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of the learned President brought on behalf of the steamship Forsete. The learned President has found that the Ovingdean Grange was to blame, because she did not keep a sufficient look-out. He has also found that the Forsete is to blame, because the Forsete violated a rule of the Thames, and if she had regarded it she would not have been in the place where the collision actually occurred; and he has found as a fact, that, being in the place where she was, and having regard to the other circumstances, namely, the presence of barges there also, she hampered the Ovingdean Grange in carrying out the manœuvre she was attempting to carry out, and therefore it placed on the Ovingdean Grange, in order to avoid a collision, the obligation of taking more than ordinary care, which is a greater obligation than that which can be insisted upon by the owners of the Forsete. The circumstances are these: The Forsete was going down the river and approaching Blackwall Point. The Ovingdean Grange was coming up the river and was about to go into dock, and when she got opposite Blackwall Point she found it necessary to turn round. She had a steam tug in attendance which assisted her in the operation of turning round and going into the dock, which was further up the river. The Forsete was coming down the river as I have said, and under art. 47 of the Thames Bye-laws it is thus provided: [The learned judge then read the rule.] The Forsete saw the Ovingdean Grange, and the Forsete slowed, it is true, but as a matter of fact she continued upon her course and found herself in the position at which the collision ultimately took place, when it did take place. The learned judge has found that in not having waited within the meaning of that rule she did wrong; and that she did not wait in the sense of waiting until the manœuvre which the other vessel was carrying out was over is clear from the facts proved. It is clear she went on, and it seems to me, and the learned President has so found, that in going on she took the risk of hampering the manœuvre which the Ovingdean Grange was carrying out. The President has found that the Ovingdean Grange, in carrying out this manœuvre, was guilty of negligence and did not keep a sufficient look-out, but he does not find, and it is not contended, there was any element of negligence—that is to say, that she was wrong in turning at that place. He does not find that she came more than midway over towards the southern side. She was in charge of the tug, and is a large vessel, and obviously it would not be just, with any particular degree of nicety, to decide what particular area she was entitled to cover. Therefore it is not suggested there was any negligence either in the place or manner in which she carried out this manœuvre, but the President has found that she did not keep a sufficient look-out, and he visited that upon her. If the Forsete had not contributed, in the sense of negligence on her part, to the collision, then the Forsete would clearly have been free from blame. But the collision takes place, and the Forsete is claiming damages against a vessel which the President has found to have been negligent. Then comes the question, What about the position of the Forsete herself? She broke the rule, but though she broke it, that in itself, as he properly says, does not alter the position of the Forsete—not in itself alone—but it is a factor in determining whether what the Forsete did, did form part of the negligence which brought about the collision. It is clear, on the President's finding, that the Forsete ought not to have been where she was at the time of the collision. That, again, is not enough, but he goes on to find that the fact that the Forsete was there, coupled with the fact that a couple of barges were there also—all these things together complicated the manœuvre which the Ovingdean Grange was carrying out in such a way that she was hampered by the act of the Forsete. The Forsete was wrong in being there, and the fact of her being there, with the fact that the barges were interfering with her when she was there, made it difficult for her to avoid the consequences of her own wrongdoing. She ought to have waited, and by not waiting she found herself in the presence of this manœuvre, and was then hampered by the presence of the barges. In those circumstances the President has found that the wrongful act of the Forsete did in fact contribute to the difficulty of the Ovingdean Grange, and cast upon her a burden greater than in point of law she is bound to bear; that is to say, cast upon her the burden of using more than ordinary care to avoid collision with the Forsete. In other words, he finds that the Ovingdean Grange could not by ordinary care have avoided collision with the Forsete.

(a) Reported by CHRISTOPHER HEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

If that be the fact, it does not matter that the Ovingdean Grange was negligent, because had she been diligent, had she used ordinary care, she would nevertheless have met with this collision. It is not disputed, I think, that the President has directed himself according to law. It seems to me, certainly, that he has directed himself exactly in accordance with law. I do not think it is material on this part of the discussion to consider whether or not the burden is thrown upon the Forsete of showing that her negligence did not contribute to the collision. In any case, we have got past that stage of the burden of proof. We are now dealing with all the facts proved before us, and whichever side the burden of proof is upon, the question is now gone. We have all the evidence before us, and our assessors are clear upon the matter that the actual circumstances of the Forsete having got to the position she was in at the time the Ovingdean Grange was carrying out this manœuvre, did hamper the Ovingdean Grange and require from her a higher degree of care than ordinary. It is said that there was not evidence upon which the President could have found what he did find. It seems to me that that really is based upon a conclusion which the learned President does not seem to have drawn. He does find, undoubtedly, that the Ovingdean Grange was well over towards the southern side, but that is quite compatible with her not being nearly so far over as is suggested by the Forsete. Therefore it seems to me that if you take, as he seems to have taken, rather a middle view between the two conflicting views of fact as to which side of the river this collision took place on, there is no inference to be drawn that there was that degree of negligence on the part of the Ovingdean Grange which would have made it impossible under any circumstances for the Forsete to have avoided a collision. It seems to me that on the President's finding of fact—I think there was abundant evidence for it—there was only such a degree of negligence on the part of the Ovingdean Grange as to admit of the Forsete, if she had exercised due care, herself avoiding the mischief. It was her own action which put her into such a position, and the Ovingdean Grange could not avoid the collision. I think the learned President has arrived at that conclusion without any misdirection in point of law, and therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN LOCKIE AND CRAGGS AND SON. (a)

Contract—Building ship—Delay—Allowances—“Circumstances beyond builders' control.”

A contract for building a ship provided that due allowance should be made for delays through certain causes “or other circumstances beyond the builders' control.”

It was within the contemplation of the parties that the ship should be commenced as soon as a suitable berth became vacant, and the first berth which became vacant was one in which another ship was being built, and delay was caused in the completion of this ship by the same kind of causes which were provided for in the contract relating to the ship in question.

Held, that allowances were properly made for delay in building the ship in the contract owing to the delay in completing the former vessel.

SPECIAL case stated by an arbitrator.

By a contract in writing dated the 6th July 1898 it was agreed between John Lockie (therein called the purchaser) and R. Craggs and Son (therein called the builders) that the latter should build and sell and the former purchase a steel screw steamer.

The clause as to delivery was as follows:

The builders undertake to build and deliver the vessel complete and ready for sea after satisfactory trial trip not later than the 31st June 1899, due allowance being made for delays through bad weather, strikes, fires, and accidents on board ship at shipbuilders' works or at any works upon which they may be dependent for supplies of material, delay in delivery of material, or other circumstances beyond builders' control or marine risks.

The arbitrator found as facts that it was contemplated by the parties that the steamer should be built at the builders' yard at Middlesbrough, and that the purchaser was at the date of the contract aware that the steamer (called No. 160) could not be commenced until a suitable berth was vacant; that the first suitable berth that became vacant was one in which another steamer (called No. 149) was being built at the date of the contract, and that the builders acted reasonably in arranging to build No. 160 in that berth; that the completion of No. 149 was delayed by the following causes, bad weather, strikes, accidents at ship and at builders' works, and delay in delivery of material; and that, owing to the non-completion of No. 149, the building of No. 160 could not be commenced until the 31st March 1899, when it was in fact commenced.

The arbitrator held that the delays in building No. 149 from the causes mentioned delayed the commencement and completion of No. 160, and that due allowance ought to be made in fixing the date at which No. 160 ought to be completed and delivered. He accordingly made due allowance for delays during the building of No. 149 due to the causes mentioned.

Scrutton, K.C. (Mackenzie with him) for the purchaser.—The question is whether the arbitrator can take into consideration causes which did not interfere with the actual building of the ship, but other circumstances altogether. The clause of exceptions which is inserted can only apply to the ship, the subject-matter of the contract, and, as they are in the favour of the builders, it must be construed against them. In Re an Arbitration between Richardsons and M. Samuel and Co. (77 L. T. Rep. 479; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 330; (1898) 1 Q. B. 261) the charter-party excepted "strikes, lock-outs, accidents to railway," and "other causes beyond charterers' control." It was held that the general clause excepting "other causes beyond charterers' control" referred to matters ejusdem generis with the antecedent exceptions. That principle applies here, and the words "other circumstances beyond builders' control" must be confined to matters ejusdem generis, as bad weather, strikes, fires, accidents, &c., and not to delays in the completion of another ship.

Hamilton, K.C. (Roche with him) for the vendors.—The case of Re an Arbitration between Richardsons and M. Samuel and Co. (sup.) is quite different to the present one, because the delay upon the railway did not in fact delay the loading. He referred to

The Alne Holme, 68 L. T. Rep. 862; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 344; (1893) P. 173.

The allowances here were properly made under the contract, and the finding of the arbitrator was right.

Scrutton, K.C. in reply.

WRIGHT, J.—The question here is a nice one, but upon the findings of the arbitrator I cannot say that the allowance in question was improperly made to the shipbuilders. I think that any abnormal delay to the first ship was intended to be included by the parties in the period of building. Taking the matter as one of construction upon the first two findings of the arbitrator, the parties took the chance of the first ship being out of the way, and the completion of that ship was a preliminary to the building of the second. The question is whether the provisions for an allowance for delay come into operation when the causes of delay apply to the former ship. Under the circumstances of the case, any specified hindrance which delays the first ship may be said to be beyond the builders' control if it affects the second ship, No. 160. I think I ought to hold that the delay was unavoidable, and that the delay in the predecessor, No. 149, is within the clause of the contract as to No. 160, as to delay under which allowance must be made. It seems to me, on the findings of the arbitrator, the builders ought to succeed. Could it be said that if the berth had been destroyed the builders would have been compelled to complete within the specified time? I do not think so. The case of The Alne Holme (sup.) is not in point, though the cases there cited are to some extent. I think that the allowance ought to be made.

MODESTO PINEIRO AND Co. v. DUPRE AND Co. (a)

Charter-party—Demurrage—Ship to go "to a loading place as ordered"—Commencement of time—Lien—Keeping goods on ship—Demurrage.

By a charter-party it was provided that a ship should proceed to Santander, excluding San Salvador old tip "to a loading place as ordered" and there take on board a cargo.

Held, that the ship could not be taken as an arrived ship for the purpose of the commencement of the lay days until she had arrived at the loading place as ordered, and that arrival at Santander was not sufficient.

A shipowner who has a lien on the cargo for freight or demurrage, when he has the opportunity of unloading the cargo, cannot keep the cargo on the ship and then claim for the detention of the ship.

COMMERCIAL CAUSE.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants to recover 400*l.* for demurrage on the s.s. San Salvador.

By a charter-party made between the parties, dated 3rd Nov. 1901, it was provided that the plaintiffs' steamship San Salvador should proceed to Santander, excluding San Salvador old tip, to a loading place as ordered, and there take on board, by day or by night if required, a cargo of iron ore, and, being so loaded, should proceed to Maryport (Senhouse Dock), and there deliver the cargo, as customary, alongside lighters or at any wharf or usual landing place as directed by the consignees.

It was also provided that

The merchants shall be allowed, weather permitting, one working day for loading every 400 tons of cargo, and a proportionate period for any odd quantity, and shall be allowed a similar period for discharging every 400 tons and a proportionate period for any odd quantity. The periods in each case, whether for loading or discharging, not to commence until after a true written notice has been given during usual Customs hours that the vessel is wholly unballasted and in every respect ready to load, or, as the case may be, to discharge, and that she has been duly entered inwards at the Custom-house and is in free pratique. The following shall not be computed as part of the aforesaid running days: Sundays, Custom-house holidays, or any time of force majeure, war, epidemic, civil commotion, political disturbances, riots, lock-outs, strikes, or stoppage of workmen, or other hands connected with the working, delivery, shipment, or discharge of the cargo, whether partial or general, or accidents to the mines, works, or machinery, floods or frosts, stoppages on railway or canal, or time when by any cause, of what nature or kind soever beyond their personal control, the charterers or their agents may be prevented or delayed in supplying, loading, or discharging, or the conveyance of the cargo from the mines to the vessel may be prevented or delayed. Demurrage (if any) shall be ascertained by adding together the running days calculated as before stated, and all hours actually occupied over the aggregate running days allowed for both operations of loading and discharging shall be deemed to be demurrage, and shall be paid for at the rate of 16s. 8d. per hour. The merchants are to be at liberty to average the time for loading and discharging during the entire currency of this charter in order to avoid demurrage and to load the steamer on Sundays and holidays, any time used to count. Time between 1 p.m. on Saturdays and 7 a.m. on Mondays not to count at ports of loading or discharge unless used. Ship to work at night if requested to do so, charterers paying extra expenses. . . . It is agreed that all liability of the charterers shall cease as soon as the cargo is shipped, notwithstanding it may have been sold at a price to cover cost, freight, and insurance, in consideration of the vessel having a lien upon same for all unpaid freight, dead freight, and demurrage, which she is hereby bound to exercise. . . . The periods, whether for loading or discharging, not to commence until after a true written notice has been given during usual Customs hours that the vessel is wholly unballasted and in every other respect ready to load or, as the case may be, to discharge, and that she has been duly entered inwards at the Custom-house and is in free pratique.

The San Salvador arrived at Santander on the 18th Nov. 1900. Due notice was given under the charter-party, and the loading time commenced to run at 1 p.m. on the 19th Nov. 1900. The loading was completed on the 10th Dec. 1900 at 6.30 p.m. The vessel loaded 1947 tons. She arrived at Maryport on the 16th Dec. Due notice was given under the charter-party. She could not get into Senhouse Dock on the 18th, but not to a berth in the dock. On the 19th Dec. she was put into a discharging berth in the dock basin on the same terms as if she had docked, and discharge commenced on the same day. The discharge was completed on the 4th Jan. 1901.

The defence raised was that by the charter-party the plaintiffs agreed that their vessel should proceed to a loading place as ordered by the defendants at Santander, exclusive of San Salvador old tip, and there load a cargo of 2000 tons of iron ore at the rate of 400 tons per day, weather permitting. The vessel did not arrive at the loading place ordered by the defendants, and was not ready to load until Friday, the 7th Dec. 1900. She commenced to load at 9 p.m. on the 7th Dec., and was fully laden on Monday, the 10th Dec. at 6.30 p.m., having been engaged (excluding time between 1 p.m. on Saturday, the 8th Dec., and 7 a.m. Monday, the 10th Dec., as per charter-party) 27½ hours or thereabouts in loading the cargo.

Hamilton, K. C. and Balloch for the plaintiffs.

Carver, K. C. and Noad for the defendants.

KENNEDY, J.—This is an action for demurrage, and there are two parts; I will take the latter part first. The question arises as to what took place on the arrival of this steamship in bringing a cargo from Santander to Maryport, and as to the time which was consumed at Maryport, the port of discharge. The plaintiffs say that there was a delay there in taking the discharge; and the defendants repudiate any liability on that head. Now I am of opinion that, assuming that there was a delay at Santander—a demurrage, that is, for which the plaintiffs had a good claim at the port of loading—what they did at the port of discharge cannot be treated as in any respect wrong. Assuming that they had a claim for demurrage, there is this right, which is not disputed, given them by the terms of the charter-party: while all liability of the charterers shall cease as soon as the cargo is shipped, the vessel has a lien for all unpaid freight, dead freight, and demurrage, which she is hereby bound to exercise. The plaintiffs, in effect, when they got to Maryport, said: "We have a good claim." No question arises as to the freight; that was never disputed by those who had to pay the freight, but the question as to demurrage was known to be in dispute. I think Mr. Hamilton is right in saying that, as they had their right to exercise their lien, they had done nothing (assuming them to have a good claim for demurrage) which would prevent them from exercising their lien in the way in which they did. The other side, representing the cargo, offered a guarantee which no doubt would have been sufficient, but the shipowner was not bound to take a guarantee, or even to accept a lodgment of money, to abide the result, in either joint names, or in a single name; and the controversy which culminated in the actual stoppage of the discharge was, in substance, as I follow the correspondence so far as it has been cited to me, this: We claim to exercise our right of lien. You, say the shipowners, ask us to accept a guarantee. If we take that guarantee it must be with an admission that there is a good claim against you for demurrage at Santander. That may, or may not, have been, apart from any question of law, a perfectly fair way of settling a debatable dispute for time being, to procure the discharge and delivery of the cargo, but in law the shipowner was not bound to do it; he had the right to exercise his lien, and I do not think on the whole that there is anything which shows that, if there had been a tender of the actual money, whether under protest or not, claimed to be due for demurrage, the shipowner would have refused it; or would have told the charterers in effect: It is no use your making me an offer which will discharge my lien. Then it still remains no doubt clearly the law that, if there is a right of the shipowner, as was the right of the plaintiffs here, to exercise a lien upon the cargo, whether for freight or demurrage, as there are facilities now given him by Act of Parliament for preserving his rights while discharging the ship, he cannot lay upon the receivers of the goods—the persons liable for the freight or demurrage, as the case may be—a larger burden in the shape of charges for the detention of his ship than the circumstances treated reasonably warrant. I think it is the law now, and I should so hold, that if a shipowner, having a right of lien, when he had the opportunities of unloading the cargo and keeping a stop upon it until the lien was discharged, made his ship into a warehouse, and then had a claim for detention, he would not be acting in a way which would be justified by law. But I think, on the whole, that that is not the case here. There are statements no doubt which, taken from the letters read by themselves, seem to signify that it would have been possible to put this cargo on shore somewhere at Maryport; but on the whole I think the balance of the evidence is that there were no trucks, and no other place reasonably fit for the storage of this cargo where the shipowner could have placed it to preserve his lien while discharging the cargo. So, on those points I should find in favour of the plaintiffs in the action. The whole result of the action, as I think the learned counsel who have given me so much assistance in the case agree, turns on what took place at Santander. Now, this is a charter-party under which the ship has to proceed with all convenient speed to Santander, excluding San Salvador old tip, to a loading place as ordered. Those are the initial words of the charter-party; and while, of course, the construction of these charter-parties, which now run into a very elaborate form, I do not say is generally easy, or easy in this particular case, I have formed the opinion that on the main point the defendants are entitled to succeed.

The main point which arises in this case is this: What is the place at which the ship must arrive in order to be treated as an arrived ship for the purpose of the commencement of the lay days? Is it to be Santander, or the river, as Mr. Hamilton suggests, which leads from Santander to the loading place for cargoes of this description; or is it, as Mr. Carver contends, the place which is ordered as the loading place inside the port of Santander? It seems to me the true interpretation of this is, that the ship is not to be taken for the purpose of demurrage as an arrived ship, not to be taken as a ship which is in a position to say, "My lay days are now commencing"—until she has arrived at the loading place which was ordered in the port of Santander. In effect, under the circumstances of this case, there is only one place to which she could be ordered and was ordered—viz, the new tip. There is the old tip, which is excluded by the terms of the charter-party. She was ordered to the new tip, and that is the loading place as ordered, and it seems to me the demurrage days did not arise until she got to that loading place, providing nothing was done to prevent her getting there earlier. Why is that so? I think it must follow from the fact that this is not a clause under which the vessel is to proceed simply to Santander only. If it had been, it might have been held that it was sufficient if the vessel proceeded to the port named, and to that usual place, be it a dock or that class of place at which the cargo to be loaded has, by the practice of the port, usually to be loaded. Here they describe the place where she is to go, and at which she would be arrived for the purpose of being at the charterers' disposal, as being not merely the port of Santander, but the port of Santander and the loading place at that port, and it seems to me that this place as ordered, the Santander new tip, is the place she must go to before she can say to the charterers, "I am here at your disposal." I think that makes the loading place as ordered, being a place in Santander, equivalent to the berth which was dealt with by the term, "Any safe berth as ordered on arrival in the dock at Garston," in the case of Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company Limited v. Morel Brothers and Co. (65 L. T. Rep. 659; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 106; (1891) 2 Q. B. 647). Here the vessel has to proceed and get—whether you call it a dock or loading place does not seem to me to matter—into the port of Santander, and she has to go to that particular place in it which was known as the new tip, and which is ordered by the charterers. It is said for the plaintiffs that those words are so qualified by the subsequent long clause beginning, "The merchants shall be allowed, weather permitting, one working day," and so on, that even if otherwise the view which I take to be the right one on the construction of the earlier words is correct, that view ought to be changed by the effect of that long subsequent clause; and, of course, I quite agree that the whole of a charter-party must be read together. But I think on that the comment of Mr. Carver is a good one. Certain things are there specified as being conditions precedent to be performed—or to happen—to the right of the shipowner to say: "My lay days are beginning"; and, it is said, that the periods for loading or discharging are not to commence until after the certain notices have been given which are there mentioned. I think that it is logically a very strong thing in support of the defendants' argument that this is a negative clause. You may read it as if the parties had said in first place: The point from which the right of the shipowner to claim to be loaded, or to have demurrage if he is not loaded in a specified time, is not to begin until the ship goes to the loading place ordered—the new tip; and, further, not only is that to be a condition precedent to the right to enforce any claim for demurrage, but that condition shall not be treated as the commencement of the period for loading until after certain notices besides have been given. In other words, there are certain additional things which the shipowner must do besides bringing his ship to the place in question. There are other words referred to by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs as supporting his view which I do not think, on consideration, affect the matter. There is a clause about the captain having to telegraph as to the probable date at which the steamer will be at Santander ready to load—that is, ready to take the cargo; and then there is the further clause about the cancelling date. Of course, if she was not in the port within the date mentioned, there would be the right to cancel. It may be—I do not know that it is necessary to decide it—that “arrived” may not have meant “arrived at the loading place;” but it is expressly provided here that if she has not arrived at Santander within twenty-seven days, meaning, I think, ready to load so far as arrival in Santander is a necessary preliminary to her taking the cargo in at the particular point at Santander which the loading place ordered may be, there is a right to cancel. I think on these grounds the plaintiffs’ case fails. In fact, she did not arrive at that place until a considerable time after her arrival at Santander. She could not get there because there were a number of vessels before her, but this is the first simple fact—she did not get there until the time at which she did arrive, and was loaded then in due time. It is not disputed that she was. Then it has been suggested by the defendants that even if I was wrong in deciding for them on the first point, there are certain clauses here which would act as a relief. It is said that there has been bad weather, which would be a sufficient ground for their not loading her earlier, and for not having her at the tip earlier to load. In my opinion that, I confess, I should be unable to decide in favour of the defendants. It seems to me that the argument which has been used, with regard to the construction of the long clause, does not make such weather as described in itself a sufficient protection, unless that weather was weather which affected the loading of this particular ship. It is not easy to distinguish the cases, but that is the view, if it was necessary—which it is not—I should be inclined to take; and I further think that the mere fact of there being a number of vessels in front of this vessel, by itself, would not be a sufficient protection. It seems to me that the fact of there being what has been called a glut of vessels was not a matter which fairly comes under the clause which protects the charterers or their agents, in case of “accidents to the mines, works, or machinery, floods or frosts, stoppages on railway or canal, or time when by any cause of what nature or kind soever beyond their personal control,” they may be prevented or delayed in supplying, loading, or discharging, or the conveyance of the cargo from the mines to the vessel may be prevented or delayed. It is not necessary for me to deal with those points, because I think that the other point is sufficient; and therefore on the construction of the charter-party, as the days did not run, as it seems to me, against the charterer until the arrival of the ship, and the other conditions being fulfilled, they being ready to load, the case of the plaintiffs fails, and there must be judgment for the defendants.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

April 15 and 16, 1902.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President).

THE BERNARD HALL. (a)

Collision—Fog—Moderate speed—Duty of vessel in vicinity of fog to stop on hearing whistle forward of the beam—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 16.

Where a fog signal is heard forward of the beam, the position of which is not ascertained, there is a duty under art 16 upon the vessel hearing it to stop and navigate with caution until danger is over, although she herself may not be in a fog. The mere fact of there being fog in the vicinity of a vessel, if not ahead, does not in all cases make it obligatory to navigate at a moderate speed.

THIS was an action for damages by collision brought by the owners of the steamship Holyrood against the owners of the steamship Bernard Hall. The collision occurred about 4.55 p.m. on the 28th March 1902, in the Atlantic Ocean, in about lat. 49° 24' N. and long. 10° 19' W.

The plaintiffs’ case was that the Holyrood, a steamship of 2715 tons gross register, was on a voyage from Portland Maine to London, laden with a general cargo. The weather was hazy, the wind light from the westward, and the current setting to the eastward of the force of about half a knot an hour, and the Holyrood was proceeding on a course E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  N. true, making about five knots an hour through the water.

Under these circumstances a bank of fog was seen some distance to the northward on the port side of the Holyrood, and shortly afterwards the whistle of a steamer, which proved to be the Bernard Hall, was heard apparently a considerable distance off and about four points on the port bow. The engines of the Holyrood were immediately put to slow and her whistle was sounded a long blast in reply; and on the Bernard Hall’s whistle being heard again, the engines were stopped and the whistle replied to. The whistle of the Bernard Hall was heard once again and answered, and then, shortly afterwards, three blasts were heard from her, whereupon the engines of the Holyrood were put full speed astern and three blasts sounded. The Bernard Hall then loomed into view about three ships’ lengths off and about four points on the port bow, and struck the Holyrood on the port side abreast of the fore rigging, and in consequence of the collision she sank shortly afterwards.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants (inter alia) with failing to keep a good look-out, with navigating under the circumstances at an improper rate of speed, and with not stopping and reversing when the fog signal of the Holyrood was heard forward of the beam. They also charged them with neglecting to comply with arts. 16, 19, 23, and 29 of the Collision Regulations.

The defendants’ case was that the Bernard Hall, a steamship of 2677 tons gross register, was at the time of the collision on a voyage from Liverpool to Barbados. The weather was foggy, with a moderate breeze from the W.N.W., and the

THE BERNARD HALL.

Bernard Hall was on a course S. 70° W., and had for some time been sounding her whistle and proceeding at half speed, making only about four knots an hour, as her speed was impeded by a very heavy swell on her starboard bow.

Under these circumstances a whistle from the Holyrood was heard close to. The engines of the Bernard Hall were at once reversed full speed astern and three short blasts sounded on her whistle, to which the Holyrood replied. After the Bernard Hall had been going astern about a minute, the Holyrood was seen coming up out of the fog at a great speed about three points on the starboard bow, and came on very fast, and, swinging to starboard across the bows of the Bernard Hall, she carried the latter's stem over to port and damaged her considerably.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with a bad look-out, with failing to keep clear of the Bernard Hall, with navigating at an excessive rate of speed, with neglecting to stop her engines when the whistle of the Bernard Hall was heard, and with not sounding her whistle sufficiently often. They also charged the plaintiffs with neglecting to comply with arts. 15, 16, and 29 of the Collision Regulations, and counter-claimed for the damage done to their own vessel.

The material part of art. 15 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is as follows:

In fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rainstorms, whether by day or night, the signals described in this article shall be as follows—viz., (a) a steam vessel having way upon her shall sound, at intervals of not more than two minutes, a prolonged blast.

Arts. 16 and 23 are as follows:

Art. 16. Every vessel shall, in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rainstorms, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions. A steam vessel, hearing apparently forward of her beam the fog signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.

Art. 23. Every steam vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, if the circumstances of the case admit, avoid crossing ahead of the other.

Laing, K.C., Scrutton, K.C., and Adair Roche for the plaintiffs.

Pickford, K.C., Aspinall, K.C., and Glynn for the defendants.

The PRESIDENT (after dealing with the plaintiffs' case, and finding on the facts that the Bernard Hall was to blame for proceeding at an excessive speed).—Then with regard to the Holyrood. There is one point which appears to me to be a question of the construction of art. 16. I will accept her statement as to the fog for the purpose of this charge against the Holyrood—viz., that although there was on her port bow, at some distance, a fog out of which a sound came, and out of which a vessel eventually came, on the other hand, straight ahead and on the starboard hand, the weather was tolerably clear. The state of things is that a vessel not herself in a fog hears in a fog or out of a fog a whistle of a vessel that is in that fog. Under those circumstances what is the obligation imposed upon her by the second part of art. 16? [His Lordship then read art. 16.]

Does the obligation under that article apply to a vessel which is not herself in a fog, but which hears the whistle of a vessel which is in a fog? I have come to the conclusion, after considering the matter, and also with the assistance of the Elder Brethren, because this is a matter upon which practical experience throws light, that that part of the article does apply, even though the vessel herself is not in a fog. It appears to me that in the reason of things it should be so, because although she might not herself be in a fog, there might be another vessel close to her in a fog. As danger arises, so comes the obligation to act with that particular kind of caution which this rule imposes. The subject matter appears to me to give rise to exactly the same necessity for caution as if the vessel is herself in a fog. The intention of the rule is clear. It is this—that where there is a vessel ahead, that is to say, forward of the beam, of which the position is unascertained, that is danger, and it becomes important to take precaution at the earliest possible moment. That being so, the danger is as great, and is of exactly the same kind, whether the vessel is herself in a fog or not. Under those circumstances it appears to me natural that the persons who drew the rule imposed upon her the same obligation as if she was in a fog. Therefore, even if the story of the Holyrood be accepted, it appears to me that she has not absolved herself from the obligation to stop her engines when she heard the first whistle from the Bernard Hall. It is clear she did not, and therefore I think she must necessarily be held equally to blame for that. An attempt was ingeniously made to argue that in this particular case there was sufficient ascertainment of the position of the Bernard Hall to free the Holyrood from the obligation under that rule. I have had occasion to consider what is the meaning of those words "not ascertained," and it appears to me that the real object of the words was to negative the obligation to stop in case of repeated whistles. When whistle after whistle is heard the position is ascertained, and therefore there is no obligation to stop for other whistles, but there is an obligation to stop with regard to the first whistle—because at that time the position is not ascertained. It is quite true that the first whistle gives a certain indication where the vessel is, but it is obvious that if the position of the vessel is ascertained by the first whistle, the effect of the rule would be nullified. It is said in this case that there was a certain ascertainment. There was this. The vessel was not on the starboard side, and not right ahead, but was in a bank of fog on the port bow, and that fog was a certain distance. It cannot be disputed there was that amount of ascertainment. But the Elder Brethren point out that there would be extreme difficulty in knowing how far off the vessel would be in a fog, and therefore they do not think there was any such ascertainment as to justify the Holyrood in not complying with the clear terms of art. 16, by stopping her engines when she first heard the whistle of the Bernard Hall; and that it is impossible to say it would not have been a material matter if she had done so. She would not only have gained time, but also located with more precision the later whistles of the Bernard Hall, and although it is clear that she did stop at the second whistle, I think it is impossible to say it would have been immaterial whether or not she had stopped at the first. I think, therefore, that the Holyrood must be held to blame for not obeying the second part of art. 16.

The other charge made against her is certainly more difficult to decide, because it involves the whole question as to the exact nature of the fog at the place where she was. It is clear according to the terms of art. 16, that the obligation to go at a moderate rate of speed applies only to a vessel which is herself in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rainstorms, and not to a vessel which is near a fog. If a vessel is running into a fog ahead, I have held—and I think I may say rightly held, because I think the Court of Appeal took the same view—that there is an obligation upon her, although she is not actually in it at the moment, not only under the first part of art. 16, but under the general rules of seamanship, to go at a moderate speed. It seems to me only common sense, and according to the advice which competent sailors could not fail to give to this court. But a different state of things appears to me to apply if the vessel is not herself in a fog nor running into it. In this case the fog was not directly ahead, and I do not think the evidence shows that the vessel was running into a fog, and I cannot say there was any obligation, under the general principles of navigation, to go at a moderate rate of speed on account of fog being in the vicinity. That is the advice I receive. That assumes that I substantially accept the Holyrood's statement with regard to the fog, and although it is not easy to see how it could be exactly as she says, at the same time there is her clear evidence, and I am not prepared to say there is anything in this case to lead me to disregard it. I do not wish to go at great length into the questions which have been rather bandied about from side to side as to the witnesses who have not been called and ought to have been, or the documents which should have been produced and have not been. Although I regret that the fullest evidence has not been given, at the same time in this case I am not prepared to say that the absence of those witnesses or of that evidence has been sufficiently clearly shown to have been material to this case. Therefore I am not prepared to say that the statement given by those on board the Holyrood is not substantially accurate as to the state of the fog. It has also been suggested, and no doubt is the case, that the Holyrood had not a man exclusively on the look-out. I do not wish to depreciate the importance of having a proper look-out, but the Elder Brethren tell me that no serious blame ought to be attached to the Holyrood on that account. Where you have officers on the look-out themselves, as undoubtedly there were in this case, it would be stretching the matter rather far to say that serious blame is to be attached to the vessel because she had not one man on the look-out at a particular spot on the vessel. The result is that, on the grounds I have indicated, both vessels must be held to blame.

Order XLVIII.A, r. 1, allows any two or more persons claiming as co-partners to sue in the name of the respective firms, if any, of which such persons were co-partners at the time of the accruing of the cause of action.

A plaintiff issued a writ in an action in rem for damage to cargo in the name of a firm of which he was the sole member, and indorsed it "the plaintiffs as owners of goods laden on board the steamship A." In a motion by the defendants to set aside the writ:

Held, that as by the old Admiralty practice, which is not abrogated by the Judicature Acts, owners of a ship or cargo are entitled to sue as such, it would have been sufficient if the plaintiff had described himself as "owner" on the face of the writ, and that therefore this was a mere irregularity and might be cured by leave to amend under Order LXX, r. 1.

Held, also, that as the defendants, by applying for security for costs after knowledge of the irregularity, had taken a fresh step in the action, they were precluded by Order LXX, r. 2, from taking advantage of the irregularity.

Smurthwaite v. Hannay (71 L. T. Rep. 157; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 485; (1894) A. C. 494) distinguished.

THIS was a motion by the defendants to set aside the writ in an action in rem brought by the plaintiff in respect of damage to cargo.

The plaintiff had issued a writ dated the 21st March 1902 in the name of Louis Dreyfus and Co., residing at No. 3, Gracechurch-street, E.C., against the owners of the Italian steamship Assunta, claiming, "as owners of goods laden on board the Assunta on a voyage from the River Plate to England, compensation for damage done to the said goods during such voyage." The vessel was arrested on the same day, and a copy of the writ was duly served on board.

On the 26th March an appearance was entered by the solicitor for the defendants, and on the 10th April the vessel was released on bail and subsequently left this country.

It appeared that the sole member of the firm of Louis Dreyfus and Co. was Leopold Louis Dreyfus, who resided in Paris, and that the London address of the firm at the date of the writ was 194, Bishopsgate-street Without, E.C., and that the address of 3, Gracechurch-street, where the firm had carried on business for some years, and from which they had recently removed owing to the premises having been burnt down, had been inadvertently inserted in the copy of the writ by the plaintiff's solicitors.

On the 16th April the defendants applied to the registrar for an order to dismiss the action on the ground of non-compliance with the rules, or, in the alternative, that the plaintiff should give security for costs; but the application was refused.

The defendants now moved that the writ should be set aside on the grounds that it was improperly issued in the name of Louis Dreyfus and Co., and did not contain the plaintiff's address.

Order XLVIII.A, r. 1, is as follows :

Any two or more persons claiming or being liable as co-partners and carrying on business within the jurisdiction may sue or be sued in the name of the respective firms, if any, of which such persons were co-partners at the time of the accruing of the cause of action ; and any party to an action may in such case apply by summons to a judge for a statement of the names and addresses of the persons who were, at the time of the accruing of the cause of action, co-partners in any such firm, to be furnished in such manner, and certified on oath or otherwise, as the judge may direct.

Order LXX., rr. 1 and 2, are as follows :

Rule 1. Non-compliance with any of these rules shall not render any proceedings void, unless the court or a judge shall so direct, but such proceedings may be set aside, either wholly or in part, as irregular, or amended, or otherwise dealt with in such manner and upon such terms as the court or judge shall think fit.

Rule 2. No application to set aside any proceedings for irregularity shall be allowed unless made within reasonable time, nor if the party applying has taken any fresh step after knowledge of the irregularity.

Leck for the defendants in support of the motion.—Before the Judicature Act there was no power to sue in the name of the firm, and Order XLVIII.A, r. 1, only gives this power when the firm consists of two or more persons. The writ therefore was improperly issued in the name of the firm, and the misdescription is more than a mere irregularity which the court can give leave to amend, as the plaintiff has begun the action in a manner not authorised by the rules. The writ is irregular within the decision in Smurthwaite v. Hannay (71 L. T. Rep. 157; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 485; (1894) A. C. 494), and ought to be set aside. A second objection to the writ is that it does not contain the plaintiff's address as required by Order IV., r. 1.

A. E. Nelson for the plaintiff, contra.—There is a long-established practice in the Admiralty Court for plaintiffs to sue as "owners of the cargo" or "owners of the ship," and it was never intended that the rules should abrogate this antecedent practice. Order LXVIII.A, r. 1, does not apply to actions in rem, which are different from actions in personam :

St. Gobain v. Hoyermann's Agency, 69 L. T. Rep. 329; (1893) 2 Q. B. 96.

Even if the rule does apply, the insertion of the name of the firm on the writ was a mere irregularity which the court may give leave to amend. Smurthwaite v. Hannay only decided that each of the plaintiffs in that case had to bring a separate action. The indorsement on the writ properly described the plaintiffs as owners of the cargo. He referred to

Dickson v. Law, 72 L. T. Rep. 680; (1895) 2 Ch. 62.

The defendants' steamship is an Italian vessel now out of the jurisdiction of the court, and the effect of setting aside the writ would be to deprive the plaintiff of his remedy against the defendants. Further, by Order LXX., r. 2, the defendants are not entitled to make this application, as they have taken a fresh step in the proceedings by asking for security for costs after knowledge of the irregularity. The omission of the plaintiff's proper address is an irregularity which the court has power under LXX., r. 1, to cure.

Leck in reply.

The PRESIDENT.—The plaintiff in this case is really one person, but he sues in the name of Louis Dreyfus and Co.—the firm name which he apparently uses in business—the indorsement on the writ showing that he sued as the "owners of goods laden on board" a certain steamship. Now in one sense that is not an important matter, because it was known to the parties what the real facts were. The indorsement on the writ showed who the real plaintiff was, and anyone could ascertain at any moment who Louis Dreyfus and Co. in fact were. But in another sense it is an important matter, because, this being an action in rem, the effect has been that the defendants' ship has left the jurisdiction, and, if this writ is held bad, it will be necessary for the plaintiff to wait until he has an opportunity of arresting the vessel again. The question is whether that title of the plaintiff renders this writ null; whether it is wrong, and, if so, whether it is merely an irregularity. The rule relied on is Order XLVIII.A, r. 1. [His Lordship then read the rule.] By that rule any party to an action may apply, by summons, for a statement of the names and addresses of the actual partners. Before the date of that rule persons could not sue or be sued in the name of a firm. The names of all the partners had to be added; but this rule gives power to persons carrying on business under a firm name to sue in the firm name, although in point of fact there might be several partners, without stating the names of the partners, except in the limited way required by the latter part of the rule. Now, what is said is first of all that this rule does not apply to an action in rem at all, and there is a great deal of force in that observation. But it is not necessary for me to decide that actual question, because there is undoubtedly an old practice in the Admiralty Court of very great value to persons concerned in those matters, which enables the owners of a ship or cargo, in any Admiralty action, to sue as such—a proceeding which would have been regarded by the courts of common law with professional horror. But the courts of Admiralty allowed it for a very good reason, because, what they were really dealing with was one ship against another, and so long as you had the names of the vessels you had really all that was material, because you could ascertain the names of the owners from the register, or otherwise. Therefore you have an antecedent practice of a very peculiar kind in the Admiralty Court, and certainly I do not think it is too much to say that it is impossible to suppose that this general rule was intended to abrogate so old and valuable practice as that which obtained in the Admiralty Court. If one looks at the terms of the rule it does not apply to the case of owners of ships, because it speaks only of persons suing

THE MARGERY.

and being sued in the name of their respective firms, whereas the owners of a ship do not constitute a firm in that sense at all. Therefore I feel no difficulty at all in saying that this rule does not apply in any sense to abrogate the former practice of the Admiralty Court, of allowing the owners of a ship to sue as such. But that does not carry us the whole way in this case, because this is not a case of the owners of a ship suing. Mr. Dreyfus did not in this case sue as "owner." He sued as Louis Dreyfus and Co., and I am not prepared to say that in its narrower sense, and I think in its truer sense, this rule does not apply to the Admiralty Division as well as to any other division.

If the question in this case was whether Order XLVIII.A, r. 1, applied to the Admiralty jurisdiction I am not prepared to hold that it does not, but a further question arises which, to my mind, is of great importance in this case. I have to decide not only whether there is a mistake in this case, but whether it is an irregularity which can be cured. I am told that it is more than an irregularity, because previously a partnership could not sue at all—it could only sue in the names of the real partners—and therefore, it is said, the terms of this order must be strictly complied with, or else the whole thing is a nullity. The case of Smurthwaite v. Hannay (ubi sup.) is relied upon. If these were proceedings in common law, I do not wish to decide whether or no that might not be the case. But what I do think is this, that in the Admiralty Court, having regard to the previous practice, which I do not think has been abrogated, and, having regard to the fact of the indorsement on this writ, it is a mere irregularity. What are the facts? Here is a person suing in the name of the firm, and the writ states on the back how he does sue. If he had sued as "owners" I think it would have been perfectly good. Therefore all it comes to is this, that instead of putting on the face of this writ, "Louis Dreyfus and Co., as owners," or "Louis Dreyfus, as owner," of the goods, he has put Louis Dreyfus and Co. on the face of the writ, and he has stated clearly on the back that he is suing as owner. I cannot regard that as more than the merest irregularity. It is perfectly different from the case of Smurthwaite v. Hannay (ubi sup.). There persons were suing together who could not sue together. There was a very material matter involved, and there was much more than a mere irregularity; but having regard to the Admiralty practice in this court, and having regard to the indorsement on the writ, I am of opinion that in the Admiralty Court, where the only mistake a man makes is in not putting on the face of the writ what he had put on the back, and which, if put on the face of the writ, would have been good, it is a mere irregularity. Therefore, I think under the circumstances that the mistake made is a mere matter of irregularity and that Order LXX. applies, and an amendment may be allowed. It follows that not only does Order LXX. apply, but Order LXX., r. 2, too—and in this case the defendants have taken a step—namely, the asking for security for costs, after they knew the facts of the real composition of Louis Dreyfus and Co. That is quite enough for me to say that I think in this case all that has happened is mere irregularity, which can be cured by an amendment, and that I am prepared to allow. I do not think it necessary to deal with the other matter, as to the address of the plaintiff, because to call that an irregularity seems to me to be using too high a term. The original writ was correct in that respect, but the copy of the writ was wrong.

THE MARGERY. (a)

Salvage—Associated insurance clubs—Agreement by owners, as insurers in clubs, to render mutual assistance—Notice to masters—Arbitration—Rights of master and crew.

Where salvage services were rendered by one vessel to another, and both vessels were insured in associations under the articles of which compensation for salvage services was to be mutually settled by the committees of the associations.

Held, that the master and crew of the salvaging vessel were not bound by such settlement, as they were not parties, and could not be taken to have acquiesced in it.

This was an appeal by the defendant, the owner of the steam drifter Margery, against a decision of the judge of the County Court at Yarmouth awarding salvage to the master and crew of the steam drifter Fifteen for services rendered to the Margery in the North Sea.

The Margery was a ketch-rigged steam drifter of 31 tons register, and carried a crew of ten hands all told. On the 9th Oct. 1901, while fishing off the east coast, and when about thirty-six miles from Yarmouth, she lost her rudder. There was a heavy sea running at the time and a strong wind from the N.W., and two shapes were hoisted to show that she was not under command. The flag of the club she was insured in was also hoisted. About 3 p.m. the Fifteen, a steam drifter of 25.76 tons register, manned by a crew of ten hands all told, came up and gave the Margery a rope. The Margery at this time had managed to get within about fourteen miles of Yarmouth. The rope shortly afterwards parted and fouled the propeller of the Margery. A wire rope was then passed, and she was taken in tow by the Fifteen and brought safely into Yarmouth.

Both vessels at the time in question were insured in insurance clubs, the Fifteen in the Total Loss Mutual Steamship Insurance Company of Sunderland, and the Margery in the United Kingdom Steam Tug and Trawler Insurance and Indemnity Association of North Shields.

In the policy under which the Fifteen was insured was the following clause:

It is mutually agreed between the assured and assurers that the articles of association of the assurer's company shall be deemed part hereof, and be binding upon the assured and assurers as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes as if such articles were inserted in this policy, and any breach thereof will invalidate the same.

By clause 92 of the articles of association:

Steamers insured in this association bind themselves to give assistance to any vessel broken down or in distress, insured in this association, or in the associations of the United Kingdom Steam Tug and Trawler Insurance and Indemnity Association of North Shields . . . it having been arranged that the vessels in these associations shall be bound to like conditions, and that the compensation for services rendered be decided and determined by the committees of the association or associations in which the vessels were insured.

In the insurance policy of the Margery was a similar clause, and a similar article was embodied in the articles of association of the club she was insured in.

In accordance with the rules of the two clubs, a committee, consisting of three directors of the United Kingdom Insurance and Indemnity Association and one director of the Total Loss Company of Sunderland, met on the 16th Dec. The statements of the two masters were read and discussed, and an award of 25*l.* made. This sum was paid to the owners of the Fifteen and accepted, and out of this amount they tendered 12*l.* 10*s.* to the master and crew of their vessel, but they refused to accept it.

On the 6th Jan. 1902 an action for salvage was instituted in the Yarmouth County Court by the master and nine members of the crew of the Fifteen against the Margery, and her nets and fishing gear, claiming the sum of 150*l.* At the trial of the action it was admitted by the master and crew of the Fifteen that they were aware of the arrangement as to mutual assistance, and that they had noticed the club flag the Margery was flying, and knew the reason why she was flying it, but they denied that they had ever heard of or agreed to the mode of settlement adopted by the two clubs.

In the agreement signed by the crew of the Fifteen was the following clause :

Every member of the crew, including apprentices and sea-fishing boys, shall be regarded as entitled to participate in any sum or sums of money arising from any salvage, or salvage services performed for any ship in distress or otherwise, in the proportion set forth opposite to their respective names in this agreement.

Under the heading "Salvage" against each name was written "half and half."

The various associations had published a card with illustrations in colours of their flags, and on it was printed :

Notice to Masters.—The above association is amalgamated with the under-mentioned associations and companies for the settlement of towage cases: United Kingdom Steam Tug and Trawler Insurance and Indemnity Association of North Shields (the names of other associations then followed). All masters of vessels insured in the Total Loss Insurance Company, Sunderland, are bound to render and accept assistance when necessary to and from any vessel insured in the above associations and companies.

One of these cards was on board the Fifteen.

The value of the Fifteen at the time of rendering the services was 3200*l.*, and of the Margery 2000*l.*, her nets and gear 300*l.*, and fish 1*l.* 10*s.*, making a total of 2301*l.* 10*s.*

The case was tried before the learned County Court judge, assisted by nautical assessors, and having held that the master and crew were not bound by the arbitration proceedings, he awarded the master and crew the sum of 60*l.* by way of salvage, which, he explained, was half of what he thought would have been a fair sum if the owners had been also parties to the action.

The defendant appealed.

Scrutton, K.C. and Roche for the appellant.—The master of the Fifteen knew he was bound to render assistance, and admitted that he knew of the arrangement as to vessels in the various clubs rendering each other assistance. He also admitted that he acted upon it when he saw the club flag flying on board the Margery. The owners are bound by the arrangement, and it is submitted the master and crew are too. The card with the "Notice to Masters" on it, which was exhibited on board, is sufficient to bring it to their notice. Further, in the agreements signed by the crews there is the provision that the division of salvage shall be on the basis of "half and half." The master can bind his officers and men by an agreement fixing the amount of reward for salvage services, and presumably the owner of the salving ship is in the same position as the master :

The Nasmyth, 52 L. T. Rep. 392 ; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 364 ; 10 P. Div. 41.

Batten for the respondents contra.—The master and crew of the Fifteen were not bound by the settlement arrived at between the respective owners. In any event, the sum awarded by the committee was absurdly inadequate. The right to salvage is dependent, not on contract, but is a right given in the interest of commerce to those who voluntarily undertake to save property, and even when an agreement is made, the court will always closely scrutinise it to see whether it is a fair one or not. The crew are no parties to the contract entered into by the owners and their underwriters. In order to bind the crew the contract must be put clearly before them, and they must be in a position to realise the logical consequences of their bargain. The "Notice to Masters," which has been relied on, only deals with towage, and only gives instructions that they are to assist, or take assistance from other club vessels when necessary, but the terms on which the assistance is to be rendered are not mentioned. The effect of such an agreement as that alleged to have been entered into by the crew, is to abandon the lien and oust the jurisdiction of the court. It is also submitted that it would be illegal under sect. 156 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. But, putting these considerations aside, the owners had no power to bind the crew :

In The Enchantress (2 L. T. Rep. 574 ; Lush. 93), which was a case decided by Dr. Lushington after the passing of sect. 182 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, it was held that agreements limiting the proportion of salvage money are to be maintained if equitable. See also (ubi sup.) the agreements which it was attempted to set up against the salvor's claims, were made after the services had been already rendered. Here the agreement to refer to arbitration is a general one, and provided for salvage services being rendered at some future time. In The Inchmaree (80 L. T. Rep. 201; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 486; (1899) P. 111) the distinction between an agreement as to future and past services was made, and the amount fixed by the agreement as to future services upheld.

The PRESIDENT. — I think this case can be decided substantially on the ground upon which it has been decided in the court below—that is, a ground which really depends, in the last resort, on a question of fact. The action is brought by the master and crew of the Fifteen against the owner of the steam drifter Margery. It is not an action by the owners of the Fifteen, but only by the master and crew; and the circumstances in which it was brought were that the owners of those two fishing vessels appear to belong to institutions known as clubs, and the result of that is that those vessels are bound, according to the rules of those clubs, to render each other assistance on the terms that the price to be paid for such assistance shall be determined by a particular kind of arbitration, and for the moment I will assume that the owners of the vessels, and their vessels in that sense, are bound by that agreement. The question is whether the master and crew are bound; and in this case, after an arbitration had taken place as to the amount to be paid, the master and crew say they are not bound by that arbitration, and they ask to have the amount of their services determined in value by the court. The learned judge in the court below has agreed in the views they put forward. He has found, as we gather from his remarks, that they are not bound by the arbitration. I do not think he meant, or that it is suggested he meant, that they were not bound by the arbitration because the arbitration is invalid, but that they were not bound by the arbitration because they were not bound by any agreement. That is the point upon which I think the case turns. I should be prepared to admit that the owners may be bound, when a question arises as to salvage, to go to arbitration in the way mentioned, and have the amount determined; but in this case the very simple question is: Are the master and crew, who have independent rights in the matter, bound by that agreement? That, as I said, depends upon a question of fact, which, it appears to me, we have to determine. Now, the master and crew are bound as between themselves and their owners, to a certain extent, because they entered, under their articles, into an agreement that they, putting it shortly, should have half of whatever salvage amount should be taken. The words are very clear about that. To that extent, between themselves and their owners, they are bound; but there the matter appears to me to stop. We are asked to go very much further, and asked to say that not only are they bound as between themselves and their owners, but as between themselves and the owners of any other ship they may save they are bound by an agreement made by their owners to allow the matter to go to arbitration and to take the money which the arbitrators give. That cannot be made out on any express agreement. There is none. There is no language to that effect in their articles, and no language to that effect anywhere; but it is said there is a certain notice exhibited on the ships, of which we have a copy, and which is in some way said to bind the master and crew. I am not at all prepared to say that under certain circumstances an agreement made by the owners on behalf of the crew might not bind them, just as an agreement made under certain circumstances by the master may bind the owners. It is clear that if, before the salvage service is rendered, the masters of the two ships meet together, they may make an arrangement by which, subject to the jurisdiction of this court to see whether it is equitable or not, the masters can undoubtedly bind the owners. I should not be prepared to deny that an agreement made under similar circumstances by the owners on behalf of the master and crew might bind the master and crew; but the reason for that is the necessity of the case. The service has to be rendered on the spur of the moment, and if the agreement cannot be made by the only persons who are there to make it, it cannot be made at all. Therefore ex necessitate an agreement so made binds; but that is a very different thing from saying that when there is no stress at all, an arrangement made by the owners binds the master and crew, without any notice to the master and crew. That proposition I am not prepared to adopt, nor is that seriously contended.

What is said is, that the master had notice of these terms and had acquiesced in them. That appears to me to be a question of fact upon which the matter turns, and I am not prepared to say that there was any such acquiescence by the master of the ship which binds him, much less his crew, to the settlement of this case by arbitration in the way the owners may, perhaps, have agreed. It is quite clear that in fact the master and crew knew nothing of the terms. We have the evidence of the master himself to the effect that he had never heard of any such agreement, and I do not think it can be disputed that, as to going to arbitration, that is a matter about which this particular master and this particular crew were wholly ignorant; but it is said, in spite of that, there was this card exhibited, and that in some way bound them. What is this card? No doubt it is called a "Notice to Masters," and it states [the learned judge then read the words of the notice]. I agree in what one of the learned counsel said, that it is possible that to an astute person it may convey the impression that disputes are to be determined by arbitration in a particular way, but further than that it does not seem to me to go. It does not say what the terms are. The very fact that it uses the word "towage," and not "salvage," appears to me to make it clear that it does not intend to give particulars of the agreement between the owners, and, as my learned brother has pointed out, there are cases of salvage in which the question of towage would not enter. Therefore, when we find the notice limited to "the settlement of towage cases," I think one is entitled to say that it hardly even gives notice that there may be an arrangement for the peculiar settlement of salvage cases. Then it goes on to say that they are bound to render assistance. That may be, but it does not say that they are bound to enter into the service upon these particular terms as regards themselves. Therefore, assuming they had this card before them, it appears to me it falls very short indeed of giving them such notice of the arrangement as would cause them to be bound by acquiescence. Indeed, the highest that acquiescence can be put is that they went to sea and continued their fishing operations, and salving operations, with this in their minds. This appears to me wholly insufficient to fix them with acquiescence in a contract of which they knew nothing. Upon this ground, therefore, I am prepared to decide the case. I am conscious that this decision leaves open many questions, some of them of very great interest—for instance, how far this court would review the decision arrived at by arbitrators of this kind, apart from any question of the validity of the arbitration by reason of incapacity on the part of the arbitrators. I am not prepared to say, at present, that this court has any such power. Whether the power of the court can be extended to deal with arbitration made in pursuance of an agreement to arbitrate by persons supposed to be sui juris, having knowledge of the circumstances—whether in its application to a particular case the arbitration of such a tribunal would come under the jurisdiction of this court, I, at the present moment, must decline to say.

There is a further question in this case—namely, whether this particular arbitration is assailable on the ground that the arbitrators were not sufficiently independent. I entirely decline to express any opinion. It is not an easy question to decide, and it is one which I am glad to be able to avoid. Some day it may have to be argued whether, even as between owners, the agreement sufficiently avoids difficulties with regard to public policy; and there may also be a question, as regards seamen, whether it is not in contravention of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act. It is not necessary in this case to go into these questions, and I base my decision upon the ground that as between the master and crew of this vessel and the owners of the vessel salvaged, it is not shown that there is any agreement which ousts the jurisdiction of this court. My learned brother reminds me that something ought to be said about the figure at which the court below arrived. I think that stands upon very strong ground. The matter was considered by the judge below with nautical assessors, and the court arrived at a figure considerably in excess of the amount awarded by the arbitrators, but which, upon the facts of the case, does not appear to be at all in excess of what a reasonable tribunal might arrive at, so that I am not prepared to differ from it.

BARNES, J.—The learned President has dealt so fully with the case that I might content myself with saying that I agree; but, having regard to the importance of the matter, I desire to add a few words. The plaintiffs' claim is that of the master and nine of the crew of the steam drifter Fifteen for salvage in respect of services rendered to the drifter Margery off Yarmouth. It is sought to meet the claim by saying, on the part of the defendant, that the plaintiffs cannot recover on the basis of an ordinary assessment of salvage in this court, or the court below, but are bound by a decision of certain arbitrators, fixing an amount which would give to the present plaintiffs a sum of 12l. 10s. Now, it seems to me that in order to make out this defence, the defendant has to prove that the plaintiffs have agreed to submit their claims to the decision of the arbitrators who made the award. It is sought to do that in a very roundabout way. No direct agreement, no express agreement, between the salvors who are suing and the owner or master of the salvaged vessel is proved, or sought to be proved, but it is said that the Fifteen was insured in a mutual insurance club; that the terms of that insurance incorporated the rules of that club, which provided that steamers insured in it bound themselves to give assistance to any vessel broken down or in distress insured in that association or certain other associations; that it had been arranged that the vessels in those other associations should be bound by like conditions, and that the question of remuneration for services rendered should be determined by the committees of the associations. It is also said that the defendant ship was insured in another association, and that the policy by which she was insured in that other association incorporated the rules of that association, which had rules substantially to the same effect. Then, having both ships insured in that way, the secretary of one of the clubs was called as a witness, to say that there is a mutual arrangement between the clubs for the purpose of assessing salvage claims. So far there has been, in a roundabout way, an arrangement suggested between the owners of the ships; not a word about the master and crew. It is then said that the master and crew are fixed by this arrangement, and have become parties to it, because a notice was exhibited on board each ship. A copy of it has been furnished to the court. There the evidence really stops, because, though it is sought to say that the master and crew in some way assented to that state of things, so far as the evidence goes, the master says although he knew of this notice, he knew nothing whatever about the provision to go to arbitration, and that he never had been told anything about it and never agreed to it. The other evidence is substantially to the same effect; for instance, the engineer is called and says, "that has nothing to do with the crew." I think it is quite clear that the master and crew never, in fact, thought that they were bound, as salvors, by what it is suggested was an intimation to them that they were so bound; so that the suggested contract put forward by the defendant seems to me to fail entirely of proof, because he does not prove that the parties suing ever agreed in any way to be bound. I think there would be great difficulty in this case in establishing such a matter even with stronger evidence than is put forward, for the reason that the master and crew are employed by their owners on the basis of certain articles. Those are the terms of their employment, and amongst them there is a stipulation, that as between owners and master and crew any salvage shall be divided in halves. That enables the crew to say: "When you have got anything you must give us half of it"; but, then, how are they bound in any way afterwards to render salvage services at all? There appears to me to be nothing to show that they are. This card only shows that the association is amalgamated with other associations for the purpose of towage services, and it states that all masters are bound to render and accept assistance when necessary to and from other vessels insured in the associations; but how bound? They never agree to be bound. They are on the ship, and the only contract they have made is to be employed by their owners upon the basis of the articles. They never agree to be bound to render or accept assistance, and unless a great deal more is proved, it seems to me they remain free agents to render services upon such terms as are usual. I think, therefore, that this case may be disposed of on those grounds as a pure question of fact, and I do not desire to enter into what seems to me a very difficult question—namely, what would be the position if it could be proved that the master and crew had agreed to go to arbitration. Then there would still be raised the question whether this court would have power to review any decision which might not meet, from any cause, the justice of the case. I do not wish to throw out any words now which should in any way lessen the jurisdiction of the court. There are other questions as to how far the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act affect the case, and I do not wish to express an opinion on such a matter, which would require very careful consideration. Upon the merits it seems to me that we ought not to interfere with the judgment of the court below, as upon the facts there is nothing to show me that it has arrived at an erroneous conclusion.

Collision—Compulsory pilotage in London district—Ship carrying passengers—Constant trader—6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59—Order in Council the 18th Feb. 1854—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 603 and 622.

The Order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854, extending the exemptions from compulsory pilotage, contained in sect. 59 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, in so far as it deals with ships and vessels trading to ports between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic, applies only to ships and vessels which are "constantly" trading between such ports.

The words "ship or vessel trading" are descriptive of the vessel, and not merely of a particular voyage, but, in order to constitute a constant trader within the meaning of sect. 59 and the Order in Council, it is not necessary that a vessel should be exclusively engaged in trading to ports between Boulogne and the Baltic.

THIS was a collision action brought by the owners of the steamship British Prince against the owners of the steamship Cayo Bonito. The British Prince, a steamship of 7326 tons gross register, was at the time on a voyage from New York to London and Antwerp with a general cargo, cattle, horses, and cattlemen. The Cayo

Bonito, a steamship of 3427 tons gross register, belonging to the Cuban Steamship Company, was on a voyage from London to Goazacoalcos, via Antwerp, Havana, and Vera Cruz, with a part cargo, and carrying one passenger. The collision occurred about 10.15 p.m. on the 8th Feb. 1902 in the Thames estuary near the Black Deep Lightship. Both vessels were, it was alleged, compulsorily in charge of pilots at the time of the collision. At the trial of the action before Barnes, J. and Trinity Masters, the learned judge came to the conclusion on the facts that the collision was solely caused by the negligence of the pilot in charge of the Cayo Bonito at the time, and reserved the question as to whether the employment of the pilot was compulsory or not for further information. The case is reported on the question of compulsory pilotage in the London district.

The Pilotage Acts and Orders in Council referred to in the judgment are as follows:

By sect. 1 of 5 Geo. 2, c. 20, it is provided:

From and after the twenty-fourth day of June in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and thirty-two, if any person shall take upon himself the charge of any ship or vessel as pilot down the river of Thames, or through the North Channel to or by Orfordness, or round the Long Sand-head into the Downs, or down the South Channel into the Downs, or from or by Orfordness up the North Channel, or the river of Thames, or the river of Medway, other than such person as shall be licensed and authorised to act as a pilot by the said master, wardens, and assistants [of the Corporation of the Trinity House] for the time being . . . every person so offending, and being thereof lawfully convicted . . . shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of twenty pounds: Provided, that nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to the obliging of any master or owner of any ship in the coal trade, or other coasting trade, to employ or make use of any pilot.

By sect. 2 of 48 Geo. 3, c. 104, it is provided:

That from and after the first day of October one thousand eight hundred and eight, it shall be lawful . . . for the Corporation of Trinity House of Deptford Stroud, and they are hereby required to appoint and license under their common seal, fit and competent persons, duly skilled, as pilots for the purpose of conducting all ships and vessels, sailing, navigating, and passing up and down or upon the rivers of Thames and Medway, and all and every the several channels, creeks, and docks thereof or therein, or leading or adjoining thereto, as well as between Orfordness and London Bridge, as from London Bridge to the Downs, and from the Downs westward as far as the Isle of Wight, and in the English Channel from the Isle of Wight up to London Bridge, which vessels shall be conducted and piloted by such pilots so appointed and licensed, by no other pilots or persons whomsoever, except pilots appointed by the Society or Fellowship of the Trinity House of Dover, Deal, and the Isle of Thanet (commonly called Cinque Port pilots) so far as such pilots are hereby authorised to pilot ships and vessels from the westward up to London Bridge, and from London Bridge downwards to the westward; that is to say, from any port or place between the Isle of Wight and the said bridge, according to the provisions in that behalf hereinafter contained, and also save and except, as well all colliers, as also all ships and vessels trading to Norway and to the Cattegat and Baltic, and likewise round the North Cape and into the White Sea, and save and except all constant trades inwards from the ports between Boulogne inclusive, and the Baltic, such ships and vessels having British registers, and coming up or going down the North Channel by Orfordness, but not otherwise; and likewise save and except all coasting vessels and all Irish traders using the navigation of the river of Thames as coasters.

The material part of sect. 2 of 52 Geo. 3, c. 39<sup>7</sup> is as follows:

Save and except as well all colliers and also all ships and vessels trading to Norway, and to the Cattegat and Baltic, and likewise round the North Cape, and into the White Sea; and save and except all constant traders inwards from the ports between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic, such ships and vessels having British registers, and coming up the North Channel by Orfordness, and not otherwise; and likewise save and except all coasting vessels, and all Irish traders using the navigation of the river Thames as coasters.

Sect. 59 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, is as follows

Provided always, and be it further enacted, that, for and notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, the master of any collier, or of any ship or vessel trading to Norway, or to the Cattegat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, on their inward or outward voyages, or of any constant trader inwards, from the ports between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic (all such ships and vessels having British registers, and coming up either by the North Channel but not otherwise), or of any Irish trader using the navigation of the rivers Thames and Medway, or of any ship or vessel employed in the regular coasting trade of the kingdom, or of any ship or vessel wholly laden with stone from Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, and being the production thereof, or of any ship or vessel not exceeding the burden of sixty tons, and having a British register, except as hereinafter provided, or of any other ship or vessel whatever whilst the same is within the limits of the port or place to which she belongs, the same not being a port or place in relation to which particular provision hath heretofore been made by any Act or Acts of Parliament, or by any charter or charters for the appointment of pilots, shall and may lawfully, and without being subject to any of the penalties by this Act imposed, conduct or pilot his own ship or vessel when and so long as he shall conduct or pilot the same without the aid or assistance of any unlicensed pilot or other person or persons than the ordinary crew of the said ship or vessel.

By sect. 1 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 129 so much of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, as related to the Cinque Port pilots was repealed, and the Trinity House and Cinque Port pilots were amalgamated.

Sect. 21 is as follows:

And whereas it is expedient to give facilities for amending the system of pilotage . . . . . Be it enacted that it shall be lawful for every pilotage authority, by regulation or bye-law made with the consent of Her Majesty in Council from time to time to do all or any of the following things in relation to pilots and pilotage within their respective districts—viz.: To exempt the masters of any ships or vessels, or of any classes of ships or vessels, from being compelled to employ pilots, and to annex any terms or conditions to such exemptions, and from time to time to revoke and alter any exemptions so made, and to revise and extend any exemptions now existing by virtue of any Act of Parliament or charter, upon such terms and conditions and in such manner as such authority, with such consent as aforesaid, may think fit.

Order in Council, 18th Feb. 1854:

Regulation for the extension of the exemptions from compulsory pilotage now existing under the provisions of the 59th section of the Act 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, submitted by the Corporation of Trinity House for the consideration of Her Majesty in Council, pursuant to the provisions of the 21st section of the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 127:

The masters of the undermentioned ships and vessels shall, subject to the provisions contained in the 59th section of the Act of Parliament, 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, in respect of the employment of unlicensed persons, be exempted from compulsory pilotage—viz.: Of ships and vessels trading to Norway, or to the Cattegat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, when coming up by the south channels. Of ships and vessels trading to ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic on their outward passages, and when coming up by the south channels. Of ships and vessels passing through the limits of any pilotage district on their voyages from one port to another port, and not being bound to any port or place within such limits nor anchoring therein.

Sects. 353 and 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) are as follows:

Subject to any alteration to be made by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the power hereinbefore in that behalf given, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory immediately before the time when this Act comes into operation; and all exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing within such districts shall continue in force.

Sect. 379. The following ships, when not carrying passengers, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district and in the Trinity House outport districts, that is to say . . . . (3) Ships trading to Boulogne or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne.

The material part of the Order in Council of the 21st Dec. 1871 is as follows:

And whereas the Trinity House of Deptford Strond, being the pilotage authority for the said districts, hath submitted for the consideration of Her Majesty in Council the following bye-law (that is to say: That all ships trading from any port or place in Great Britain within the London District or any of the Trinity House outport districts to the port of Brest in France, or any port or place in Europe north and east of Brest, or to the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, or from Brest, or from any port or place in Europe north and east of Brest, or from the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man to any port or place in Great Britain within either of the said districts, when not carrying passengers, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage within such districts. Now, therefore, Her Majesty . . . . is pleased to declare her consent to the same.

Sects. 603 (1) and 625 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. 60) are as follows:

Sect. 603 (1). Subject to any alteration to be made by the Board of Trade or by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the powers hereinbefore contained, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts where it was compulsory immediately before the commencement of this Act, but all exemptions from that compulsory pilotage shall continue to be in force.

Sect. 625. The following ships when not carrying passengers shall, without prejudice to any general exemption under this part of this Act, be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district, and in the Trinity House outport districts (that is to say: (3) Ships trading from any port in Great Britain within the London district or any of the Trinity House outport districts to the port of Brest in France, or any port in Europe north and east of Brest, or to the Channel Islands or Isle of Man. port in Great Britain within the said London or Trinity House outport district.

The evidence called showed that the Cayo Bonito belonged to the Cuban Steamship Company, and was one of several vessels regularly engaged in two lines—one running between London, Antwerp, Cuba, and America and back, and the other between London and New Orleans, calling sometimes at Bermuda. The prospectus of the company was also put in.

Aspinall, K.C. and Dawson Miller for the plaintiffs, the owners of the British Prince.

Laing, K.C. and Bullock for the defendants, the owners of the Cayo Bonito.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear from the judgment.

June 19.—BARNES, J.—This was the case of a collision which took place on the 8th Feb. last between the British Prince and the Cayo Bonito, in the estuary of the Thames, near the Black Deep Lightship, and the question of fault was heard before me some time ago. I held that the Cayo Bonito was in fault for the collision, but that the fault rested with the pilot of that ship, and the question of whether or not the pilot was compulsorily employed was reserved for consideration. It was argued before me a considerable time back, and then the case stood over for some further information with regard to the service on which the Cayo Bonito was engaged. It is only within the last few days that that information has been furnished to me. The Cayo Bonito was a large vessel belonging to the port of London, of 3427 tons gross register, and at the time of the collision she was on a voyage from London to Antwerp, and then from Antwerp to Goatzacoalcos, which I think is near Vera Cruz, Mexico. She had some cargo on board and one passenger, and it was in the course of the passage from London to Antwerp that the collision between her and the British Prince took place, about the place which I have mentioned. The plaintiffs contended that the employment of the pilot was not compulsory by law, but the defendants contended that it was so compulsory, and that, therefore, they ought to be acquitted from the judgment in this case. The question of compulsory pilotage in this present case is one of very considerable difficulty, and the difficulty arises from what I cannot help considering the present unsatisfactory state of the legislation which affects the question of pilotage and the exemptions from pilotage in the Thames and its estuary. If one looks through the Acts it is extremely difficult to come to any satisfactory conclusion upon them, and although I have examined them as carefully as I can, I feel that in the decision which I am about to give I cannot arrive at that conclusion with any confidence. There are two questions. One, I think, is entirely a question of law, and the other is either a simple question of fact, or possibly it may be termed a question of mixed law and fact. The legal question is, what is the true meaning of the Order in Council which the case turns upon, and the second is, when one has placed a meaning upon that order, whether this vessel is to be treated as falling within the exemption which that order provides for, having regard to the circumstances of her trading. Now, pilotage in this locality is compulsory under sect. 622 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, which provides that, subject to any alterations made by the Trinity House and the exemptions under this part of this Act, pilotage shall be compulsory within the London district and the Trinity House outport districts; and therefore, unless the exemptions there referred to apply to this ship her pilotage would have been compulsory. The exemptions which the plaintiffs rely upon in this case, or rather the one exemption which is material, is an exemption in the Order in Council of 1854. As this vessel had a passenger on board, the provisions of sect. 625 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 do not apply, because the exemptions in that section only apply when the ship is not carrying passengers; but there are two sub-clauses to that section which have a bearing upon this case, because of a construction placed upon the word "trading" in them, which, it is contended, affects the decision in this case. Now, the exemptions conferred by sect. 625 not being applicable, the plaintiffs have to rely upon other exemptions, which, as I have already said, are exemptions in the Order in Council; and it is to be noticed that the exemptions in the Order in Council were held in the case of The Earl of Auckland (ubi sup.) to have been preserved by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and so it was conceded they were preserved by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 in the same way as they had been preserved by the Act of 1854. The 603rd section of the Act of 1894 is the section which was relied upon as still continuing those exemptions. Now, the Order in Council is one which was made on the 18th Feb. 1854, and it is shortly stated, but sufficiently fully for my purpose, in Lushington's Admiralty Reports, p. 167. [His Lordship then read part of the Order in Council set out above.] The plaintiffs say that this exemption applies in this case, and that the words "ships and vessels trading" practically mean the same as ships and vessels on a voyage from the port of London to a port or ports between the ports on the Continent, mentioned in that clause, which I have named; while the defendants' contention is that the words "ships and vessels trading" mean "constant traders," because they contend that that Order in Council must be read with the 59th section of

THE CAYO BONITO.

6 Geo. 4, c. 125. In reply to that contention, in addition to the point already referred to which the plaintiffs make, they make a further point by saying that even if it is to be construed as referring to "constant traders," this vessel was, within the true meaning of such words, a constant trader from London to Antwerp, which is included in the area mentioned, and was so trading at this time.

Now, the legislation is somewhat voluminous, and the Acts, I think, require a careful consideration, and are not easy to follow very accurately, at first, without bearing in mind that at one time there were two bodies connected with the pilotage of the Thames—namely, the Trinity House pilots and the Cinque Ports pilots; the latter being engaged in piloting vessels coming from the west to the Thames and Kentish ports. The first Act I think it necessary to refer to is 5 Geo. 2, c. 20, which dealt with the Trinity House pilots. [His Lordship read part of sect. 1.] That is the first exemption to which I have been referred to. The next Act is 48 Geo. 3, c. 104, s. 2. Stating its terms briefly from a marginal note, there is this provision: "From the 1st Oct. 1808 the Corporation of Trinity House of Deptford shall license fit persons as pilots to conduct all vessels within certain limits, and none others shall act, except as herein stated." There is an exception of pilots appointed by the Society or Fellowship, of Pilots of Dover, Deal, and the Isle of Thanet, commonly called Cinque Port pilots. [His Lordship then read sect. 2.] It is to be observed that the exemption is to constant traders inwards, from ports mentioned, such vessels having a British register, and coming up and going down the North Channel, and my impression is, from an examination of the Acts, that the words "going down" were erroneously introduced—that the intention at that time had been to exonerate ships coming inwards from the ports mentioned, to London, having British registers, and in that way, for reasons which are mentioned in various reports to Parliament and so forth, to favour British ships coming inwards, as against foreigners coming inwards. That Act was an Act only to be in force for four years from the passing of it, and the subject was again dealt with by the Legislature by the 52 Geo. 3, c. 39, which became a more permanent Act. It is in the 2nd section again provided that the Corporation of the Trinity House shall license fit persons as pilots within certain limits, and those limits were for all vessels and ships passing up and down or upon the Thames and Medway, &c. Then there were powers given to the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports to license pilots for ships and vessels sailing and navigating from the westward up to the Thames and Medway—"that is to say, from Dungeness up to London Bridge and Rochester Bridge, and from the Buoy of the Brake to the westward—that is to say, from the said buoy to the west end of the Owers." Then there was this exemption: [His Lordship then read the portion of the section dealing with the exemption.] That, so far as is material, is practically the same as the Act I have referred to, except that the words "going down" are omitted in the considered Act passed in 1812. There was a report of a Committee in Parliament on the question of these Acts in 1824, I think, which made certain recommendations, but as far as I can make out the recommendations were not fully carried out. The next Act of Parliament which dealt with the subject is the one which is referred to in the Order in Council, and is an Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, and sect. 59 is the one which contains the exemptions provided by the Act. [His Lordship read the section.] Now, the word "either" seems to be a mistake. The section otherwise is very much the same as the Act of 1812, providing for the freedom from pilotage of "constant traders" inwards from ports north of Boulogne, coming up by the north channel. Then came the statute of 1853, which is the 16 & 17 Viet. c. 129, which amalgamated the Trinity House pilots and the Cinque Port pilots, and by the 21st section gave power for every pilotage authority by regulation and Order in Council to do certain things. [His Lordship then read the material part of the section.] It was in pursuance of that section that the Order in Council of Feb. 1854, which I have already referred to, was made. Now, upon that state of things there are two cases to mention. The first is Reg. v. Stanton (ubi sup.) which decided that, "The exemption given by stat. 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, from the necessity of employing licensed pilots to masters piloting their own ships on the voyages there specified, without the aid of an unlicensed pilot, is continued by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and this exemption applies as well to ships carrying as to ships not carrying passengers, and is not affected by the exemption given in sect. 379 of the same Act to ships on particular voyages not carrying passengers." That was the case of a regular trader to the Baltic, which had passengers. There was also the case of The Earl of Auckland (ubi sup.), which was the case of a vessel whose ordinary occupation was carrying goods and passengers between London and Rotterdam, and had passengers on board, and which case decided, in the same way as Reg. v. Stanton that the exemptions given by 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, supplemented by the Order in Council of 1854 were maintained by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. Then, as I have already mentioned, the Act of 1894 kept these exemptions alive, and therefore if they are applicable to the present case those cases show those exemptions are treated as still existing, and of course I must follow those decisions.

Now, in addition to the exemptions I have already referred to, there were in sect. 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 exemptions of the following ships, when not carrying passengers, in the London district and Trinity House outport districts, amongst others: namely, ships trading to Boulogne or any place in Europe north of Boulogne. That exemption was somewhat modified by an Order in Council on the 21st Dec. 1871, which had practically the effect of extending the coast line, if I may so express it, from Boulogne to Brest, making therefore an exemption of vessels not carrying passengers, trading from London to any port between Brest and any place in the north of Europe. These exemptions, although the words were "trading to," were held in The Wesley (ubi sup.) to apply to vessels both ways, that is going outwards or coming in, though there seems possibly some doubt whether, on the language of the exemptions, that was correct. This class of exemption was further provided for by the 625th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, which I have already referred to. [His Lordship then read the section.] Those provisions clearly provide for the inward and outward trading, when not carrying passengers, but they are not applicable to the present case, because the ship was carrying a passenger. They are material to the discussion of the case because of the language, which is "ships trading," and certain decisions upon the meaning of "ships trading," and the argument of Mr. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, that those decisions really concluded this case. Now, the first of those decisions is Courtney v. Cole (ubi sup.). In that case "A British ship was one of a line of vessels making regular voyages from London to Japan and ports in the East, and back to London, and thence to ports in Europe north of Boulogne and back to London. On a return voyage from the East she went, as usual, to London. She there discharged part of her cargo and her crew, and then, with the bulk of her cargo and a crew of runners, but without passengers, proceeded to Holland. Held, that she was a ship 'trading to' a place north of Boulogne, and therefore exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district." Lord Coleridge and the late Master of the Rolls (then Smith, J.) decided the case upon the construction placed by them upon the 379th section of the Act of 1854, and they held that the vessel was, within the meaning of the words of the section, a ship which was trading to a place north of Boulogne. The judgment of Smith, J. contained this passage (57 L. T. Rep. at p. 413; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 173; 19 Q. B. Div. at p. 457): "This being so, in my judgment the words in sub-sect. 3 are not to be read as meaning the constant trading to Boulogne or any place in Europe north of Boulogne, but as meaning what they say—i.e., when a ship in fact is trading to Boulogne or north thereof, and, I would add, from (and possibly to) the London district and the Trinity House outport districts, she is exempt. The argument addressed by the pilots, that in sect. 59 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, the word 'constant' is used, and that by sect. 353 of the Act of 1854 compulsory pilotage was to be enforced as theretofore, in my judgment avails nothing in the face of the fact that the word 'constant' is expressly omitted in the later section—viz., 379. I would add that, should I be wrong in the interpretation I put upon the words of sect. 379, sub-sect. 3, the findings in the case, especially those in pars. 5 and 9, show that the Cardiganshire was a constant trader from London to Amsterdam and back; for it seems to me impossible to hold that the words of the sub-section mean only trading to Boulogne and north thereof, which must be the pilots' contention if they are correct upon their interpretation of the sub-section as applied to the facts of this case." So it was held there that when a ship not carrying passengers was in fact trading from London to Europe north of Boulogne she was within the exemption of the 379th section of the Act of 1854, and that that was so although that was not her only trade. It is to be noticed in that case it was a ship which was a trader to Japan and the East, as part of her trading. She made the passage from London to Amsterdam and Hamburg and back as part of that trade. That case was followed by The Rutland (ubi sup.). That case was the case of a ship laden with cargo, from the River Plate to Rotterdam, with cattle, for London. She had discharged the cattle in London and proceeded with the cargo to Rotterdam, and it was held that whilst the ship was proceeding from London to Rotterdam she was, although she took no cargo in in London, trading between London and Rotterdam, within the meaning of the section, and therefore exempt from compulsory pilotage in the London district. She had no passengers, and the question, of course, was whether at that time the 625th section of the Act of 1894, sub-sect. 3 was applicable. The view which I understand the House of Lords took in that case may be gathered from one short sentence in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, when he said (76 L. T. Rep. at p. 663; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 271; (1897) A. C., at p. 335): "For my own part I cannot adopt the view that you are entitled to change the participle into an adjective, and I do not think it would carry us to a right conclusion if you did. A 'vessel trading' points to the particular act of trading, which is the matter that was in the mind of the Legislature." Lord Watson said: "I can find nothing in the Act of 1894 which requires that the words of sub-sect. 3 shall be construed in any other than what I venture to term their ordinary and natural import; and, when so construed, I think they include every ship which has left the port of London and is on her way to Brest or to any of the other ports which are named in the statute, in pursuit of a commercial adventure." Now, Mr. Aspinall argued that those two cases were applicable to the present case, and that it was sufficient to bring a ship within the exemption contained in the Order in Council, if she was on the particular occasion trading from London to a port within the limits of the coast-line referred to; and that in substance the words "ships or vessels trading" should be construed in the Order in Council practically in the same way as they were construed in the 379th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and the 625th section of the Act of 1894. There seems to me to be very considerable difference between the considerations applicable to the one set of exemptions and the other. Possibly there is some difficulty in distinguishing the exemptions in the Order in Council and the exemptions in the Act of 1854, sect. 379, but there is clearly not so much difficulty in distinguishing between the Order in Council and the Act of 1894, s. 325, because the language of sub-sects. 3 and 4 seems to point to a particular act of trading, rather than to a description of a vessel engaged in a trade. I do not myself consider that the question before me is determined by the two decisions to which I have just referred, and I think that it is necessary to consider what is the true meaning of the Order in Council which is relied upon by the plaintiffs. Now, I think it is necessary to notice, in the first place, that it has been decided in The Vesta (ubi sup.) that "ships and vessels" in the Order in Council mean British ships, and that the reason for so treating the Order in Council is that it ought to be read with 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, which provides that the ships and vessels referred to are all to have British registers, and therefore as the Order in Council will extend the exemptions existing under the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, the words "ships and vessels" are not to be read as referring to all ships and vessels, but to ships and vessels having British registers; and that therefore the Order in Council is not to be read literally. Sir R. Phillimore, in giving judgment in The Vesta (46 L. T. Rep., at p. 496; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 519; 7 P. Div., at p. 245), said: "I am of opinion that this absurdity does not arise, and that the exceptions in this Order in Council do not apply to foreign vessels, but that the words 'ships and vessels' when used in the portion of the Order in Council I have read, must mean British ships and vessels, which alone are dealt with by the material portions of the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, to which section the Order in Council in question, so far as it relates to exemptions, is subsidiary, and of which it is explanatory. I think, moreover, that this was the opinion to which Dr. Lushington inclined in the cases of The Earl of Auckland (ubi sup.) and of The Hanna (ubi sup.)." Now, if the Order in Council is to be read in the way that Sir R. Phillimore read it, not literally, but as subsidiary to the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, one must see what is meant by the words "ships or vessels trading." In the 59th section it is used of ships or vessels trading to Norway or the Cattagat or Baltic, on inward or outward voyages, and I cannot help thinking that "ship or vessel trading" is there descriptive of the vessel, and not merely a particular voyage with which she is for the moment concerned. Then, again, "of any constant trader"—that, I think, cannot refer to one particular occasion on which a vessel is proceeding, but to a description of the vessel; and so, also, Irish trader was to mean ships or vessels employed in the regular coasting trade of England. Therefore, I think, it seems probable that the words "ship or vessel trading" were used in the Order in Council, especially having regard to the words "to ports between Boulogne and the Baltic on their outward passages, and when coming up by the south passages," as descriptive of a class of vessel, and not simply of the particular voyage on which the vessel happened to be engaged at the moment. Now, having regard to these considerations, the inference which I draw from the use of the words in the Order in Council is that it refers, as I have said, to a description of vessels—one which speaking in general terms, may be distinguished as engaged in the trade between London and the continental ports included in the coast area.

The question then comes to be, whether this vessel was so engaged, or was not. That is the second question in the case, and it is necessary now to see what the facts are. The Cayo Bonito belonged to the Cuban Steamship Company, which had several other vessels, and evidence has been given as to the nature of the employment of these vessels and other ships which, I think, they charter from time to time. Substantially it comes to this, that the vessels were worked in two lines. The prospectus of the company was put in, and that described the company as having been formed under the above title for the purpose of developing and carrying on on a more extensive scale a line of steamers between London, Antwerp, and Cuba. Then a list was put in of the ships and their advertised times of sailing from London and Antwerp to Havana, Vera Cruz, &c. I find the "fine screw steamship Cayo Bonito" is mentioned. Under that there is a description of the Cuban Line of steamers from London to New Orleans direct. The Cayo Bonito is also put down as one of the steamers serving in that line. It appears that, shortly stated, this vessel, with others, was engaged in working two lines. One may be described as a line from London to Antwerp, and then on to America and back, and the other as a line from London to New Orleans direct, with liberty to call at Bermuda. So that you have a very difficult question of fact to determine. The vessel in this case, if I recollect the evidence rightly, had made one voyage previously to this action, going from London to Antwerp, and then on to Mexico. On the voyage in question she was on the same round from London to Antwerp, and then on to Mexico, and I think I am right in stating that since the disaster she has made another voyage from London to Antwerp and Mexico, with part of the same cargo. A schedule or statement of the working of the ships of the Cuban Line has been handed in, but substantially it seems to me that you have a vessel belonging to a company which is employed, so to speak, in two lines, because although she has been on the voyages she has made—I think she is a new ship—only on this round from London to Antwerp and then to America, she is advertised, and it was stated she might be used, to go to Bermuda direct, and thus fulfil the service of both lines. Although we may analyse and examine this statement more fully, I do not think I should come to any other statement of the position than that which I have done. Possibly I might add this, that it does not appear that vessels going to Antwerp always go to Antwerp, but they appear to do so generally. That presents this matter for consideration. If the Order in Council is to refer, using a neutral term for a moment, to regular traders, is a ship so engaged a constant or regular trader between London and Antwerp, which is included in the coastal area? I think that is an exceedingly difficult question to determine, because there may be two views taken. There may be the view that the word "constant" is used in the sense of a vessel doing nothing else but going between London and the Continent, and here the use of the word "constant" is that which is used in mathematics—namely, an inflexible, unalterable quantity, as opposed to a fluctuating, variable quantity. The other is that it is used in a business sense, of a vessel which is regularly engaged in the particular trade, but not so absolutely constantly going backwards and forwards that there is never any departure from the voyage between the Continent and London. The only light I can obtain upon this question appears to me to be that which is found in the judgment of Smith, M.R., in Courtney v. Cole (ubi sup.), where he says that, if it were necessary to find that the vessel in Courtney v. Cole was a constant trader, it was impossible to hold that the words of the sub-section of which he was speaking (sub-sect. 3, sect. 379, of the Act of 1854) meant only trading to Boulogne or any place in Europe north of Boulogne. His view, certainly, was that a vessel would still be a constant trader if part of her duty or business was to go from London to the Continent, though the remaining and larger and more substantial part seemed to go from this side of the Atlantic to ports in Japan and the East, and the voyage between London and Antwerp or Boulogne, or Hamburg or Amsterdam, whichever it was, is a very small portion of that larger business in which the ship is engaged. So that the view which he took of a constant trader does not simply limit the ship to going backwards and forwards between the port of London and the Continent. Therefore, if this ship were absolutely regularly engaged, so that she never did anything except go between London and Antwerp and then on to America, she would be, within the language which the late Master of the Rolls used, a constant trader, although she did not only go backwards and forwards between London and the Continent. That leaves a further matter. Does the word trading, as used, or constant trader, allow any departure from always going to a continental port after leaving London by being taken off the regular line, which includes calling at a continental port, and going, on occasions, direct from this country to other than a continental port? In other words, is a ship which is to come within that definition of constant trader one which must never depart from it, and never make any other voyage except that which would include going to a continental port? I have thought about this matter a good deal, and I do not feel able, having regard to the general terms of the Act, to place such a strict meaning upon it, because it seems to me it would involve this remarkable result, that, if a ship which was habitually—so habitually as never to do anything else—engaged in going from London to Antwerp, we will say, and back, were for any particular voyage taken off and run to some other port—for instance, London to Bordeaux—for a voyage, and then to be put back on to her regular trade, it would destroy her constancy, so to speak; and the ship would never, although in an ordinary business sense regularly engaged in going backwards and forwards, dare to depart, for business purposes, for fear of destroying her constancy, and thus being taken out of the exemption which otherwise she would avail herself of. I cannot help thinking that the true result to arrive at is that the use of these terms must be regarded from a business point of view, and that if it is a part of the regular business of a ship to proceed from this port of London to the Continent, between the limits mentioned, she is, within the meaning of the Order in Council and the section, a constant trader, and therefore exempt from the compulsion to take a pilot. That is the conclusion I have come to, and in the result I hold, therefore, that this vessel was as a matter of law and fact within the exemption, and that her pilotage was not compulsory. That leaves the defendants responsible for the collision, and therefore there will be an order of the Cayo Bonito alone to blame.

THE PORT VICTORIA. (a)

Action in rem—Negligence—Putting out to sea to avoid collision—Loss of anchor and chain—Consumption of extra stores—Liability of wrongdoing vessel for losses incurred in consequence.

A steamship slipped her anchor and put out to sea in order to avoid a collision with another steamship, which had negligently been allowed to drag her anchor and cause danger of collision.

Held, in an action in rem, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the value of the anchor and chain lost, and the coals and stores consumed in consequence of having to put to sea.

THIS was an action in rem brought by the owners of the steamship Norman against the owners of the steamship Port Victoria to recover the value of an anchor and chain lost, and of coals and stores consumed, by reason of their vessel having had to put to sea in order to avoid a collision with the Port Victoria.

The plaintiffs' case was, that on the 5th Oct. 1900 the Norman, a twin-screw steamship of 7537 tons gross register, belonging to the Union-Castle line, while on a voyage from East London to Durban with mails, passengers, and a general cargo, was lying at anchor in the outer anchorage ground, Port Natal. The Norman was in a safe and proper berth and was riding to a single anchor with seventy-five fathoms of chain, the weather was clear but threatening, and there was a strong breeze increasing to a moderate gale from the east with a rough and rising sea and a heavy swell. About three-quarters of a mile ahead of her the Port Victoria, a steamship of 3378 tons gross register, was lying with her port anchor down and forty-five fathoms of cable out, contrary to the provisions of art. 7 of the Port Regulations, which requires vessels to lay with not less than seventy fathoms of chain. About 3.20 p.m. it was noticed the Port Victoria was dragging her anchor and getting dangerously close to the Norman. The engines of the Norman were accordingly put slow astern and the cable veered out to 135 fathoms, but about two hours afterwards the Port Victoria fouled the cable of the Norman. Signals were then made to the Port Victoria, which had a tug in attendance, to slip her cable and keep clear, but nothing was done, and the Port Victoria continued to drift down upon the Norman. Eventually she came so close that the master of the Norman decided to slip his cable and put out to sea, where he remained until daylight the following day, when he considered it safe for him to return.

It was agreed between the parties that the expenditure incurred for loss of anchor and chain and coals and stores consumed amounted to 308l. 1s. 6d.

The defendants admitted that the Port Victoria dragged her anchor and fouled the Norman's chain, but alleged that the Norman, when she arrived, anchored too close to leeward of the Port Victoria. As soon as the port anchor was found to be foul of the Norman's cable the starboard anchor was also let go, but this also fouled the cable. Both anchors were subsequently hove in again and the chains cleared, and the Port Victoria was manœuvred under her own steam until this had been done. It was only after this had been done that the Norman slipped her cable and put out to sea. They contended that it was not necessary for the master of the Norman to have slipped and put out to sea, that there was no actual collision between the vessels, and that, under the circumstances, an action in rem would not lie to recover the loss.

By art. 7 of the Regulations of the Port and Harbour of Port Natal, issued in 1900 by the Natal Harbour Department:

Vessels should lay at single anchor with not less than seventy fathoms of chain out, having the second anchor ready for letting go. The anchor should be weighed and sighted occasionally, especially after bad weather. Should any accident occur by which a vessel may drift or lose an anchor, the facts of the case must be notified in writing to the port captain.

Scrutton, K.C. and Mackinnon for the plaintiffs.—The master of the Norman did the only prudent thing under the circumstances, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the loss they have suffered. In an American case it has been held that where a vessel is obliged to slip her anchor in order to avoid a collision she is entitled to recover the value of the anchor and chain from the wrongdoing vessel:

The Perkins, cited in 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. Digest, No. 548.

Aspinall, K.C. and Lewis Noad for the defendants contra.—The master of the Norman was unduly apprehensive, and there was no real necessity for him to slip and put out to sea. The Port Victoria was under control, and was able to use her engines when it became necessary for her to do so. There was no collision, and under the circumstances an action in rem will not lie to recover the alleged loss.

Scrutton, K.C. in reply.

The PRESIDENT.—I believe this is the first case exactly of this kind which has been brought in the Admiralty Court; but the principle governing the case appears to be clear, and, apparently, in America the principle has been applied in similar circumstances. It seems to me clear that if a vessel by negligence drags down towards another, and if it is a natural consequence that the other vessel is obliged to take a step which involves her in some expenditure, that is damage for which the first vessel is liable. Applying those principles to this case, the first question is, Was the Port Victoria negligent? Now, certainly the Norman was not negligent in taking up the position she did, because she appears to have given the other vessel a berth of three-quarters of a mile, and the Elder Brethren tell me that was a proper allowance to make, and that no fault is to be alleged against the Norman on account of the position she took up. Then the Port Victoria undoubtedly dragged down towards her. As regards negligence, I should have thought it was almost a case of res ipsa loquitur. It seems to me that the Port Victoria was driving because she had an insufficient scope of cable. She appears to have been violating the rule of the local authorities, which is that a vessel riding in that anchorage should not have less than seventy fathoms of chain—a rule no doubt prescribed on account of the knowledge possessed by the authorities of the locality, and the dangers to which vessels are there exposed. I do not inquire what exact legal force that rule has, but the Port Victoria chose to ride with forty-five fathoms of chain, and afterwards veered out to only sixty-five. Therefore she was not complying with that rule, and it is shown that she was using an insufficient scope of cable. Then there certainly was a bad look-out, because it was clear that nobody on board her was aware of her dragging until she had dragged a very considerable distance, indeed until she was tolerably close to the Norman. The result of that bad look-out was important, because the master of the Port Victoria may be right in saying that when he got so near to the Norman it might have been unwise to let go the starboard anchor, because it might bring him towards the Norman and prevent his going past her as he intended to do. But if those in charge of the Port Victoria had, in sufficient time, noticed her dragging, they could have used their starboard anchor and never have got near the Norman at all. That appears to me to show clearly that the Port Victoria was negligent in this matter. I do not say anything about the steam. No doubt the Port Victoria ought to have had her steam effectually available, but it is difficult to ascertain exactly what the fact was with regard to her steam; and it is not necessary to go into that question, because, on the other fact which I have mentioned, it is clear to my mind that the Port Victoria was negligent. Under these circumstances, was the expenditure which the Norman has been exposed to so far the consequence of the Port Victoria's negligence as to make her liable? All that can be said against that is said in the phrase used in the argument, that the master of the Norman was unduly apprehensive. That is a matter upon which I have consulted the Elder Brethren, and the view I take upon their advice is that the master of the Norman was, if anything, unduly patient. There was a vessel coming down towards him with the possibility, at any rate, to say nothing more, of the propeller fouling the chain in the same way as the anchor fouled the chain, and the wonder to me is that the master of the Norman did not take action sooner than he did. He appears to me to have exercised a great deal of patience, and to have abstained from taking any step until a time when it must have been getting on for dark, and it was high time, for the safety of the ship, to take some action. I do not see what action he could have taken except that which he did take—namely, slipping the cable and himself getting away out to sea. In those circumstances it seems to me that the Port Victoria is liable for what occurred, and the natural consequence appears to have been a loss of 308*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* There will be judgment for the plaintiffs for that sum with costs.

THE USKMOOR. (a).

*Collision—Duty of steamship to indicate her course by whistle—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Application of art. 28.The obligation under art. 28 of the Collision Regulations on a steamship in sight of another to indicate by signals on her whistle that she is taking any course authorised or required by the rules is imperative.The words "taking any course authorised" mean everything which by the rules of good seamanship it is necessary and proper should be done.*THIS was a collision action brought by the owners of the steamship Minnetonka against the owners of the steamship Uskmoor.The collision occurred about 10.45 a.m. on the 9th June 1902 in the English Channel, off the Royal Sovereign lightship.The plaintiff's case was that the Minnetonka, a twin screw steamship of 13,400 tons gross register, was proceeding up Channel in the course of a voyage from New York to London with a general cargo and passengers, and was between Beachy Head and the Royal Sovereign lightship.

The weather was fine and clear, there was a light N.N.E. wind, and the tide was flood of the force from two to three knots an hour.

The Minnetonka was proceeding on a course of S. 76deg. E., and was making about fifteen knots an hour through the water.Under these circumstances the Uskmoor was seen about two and a half miles off, and bearing about three-quarters of a point on the starboard bow with her masts open on the starboard side in a position to pass all safe starboard to starboard.The Uskmoor, however, instead of keeping her course, was seen to port, and the helm of the Minnetonka was accordingly also ported and the Uskmoor brought on to the port bow, when it was steadied, but very shortly afterwards the Uskmoor was seen to be starboarding, whereupon the helm of the Minnetonka was starboarded and steadied, and the vessels brought starboard to starboard. The Uskmoor was then seen to be again porting, and the helm of the Minnetonka was also ported, a short blast sounded on her whistle, and the starboard engine put full speed astern. The Uskmoor, however, again starboarded, and came on, and with the bluff of her starboard bow struck the Minnetonka a heavy blow on the port bow, and then on the port side aft. When the Uskmoor was seen to be starboarding the port engine of the Minnetonka was also put full speed astern.The plaintiffs charged the defendants (inter alia) with improperly altering her helm from time to time when the vessels were in a position to pass each other all clear, with neglecting to sound her whistle and give any indication of her course, and with not stopping and reversing, and with failure to obey arts. 18 and 28 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.The defendants' case was that the Uskmoor, a steamship of 3587 tons gross register, was proceeding down Channel on a voyage fromBlyth to Cape Town with a cargo of coals, and was to the eastward of the Royal Sovereign lightship. She was steering a course of W.  $\frac{3}{4}$  S. southerly, and was making about eight knots an hour through the water with engines working at full speed.In these circumstances the Minnetonka was seen coming up Channel about seven miles off, and bearing about two and a half points on the starboard bow.The Uskmoor continued on her course, and shortly afterwards, when the Royal Sovereign was abeam, the course was altered to W. by N. magnetic.The Minnetonka at this time was still a long distance off and on the starboard bow, and in a position to pass starboard to starboard, but when about two miles off she was seen to port her helm and pass under the stern of another steamer which she had been overtaking.The Minnetonka continued under a port helm as if intending to cross the bows of the Uskmoor until she bore about ahead, when she starboarded her helm and straightened up again a little on the starboard bow of the Uskmoor and to the southward of the other steamer. As soon as the Minnetonka was seen to be starboarding the engines of the Uskmoor were stopped, but the Minnetonka continued to come on gradually broadening on the starboard bow of the Uskmoor, but when a short distance off she ported, and although the engines of the Uskmoor were put full speed astern, collided with the Uskmoor.The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with improperly failing to pass the Uskmoor starboard to starboard, with improper porting, with not indicating her course by the whistle, and with not stopping and reversing. They also charged them with neglecting to comply with art. 28 of the Collision Regulations.

Art. 28 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is as follows :

The word "short blast" used in this article shall mean a blast of about one second's duration. When vessels are in sight of one another, a steam vessel under way, in taking any course authorised or required by these rules, shall indicate that course by the following signals on her whistle or siren—viz: One short blast to mean "I am directing my course to starboard." Two short blasts to mean "I am directing my course to port." Three short blasts to mean "My engines are going full speed astern."

The case is reported on the question of the proper interpretation of art. 28.

conclusion about the whistling rule. It is not easy to construe it so as to deal with all possible cases. The words of the rule are not at all easy to make out. Its application is limited in two ways. Vessels must be in sight of one another, and must be "taking any course authorised or required by these rules." It is not easy to put a clear interpretation upon the second limitation, although the first one is intelligible enough. The rule does not apply where a vessel in conducting manœuvres in the ordinary course of navigation, quite apart from seeing any other vessel, thinks it right to port or starboard her helm. But the rule is also limited to "taking any course authorised or required by these rules." It has been sought to put a rather narrow interpretation upon the rule. Of course the word "required" is clear enough. There are certain things required by the rules to be done. But the word "authorised" is very much larger, and I am inclined to think that a large interpretation ought to be given to it; that everything is authorised which by the rules of good seamanship it is necessary and proper should be done, although it is quite true there are certain cases where you may say a more distinct authorisation arises. For instance, an overtaking vessel, which has to keep out of the way of the overtaken vessel, would be authorised in going to port or starboard, according as the circumstances of the case might require, and of course, under the crossing rule, the vessel which has to keep out of the way is authorised to do so by either one of several means, as the case may seem to require. I do not think the matter ought to be tied down to any narrow interpretation of the rule. But even if it was so, I think in this case it is right to say that the course taken by the Minnetonka, according to her own story, was a course authorised by the rules. According to her case, when the other vessel which was approaching her ported, she thought it right to port also, and it is by no means certain that might not be brought within the crossing rule, which imposes a duty of keeping out of the way, and authorises it to be done by any appropriate means; but that in the larger sense of the word her course was authorised by the rule appears to me clear. On the whole, therefore, it appears to me that under the circumstances of this case the obligation of whistling was imposed upon the Minnetonka at an earlier time than the officer who was in charge thought it necessary to whistle. He did at a later period whistle, and quite rightly. The reason he gave for not doing so before, which I do not wish to press against him, though it probably reflects the mind of a good many sailors, was that he did not think it was necessary to obey the rule, except in the case of vessels meeting in narrow waters. I wish emphatically to say that the rule is not so limited, and it is necessary to say that with some emphasis, because the experience of this court shows that the rule has not been followed by the nautical world with the completeness which its terms demand. I hope captains in future will err, if they err at all, on the side of whistling. I am obliged, therefore, to say that in this case I think the officer in charge of the Minnetonka was wrong. I think, when he took action corresponding to the somewhat extraordinary manœuvre which the Uskmoor was pursuing in front of him, it was his duty to give the clearest possible indication to the Uskmoor of what he was doing, and in that duty he failed. Then it is said that it could not and would not have affected the collision, but after considering the question with the Elder Brethren, I am unable to accept that view. If he had given the Uskmoor a very clear indication at that time that he was porting—and the inference would be that he would pass port to port—I think it might have been borne in upon the mind of those on the Uskmoor that they had to pass port to port; and it might have prevented the Uskmoor from afterwards attempting the extraordinary manœuvre she did perform. I think the Uskmoor did not have the help which would have been afforded her by a very clear whistle. Then I have to consider the closely analogous question of the Minnetonka's stopping. She did at a later stage help matters by stopping one of her two engines, and later on she put the engines full speed astern. She recognised at a later stage, at any rate, that it was her duty to bring herself to a standstill, and I cannot help thinking, and the Elder Brethren agree with me, that it was her duty under the circumstances to have stopped and brought herself to a standstill at an earlier time. The result is that I am compelled to hold both vessels to blame.

THE LEITRIM. (a)

By the uniform practice of average adjusters a loss of time charter freight is never included in general average.

Where such practice is not in conflict with legal principles it ought to be followed.

A fire occurred on board a vessel which was under time charter, and in order to extinguish it a sacrifice was incurred. Whilst the vessel was undergoing repairs the hire ceased under the terms of the charter-party.

Held, that the shipowner was not entitled to any compensation in general average for the delay caused by the sacrifice.

ACTION brought by the owner of the steamship Leitrim against the British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company claiming the sum of 66*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, their proportion of a general average contribution under a policy for 4000*l.* on the steamship Leitrim.

The following was the agreed statement of facts:—

1. The plaintiff is the registered managing owner of the steamship Leitrim, and is suing on behalf of himself and all others the owners of that vessel. Such owners were at all material times fully interested in the policy for 4000*l.* upon the Leitrim issued by the defendant company and dated the 18th June 1900.

2. The Leitrim is a steel screw steamship of 4284 tons gross and 2811 tons net register. For the purpose of carrying frozen meat her No. 2 lower hold is insulated by means of two layers of match boards between which are charcoal and paper. Inside the chamber, and fixed to these boards, run brine pipes for the purpose of refrigeration. These pipes are carried along the sides and the top and bottom of the chamber, and pass from it through a cross-bunker to the refrigerator engine.

3. By a charter-party dated the 2nd Feb. 1900, to which defendants refer for its terms, the Leitrim was chartered by Messrs. William Milburn and Co. for five calendar months from the date of her delivery to the charterers, with an option to the charterers (under clause 16) to continue her employment for a further period of five calendar months. This option was exercised, and, at the time of the events giving rise to the action, the period of employment under this charter-party was to determine on or about the 20th Jan. 1901.

4. By a charter-party dated the 5th Sept. 1900 Messrs. William Milburn and Co. sublet the Leitrim to Messrs. Houlder Brothers and Co. for a voyage from Barry to Cape Town with a full cargo of coals.

5. In pursuance of the last-mentioned charter-party the Leitrim after bunkering at Liverpool proceeded to Barry, and on the 12th Sept. 1900 began loading the cargo of coals into No. 2 hold. On the 13th Sept. No. 2 hold was completed. On the 15th Sept., while the loading was proceeding in the other holds, fire broke out in No. 2 hold, and this fire spread to the bunker coals stowed in the cross-bunker abaft that hold.

6. In order to extinguish the fire it was found necessary to pour large quantities of water into both No. 2 hold and this cross-bunker. After the fire was extinguished the coals from No. 2 hold and from the cross-bunker were landed and sold, and were eventually replaced by new shipments.

7. A portion of the insulation in No. 2 hold was damaged by the fire, and parts of the steel work of that hold and in the cross-bunker were burned and buckled. In addition to this fire damage to insulation, the employment of water to extinguish the fire so damaged the charcoal and paper of the insulation as to necessitate the renewal of nearly all of it, and, in order to replace and repair it, all the brine pipes in this hold and in the cross-bunker were necessarily removed.

8. The time occupied in extinguishing the fire, discharging the damaged coals, and entirely repairing and refitting the vessel extended from the 15th Sept. to the 24th Oct., a period of thirty-nine days. The time necessary for the repair of the insulation damaged by water, together with the incidental removal and reinstatement of the brine pipes, would by itself have been thirty-one days.

9. In respect of the period of thirty-nine days Messrs. Milburn and Co. claimed, and were properly allowed by the plaintiffs, a deduction from the hire of the vessel of 2160*l.* under clause 17 of the charter-party of the 22nd Feb. 1900.

10. Either party may refer without further proof to the following documents (a list of documents then followed).

11. It is admitted that the disbursements, and expenses appearing in the statements above mentioned (e) and (f) were in fact incurred, and properly incurred. The correctness of the various calculations and apportionments therein made is also admitted, if the statements are made up upon correct principles, but no admission is made as to such principles.

By clause 17 of the charter-party entered into between the plaintiff and Messrs. Milburn and Co. it was agreed:

That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four working hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service, or should she in consequence put into any other port than that to which she is bound, the port charges and pilotages at such port to be borne by the steamer's owners, but should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo, such detention or loss of time shall be at the charterers' risk and expense.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the plaintiff was entitled to compensation in general average for any portion of the loss he had incurred by reason of the hire ceasing whilst the vessel was undergoing repairs.

Evidence was called by the defendants at the trial to prove that, according to the practice of average adjusters, a loss of time charter freight was in no case included in general average.

Carver, K.C. (Cambier with him) for the plaintiff. — This is clearly a general average sacrifice, and comes within the definition of Lawrence, J. in Birkley v. Presgrave (1 East, 220), who says at p. 228: "All loss which arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made or expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo comes within general average, and must be borne proportionately by all who are interested." The pouring of the water into the hold, and consequent damage to the insulating plant, was for the preservation of ship and cargo. The ship-owner here has sacrificed the hire during the time his ship was being repaired in consequence of a sacrifice for the common benefit, and the practice of adjusters not to allow for loss of time does not give proper effect to the principles of general average. He referred to the following cases:

Power v. Whitmore, 4 M. & S. 141;

Attwood v. Sellar, 42 L. T. Rep. 644; 4 Asp. Mar.

Law Cas. 283; 5 Q. B. Div. 286;

Anglo-Argentine Live Stock and Produce Agency v. Temperley Shipping Company, 81 L. T. Rep. 296; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 595; (1899) 2 Q. B. 403.

Scrutton, K.C. and Hamilton, K.C. (Mackinnon with them) for the defendants, contra. — It is not in accordance either with principle or with the practice of average adjusters to include a loss of time charter freight in general average. This is an attempt to bring into general average a loss of freight under a time charter with which the cargo owner has nothing to do. There was no reason why the repairs should not have been done at the termination of the voyage at Cape Town. This is a case of first principle. There are no authorities in point, and it is submitted that the universal custom of average adjusters should be followed. Such custom is not in conflict with the law. The consequences which follow from delay to various interests are never included in general average, e.g., demurrage, wages and provisions of ship's crew at port of refuge, loss of interest on freight and cargo. In Anglo-Argentine, &c., v. Temperley Shipping Company (ubi sup.) the wages of cattlemen and expenses of water and fodder were claimed, but disallowed by Bigham, J. They referred to:

THE LEITRIM.

BARNES, J.—This is a case in which a Mr. Hudson, as managing and part owner, claimed on behalf of himself and the other co-owners of the steamship Leitrim a sum of 66*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* alleged to be due on a policy of marine insurance on the said steamship, dated the 18th June 1900. The defendants, the British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company, dispute the claim, and, the matter having been brought before me, it was agreed that the question for the decision of the court was whether an item of 1340*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* for sacrificing time of hire was rightly included in a certain adjustment of general average. If it is rightly included, it was agreed that there is to be judgment for the plaintiffs for 66*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, and if it was not rightly included, there is to be judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff sues on a policy for 4000*l.* on the Leitrim. She was a large vessel, fitted for carrying frozen meat in her number two hold. She was chartered by time charter, dated the 2nd Feb. 1900, to Messrs. William Milburn and Co., and her period of hire was to expire about the 20th Jan. 1901. The hire, according to the charter-party, was at the rate of 1680*l.* British sterling per calendar month, and there was a cesser clause in the charter which was in these terms: [His Lordship then read clause 17 of the time charter.] There was also in the time charter a power to sublet, the charterers remaining responsible for the due fulfilment of the conditions of the charter. The vessel was sublet by a charter dated the 5th Sept. 1900 to Messrs. Houlder Bros. and Co. Limited for the purpose of carrying a cargo of coals from Cardiff, Penarth, or Barry to Cape Town. Freight was to be paid at the rate of "35*s.* per ton of 20 cwt. or 1015 kilos. delivered, or on bill of lading quantity, less 2 per cent., at receiver's option, to be declared in writing before cargo is broken." On the 13th Feb. last, whilst she was loading coals at Barry, a fire broke out in her No. 2 lower hold, and the following statement of what occurred is taken from the admissions of facts: [His Lordship then read the agreed statement of facts.] An average statement was made up, which was put before me when the case was argued, and according to that statement, as originally prepared, the 4000*l.* insured with the British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company was to pay 210*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* At the instance of the plaintiffs the average statement appears to have been reconsidered, and an addition is to be found in a further statement towards the end of the document. That is, "net loss of time freight resulting from detention under repair of general average damage exclusively, after crediting wages and provisions of crew, already allowed in general average, 1340*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.*" Then the statement goes on, "Allow for general average 1340*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.*," &c. That really represents the deduction, so to speak, of the time hire which the charterers have made as against the ship owners in respect of the thirty-one days which I have already referred to in the statement of the facts, which was the time necessary for the repair of the insulation, damaged by water, together with the incidental removal and reinstatement of the brine pipes. It is to be observed that it is not the full amount of the deduction, because, there has been included already in the general average statement the wages and provisions of the crew. That appears to have been done because the sub-charter included the York-Antwerp rules. The net result of what I have stated is that the sum of 1340*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* is introduced into the general average statement as "the net loss of time freight resulting from detention under repair of general damage." Then there is an apportionment further on in the statement, in which the matter is thus treated; the steamer is put down as of net value, including made good, of 34,810*l.* and its proportion of general average at 3038*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.*; the insulation, including made good, is put down at 8050*l.*, and its proportion of general average at 702*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.* Then there comes the part of the apportionment which gives rise to the difficulty—namely, "total freight at risk, less port charges, wages, &c., 7026*l.*"; of which there was at risk of charterers 5544*l.*, and at risk of shipowners 1482*l.*, add made good on account of loss of time hire 1340*l.* The total amount of shipowners' time freight is put down at 2822*l.* Then, freight which is put down as at the risk of the charterers—namely, 5544*l.*, is made to bear in general average a contribution of 483*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.*, and the freight at risk of shipowners has to contribute 246*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* The cargo then, "as per previous statement," is put down at 4726*l.*, and has to bear 412*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.* Then, when that is apportioned so as to apply to the policy affecting the defendants, the original figure which I have mentioned as payable by them—namely, 210*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*, becomes 277*l.* 4*s.* The balance to pay is 66*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, the amount sued for in this action.

The question that is raised by these facts is both interesting and difficult, and so far as I am aware it has not been considered in the courts. It was, however, well argued before me by Mr. Carver for the plaintiffs and Mr. Scrutton and Mr. Hamilton for the defendants, and I cannot help feeling I should like to have read, prior to the argument, all the books to which I was referred and others to which I have myself referred, because there is no doubt that when a point of this kind is presented for the first time, when one proceeds to consider it after the argument various points occur to one which have not necessarily been as fully dealt with in the argument as if one had been prepared with full knowledge of the law and cases applicable to the point. However, if this case is ever re-argued the parties will have an opportunity of reconsidering the various matters with which I am proposing to deal. At the hearing before me, evidence was given by experienced average adjusters to the effect that according to the practice of average adjusters a loss of time charter freight in such cases is never included in general average. No evidence to the contrary was given, and I think, therefore, it may be taken that the practice of average adjusters is uniform on this matter. So that the question comes to be whether this practice is right, because, although it was suggested by the defendants' counsel that as the sub-charter provided that in case of average the same was to be settled according to the York-Antwerp Rules, 1890, and under rule 18 of those rules—which is as follows: "Adjustment, except as provided in the foregoing rules"—which, I may mention do not apply to the present case—"the adjustment shall be drawn up in accordance with the law and practice that would have governed the adjustment

THE LEITRIM.

had the contract of affreightment not contained the clause to pay general average according to these rules"—the adjustment should be in accordance with the practice, yet that rule does not, in my opinion, mean that the adjustment is to be in accordance with practice if the practice conflicts with the law. I have therefore to determine what is the law applicable to this case. The real question appears to me to be whether the shipowners are entitled to some compensation in general average for the delay caused by the sacrifice. I do not think that the question is whether they are entitled to be compensated in general average for the particular consequences of the delay in this case, because that would be to make the rights and liabilities of the cargo owners, depend entirely on the contract of time charter, to which they are in no way parties. The shipowners' loss of freight is caused by the operation of the cesser clause which I have already referred to. If that clause had not been inserted the time charterers would have remained liable to pay the freight in accordance with the principle upon which the old case of Ripley v. Scaife (5 B. & C. 167) was decided, and in my opinion the cargo owners ought not to be affected by the question of whether the loss of time falls, by the contract between the shipowners and time charterers, to be borne by the one or the other. If the time charterers had to continue paying freight during the delay the measure of their loss would appear to be the loss of the freight which would have accrued to them but for the delay. Mr. Carver relied upon the well-known passage in Lawrence, J.'s judgment in Birkley v. Presgrave (ubi sup.), which is "All loss which arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made or expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo comes within general average, and must be borne proportionately by all who are interested." He argued that the hire for thirty-one days was lost by the sacrifice, and that therefore it ought to be borne proportionately by all who are interested. But in my opinion the words "all loss" in this and other statements of the principle of general average have not the width of meaning attributed to them by Mr. Carver. They ought not, I think, to be held to extend to include losses which, to use a term which has been employed, are the result of "accidental circumstances" affecting the loser and are not losses which the other persons interested ought in ordinary course to be treated as concerned with. This term is to be found in the judgment of Lord Esher in Rodocanachi v. Milburn (56 L. T. Rep. 594; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 100; 18 Q. B. Div. 77). That was an action by charterers against shipowners for non-delivery of cargo, and the plaintiffs had sold the cargo to arrive. It was held that in estimating the damage the market value at the time when the cargo should have arrived must be looked at, and not the price at which the plaintiffs had sold the cargo. Lord Esher said: "But the value is to be taken independently of any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff. It is well settled that in an action for non-delivery or non-acceptance of goods under a contract of sale the law does not take into account in estimating the damages anything that is accidental as between the plaintiff and the defendant, as, for instance, an intermediate contract entered into with a third party for the purchase or sale of the goods. It is admitted in this case that, if the plaintiffs had sold the goods for more than the market value before their arrival, they could not recover on the basis of that price, but would be confined to the market price, because the circumstance that they had so sold the goods at a higher price would be an accidental circumstance as between themselves and the shipowners; but it is said that, as they have sold for a price less than the market price, the market price is not to govern, but the contract price. I think that if the law were so, it would be very unjust. I adopt the rule laid down in Mayne on Damages, which gives the market price as the test by which to estimate the value of the goods, independently of any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff, and so independently of any contract made by him for the sale of the goods. That rule gives the mode of estimating the value which is to be taken for the purpose of arriving at the damages." Then he proceeds to other matters which do not concern my present purpose. It is for similar reasons that although, where goods have been sold to arrive and have been jettisoned in circumstances giving rise to a general average loss, the actual loss to the merchant is the price at which the goods were sold, yet the market value of the goods at the time of the ship's discharge is the basis of compensation. So, also, in my opinion, the reason why where a ship has been chartered at one rate of freight and goods have been shipped at a different rate of freight the chartered freight is left out of consideration in assessing the compensation for freight lost by jettison of goods, is that chartered freight is a matter with which the owners of cargo are not concerned, and its loss may be the result of "accidental circumstances" peculiar to the shipowner. I am led to the conclusion that the cargo owners have no concern with the contract between the shipowners and the time charterers, that the loss of freight under it caused by the delay is the result of an accidental circumstance peculiar to the shipowners and time charterers, and that the question is whether the shipowner is entitled to be compensated in general average on the basis of the ordinary consequences of the delay as if the ship were carrying the goods simply under the contract under which they were shipped.

It is a different question from that which has been discussed in text-books as to the allowance in general average, to the owners, of the expenses of maintaining and paying the crew during the delay caused by the execution of repairs rendered necessary by a general average sacrifice. I know it has been thought by some that by common law these expenses are not to be included in general average in such a case, but the cases which are referred to by Mr. Lowndes and criticised by him on p. 241 do not appear to me to go this length, and I agree with what Lord Thesiger said in Atwood v. Sellar (42 L. T. Rep. at p. 647; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 287; 5 Q. B. Div. at p. 291), that "As a matter of fact it is extremely doubtful whether the expenses for wages of crew or provisions in a port of refuge have ever been disallowed by our courts, as constituting a claim for general average, in a case where a ship has put into the port to repair damage, itself belonging to general average." The wages and provisions of the crew during the delay in question have been allowed in general average in the present case, apparently under the York-Antwerp Rules, which are referred to in the sub-charter, and I have not to decide anything about them, though as at present advised there appear to me to be strong reasons for holding that at any rate wherever the delay is to repair damage, which is itself the subject of general average, the wages and maintenance of the crew during such delay should be allowed by law in general average. But it does not at all follow that the mere loss of the profitable employment of the vessel as distinguished from actual expenses should in such a case be allowed. In the first place, so far as I can ascertain a loss of this character has never been claimed in general average. It is not introduced in the York-Antwerp Rules, nor can I find any trace of its being allowed by the laws of any foreign country, though many of them contain provisions as to the allowance in general average of the wages and maintenance of the crew. It may be said, why on principle should not the loss of time be compensated for where that loss is due to the necessity for repairing damage, itself the subject of general average? I think the answer is that although possibly there may be cases in which the loss of time is not common to all concerned, at any rate in cases like the present the loss of time is common to all the parties interested and all suffer by the delay, so that the damages by loss of time may be considered proportionate to the interests, and may be left out of consideration. Were this otherwise, great inconvenience would arise and enormous difficulty be found in attempting to ascertain what was the proper amount of loss on each of the numerous interests which go to make up a shipping adventure. An average adjuster has a heavy task now when he has to deal with actual losses and values, but if he were also to have to assess speculative and estimated losses his task would be still heavier. Moreover, this inconvenience and difficulty is practically obviated by treating everyone's loss of time as proportionate to his interests, and not bringing it into account. This appears to work substantial justice, for, referring to what I have said about "accidental circumstances peculiar to a party," it seems clear that if the losses by delay—I am not dealing with expenses—were to be investigated the accidental circumstances would be excluded, with the result that all that could be considered would be the loss of the profitable employment during the delay of the capital invested in each interest concerned; and it would be unreasonable to embark upon an examination of what, upon such a basis, would be the loss on each interest; so that for all practical purposes the losses may be considered as proportionate to the interests, and left out of consideration altogether. Mr. Carver felt the difficulty there is in allowing claims for delay of a general character to be introduced into a statement of general average, and he endeavoured to distinguish between such claims and that in the present case, the former, as he said, being speculative and the latter definitely ascertainable. But, as I have already noticed, this definite loss is due to arrangements between the actual owners and the owners pro hac vice of the vessel, which ought not to affect the cargo owners who had no cognisance of such arrangements, and are not parties thereto, and place their goods on board the vessel on the terms that they shall be subjected to the ordinary incidents involved in so doing. In my opinion, therefore, the practice affecting this matter, proved by the average adjusters who have been called, is in accordance with legal principles, and is right, and I answer the question submitted to me in the negative. The consequence is that judgment will be for the defendants, with costs.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Smith, M.R., Williams and Stirling, L.J.J.) affirming a judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial in the Commercial Court.

The judgment of the Court of Appeal is reported 85 L. T. Rep. 389; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 254; (1901) 2 K. B. 896; and that of Bigham, J. 83 L. T. Rep. 282; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 139; (1900) 2 Q. B. 748.

The action was brought by the appellants, Messrs. Raeburn and Verel, of Glasgow, as plaintiffs, on a policy of marine insurance on the steamship Balmoral, subscribed to by the respondent with other underwriters, to recover a portion of general average charges and salvage charges incurred in respect of the Balmoral and her cargo.

The policy sued upon was a time policy, dated the 20th Dec. 1898, for a period of twelve months from noon of the 5th Dec. 1898, and was against the usual risks.

The following clause is material for the purposes of this action:

The said ship, &c., goods and merchandise, &c., for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and assurers in this policy are and shall be valued at say on: Hull, tackle, apparel, furniture, &c., valued at 20,000l.; machinery, boilers, &c., and everything connected therewith, valued at 13,000l.—total, 33,000l.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

BALMORAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. MARTEN.

The policy was underwritten by the respondent for the sum of 480*l*.

On the 22nd and 23rd June 1899, during the currency of the policy, certain salvage services were rendered to the Balmoral and her cargo (her machinery having broken down) by the steam trawler Amroth Castle; general average expenses were also incurred for the hire of tugs to tow the ship and cargo to London.

In an action in the High Court of Justice (Admiralty Division) by the owners of the Amroth Castle for salvage, the value of the Balmoral was proved by her owners in the usual affidavit of values at 40,000*l*., and an award of 560*l*. and costs was made on the basis of that value.

The same value was also adopted as the value of the ship for the purpose of assessing its contribution to the general average expenses by Messrs. May and Meikle, of Glasgow, average adjusters.

The average adjusters, in apportioning the general average expenses and salvage charges between the interests at risk, made the ship valued at 40,000*l*. pay 58*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*. general average and 472*l*. 2*s*. for salvage charges.

They then dealt with these amounts in respect of the insurances on ship as follows:

The ship pays general average, 58*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*.; if contributory value 40,000*l*., pays 58*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*.; insured value 33,000*l*., will pay 48*l*. 2*s*. 6*d*.; the ship pays salvage charges, 472*l*. 2*s*.—520*l*. 4*s*. 6*d*.

The adjusters thus charged to the insurers on ship in respect of general average thirty-three fortieths of the sum paid by the ship, and in respect of salvage charges the entire sum paid by the ship.

The appellants having claimed to recover from the respondent on the basis that the underwriters were liable to pay the whole of the general average payable by the ship—viz., 58*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*.—and not the thirty-three fortieths of such amount shown in the average statement, and also the whole of the salvage charges payable by the ship—viz., 472*l*. 2*s*.—the respondent contended that the underwriters' liability to compensate the appellants in respect of general average and salvage charges was limited to thirty-three fortieths of the sums of 58*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*. and 472*l*. 2*s*. respectively, that being the proportion which 33,000*l*., the agreed value of the Balmoral in the policy, bore to 40,000*l*., the value on which the salvage award was made, and the ship's contribution to general average assessed.

The courts below decided in favour of the respondent.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Leck appeared for the appellants, and contended that the ship being fully insured by a valued policy, though it was under-valued, the owners were entitled to an indemnity up to the amount of the policy. The insured is not entitled to make a profit, but only to receive an indemnity if the ship is over-valued, and in the same way he is entitled to an indemnity if the ship is under-valued. There is a difference between a salvage claim and a general average claim. These were volunteer salvors, and the salvage is a particular average loss from perils of the sea, not under the suing and labouring clause. See Aitchison v. Lohre (41 L. T. Rep. 323; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 168; 4 App. Cas. 755), where the rule now contended for was not referred to at all. See also

As to an over-valuation in the case of a constructive total loss, see Irving v. Manning (1 H. L. C. 287), which decided that the real value must be taken. The appellants have paid their share of salvage and general average. Their loss is ascertained, and it is within the limit of the policy. The value cannot be reopened in adjustment, but the appellants are fully insured, and have paid premiums on a sum to cover the whole risk, and are entitled to recover their whole loss and not only thirty-three fortieths of it. Lewis v. Rucker, 2 Barr. 1167.

The rule as to goods is different from the rule as to ships, and gives colour to the appellants' contention. In that case the percentage of depreciation has to be calculated on the arrival value of the goods, which is applied to the insured value. It being on goods as arrived, not on goods as shipped, the case of the ship is not analogous. The rule has been applied to a ship in the case of Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (46 L. T. Rep. 863; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 9 Q. B. Div. 192), which was a very special case. The question has been discussed in America in

It was said in the courts below that this is a rule of long standing, not to be departed from, and that the contract was subject to it, but this is not borne out by the evidence. See also

Scendsen v. Wallace, 52 L. T. Rep. 901; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 550; 10 App. Cas. 404.

The case of The Mary Thomas (71 L. T. Rep. 104; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 495; (1894) P. 168), referred to in the judgments below, is not in point.

Pickford, K.C. and Scrutton, K.C., for the respondent, argued that the contract was to indemnify the assured up to the limit in the policy if he was fully insured, which in this case he was not. The agreed value is conclusive, and the assured is estopped from setting up a higher value. The same rule applies as in the case of damage to goods, and it is an established rule which has been acted upon by English average adjusters for a long time. See 2 Phillips on Insurance, s. 1410, p. 150, 5th edit.

Hamilton, K.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

BALMORAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. MARTEN.

Aug. 5.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: The question in this case is of little consequence as regards the money value of the claim. It is important in its bearing on a rule of practice which has prevailed with underwriters and average staters in this country for a long period. Ship, cargo, and freight have had to contribute to general average and salvage charges. For the purpose of contribution the values of the ship, cargo, and freight at risk were ascertained. There is no question as to the value of the cargo or of the freight. The value of the ship was taken to be 40,000*l.*, being the amount at which it was valued in the salvage proceedings. Contribution from the ship in respect of general average and salvage charges works out at 530*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.* This amount is claimed from the underwriters. The underwriters say: "That may be the proper amount of contribution as between ship, cargo, and freight, but as between us and you the policy on the ship was a valued policy. It was stipulated that 'for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and assurers' the ship, with its machinery and everything connected therewith, was valued at 33,000*l.* As the value in the policy is so much less than the contributory value, we are only bound to pay a proportionate amount, or thirty-three-fortieths of the ship's contribution." To this the shipowners answer: "You are opening the policy. The ship was fairly valued at 33,000*l.* That value as between you and us must hold good for all purposes. You have nothing to do with the value put upon the ship at a different time and for a different purpose. It is impossible to determine with any degree of accuracy the value of a thing which is not an article of commerce. The agreed value in the policy is, or was at the time of the agreement, just as truly the 'real value' as the value arrived at somehow or other in the salvage proceedings. The ship was fully insured, and you must make good the loss just as you would have had to reimburse the cost of repairs made necessary by sea damage." Many authorities were cited, and all available text-books were referred to. But, speaking for myself, I must say that I think that little help is to be obtained from text-books or reported cases. No case was cited which has more than a very remote and indirect bearing upon the question. Mr. Phillips, who upholds the English practice as against the New York practice, for which the appellants contend, puts the case very fairly when he says (s. 1410): "There is nothing in the policy that favours one of these modes of construction in preference to the other, each being consistent with the language of the instrument." His conclusion is that the question must depend upon the application of "the general principles of insurance." But I do not think that we get rid of the difficulty by referring it to the general principles of insurance. It seems to me that there is as much to be said on the one side as on the other. And although I think, if the matter were res integra, that I should prefer the English rule, my preference would be based on this consideration, that the law of marine insurance in this country, although anomalous in many respects, is eminently practical. Just as the agreed value of the ship is disregarded when the question is whether a prudent uninsured owner would repair or abandon, so where there has been a value put upon the ship by a competent authority or adopted by a competent authority, or treated as binding in a business transaction, it seems to me that that value, whether it has or has not the better right to the title of "the real value," cannot be left out of consideration. And I think it a salutary rule and not unreasonable that the underwriters' liability under the policy should be adjusted with regard to it. However that may be, I do not think that Mr. Hamilton, in his able argument, succeeded in proving that the English rule is contrary to principle. That being so, there is, in my opinion, an end of the case, and discussion on the comparative merits of the English rule and the New York rule becomes academical.

The rule that prevails with English average staters is a rule that has been long established. It is well known, and it must have helped to form the basis of a vast number of contracts which are still running, and some of which may run for twelve months to come. In that state of things it seems to me that if the English rule is to be altered, it must be altered by Parliament and not by a decision of this House. It would be open to Parliament, if it should see fit, to enact a new rule, to fix a date for its coming into operation, and so avoid any semblance of injustice to those who have contracted on the footing of the old rule. Stirling, L.J. in his judgment in the Court of Appeal, expresses an opinion that, theoretically, the sum recoverable would be that which would be payable if the agreed value in the policy had been employed in the average adjustment. I venture to think so too. The mode of calculation adopted by the average staters seems rather too favourable to the underwriters. Suppose the value of the ship in the policy, and also for the purpose of contribution, to be 16,000*l.*, the value of the cargo and freight to be 12,000*l.*, and the total amount required to be 840*l.*, the ship would then pay four-sevenths, or 480*l.* Then suppose the ship, for the purpose of contribution, was valued at 18,000*l.*, the value of cargo and freight remaining the same the ship would pay three-fifths, or 504*l.*, that is 24*l.* more than if the value for the purpose of contribution had been the same as the value in the policy. But if you reduce the ship's contribution in the proportion of eighteen to sixteen, the underwriters have only to pay eight-ninths of 504*l.*, or 448*l.*, that is 32*l.* less than would have been payable if the contributory value had been the same as the value in the policy. But there again the rule is well understood, and, though I do not think it quite accurate, I do not think that it ought to be disturbed. Though the rule only speaks of general average, it has always been treated as applying to salvage expenses also. I do not think that any distinction ought now to be made between these two heads of expenditure. The first part of the rule, which says that the insurers are not to pay more than the ship's contribution, although the contributory value be less than the value in the policy, seems to me to be unobjectionable, as the contract of insurance is a contract of indemnity. In the result, therefore, I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord SHAND.—My Lords: I am also of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed, and the judgments of Bigham, J. and of the Court of Appeal affirmed with costs. I confess that I think the case a very clear one, and the ground of my judgment may be stated very shortly. The policy of insurance provides that the ship, for so much as concerns the assured, by agreement between the assured and assurers in this policy, is and shall be valued at, say, 33,000*l.* In all questions of indemnity, therefore, the parties to the policy, insurers and insured, have agreed that, though the ship may in truth be much more valuable, her value is to be taken at 33,000*l.* only. There is no exception. The agreement is to apply in all cases of indemnity which may arise. So if the question were one of principle merely, and the rule of custom and practice, which has been so much referred to, had never existed, the House must give effect to this stipulation or agreement between the owner of the ship and the underwriter or insurer, who asks that the terms of his special contract shall receive effect. An owner may insure so as to cover his whole risk, or he may insure only to cover part of his risk, and prefer to be his own insurer in part, or, to put it in other words, to leave his ship in part uninsured. This he does if he insures his ship below her true value. Thus, having a ship worth 40,000*l.*, he may insure her for 20,000*l.* only, with a clause such as that above quoted, declaring that he has agreed that between him and the underwriter the ship shall be taken to be of that value only. What is the effect of this? Not only that the owner becomes his own insurer for one-half of the value of the ship, but he gets a present benefit. He pays only one-half of the premium which he must have paid had he insured his ship at her true value, and, on the other hand, the underwriter undertakes only the risk corresponding to the reduced premium on one-half of the real value of the ship. In questions of salvage and general average, which at once give rise to claims of indemnity under an insurance policy, the value of the ship is necessarily a material element, for the value of the ship will, with the circumstances in which the salvage services have been given, enter deeply into the question of the remuneration to be given. Of course that value in a question with salvors must be the real value at the time when the salvage services are rendered. Accordingly, in this case the ship was taken at her full value, and the owner had to pay a larger sum than if the value had been 33,000*l.* only. It seems to me that when he claims full relief by way of indemnity, the underwriter in his defence is simply asking that effect shall be given to his stipulation in the policy that in all questions of indemnity the ship shall be valued at 33,000*l.* only. It follows that he is liable to pay only the proportion which the value in the policy bears to the actual value on which the statement has been made up. I therefore agree with Bigham, J. in holding that the rule or custom founded on is in accordance with sound principle; but even if that were open to question, the rule has been so long recognised and acted on that I am further of opinion with your Lordships that effect should now be given to it, and that it should continue to receive effect unless altered by legislation.

Lord BRAMPTON.—My Lords: The steamship Balmoral, by a marine policy dated the 20th Dec. 1898, and underwritten by the respondent, was insured for twelve calendar months against all ordinary perils of the seas. By the policy it was agreed that, for so much as concerned the assurers and the assured, she should be valued at 33,000*l.* In June 1899, while on a voyage from Philadelphia to London, when near the Isle of Wight, the Balmoral met with so strong a gale, and so heavy and irregular a sea, that her tail shaft was fractured, and it became necessary to accept the voluntary assistance of the steam trawler Amroth Castle to tow her, as she did, during two days, when two tugs, which had been engaged and hired for that purpose, took her in charge in the Downs and towed her to the Millwall Dock, London. The cost of these two tugs was 100*l.*, and formed the item of general average in dispute, and the owners of the Amroth Castle were awarded by the Admiralty Court as salvage the sum of 500*l.* In the course and for the purposes of the salvage action it was proved that the contributory value of the Balmoral was 40,000*l.*, so that, having regard to the agreed policy value, she was underinsured to the amount of 7000*l.* In adjusting these two items as between the owners of the ship, cargo, and freight, the adjuster, taking the contributory value of the ship to be 40,000*l.*, assessed the amount to be contributed by the owners for general average at 58*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, and for salvage 472*l.* 2*s.*, making a total of 530*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.* payable by the Balmoral. The question has now arisen between the shipowners and the underwriters, the shipowners claiming that the whole of those amounts is payable by the underwriters, as insurers of a fully-insured ship, the underwriters contending that their liability is limited to such proportion of those sums as the agreed value of the ship bears to the contributory value proved in the Admiralty Court. This would reduce their liability to thirty-three fortieths of the plaintiffs' claim, which they have always been prepared and are willing to pay. Before Bigham, J. it was proved by a highly experienced average adjuster, that for many years a custom had existed which certainly in and since 1874 had been adopted as a rule at Lloyd's, that when a ship is insured for less than the contributory value, the underwriter pays on the insured value. It was proved also that such custom applied to salvage as well as general average, and that salvage had until recently been always adjusted as part of a general average. The owners of the ship contended that the rule was inconsistent with the terms of the policy, for that the Balmoral was a fully-insured ship, being valued as a whole at 33,000*l.*, and being so insured they were entitled to a full indemnity against the claims. Bigham, J. overruled that contention, and refused to disregard the rule, on the basis of which, as he said, policies for many millions had been made, and acting upon it he gave judgment for the underwriters.

In that judgment I entirely agree. I can well understand that in one sense, but in one sense only, the Balmoral may be said to have been fully insured as a ship—that is to say, every part of her structure forming a complete ship was in fact covered by the policy, but not to her full value, for it was expressly agreed in the policy that for all purposes of it her value should be limited to 33,000*l.*, being only thirty-three fortieths of her contributory or real value, in respect of which the salvage was awarded. In adjusting the liability of the underwriters, therefore, the amount of salvage payable by them was properly arrived at having regard to the proportion which the agreed value of the ship bore to the contributory value as proved in the Salvage Court. This was in exact accordance with the custom and rule proved. Based, as the amount of a salvage award invariably is, upon the true contributory value of the ship, and the property saved, I cannot conceive anything more unreasonable or unjust than that an owner should seek to recover from an underwriter salvage based upon a value far in excess of the insured value, and so get the benefit of an insurance without paying the premium largely in excess of the smaller value which as between themselves they have agreed for all purposes of the policy to treat as the true value and to be bound by. Another consideration presents itself to me. It cannot be denied that the ship being for all purposes of the insurance insured for 33,000*l.* only, the property of the owners saved by the salvors was worth 7000*l.* more than the insured amount. What sound or just reason can possibly be urged in support of the claim of the owners to be so indemnified by the underwriters who have received from the owners no consideration for such indemnity? I can see none. Let me suppose that the owners, having insured with the defendants in 33,000*l.* on the ship valued at that sum, had effected another insurance with other underwriters, valuing the ship at 7000*l.* to make up its full value. Would anybody question that the salvage payable on the full value of the ship would be rightly claimed and payable by contributions from both sets of underwriters in the proportions which the sum insured by each bore to the whole value of the property saved—viz., 40,000*l.*? If the assured, whether with a view of saving the premiums or for any other reason, preferred to leave the 7000*l.* uninsured, they became their own insurers to that amount, and I see no reason in law or good sense why they should not bear the burden which they now seek, as I think, improperly, to fix upon the underwriters. I have considered carefully the very able arguments of the learned counsel for the appellants and the cases cited in support of them, but they have not substantially affected the views which I have expressed and entertain. The rule and custom of Lloyd's, upon which Bigham, J. acted, is, in my opinion, sound, sensible, and legal, and I am therefore content to rest my judgment upon it, and agree that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord ROBERTSON concurred.

Lord LINDLEY.—My Lords: This case turns on the effect of expressing, in an ordinary marine policy, an agreed value at which the ship insured by it is to be taken as between the assured and the underwriter. The effect has to be considered with reference to two losses sustained by the assured—viz., (1) his share of a general average loss; and (2) his share of a loss sustained by reason of salvage services for which payment had to be made. The assured's share of these two losses is 530*l.* The ship was valued in the policy at 33,000*l.* In ascertaining the amount payable by the assured for general average and for salvage the ship was valued at 40,000*l.* The underwriters thereupon contend that they are liable to pay thirty-three fortieths of the above-mentioned 530*l.* The assured, on the other hand, say that they are entitled to be paid the whole of this sum, as it does not exceed the limit of 33,000*l.* The underwriters contend that their view is correct in principle, and is in conformity with a long-established custom or practice at Lloyd's invariably followed in this country. The assured do not deny that the last statement is true, but they contend that the custom or practice is contrary to principle, and ought not to be judicially recognised. Bigham, J. who tried the case, and the Court of Appeal have both decided in favour of the underwriters, and your Lordships are asked to reverse their decision. Let us consider the principles applicable to the case independently of any custom or practice at Lloyd's or amongst underwriters. The sum of 33,000*l.* mentioned in the policy is a sum agreed upon between the assured and the underwriter. No one else is in any way bound to value the ship at that sum. If, as here, a general average loss has been sustained and has to be borne by ship, freight, and cargo, according to their respective values, it is plain that the real value of the ship must be ascertained in order to apportion the loss between them, and that the conventional value of 33,000*l.* must be disregarded. So as regards salvage; the salvors are in no way affected by the fact that the ship has been valued at a particular sum in her policy of assurance. The real value of the ship saved must be ascertained, because the amount awarded for salvage depends (inter alia) and to a great extent on the benefit which accrues to the owner of the ship, and this benefit can only be measured in money by the value of the property saved. But, whatever the real value of the ship, when the amount payable by the underwriter to the assured has to be ascertained, her value must be treated as 33,000*l.*; and if the owner makes any claim on him based on the ship being worth more, the underwriter is entitled to say that the claim is not in accordance with the bargain between them. I confess that I see no answer to this argument. It seems to me to follow from the decision of your Lordships in Irving v. Manning (1 H. L. Cas. 287), where the true effect of a valuation clause in a policy was carefully considered and finally settled. For the sake of avoiding all disputes in settling what the underwriter has to pay, the value of the ship is to be taken at an agreed sum. In order to prevent fraud by over-insuring this principle may require qualification, but where, as here, the ship is under-insured, no qualification is necessary. The notion prevalent at one time, and supported by the high authority of Mr. Benecke, that although the valuation in a policy is conclusive in the case of a total loss, yet that in the case of a partial loss the valuation may be opened, has long been exploded: (see 3 Kent's Com. 274, 1 Parson's Marine Ins. 272; 1 Arnould Ins. 299 and 2 Ib. 939, edit. 6). There are numerous decisions showing this to be the case in valued policies on goods and freight (the most recent being The Main, 70 L. T. Rep. 247; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 424; (1894) P. 320); and I am unable to discover any reason for applying to ships a doctrine repudiated as unsound when applied to goods or freight. At the same time, I have not discovered any direct decision on this point. The principle that the valuation in a policy on ships is to be regarded in cases of partial loss was assumed to be correct in Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (46 L. T. Rep. 863; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 9 Q. B. Div. 192), and was not questioned on appeal. The owners, however, contend that the underwriters have no concern with the mode in which the amounts payable for losses insured against are arrived at. The owners say that they are fully insured up to a certain limit, and that if that limit is not exceeded all losses insured against must be fully paid. This appears to me to ignore the difference between valued policies, as understood in this country, and open policies, and to be erroneous according to English law. The introduction of the word "fully" occasions the fallacy in the plaintiff's reasoning. It is not true to say that the plaintiffs are fully insured. If the word "fully" is introduced, it must be qualified, so as to show its true meaning—i.e., fully for a ship of the value mentioned in the policy. If, in this case, the ship had been totally lost the owners would have found themselves uninsured to the extent of the ship's real value over 33,000*l.* To say that the whole value, as fixed in the policy, is insured, and then to treat the assured as fully insured, appears to me misleading. The contract is not fully to insure the shipowner up to a certain limit, but to insure him on the footing that his ship is to be taken to be of the value of 33,000*l.* for the purpose of ascertaining what is payable under the policy. The foregoing observations are as applicable to losses owing to salvage as to ordinary general average losses. There is more difficulty in dealing with salvage losses, as the sum awarded for salvage services is arrived at by considering the risks and dangers encountered by the salvors as well as the value of what is saved; but this value is always a very material matter for consideration; and, other things being the same, it may, for all practical purposes, be fairly regarded as regulating the amount awarded when the sum payable under a valued policy has to be ascertained. So the matter stands on principle.

Let us now consider the custom or practice or rule on which the underwriters also rely. The rule does not mention salvage; but it was proved at the trial that the rule is always applied to losses occasioned by salvage as well as to ordinary general average losses, and I have endeavoured to show that this is correct in principle. The rule, as framed, treats over-insurances and under-insurances differently. It first deals with over-insurances, and says: "If the ship or cargo be insured for more than its contributory value, the underwriter pays what is assured on the contributory value." If this rule is applied to a valued policy, it infringes the principle of taking the agreed value for better and for worse in ascertaining what the underwriter has to pay. This deviation from that principle may perhaps be justifiable in cases of over-insurance, on the ground that it avoids all danger of fraud and endless disputes between over-insured owners and underwriters. But this part of the rule is inapplicable to the present case, and it is unnecessary to say more about it. The second part of the rule applies to under-insurances and to the present case; and there being no danger of fraud, the rule says: "But when insured for less than the contributory value the underwriter pays on the insured value." The rest of the rule is consequential on this. The rule is, in my opinion, not wrong but right in principle, and is calculated to save infinite trouble. The actual method of working out the rule adopted by underwriters may not be arithmetically accurate, but it is simple and convenient; there is nothing unfair in it, it has long been adopted, and there is no justification for disturbing it. It is true that in New York the practice appears to be in favour of the appellants, but in this respect I believe New York stands alone; and although uniformity in these matters is greatly to be desired, your Lordships cannot, in my opinion, judicially do otherwise than dismiss this appeal. So far as the actual words of the policy go, they appear to me consistent with both rival contentions; but the English rule is more consistent than the other with the interpretation which has for years been put on valued policies in this country. The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

(Before COLLINS, M.R., MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ.)

STEEL, YOUNG, AND CO. v. GRAND CANARY COALING COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Construction—Time for loading—Stoppage by strikes—"Stoppage for six days from time of vessel being ready to load"—Charter to "become null and void"—Stoppage commencing after expiration of time for loading.

By a charter-party it was agreed that the vessel should load a cargo of coal for the charterers, "to be loaded in 140 running hours commencing when written notice is given of steamer being completely discharged of inward cargo and ballast in all her holds and ready to load"; and it was provided that in the event of a stoppage arising from strikes "continuing from the period of six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load, this charter shall become null and void, provided however that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the steamer previous to such stoppage." It was agreed the charterers should pay 16s. 8d. per hour demurrage.

Notice that the vessel was ready to load was given on the 8th Aug., and the time for loading expired on the 15th Aug. On the 20th Aug. a stoppage arising from a strike commenced and continued for six days. No cargo had been shipped, and the charterers gave notice that the charter was cancelled.

Held (reversing the judgment of Phillimore, J.), that the charter became null and void if at any time after the vessel was ready to load a stoppage continued for six days and no cargo had been shipped, and that the charterers were therefore entitled to treat the charter as cancelled.

CT. OF APP.] STEEL, YOUNG, AND CO. v. GRAND CANARY COALING COMPANY. [CT. OF APP.]

APPEAL by the defendants from the judgment of Phillimore, J. at the trial of the action as a commercial cause.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Nith, and brought this action to recover damages from the defendants for breach of a charter-party relating to that ship.

By a charter-party dated the 29th July 1900 it was provided that the Nith should proceed to Newport and there load a full and complete cargo of steam coal for the defendants for carriage to Teneriffe or Las Palmas at 10s. 6d. per ton freight.

By the charter-party it was provided as follows:

The cargo to be loaded in 140 running hours (excluding bunkering time, Sundays, custom house, colliery and local holiday, Easter Monday and Tuesday, Whit Monday and Tuesday, and three days following Christmas day, and from 5 p.m. on Saturday or the day previous to any such holiday to 7 a.m. on Monday, or the day after any such holiday, unless used), commencing when written notice is given of steamer being completely discharged of inward cargo and ballast in all her holds and ready to load, such notice to be given between business hours of 9 a.m. and 5 p.m., or 1 p.m. on Saturdays. Any time lost through riots, strikes, lock-outs, or any dispute between masters and men occasioning a stoppage of pitmen, trimmers, or other hands connected with the working or delivery of the coal for which the steamer is stemmed, or by reason of accidents to mines or machinery, obstructions on the railway or in the docks, or by reason of floods, frost, fog, storms, or any cause beyond the control of the charterers, not to be computed as part of the loading time (unless any cargo be actually loaded during such time). In the event of any stoppage or stoppages arising from any of these causes continuing for the period of six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load, this charter will become null and void, provided however that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the steamer previous to such stoppage or stoppages. In case of partial holiday or partial stoppage of colliery or collieries from any or either of the aforesaid causes, the lay hours to be extended proportionately to the diminution of output arising from such partial holiday or stoppage. If longer detained, charterers to pay sixteen shillings and eightpence per running hour demurrage. No deduction of time shall be allowed for stoppages unless due notice be given at the time to the master or owner.

The vessel was completely discharged in all her holds and was ready to load on the 8th Aug., and written notice was duly given.

The 140 hours for loading expired on the 15th Aug., but no cargo had then been loaded.

On the 20th Aug. a colliery strike caused a stoppage of the coal for which the steamer was stemmed, and that stoppage continued for six running days. No cargo had then been put on board.

On the 28th Aug. the defendants gave notice to the plaintiffs that, inasmuch as the stoppage had continued for six days and no cargo had been put on board, the charter had become null and void and was cancelled.

The plaintiffs were unable to obtain another charter until the 3rd Sept., when another charter was obtained at a lower rate of freight.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for delay from the 8th Aug. to the 3rd Sept., and also for the difference in freight. The defendants paid into court a sum for demurrage from the 8th Aug. to the 26th Aug.

At the trial before Phillimore, J. the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Lush, K.C. for the appellants.—The learned judge was wrong in construing the clause in question in this charter-party as meaning that the period of six days must run from the time when notice is given that the vessel is ready to load, and in holding that therefore the provision as to stoppage for six days did not apply if the stoppage commenced after the vessel was ready to load. The proviso that “no cargo shall have been shipped on board the steamer previous to such stoppage,” shows that a stoppage commencing after the vessel was ready to load must have been contemplated and intended to be included. Cargo would not be shipped before the vessel was ready to load, and it could not be shipped afterwards if a stoppage was preventing the loading of the vessel. The construction of the clause adopted by the learned judge deprives that proviso of any effect at all. The clause must have been intended to apply to any stoppage continuing for six days at any time, provided that no cargo had been put on board.

Carver, K.C. and L. Noad for the respondents.—The learned judge adopted the right construction of this clause. His construction gives their natural meaning to the words of the clause, and carries out the object of the parties. The words are that the charter “shall become null and void,” and that is the apt language to be used if our construction of the clause is the right one, but not if the appellants’ construction is adopted. The meaning of the clause clearly is that the position between the parties is to be as if the charter-party had not been made, if, when the vessel is ready to load, there is a stoppage which continues for six days; that the charter is then to be wiped out, and neither party to have any right of action. It cannot mean that the vessel might be kept on demurrage by the charterers for any length of time after she was ready to load without loading any cargo, and that then the charterers, if a stoppage occurred, might say that the charter was null and void, and they were not liable to pay any damages for loss caused by a reduction in the rates of freight. The words “for a period of six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load” cannot refer to a stoppage commencing at any time after the vessel is ready to load. By the charter it was agreed that the vessel should be loaded within 140 hours from the time when she was ready to load. That time expired on the 15th Aug., and there was then a breach of contract by the charterers. The stoppage commenced after that date, and it cannot possibly be said that the charterers, who had then committed a breach of contract, could be entitled to treat the charter as null and void by reason of the subsequent strike and stoppage. The defendants are endeavouring to take advantage of their own breach of contract in not loading the vessel according to the terms of the charter. Proper effect can be given to the proviso as to no cargo having been shipped at the time of the stoppage if our construction of the clause is adopted. Cargo might well be loaded before all the inward cargo was discharged, by arrangement between the parties.

Hamilton, K.C. in reply.—There is no foundation for the suggestion that cargo might be loaded before notice was given that the vessel was ready to load; there was no evidence that such a thing was probable or possible; such a thing would not be feasible in the case of a cargo of coal, according to the ordinary practice; the discharging and loading do not take place at the same part of the port. The charter could not in any case become null and void ab initio, because something must necessarily have been done under it before the continuance of a stoppage for six days can have been ascertained.

Collins, M.R.—This is an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Phillimore, J. at the trial, in an action brought by the shipowners against the charterers of the ship. The question in the case turns upon the construction of a clause in the charter-party. [His Lordship read it.] Notice was given on the 8th Aug., within the terms of that clause, that the vessel was ready to load, and the running hours for loading ended on the 15th Aug. No cargo was loaded at all, and on the 20th Aug. a strike began at the colliery from which the coal was to be loaded, and continued for six running days. The charterers then asserted that they were entitled to say that the charter had become null and void. Accepting the obligation to pay demurrage from the 15th Aug. to the 20th Aug. and for six days afterwards, they say that they are absolved from any further liability in respect of the charter, because the charter had become null and void under the terms of the above clause. Phillimore, J. did not accept that contention, but held that the stoppage for six running days within the clause must be from the time when the notice was given that the vessel was ready to load. The question which we have to decide is whether the learned judge was right in taking that view of the meaning of the clause. Now, I agree that prima facie the first part of the clause with respect to the written notice does seem to make that the point of time from which the six days must run. But the same clause goes on to say, "provided that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the steamer previous to such stoppage." That undoubtedly contemplates a time between the time when the notice is given and cargo is loaded, because it contemplates an interval of time between the notice and the commencement of a stoppage during which cargo may have been put on board, and provides that if any cargo has been put on board, the clause with respect to stoppage for six days is not to operate. Looking at the reason of the whole thing, that is not an unreasonable view; this clause was inserted for the benefit of both parties with a view to the expected possibility of a difficulty in procuring cargo; and the period of six days was provided in order that the parties might be able to form a judgment as to whether the strike was likely to prove serious or not. This was a provision for the benefit of both parties, sometimes more for the benefit of one party than the other when greater loss might occur to the one than to the other. What, then, is the proper construction of the clause? The plaintiffs say that the stoppage for six days must run from the time when notice is given that the vessel is ready to load, because the charter is to "become null and void," which means that the contract is to be wiped out and is inconsistent with anything being done under the contract; that this provision must be applicable only to the inception of the matter when nothing has been done under the contract; and that, if the provision were to refer to any later time, the words "null and void" would not be a proper expression. The plaintiffs were, however, compelled to admit that the expression "null and void" might, in some circumstances, be applicable to a stoppage at a later period than the notice of readiness to load. It seems to me that, if we were to accept the contention of the plaintiffs, it would be impossible to give any fair and proper effect to the words, "provided, however, that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the steamer previous to such stoppage."

It has been suggested that cargo might have been put on board before notice that the vessel was ready to load. That was a mere suggestion without any facts or evidence to support it, or to justify us in construing this clause upon such a supposition. It would not be according to the usual practice that cargo should be so loaded. The natural meaning of those words is that the parties were contemplating the ordinary and natural course of loading. The parties were contemplating the possibility of a stoppage for six days after cargo had been put on board, or of a stoppage for six days when no cargo had been put on board though notice of readiness to load had been given. Apart from the mere suggestions of the plaintiffs, there is no possible construction of that proviso which is compatible with the construction of the clause for which the plaintiffs contend. In my opinion, the appellants' construction of this clause is the right construction, and, as they have paid into court all the damages for which they can be liable, judgment must be entered for them. By the provision as to demurrage the charterers only agree that, beyond the number of days allowed for loading, they must take further time for loading at their own expense; they do not commit any breach of contract by not loading within the limited time. Therefore, there was no breach of contract on the part of the charterers, and there was nothing to prevent them taking advantage of the clause in the charter-party. I think, therefore, that the judgment of Phillimore, J. was wrong, and that the appeal must be allowed.

Mathew, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A somewhat surprising construction of this contract has been suggested by the plaintiffs. The cargo was to be loaded within 140 hours from the giving of notice that the vessel was ready to load, and it was agreed that if the charterers took a longer time for loading they would pay 16s. 8d. per hour demurrage. Is there any reason to doubt that this was a contract for the payment of money for the use of the vessel for loading for any time beyond the agreed 140 hours. Therefore, there was no breach of contract on the part of the defendants in not loading within the agreed 140 hours. It cannot be doubted that in contracts like this the parties contemplate the occurrence of calamities for which neither party shall be made liable. The case of a strike is provided for. The charter-party provides that "any time lost through strikes . . . is not to be computed as part of the loading time, unless any cargo be actually loaded during such time." The running of the agreed time for loading might therefore be stopped by a strike. Then the clause in the charter-party proceeds: "In the event of any stoppage or stoppages arising from any of these causes continuing for the period of six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load, this charter shall become null and void, provided however that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the steamer previous to such stoppage." It is contended by the charterers that, if no cargo has been put on board and a stoppage from a strike has continued for six days, the charter becomes null and void. On the other side, it is contended that this clause has no operation if there was no stoppage from a strike at the particular moment when the vessel was ready to load. I think that this latter contention is not a reasonable one. The object of the clause is to provide for the case of a strike stopping the loading of the vessel for six running days, if no cargo has in fact been loaded. From that proviso as to no cargo having been loaded, it seems to me to be clear that we cannot adopt the narrower construction of the previous words of the clause. It seems to me that the meaning of the clause clearly is that, if there is a stoppage from a strike for six days at any time before any cargo is put on board, the charter-party is to become null and void. I think that the contention of the charterers is right, and that they are entitled to succeed in their appeal.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION v. SJÖFORSÄKRINGS AKTIEBOLAGET VEGA. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Policy for more than twelve months—Continuation clause—Definition of risk—Validity—Stamp Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39) s. 93.

A ship was insured for twelve months by a policy which contained a clause providing that, should the vessel be at sea or abroad on the expiration of the policy, she should be held covered "until arrival at her port of final destination in the United Kingdom, or on the continent of Europe, at a pro rata daily premium to the within." At the date of the expiration of the policy the ship was abroad, and was afterwards lost on her homeward voyage.

Held, affirming the decision of Bigham, J. reported 85 L. T. Rep. 241; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1901) 2 K. B. 567, that the policy was invalid under sect. 93, sub-sect. 3, of the Stamp Act 1891.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a decision of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by an insurance company upon a policy of marine insurance, whereby they had reinsured themselves against certain risks.

The owners of the steamship Merrimac effected with Messrs. Gray, Dawes, and Co., underwriters, an insurance for 4200*l.* on the hull and machinery of the Merrimac against all risks for twelve months, from the 18th Oct. 1898 to the 18th Oct. 1899. The policy was in the ordinary form of a Lloyd's policy, and contained at the foot of it the words: "Including printed clauses as attached." Attached to the policy was a printed slip headed: "Elder, Dempster, and Co. Time clauses." Among those clauses was the following:

7. Should the vessel be at sea or abroad on the expiration of this policy, it is agreed to hold her covered until arrival at her port of final destination in the United Kingdom or on the continent of Europe at a pro rata daily premium to the within.

Four days later, Messrs. Gray, Dawes, and Co. effected a reinsurance with the plaintiff company on part of their risk on the Merrimac. This policy was expressed to be

A reinsurance of Gray, Dawes, and Co., underwriters, subject to terms, pro rata returns, continuation, valuation clauses, and conditions of the original policy and to pay as may be paid thereon.

The plaintiffs then reinsured with the defendants, a Swedish company, part of the risk accepted by them. The policy was drawn up in English and was in the ordinary Lloyd's form, but was executed by the defendant company in Sweden. It covered the same period of time as the original policy, and contained a clause: "Continuation clause as per original policy." It was expressed to be

A reinsurance to the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation subject to all the same clauses, terms, conditions, continuations, &c., that do or shall attach to the original policy and (or) policies, and to pay and (or) receive as may be paid and (or) received thereon, anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding. All claims and (or) losses payable in London. In the event of claim the Vega Company agree and undertake to pay upon the claim note of the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation, stating such claim to have been already settled by same. In case of any dispute under this policy, the Vega Company agree to be bound in all things by the jurisdiction and decision of the English law courts.

During the currency of these policies the Merrimac sustained heavy damage and put into Quebec, where temporary repairs were effected with the intention of bringing the vessel home for permanent repairs. On the 25th Oct. 1899, the twelve months named in the policy having then expired, the Merrimac sailed from Quebec and was totally lost on that voyage home.

The defendant company refused to pay under the policy which they had underwritten, and the plaintiff company commenced the present action.

At the trial before Bigham, J. the policy sued upon was tendered in evidence by the plaintiffs. Bigham, J., acting under sect. 14 of the Stamp Act 1891, then took the objection that the policy was invalid under sect. 93 of that Act, and, after hearing the arguments on both sides, held that the policy was invalid and inadmissible in evidence.

The learned judge thereupon gave judgment for the defendants.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case is reported 85 L. T. Rep. 241; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1901) 2 K. B. 567

The plaintiff company appealed.

The Stamp Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39) provides as follows:

Sect. 93 (1). A contract for sea insurance . . . shall not be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy of sea insurance. (2) No policy of sea insurance made for time shall be made for any time exceeding twelve months. (3) A policy of sea insurance shall not be valid unless it specifies the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sum or sums insured, and is made for a period not exceeding twelve months. (a)

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and A. H. Chaytor for the plaintiff company.—This document is not invalidated by sect. 93. It is not a policy made for a period exceeding twelve months. The document sued upon really contains two separate policies. The first is clearly a time policy for twelve months, and the second, which is contained in the continuation clause is a separate and distinct policy. This second policy, if it be treated as a time policy, is valid, because it is not made for a period exceeding twelve months. But it is really a voyage policy, the voyage being clearly defined as commencing at the spot where the ship happens to be at the termination of the previous time policy, and ending at the port of her final destination in the United Kingdom or on the continent of Europe. That is the proper view to take of this agreement:

Way v. Modigliani, 2 T. R. 30; 1 R. R. 412.

There is no objection, so far as the Stamp Act is concerned, in holding that a document may contain two distinct contracts, as either contract may be stamped separately from the other. Where a contract is capable of two constructions, one making it valid and the other void, it is clear law the first ought to be adopted:

Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of Norwich v. Norfolk Railway Company, 4 E. & B. 397;
North-Eastern Railway Company v. Lord Hastings, 82 L. T. Rep. 429; (1900) A. C. 260.

The particular risk is sufficiently defined to satisfy the requirements of sect. 93, if the beginning and the end of the voyage can be ascertained with reference to events which have happened:

Folsom v. Merchants' Mutual Marine Insurance Company, 38 Maine, 414;
Cleveland v. Union Insurance Company, 8 Mass. 308.

This point was assumed, though not actually decided, in two English cases:

Crocker v. Sturge, 75 L. T. Rep. 549; (1897) 1 Q. B. 330;
Crocker v. General Insurance Company Limited of Trieste, 3 Com. Cas. 22.

But, further, the Stamp Act 1891 ought not to apply at all to this contract. The contract was executed in Sweden by a Swedish company and ought to be construed according to Swedish law. A contract valid according to foreign law may be sued upon in England, although, if it had been made in England, it would not have been enforceable by action:

Leroux v. Brown, 12 C. B. 801.

(a) This section has been amended by the Finance Act 1901 (1 Edw. 7, c. 7), s. 11.—REP.

Here the intention of the parties was to make a valid contract. There is nothing in the contract against public policy, or against morality, nor anything by which the public revenue is injured. There are many instances, such as under the Statute of Frauds or the Statutes of Limitations, in which, under such circumstances, parties can agree not to rely upon the provisions of a statute. The objection taken to this document by Bigham, J. is of that kind which the law leaves to the parties to rely upon or not, as they may desire. As the parties here intended to make a valid contract, the court should infer an agreement between them that the defendants should not rely upon this objection under sect. 93. It is, of course, the duty of the judge to look at a document to see if a sufficient stamp duty has been paid upon it, but here the question is not one affecting the revenue. The question is merely whether the plaintiffs have a cause of action.

Scrutton, K.C. and T. Mathew for the defendant company.—There is no evidence whatever of any agreement between the parties that the defendants should not rely upon sect. 93. Under sect. 14, it is the duty of the judge to look at a document offered in evidence to see whether it complies with the requirements of the Stamp Act. As to the law by which this contract is to be governed, the primary rule is to ascertain what was the intention of the parties:

Hamlyn and Co. v. Talisker Distillery Company, 71 L. T. Rep. 1; (1894) A. C. 202.

Here the contract is drawn up in a common English form, payment under it is to be made in England, and the defendants agreed to be bound by the jurisdiction and decision of the English law courts. Then, if English law is to be applied, the policy does not comply with the requirements of sect. 93 of the Stamp Act 1891. Whether it be treated as containing a time policy followed by a voyage policy, or a time policy followed by another time policy, the same objection applies to it, that there is no specific description such as sect. 93 requires. The risk must be definitely described in the policy:

Home Marine Insurance Company v. Smith, 78 L. T. Rep. 734; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 408; (1898) 2 Q. B. 351.

They referred also to

Allen v. Morrison, 8 B. & C. 565;
Great Britain Steamship Premium Association v. Whyte, 19 Rettle, 109.

Hamilton, K.C. in reply.—Home Marine Insurance Company v. Smith (ubi sup.) is distinguishable. The judgment in that case went upon the impossibility of defining the amount for which the ship was insured.

COLLINS, M.R.—Notwithstanding the able argument of counsel for the plaintiffs, I think that the judgment of Bigham, J. should be affirmed. The action is brought by an insurance company who had reinsured other persons in respect of certain risks, and had also reinsured themselves with the defendants. The plaintiffs have paid the sum due by them under the first policy, and now seek to recover their loss from the defendants. The action was tried before Bigham, J. without a jury. He looked at the instrument put in suit, as he was bound to do under sect. 14 of the Stamp Act 1891, and he came to the conclusion that, having regard to other provisions of the Act, the instrument was invalid and could not be made the subject matter of an action. The question raised on this appeal is whether he was right in coming to that conclusion. This question turns mainly on sect. 93 of the Stamp Act 1891. [His Lordship read the section.] The last clause in that section must refer to time policies. Now, does the policy relied upon by the plaintiffs comply with the provisions of that section? The answer depends upon the continuation clause. The policy itself is for a period of twelve months, but then it contains the continuation clause which has caused the difficulty in the case. The clause is this: "Should the vessel be at sea or abroad on the expiration of this policy, it is agreed to hold her covered until arrival at her port of final destination in the United Kingdom or on the continent of Europe at a pro rata daily premium to the within." The question is whether the risk is sufficiently defined to bring the policy within the provisions of sect. 93. Now, the vessel was damaged on the voyage insured, but succeeded in putting into Quebec where temporary repairs were carried out in order to enable her to cross the Atlantic for the United Kingdom. She left Quebec after the expiration of the twelve months and was lost on her voyage home. Under those circumstances claims were made on the policies of insurance. Bigham, J. held the policy sued upon to be invalid under the Stamp Act 1891 as being a time policy for a period exceeding twelve months. The plaintiffs contend that the policy is not invalid under sect. 93 on two grounds, first, that it is really a policy for twelve months, followed by a voyage policy, and alternatively that it is really two time policies though contained in one document. As to the first contention, the difficulty arises as to the places where the supposed voyage is to begin and end. Mr. Hamilton said that the voyage should be considered to be from the place where the ship happened to be at the expiration of the time policy to the port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent, which the ship might finally arrive at. That, he says, is a sufficiently definite description of the risk to satisfy the provisions of sect. 93. In my opinion, however, his proposition seems to ignore the provisions of the section which require a specific definition of the voyage. That requisition is not satisfied by describing a voyage as beginning anywhere and ending at any port in the United Kingdom or on the continent of Europe, at no particular time. The learned counsel pressed upon us the interpretation put on some somewhat similar clauses in certain American cases; but, as Mathew, L.J. has pointed out, those cases had reference to a particular class of vessel engaged in a particular kind of trade. The question there depended upon the course of trade, and, whether or not those cases would in similar circumstances be followed in English courts, they seem to me to be so far apart from the present case as not to throw any light upon the question now before us. It was also sought to distinguish the case of Home Marine Insurance Company v. Smith (ubi sup.). There the indistinctness of the definition was in the amount insured for. The court held that as the amount was not defined except in so far as a limit was put to the sum to be paid by the underwriters as regards any one ship, there was no specific definition sufficient to satisfy the statute. I do not think that the learned counsel were able to distinguish that case satisfactorily. The case applies to the amount insured, not to the risk insured against, but the principle on which it was decided seems to me to apply to both matters. The termini of the alleged voyage in the present case are just as indistinct as was the sum named in the case referred to. Bigham, J. was of opinion that the plaintiffs had not succeeded in showing that sect. 93 did not apply to this policy. He dealt first with the hypothesis that the document sued upon was a time policy, followed by a voyage policy, and he pointed out the great inconvenience of including in it a policy to which no implied warranty of seaworthiness attached, and another policy to which such a warranty did attach. He also held that the voyage was not sufficiently defined, as no termini were specified. He then dealt with the other alternative suggested—viz., that the document contained two time policies. He found that a similar difficulty existed there, because the period of the second time policy is not defined. On these grounds therefore he held, and in my opinion rightly held, that the policy is too indefinite to satisfy the requirements of the Stamp Act, and is therefore invalid.

It was then contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that as the defendants did not themselves take any objection to the validity of the policy it ought to be inferred that the parties to the action had agreed that the point should not be taken. It was also argued that as the defendants are a Swedish Company and the policy was executed by them in Sweden, the question of the validity of the contract ought to be decided by Swedish law. I will deal with the latter point first. It seems to me to be perfectly clear that the parties intended their rights to be governed by English law. The policy is in a well-known English form, and it expressly provides that in case of any dispute under it the Vega Company agrees to be bound in all things by the jurisdiction and decision of the English law courts. The inference to be drawn from that is absolutely clear, and I will only refer to the principle laid down in Hamlyn v. Talisker Distillery Company (ubi sup.). As the question was one which had to be decided in an English court, it would be out of the power of the parties to come to any agreement as to the validity of the policy which would have the effect of fettering the power of the judge at the trial of the action to do that which the Stamp Act 1891 requires him to do. It was, however, urged that the Act only requires the judge to take objections in the case of the stamp on a document being inadequate, and that the Act does not apply to such an objection as was made by the learned judge in the present case, which goes to the validity of the document. But the difficulty in the plaintiffs' way here seems to me to be even greater than it would have been if the objection had been the ordinary one of insufficient stamping. The objection taken is one that actually annuls the document, so that the document cannot be put in suit. The plaintiffs have no cause of action at all. I agree entirely with the judgment of Bigham, J. and I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

APP.] CARISBROOK STEAMSHIP CO. v. LONDON & PROVINCIAL MARINE, &C., INSUR. CO. [APP.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is as to the construction of this policy. Is it a time policy throughout? The original policy contains a continuation clause which is incorporated in the reinsurance policy. That clause seems to me to be an extension of the period of time previously mentioned in the policy. The instrument is one time policy for the period of twelve months, and the additional time contemplated by the continuation clause. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that the instrument ought to be construed as though it contained two separate policies, but I cannot believe that it was ever the intention of the parties that the document should be so considered. But even if we were to yield to that suggestion, the second of the supposed policies is not sufficiently specific. The risk is not defined. No one could possibly predict what voyage the vessel might be sent upon at the end of the twelve months named in the policy. Such a policy would be so indefinite that no action could be maintained upon it. I entirely agree with the judgment of Bigham, J. on that point. Then it was said that the court ought to infer an agreement between the parties to the action that no such point as that raised by the learned judge should be taken. There is no evidence of any such agreement, but even if any such arrangement had been made, it could have no effect upon the power of the judge to perform the duty imposed on him by the statute. As to the suggestion that the policy ought to be dealt with according to Swedish law, it is enough to refer to the express stipulation in it that in case of dispute the parties agree to be bound by the jurisdiction and decision of the English courts.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have little to add. If the plaintiffs had made out that the law of Sweden is to be applied to this policy other considerations would have arisen, but it seems to me that they have failed to show that. The contract was made in Sweden, but that fact is not conclusive to show that the law of Sweden applies to it. The place of payment is to be England, but that fact again is not conclusive in any way. The intention of the parties is to be gathered from the terms of the instrument and the surrounding circumstances. It seems clear to me that in the present case the parties intended their contract to be governed by English law as administered in an English court. That being so, sect. 93 of the Stamp Act 1891 applies, and that section provides that a document of a certain kind which appears to be a contract is to be a nullity. No agreement between the parties could make such a document valid, or could relieve the judge from the obligation of treating it as a nullity. I agree that the judgment of Bigham, J. was right and should be affirmed.

CARISBROOK STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. LONDON AND PROVINCIAL MARINE AND GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

General average—Contribution by chartered freight—Sacrifice on outward voyage by ship in ballast.

A ship was chartered to proceed from England to a foreign port and there load a return cargo for freight payable on delivery of the home cargo. The ship performed the outward voyage in ballast, and in the course of that voyage met with a misfortune which necessitated a general average sacrifice. She afterwards completed her voyage, and brought home the cargo for which her owners received the chartered freight.

Held (affirming the decision of Mathew, J.), that the chartered freight was liable to contribute to the general average sacrifice.

Williams v. London Assurance Company (1 M. & S. 318) followed.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Mathew, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Nestor upon a policy of insurance underwritten by the defendants by which the hull and materials, engines and machinery, of the ship were insured from the 1st Feb. 1900 to the 31st Jan. 1901.

By a charter-party, dated the 11th Sept. 1900, it was agreed that the ship, which was described as "reported expected to leave Fleetwood about the 12th Sept in ballast, calling at a Bristol Channel port for coals," should proceed to Savannah, and there, having discharged her cargo (if any), load for the charterers a full and complete cargo of cotton, and being so loaded should proceed therewith to Liverpool, Manchester, or Bremen, one port only, as directed, and there deliver the cargo; the freight to be paid on delivery at specified rates per ton.

On the 13th Sept. the Nestor sailed from Fleetwood in ballast for Savannah.

The charterers did not exercise their option of calling at a Bristol Channel port.

On the 3rd Oct. she arrived at Savannah roads.

On the 4th Oct., on her way up the river she grounded. She was got off, but with some damage to her propeller and machinery; and repairs having been effected she proceeded to load a cargo of cotton, which she afterwards duly delivered, and the chartered freight was paid.

The plaintiffs brought this action to recover the cost of the repairs.

The defendants contended that the loss was a general average sacrifice, and that the plaintiffs were bound to contribute to the loss in respect of their chartered freight.

Mathew, J. held that the chartered freight ought to contribute to the general average sacrifice, and he gave judgment for the defendants.

The case is reported (1901) 2 K. B. 861.

The plaintiffs appealed.

APP.] CARISBROOK STEAMSHIP CO. v. LONDON & PROVINCIAL MARINE, &C., INSUR. CO. [APP.]

Carver, K.C. and D. Stephens for the plaintiffs.—The outward voyage in ballast was no part of the adventure in which the freight was to be earned. That was the opinion expressed by Willes, J. in

Potter v. Rankin, 18 L. T. Rep. 712; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 122; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 562.

And that opinion was approved of by Blackburn, J. in giving his opinion to the House of Lords in the same case:

Rankin v. Potter, 29 L. T. Rep. 142; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; L. Rep. 6 H. L. 83.

The freight, therefore, ought not to contribute to a general average sacrifice on that voyage. The moment when that average ought to have been adjusted was the date of the ship's arrival at Savannah at the end of her outward voyage. In the court below, Mathew, J. followed a decision of the Court of King's Bench in 1813:

Williams v. London Assurance Company, 1 M. & S. 318.

That case is distinguishable. There there was one entire voyage out and home, in respect of which freight was payable, so that the freight was being earned at the time when the loss happened to the ship. The case turned on the special terms of the charter-party. But if the court should be of opinion that that case is not distinguishable from the present, we submit that it was wrongly decided and should be overruled. Many writers have expressed disapproval of it:

Benecke's Principles of Indemnity, p. 315;
Arnould's Marine Insurance, p. 956, 2nd edit.;
Phillips on Insurance, s. 1387, 3rd edit.;
Abbott's Merchant Shipping, p. 357, 5th edit.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (F. D. Mackinnon with him) for the defendants.—The plaintiffs' arguments rest wholly on the assumption that there were here two voyages by the ship. There is no ground for that assumption. Every transit from one port to another does not of necessity constitute a voyage. The sole object with which the ship left Fleetwood was to earn freight by carrying cargo from Savannah to England. She began to earn the chartered freight the moment she left Fleetwood:

Barber v. Fleming, L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 59.

The moment the ship left England the plaintiffs had an insurable interest in the chartered freight. The charter was of a definite ship, so that no other vessel could have earned the freight from Savannah to England. The charter was the same as though the ship had been chartered to go to Savannah and back for a lump sum. The judgment of Lord Ellenborough, C.J. in Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.) is exactly in point. That case has been approved by the full Court of Queen's Bench in 1857:

Moran v. Jones, 7 E. & B. 523.

The evidence given by adjusters shows that their practice has always been to act in accordance with those two decisions, except for a short time when some doubt was felt in consequence of a decision of Barnes, J. in The Brigella (69 L. T. Rep. 834; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; (1893) P. 189). The dicta of text-book writers that have been referred to throw no real doubt on the decision in Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.). They merely point out the difficulty of apportioning the relative values of the outward and homeward freight. The case is quoted with approval by other writers:

Lowndes on General Average, p. 310, 4th edit.;
Baily on General Average, p. 152, 2nd edit.

The case has also been followed in America, in Massachusetts:

The Brig Mary, 1 Sprague, 17.

In 1810 Sir William Scott, in a question as to the salvage of some vessels recaptured from the French, said that where a ship goes out under a charter-party to proceed to her port of destination in ballast, and to receive her freight only upon her return, the court is not in the habit of dividing the salvage:

The Progress, 1 Edwards, 210.

As to Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.) the dictum of Willes, J. which is relied upon ought to be read in connection with the facts of the case. There the ship was on a voyage and earning freight at the time of the charter. The freight in question was not being earned at all on that voyage. The two cases of Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.) and Moran v. Jones (ubi sup.) were not cited. No question of general average was there raised. The court will always be unwilling to upset the general practice of average adjusters:

Svensden v. Wallace, 52 L. T. Rep. 901; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 453; 10 App. Cas. 404, at p. 416;
Balmoral Steamship Company v. Marten, 85 L. T. Rep. 389; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 254; (1901) 2 K. B. 896.

D. Stephens in reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Mathew, J. in an action on a policy of marine insurance brought by the owners of the steamship Nestor, who were also owners of, and had received, the chartered freight. The insurance was on the hull and machinery of the ship. The defendants, the underwriters, wish to set off against the plaintiffs' claim a sum which they allege to be payable by the plaintiffs as a general average contribution. The question is, whether the chartered freight is the subject-matter of general average contribution or not. The ship was chartered from Fleetwood to Savannah, and was entitled to call for coals at a Bristol port, an option of which she did not avail herself. She proceeded without any cargo to Savannah, where she was to load a full and complete cargo of cotton, and she eventually arrived there, loaded her cargo and returned to England; and the plaintiffs duly received the chartered freight. But on her way out to Savannah she met with a misfortune which necessitated a general average sacrifice, by running on to a sandbank which caused damage to her propeller and machinery. The question is whether the plaintiffs, as owners of the chartered freight, are liable to contribute to the general average sacrifice. Mathew, J. held that the chartered freight had been at risk, and had been saved by the general average sacrifice, and it was therefore a contributory factor to the general average loss. On behalf of the plaintiffs it was contended that the freight could not be taken into consideration as a contributory factor to the general average loss, because it was on the outward voyage that the loss occurred. Against this contention we have the case of Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.) decided in 1813. That case admittedly covers the point which is now raised. To my mind it is even a stronger case than the present. There the ship was chartered for a voyage from London to the East Indies and back, and it was agreed that the charterers should only pay freight for cargo brought home from the East Indies. She was only insured for the outward voyage, and in the course of that voyage she incurred an average loss, but was repaired, and afterwards performed her voyage and the freight was received. The Court of King's Bench, consisting of Lord Ellenborough, C.J., Le Blanc and Bayley, J.J., held that the freight was liable to contribute to the general average. That case is directly in point here, but the contention put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs is that it was wrongly decided, and should be overruled. In 1857 the same point came up before the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Moran v. Jones (ubi sup.), and the court decided the point in the same way; or, at least, unanimously adopted as law the decision in Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.). The marginal note to that case contains the following words: "The ship was chartered to proceed from Liverpool to a foreign port, and there load a return cargo for freight payable on delivery of the home cargo. She took on board an outward cargo and sailed. She was driven on a bank by a storm near Liverpool; and the cargo was rescued from her and carried to Liverpool and there warehoused; the ship still remaining ashore in a situation of peril. Some days afterwards the ship was got off and taken to Liverpool, where she was repaired and again took the cargo on board, and proceeded on her voyage. It was agreed between the parties in the case that the freight was to be taken as liable to contribute to general average; and the question for the court was only whether the expenses, incurred after the goods were in Liverpool, in getting the ship off, without which she could not have proceeded on her voyage, or earned the chartered freight, were general average to which ship, freight, and cargo were to contribute; or were chargeable to ship alone; or were chargeable on any other principle. Held, that as the ship and freight were both in peril, and both saved, the freight must contribute as well as the ship, supposing the cargo not to contribute." That case is directly in point, though perhaps the headnote expresses rather more strongly than was necessary the relation which the case has to the question of the liability of the cargo to general average. It certainly seems from the argument that both the court and counsel dealt with the question of the liability of the freight as being left to the court to decide. Mr. Brown, in his argument for the plaintiff, said: "Then, next, it is clear that the chartered freight was in risk, and must contribute," and in support of that he cited Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.). Then he went on, "The freight is in fact part of the value saved. The expense of getting the ship off the shore is clearly matter of general average." Then at the end of the argument Lord Campbell, C.J. said: "So far as respects the liability of the freight to contribute to these expenses, we are prepared to give our opinion now; but as to the cargo, we wish to take time for consideration."

Therefore he treated the first of those two matters as a question of law to be decided by the court. Lord Campbell, C.J. afterwards delivered the considered judgment of the court. He said: "In this case we never doubted that the defendant, as underwriter on the freight, was liable for a contribution to general average in respect of the sum of 643*l.* 1*l.* 1*d.*, the expenses incurred in order to get the ship off from the bank on which she was stranded, whether the goods were or were not liable to contribute to this portion of the loss. It is admitted that the ship could not have been got off and completed her voyage unless these various expenses had been incurred. Therefore, without these expenses there would have been a total loss of the freight amounting to the sum of 675*l.* Even if the goods were not liable to contribute, on the ground that they were not exposed to any peril when these expenses were incurred, still, the freight which was then exposed to peril and has been saved ought to contribute as if there had never been any goods on board, and the ship had sailed from Liverpool to Callao in ballast." Those words seem to me to be directly in point here, and they seem to me to be the decision of the court. But whether they are so or not, they are at all events an expression of opinion of the full Court of Queen's Bench approving the principle of the earlier case. But, further than that, we have a case decided in 1810 which involved a similar principle, that was the case of The Progress (ubi sup.), decided by Sir William Scott (afterwards Lord Stowell) in the Admiralty Court. In that case, some ships which had been captured by the French were recaptured at Oporto by the allied British and Portuguese army. At page 218 of the report Sir William Scott says that he had to determine three points, and the third of these points was this: "Whether a salvage is due on the freight of ships taken up in this country and sent to Oporto to bring away these cargoes which they have been enabled to do by the act of recapture." Then at page 223 he says: "As to the freights of the vessels that were taken up at Oporto, no salvage is asked upon them, and certainly it could not have been contended that any would be due, as the voyage had not commenced. But those vessels which had gone to Oporto from this country under a charter-party for one entire voyage out and home, and had already performed the outward voyage, were in the course of earning their freights at the time of capture; they had actually broke ground, as the phrase is, and had entered upon that adventure out of which their profits were to arise. While lying in the harbour of Oporto they were in the course of earning their freights; they were in itinere and the salvage is as clearly due as if they had been captured at sea. If there had been two distinct voyages, as is sometimes the case in charter-parties, distinguishing the outward from the homeward voyage, the case would have assumed a different aspect; but where a ship goes out under a charter-party to proceed to her port of destination in ballast and to receive her freight only upon her return, the court is not in the habit of dividing the salvage. These, therefore, are the determinations I have come to; . . . and thirdly, that where a ship goes out under a charter-party for the voyage out and home, salvage is due upon the whole freight." It was contended on behalf of the appellants that there was no analogy between a salvage claim and a general average loss. But it seems to me that there is a very clear analogy between them. In each case something has been saved at the expense of another person, and the question is what has been saved and as to the payment for the saving. In both cases that involves a consideration of what was at risk and what was saved by the sacrifice—viz., in the one case the average sacrifice, in the other the labour and expense of the person salvaging. Then in what proportion are the interests which were at risk and were saved to contribute? What is the factor which ought to come into consideration in respect of freight? It seems to me that in The Progress (ubi sup.) the court had practically the same question to decide as the average adjuster had in the present case. The judgment is therefore a clear authority in principle that in the case of a round voyage under such conditions as these, where the freight is only payable on the ultimate arrival of the ship with its cargo on board, that freight is a contributing factor.

But, besides the cases I have referred to, we have a decision of the Court of Admiralty in America—namely, the case of The Brig Mary (ubi sup.). As has been pointed out, the case cannot be considered as a binding authority in England, but having regard to the fact that opinions of text-writers, some American, have been cited to us, the case is a very valuable contribution to the discussion, because it is a clear opinion by Sprague, J. directly upon the point in question, in which, after considering the opinions of text-writers, and the decision in Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.), he came to the conclusion that the decision in that case was correct. That, then, is the state of the authorities. Considered as a question of principle, the matter seems to me to come within the general principles that freight should contribute to the loss. In a round voyage such as this, the ship is earning freight from the moment of breaking ground to the time when the cargo is ultimately delivered, and is in process of earning it just as much before the goods are put on board as afterwards. Just as the ability of the ship to earn freight would be defeated if the adventure were stopped short by some peril a fortnight after starting, so also it would be defeated if it met with a similar peril one day before reaching the port of destination. Where there is a general average sacrifice ten days after she has started, it seems to me that there can be no distinction in principle between that sacrifice and the sacrifice two days before she would have arrived. What is at risk in both cases is the same—namely, the ability of the ship to consummate the whole undertaking in safety. No doubt there are differences of convenience where a cargo is carried to the intermediate port as distinguished from the case where there is no cargo carried to that port; and if the cargo is carried under a charter which entitles the ship to a freight at the intermediate port, one can easily understand why average adjusters should make a difference and limit the contributors in respect of such an average sacrifice on what I may call the first part of the voyage by limiting the freight contribution to the freight which was to be earned at the first port where the cargo was to be discharged. I am not quite sure that that practice is entirely satisfactory in point of principle, but I do not think you can obtain rules laid down and acted upon which are absolutely perfect in point of principle. It is necessary to obtain rules which are good working rules in point of convenience, and that is the standard which has always been applied in this country. The law has to be administered as a practical thing, and cannot always be carried out with extreme nicety to all its logical results. The principle laid down in Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.) seems to me to be on the whole a sound working practical rule, and, speaking for myself, I am not able to find a better one. The difficulties which it is argued may arise in applying that principle seem to me to be less than the difficulties which may arise in applying the rules suggested by those who have questioned that case. But I think that the arguments put forward on behalf of the defendants show that the objections to the decision in Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.) are not really so formidable as at first sight they appear. They are objections pointing to the difficulty of estimating the proper value to be put upon the freight at risk, rather than difficulties arising from taking it into consideration at all. But in my opinion the law as laid down in Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.) is the law of the country at this moment. The case was decided in 1813 by a court presided over by Lord Ellenborough, C.J., a court of judges pre-eminently versed in the question in dispute. It was decided a year or two after the case of The Progress (ubi sup.), in which, in my opinion, the same principle was involved. It was approved and followed in 1850 by the Court of Queen's Bench, presided over by Lord Campbell, C.J., and also consisting of lawyers very familiar with this particular branch of the law. And further, it has never been questioned in any case in which it has been cited and discussed. The only and most formidable objection made to it is based upon some observations of Willes, J. in Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.). I need not say that any observations falling from him with regard to the law of insurance, or the common law, I should treat with the most absolute and unfeigned respect; but it seems to me that, when the circumstances of the case are examined, the observations made by him which are here relied on merely amount to a dictum. The facts in the case did not raise the point which we now have to deal with, nor was the case of Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.) cited or in any way commented upon. The mind of Willes, J. was addressed to a different, not to the same set of circumstances as exist in the case now before us, and his observations ought therefore to be taken secundum subjectam materiem. It was not present to the mind of the learned judge that he was in any way impugning the decision in Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.). The same observation applies to the opinion of Blackburn, J. in the House of Lords when we remember that he himself was counsel in the case of Moran v. Jones (ubi sup.) when Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.) was cited and the matter discussed. Lord Blackburn could not have forgotten it, and it is impossible to conceive that he had in his mind any intention of impugning the authority in the observations that he made. It must have been present to his mind, and, therefore, I am satisfied that neither Willes, J. nor Blackburn, J. had any intention of impugning the authority of that case in the observations that were made in Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.). That is the state of the authorities. We have the two decisions of the full Court of Queen's Bench, never discussed or drawn in question in any court of law in this country till now. In that state of the law we are asked to overrule those authorities, which have been followed by average adjusters all this time, in order to give effect to some doubts of an ambiguous and difficult character suggested by text-writers more or less eminent. On these grounds I think I may adopt in terms the judgment of the learned judge in the court below. In my opinion this appeal should be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A very elaborate and able argument upon behalf of the appellants has brought before us many considerations which would be well worthy of being weighed if the question were now brought before the courts of this country for the first time, or if we were engaged in framing a code of rules to be adopted with reference to matters of this description. But our duty is to administer the law as we find it, and it is admitted, in order that the appellants may succeed, that Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.), which was decided in 1813 by a court consisting of Lord Ellenborough, C.J., Le Blanc, and Bayley, J.J., must be overruled. Now, that case was not only decided a long time ago, but it has never been judicially dissented from. On the contrary, it has been followed, as it seems to me, by Lord Campbell, C.J. and the Court of Queen's Bench in Moran v. Jones (ubi sup.). Further, it has been acted upon, so far as appears, ever since down to the present time by average adjusters, and their practice, regard being had to the long time it has been established, in itself raises a strong presumption that the rule which is there laid down is not one which works injustice or is found in practice to be unreasonable. Now, what have we against this? No doubt the decision has been criticised by text-writers; but the only scrap of authority which can be adduced is a statement by Willes, J. in Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.), a statement which was accepted as accurate by Blackstone, J. in advising the House of Lords in the same case. Now, two observations may be made with reference to what was said by Willes, J. The facts of Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.) were not the same as those in the present case and in the case of Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.). In Potter v. Rankin the outward and homeward voyages were not, as here, dealt with by one and the same charter; but the homeward voyage was the subject of a totally distinct and separate charter-party from that which dealt with the outward voyage. Further, Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.) was not cited in Potter v. Rankin either in the Court of Common Pleas or in the House of Lords. It is impossible for me to suppose that either of the learned judges whose opinions in Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.) are relied upon meant, without citing or dealing with Williams v. London Assurance Company (ubi sup.), to overrule a decision which had been well established at the time when they spoke. For these reasons, which are substantially those of my Lord and Mathew, J., I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

DUNN AND OTHERS v. BUCKNALL BROTHERS AND OTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bill of lading—Delay in carriage of goods—Negligence—Liability of shipowner—Measure of damages—Loss of market.

The carriage by a shipowner of goods destined for an alien enemy, without the knowledge and consent of the shipper of other goods on the same vessel, is a breach of duty by the shipowner towards the shipper of the other goods, and he is liable for delay in the delivery of those other goods occasioned by the seizure and detention of the ship by reason of the fact that the enemy's goods were on board, and he is not excused by an exception in the bill of lading of loss or damage occasioned by restraint of princes.

There is no absolute rule of law that damages for loss of market cannot be recovered for delay in the carriage of goods by sea. Whenever the circumstances admit of calculations as to the time of arrival and the probable fluctuations of the market being made with the same degree of reasonable certainty in the case of carriage by sea as in the case of carriage by land, the damages for delay are to be calculated upon the same principles in both cases.

The Parana (36 L. T. Rep. 386; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399; 2 P. Div. 118) considered and explained.

APPEAL by the defendants from the judgment of Mathew, J., at the trial of the action as a commercial cause, without a jury.

The plaintiffs brought this action to recover damages from the defendants for delay in the delivery of goods shipped at New York on the Mashona for carriage to Algoa Bay.

The goods were shipped by the plaintiffs under bills of lading, which contained an exception of liability for loss or damage occasioned by restraint of princes.

The Mashona sailed from New York on the 5th Nov. 1899, shortly after war had broken out between Great Britain and the South African Republic.

The vessel arrived at Algoa Bay on the 5th Dec. On her arrival at Algoa Bay she was arrested by H.M.S. Partridge, when it was found that she was carrying goods consigned to residents in the South African Republic. These goods consisted chiefly of breadstuffs, and were said to be intended for the enemy.

DUNN AND OTHERS v. BUCKNALL BROTHERS AND OTHERS.

[CT. OF APP.]

The vessel was then taken to Table Bay by order of the naval authorities, and a suit was instituted in the Prize Court at Cape Town for the confiscation of the goods and the condemnation of the vessel, as aiding or attempting to aid trading operations with the enemy.

The vessel and cargo were detained at Table Bay, pending the proceedings in the Prize Court, from the 5th Dec. 1899 until the end of March 1900.

By the judgment of the Prize Court the goods consigned to the residents in the South African Republic were condemned, but the vessel was released.

The owners of the vessel were ordered to pay the costs of the captors, save those of bringing the vessel round from Algoa Bay.

The Prize Court held that "there was reasonable and probable cause for seizing the ship; that there was certainly carelessness in taking the cargo on board at New York; and that though the intention was perhaps not to have landed them without the consent of the proper authorities, still the ship had the goods on board."

In consequence of these proceedings there was a delay of several months in the delivery of the plaintiffs' goods, and the plaintiffs brought this action alleging that the delay was caused by the negligence of the defendants.

The action was tried before Mathew, J. without a jury as a commercial cause.

The learned judge found as a fact that the defendants' agents knew the true character of the goods which were subsequently condemned, and that they were guilty of negligence and breach of duty to the plaintiffs in permitting them to be shipped on the same vessel as the plaintiffs' goods, and he accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The learned judge further held that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages based on the difference between the market value at the time when the goods ought to have been delivered in due course and their market value at the time when they were in fact delivered. He found as a fact that it was known to the defendants what the object of the plaintiffs' shipment was—namely, the supply of the British troops—and that the goods would sell at a much higher price if delivered in due course than at a later time when a large importation of similar goods would force prices down.

The defendants appealed.

Carver, K.C. and Lewis Noad for the appellants Bucknall Brothers, and Sir E. Clarke, K.C., Scrutton, K.C., and F. D. Mackinnon for the appellants Donald Currie and Co.—The judgment of the learned judge at the trial was wrong upon both parts of the case. First, there is no liability at all upon the defendants, for they are protected by the exception, in the bill of lading, against loss or damage occasioned by restraint of princes. There was no negligence or breach of duty on the part of the defendants towards the plaintiffs in carrying goods for other shippers which were destined for the South African Republic. There is no obligation upon the shipowner not to carry any other cargo which may possibly in the result cause delay. These other goods were not dangerous goods within the authorities which show that a shipowner may be liable if he takes goods on board which cause actual physical damage to other goods on the same ship:

Hayn v. Culliford, 40 L. T. Rep. 536; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 128; 4 C. P. Div. 182.

Even if the defendants knew the destination of these goods, yet they did not intend to land them without the leave of the proper authorities, and therefore they were not guilty of any breach of duty towards the plaintiffs in carrying these goods, the carriage of them not being an illegal act:

The Mercurius, Edwards's Adm. Rep. 53;
The Minna, Id. 55, n.

There was not any breach of duty or any negligence, on the part of the defendants, arising from the carriage of these other goods, for which the defendants can be made liable for the delay of the plaintiffs' goods:

The Xantho, 57 L. T. Rep. 701; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; 12 App. Cas. 503;
Steinman v. Angier Line, 64 L. T. Rep. 613; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 46; (1891) 1 Q. B. 619.

If the defendants are liable for the delay, the judgment of Mathew, J. as to the measure of damages was wrong. Damages for loss of market are not recoverable in the case of delay in the carriage of goods by sea. The judgment of the learned judge upon this question is contrary to the decision in The Parana (36 L. T. Rep. 388; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399; 2 P. Div. 118). In that case Mellish, L.J. said: "It was said that there can be no difference between the carriage of goods by railway and the carriage of goods by sea; but it appears to me there may be a very material difference between the two cases. . . . The difference between cases of that kind and cases of the carriage of goods for a long distance by sea seems to me to be very obvious. In order that damages may be recovered, we must come to two conclusions—first, that it was reasonably certain that they would be sold immediately after they arrived, and that that was known to the carrier at the time when the bills of lading were signed"; and the Court of Appeal held that damages for loss of market could not be recovered. The distinction between cases of carriage by land and by sea is based upon the uncertainty of the length of a voyage by sea, and upon the uncertainty as to the time of sale, which may be before, during, or after the voyage. Damages for loss of market have never been allowed in cases of carriage by sea:

British Columbia Saw Mill Company v. Nettleship, 18 L. T. Rep. 604; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 65; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 499;

The Notting Hill, 51 L. T. Rep. 66; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 241; 9 P. Div. 105;

Victorian Railways Commissioners v. Coultas, 58 L. T. Rep. 390; 13 App. Cas. 222.

There was no evidence that the defendants knew anything at all about the object and purpose of the shipment of the plaintiffs' goods. Further, mere knowledge is not sufficient; it must be knowledge under such circumstances that the contract is made with reference to the object and purpose of the shipment. It was not a natural and probable consequence of the alleged breach of duty by the defendants that the vessel should have been unnecessarily taken to Cape Town, and the defendants cannot be liable for the delay thereby caused.

Asquith, K.C., Bray, K.C., and F. W. Hollams for the respondents.—The judgment of the learned judge was right both upon the question of liability and as to the measure of damages. The case is quite clear as to the liability of the defendants, and there is no ground for questioning the finding of fact of the learned judge that the facts concerning these goods were known to the agents of the defendants. There was a clear breach by the defendants of their duty towards the plaintiffs, and that breach was committed as soon as the vessel sailed from New York with the contraband goods on board. The carriage of those goods made the vessel dangerous to the goods of the plaintiffs:

Hayn v. Culliford, 40 L. T. Rep. 536; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 128; 4 C. P. Div. 182.

What, then, is the proper measure of damages? If the goods of the plaintiffs had been lost by the negligence of the defendants and they were liable to pay damages for the loss, the measure of damages would clearly be the market value of the goods at the port of destination. It is admitted that the price which the Government would pay for the goods was as high as the market value. The plaintiffs are not claiming damages in respect of any exceptional contract, but only ordinary damages. The facts of the present case entirely distinguish it from the case of British Columbia Saw Mill Company v. Nettleship (18 L. T. Rep. 604; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 65; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 499). The loss of the difference between the market value of the goods at the time when they ought to arrive at their destination and at the time when they do in fact arrive is an ordinary and natural consequence of the breach of the contract to carry when the delivery of the goods is delayed just as much as the loss of the market value when the goods are lost. In the present case it was in the contemplation of both parties that the goods were to be carried to a special market. The case of The Parana (36 L. T. Rep. 338; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399; 2 P. Div. 118) is, therefore, an authority in favour of the plaintiffs upon that state of facts. That part of the judgment in that case which deals with the special character of the contract for carriage by sea does not affect the present case, and it is unnecessary to argue that it is not now good law. The case of Rodocanachi, Sons, and Co. v. Milburn Brothers (56 L. T. Rep. 594; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 100; 18 Q. B. Div. 67) shows that the market value of the goods at the time when they ought to have been delivered is the measure of damages, and that, if damages are claimed in respect of an exceptional contract of sale at a price higher than the market price, that contract must have been brought to the notice of the carriers. The case comes absolutely within the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch. 341), which is equally applicable to cases of carriage of goods and of sale of goods. That rule was stated, in the Court of Appeal, to be now the law upon the subject, in Hammond v. Bussey (20 Q. B. Div. 79).

Carver, K.C. in reply.—This seizure could not reasonably have been expected, and the delay thereby caused was not a natural and probable consequence which could have been within the contemplation of the parties. The case of Hayn v. Culliford (ubi sup.) was an entirely different case, where the other goods actually injured the plaintiff's goods. The defendants had reasonable grounds to believe that arrangements could be made for landing the goods which were subsequently seized, and therefore there was no negligence on their part:

The Mercurius, Edwards's Adm. Rep. 53.

As to the damages, the judgment of Mellish, L.J. in The Parana (ubi sup.) was based upon the character of the commerce and not upon the uncertainty of carriage by sea, and that judgment is good law.

Aug. 7.—The judgment of the court was read by

COLLINS, M.R. [stated the facts and proceeded:]—The defendants deny liability altogether and dispute the measure of damages. Their contention on the first point is that at the time of shipment they had reasonable grounds for supposing that by arrangements existing at South African ports ships containing cargo consigned to the enemy would be allowed to proceed on giving a bond in 10,000*l.* for the discharge of such goods into the hands of the British authorities at their ultimate port of destination within British territory, and that their intention in proceeding to Algoa Bay was to report the facts to the British authorities there and act as directed by them—an intention which was defeated by the intervention of the Partridge before they had time to carry it out; and they relied on the case of The Mercurius (Edwards's Adm. Rep. 53) in support of this contention. We are of opinion that, if such was their real intention (and the court use the word "perhaps" in referring to it in the passage above cited), it affords no defence to this action. The court have found, in the passage above cited, that there was carelessness at New York, and that there was reasonable and probable cause for seizing the ship. Even if the finding of the court were not conclusive on this point, in our opinion the course they took in carrying enemies' goods without the knowledge and consent of the other shippers was a breach of duty towards them, and was in effect to court detention even if they had a well-founded hope of being able to give such explanations to the authorities as would avoid the condemnation of the ship. They took the risk of escaping detention without consulting the plaintiffs on the matter. They are prima facie liable to the plaintiffs for late delivery, and can only excuse themselves by the exception. But it is quite clear that they cannot rely upon an exception to excuse themselves from the consequences of a peril which their own negligence contributed to bring about. The principle is thus stated by Mr. Carver in his valuable work on Carriage by Sea, 3rd edit., sect. 16: "A shipowner will not be exonerated from losses arising from any of these excepted causes when there has been any neglect on his part to take all reasonable steps to avoid them." See also sect. 77 of the same work, citing The Xantho (57 L. T. Rep. 701; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; 12 App. Cas. 503, 510, 515), and Bowen, L.J. in Steinman v. Angier Line Limited (64 L. T. Rep. 613; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 46; (1891) 1 Q. B. 619). The converse case of the owner's right against the shipper is given by Lord Tenterden in his treatise on Shipping, chap. 7, as an instance of an unquestionable liability—and is quoted by Lord Campbell, C.J. in Brass v. Maitland (6 E. & B. 470, at p. 484): "The merchant must lade no prohibited or uncustomed goods by which the ship may be subjected to detention or forfeiture"; and the liability of the shipowner under the express contract of the bill of lading is at least as clear as that implied as resting on the merchant. Here, as pointed out by Mathew, J., there can be no doubt as to the conduct of the shipowners. They had taken advice and caused a clause to be introduced into the bills of lading delivered to the shippers of goods for the Transvaal, pointing to the possibility of detention and excusing themselves from liability. Indeed, Mr. Carver contended that, inasmuch as their conduct was deliberate, and with a view to carry such cargo to its destination only if the British authorities sanctioned it, the case came within The Mercurius, and the shipowners were excused. It certainly seems a startling contention that a liability for the consequences of an act done negligently would be excused if it were shown that the act was done deliberately. The question whether the conduct of the owners has been such as to justify the condemnation of the ship is quite independent of their responsibility to the shipper for detention brought about by their act, negligent or deliberate. If negligence in not taking all proper precautions to avoid the excepted perils debars them from relying on the exception, how can they better their position by showing that they deliberately encountered it, even though they had hopes more or less sanguine of avoiding serious detention? They clearly had no right to speculate on possible immunity at the risk of the plaintiffs without consulting them. In our opinion, therefore, on the undisputed facts in this case their liability is clearly established, and the only remaining question is whether the learned judge was wrong in his direction to the referee as to the measure of damages.

On this part of the case The Parana (36 L. T. Rep. 388; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399; 2 P. Div. 118) was strongly relied upon by the appellants as establishing that the plaintiffs could be entitled to nothing more than interest on the value of the goods when they ought in ordinary course to have been landed down to the date of actual delivery, and they contended broadly that damages could not be recovered for loss of market on a voyage by sea. But we do not understand The Parana as establishing any such general proposition. There can be no absolute peremptory rule taking voyages by sea out of the principles which regulate the measure of damages on breach of other contracts. It is only because the possible length of voyages and the consequent uncertainty as to the times of arrival may in many cases eliminate the supposition of any reasonable expectation as to the state of the market at the time of arrival that, as a general rule, damages for loss of market by late delivery are not recoverable from the carrier by sea. It is certainly not a rule of law; it is only an inference of fact that from the circumstances of the case no reasonable assumption as to the state of the market at the time of arrival could have been a factor in the contract between the parties. But, as the means of sea transit improve, voyages of three and four weeks' duration may be, and are now, accomplished with almost absolute certainty, and the state of the market at the reasonably calculated date of arrival may well be a vital factor present to the minds of both parties at the time of making the contract. Wherever the circumstances admit of calculations as to the time of arrival and the probable fluctuations of the market being made with the same degree of reasonable certainty in the case of a sea, as of a land, transit, there can be no reason why damages for late delivery should not be calculated according to the same principles in both cases. This, indeed, if it were not self-evident, would seem to follow from the illustrations given by Mellish, L.J. himself in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in The Parana (ubi sup.). After giving other instances, he says, at p. 121: "Or if it is known to both parties that the goods will sell at a better price if they arrive at one time than if they arrive at a later time, that may be a ground for giving damages for their arriving too late and selling for a lower sum." And he adds: "But there is in this case no evidence of anything of that kind." Here the learned judge has found as a fact "that it was known to the defendants what the object of the plaintiffs' shipment was—namely, the supply of the British troops—and that the goods would sell at a much higher price if delivered in due course than at a later time when a large importation of similar goods would force prices down." The appellants, indeed, suggested that evidence was wanting to support these findings, but on the admitted facts it seems to us a case of res ipsa loquitur as to the inference which both parties must have drawn as to the purpose of the shipment and the probable effect of delay in delivery. And, as is well known to practitioners in the Commercial Court, cases are there conducted on the basis of mutual admissions which do not always appear in the formal record. We are of opinion, therefore, that the judgment of the learned judge was right on all points, and that, consequently, this appeal must be dismissed.

but only against a total loss, and in the policy of reinsurance this clause was struck out. The ship was stranded, and the owners abandoned her as a constructive total loss, selling her for 6000*l.* to a buyer who raised and repaired her. On the evidence it appeared that, while she was an ordinary constructive total loss, yet she might have been repaired at less cost than her assured value.

Held, that under these circumstances the underwriter was not entitled to recover on the policy of reinsurance as for a total loss.

THIS case was heard before Bigham, J. sitting in the Commercial Court on the 25th and 28th April.

Sailing Ship Blairmore Company v. Macredie, 79 L. T. Rep. 217; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 429; (1898) A. C. 593.

The facts and arguments are fully stated in the judgment.

May 15.—BIGHAM, J.—By a policy of the 29th May 1899 the plaintiffs underwrote a vessel called the William Symington against all risks for twelve months. The vessel was valued in the policy at 16,000*l.* Attached to the policy was a printed memorandum containing what are called the Institute Time Clauses, one of which is as follows: "The insured value shall be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel is a constructive total loss." The effect of this clause is that, if the vessel becomes damaged by the perils insured against, the owner, before he can recover for a constructive total loss, must show that the cost of repairing her will exceed 16,000*l.* The plaintiffs had taken risks on many other vessels, in respect of which they had issued other policies. At the end of the year they were desirous of reinsuring all these risks, and accordingly they effected a policy of reinsurance with the defendants, which is the policy sued on. It is dated the 3rd Jan. 1900, and it covers a sum of 42,884*l.* "upon the vessels as per schedule annexed." The schedule contains the names of about 100 vessels, one of them being the William Symington. In the body of the policy there is a valuation clause in the following words: "The said steamships, by agreement between the assured and assurers in this policy, being valued at as per schedule annexed or as per original policy or policies." On turning to the schedule it is found that the William Symington is valued at 16,000*l.* and is covered to the amount of 650*l.* The risk is described in the policy as "against the risk of total and (or) constructive total loss only warranted free of all average and (or) salvage charges, being a reinsurance applying to policy or policies, and to pay as may be paid thereon." Thus it will be seen that, whereas the original policy was against total or partial loss (all risks), the reinsurance was only against total or constructive total loss. The Institute Time Clauses were printed on the reinsurance policy, but many of them were struck out by an ink line being drawn diagonally through them; the clauses so struck out were such as applied more particularly to cases of partial loss, and were inapplicable to a policy against total loss. They included, however, the clause by which it is stipulated that the insured value is to be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel is a constructive total loss. This clause is numbered 14, and the diagonal line went down from No. 5 to No. 15 inclusive, thus traversing No. 14. During the period covered by the two policies—namely, on the 9th Dec. 1899—the William Symington ran ashore at Chioggia, in the Adriatic, and on the 20th Dec. the owner served the plaintiffs with notice of abandonment. The vessel was floated on the 23rd Feb. 1900, and was towed into Venice. There some temporary repairs were done to her, and she was then taken to Fiume, where she was sold to a Mr. Fragala for a sum of 5200*l.* Mr. Fragala repaired her, and she is now trading on his account. Having heard the evidence as to the cost of proper repairs to restore the vessel to her original class, I am satisfied of two things—first, that if the ordinary rules are applied to ascertaining the fact, the vessel was a constructive total loss at the date of the notice of abandonment. I mean that a prudent uninsured owner would not have repaired her; he would have made the best of a bad job by selling the wreck as it lay at Chioggia; but I am also well satisfied of a further fact—namely, that if the repaired value is to be taken at 16,000*l.*, and not at its true figure, then the vessel was not a constructive total loss. She could have been repaired at a cost which, after taking everything into account, would have been much less (less by some thousands of pounds) than 16,000*l.*

The question I have to consider is whether the plaintiffs ever became liable to pay a constructive total loss to the shipowners within the meaning of the reinsurance policy. If they did become liable to pay such a loss and have compromised with the shipowners for a payment of some less sum, the defendants will get the benefit of the abatement. The whole question of the defendants' liability of course turns upon the true construction to be placed upon the reinsurance policy. The defendants say that the only risk they undertook was the risk of the plaintiffs having to pay as for a total or a constructive total loss on their policy with the shipowners—that is to say, on the basis of a repaired value of 16,000*l.*; and that as the plaintiffs never became liable to pay such a loss, no cause of action has arisen on the reinsurance policy. On the other hand, the plaintiffs say that the defendants are not entitled to inquire whether the plaintiffs had become liable for a constructive total loss on the original policy; and that it is sufficient for the plaintiffs to show a constructive total loss on the basis of the actual repaired value of the ship. Thus the question is reduced to this—Is the clause that the insured value shall be taken as the repaired value to be read into the reinsurance policy? I will first examine this policy as though it contained no express reference of any kind to this clause—that is to say, as though the clause had never appeared in print in the margin and had never been struck through in ink, as already described. What then would have been the meaning of the policy? Now, I think the meaning quite plain, it is a

K.B. Div.]

"reinsurance"; that expression connotes the idea of something already insured. Then what was already insured? The answer is two things—namely, the risk of total loss and the risk of partial loss; but the defendants only reinsured one of these two risks—that is to say, the risk of total loss. But, again, what risk of total loss? The answer is only the risk which arises when the repaired value is taken at 16,000*l.* The plaintiffs are not liable for any other kind of total loss, and therefore cannot reinsure any other kind. The fact is that the sole object of the reinsurance policy was to indemnify the plaintiffs against the risk of total loss covered by the policy which they themselves had issued. Then does it make any difference that the clause can be seen in the print, and has been struck through by the ink line? It is said that this shows an intention to let the question of constructive total loss, if it arises, be determined without reference to the agreed value; in other words, that it shows an intention to reinsure a kind of constructive total loss which does not form the subject of the already existing policy. But, even if any significance at all ought to be attached to the striking out of the clause, there are two answers to this contention: first, that the body of the policy is so worded as to make the clause quite unnecessary—the body of the policy, as I have already said, indemnifies against the risk in the original policy, and against that risk only; and, secondly, that it may well be that, among the many original policies issued in respect of the other 100 ships, there are some which do not contain the repaired value clause; in which case it would be right to strike the clause out of the reinsurance policy. In the way in which the body of the policy is worded it covers all the original risks against total loss or constructive total loss whether the original policies contain the clause or do not contain it, and this is exactly what the parties intended. In truth the plaintiffs have sustained a very large partial loss on the original policy, and they want to recover it back under the reinsurance policy against constructive total loss only. This they cannot be allowed to do. The plaintiffs further say that, having paid as for a constructive total loss on the basis of a repaired value of 16,000*l.*, they ought to be allowed to recover against the defendants, as the reinsurance policy contains the words "to pay as may be paid on the original policy." But the answer is, first, that they have not paid as for a constructive total loss. They may so describe the payment which they have made, but it was, in fact, only a payment for a large partial loss; and, secondly, even if they have paid as for a constructive total loss inasmuch as, in my opinion, they were not liable to pay they cannot recover. The words "to pay as may be paid" mean only to pay as the reassured may have been compellable to pay.

EDGILL (app.) v. J. AND G. ALWARD LIMITED (resps.). (a)

Seaman—Disobeying lawful command—Order to join boat—Desertion—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 376.

A seaman can be convicted under sect. 376 (1) (d) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 for disobeying a lawful command, even although such disobedience amounts to desertion or absence without leave within sect. 376 (1) (a) or (b).

CASE stated on an information preferred by the respondents against the appellant, under sect. 376 (1) (d) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, charging him that he, being a seaman and having been lawfully engaged to serve on a British fishing boat, unlawfully and wilfully disobeyed on the 25th Jan. 1902 a lawful command of the master thereof.

The appellant was engaged by the respondents to serve them as second engineer of the Andes under an agreement for the half year beginning on the 1st Jan. 1902.

On the 22nd Jan. the Andes arrived at Grimsby fish dock from a fishing voyage. The appellant had acted as second engineer during that voyage.

On the 24th Jan. the appellant, being at his work on the Andes, was ordered by the foreman manager of the respondents, acting for them and the master of the Andes, to be on board at 6 a.m. on the 25th Jan., when the Andes was to start to the knowledge of the appellant on another voyage. The appellant assented to such orders, and asked and was informed where the boat would be lying at the time when he was to join.

The appellant did not go aboard the Andes at all on the 25th Jan. Search was made for him, and the vessel was detained until another second engineer could be engaged.

The justices found that the appellant wilfully disobeyed the command, without any excuse or reason for so doing.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he was wrongly charged, as it was not proved that any order had been given him by the master on board the vessel; that he could not be convicted of wilfully disobeying a lawful command as the facts showed that if he had committed any offence it was that of desertion, or of absence without leave, under sect. 376 (1) (a) and (b), and that in such a case sect. 376 (1) (d) was not applicable. For the respondent it was contended that the appellant had committed the offence under sect. (1) (d), and that a seaman was not relieved for wilful disobedience under sect. (1) (d) because that act of disobedience was desertion under (a) or absence without leave under (b).

The justices were of opinion that the appellant had disobeyed a lawful order, and had committed an offence under sect. 376 (1) (d), and that it was immaterial whether he had or had not committed either the offence of desertion or absence without leave, and they convicted the appellant.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 376:

(1) If a seaman lawfully engaged to serve in any fishing boat or an apprentice in any sea fishing service commits any of the following offences, that seaman or apprentice shall be punished summarily as follows: (a) For the offence of desertion he shall be liable to forfeit all or any part of the effects he leaves on board and all or any part of the wages which he has earned, and to satisfy any excess of wages paid by the skipper or owner of the fishing boats from which he deserts to any substitute engaged in his place at a higher rate of wages than the rate stipulated to be paid to him. (b) For the offence of absence without leave—that is to say, for neglecting or refusing without reasonable cause to join or to proceed to sea in his fishing boat, or for being absent without leave at any time within twenty-four hours of his boat's sailing from any port, either at the commencement or during the progress of the engagement, or for being absent at any time without leave and without sufficient reason from his boat—if the offence does not amount to desertion, or is not treated as such by the skipper, he shall be liable to forfeit a sum not exceeding two days' wages, and in addition for every twenty-four hours of absence either a sum not exceeding four days' wages or any expenses properly incurred in respect of a substitute. . . . (d) For the offence of wilful disobedience—that is to say, for disobeying any lawful command during the engagement—he shall be liable to imprisonment for any period not exceeding four weeks, and also to forfeit a sum not exceeding two days' wages. . . .

(5) A seaman or apprentice shall not be relieved by his refusal or neglect to go to sea or by his desertion from being liable to punishment under this section for an offence of wilful disobedience, continued breach of duty, or unlawful combination, and, in addition to any such punishment, shall also be liable to be punished for the offence of desertion or absence without leave.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—We have to construe sect. 376 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. It is perfectly true that that was a consolidation Act; but it was more, and, although in some cases I agree some light can be gained by seeing the course of legislation, I doubt very much whether that applies to this class of legislation, which is obviously part of a code. I think there were two classes of offences contemplated by sub-sects. (a), (b), and (c), as contrasted with subsequent subsections. There may be many absences without leave or acts of neglect to join without reasonable cause which would not be wilful disobedience. One would be that a man was not there because he had a reasonable excuse, or that he was not there for some cause which would not be wilful on his part, and he would be liable then to the lesser penalty. But wilful disobedience is made the subject of express enactment, and by that I understand it is meant that the man meant intentionally to disobey something that he was told to do. Speaking for myself, I think it is clear that that construction is very much assisted by sub-sect. 5, which shows that the Legislature was dealing with the same subject-matter in one sense, because they have spoken of punishment for the offence of wilful disobedience, and the punishment for the offence of disobedience or absence without leave is not to relieve him from being liable to punishment for the offence of wilful disobedience. Then, with regard to sub-sect. 4, I think that in all probability it was inserted in order to deal with the cases of apprentices, who are under stricter discipline all the time. Certainly I do not think it was intended to apply to the case where a seaman has had an order with regard to his duty given to him on board the ship. Now, here the evidence before the magistrate was that the man was told to be on board by six o'clock on the following morning. He was the engineer, and it was not to be supposed that he could safely go away and that the ship could sail without someone else being supplied to take his place, and they have found as a fact that he wilfully disobeyed an order. I am quite clear that there was sufficient evidence to come to the conclusion that the offence of wilful disobedience of a lawful command during the engagement had been committed, and therefore we ought not to interfere. I think the words "during the engagement" would seem to show that you must look at what the contract between the employer and employed is for this purpose, and if there is a wilful disobedience of an order given to him during the engagement, and he was bound to obey it, it may well be that sub-sect. (d) deals with a different subject-matter than that which was contemplated by sub-sects. (a), (b), and (c).

Marine insurance — Policy — Construction of — Suing and labouring clause in printed form — Insurance against shipowners' liability owing to omission of negligence clause in contract of affreightment — Applicability of suing and labouring clause to such insurance.

Shipowners, who had entered into a contract of affreightment which contained no negligence clause exempting them from liability for loss arising through the negligence of their servants, effected with an underwriter a policy of insurance on their ship, to cover their liability of any kind to the owners of the cargo up to a certain specified amount owing to the omission of the negligence clause in the contract. The policy was an ordinary printed form of Lloyd's policy, and contained a suing and labouring clause entitling the assured to sue and labour for the defence and recovery of the goods and ship. During the insured voyage the vessel stranded owing to the negligence of the shipowners' servants and part of the cargo was lost, and the shipowners became liable in respect thereof. The shipowners incurred expenses in saving the cargo which was saved and in trying to save the cargo which was lost, and in attempting to tow the vessel off the rocks; and they sought to recover these expenses from the underwriter, not as a direct loss under the policy, but under the suing and labouring clause in the policy as being suing and labouring expenses.

CUNARD STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v. MARTEN.

[K.B. Div.]

Held, that the suing and labouring clause in the policy had no application to the subject-matter of the insurance, and did not form any part of the insurance, and that the shipowners could not recover under that clause the expenses so incurred by them.

COMMERCIAL CAUSE tried before Walton, J. without a jury.

The action was brought by the Cunard Steamship Company Limited, as the owners of the steamship Carinthia, against the defendant, who was one of the subscribers to a policy of marine insurance effected on behalf of the plaintiffs.

By the policy, which was dated the 9th May 1900, the plaintiffs were insured against perils of the seas from New Orleans to ports in South Africa on the plaintiffs' steamship Carinthia.

To cover shipowners' liability of any kind to owners of mules and (or) cargo up to 20,000*l.*, owing to the omission of the negligence clause in contract and (or) charter party and (or) bill of lading.

The policy was an ordinary Lloyd's printed form of policy with special clauses added, and it contained a suing and labouring clause in the following form:

In case of any loss or misfortune, it shall be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue, labour, and travel for, in and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said goods and merchandises and ship, &c., or any part thereof without prejudice to this insurance.

In a special clause on a slip gummed to the policy the plaintiffs were given "all liberties as per contract of affreightment and (or) charter-party and (or) bill or bills of lading new or old including negligence clause."

The defendant subscribed this policy for 1000*l.*

The Carinthia had been chartered by the Government in April 1900 for the purpose of carrying mules from New Orleans to South Africa. The terms of the contract of affreightment were contained in a letter of the 5th April 1900 from the Admiralty Director of Transports to the plaintiffs, and by the terms of the contract the Carinthia was to carry some 1500 mules in consideration of the freight and on the terms therein specified.

The contract of carriage contained no negligence clause exempting the plaintiffs from liability for loss arising from the negligence of their servants, the shipowners' liability to the Admiralty being that of common carriers.

In these circumstances the plaintiffs insured themselves by the policy against all liability which might result to them by reason of the omission of the negligence clause in the contract of affreightment.

The Carinthia sailed from New Orleans for Cape Town on the 11th May 1900 with the mules on board.

On the 15th May, owing to the negligence of the master, she stranded at Cape Gravois, in the island of Hayti, and was wrecked, and a large number of the mules were lost, and considerable expenses incurred in saving those which were saved and in trying to save those which were lost, and in attempting to tow the vessel off the rocks.

The plaintiffs thereby incurred a liability to the Admiralty.

The plaintiffs in their points of claim alleged that by reason of the stranding of the vessel many mules were totally lost, and the plaintiffs were under liability in respect of the same and in respect of increased freight paid on the mules saved, which were sent on in another vessel, but that the extent of the liability had not yet been ascertained, and that, to reduce or avert a loss which would be recoverable under the policy, the plaintiffs incurred expenses under the suing and labouring clause in the policy to the amount of 7744*l.*; and the plaintiffs claimed in this action only in respect of those suing and labouring expenses. The defendant's proportion of these expenses on his insurance of 1000*l.* was 387*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.*, and that was the sum which the plaintiffs now claimed.

The defendant in his defence admitted that the vessel was stranded during the insured voyage owing to the negligent navigation of the plaintiffs' servants, and he alleged that

The policy sued on is expressed to be upon shipowners' liability to owners of mules owing to the omission of the negligence clause in the contract of carriage. The sue and labour clause in the printed form of policy has no application to such a subject-matter of insurance, and is not part of the contract. Alternatively, if the sue and labour clause applies, none of the expenses claimed have been incurred within the meaning of the clause by the plaintiffs, their factors and assigns, in averting from the subject-matter insured loss by perils insured against as alleged or at all. In the further alternative, if the defendant under the policy sued on is liable for sue and labour expenses, the expenses claimed herein were incurred by the plaintiffs to avert the whole of their possible liabilities to the owners of the mules and (or) cargo which far exceeded the liability covered by the policy.

Pickford, K.C. and Loehnis for the plaintiffs — It is admitted that the loss was caused by the negligence of the plaintiffs' servants, and that the plaintiffs came under a liability to the Admiralty in respect of the loss. The plaintiffs' claim in this action is confined to a claim under the suing and labouring clause in the policy in respect of expenses incurred by them to avert or reduce the amount of the loss. The first question is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover under the suing and labouring clause in the printed form of the policy in respect of the losses incurred. They are entitled to recover under the clause. The policy ought to be construed as a contract on the part of the underwriters by which they agreed to indemnify the shipowners against any liability up to 20,000*l.* which the shipowners might incur to the owners of the mules owing to the omission of the negligence clause in the contract of affreightment; so that, if the loss does not exceed 20,000*l.*, they are entitled to recover the whole loss, but if it exceeds 20,000*l.*, then they are entitled to recover 20,000*l.* Here the liability of the shipowners to the Admiralty arose owing to the omission of the negligence clause in their contract with the Admiralty, and upon the construction of the policy the suing and labouring clause is applicable, and the underwriters are bound to indemnify the plaintiffs. [K.B. Div.]

Carver, K.C. and F. D. Mackinnon for the defendant.—The whole point really is whether the plaintiffs can recover these expenses under the suing and labouring clause in the printed form of the policy. They are not claiming these expenses as a direct loss under the policy, but are claiming them under the suing and labouring clause in the printed form of the policy. The claim should have been a direct claim under the policy. The object of bringing their claim under the suing and labouring clause, instead of bringing it as a direct loss under the policy, is to make the defendant pay more than 100 per cent. of the loss, and to make him pay more than he ought to pay. There is a valid objection to the whole claim. The suing and labouring clause in this policy has no application at all to the subject-matter of the insurance in this case. It is common form in the printed policy, and what the parties have written in the policy is inappropriate to the printed matter. That clause in the printed form is concerned with an insurance on ship and goods; and if the policy were to be read as an insurance on goods, then it might be right to say that the suing and labouring clause applied. But if we are right in saying that this is not an insurance on ship and goods, then the clause does not apply, because there is no subject-matter of the insurance to which it could apply. The insurance was against liability of any kind, and was not confined to the safety of the mules, but covers all liability which the plaintiffs would have incurred owing to the omission of a negligence clause in the contract. Xenos v. Fox (ubi sup.) is a clear authority to show that the suing and labouring clause has no application to this policy. Even if the clause applies, these were not suing and labouring expenses. Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—WALTON, J. delivered the following written judgment, commencing with a statement of the facts as above set out:—There is no doubt that the plaintiffs are liable to the contractor of the Admiralty for the mules which were lost, and this liability is within the meaning of the policy "owing to the omission of the negligence clause in the contract of affreightment." The difficulty of determining whether the suing and labouring clause forms part of the contract of insurance in this case arises (as so frequently happens in questions of marine insurance) from the very peculiar way in which contracts of marine insurance are expressed. A printed form which dates back to the eighteenth century is used as the basis of the contract. In this form there are certain blank spaces, in which it is usual to insert a description of the subject-matter of the insurance or of the special line of indemnity intended to be given by the policy. It not uncommonly happens that the words written into the blank spaces of the form have no connection with the printed words which precede or with those which follow them. In almost all cases certain parts of the printed form have no application to the risk described by the written words. Sometimes it will be found that many even of the special clauses contained in printed slips gummied on to the policy have no possible application to the actual insurance. Cases are not uncommon in which the whole contract is contained in the written definition of the termini of the voyage and a few written words inserted below in some blank space in the form, none of the printed clauses of the form being applicable at all. Such being the well-known course of business in formulating contracts of marine insurance, it is obviously necessary in every case to consider carefully the description of the risk or special kind of indemnity expressed in the written words of the policy in order to ascertain whether any particular clause of the printed form applies to the insurance effected by the policy. It is most unusual to find that the superfluous or inapplicable words have been struck out of the printed form. Applying this to the present case, it is necessary to look at the description of the risk undertaken by the underwriters in order to determine whether that part of the printed form which is called the suing and labouring clause has any application or forms part of the contract. A somewhat similar question had to be decided in Xenos v. Fox (19 L. T. Rep. 84; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 146; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 630; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 665). The question which arose in that case was whether the suing and labouring clause applied to that part of the policy called "the running down clause," by which the underwriters undertake to indemnify the owner of the vessel insured from liability which he may incur to the owners of other vessels with which the vessel insured may be negligently brought into collision. It was held that the suing and labouring clause had no application to such a contract of indemnity contained in a policy on ship. The decision would have been the same if the policy had covered nothing but the risk of liability for collision. I refer to that case only as an illustration, and not as an authority upon which the present case can be decided. The construction of the policy now in question must depend upon its own language and cannot be determined by the interpretation of different language in another policy. It is necessary to consider what was the precise character of the risk covered by the policy now sued upon. It was, as I have said, "to cover shipowners' liability of any kind to owners of mules and (or) cargo up to 20,000*l.*, owing to the omission of the negligence clause in the contract." I may in passing point out that in a special clause which is, I think, contained in a slip gummied on to the policy, the assured is given "all liberties as per contract of affreightment and (or) charter-party and (or) bill or bills of lading new or old including negligence clause." The assured is somewhat specially given liberty to make contracts, including a negligence clause, in a policy which covers nothing but his liability, owing to the omission of the negligence clause. Proceeding, however, with the consideration of the words which I have quoted, describing the risk covered, there appear to me to be two possible views of the nature of the insurance. It may be an insurance for 20,000*l.* on the mules applying to the plaintiffs' interest as carriers responsible for the safe delivery of the mules. A shipowner who is responsible for the safe delivery of goods carried in his ship has an insurable interest in the goods which he can insure by a policy on goods. Crowley v. Cohen (3 B. & Ad. 478) affords an example of such a policy. If the policy in the present case were to be interpreted as a policy on mules or cargo applying to the shipowners' liability as carriers, one result of such a construction would be that, if the mules or cargo were worth more than 20,000*l.*, the shipowners were not fully covered. The mules were in fact worth considerably more than 20,000*l.*, and the shipowners' total responsibility, therefore, was for a sum considerably in excess of 20,000*l.* Assuming, merely for the purposes of argument, that the total value of the mules and possible liability was 40,000*l.*, the effect of the policy, treating it as a policy on the mules, would be that the shipowners' interest was insured to the extent of one-half only, and, in the case of a loss, whether total or partial, they would be entitled to recover one-half of such loss and no more. If this is the true nature of the insurance, I see no difficulty in applying the suing and labouring clause. It would not be distinguishable for the purposes of this case from an ordinary policy on goods.

The plaintiffs, however, do not contend that the policy should be construed in this way as an insurance on goods. They contend that the policy must be read as a contract by which the underwriters agreed to indemnify the plaintiffs against liability of any kind up to 20,000*l.*, which they might incur to the owners of the mules owing to the omission of the negligence clause. The plaintiffs contend that for any loss not exceeding 20,000*l.* they were entitled to recover in full, and for any loss exceeding 20,000*l.* they were entitled to recover 20,000*l.* I think that this is the true construction of the policy, and that to treat it as a policy on goods would not give effect to the plain intention of the parties as expressed in the policy. The present policy is, in my opinion, similar to the policy in the case of Joyce v. Kennard (25 L. T. Rep. 932; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 194; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 78), and, as was there said, not an ordinary marine policy. If, however, the policy is not to be treated as a policy "on goods," but as a contract of indemnity against a certain kind of liability up to a certain limited amount, it is very difficult to apply the suing and labouring clause to such a contract. That clause applies when there is a suing or labouring for the safeguard and recovery of "the said goods"—that is to say, the goods insured. As I have said, this is not an insurance on goods. Again, the suing and labouring clause indubitably contemplates and implies that, whilst the underwriters are to bear their share of any suing and labouring expenses, they are to bear such share only in the proportion of the amount underwritten to the whole value of the property or interest insured. If the assured has insured himself or goods to the extent of one-half only of the value of his property or interest in the goods insured, he, in respect of each and every item of suing and labouring expense, recovers one-half and bears one-half himself. This is the perfectly well-established basis of every adjustment of suing and labouring expenses. But how can this be applied in the case of a contract of indemnity against liability to a limited amount such as is here sued upon? There might be liabilities covered by the present policy which did not depend upon the safety of the goods. But assuming that the liability can be measured by the value of the goods—that is to say, the mules—and depends upon their safety, how is the proportion of suing and labouring expenses to be borne by underwriters to be arrived at? In the one case, where all the mules are on board the ship and are all in equal danger of total loss, and an expense is incurred to avert such loss—as, for instance, by towing the ship when sinking, and placing her in safety on the beach—there would be no difficulty. But, assuming again that the total value of the mules is 40,000*l.*, and the liability covered is up to 20,000*l.*, as in the present case, and expense is incurred in saving the mules by getting them ashore one by one, and mules to the value of 20,000*l.* are thus saved and the rest lost, how is the expense to be apportioned? In such a case it might very well be said that the whole expense was for the benefit of the assured, and not for the benefit of the underwriters at all. Intermediate cases would present even greater difficulties. I fully recognise that a suing and labouring clause might be framed which would be appropriate to such an insurance as was effected in the present case. But, in my judgment, any attempt to apply to the insurance in question a clause which was framed and intended to apply to an insurance of a different kind would work injustice, unless in order to make the clause applicable to the insurance in question it was so modified as to make it in fact a different clause altogether. I think that the suing and labouring clause in this policy, like many other parts of the policy, is inapplicable to the insurance actually effected, and was no part of the contract. I may add that, if I thought the suing and labouring clause must be held to apply, I should regard this as a strong reason for treating the policy as an open policy for 20,000*l.* on goods, with the usual consequences. Judgment for the defendant with costs.

DE HART v. COMPANIA ANONIMA DE SEGUROS AURORA.

[K.B. Div.]

The ship being chartered, it was provided by the charter-party: "In case of average, jettison of deck cargo and the freight thereon for the common safety shall be allowable as general average."

In the course of a voyage to Antwerp it became necessary for the common safety to jettison part of the deck cargo, and, upon the average statement being made up there, this was included in general average.

Apart from any special provision in the charter-party, the jettison of deck cargo and the freight thereon would not by Belgian law be the subject of general average.

Held, that the statement was in accordance with the Belgian law, as that law recognises the special terms of the contract between the parties, and so the plaintiff could recover from the defendants the contribution that had to be made by the ship in general average relating to the jettison of the deck cargo.

COMMERCIAL CAUSE.

The plaintiff effected with the defendants, who were underwriters, two policies of insurance on his steamship Henriette H. for twelve months.

Each of the policies contained the clause,

General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up or York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with the contract of affreightment, and attached to the policy were the Institute Time Clauses 1900, which include the following clause:

General average and salvage charges payable according to foreign statement or per York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with the contract of affreightment.

By a charter-party dated the 11th Oct. 1900, made between the plaintiff and Messrs. Baars, Dunwoody, and Co., it was agreed that the Henriette H. should carry a cargo of pinewood, including a deck load (if required by the master), from Pensacola to Antwerp.

It is the regular and usual course of trading for vessels from Gulf timber ports to carry deck loads of timber to Continental ports.

Clause 11 of the charter-party was as follows:

In case of average the same to be settled according to York-Antwerp Rules 1890, excepting that jettison of deck cargo (and the freight thereon) for the common safety shall be allowable as general average.

The Henriette H. sailed during the continuance of the policies from Pensacola on the 29th Nov. 1900, carrying a deck load, and on the voyage she suffered damage, and it became necessary for the safety of the ship and her cargo, in consequence of perils insured against, to jettison part of the deck load.

The remainder of the cargo was delivered at Antwerp.

An average statement was prepared at Antwerp and the deck cargo jettisoned and its freight was included as general average.

By Belgian law, apart from any special provision in the charter-party, the jettison of the deck cargo and the freight thereon would not be the subject of general average.

Carver, K.C. and De Hart for the plaintiff.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and J. R. Atkin for the defendants.

KENNEDY, J.—In this case a point has been raised which is obviously thought of importance from a business point of view, but which I confess, although having had the great advantage of hearing both the arguments of Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Atkin, as a matter of construction I should have thought there was no doubt about. But one may be too easily led wrong in construing business documents as business men intended them to be appreciated. All I have to say is what is the right construction taking the document in its ordinary sense, giving to the words what appears to me to be the fair business meaning in a transaction of marine insurance. The question arises as to the liability of the defendants in respect of what is claimed by the plaintiff by way of indemnity for a contribution that has had to be made in general average, and the particular question turns upon the construction of a clause in the policy: "General average and salvage charges payable according to foreign statement or per York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with the contract of affreightment." That is in the clause attached to the policy in the Institute Time Clauses 1900, and in the body of the policy itself appears—"General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up or York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with the contract of affreightment." Now, I could quite well conceive the parties coming to such an arrangement as the counsel for defendants argued the arrangement is if this clause be properly construed. They might arrange that the insurers will be liable for general average if the average is assessed or adjusted according to any one of three modes—first, according to the law of England; secondly, according to the express law of a foreign country where there was no express agreement between the parties to the contract of affreightment; and, thirdly, that they would be liable to an assessment or adjustment of the general average and be ready to pay in the case of one specific convention only between the parties—namely, on the York-Antwerp Rules being included. But I cannot so read the provision, which appears to me, I confess, susceptible of a natural meaning which is also a sufficiently good business meaning. This was a time policy. The vessel might be sailing to various foreign ports governed by various foreign laws. As a matter of fact, there had to be an adjustment made at Antwerp and a general average statement prepared, and a general average statement was there prepared and made up. It is not contended here that that statement was made up in a way contrary to the law of the country. I need not decide whether or not when you use the words "general average charges payable according to foreign statement" that does or does not mean according to foreign statement if that foreign statement is correct according to foreign law, or as it is put in the sixth edition of Arnould, from which I quote: "The underwriter renders himself liable to pay according to the foreign average adjustment if made at the foreign port in accordance with the law in force at that port"; or whether, as stated by Bovill, C.J. in Harris v. Scaramanga (26 L. T. Rep. 797; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481; 1 Asp. M. C. 339), delivering the judgment of himself and Keating, J., "that if a question arises as to whether or not there was a claim for general average for which the underwriter was liable, it was by express agreement of the parties a question to be determined by the

ROWSON v. ATLANTIC TRANSPORT COMPANY LIMITED.

[K B. Div.]

foreign adjustment." It is said that there is language taking a different view and justifying the expression in Arnould in Hendricks v. Australasian Insurance Company (30 L. T. Rep. 419; 2 Asp. M. C. 44; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 460) and also in Marro v. Ocean Marine Insurance (32 L. T. Rep. 743; 2 Asp. M. C. 500; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 414). I have not got, as it appears to me, to decide that point. By agreement here between the parties the average statement has to be made in accordance with the law of Belgium. The objection by the defendants to the terms of that adjustment being valid and effective against them is that that adjustment admits as general average what would not be admitted by the law of Belgium apart from special contract between the parties. But what is in fact in the average statement is so stated in accordance with the law of Belgium, because the law of Belgium does recognise as a basis for adjustment express terms if it is proved that express terms have been made between the parties to the contract of affreightment. It seems to me the only fair construction of this clause is that the underwriter undertakes to pay according to a foreign statement—I will assume a foreign statement made in accordance with the law of the foreign country. The law of the foreign country in this case Belgium, recognises as one of the constituents of the average adjustments the special terms of the contract between the parties. Therefore the foreign statement is correctly made up having regard to those special terms, and it seems to me, therefore, that the underwriters are bound to recognise that foreign statement, assuming that the foreign statement includes a statement made according to foreign law. Now, one of the arguments is, Why make a special exception with regard to the contract of affreightment in respect of the York-Antwerp Rules? That, I presume, was to cover this, that the York-Antwerp Rules are very commonly adopted, and if the adjustment is not made in that foreign country, but, we will say, is an English adjustment, they are willing, so far as the York-Antwerp Rules apply, to adopt the liability which they may create if the parties have so chosen to stipulate in their contract of affreightment as between themselves. Otherwise they would not be so bound. It seems to me that there is no inconsistency or improbability from a business point of view in saying, we will take the foreign statement and be bound by that, although it may in the result conflict with our law, and, amongst other things, embody and recognise the special contracts between the parties. It is fair and just to the owner of the ship travelling to various parts of the world, having himself to incur various liabilities under various laws, which of course in fact he does not know beforehand, that his insurers should indemnify him against the risk of having to pay sums which he would not have to pay under the English law. So far as knowledge of the law is concerned, of course he does not know it, but if he does study the law I daresay he will find others like the Belgian law, which embodies in the terms of adjustment the terms of a special contract made between the parties; whereas when you come to English law the assurer says: "I am quite willing to adopt the York-Antwerp Rules if the parties agree to them and adopt them inter se and stand upon them, but otherwise I stand upon the law of England, which says under the terms of the agreement the underwriters are not responsible." I must therefore give judgment for the plaintiff.

ROWSON v. ATLANTIC TRANSPORT COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

Damage to cargo—Exceptions in bill of lading—Faults or errors in the management of vessel—Harter Act (U.S.A.) 1893.

By the Harter Act, which was incorporated in certain bills of lading under which butter was shipped, if the owner of a vessel transporting merchandise exercises due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy and properly manned and equipped, then the owner is not to be responsible for damage "resulting from faults or errors in navigation, or in the management of the said vessel."

Owing to the negligence of the persons in charge of the refrigerating apparatus with which the ship was fitted, the butter was damaged.

Held, that this was a fault or error in the management of the vessel, and that the owners of the vessel were not liable.

COMMERCIAL CAUSE.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants for damages for breach of contract and duty in the carriage of goods by water.

By the points of claim it was alleged that the plaintiff had suffered damage by breach of contract by two bills of lading, each signed by the defendants and dated the 29th June 1900, of several parcels of butter, amounting in all to 206 tubs and 170 boxes, received in apparent good order and condition by the defendants from Abraham Hodgson and Sons, to be transported by the steamer Minneapolis from New York to London, to be delivered in the like good order and condition at London unto order or assigns.

All the bills of lading were indorsed to the plaintiff, to whom the property in the goods passed by such indorsement.

All the butter was delivered in a damaged condition, the depreciation on the same amounting to 250l.

By their defence the defendants relied on the exceptions contained in the bills of lading and the terms and provisions of the Harter Act therein incorporated, that neither the vessel, her owner or owners should become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of the said vessel, nor from inherent defect, quality, or vice of the thing carried.

The faults or errors upon which the defendants relied were the failure on the part of those in charge of the refrigerating machinery to properly work the same and to keep the refrigerating chambers at a proper and sufficiently low temperature.

Nov. 19.—KENNEDY, J.—In this case the action has been brought by Arthur Jopson Rowson against the Atlantic Transport Company Limited to recover damages in respect of injury to a quantity of butter carried by the defendants' vessel at the end of June and beginning of July 1900, from New York to London, under two bills of lading, of which I have had the originals produced before me; one bill of lading being for 206 tubs of butter, and the other one for 170 boxes of butter. There is no question that the butter when received in London in July was damaged, and there is no suggestion that the butter when received by the defendants for carriage on board the Minneapolis, the steamer in question, at New York was in good condition. The butter in these tubs, or boxes, was carried on board the Minneapolis in certain chambers, which are also in the evidence called boxes by some of the witnesses—rooms in the ship in which there is insulation for the purpose of the application of the refrigerating apparatus with which the Minneapolis is equipped for the purpose of carrying in summer goods such as butter, and also for the purpose of carrying, as she did in two other chambers on this voyage, dressed meat safely and in good condition to the port of discharge. There are, as it appears to me, two questions substantially which arise for decision in the case; one a question of fact, the other a question of law. The question of fact is (the burden resting unquestionably, in my view, upon the defendants) whether or not they have proved that the cause of the damage to this butter during this summer voyage of the Minneapolis was negligence in respect of the management and application of the refrigerating apparatus to the four chambers, or boxes, which carried the butter. The question of law is whether or not if the defendants have shown that that was the cause of the damage, they are entitled to rely upon the protection contained in the Act of Congress of the United States of 1893, commonly known as the Harter Act. The same questions, to the extent to which I will mention in a moment, came before my brother Walton, in November of last year, in an action brought by Mills and Sparrow against the defendants, and Walton, J. in the judgment which I have had before me, came to the conclusion upon the question of fact that the defendants had not satisfied him by the evidence which they then adduced that the damage to similar butter on the same voyage was caused by the negligent management of the refrigerating apparatus on board the ship, and therefore it became unnecessary for him to decide the question of law, which could only arise, as I have said, in a case of this kind if the defendants have shown affirmatively that the mischief did arise from negligence in the management of the refrigerating apparatus. I have to consider therefore, and I have carefully considered here, first, whether or not the burthen of proof has in the case before me been satisfied. In the action of Mills and Sparrow against the Atlantic Transport Company, my brother

Walton, after carefully reviewing what evidence was before him, pointed out that he could not be asked to make a guess as to the cause of the loss. He said: "I might perhaps guess as a mere matter of guessing that very likely there was some negligence on the part of the engineers during the voyage, but I cannot dispose of this case in that way. It may be that there is a case of suspicion—that may be—but if I ask myself was there negligence on the part of the engineers during the voyage in the use of this machinery, and was this damage the result of that, the only answer I can give, after very carefully considering the evidence, is that I do not know; I cannot find it as a fact; I simply have not the materials before me which satisfy me one way or the other that there was. Of course, if the plaintiffs here have to prove that there was no negligence the case would be very different, but the defendants have to satisfy me reasonably and fairly that there was negligence." In that case there was, as I understand the evidence, no proof from New York, the port of lading, as to the condition of the refrigerating apparatus when this butter was loaded on board, when, of course, the chambers should be cool, or as to the condition of the apparatus when, the butter being received there, the refrigerating apparatus was being run for the purpose of maintaining the proper degree of coolness. The evidence was entirely wanting. There was also no evidence then called from the engine-room, so far as regards the person who was primarily responsible, because actually in supreme command—namely, Mr. Edwards. Edwards was not called then, because, as appears from Walton, J.'s judgment, as well as from the statements before me on the hearing of this case, in fact his address was not known; he left the ship soon after her arrival, and had gone, as I understand, to Folkestone, and although in fact, if a certain line of inquiry had been adopted—namely, inquiry from other persons on board the ship—his address might have been known, it was not in fact known, and his evidence therefore was not procured by the defendants for the trial. To that Walton, J. calls express attention. Now, I have had before me, in addition to evidence of a very full kind as to the state of things on the shipment at New York with regard to what was done to make the chambers properly cool for the reception of the butter—with regard to the taking of temperatures both before and during the actual shipment, and with regard to the good working of the refrigerating apparatus when this vessel was loaded—very full evidence, both documentary, and in the case of Mr. Nobbitt oral, from New York. I have had also the evidence of Mr. Edwards, and as a result of that evidence—to which I will refer somewhat more in detail in a moment—coupled with the fact that, as really is undisputed, there were no material or serious repairs which were done to the machinery at the termination of the voyage in England by the firm of Messrs. Hall, whose machinery it was, and the fact that no complaint had been made on the previous two voyages, or either of them, on one of which, at all events, the refrigerating apparatus was used. Coupled with that fact the evidence, I feel bound to say, has satisfied me that there was negligence upon this voyage which was the cause, and that negligence is the cause to which the mischievous here ought to be attributed. There is no doubt of the mischief; there is no imputation upon the character and condition of the butter when shipped; and, further, as my brother Walton pointed out in that case, even if it had been at all moist, or sloppy, as it must be called, when shipped, if the refrigerating apparatus was in good order, and was properly worked, the butter ought to have been hardened before its arrival in this country; there is no doubt of the damage when the cargo arrived, and, in addition to the evidence before him, there is proved to me satisfactorily that great care was exercised in my view as regards the shipment. It is proved to me that the refrigerating apparatus in cooling the chambers was found to run perfectly. [His Lordship, after dealing with the evidence, continued:] Now I come to that which required me to reserve my judgment, because I formed a clear and definite conclusion upon the evidence at the time, and a minute and careful examination of the evidence since has only gone to confirm me in that conclusion. Then the question is, Is that a defence? And I have felt considerable difficulty in coming to a conclusion.

The matter turns upon the proper construction of the Harter Act with regard to this state of facts. The two bills of lading, as I have said, embodied as a term this: "It is mutually agreed that this shipment is subject to all the terms and provisions of and all the exemptions from liability contained in the Act of Congress of the United States approved on the thirteenth day of February 1893 and entitled 'An Act Relating to the Navigation of Vessels,' &c." It is agreed in this case that the question stands thus. It turns upon sect. 3 of the Act in question: "That if the owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property to or from any port in the United States of America shall exercise due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy and properly manned and equipped and supplied, neither the vessel, her owner or owners, agent or charterers shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of said vessel." Now, I am satisfied that in this case not only due diligence was exercised, but in fact the vessel was in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied. There is abundant affirmative evidence and nothing to the contrary of that. Then arises this question: Assuming that to be so, is the damage by reason of negligence with regard to the refrigerating apparatus and the temperature of these chambers resulting from it, a fault or error in the management of the said vessel? That question is one with which my brother Walton dealt to some extent in the judgment to which I have referred, and he, with his very great experience of this class of question, felt exactly as I feel, that it is very difficult to determine precisely whether mismanagement of refrigerating machinery during the voyage is mismanagement of the ship as a ship affecting the safety of the cargo, or merely mismanagement of the cargo, affecting the safety of the cargo. "It seems to me," he said, "to be very close to the line, and it would be very difficult to determine on which side of the line the present case falls. If it is merely mismanagement of the cargo, then I think it is not a fault or error in navigation or in the management of the vessel within the meaning of sect. 3 of the Harter Act. If it is mismanagement of the ship as a ship, then, according to the decision in The Rodney (82 L. T. Rep. 27; 9 Asp. M. C. 39; (1900) P. 112), it would be an error or fault in the navigation or management of the vessel within the meaning of sect. 3 of the Harter Act." He, however, found it unnecessary for him in that case, owing to the state of the facts, to give a solution of the difficulty. I need not say that even merely from what he said I think there was a difficulty, but I think it is obvious to anybody that it is a very difficult question, and I propose very shortly to give my reasons for the view which on the whole I have come to with regard to it. It seems to me to be clear, to start with, that the protection is given, as far as it is given by the Act, upon the condition of the vessel being one in respect of which the owners have exercised due diligence to make the vessel in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied. Now, a vessel which has to carry cargo which can only be safely carried if the refrigerating machinery is in proper order is a vessel to which, according to a series of decisions both in this country and America, the term "seaworthiness" would be properly applied. It is a term which originally no doubt was used in days when refrigerating apparatus of course was unknown—like many other parts of modern appliances and equipments for the safe carriage of cargo. In a sense of course it is obviously not a happy term to use, except with regard to that condition of the vessel which enables the owner in respect of her cargo to keep it free from perils of the sea; but it is a well-known term, a well-recognised term, and to my mind the proper view to take of this section is that "in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied" means in all respects fit to carry the particular cargo safely in respect of the dangers which but for proper fittings and equipment might damage it during carriage. There is a case which is referred to in Mr. Carver's well-known book, in the portion which deals with this class of case which I have referred to, and it is the only American case which I think I need refer to—namely, the case of The Thames (61 Fed. Rep. 1014). The District Judge in that case said in the course of the judgment: "The term 'seaworthy' is relative. A ship leaking in her deck may be seaworthy for carrying stone, iron, coal, and for many other things even more valuable in respect to avoid-du-pois. But it cannot legitimately be contended that a ship is seaworthy as to perishable articles when it leaks in such a manner and degree as to cause damage to a very large proportion of such articles by a process plain to all on board and obvious throughout the voyage." Then he refers to the particular cargo there, which was flour, and proceeds: "A ship may be seaworthy as to one sort of cargo and unseaworthy as to another. Where a customary and well-known article of commerce is received on board ship and carried on a voyage the master guarantees the seaworthiness of his ship for taking charge of that article. As to her cargo, seaworthiness is that quality of a ship which fits it for carrying safely the particular merchandise which it takes on board. The ship is impliedly warranted to be seaworthy quoad that article, and if damage occurs in consequence of the unfitness of the ship for carrying that article, the ship is liable and cannot exonerate itself by proving the non sequitur that it is capable of carrying safely and without damage some other article of a different character.”

The same view as to unseaworthiness was taken in the case I am about to refer to. I need only refer to that case because it is closer in subject-matter to the present case. That was a decision of the Court of Appeal, affirming a judgment, I think of my brother Mathew, in the case of Owners of Cargo on Ship Maori King v. Hughes (73 L. T. Rep. 141; 8 Asp. M. C. 65; (1895) 2 Q. B. 550). There the preliminary question had to be decided as to whether, according to the terms of the bill of lading, there was an implied warranty that the refrigerating machinery was at the time of shipment fit to carry the frozen meat in good condition to Europe, and in the course of those judgments of the late Master of the Rolls and the Lords Justices the matter is fully dealt with, but the principal parts to which I think it necessary to refer here are passages in the judgment of Kay, L.J. at pages 558 and 559. The Lord Justice says, quoting Lord Blackburn’s judgment in Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. 333; 3 Asp. M. C. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72): “I take it, my Lords, to be quite clear, both in England and in Scotland, that where there is a contract to carry goods in a ship, whether that contract is in the shape of a bill of lading, or any other form, there is a duty on the part of the person who furnishes or supplies that ship, or that ship’s room, unless something be stipulated which should prevent it, that the ship shall be fit for its purpose. That is generally expressed by saying that it shall be seaworthy; and I think also in marine contracts, contracts for sea carriage, that is what is properly called a ‘warranty,’ not merely that they should do their best to make the ship fit, but that the ship should really be fit.” And he deals with the question of seaworthiness at the earlier page, 557, in this way: “Supposing, however, that it should be necessary to make such an inquiry, the real inquiry, as it seems to me, would be, not as to the ‘unseaworthiness’ of the ship properly so called, but whether the ship was, at the time when the goods were shipped, provided with proper appliances to enable her to carry these goods in their hard frozen condition, and deliver them in that condition at the end of the voyage.” Now, in this case the ship held herself out as a carrier in these rooms of cargo which could only safely be carried if the rooms were refrigerated. It differs so far from Owners of Cargo on Ship Maori King v. Hughes (sup.) that in that case I think, if I recollect rightly, the bill of lading was headed “Refrigerator Bill.” There is no question in this case—indeed it is common ground—that the butter could not be safely carried except in the refrigerating chamber, which was kept refrigerated, and that the shippers of the cargo would, of course, have said, as it seems to me correctly, that if that ship had taken that butter, and delivered it damaged without refrigerating apparatus in that chamber, the ship was not seaworthy in respect of the butter. That was the business of the transaction; they were seeking to get this butter trade; they held themselves out and undertook to load it in such a chamber as was fit for the carriage of the goods. Perhaps the strongest case of inferring a duty of this kind is something which is not exactly this, but it is a case which is comparatively recent, and is one which we know of as the Bullion case—Queensland National Bank v. Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company Limited (78 L. T. Rep. 67; 8 Asp. M. C. 338; (1898) 1 Q. B. 567; 5 Com. Cas. 51)—in which it was held that if you hold yourself out to carry bullion, not only do you undertake to find room for it in the ship, but such a place as will make it reasonably safe by being sufficiently strong for the carriage of an article of that kind, which is exposed to theft. If that is so that is the reason which brings me, rightly or wrongly, to the conclusion that if the proviso would not be rightly fulfilled unless there was proper refrigerating machinery to keep the butter cool, if the ship would be unseaworthy in that state of facts, then if she is rendered unseaworthy during the voyage by the negligence in the use of that room, that is mismanagement of the vessel with regard to the cargo, and it cannot be said not to be mismanagement of the vessel. If she would be as a vessel unseaworthy in respect of the carriage of those goods if she had not got that refrigerating machinery in good order to work—if the room was not fitted—I cannot escape, as it seems to me, from the logical conclusion that if she is so fitted, and by negligence during the voyage that part of her is made dangerous and unseaworthy in respect of that which is carried in it, it must be a fault or error in the management of the vessel. She would not have been a seaworthy vessel had she not got the appliances. If she is made unseaworthy during the voyage by negligence, it is an error, or fault, in the management of the vessel of which this equipment of this chamber is part. The refrigerating apparatus is in fact, of course in a sense, a thing that could be taken out; so might the insulating chambers as far as that goes; the steam, I understand, is supplied from the main boilers, but otherwise there is no immediate connection with the rest of the engine. But if you undertake to carry cargo safely you must have your appliances and your refrigerating machinery, just as in the case of a vessel carrying wet sugar (Stanton v. Richardson, 33 L. T. Rep. 193; 3 Asp. M. C. 23; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 421) you must have your pumps. You must have in such a case as this that refrigerating apparatus fit at the start, or you will not comply with the condition of the Harter Act; and if there is an error or fault which causes damage or loss from your mismanagement of that part of your ship, which is your refrigerating apparatus, without which, unless it was in good condition at the start, the ship would have been unseaworthy, it is a fault or error in management, and not in navigation. I adopt (and I think I am following it in this respect, although it does not decide this case) a decision of the Divisional Court in the Admiralty Division, which, of course, I should be bound by, whatever it decided, and whatever my view might be if it absolutely governed this case. I believe I am deciding entirely in accordance with the view of the learned judges, Jenne, P. and Barnes, J. That is the case of The Rodney (sup.) (which followed the earlier case of The Glenochil (73 L. T. Rep. 416; 8 Asp. M. C. 218; (1896) P. 10).

K.B.] Re ARBIT. NEWMAN & DALE SS. CO. AND BRITISH & SOUTH AMERICAN SS. CO. [K.B.]

That was a case in which—"During the voyage the vessel met with heavy weather, and the fore-castle becoming flooded, the boatswain, while endeavouring, with the aid of a poker, to clear a pipe used to carry off the drainage, drove a hole through it, thereby admitting water into the fore-hold, and damaging a portion of the cargo. The owner of the cargo sought to render the ship-owner liable. Held, by the Divisional Court (Jeune, P. and Barnes, J.), reversing the decision of a County Court judge, that the shipowner was exempt from liability, as the damage resulted from a fault in the 'management' of the vessel, the act having been done for the purpose of rendering the fore-castle habitable—that is, with the object of rendering the ship proper for the purpose for which she was intended." As I say, I think that does not exactly cover this case, but what I especially quoted it for was for the same reason that the learned counsel cited it to me in this case when they brought that case under my notice—namely, the language used by Barnes, J., which is also referred to by Walton, J. in his judgment to which I have referred more than once. The last words in the judgment of Barnes, J. are: "I think that the words 'faults or errors in the management of the vessel' include improper handling of the ship as a ship, which affects the safety of the cargo." Well, is the refrigerating apparatus the ship or part of the ship? Clearly it is with regard to the warranty of seaworthiness, on the decisions. Why is it not a part of the ship when we come to deal with that second part of the Harter clause, which refers to the errors which may arise from mismanagement? It is, as it appears to me, the only logical solution of the question which I have to solve here and to decide, to say that the mismanagement of this machinery—for that is what it is—the mismanagement of that part of the ship which is the machinery and the chambers—is a mismanagement which is a mismanagement of the ship, or, as the clause expresses it, "the damage or loss resulting as a damage or loss which results from the faults or errors in the management of the said vessel." I therefore in this case, on the evidence before me, must give judgment for the defendants, who have satisfied the first half of the clause, and have become, therefore, entitled to the protection of the second half.

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN NEWMAN AND DALE STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED AND THE BRITISH AND SOUTH AMERICAN STEAMSHIP COMPANY. (a)

Charter-party—Demurrage—Exception clause—Exception of fire—Whether for benefit of charterer as well as shipowner.

A charter-party made between the owners of a ship and the charterers provided that a certain number of days should be allowed for loading and unloading the cargo, after which demurrage was to be paid at a specified rate, and it also contained the usual exception clause, with, among others, the exception of fire.

Held, on the authority of Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation (2 Com. Cas. 50), that the exceptions applied for the benefit of the charterers as well as for the benefit of the shipowners, and that the charterers were by the exception of fire excused from paying demurrage in respect of a necessary delay occasioned by a fire breaking out in the cargo while the cargo was being discharged, but were not excused in respect of a further delay which was not occasioned in consequence of the fire.

AWARD stated by an umpire in the form of a special case.

1. By a charter-party dated the 16th July 1901, made between the Newman and Dale Steamship Company Limited, owners of the steamship Aqua, of London (hereinafter called the owners), of the one part and the British and South American Steamship Company (hereinafter called the charterers) of the other part, it was provided that the steamship Aqua should Proceed to New York and there load as required by charterers (after having bunkered and being in every respect ready for the voyage) a full and complete cargo of hay, alfalfa, and (or) bran which freighters may send alongside for shipment . . . and being so loaded shall proceed to Table Bay for orders which are to be given within twenty-four hours of the captain's application to charterers' agents for same on arrival to discharge (always afloat) at one or two ports between Cape Town and Delagoa Bay (both ports included) as ordered and there deliver the same, in consideration whereof the freighters shall pay for the full reach and hire of said ship as above with exceptions as stipulated for the said voyage a lump sum of 6750*l.*, payable one-third in London in cash, on sailing if required less 3 per cent., or one-half advance at owners' option less 5 per cent. and the balance in London in cash, seven days after receipt of consignees' certificate of the right and true delivery of the cargo in full of all port charges, pilotages, &c.

2. By the charter-party it was also provided in clause 8 thereof:

Twenty-four weather working days, Sundays and holidays excepted, to be allowed for loading and discharging the cargo, after which demurrage to be paid at the rate of 45*l.* per running day to be settled in London. Time in shifting ports not to count as lay days.

It was also therein provided that, should any dispute arise between the owners and the charterers, the matter in dispute should be referred to the arbitration of two persons at London, one to be appointed by each of the parties thereto, or the umpire of the two so chosen, and the decision of the arbitrators or umpire should be final, and that, for the purpose of enforcing any award, that agreement might be made a rule of court.

3. The charter-party contained the following clause (clause 10) as to strikes:

If the cargo cannot be loaded or discharged by reason of a strike or lock-out of any class of workmen essential to the loading and discharging of the cargo, the days for loading and discharging shall not count during the continuance of such strike or lock-out. A strike of the receiver's men only shall not exonerate him from any demurrage for which he may be liable under this charter, if by the use of reasonable diligence he could have obtained other suitable labour, and, in case of any delay by reason of the before-mentioned causes, no claim for damages shall be made by the receivers of the cargo, the owners of the ship, or by any other party under this charter.

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Then immediately after, in clause 11, the charter-party also contained the following exceptions:

The act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates and thieves, arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and people, collisions, stranding and other accidents of navigation excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners. Ship not answerable for losses through explosion, bursting of boilers, breakage of shafts, or any latent defect in the machinery or hull, not resulting from want of due diligence by the owners of the ship, or any of them, or by the ship's husband or manager.

4. The cargo was shipped under a bill of lading dated the 12th Aug. 1901, and was delivered, as hereinafter mentioned, at East London to the British Government, who were the consignees of the cargo. Copies of the charter-party and of the bill of lading were annexed to and formed part of this case.

5. The vessel sailed from New York on the 13th Aug. 1901, and arrived in Table Bay on the 22nd Sept. 1901, when she received orders to proceed to East London and discharge. Five lay days were occupied in loading at New York.

6. The Agua arrived at East London on the 26th Sept., and notice was at once given to the representative of the British Government at the port, but she did not begin to discharge until the 13th Oct. On the 16th Oct. fire broke out in the cargo, and the vessel was ordered away from the discharging berth by the consignees and removed to an anchorage in the river. She continued at her anchorage discharging damaged hay and coals into lighters until the 3rd Nov. 1901, when, notice having been given to the consignees that all damaged cargo had been discharged, she was again ordered to her discharging berth, and continued discharging undamaged cargo until the 7th Nov., when the whole of such cargo was discharged. Some further amount of damaged hay was then found in the vessel, and she was again moved from the discharging berth to an anchorage in the river, when she proceeded to discharge the damaged cargo, and completed such discharge at 5 p.m. on the 11th Nov. 1901.

7. During discharge the owners demanded demurrage from the charterers, and the charterers paid certain sums in respect of such demurrage under protest, and claimed to recover the same or a portion thereof, or to deduct the same from the balance of freight as improperly demanded.

8. The owners brought an action against the charterers to recover the balance of freight and demurrage owing upon the charter-party and the same was by order of the High Court stayed, and it was ordered that all matters in dispute should be referred to arbitrators to be nominated by each party and their umpire. Two arbitrators were appointed, and Mr. Pickford, K.C. was appointed as umpire. The arbitrators were unable to agree, and thereupon the matters in difference were referred to Mr. Pickford for his award and determination as umpire.

9. The facts above stated were proved or admitted before the umpire, and the only question between the parties was as to the amount of demurrage payable to the owners by the char-terers. The owners claimed twenty-eight days at 45*l.* a day, and the charterers admitted two days and sixteen hours. If the owners' claim were correct there remained a balance due to them in respect of freight and demurrage of 109*l.* 13*s.* 11*d.*, and if the charterers' allowance were correct no sum remained due to the owners. The amount of demurrage payable depended partly upon the question of law hereinafter stated, and partly upon questions of fact not material to this case.

10. It was contended on behalf of the charterers that the exception "fire" in the charter-party applied to the obligation of the charterers to discharge, and that they were excused by the occurrence of the fire above mentioned from all demurrage caused by the fire. It was contended on behalf of the owners that the exception did not apply to the charterers' obligation to discharge, and that the charterers were not thereby excused from liability for demurrage occasioned by the fire. The umpire consented to state his award in the form of a special case raising the question which of those contentions was right in law.

11. The umpire found that it was necessary to remove the vessel from her discharging berth in consequence of the fire, and that the damaged hay required a longer time to discharge than if it had been sound, and that there was a necessary delay of seven days in consequence of the fire.

12. The umpire also found that there was a further delay by reason of the following circumstances: After the fire had been extinguished and the vessel could have been safely brought back to a discharging berth, the consignees continued to discharge the damaged hay into lighters in the river instead of so bringing her back and continuing the discharge at the berth. This course was adopted because the hay was damaged and worthless to the consignees, and was under the circumstances a reasonable course for them to pursue, but it was not necessary in consequence of the fire. He found that the delay so caused amounted to ten days.

13. It was contended that the charterers were freed from any liability for demurrage in respect of both those periods of seven and ten days by reason of the above exception of fire.

14. If the charterers' contention were right as to both of the periods of seven and ten days, the umpire awarded that there was due from the charterers to the owners in respect of the matters so referred to him the sum of 56*l.* 13*s.* 11*d.*

If the charterers' contention were right as to the period of seven days, and wrong as to the period of ten days, the umpire awarded that there was due in respect of these matters the sum of 45*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*

If the charterers' contention were wrong as to both those periods, the umpire awarded that there was due in respect of those matters the sum of 79*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*

He awarded that the charterers should pay the costs of the arbitration and of his award.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the contention of the charterers was correct as to one or both of the above periods of seven and ten days.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (L. Noad with him) for the shipowners.—Clause 8 of the charter-party provides as to the number of the days allowed for loading and unloading after which demurrage was to be paid; and clause 11 set out the exceptions, of which the material one in this case is "fire." In no view of the case are the charterers right in saying that they are excused from payment as to the ten days, as to which there is an express finding that that delay was not caused by the fire. Then as to the delay of seven days, the charterers are not excused. The exception applies only for the benefit of the shipowners, and does not apply for the benefit of the charterers. The express words in the exception clause do not seem to refer to any liability of the charterers so as to create an exception in their favour; on the other hand, clause 8 creates an express obligation on the part of the charterers to load and unload within a certain time, and after that time to pay demurrage, and it is submitted that the charterers cannot be allowed to cut down that express obligation under clause 8 by any inference arising from clause 11 as to the exceptions. The charter-party in clause 10 deals with one circumstance and one only—namely, strikes—which is expressly put in for the benefit of the charterers; and, that being so, the charterers cannot afterwards say that clause 11 is for their benefit. The current of authority is principally applicable to the shipowner's obligation for the safe delivery of the cargo, and shows that these exceptions are inserted for the benefit of the shipowner only, and not for that of the charterer. The matter was considered in Blight v. Page (3 B. & P. 295, n.), and Lord Kenyon there held in an action by the shipowners against the shippers that the exception "restraint of princes and rulers" was only applicable to the shipowners. In Touteng v. Hubbard (3 B. & P. 291), which was also an action on a charter-party by the shipowners against the charterers, Lord Alvanley, C.J. said (at p. 298): "I will first consider for what purpose and for whose benefit the words 'restraint of princes and rulers during the said voyage always excepted' were inserted in the charter-party. It appears to me that they were introduced for the benefit of the master, not of the merchant. . . . Lord Kenyon in the case of Blight v. Page (ubi sup.) put this construction on an instrument nearly similar with the present." Those cases show that this exception is for the benefit of the shipowners only; and the only case against that proposition is the case decided by Mathew, J. in 1896 of Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation (2 Com. Cas. 50), which really does not affect this case. The clause in this case is different from the clause in that case, and the difference shows that the reason why the charterers got the benefit of the exceptions in that case was that clauses were inserted in the charter-party in that case which were considered by Mathew, J. to show an intention that the charterers should get the benefit of the exception clause. That is not so in the present case, and Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation (ubi sup.) is therefore distinguishable upon that ground. [BIGHAM, J.—I have always understood that this clause as it stands here applies to the shipowner only?] Yes; the clause must be read as a clause only in favour of the shipowner. He also referred to Hulthen v. Stewart, 6 Com. Cas. 65.

Carver, K.C. (T. E. Smith with him) for the charterers.—This exception clause enures for the benefit of the charterers as well as of the shipowners, and, although the word "mutually" is frequently introduced in the form that the ordinary risks are "mutually excepted," the word "mutually" is quite unnecessary to give the charterers the benefit of the exceptions. In Touteng v. Hubbard (ubi sup.) the exception clause was a portion only of a larger clause, whereas here it forms the whole clause. In that case (see 3 B. & P., at p. 292), as well as in the case of Blight v. Page (3 B. & P. 295, n.), the shipowners were bound to "deliver the same"—that is, the cargo—"on being paid freight by the merchant," and the exception "restraint of princes" comes immediately after, so that the words of that exception came in as a qualification of the obligation to deliver, and were therefore held to be for the benefit of the shipowners only. The exception clause in this charter-party comes after the several clauses that relate to the voyage to the port of loading, the loading, and the voyage to and delivery at the port of discharge, and the exceptions are therefore as applicable to the charterers' part of loading and unloading as they are to the shipowners' part of bringing the ship to the ports of loading and discharge and safely delivering: (see Ford v. Cotesworth, 19 L. T. Rep. 634; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 127, at p. 137; and in Ex. Ch., per Martin, B., 23 L. T. Rep., at p. 166; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 544, at p. 548). Martin, B. there says: "For my own part, I do not see why the clause, 'restraints of princes and rulers, &c.,' throughout this charter-party always excepted," should not apply to the present circumstances"—that was, to the excuse of the charterers. The view taken in the text-books is that the exception clause in the charter-party applies to exonerate both shipowner and charterer (see Scrutton on Charter-parties, pp. 168, 169, and p. 174, where it is said: "The exceptions in the bill of lading only apply to exonerate the shipowner or carrier; exceptions in the charter apply to exonerate both shipowner and charterer"; and see Carver's Carriage by Sea, sect. 150, p. 175, which is to the same effect). The case is really concluded by the case of Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation (ubi sup.), which decides the exact point. There the exception clause was the same as this, and Mathew, J. held that the exception enured for the benefit of the charterer as well as of the shipowner. We must look at this charter-party as a whole; all the clauses at the end are general clauses of general application, and why should not this exception clause be of general application? Unless there is some indication to the contrary in the charter-party itself, the right construction is to apply the clause to both parties. So far as to the question whether the exceptions apply to both parties. The next question is, assuming that they apply to the charterers, how far they apply. As to the delay of the seven days, there is the express finding that that was caused necessarily by the fire. As to that the charterers are clearly excused. As to the ten days, there is the finding that, although the delay was not necessarily caused by the fire, the consignees pursued a reasonable course in so discharging the cargo, and once it is found that a party to the contract when placed in a difficult position acts reasonably, that is sufficient to entitle him to the benefit of the clause. The charterers are therefore excused as to both periods.

BIGHAM, J.—The question in this case is whether the exception in the charter-party with reference to fire enures to the benefit of the charterer as well as to the benefit of the shipowner. For my own part, if I had to decide this case without reference to authority, I should be of opinion that all the exceptions in the 11th clause of this charter-party were intended to apply exclusively for the protection of the shipowner and to nothing else. I have always understood these clauses to be introduced by the shipowner for his own benefit, and for his own benefit only. But the case is not devoid of authority. I have the decision of Mathew, J. in the case of Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation (ubi sup), and I do not think I can decide this case according to my own view of the intention of the parties, having that case before me, for I am not able to distinguish satisfactorily the present case from the case of Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation (ubi sup). It seems to me to follow that if the decision in Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation (ubi sup) is right, then the exceptions in clause 11 of this charter-party must be applied for the mutual benefit of both shipowner and charterer. It is quite a common thing, known to us all, that the charterer not infrequently introduces into a clause of this kind the word "mutually" for the purpose of acquiring the benefit of the clause, and probably under the impression that if he did not do so he would not get the benefit of it; and it is the recollection of that fact, amongst others, that makes me disposed to say that the clause without the word "mutually" in it is intended only for the benefit of the shipowner. But, I repeat, there is the authority of the judgment of Mathew, J., and I am not able to distinguish in principle the present case from that case. Mathew, J. in dealing with the case of Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation (ubi sup) relies upon certain clauses in the charter-party which point to mutuality; and he says that he sees no reason why mutuality should not be applied to the clause as to the excepted perils, and he gives an illustration which, to my mind, applies to this case just as much as it did to the case with which he was then dealing. He says: "During the argument the question was put: If the cargo had been provided, and the lighters had all been sunk"—which, of course, would have been a peril of the sea—"would the exceptions have applied to protect the charterers? To my mind they would if it were not for clause 3"—a particular clause which he mentions and to which he refers. He must have thought that the exception of perils of the sea in the exception clause was intended for the protection of both shipowner and charterer. I think I am bound by that authority to say that the exception of fire in this charter-party applies both to the charterers and the shipowners, and that therefore the charterers are entitled in this case to the benefit of the protection that it gives.

Now, the next question in the case is, What protection does it give? On the facts as found by Mr. Pickford, I am of opinion that the charterers are excused from payment for the seven days mentioned in par. 11 of the case. Mr. Pickford there finds that it was necessary to remove the vessel from her discharging berth in consequence of the fire, and that the damaged hay required a longer time to discharge than if it had been sound, and that there was a necessary delay of seven days in consequence of the fire. The facts as found there, I think, bring that part of the case within the exception. Then, as to the other part of the case, Mr. Pickford finds that after the fire had been extinguished, and the said vessel could have been safely brought back to a discharging berth, the consignees continued to discharge the damaged hay into lighters in the river instead of so bringing her back and continuing the discharge at the said berth. The said course was adopted because the hay was damaged and worthless to the consignees, and was, under the circumstances, a reasonable course for them to pursue, but it was not necessary in consequence of the said fire. Then he says that the delay there amounted to ten days. I am of opinion that in respect of those ten days the charterers are not excused. The fire had ceased to be the operating cause and was not the operating cause during these days at all—that is to say, the exception ceased to exist, and is therefore no longer available to excuse the charterers. The fact appears to have been that the hay had been rendered worthless and the charterers chose to throw it away, to throw it overboard, and they could do it much more cheaply and easily, though at considerable delay to the vessel herself, if they threw it overboard where the vessel then lay. As to those ten days, I think the charterers are not entitled to rely upon the exception as excusing them from performing a positive contract to discharge the vessel within a certain number of days.

THE HARMONIDES.

[ADM.]

On the 5th March 1902 a collision occurred in a dense fog in the river Mersey between the steamship Waesland, belonging to the Red Star Line, and the steamship Harmonides, of the Houston Line, in consequence of which the Waesland sank and was totally lost.

The Waesland at the time was on a voyage from Liverpool to Philadelphia with a general cargo and passengers.

At the trial of the action the Harmonides was found solely in fault for the collision, and her owners subsequently obtained a decree limiting their liability, under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, to sl. per ton, and paid the sum of 27,12*sl.* into court with interest from the date of the collision.

At the reference before the district registrar and merchants at Liverpool, claims amounting in all to 80,477*l.* were put forward by the owners of the Waesland, owners of cargo on board, and others. Of this sum, the owners of the Waesland claimed 29,777*l.* as the value of their vessel at the time of the collision, and in support of their claim affidavits were filed by the senior partner in the firm of managing owners, and by a former general manager of the Cunard Steamship Company. As against these an affidavit of Mr. Lachlan, a partner in the firm of Lachlan and Co., official valuers to the Court of Admiralty, was filed, in which he gave it as his opinion that the market value of the Waesland was 16,500*l.*, exclusive of the equipment for passengers.

No witnesses were called in support of either of these allegations, and the registrar came to the conclusion that 18,000*l.* was a proper value to put on the vessel, and allowed this sum accordingly.

The owners of the Waesland appealed.

At the hearing of the motion in objection to the registrar's report, a further affidavit was filed by the owners of the Waesland claiming a further sum of 1426*l.*, the value of the refrigerating machinery on board of her. The learned judge, being of opinion that further evidence ought to have been given before the registrar, adjourned the case in order that witnesses might be called.

At the adjourned hearing on the 7th Nov. a statement was put in of the yearly earnings of the Waesland, and evidence was called by her owners from which it appeared that the Waesland was a steamship of 4752 tons gross, built originally in the year 1867 for the Cunard Steamship Company and named the Russia. She was purchased in 1880 by the Red Star Line for 18,000*l.* and renamed by them, and at the same time she was lengthened and refitted for passenger accommodation, about 50,000*l.* in all being spent upon her. In 1889 her engines were tripled at an expense of 23,000*l.*, and it was estimated that her cabin accommodation had cost 18,000*l.* The value set upon her by her owners had been arrived at by adding together the sums expended in 1880 and 1889 and deducting 6 per cent. per annum for depreciation.

It was contended that it was impossible to say what was the exact market value of an Atlantic liner, because they never came into the market unless they were unprofitable or worn out.

Evidence was called by the respondents to prove that the Waesland was virtually an obsolete vessel, and that her market value was in the circumstances a fair test of her value to her owners.

The Iron-Master, Swa. 441.

BARNES, J. (after dealing with the facts and the evidence).—I think the litigation in this court has been brought about by the case being treated too scantily before the district registrar, because the moment the case was presented to me on these affidavits it became obvious that one would desire to see the witnesses and hear them cross-examined, and have them point out by what reasons they were able to support their affidavits. I think it is to be regretted that the matter was not more fully dealt with before the district registrar. It has been fully considered before me and I have seen the witnesses, and I think I am in a much better position for dealing with this case than the registrar was when he had it before him. There is no real dispute between the parties as to the principle upon which the matter should be dealt with. I fully agree with the observations quoted from the case of The Iron-Master (ubi sup.). There is no doubt that in this class of case the best evidence is that of those who know the ship, and the next best evidence that of those who have experience of the market, but who do not know the vessel except from the shipping records. There are other criterions, such as the amount of capital invested, the amount of depreciation, the amount of profits, and so forth. All these matters have to be considered, to my mind, where it is impossible to say that there is a real market test of the value of such a vessel as this. If one goes to the root of the matter, it is clearly obvious that what the owners lose if a vessel like this is run into and sunk is really what it would cost to replace them in the position they were in before the accident. But where a ship like this has gone to the bottom you cannot, speaking from a business point of view, replace them in the position they were in before, because you cannot replace the vessel which is at the bottom of the sea; you cannot buy another like her in the market; you cannot get another made immediately, and if you bought another ship she would be new and consequently more valuable, because she would start as a new ship from that day. You would have to start on the basis of her being a new ship and then discount her value down. So that the real test, where there is no market, is, as Mr. Aspinall has said, and Mr. Pickford agrees, what is the value to the owners, as a going concern, at the time the vessel was sunk? There is no dispute between counsel as to that. You cannot get at it with any great certainty. Certainly, to my mind, you cannot get at it from the market value. Possibly, for such a ship at such a time there would be no market, and she would have to be sold for old iron. You cannot deal with it like an ordinary commodity being sold every day. You must look at it and see what is the loss to the owners. It has been pointed out that you may look at the original cost, plus the money expended on her, and so forth. That is of assistance, but it is not complete assistance, because it is a rough and ready method. You may look and see also how the ship is paying. But that is not a complete test because you cannot be sure that the way she has been paying will continue. But one thing is absolutely certain, you cannot say the test is her market value. I think the registrar has come to an erroneous view about this case because he has not had it sufficiently threshed out before him. I have considered it with great care, and by the light of the class of ship, and of the considerations which ought to be taken into account, in arriving at what the ship was really worth to her owners, and my opinion is that the appellants have not overstated their case. I think the vessel was worth 31,000*l.*, and I therefore propose to vary the report by increasing the sum of 18,000*l.* to 31,000*l.* The appellants must have the costs of the appeal.

THE TERGESTE. (a)

An allowance of money made to the crew of a vessel in consideration of their finding their own provisions is part of their wages, and they have a maritime lien in respect of it.

The maritime lien of the crew for their wages takes priority of the possessory lien of shipwrights up to the time when the vessel is put into the hands of the shipwrights for repairs, and the fact of the master and crew being on board the vessel while repairs are being done does not oust the possessory lien of the shipwrights.

Where a contract has been entered into to do certain repairs to a ship, the repairers have a possessory lien for the work they have done, although they have not completed all the repairs they contracted to do.

ACTION by the master and crew against the owners of the Italian steamship Tergeste claiming wages and disbursements, and also a declaration that the crew were entitled to a possessory lien for work done to the vessel while in dry dock.

The owners entered no defence to the action, but shipwrights, who claimed to have a possessory lien on the ship for repairs, intervened.

The Tergeste arrived in London on the 9th March 1902. As she had suffered some damage on the voyage, and it was also necessary for her to undergo her No. 2 survey in order to keep her class, a contract was entered into with Messrs. Rait and Gardiner to do the necessary work.

On the 8th April the vessel was put into Messrs. Rait and Gardiner's dry dock, and work was begun. The crew at the same time were also employed doing repairs.

In June the contractors, having failed to obtain any money on account, stopped work, and on the 29th July, as they still remained unpaid, they commenced an action against the ship. She was thereupon arrested by the master and crew in the present action, and, as the owners did not appear, she was sold by order of the court, and the proceeds, which amounted to 3440*l.*, less 250*l.*, paid by order of the Vacation judge to the crew, were brought into court.

Evidence was called by the plaintiffs from which it appeared that the master was engaged at 18*l.* a month, including food, and the crew were shipped under Italian articles, and received forty lire per month as wages, and a further forty lire as a victualling allowance.

They claimed that they had a maritime lien for both the wages and the victualling allowance, that they were entitled to a further sum by way of viaticum, and they also claimed that they were entitled to a possessory lien for the work done by them to the vessel while in dry dock.

The interveners admitted that wages were due up to the time the vessel was put into dry dock, but not beyond that date.

Laing, K.C. and Denis O'Connor for the plaintiffs.—The interveners have no possessory lien, as they have not completed their contract. They can only have a possessory lien if a common law action would lie, and here it will not, as they have stopped work of their own accord. Moreover, the master and crew were on board the whole time the repairs were being done, and therefore Messrs. Rait and Gardiner never had complete possession of the vessel. They referred to:

The Gustaf, 6 L. T. Rep. 660; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 230; Lush. 506;

The Immacolata Concezione, 50 L. T. Rep. 539; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208; 9 P. Div. 37;

Fisher on Mortgage, sect. 623.

Aspinall, K.C. and Darby for the interveners.—The shipwrights have a promissory lien. In The Gustaf (ubi sup.) the crew remained on board during the operations, and in The Immacolata Concezione (ubi sup.) the shipwrights stopped work on account of the insolvency of the shipowners. There was no specific contract, and a repairer is entitled to be paid on account, and retains his possessory lien throughout:

Roberts v. Havelock, 3 B. & A. 404.

The following cases were also referred to:

Ex parte Willoughby, 44 L. T. Rep. 111; 16 Ch. Div. 604;

The Carolina, 34 L. T. Rep. 399; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 141.

PHILLIMORE, J.—The Italian steamship Tergeste was arrested by the marshal of the court in an action for wages and disbursements, brought by the master on behalf of himself and the crew. At the time she was arrested the firm of Rait and Gardiner, ship-repairers, claimed to have a common law possessory lien on the ship for work which they had done. The ship sold for 3440*l.*, of which 250*l.* has already been paid, under the order of the Vacation judge, by or on behalf of the plaintiffs, leaving 3190*l.* to be dealt with new. The claim of the plaintiffs, if it is to be supported in its entirety, amounts to a large sum—I think about 1400*l.* As against that Messrs. Rait and Gardiner say they have spent 4161*l.* in repairs to the ship, in respect of which they claim a possessory lien, and though that bill has not been taxed and might of course be taxed, I understand that the counsel for the master and crew do not say that if that bill was to be allowed in its proper shape it would not exhaust the fund in court—at any rate, that the uncontested part of this claim would not exhaust the fund in court. Therefore it becomes a question of dispute between the master and crew on the one side and Rait and Gardiner on the other as to which should have priority for their claims. It is not disputed, and there is no doubt that the master and crew are entitled to priority for their wages up to the date the ship was put into the dry dock of Rait and Gardiner, which was on the 8th April. I have to decide what is meant by their wages. I come to the conclusion that what is called the victualling money or allowance of forty lire per man per month in respect of victualling is part of his wages, and that therefore the master and crew may not only have the sum given them for their wages, but also the sum given to the crew in consideration of their finding their own provisions, and I do not think, that being allowed, there is any serious dispute as to the amount due for wages to the master and crew. The crew are also entitled to their viaticum home, and I understand that counsel for the material man are ready to accept the figures in the captain's account, as to the way in which he spent the 250*l.* which was advanced by the marshal to him, as correct. To that must be added, I think it was said to be 8*l.* for the captain's journey home. I do not think that the crew are entitled, at any rate, in priority to the material man if the material man has a lien, to any allowance for subsistence money, from the time when they issued their writ to the time when they were provided for by the marshal. It may be that the registrar will allow some sum in respect of costs according to whatever is the usual rule in those matters. That I leave entirely to him. The captain's disbursements previous to the time when the ship was put into dry dock are claimed at the sum of 87*l.*, and I understand there is no serious conflict about that. Those items, therefore, are in the first instance to be paid out of the fund in court.

The view which the Admiralty Court has taken with regard to conflicting claims by shipwrights having a possessory common law lien and the claims which have been sustained by process in the Admiralty Court has been well established and been accepted by the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice since. It is that it is the duty of the material man not to fight with the Admiralty marshal; to surrender the ship to the officer of the court and let the officer of the court, under the order of the court, remove and sell her; but having done that, the court undertakes that he shall be protected, and that he shall be put exactly in the same position as if he had not surrendered the ship to the marshal; and the court has further decided in the case of The Gustaf (ubi sup.) that the possessory lien is subject to maritime liens attaching to the ship when taken into the shipwright's yard, and the only doubt that Butt, J. had in the case of The Immacolata Concezione (ubi sup.) was whether The Gustaf was not too favourable to the claimants under a maritime lien. I have some recollection of that case, which may assist the court, besides the report of it. The court has decided that maritime liens which accrue before the ship is put into the possession of the shipwright are to be paid in preference to the shipwright's possessory lien—probably on the ground put by Dr. Lushington, that the shipwright is entitled to retain the ship, but that if there is a possessory lien, that possessory lien is to take precedence of all maritime liens for claims which accrue after the date when the possessory lien begins. There is no doubt here when the possessory lien began; it began when the ship was put into dry dock. It is perfectly true that for some days there was no amount due in respect of which the lien would operate; that becomes material, because the date I have to look to is the date when the ship was taken from the shipwrights by the marshal, and the shipwrights should be in the same position as they were at the time when the ship was taken from their possession. If Messrs. Rait and Gardiner had such possession as to give them a possessory lien at the date when the ship was taken by the Admiralty marshal they had it for the price of the whole of the work which they had done up to that time. It is said they had no possessory lien, because the master and crew were on board; if that were the rule a great number of shipwrights' liens would be disturbed. That man has a lien who has such control of the chattel as prevents it being taken away from his possession. He may admit other persons or workmen to access to the chattel; other tradesmen may claim a possessory lien of the chattel or part of it, but if it cannot be got out of the dock or yard without the consent of the owner of the dock or yard the owner of the dock will have a possessory lien, though perhaps not the only one, on the chattel, which he can enforce, and which the court has taken upon itself to enforce for him as against subsequent claims. I have no doubt in this case that Rait and Gardiner had an ample possessory lien. Then comes the next point, had any money accrued to them? It is said, no, because they had not completed any one of the five orders which they had received. There the law follows good sense and business principles, and it was said by the court in Roberts v. Havelock (ubi sup.) that a man who contracts to do a long costly piece of work does not contract, unless he expressly says so, that he will do all the work, standing out of pocket until he is paid at the end. He is entitled to say, "That is not my contract; it is quite true that I had contracted to do the work and I am bound to do it, but there is an understanding all along that you are to give me from time to time, at reasonable intervals, payments for work done." The shipwrights contend that if the contract here was to do certain work, it always included the term, to do it if they were paid reasonable sums in part payment as they went along, not an advance, but in part payment for work already done before they proceeded to the next thing; and if that payment was not made then the shipwright, or any other artificer, is entitled to review his work, and say, "I have done work worth so much; true I have contracted to do other work, but it is not reasonable I should do it as I have not been paid, and in respect of work I have done I claim payment." In my judgment Messrs. Rait and Gardiner had here a possessory lien for the work which they had done, though they had not finished all the work. If they had asked for payment on account, as they were entitled to do. They have a possessory lien on all the work they have done, and that lien takes precedence of any claim, even a maritime lien, which has accrued since the ship first came into their possession. The result, therefore, is that the plaintiffs master and crew will be entitled to their wages to the 8th April, to the money in the form of wages which takes the form of compensation for provisions up to the same date, their viaticum home, including the viaticum to the captain, to the captain's disbursements up to that date. After that must come the claim of Messrs. Rait and Gardiner, and as that will unquestionably swallow up almost all that is left, it is unnecessary to discuss anything further, and I think that is the proper order to be made. The costs will come out of the fund, and there will be no reference unless some ground is given for one, and if any of the parties make an unnecessary application for a reference they will have to pay the costs.

THE TORBRYAN. (a)

Charter-party—Damage to cargo—Negligence of stevedores—Exception clause—Proper interpretation of words.

Goods were shipped under a charter-party, a clause of which protected the shipowners from liability for "the act of God . . . and all other accidents excepted, even though caused by negligence, fault, or error of judgment on the part of the pilot, captain, sailors, or other servants of the owners in the management or navigation of the vessel, or otherwise."

Held, that the shipowners were not liable for damage done to the goods, as the word "otherwise" referred, not to the "management or navigation of the vessel," but to the receiving and delivery of the cargo, and that although the damage was due to the negligence of the stevedores in the discharge of the cargo, it was an "accident" within the meaning of the clause, as the negligence was not wilful.

ACTION by owners of cargo to recover damages in respect of damage done to cargo and short delivery. By a charter-party, dated the 30th Jan. 1902, the plaintiffs shipped 8000 bags of sugar at Dunkirk for London by the defendants' steamship Torbryan. The sugar was shipped in bags, and after the cargo had been discharged it was found that seven of the bags were missing, seven others had been damaged by coal dust, and several of the other bags had been torn and a portion of the contents lost, partly owing to their striking the deck or hatch-coamings as they were being discharged, and partly owing to the stevedores having used hooks. The plaintiffs claimed 17*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.* in all for the damage done and loss of the contents of the bags.

The defendants admitted that the bags were shipped apparently in good order and condition, and that the number and weights were correct, and paid into court 12*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* in respect of the bags lost and those damaged by coal dust. They contended, however, that the damage to the remainder was caused by the bags being too thin and weak, and also by the negligent stowage of them by the defendants' agents or servants at Dunkirk, in consequence of which the various marks got mixed up together and rendered the discharge very difficult. They also contended that they were protected by the exceptions in the charter-party, which were as follows:

The act of God, fire, perils of the seas, barratry on the part of the captain or crew, enemies, pirates, or robbers, strikes, arrests or restraint of princes, rulers, and people, collisions, strandings, and all other accidents excepted, even though caused by negligence, fault, or error of judgment on the part of the pilot, captain, sailors, or other servants of the owners in the management of the vessel, or otherwise.

Scrutton, K.C. and Balloch for the plaintiffs.

Carver, K.C. and Nelson for the defendants.

At the conclusion of the evidence, Phillimore, J. stated that, in his opinion, the damage to the bags and the consequent loss was due to negligence of the stevedores in the handling and discharge of the cargo.

The arguments of counsel on the question of law sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Dec. 8.—PHILLIMORE, J.—The plaintiffs are the owners of 8000 bags of sugar shipped on the steamship Torbryan at Dunkirk for delivery in London upon the terms of a charter-party in the French language, of which I have an agreed translation. They sue in respect of four heads of damage—seven bags short delivery, 9*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.*; seven bags damaged by coal dust, 3*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* (which two sums have been paid since writ); loss by spilling from bags, 158*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*; cost of repairing bags, 7*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.* These two latter claims are in question. I have no doubt as to the facts. The cargo was brought over in sufficient bags. Some were torn in the sides by hooks which the stevedores improperly and recklessly used in the course of discharge. Some were cut through from below by the slings owing to the sets being violently knocked from underneath against the deck or the coamings of the hatch in the course of their being carelessly lifted out of the hold. It is possible that in a few cases the bags burst at the seams through the same violent contact. From the holes and at the burst seams fine crystallised sugar spilt in the process of moving. Some was saved clean and put back into the bags, some was saved in a damaged condition and sold for an inferior price as sweepings, and a good deal was lost. The net loss was properly put by the plaintiffs at 158l. 2s. 8d., and they properly spent 7l. 19s. 5d. in repairing the bags, and thus saving further loss. The acts and omissions of the stevedores which caused these losses were negligent and improper, the stevedores were the servants of the shipowner, and he is responsible to the plaintiffs unless he is protected by the charter-party. There is one other fact which might on a possible construction of the charter-party be material—viz., the proportion of loss due to either of the two causes, tearing by the hooks or violent contact. I have no means of apportioning between these two causes, and it was agreed at the trial that if such apportionment should ever become necessary it should be ascertained in some subsequent proceeding, either by a reference to the registrar or otherwise. The material clause of the charter-party is as follows: [His Lordship then read the clause set out above.] Protective clauses of this kind are now well established in commerce, and business is conducted on the footing of their existence, and courts of justice must, and do give full effect to them. But the position is artificial, the steps by which the court reaches the construction are made up of arguments finely drawn, and the conclusion is of necessity strange to the plain man, who is neither lawyer nor merchant. The defendants contend that the loss sued for is upon the facts which I have found to be considered to be due to an "accident caused by negligence of servants of the owners" "otherwise" than "in the management or navigation of the vessel." I propose first to deal with the word "otherwise." The plaintiffs say that this word means something very like management or navigation, and they rely upon the cases of Re Richardsons and Samuel (ubi sup.) and Owners of Cargo on board the Steamship Waikato v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.). The defendants say that this word introduces, at any rate, something in addition to management and navigation, and they rely upon the case of Baerselman v. Bailey (ubi sup.). I think both contentions are of force, but the result of the two is in favour of the defendants. "Navigation" is the bringing of the ship with the cargo on board from port to port. "Management" covers such matters as opening and closing the hatches to secure ventilation or protection from weather, and such exceptional duties with regard to the cargo as may be imposed upon the master of the ship in certain events upon the authority of the case of Notara v. Henderson (ubi sup.). What is naturally left for the word "otherwise" except the receiving and delivery of the cargo?

Then comes the question—Is this loss due to an accident caused by negligence?—a question to my mind far more difficult. I have considered the cases of Pandorf v. Hamilton (ubi sup.), The Xantho (ubi sup.), The Cressington (ubi sup.), and Blackburn v. Liverpool, Brazil, and River Plate Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.), which, apparently, contain the law upon this subject. On the whole, I think that the loss here should be deemed for the purposes of the charter-party to be caused by the spilling of the sugar, and that this spilling was an accident. The other view would be that the loss was caused by damage to the bags, and that it would be necessary for the defendants to prove that the damage to the bags was accidental. Even taking the case at this stage, I think the defendants should succeed. I have not much doubt that they should succeed as to those bags which were damaged by the striking against the deck or hatch coamings. That striking, though due to careless working, was clearly accidental. The loss from these bags was, in my view, due to an accident, the spilling, caused by an accident, the striking, which was brought about by negligence. As regards the damage caused by the hooks, I have had more doubt. All use of such hooks as were used was wrongful, and was likely to be injurious; but it did not follow that the hooks each time they were used tore one of the bags. Here, again, I think upon the whole that there was a loss by accident, the spilling, caused by another accident, the tearing, due to negligence in shifting the bags with hooks. In this way I arrive at a double accident in the chain of consequences in each case; but a single accident is sufficient for the defendants. It was urged upon me that very early in the course of delivery and repeatedly afterwards complaint was made of and to the stevedores of their improper working in both respects, and it was contended that their persistence after warning removed the subsequent mischief from the category of accidents. The fact is true, but I cannot accept the inference sought to be drawn from it. The stevedores were reckless, and it may be said wanton, but they were not wilful. They did not intend to damage or destroy; they intended to hurry over the discharge, and to take their chance of doing or not doing damage. They handled many bags without damaging them. The balance were damaged, and as each bag was damaged it was an accident, though no doubt not an unlikely one. There must be judgment for the defendants except as to the two small claims which have been paid since the writ was issued.

THE DUC D'AUMALE. (a)

Practice—Collision—Action in personam—Concurrent writ—Service out of jurisdiction—“Necessary or proper party” — Rules of Supreme Court 1883, Order XI., r. 1 (g).

A collision occurred outside territorial waters between a British steamship and a French barque, which at the time was in tow of a British tug.

An action was commenced in personam by the owners of the steamship against the owners of the tug and the owners of the barque in tow of her.

given to issue a concurrent writ and to serve notice of it out of the jurisdiction. The judgment of Barnes, J. affirmed.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Barnes, J. refusing to set aside an order of the President (Sir F. Jeune) granting leave to issue a concurrent writ in an action for damage by collision, and allowing notice of the same to be served out of the jurisdiction.

The appellants were the Compagnie Maritime Française, the owners of the French barque Duc d'Aumale, and the respondents were the Marychurch Steamship Company, the owners of the British steamship Camrose.

On the 22nd June 1902 a collision occurred between the steamship Camrose and the Duc d'Aumale in the English Channel, but outside British territorial waters. The Duc d'Aumale at the time was in tow of the British steam-tug Challenge, and after the collision she put into Calais, while the Camrose proceeded on her voyage to Antwerp. Subsequently the Duc d'Aumale was towed to Dunkirk and there repaired. There was no collision between the Camrose and the tug Challenge.

On the 2nd July proceedings were instituted by the owners of the Duc d'Aumale in the Tribunal of Commerce at Nantes against the owners of the Camrose, and, as no appearance was entered to the action, judgment was given against them by default on the 20th Aug., and they were pronounced solely in fault for the collision, and condemned in damages and costs. By the convention of the 8th July 1899, a judgment of a French court can be enforced in Belgium, and the owners of the Duc d'Aumale threatened to seize the Camrose in Antwerp, whereupon the owners of the Camrose agreed to give bail, without prejudice, for 250,000 francs, to prevent their vessel being arrested as soon as the proceedings by default became final. On the 11th July the owners of the Camrose issued a writ in personam against the owners of the Duc d'Aumale and the owners of the tug Challenge, claiming compensation for the damage their vessel had suffered by the collision. The writ was duly served on the owners of the Challenge, and on the 8th Aug. the plaintiffs obtained leave from the President (Sir F. Jeune) to issue a concurrent writ, and to serve notice of it on the owners of the Duc d'Aumale at Nantes. This notice was duly served on the 14th Aug., and on the 25th Aug. the owners of the Duc d'Aumale entered a conditional appearance under protest, and on the 23rd Oct. they took out a summons in chambers praying that the order might be discharged and the writ set aside. This summons was adjourned into court, and on the 10th Nov. came on by way of motion before Barnes, J.

It was contended by the owners of the Duc d'Aumale that the action was not properly brought against the owners of the Challenge within the meaning of the rule, as the tug Challenge had never been in collision with the plaintiffs' steamship Camrose, and that the real purpose of the action was to bring the Duc d'Aumale before the court, although the collision occurred outside the jurisdiction.

Order XI., r. 1 (g) is as follows :

Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the court or a judge wherever—(g) Any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction.

Scrutton, K.C. in support of the motion.

Pickford, K.C. and Balloch, contra.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument :

- Massey v. Heynes*, 59 L. T. Rep. 470; 21 Q. B. Div. 330;
Flower v. Rose, 7 Times L. Rep. 280;
Witted v. Galbraith, 68 L. T. Rep. 354; (1893) 1 Q. B. 577;
Williams v. Cartwright, 71 L. T. Rep. 834; (1895) 1 Q. B. 142;

The Avon and Thomas Jolliffe, 63 L. T. Rep. 712; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 605; (1891) P. 7.

BARNES, J.—The first point taken on behalf of the owners of the Duc d'Aumale is that the writ is issued against persons who are not "necessary or proper" parties to an action "properly brought" within the jurisdiction, for it is argued that the action is really and substantially brought against the French owners, and that the tug-owners are only put on the record for the purpose of bringing in the French shipowners under Order XI., r. 1 (g). That argument is supported by the cases of Flower v. Rose (ubi sup.), Witted v. Galbraith (ubi sup.), and Williams v. Cartwright (ubi sup.). The view presented on the other side in substance is that there is an actual bonâ fide cause of action alleged against the tug-owners as well as against the French shipowners, and that, if the owners of both these vessels, the tug and tow, had been within the jurisdiction, they would both have been proper parties in a suit to recover for the damage done to the plaintiffs' ship, and that the tugowners in this case are not merely brought into the suit for the purpose of founding a right to proceed under the sub-section to which I have referred. I am of opinion that in this matter the plaintiffs are in the right. I think that the action is properly founded against both defendants, if there is a bonâ fide charge of negligence against both sets of defendants, which is the case presented on the part of the plaintiffs, and therefore I do not think it can be said that the other defendants, the French owners, are either improper or unreasonable or unnecessary parties. Of course, they are not strictly necessary parties—the words in the rule are "necessary or proper"—but they are "proper" parties to the suit brought in this court against both, and I think, after listening to the cases cited by counsel for the owners of the French ship, that the reasoning of those cases is that the attempt was there made to bring into play the sub-section of the rule when there was no real cause of action against the persons who were within the jurisdiction, and it was only sought to bring the rule into play, if it could by possibility be done, in order to enforce a remedy against the persons who were not within the jurisdiction. I do not think that I can usefully add anything to what I have said except by referring to Lord Esher's judgment in Massey v. Heynes (21 Q. B. Div. 330, at p. 338), where he says: "The question whether a person out of the jurisdiction is a 'proper party' to an action against a person who has been served within the jurisdiction must depend on this—supposing both parties had been within the jurisdiction, would they both have been proper parties to the action? If they would, and only one of them is in this country, then the rule says that the other may be served, just as if he had been within the jurisdiction. This is the legislation on the subject, and we are bound by it." There is this further point to make in a case of this kind, apart from what may happen in the future, if the plaintiffs succeed against the French shipowners in enforcing their rights. There can be no doubt that, if this is a bonâ fide allegation of negligence against both sets of defendants, it is quite the proper and right thing that the whole matter should be fought out once for all with everybody present who was concerned with the accident. Therefore, unless this is a mere attempt to bring in the outside person not subject to the jurisdiction, without a shadow of a right against the person who is within the jurisdiction, I think that it is quite a proper case in which the process should be allowed to go against both. There may be the ultimate difficulty in enforcing the judgment if recovered, and at the present moment there is the difficulty on the part of the present appellants in setting aside this writ and enforcing what I understand is a judgment recovered by them in default of appearance in France against the present plaintiffs. It appears by affidavit that some proceedings in France were instituted by the French company against the present plaintiffs, and an attempt is now being made to enforce that judgment in Belgium. I have not thought it necessary to adjourn this case in order to inquire what the rights of the parties are in Belgium, or to see what would be the result of the French suit; but it is a strong thing to say that the rights of the parties are to be precluded by default proceedings, and my decision, in the exercise of the discretion vested in me, is that the application on the part of the defendants, the French company, must be refused. The costs will be costs in the cause.

The defendants appealed.

Dec. 1.—Scrutton, K.C. and Noad for the appellants.—There must be a bonâ fide cause of action against the person served within the jurisdiction before leave should be given to serve notice out of the jurisdiction. The words of Order XI., r. 1 (g), are "a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served," &c. The test is whether the defendant within the jurisdiction could have been properly made a party to the action if there had been no question of jurisdiction:

Witted v. Galbraith (ubi sup.).

In that case the Court of Appeal refused to allow shipowners residing in Scotland to be served, on the ground that the action against the brokers residing in London was not a bonâ fide one. See also the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R. in Williams v. Cartwright (ubi sup.). The tug is the servant of the tow, so that there is no cause of action against the tug. It cannot be said the tug is independently liable, because there never was a collision between the Camrose and the tug. The owners of the tug are simply made defendants so as to take advantage of Order XI., r. 1 (g), and bring in the owners of the French ship. Secondly, the appellants have obtained judgment by default in the court at Nantes, and that decision is now final. If the proceedings in this country go on, there will be two conflicting decisions. Thirdly, the action is one in personam in respect of a collision on the high seas. The cause of action did not arise within the jurisdiction of the English courts, and, as Lord Coleridge pointed out in Harris v. Owners of the Franconia (2 C. P. Div. 173, at p. 177), Order XI., r. 1, does not enable a judge to order service of a writ out of the jurisdiction in such cases. If service of notice of writ is allowed, there will be an assumption of jurisdiction over a foreigner in personam in respect of a tort committed on the high seas, in spite of the fact that the vessel has never come within the jurisdiction. See

This would amount to an alteration of the rights of the parties by means of rules of practice, and the rules are rules of procedure only, and were never intended to affect the rights of the parties:

British South Africa Company v. Companhia de Moçambique, 75 L. T. Rep. 604; (1893) A. C. 602.

Pickford, K.C. and Balloch, for the respondents, the owners of the Camrose, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—It seems to me that the rule was framed with a view of excluding the cases put by the learned counsel who has just addressed us, because you could not have it more clearly expressed in language than it is in this sub-section. (g) of Order XI., r. 1. [His Lordship then read the rule.] So that the framers of the rule make the criterion due service within the jurisdiction; not that the cause of action itself has arisen within the jurisdiction. If you get the "other person" duly served within the jurisdiction, then you have to show that the person not within the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party. The service, and not the cause of action, is made the criterion in this sub-section. With regard to the legal merits of the case, I have nothing to add to the judgment of Barnes, J., which appears to me to cover the whole ground, and with which I entirely agree.

MATHEW, L.J.—I agree. The question here is whether one of the parties is a necessary or proper person within the meaning of the rule. There is no doubt that if these two persons were British subjects within the jurisdiction they could be sued together. One happens to be out of the jurisdiction, which is the case referred to in the rule. There is the service of the writ upon one within the jurisdiction, and this enables leave to be given to serve another person out of the jurisdiction who is a proper party to the litigation.

MACIVER AND CO. LIMITED v. TATE STEAMERS
LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Seaworthiness — Charter-party — Charterers to provide and pay for coal — Captain to be under orders of charterers — Liability of owners to see that ship was seaworthy as regards amount of coal on board at commencement of voyage.

A charter-party for a voyage from the United Kingdom to the River Plate and back provided that the charterers should provide and pay for all the coal, and the captain was to be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, and other arrangements.

Held, affirming the decision of Kennedy, J., that there was nothing in the charter-party to relieve the shipowners from their duty of seeing that the steamer was seaworthy as regards her supply of coals on board at the time of leaving the River Plate on her return voyage.

APPEAL by the defendants from the judgment of Kennedy, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiffs were the charterers, and the defendants were the owners of the steamship Patapsco.

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of the terms of a charter-party that the ship should be seaworthy for a voyage from the River Plate and St. Vincent.

By the charter-party, dated the 14th Feb. 1901, the defendants agreed to let and the plaintiffs agreed to hire the steamship Patapsco for one round voyage from Liverpool to the River Plate and back to the United Kingdom, the ship to be placed at the disposal of the charterers at Liverpool in such dock, or at such wharf or place (where she might always safely lie afloat) as they might direct, and

Being on her delivery ready to receive cargo, and tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted for the service . . . having steam winches and donkey boiler with capacity to move all the steam winches at once and at the same time, or main boiler to be used, (and with full complement of officers, seamen, engineers, and firemen for a vessel of her tonnage) and to be so maintained during the continuance of the charter-party, to be employed in carrying lawful merchandise . . . as the charterers or their agents shall direct on the following conditions :

The material conditions were as follows :

(1). That the owners shall provide and pay for all provisions, wages, and consular, shipping, and discharging fees of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew, and shall pay for the insurance of the vessel, and also for all the cabin, deck, engine room, and other necessary stores and maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for and during the service ; (2) that the charterers shall provide and pay for all the coal, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, consular charges (except those pertaining to the captain, officers, or crew), and all other charges whatsoever except those before stated : (3) that the charterers shall accept and pay for all coal in the steamer's bunkers on delivery, and the owners shall, on the expiration of the charter-party, pay for all coal left in the bunkers, each at the current market prices of the respective ports where she is delivered to them ; . . . (8) that the whole reach of the vessel's holds, decks, and usual places of loading and accommodation of the ship (not more than she can reasonably stow and carry) shall be at the charterers' disposal, reserving only proper and sufficient space for ship's officers, crew, tackle, apparel, furniture, provisions, stores, and fuel, including cattle and (or) coal and (or) cargo on deck at shipper's risk ; (9) that the captain shall prosecute his voyage with the utmost despatch, and shall render all customary assistance with the ship's crew, tackle, and boats, and that, though appointed by the owners, he shall be under the orders and directions of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other arrangements, and the charterers hereby agree to indemnify the owners from all consequences or liabilities that may arise from the captain's signing bills of lading or otherwise complying with the same ; (10) that if the charterers shall have reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the captain, officers, or engineers, the owners shall, on receiving particulars of the complaint, investigate the same and, if necessary, make a change in the appointments ; . . . (12) that the master shall be furnished from time to time with all requisite instructions and sailing directions, and shall keep a full and correct log of the voyage or voyages, which are to be patent to the charterers or their agents, and furnish to the charterers their agent, or super-cargo, when required, a true daily copy of the log, showing the course of the steamer and distance run, and the consumption of coal ; . . . (17) the act of God, enemies, fire, restraint of princes, rulers, and people, and all dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, machinery, boilers, and steam navigation, and errors of navigation, throughout this charter-party, always mutually excepted.

There was a conflict of evidence as to the amount of coal on board the ship when she left the River Plate for St. Vincent, but at the trial of the action Kennedy, J. found as a fact that the ship left with an insufficient quantity of coal, so that she was unseaworthy for the voyage. He also found that the weather experienced on the voyage was such as ought to have been expected at that season of the year, and there was nothing beyond the ordinary perils which ought to have been guarded against by the captain.

After leaving the River Plate the master found it necessary to put into Pernambuco in order to take in some more coals, and in fact took on board seventy tons.

In consequence of this the voyage was delayed, and a higher price was paid for the coals than would have been given if they had been bought in the River Plate.

Kennedy, J. under these circumstances gave judgment for the plaintiffs, holding that neither the captain nor the owners were released by the provisions of the charter-party from the responsibility of seeing that the ship was in a seaworthy condition at the commencement of the voyage from the River Plate.

The defendants appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Bailhache for the defendants.—Under the terms of the charter-party the charterers are to provide and pay for all coal. If the captain was negligent in not seeing that he had enough coal on board, he was acting in that manner not as agents of the owners, but of the charterers. The duty of the owners was to provide an efficient captain, and having done that, they would not be responsible for an error of judgment in such a matter as that. They referred to

Pickford, K.C. and Bateson, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion the judgment of Kennedy, J. was right. The argument on behalf of the owners really comes to this: That the provisions of the charter-party relieved the shipowners from the obligation of seeing that the ship was seaworthy in respect of the amount of coal on board on starting on each successive stage of the round voyage. Clause 2 was chiefly relied upon. That clause says that the charterers shall provide and pay for all the coal. It was argued that the words "provide and pay for" show that the intention of the parties was that the question of the amount of coal required to be on board before starting on each stage of the voyage was one to be determined by the charterers, so that the shipowners were to be relieved of their obligation to see that the ship was seaworthy in respect of the coal on board. I cannot see anything in the provisions of the charter-party to relieve the shipowners from that obligation. It was said that as the charterers had agreed that they themselves would provide the necessary coal, they could not sue the shipowners. I see no evidence that the charterers exercised any discretion in this matter; but, even if they had done so, it seems that they were put in a position in which it was impossible for them to form a correct judgment through the default of the defendants' servants. I see no reason for thinking that the judgment of Kennedy, J. was wrong, and, in my opinion, the appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree.

MATHEW, L.J.—I agree. It is not disputed that the shipowners were under an obligation to see that the ship was seaworthy in other respects than as regards coals, but as to that matter it is said that the duty was cast upon the charterers. I think that it is only necessary to read the charter-party to see that this could not have been the intention of the parties. Having regard to the obligation which, in my opinion, remained imposed on the shipowners of having the ship in a seaworthy condition in respect of her supply of coal at the commencement of the different stages of the voyage, it was the duty of the captain to give the charterers correct information so as to enable them to provide the requisite quantity of coal. That duty was not performed, and therefore enough coal was not provided before the ship left the River Plate. The vessel was in consequence unseaworthy for the voyage to St. Vincent, and the loss was thereby occasioned to the plaintiffs for which the learned judge has given them damages. I think that his judgment was correct.

ESSARTS v. WHINNEY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Mortgage—Shares in ship—Agent receiving profits—Notice by mortgagee—Periodical distributions of profits by agent.

E. was the mortgagee of certain shares in two ships. The profits were received by Messrs. B., A., and Co., who made periodical distributions, once a year in March, amongst the persons entitled. E. gave notice in November of the mortgage.

Held (affirming the decision of Wright, J.), that E. was only entitled to the freight earned and received by Messrs. B., A., and Co. after the notice, and that before that date the mortgagor was entitled, as the fact that the agents only accounted to the persons entitled at stated periods made no difference.

APPEAL from Wright, J. on an interpleader issue.

The plaintiff was the mortgagee of sixteen sixty-fourth shares of two ships which were mortgaged to her by one Cartmell Harrison.

The defendant was the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor.

Messrs. Brown, Atkinson, and Co. were the managing owners of the two ships in question, and they made periodical distributions of the profits earned, once a year in March, to the persons entitled.

The two mortgages were dated the 11th Aug. 1899, and on the 24th Nov. 1899 notice of the mortgages was given by the mortgagee to Messrs. Brown, Atkinson, and Co., who received it on the 25th Nov. 1899, and they paid into court the sum of 649l. 12s. 6d., being the portion of the profits of the ships attributable to the sixteen sixty-fourth shares.

The plaintiff claimed the whole of this money, but the learned judge held that she was only entitled to the freight earned and received by Messrs. Brown, Atkinson, and Co. after the notice was received on the 25th Nov. 1899, and he ordered 262l. 7s., part of the sum of 649l. 12s. 6d., to be paid to the defendant as trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor.

The plaintiff appealed.

Spencer Bower for the plaintiff.—Wright, J. thought that the plaintiff was not entitled to any freight earned before the notice, but she is entitled to all the money that was in the hands of the agents at the time the notice was given, and all that comes into their hands afterwards irrespective of when it was earned. It can be stopped before it actually arrives in the mortgagor's hands. In Rusden v. Pope (18 L. T. Rep. 651; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 91; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 269) it was held that a mortgage of a vessel carried with it freight, and the mortgagee intervening by taking possession or by an act equivalent to taking possession before the freight becomes payable is entitled as against the mortgagor or his assignees in bankruptcy to receive it. Actual possession being impossible, notice to the mortgagors and charterers was an act equivalent to taking possession, and, that being done, the mortgagee was entitled to the freight. Here the freight had not been paid over, and was still in the hands of the agents. It would not have been paid over till March, and, as it did not become payable till then, the present plaintiff was entitled as against the mortgagor or his trustee in bankruptcy, the present defendant, to all this money. In Keith v. Burrows (37 L. T. Rep. 291; 3 Asp. M. C. 481; 2 App. Cas. 636) Lord Cairns said: "In point of fact, when a mortgagee takes possession he becomes the master or owner of the ship, and his position is simply this: from that time everything which represents the earnings of the ship which had not been paid before must be paid to the person who then is the owner, who is in possession." He referred to

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Gumm v. Tyrie, 6 B. & S. 299;

The Heather Bell, 84 L. T. Rep. 794; 9 Asp. M. C. 206; (1901) P. 272.

[Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I think The Heather Bell is against you.] In Black v. Homersham (39 L. T. Rep. 671; 4 Ex. Div. 24) shares were sold at auction. The conditions of sale were silent as to dividends, and between the time of sale and the date of completion of the purchase as fixed by the conditions a dividend on the shares was declared in respect of a period antecedent to the sale, and it was held it belonged to the purchaser. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. referred to Willis v. Palmer (2 L. T. Rep. 626; 7 C. B. N. S. 340).] That case might be against me if the agent received the money merely on behalf of the mortgagor. But here the agents received it on behalf of all the holders of the shares in the ship, and they only divide it periodically amongst the various persons entitled.

Carver, K.C. and H. G. Farrant, for the defendant, were not called upon to argue.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—I entirely concur with the judgment of the learned judge below. The law is well settled, and I can draw no distinction between the case of money received on behalf of one person entitled or on behalf of three persons entitled, although it has been suggested that there is a distinction. The mere fact that at stated periods the agents accounted to the persons entitled to the money does not affect the question. The time of distribution of the aliquot share makes no difference. The agents of the mortgagor had received the money before notice of the mortgage; the appeal must therefore be dismissed.

GREENOCK STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. MARITIME INSURANCE COMPANY. (a)

Insurance (marine)—Voyage policy—Unseaworthiness arising during voyage—Insufficient coal taken at coaling port—Consequent loss—Liability of underwriters.

A steamship on commencing a voyage is prima facie unseaworthy if she has not sufficient coal on board then to complete the voyage, but where the voyage is made in stages she is seaworthy if she has sufficient coal on board on commencing each stage to enable her to complete that stage.

Where a steamship commences a stage of the voyage with a deficiency of coal owing to the negligence of the master, any loss to the insured resulting from such deficiency is not covered by a clause in the policy that the insurance is "to cover loss through the negligence of master, mariners, engineers, or pilots."

Such loss is covered by a clause, "Held covered in case of any breach of warranty . . . at a premium to be hereafter arranged," but where the loss has occurred before the breach of warranty is discovered the premium to be arranged will be at least as great as the loss and so the insured can recover nothing under the clause.

ACTION tried before Bigham, J. sitting in the Commercial Court.

This action was tried upon the following agreed statement of facts: The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Gulf of Florida, and the defendants were a marine insurance company who had insured the steamship by a policy dated the 19th July 1897. The more important terms of the policy were as follows:

For 3000l. on the Gulf of Florida valued at 30,000l. At and from . . . to port or ports in any order in the United Kingdom and (or) Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both inclusive, and while there and thence to port or ports place or places, on west coast of South America backwards or forwards and forwards and backwards, in any order or rotation, while there and thence to port or ports of call and (or) discharge in any order in the United Kingdom and (or) Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg both inclusive, and while there however employed, until expiry of thirty days after arrival or until sailing on next voyage, whichever may first occur. With leave to call at any ports and places for all purposes, and any ports and places on the east coast of South America, and (or) Falkland Islands, both outwards and homewards. The risk not to commence before the expiration of previous policies. Against the risk of total loss only, but including collision clause, general average and salvage charges. Perils insured against of the seas, &c. Subject to and including Gulf Line voyage clauses as annexed.

Such clauses were shortly as follows:

This insurance also to cover loss through the negligence of master, mariners, engineers, or pilots. Including all risks incidental to steam navigation. General average salvage and special charges payable as per official foreign adjustment, if so made up, or per York-Antwerp Rules 1890 if in accordance with the contract of affreightment. Held covered in case of any breach of warranty, deviation, and (or) any unprovided incidental risk or change of voyage at a premium to be hereafter arranged. It shall be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue, labour and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard and recovery of the said ship, &c., and any part thereof without prejudice to this insurance, to the charges whereof we the assurers, will contribute each according to the rate or quantity of this sum herein insured. In the event of any inaccuracy in the description of voyage, interests, name of vessel, clauses, or conditions, it is agreed to hold the assured covered at a premium to be arranged.

The previous policies, before the expiration of which the risk was not to commence, were all in similar terms. One of them was dated the 1st Jan. 1897, and was subscribed by the defendants.

The events giving rise to disputes between the parties took place after the Gulf of Florida left Monte Video on the 18th Dec. 1897.

Stated shortly they were as follows: On arrival at Monte Video the Gulf of Florida had on board 232 tons of bunker coals. She took on board a further 330 tons, and sailed on the 18th Dec. with 562 tons in the bunkers, the bunkers being full and the quantity apparently more than sufficient for the passage to St. Vincent, where in the ordinary course she would coal again. On the same day that she left Monte Video she put back in consequence of an accident to the condenser door. This was renewed, and the voyage resumed on the 23rd Dec. By this time about twenty tons of the bunker coals had been used, but those on board considered she had still sufficient for the passage to St. Vincent. After leaving Monte Video the Gulf of Florida experienced strong head winds and seas. On the 7th Jan. 1898 the coal was found to be burning very quickly, at a rate equal to thirty-six tons per day. As the rate of consumption continued very high, the speed was reduced on the 9th Jan. and to save steam the steam steering gear and electric light were shut off. On the 10th Jan. some of the ship's fittings were used for fuel, and on subsequent days further fittings and spars, and portions of the cargo were burnt to assist in keeping up steam. If this had not been done the Gulf of Florida would have been unable to reach port without assistance, and without such assistance would have been helpless and in danger of being totally lost.

The quantity of coal with which the Gulf of Florida left Monte Video, both on the 10th and 23rd Dec. was, in fact, insufficient for the passage to St. Vincent. This insufficiency happened owing to the negligence of the master and engineers.

The value of the ship's fittings and spars burnt was 312l. 4s. The plaintiffs had paid the consignees of cargo for the cargo used as fuel 662l. 1s. 11d.

The plaintiffs claimed that they were entitled to the defendant company's proportion of the value of the ship's fittings and spars burnt, and of the sums paid for cargo burnt. Alternatively they claimed the defendant company's proportion of the value of the fittings and spars burnt, and of the ship's contribution in general average of the value of the cargo burnt. In the further alternative, the plaintiff claimed to be entitled as above on payment of an additional premium to be fixed by the court, or as the court might direct.

The defendants denied that the plaintiffs were entitled to any of the said sums, or any part thereof, even on payment of an additional premium.

Carver, K.C. and Leck for the plaintiff.—There was here no warranty of seaworthiness, at any rate at the time this loss occurred. The warranty of seaworthiness, if any such existed, was of seaworthiness at the commencement of the voyage. Even saying that this warranty reattached at every port of call, and that the departure of the vessel from Monte Video with an insufficient supply of coal was a breach of such warranty, such breach and therefore the consequent loss arose through the negligence of the master and engineers, and was, therefore, covered by the policy. In any case we are entitled to recover on payment of a premium to be fixed by the court under the clause, "Held covered in case of any breach of warranty . . . at a premium to be hereafter arranged." Lastly, the whole value of the goods burnt is recoverable under the sue and labour clause. Counsel cited the following cases:

- Gibson v. Smale*, 4 H. L. Cas. 353;
Bermon v. Woolbridge, 2 Dougl. 781;
The Bona, 71 L. T. Rep. 870; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 557; (1895) P. 125;

Montgomery v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Assurance Company, 86 L. T. Rep. 462; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 141; (1902) 1 K. B. 734.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Simey for the defendants.—This being a voyage policy the fact that the vessel in commencing her voyage had not sufficient coal in her bunkers to enable her to complete the voyage made her prima facie then unseaworthy. But this unseaworthiness may be cured when the voyage is by stages by her recoaling at each port of call sufficiently to enable her to complete the next stage:

- The Vortigern*, 80 L. T. Rep. 382; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 523; (1899) P. 140.

Here on the facts stated she was not coaled sufficiently when she left Monte Video. She therefore commenced that section of the voyage in an unseaworthy condition. It is argued, however, that if this is so the breach of warranty is covered by the clause as to loss through the negligence of the master or engineers. But the loss here was not directly due to any such negligence. The burning of the fittings and cargo were not acts of negligence. The negligence of the master in leaving Monte Video with the vessel in an unseaworthy condition may have been a sine qua non to but was not the causa causans of the loss. The negligence was complete long before the loss took place. Then it is argued that the clause "Held covered in case of any breach of warranty . . . at a premium to be hereafter arranged" covers this breach. This clause obviously can apply only to breaches of warranty discovered before any loss has actually occurred. Counsel cited

Dixon v. Sadler, 5 M. & W. 405.

Dec. 10.—BIGHAM, J. read the following judgment:—The main question in this case is whether when the Gulf of Florida sailed from Monte Video for St. Vincent, on the 23rd Dec. 1897, there existed any implied warranty on the part of the plaintiffs that she was seaworthy for that voyage. It is found as a fact that she was insufficiently coaled; and this was clearly a breach of the warranty, if such a warranty existed. Now, the policy sued upon is a voyage policy—the body of the policy and the attached clauses clearly show it; so that, when the vessel originally started from the United Kingdom on her round, a warranty existed that she was seaworthy for that round voyage. But the warranty is one thing and the observance of it another. It is clear that in such an adventure it is practically impossible for the ship to sail with sufficient coal for the whole of the contemplated voyage. She would have to call at convenient ports on her route for the purpose of replenishing her bunkers; and, therefore, though the warranty at starting is that she shall be seaworthy for the whole voyage, the warranty is sufficiently observed if the voyage is so arranged that the ship can and shall coal at convenient ports en route. The warranty may be stated as an undertaking that the vessel shall be sufficiently coaled for the whole of her voyage, the warranty to be observed by coaling sufficiently at successive points to navigate the vessel to the end of her voyage. This, I think, is the true effect of Thin v. Richards (66 L. T. Rep. 584; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 165; (1892) 2 Q. B. 141) and of The Vortigern (sup.). There is, to use the language of the present Master of the Rolls, “a recurring obligation to bring the vessel up to the required standard at each stage.” It is true that in both those cases the question arose between shipowner and cargo-owner, and not between shipowner and underwriter. But this, in my opinion, makes no difference; and I am fortified in this view by the judgment of the late A. L. Smith, M.R. in The Vortigern. He there states the law as follows: “In my judgment when a question of seaworthiness arises between either a steamship owner and his underwriter upon a voyage policy, or between a steamship owner and a cargo owner upon a contract of affreightment, and the underwriter or cargo owner establishes that the ship at the commencement of the voyage was not equipped with sufficiency of coal for the whole voyage, it lies upon the shipowner, in order to displace this defence, which is a good one, to prove that he had divided the voyage into stages for coaling purposes by reason of the necessity of the case, and that, at the commencement of each stage, the ship had on board a sufficiency of coal for that stage—in other words, was seaworthy for that stage. If he fails in this he fails in defeating the issue of unseaworthiness which prima facie has been established against him. In each case it is a matter for proof as to where the necessity of the case requires that each stage should be, and I think that in the present case the necessity for coaling places at Colombo and Suez has been established.” This view of the law does not in any way conflict with the well-known rule that, once the warranty of seaworthiness for the whole voyage is complied with, the shipowner’s obligation to the underwriter is at an end. It merely allows of a convenient way of enabling the shipowner to fulfil his warranty—that is to say, to fulfil it by stages instead of once for all at the beginning of the risk. I therefore hold that the warranty of seaworthiness still existed at Monte Video, and was there broken. The result is that when the vessel sailed from Monte Video the policy no longer attached to the risks insured against.

But there are other questions to consider. It is said that the breach was due to the negligence of the engineers, and that therefore the loss is covered by the negligence clause attached to the policy. This clause is one of a number of clauses introduced into the policy by shipowners for their own benefit. It is in the following words: “This insurance also to cover loss through the negligence of masters, mariners, engineers, or pilots. . . .” I do not think this clause has any application to the present case. The underwriters are only responsible for losses which are directly attributable to the risks insured against. The loss in question—namely, the burning of the ship’s fittings and spars—was not directly due to any negligent act at all. It was due to the voluntary act of those engaged in the navigation of the ship. The original negligence was, no doubt, a causa sine qua non, but it was not a causa causans. Therefore it cannot be taken into consideration. Moreover, as I have before stated, the loss did not happen until after the policy had ceased to attach. The plaintiffs, however, relied upon another of the appended clauses as affording them a right to recover. The consideration of this clause presents more difficulty. It is as follows: “Held covered in case of any breach of warranty, deviation, and (or) any unprovided incidental risk or change of voyage, at a premium to be hereafter arranged.” Now, undoubtedly the warranty of seaworthiness is by far the most important of the few implied warranties which a shipowner enters into when he insures his ship, and I am satisfied that if proper effect is to be given to this clause, it must be held to apply to that particular warranty. What, then, is the operation of the clause? In my opinion, it entitles the shipowner, as soon as he discovers that the warranty has been broken, to require the underwriter to hold him covered. It also entitles the underwriter to exact a new premium commensurate with the added risk. But what is to happen if the breach is not discovered until a loss has occurred? I think even in that case the clause still holds good, and the only open question would be, What is a reasonable premium for the added risk? To answer this, the parties must assume that the breach was known to them at the time it happened, and must ascertain what premium it would then have been reasonable to charge. If they cannot do it by agreement, they must have recourse to a court of law. It is like the case of goods sold at a reasonable, though an unnamed, price. The sale is good, but the price has to be ascertained, either by agreement or at law. In the present case the plaintiffs ask the court to fix this additional premium, and I am prepared to do it. What might an underwriter fairly require as a premium for insuring a steamer which starts on a voyage short of coal? One of the almost inevitable consequences of such a state of things is that some other fuel will have to be used during the voyage—cargo, or ship's fittings, or spars. Such a sacrifice will constitute a general average loss, for which the underwriter will be responsible to the shipowner. Would it be reasonable to require the underwriter to charge as premium a less sum than the amount of a loss so obviously probable? I think not, and, indeed, I think the underwriter would reasonably be entitled to charge more, for the short supply of coal would not merely bring about the general average loss I have mentioned (as it did in this very case), but would also materially increase the risk of a total loss of the vessel herself. Thus I come to the conclusion that the additional premium in this case ought to be at least equivalent to the general average loss now claimed. It follows that the plaintiffs can recover nothing in this action, for the additional premium more than meets the loss claimed. A question was argued before me as to whether the loss in question was a general average loss or gave rise to a larger claim on the part of the shipowner under the sue and labour clause. It is not material to consider this question, for, even if the full value of the burnt goods could be recovered under the sue and labour clause, I should still be of opinion that the additional premium would exceed the amount of the claim; but I desire to say that, in my opinion, the sacrifice cannot be regarded as within the sue and labour clause. At most it is the subject-matter of general average.

CARDIFF STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v.
JAMESON. (a)

Bill of lading—Custom—Charges to be paid by the ship—Charges for stowing in transit-shed—Inconsistency—Mersey Docks Acts and Bye-laws.

Bills of lading provided that certain currants were "to be delivered from the ship's deck when the ship's responsibility shall cease . . . Simultaneously with the ship being ready to unload the said goods . . . the consignee is hereby bound to be ready to receive the goods from the ship's side, and in default thereof the master of the agent of the ship is authorised" to enter, land, and warehouse them at the expense of the consignee.

Held, that a custom, that in the discharge of dried fruit cargoes the charges for trucking from the shed and piling in the transit-shed are to be paid for by the ship, was good, as it did not contradict the bills of lading, but merely annexed an incident to them.

Held, further, that these charges were not included in the all-round charge made by the master porters under the Mersey Docks Acts and the bye-laws of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from His Honour Judge Shand sitting at the Liverpool County Court.

The action was brought to recover balance of freight due on a cargo of dried currants discharged ex plaintiffs' steamship Dordogne, at Liverpool, and received by the defendant as agent for the plaintiffs.

The defendant admitted the claim, but claimed 34*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.* as a set-off for money paid for and on behalf of the plaintiffs at their request in respect of the same cargo—namely, for "stowing" at 9*d.* per ton.

The facts found were as follows:—

The Dordogne, loaded with a cargo of dried currants from Patras, arrived at Liverpool on the 27th Nov. 1901, and berthed in the Queen's Dock.

The cargo consisted of 37,000 packages, represented by eighty-seven bills of lading and 187 marks, the number of consignees being nineteen.

The bills of lading contained clauses that cases of currants

Are to be delivered from the ship's deck, when the ship's responsibility shall cease . . . Simultaneously with the ship being ready to unload the said goods . . . the consignee is hereby bound to be ready to receive the goods from the ship's side, and in default thereof the master or agent of the ship is authorised to enter the goods at the Custom House and land, warehouse, or place them in lighter at the risk and expense of the consignee after they leave the deck of the ship.

The defendant acted as stevedore on behalf of the ship in discharge of the cargo, and as master porter on behalf of the consignees.

The Queen's Dock was provided with a transit-shed for goods, and the method employed by the defendant in the discharge of the vessel was that the packages, after being brought on deck and after leaving the ship's stage, were trucked to the transit-shed and there piled.

After being piled the defendant sorted the packages to marks and then trucked them to the Customs' scales to be weighed. After weighing they were either loaded on to the consignee's carts or repiled by the defendant in the transit-shed to await the consignees taking delivery.

The defendant had been paid 1*s.* per ton as stevedore for discharging, but sought to charge the plaintiffs, as owners of the ship, with an additional 9*d.* per ton for trucking the packages from the ship to the transit-shed, and then piling them before their being sorted to marks.

There was a custom proved of the Port of Liverpool that in the discharge of dried fruit cargoes the charges for trucking from the ship and piling in the transit-shed are paid for by the ship.

The master porters' charges and duties are regulated by the bye-laws made by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and by bye-law 1 the charges to be made by master porters for work done by them are to be the amounts specified in the schedule; and by bye-law 7 the operations included in the charges stated in the schedule which are to be performed by the master porters for those charges include sorting or selecting goods to bill of lading mark, weighing, piling, or storing on the quay and trucking, &c.

The learned County Court judge decided that the custom was consistent with the bill of lading and allowed the set-off.

By sect. 35 of the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858:

The master or owner of any vessel lying in and using any dock on the quay adjoining to which any transit-shed may have been erected and opened for the reception of goods, or the owner of all or any part of the inward cargo of such vessel, may cause such cargo or any part thereof, without previously making any entry thereof, upon giving due notice to the proper officer of Customs, to be landed and deposited in such transit-shed; and such cargo or such part of such cargo, so landed and deposited in such transit-shed, shall for all purposes be considered as still on board the vessel from whence the same shall have been landed, and shall be removable only from such transit-shed in such manner and by the same process in all respects as the same might by law have been removed from such vessel, in case the same were still actually on board thereof.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Leslie Scott for the plaintiffs. — The question is whether a ship's agent who appointed himself stevedore for the owners of the ship, and master porter for the consignee of goods, is entitled to make certain charges. A local Act—namely, the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858—provides that the unloading is to be performed by master porters, and it is desirable that goods should be transferred from the ship to the transit-shed. Here the operation was "trucking" goods from the ship to the transit-shed, and then piling them there. The defendant has been, or ought to have been, paid for performing this operation by the consignee, and ought not to look to the plaintiffs for payment. Reliance is placed upon the Mersey (Liverpool) Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858 and the Mersey Docks (Ferry Accommodation) Act, s. 33. Under this last section the board may make bye-laws. Reference is made to bye-law 1 as to the charges and the rules as to charges to be made by master porters, and bye-law 7. As the defendant was the ship's agent he had no right to pay himself any charges as master porter that the shipowner was not bound to pay. But he sets up a custom alleged to be universal, not inconsistent with the bill of lading and reasonable, that one or other is paid this amount by the ship. The plaintiffs say this custom is unreasonable, because the Act and bye-laws impose on the master porter the performance of these operations at a certain charge. The defendant paid himself as stevedore and the plaintiffs do not complain, but when he claims this extra 9d. as stevedore the plaintiffs say that he did the work as master porter, as he was bound to do under the bye-laws. The custom alleged is inconsistent with the bill of lading, which says that goods are to be delivered from the ship's deck, where the ship's liability shall cease. Here there was no custom and no evidence that the plaintiffs knew of the existence of any, and no case can be cited in which a custom has been allowed to impose charges on a ship contrary to the bill of lading. The obligations of the ship are brought to an end when she has discharged the cargo over her side. They referred to

Horridge, K.C. (Tobin and O'Connor with him) for the defendant.—The custom is a good and reasonable one. This is something done at the request of the ship, as the goods must go to the transit-shed. By sect. 166 of the Act of 1858 the goods in that shed are to be considered on board the vessel. The custom proved here does not contradict the bill of lading. It is said that that this work was done by the master porter as stevedore, but that is not so.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case has been extremely well argued, and raises a point no doubt of very great importance and of interest, although I think after argument it does not appear to be one of any difficulty. The question arises as to whether or not by a custom or on any other ground shipowners who have received goods for several consignees under bills of lading, can be called upon to pay a sum of 9d. for trucking consignees' goods and piling them in the warehouse before they are sorted or dealt with by the Customs. It is said on behalf of the appellants that they are not liable upon two grounds. It is first said that by the terms of the bill of lading the goods are to be delivered from the ship's deck, where the ship's responsibility is to cease. By the bill of lading it is provided that "simultaneously with the ship being ready to unload the above-mentioned goods, or any part thereof, the consignee of the said goods is hereby bound to be ready to receive the same from the ship's side, either on the wharf or quay at which the ship may lie for discharge"; and it is said that any arrangement by custom or otherwise, which imposes the 9d. upon the shipowner, would be contrary to that bill of lading. It is further said that the provisions of the Dock Acts which lay down the conditions by which the persons who do the work are controlled, impose upon the consignee the duty of paying for this, or, at any rate, do not allow the master porter to make a charge against the ship. Now, in answer to that, it is said that there is a well-established custom at the port of Liverpool when dutiable goods are sent into a transit-shed, that the expense of wheeling them there and of piling them is one which is to be borne by the ship, but it was not suggested by Mr. Scott, who opened the case for the appellants, that the evidence before the County Court judge did not establish that that practice or custom, if it is a custom which is valid, as applied to this state of circumstances, exists. To deal with the second point first. If

Mr. Scott or Mr. Hamilton could have made good the position that the bye-laws contemplated this charge being paid by the consignee or this work being done by the master porter for the 1s. 9d. or 1s. 10d. in the case of dried fruits, he would have gone a very long way, I think, to show that the custom could not put this charge or that the circumstances would not justify this charge being put upon the shipowner. But I think when the statute and bye-laws are looked at, that ground cannot be supported. Sect. 35 of the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858 says: "The cargo of any vessel from any foreign or colonial port entering and using any open dock shall be received, weighed, and loaded off by one set of porters only, who shall be in the employ and under directions and orders of one of the master porters appointed by the board," and if the ship has been dealt with under that section, or, in other words, if all that has been done by the ship or at the express or implied request of the ship, has been done under that section, then I think Mr. Scott would have made good his point that the bye-laws applied. Now, when you come to look at the bye-laws which are made under sect. 221, &c., you find that those sections enable bye-laws to be made for the regulation and good government of master porters. Our attention has been called to these bye-laws and, as I understand, they do provide that the master porters shall do certain services for the sums of money which are there set down; and the schedule which imposes those charges is divided into two classes, both of which are headed with their respective heading: "For goods delivered after having been stowed on the quay," and "For goods delivered without being stowed on the quay." Therefore, upon the face of the headings, it certainly does appear that the charges which are there referred to, are charges for something in respect of services done to goods which either have been delivered straight from the ship or which have been stowed on the quay. Now, when we turn back to rule 7, which includes in a schedule or list "operations included in the charges stated in columns Nos. 1 and 2 of the schedule of charges hereunto annexed, except where otherwise provided in such schedule and in cases to be hereafter determined by resolution of the board, and to be then recorded in such schedule," "the following and all operations incidental thereto are to be performed by the master porters." I need not read them all through. They include piling or stowing on the quay, trucking, refilling, and stowing ready for gauger. Except the "stowing ready for gauger," it is admitted that there are none of those operations that must relate to goods which are dealt with in the transit-shed, and I think it has been fairly put on both sides that "stowing ready for gauger" is something which may have to be done after the original wheeling into the shed and piling has been done. Therefore it does seem to me, upon the bye-laws and upon the statute, that it cannot be said that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board have, by their statutes or regulations, provided that the master porters should do this work which they have been called to do for the all-round charge which is included in the schedule.

That being so, we have now to consider the other ground in respect of which it was contended that this charge could not be imposed upon the ship—namely, that it contradicted the bill of lading. Now, in order to understand that position, we have to look at what the powers and privileges of shipowners are, independently of those clauses in the bye-laws to which I have referred. By sect. 166 it is provided that "the master or owner of any vessel lying in and using any dock on the quay adjoining to which any transit-shed may have been erected and opened for the reception of goods, or the owner of all or any part of the inward cargo of such vessel may cause such cargo, or any part thereof, without previously making any entry thereof, upon giving due notice to the proper officer of customs, to be landed and deposited in such transit-shed; and such cargo, or such part of such cargo, so landed and deposited in such transit-shed shall for all purposes be considered as still on board the vessel." Now, I accept the view which I understand was indicated by the late Master of the Rolls, Sir A. L. Smith, in Bomphrey v. Houghton (55 J. P. 729), that that really is a section mainly, if not entirely, to control directly the relations between the shipowners and the customs; but it certainly does put it in the power of the captain and the owners and the agents of the ship to save the ship very considerable expense. They may land without entry; and what is pointed out in the evidence (and I think properly pointed out) is that if the ship is not able to do something of that kind, then, as they will not allow goods to be landed upon the quay without entry being made, there will be great delay, because there will have to be an entry made in respect of the dutiable goods, and that parcel treated, so to speak, specially and separately from the rest of the cargo. In the same way, if this case had been controlled solely by the rights of the shipowner under the bill of lading, without considering the power of discharging the ship, under sect. 166 the shipowner would have to be prepared to deliver to the consignee at the ship's rail his parcel, and the consignee would have to come and demand his parcel and receive his parcel from the ship's side. At one time I thought that the point which Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Scott pressed upon us, that the master porter in doing this work was really taking delivery from the ship, was a point which might raise some difficulty; but it seems to me, when the true facts are ascertained, that it really is not. The fact is that the shipowner does not ask the consignee to act exactly in accordance with the bill of lading; he does not ask the consignee to come and take his parcel; the consignee does not ask the shipowner to deliver his separate parcel; the master porter when he takes the cargo to the transit-shed is not taking, if I may use the expression, the parcel of each separate consignee to the transit-shed as the agent of each separate consignee, but he is taking the bulk cargo to the transit-shed there to be dealt with. Therefore it seems to me that a state of things has arisen which is not dealt with in terms by the bill of lading, and therefore cannot be said to be controlled by the express language of the bill of lading. An incident is annexed to the contract, in the interests both of the shipowner and the consignee, that delivery shall be taken in a substituted way—namely, from the transit-shed—the ship getting the benefit of discharging her cargo in bulk to the transit-shed and the consignee there receiving it in a separate parcel. To that state of things the custom applies and the custom found is, that when that state of things arises the charge of 9d.—which is considered a fair amount for taking the goods from the ship and piling them in the transit-shed—shall be borne by the ship. In my opinion, that is not contradicting the bill of lading. It is annexing an incident to it. I further think it is a case in which the ship and the representatives of the ship have properly not insisted upon the terms of the bill of lading, but have asked that certain work should be done for the ship, making an advance for the ship in respect of which they get a quantum meruit. Of course, it is not disputed in this case that Mr. Jamieson acted bonâ fide; it is not disputed that he did save the ship demurrage or delay by going to the transit-shed. Under those circumstances it seems to me that the quantum meruit which is fixed for the work done on the ship's behalf in that case may be properly fixed by the custom, and that that incident is thereby annexed to the contract. For these reasons I think that the finding of the learned County Court judge was right, and that this appeal ought to be disallowed. With regard to the authorities, I do not think that any of them help us beyond this, that certainly in some of the later cases it does not seem to have been considered that a custom was of necessity bad because it imposed some burden upon the shipowner or, I ought to say, imposed some burden upon the parties to the contract in the bill of lading, not dealt with in terms by the bill of lading itself. With regard to the judgment of the late Master of the Rolls, as to the expense of watching, it is not a judgment upon this point, because I understand the watching there was after the goods had been piled. At any rate, it does not, in my opinion, conflict with the view which I have endeavoured to express, that where the parties have acted in a way not contemplated by the bill of lading, there is nothing improper in the custom of the port suggesting what their relation shall be under those altered circumstances which were not so contemplated. For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I only wish to express in a very few words why it appears to me that the alleged custom may very well be added to the bill of lading. I apprehend that under the bill of lading as it stands, and in spite of the custom, if either party chose to insist upon having delivery made according to the bill of lading, the other party would be bound to accept that stipulation in performance of the contract in the way that has been pointed out. There seems to me to be nothing inconsistent with that in saying that a term may be superadded and is superadded by practice and custom to the effect that, if both parties so choose, delivery instead of being made in the way provided by the bill of lading may be made through the transit-shed. If that is the case, there is no difficulty in saying that the payment for that service may fall upon the ship instead of on the consignee. The service is eminently for the benefit of the ship. It is quite clear that it is for the benefit of both parties. It is also quite clear that neither does the captain nor the ship-owner wish to deliver pursuant to the bill of lading, nor does the consignee wish to take his cargo in the way provided for by the bill of lading in every case, because to do so would be to defeat the rapid discharge of business, which is the soul of commercial life. It seems to me, therefore, that there is nothing in any way inconsistent with the terms of the bill of lading in the annexation of this additional term which custom has annexed.

CHANNELL, J.—I entirely agree with the judgments as to custom which have been delivered already. I only wish to mention one point which was raised in the argument, and which I think my learned brethren have not dealt with. That is this: It was suggested that this practice, which as a practice in fact existing was proved beyond all possible doubt, cannot be taken notice of as a custom binding between the parties, because it merely is a mistaken view of sect. 163 of the Act of 1858. I think that if it clearly appeared that parties had acted upon a mistaken view of an Act of Parliament, and that such action had become perfectly common and usual, parties could not turn round upon it and say: "Well, even if the parties have misunderstood the Act of Parliament, this is binding upon them as a custom because it has been usual to act in that way." But, although it is fairly clear here that the practice which has arisen has some reference, I think, to the fact of this 166th section existing, because it relates to the transit-shed which is created by those sections of the Act of Parliament, we have an Act of Parliament which says that for certain purposes goods which are not in fact on board a ship are to be taken as if they were still on board, and that is a matter which might give rise to difficulty; and if the parties concerned in such matters met frequently and came to the conclusion that, there being a difficulty about it, one party should pay one portion of the expenses and the other party the other portion, it seems to me that that agreement between parties made between individuals in the first instance, and then made so constantly and so frequently as to become perfectly understood in the trade, would then become binding as a legal custom. I do not think it necessary for me to add anything to what my brothers have said as to the view that that is not inconsistent with either the bye-laws or with the terms of the bill of lading.

COMMERCIAL CAUSE.

The plaintiffs, who were members of Lloyd's, underwrote two policies of insurance on sugar per the Professor Woermann from Hamburg to Gibraltar, and reinsured their liability with the defendants under a reinsurance policy dated the 21st April 1902, and the action was brought to recover money under this last-mentioned policy as the sugar was damaged.

The defence raised by the points of defence was that the defendants were induced to underwrite the policy sued on by the concealment of the following facts: (a) That the ship had arrived at Gibraltar on the 17th Feb.; (b) that the cargo had been wholly or partially discharged and examined on or before the 22nd and 24th Feb. and found damaged.

As to (a), the learned judge found on the facts that there was no concealment.

As to (b), in point of fact on the 22nd and 24th Feb. the survey of the cargo on board the Professor Woermann was made by a merchant at Gibraltar named Lewis Dasoi, and by his reports of survey, dated the 26th Feb., he found the cargo to have been damaged.

It appeared by a note appended to the reports of survey that Dasoi was employed by Messrs. Smith Imossi and Co., who were agents for Lloyd's at Gibraltar.

By the policies by which the plaintiffs were assured, it was provided that in case of damage notice should be given to Messrs. Smith Imossi and Co., so that they might appoint a surveyor.

It was contended by the defendants that, although the plaintiffs on the 25th Feb., when the slip was initialled, had no actual notice that the cargo had been found damaged on the 22nd and the 24th Feb., yet they must be taken to have known all that Messrs. Smith Imossi and Co. knew at the time the slip was initialled. The defendants argued that if the plaintiffs were once fixed with notice of a material fact, such as the damage to the cargo, the neglect of the plaintiffs to communicate that fact, although it was wholly unknown to them, would operate as a concealment which would vitiate the policy.

The defendants relied upon the printed book of instructions issued by Lloyd's to their surveyors, dated the 27th July 1892. By rule 3, p. 6, especial attention of the agent is called to the necessity of telegraphing any report of the loss of a vessel or a casualty at once and direct to Lloyd's. By rule 8, p. 7, the agent is to furnish on forms supplied by the secretary prompt and regular advices of the arrival, sailing, and speaking of vessels. He is also to send the names of vessels arriving with damage or having damaged goods on board which have been surveyed under his superintendence. There were other provisions in the book of instructions upon which the defendants relied which it is not necessary to refer to.

Having regard to the terms of the instructions and the evidence of the head of the agency department at Lloyd's, the learned judge came to the conclusion that the agents of Lloyd's at foreign ports have a discretion as to the mode of communicating notice of damage to Lloyd's; that there is no obligation upon them to communicate by telegraph in the case of every case of loss or damage, but as a matter of business in the case of serious loss or damage they do communicate by telegraph, though in the case of small loss or damage they do not. In the present case they did not telegraph.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Theobald Mathew for the plaintiffs.

Scrutton, K.C. and Loehnis for the defendants.

BRUCE, J. (after stating the facts set out above, continued):—By omitting to telegraph Lloyd's agents did not thereby, I think, omit to perform any duty incumbent upon them. In my opinion there was no duty on the part of Lloyd's agents at Gibraltar to communicate the result of the surveys of the 22nd and 24th by telegraph to Lloyd's, London; but, even if there was a duty so to communicate with Lloyd's, that is quite a different matter from there being a duty to communicate with the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs had no control over the appointment or conduct of Lloyd's agents at Gibraltar, and I think it is quite clear that the knowledge of Lloyd's agents at Gibraltar cannot be said to have been the knowledge of the plaintiffs. Lloyd's have agents in every important port in the world, and, if the knowledge of Lloyd's agents at a distant port is to be taken to be the knowledge of an individual underwriter who may be a member of Lloyd's, the practice of reinsurance would become impossible, because reinsurance is commonly resorted to to cover risks of loss which, while unknown to the underwriter in this country, in most cases must be known to Lloyd's agents in distant parts of the world. I may say I am clearly of opinion that, according to the principles laid down in Blackburn v. Vigors (57 L. T. Rep. 730; 6 Asp. M. C. 218; 12 App. Cas. 531) and Blackburn v. Haslam (59 L. T. Rep. 407; 6 Asp. M. C. 326; 21 Q. B. Div. 144), the knowledge acquired by Lloyd's agents at Gibraltar on the 22nd and 24th Feb. cannot be treated as knowledge of the plaintiffs, and the defendants cannot rely upon the non-communication of the facts disclosed by the surveys as affording any ground of concealment. As the plaintiffs had no actual knowledge that the cargo had been partly discharged and found damaged at the time the slip was initialled by the defendants' underwriter, the defence of concealment under head (b) fails. I give judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed. Judgment accordingly.

lex loci contractus, and a foreign master has a maritime lien for his wages up to the date of the arrest of the ship.

Sect. 167 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) applies to all vessels, British and foreign, and gives the master of a foreign ship the same rights and remedies as the master of a British ship.

The Milford (31 L. T. Rep. O. S. 42; Swa. 362) followed.

ACTION by the master and crew of the Argentine steamship Tagus claiming wages and disbursements.

The Tagus was a steamship of 1366 tons gross register, belonging to the port of Buenos Ayres, and owned by one Savas N. Savas.

By a mortgage dated the 19th June 1901 the owner had mortgaged the vessel to mortgagees in the Argentine for 30,000 dollars, and the mortgagees, not having been paid, took possession of the vessel on her arrival in Sharpness on the 3rd Oct. 1902.

While there she was arrested in an action for necessities in the County Court of Gloucester, and the master and crew thereupon instituted the present action.

Subsequently all actions were transferred to the High Court, and the vessel was eventually ordered to be sold and the proceeds paid into court.

The owners did not enter any defence to the action by the master and crew, but the mortgagees now appeared as interveners.

The claim of the crew was for their wages from the date of shipment in Buenos Ayres, which was the last voyage, but the master claimed wages during the whole time he was on board the vessel, and also disbursements, in which were included earlier voyages and wages which he had paid to the crew on previous voyages.

The interveners admitted, subject to a reference, that the crew were entitled to their wages for the last voyage, but contended that by the law of the Argentine Republic the master was only entitled to liabilities incurred as master, provided that there was at the time an absolute lack of funds in his possession belonging to the ship or her owners, and that the owner of the ship was not present.

The master was called, and stated in evidence that he was a Greek and brother of the owner of the Tagus. He had been to sea for some time as a seaman, but had not until recently held a certificate as master.

In Dec. 1900, the owner being dissatisfied with the late captain and the management of the vessel, put him on board as commissario, whose duties correspond with that of a supercargo. As such he had paid the wages of the crew from time to time, and he sometimes kept watch and piloted the vessel.

During this time the master was disrated and acted as mate, and the plaintiff received 300 pesetas a month, the wages of the master.

He continued so to act till Sept. 1901, when he obtained a master's certificate, and the late master left the ship shortly afterwards.

The vessel at this time was chiefly employed in running backwards and forwards between Rio Janeiro and Buenos Ayres.

In Feb. 1902 the present crew were shipped at Buenos Ayres on a voyage to Sharpness and home. She sailed on the 17th Feb. and called at Alexandria, where the plaintiff met the owner, who joined the ship there and travelled in her to England.

A doctor of laws practising at Buenos Ayres was called by the interveners to prove the law of the Argentine Republic with regard to wages and disbursements. He referred to arts. 947, 948, 952, 1366, 1375, and 1377 of the Codigo Comercio de la República Argentina. From these it appeared that by Argentine law there was no maritime lien for wages on any voyage previous to the one immediately prior to the institution of the action. Further, such wages did not constitute a "privileged debt" within the meaning of the articles of the code.

The interveners further contended that the provisions of sect. 167 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 did not apply to the masters of foreign ships, because by sect. 260 the application of Part 2 of the Act (which deals with masters and seamen) was limited to ships registered in the United Kingdom.

Sects. 167 and 260 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 are as follows:

Sect. 167 (1). The master of a ship shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages as a seaman has under this Act or by any law or custom. (2) The master of a ship . . . shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of disbursements or liabilities properly made or incurred by him on account of the ship as a master has for the recovery of his wages.

Sect. 260. This part of this Act shall, unless the context or subject-matter requires a different application, apply to all sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom, and to the owners, masters, and crews of such ships, &c.

Sect. 261. This part of this Act shall, unless the context or subject-matter requires a different application, apply to all sea-going British ships registered out of the United Kingdom, and to the owners, masters, and crews thereof as follows: &c.

Sect. 265. Where in any matter relating to a ship or to a person belonging to a ship there appears to be a conflict of laws, then, if there is in this part of this Act any provision on the subject which is hereby expressly made to extend to that ship, the case shall be governed by that provision; but if there is no such provision, the case shall be governed by the law of the port at which the ship is registered.

Aspinall, K.C. and Batten for the plaintiffs.—Sect. 167 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 applies to all ships, British and foreign. That section re-enacts the provisions of sect. 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and gives the master of a ship the same rights for the recovery of wages as a seaman has under the Act, and, by re-enacting the provisions of sect. 1 of 52 & 53 Vict. c. 46, gives him also the same remedies for the recovery of disbursements as a master has for his wages. In neither of the sections in the previous Acts which are re-enacted in sect. 167 is there anything to show that the provisions are limited to the masters of British ships, and it was expressly decided by Dr. Lushington in The Milford (31 L. T. Rep. O. S. 42; Swa. 362) that the words of sect. 191 of the Act of 1854 were broad enough to cover the case of foreign masters. The language of sect. 260 and following sections, which provide that Part 2 of the Act shall apply to "all sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom," is affirmative and not negative. It may be that with regard to particular ships specially mentioned, the Act only applies to them if they are British. The case of The Milford (ubi sup.) has been followed and approved of in Reg. v. Stewart (80 L. T. Rep. 660; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 534; (1899) 1 Q. B. 964). Channell, J. there says (80 L. T. Rep., at p. 663; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 537; (1899) 1 Q. B., at p. 970): "It seems to me we must read sects. 260 to 266 in this way, as if they began by saying 'and with respect to the application of Part 2 to ships registered in the United Kingdom be it enacted as follows.'" The Milford was also followed by the Court of Session in Scotland in Hart v. Alexander (36 Sc. L. Rep. 64). It was there pointed out by Lord Moncreiff that some of the provisions of Part 2 were applicable only to British ships, some were also made applicable to foreign ships, and some were provisions quite irrespective of the nationality of the ships or the seamen. See also

It must be admitted that the master is entitled to recover his disbursements before he became master, as they consisted of payments of wages to the crew, and he is therefore in the same position as the crew with regard to them:

The Albion, 27 L. T. Rep. 723; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 481.

Laing, K.C. and Maurice Hill for the interveners.—It is submitted this master is not entitled to recover disbursements and wages in priority to the mortgagees. The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 gave the master a maritime lien for wages, and there was a lien for disbursements given by 52 & 53 Vict. c. 46. Dr. Lushington was wrong in The Milford (ubi sup.) in the construction he put upon Part 2 of the Act of 1854. He there decided the court ought to apply the lex fori, not the lex loci contractus, but admitted in The Jonathan Goodhue (Swa. 524) that The Milford was "a case of great doubt and difficulty." We submit the master has no maritime lien for wages or disbursements by the lex fori. Until 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, s. 16) the master had no lien at all for wages, and he was then only given the remedies of a seaman in case of the bankruptcy or insolvency of the owners. That section only applied to wages due "from the owner of any ship belonging to any of Her Majesty's subjects." It was extended by sect. 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which put the master in the same position with regard to his wages as a seaman, and this section was re-enacted by sect. 167 of the Act of 1894. Sect. 260 expressly limits the application of Part 2 to sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom. Sect. 261 limits it to British ships registered out of the United Kingdom. Sect. 265 enacts that, where there is a conflict of laws, the case shall be governed by any provision on the subject in Part 2 of the Act, if there is one; but if there is no such provision, the case shall be governed by the law of the port at which the ship is registered—that is, the lex loci. With regard to disbursements, sect. 10 of 24 Vict. c. 10 gives jurisdiction to the court. In The Mary Ann (13 L. T. Rep. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. 294; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8) Dr. Lushington decided the master had a maritime lien. That case was overruled by the House of Lords in The Sara (61 L. T. Rep. 26; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 14 App. Cas. 209). The master, however, was expressly given a maritime lien for disbursements by sect. 1 of 52 & 53 Vict. c. 46. This must be read with sect. 167 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and the words of that section are, "the same lien . . . as a master has for the recovery of his wages." At that time the master of a foreign ship had no lien for his wages. The Milford (ubi sup.) was decided in 1858, and Dr. Lushington's reasoning is not sound. At the time the Merchant Shipping Act of 1844 was passed, a master had no lien for his wages. The Act gave the master of a British ship a right; it ought not, therefore, to have been extended beyond the Act. Where it is intended the Act should apply to foreigners, it says so in terms: (see sects. 219 and 238). Davidsson v. Hill (ubi sup.) is a decision under Lord Campbell's Act, which is a general Act, but the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 is, on the contrary, a particular Act, and its sections only apply to particular ships or persons. In Poll v. Dambe (ubi sup.) it was held that the section there in question did not apply to foreign ships. [PHILLIMORE, J. referred to Leary v. Lloyd (3 E. & E. 178).] Priorities must be settled by the lex fori. That is decided by The Milford (ubi sup.). [PHILLIMORE, J.—If Dr. Lushington was wrong, has not his decision been acted upon by subsequent legislation? See The Cargo ex Schiller (36 L. T. Rep. 714; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 439; 2 P. Div. 145).] No; surely re-enacting a statute would not have that effect. With regard to the disbursements made by the master before he obtained his certificate as master, he cannot at any rate recover these under the Act. The Act must be construed strictly, and it is only as master that he can recover them at all:

The Albion (ubi sup.).

Aspinall, K.C. in reply.—Reg. v. Stewart (ubi sup.) supports the case of The Milford (ubi sup.), as it shows that Part 2 of the Act may apply to foreign ships. In The Mac (46 L. T. Rep. 907; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 555; 7 P. Div. 126) Lord Coleridge points out that a definition clause is not exhaustive, and in The Immacolata Concezione (50 L. T. Rep. 539; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208; 9 P. Div. 37) and The Gustaf (6 L. T. Rep. 660; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 230; Lush. 506) effect was given to a maritime lien.

The following cases were also referred to in the course of the argument:

PHILLIMORE, J.—In this case the seamen have proved their case for wages, as I understand by admissions with regard to figures, subject to the necessary reductions bringing the claim to the 21st Oct. instead of some day in November, and they must have judgment for those wages and such subsistence money from that date forward and viaticum as the parties shall agree or the registrar shall determine. For the purpose of determining whether any viaticum shall be paid, the registrar will be guided by the ruling in the case of The Immacolata Concezione (ubi sup.). I should add that the seamen are to have judgment for payment out of the proceeds in court of their wages, and they will have an order when the other sums have been collected for payment out of those other sums in priority to payment out to anybody else who has appeared on behalf of the ship, or who has any interest in the ship, including the mortgagees whom Mr. Laing represents. With regard to the master the position is a peculiar one. He is the brother of the owner, and he has a very long claim for wages running over a long period, and for disbursements. It is obvious that anybody who comes in hostility to him ought to have a right to have that claim examined, and any decree in his favour must be subject to some examination, either between the parties themselves or before the registrar, probably before the registrar. It appears that he was put on board by his brother in Dec. 1900. He had considerable practical experience as a seaman, but he had no certificate, and therefore could not be passed as a master. If we take his evidence, which is uncontradicted, and, as far as I know, is not at variance with the books which he has produced (and as to that the registrar will inquire), he received from that date forward the master's wages, the master being disgraced and taking wages as the mate, and in Sept. 1901 he became a certificated master, and in Nov. 1901 the old master left the ship. In my opinion, and I so decide, he was not master before September, and he became master from September; the date must be ascertained, if necessary, by the registrar—being the date when he can prove that he obtained his certificate. If he cannot prove the certificate, then he must go till November, when the other master left the ship; but, in my opinion, from the moment he got the certificate, or the right to obtain it, from that moment he was master. His claim for wages, of course, must depend upon whether he was master or whether he was in his earlier position, which was mostly analogous to that of a supercargo, but I have myself no doubt it was a position which would give him a claim in the Admiralty Court as a seaman for wages. The points to determine with regard to him are whether or not he comes in priority to the mortgagees, who have a registered mortgage, which was registered on the 19th June 1901. It therefore becomes important that under 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 10, he certainly has a right in rem and a right to sue for his wages and disbursements, but, as the case of The Sara (ubi sup.) has pointed out, that does not necessarily show that that right comes in priority to the mortgagees. I have first to determine whether the lex fori or the lex loci applies, and I am of opinion that the lex fori applies, because what we are doing is construing an English statute with regard to property which is within the English jurisdiction. This view is in accord with the authority of The Milford (ubi sup.), which laid down the principles; therefore, both upon principle and authority, I so hold. There may be a question about which I may have to say a word, which may be considered in another court, as to whether with respect to part of this case the very lex fori does not import the lex loci. I will touch upon that later on. Now, applying for the moment the lex fori, the man was a seaman up to the date when he became master—probably, as I have said, in Sept. 1901. I see no reason why by the lex fori he should not have his wages for that period. Now, as regards whether at the master's rate or at the mate's rate does not matter; he was then master, and I do not see why he should not have his wages as a seaman at that time. With regard to the wages subsequent to that time I am bound unquestionably by The Milford (ubi sup.)—that was really admitted, I think, by counsel on both sides—to hold that he has a maritime lien, as good a maritime lien as the master of an English ship for his wages up to the date of the arrest of the ship. I think myself, and I offer this observation really with submission to what may be decided elsewhere, it would be extremely unfortunate if it should be necessary to hold that the law of The Milford (ubi sup.) must be upset, and I think it is extremely difficult to upset the law even supposing it was a wrong construction, at the time it was decided, of the Act of 1854. I think there are considerable authorities for saying that the matter was rightly decided. At the same time, I cannot help saying that, if the matter was absolutely res integra, it would be difficult to arrive at the conclusion which was arrived at in that case. The Milford (ubi sup.) has been expressly approved of by my brothers Darling and Channell in the case of Reg. v. Stewart (ubi sup.), and has been followed over and over again in this division. The ground upon which it can be supported is that the words are affirmative and general, giving a master of an English or foreign ship the same lien for his wages as a seaman had. The further ground for, if possible, adopting that construction is the ground which will be found expressed in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, my brother Lawrance, and myself in the case of Poll v. Dambe (ubi sup.)—namely, that the provision of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 was in substance the removal of a very artificial and archaic rule of common law of this country, and bringing the common law of this country in matters maritime, as it is most desirable it should be brought, into harmony with the laws of almost every other country, except, probably, in some period of their history—whether now or not, I do not know—the United States of America. Those are the grounds for adopting the construction of a principle like that laid down in The Milford (ubi sup.). On the other hand, it is extremely difficult to satisfy the clause with regard to the application of that part which specifies ships, and the strongest reasoning is that of my brother Channell in Reg. v. Stewart (ubi sup.), which will commend itself, I have no doubt, to any court who examines into this matter, as to which I have no more to say than there it is. In the case of Poll v. Dambe (ubi sup.) we pointed out that the case of Reg. v. Stewart (ubi sup.) can be perfectly well supported upon other grounds, and we did not profess or desire to make any comment upon the decision. Assuming The Milford (ubi sup.) was rightly decided, there is, of course, nothing more to be said; but assuming it to be wrongly decided, it is very difficult to say if Parliament has not by the great mass of subsequent legislation accepted and given a statutory force to the construction which that case puts upon the Act of 1854. The Act of 52 & 53 Vict. c. 46 was passed avowedly to remedy the decision in The Sara (ubi sup.) that the master, no doubt in the case of an English ship, had no lien for his disbursements, though he had for his wages, and it extended the maritime rights of the master to his disbursements, in addition to his wages. The Act is perfectly general; it is perfectly true, as has been observed by Mr. Laing, that that gives a master a lien for disbursements where he had a lien for his wages, and if a foreign master has no lien for wages he has no lien for disbursements given him by the Act; but, having regard to the principles upon which the courts of justice act, and subsequent legislation, and having regard to the fact that The Milford (ubi sup.) is recited in The Sara (ubi sup.), and that that Act was passed to remedy the decision in the latter case, it does seem extraordinary that if the Act was not intended to extend to foreign masters perfectly wide and general words should have been used. I have therefore great difficulty in saying that the Act of 52 & 53 Vict., whatever may be its construction, does not positively give the remedy for disbursements, and, by implication, a remedy for the wages to a foreign master. No doubt the position is somewhat reversed when you come to the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, which incorporates 52 & 53 Vict. c. 46 in its second part, but in this sort of game of hide and seek into the various sections of the Act the net result obtained is that there is a very old and well known and constantly followed decision, with at least two opportunities when the Legislature could have made it clear that the decision was wrong, and the Legislature has deliberately declined to make any such comment with regard to it. Those are the grounds upon which, had I not thought I was bound by The Milford (ubi sup.), I think it should be supported. As I say again, I think it would be a very grave matter if the law of England in that respect, that was supposed for forty years to be in harmony with the law of the rest of the world, and which is certainly not an unreasonable law, should be now discovered to be, and to have been, out of harmony with the rest of the world.

So much for the question of the lien of the master for his wages and disbursements, according to the lex fori. There is a possible view suggested by the language of my brother Channell in Reg. v. Stewart (ubi sup.)—namely, that the section about conflict of laws operates wherever it is proved that there is a foreign ship subject to a different law. If that were the proper construction of these sections, then the master would have his remedy in this case where the Argentine law gave it, but would not have the remedy where the Argentine law did not give it. In other words, he would be entitled to his wages for the last voyage, and he would be entitled to his disbursements, as I think the true construction of the Argentine law is, for the last voyage only; but, whatever view the Court of Appeal may take, that is not the view which is open to me; therefore, I may here say that I find as a fact, though the evidence, of course, will be open to the Court of Appeal to find otherwise if it disagrees, that by the Argentine law there is no maritime lien, nor anything corresponding with a maritime lien for wages of the master or crew for a previous voyage or for disbursements expended upon a previous voyage; but there is a lien for wages during the last voyage, which means from the time the vessel left her home port till she returned, and for disbursements during the voyage if certain conditions with regard to disbursements are complied with, and it seems to me in this case that they were complied with, and that therefore by Argentine law the master would have a lien for his wages for the last voyage and for his disbursements for the last voyage also, such as the registrar shall find. There remains a question about his disbursements before he became master; in my opinion, if those disbursements are of the ordinary kind—port dues, coal bills, and entries of that kind—he cannot claim them, and I so direct that it shall be held at the reference. I follow in that respect the decision in The Albion (ubi sup.), which has been cited to me, and I think that is the law, but if the whole disbursements are, as apparently they are (they will have to be looked into if necessary) merely payments of wages of the crew, who might have seized the ship, then I think the doctrine which this court has often applied—that the man who has paid off the privileged claimant is standing in the shoes of the privileged claimant—should be applied, and I think the master has a lien for any disbursements made, although he was not master, in payment of the wages of the crew. In all probability that means for all disbursements which are here at stake. The result, therefore, is that the master is to have a judgment for such sum as shall prove to be his wages whilst he was supercargo first of all; secondly, for such sum as he shall prove to be his wages while master; thirdly, for his disbursements while master; fourthly, for any sums which he dispensed for the ship while he was supercargo in payment of the crew's wages—all subject, of course, to investigation by the registrar, and to reduction in respect of the freights and other sums he received on behalf of the ship; and in the ordinary course he will have his costs of the action.

standing the provisions of sect. 3 of Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 60), the Court of Admiralty may, if it sees fit, under sect. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), fix a time, less than that allowed by the section, within which claims for loss of life shall be made against the fund in court.

The court may also, after the expiration of the time fixed for claims to be made, order money paid into court to meet such claims to be paid out to the plaintiffs in the limitation suit, although all possible claims have not been made.

MOTION on behalf of the London and South-Western Railway Company, as owners of the steamship Alma, in objection to part of the registrar's report with respect to money paid into court to meet claims in a collision action.

On the 1st April 1902 a collision occurred in the English Channel between the Alma and the sailing ship Cambrian Princess, the Alma at the time being on a voyage from Southampton to Havre with cargo and passengers, and the Cambrian Princess being on a voyage from Lobos de Alfuera to Antwerp with a cargo of guano.

In consequence of the collision the Cambrian Princess sank and was totally lost, and eleven of her crew were drowned.

It was admitted that the Alma was solely in fault for the collision, and an action was commenced to limit her liability under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and the sum of 16,758*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.* was paid into court, representing the statutory liability of her owners at 15*l.* a ton and interest.

A decree was obtained, and the 23rd Sept. was fixed as the last date on which claims could be filed, and on the 4th Dec. the claims came on for hearing before the registrar and merchants. Although there were eleven lives lost, only six claims for loss of life were put forward—four in the King's Bench Division and two in the Admiralty Division. In these six cases, and in one other case, claims were made for loss of effects, so that there remained in all four cases in which no claims were put forward.

In dealing with the claims the registrar reported:

Any further claims for loss of property are clearly out of time, and the distribution of so much of the fund (l. per ton) as is applicable to such claims ought not, I think, to be delayed, with the chance of any further claims coming in. But the claimants for loss of life have under Lord Campbell's Act a year and a day for bringing actions, and although that is no reason for deferring payment of the loss of life claims already brought, the fund for such claims (7*l.* a ton) being far more than sufficient to pay in full any possible claims upon it, a small portion of the balance remaining after payment of the present claims ought, I think, to be retained in court until the expiration of the year and a day allowed by Lord Campbell's Act for bringing such claims.

Where any liability is alleged to have been incurred by the owner of a British or foreign ship in respect of loss of life, personal injury, or loss of or damage to vessels or goods, and several claims are made or apprehended in respect of that liability, then the owner may apply in England and Ireland to the High Court, or in Scotland to the Court of Session, or in a British possession to any competent court, and that court may determine the amount of the owner's liability, and may distribute that amount rateably among the several claimants, and may stay any proceedings pending in any other court in relation to the same matter, and may proceed in such manner and subject to such regulations as to making persons interested parties to the proceedings, and as to the exclusion of any claimants who do not come in within a certain time, and as to requiring security from the owner, and as to payment of any costs, as the court thinks just.

Provided always and be it enacted, that not more than one action shall lie for and in respect of the same subject-matter of complaint, and that every such action shall be commenced within twelve calendar months after the death of such deceased person.

Aland for the owners of the Alma.—The time for bringing in claims has expired. Lord Campbell's Act allows a year and a day from the date of death for bringing an action, but sect. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 gives the court full power, not only in respect of claims for loss of goods, &c., but also in express words for loss of life. The Legislature in framing the words of the section must have had in mind Lord Campbell's Act, because only under that Act can there be claims for loss of life. The Admiralty Court has, in the exercise of its discretion, fixed a period for the bringing in of claims, and it would be a good answer to any future claims in the King's Bench Division to say that that period had expired. Sect. 504 gave the court power to impose a new limitation in respect of claims both for loss of life and loss of goods, and no distinction can be drawn between these two classes of claims.

Bateson for the owners of the Cambrian Princess.

Holloway for claimants in respect of loss of life.

THE PRESIDENT.—I confess at first my feeling was against the motion made by counsel for the plaintiffs, because I thought it possible, though not probable, there might be further claimants in the King's Bench Division, and that no great harm would be done in keeping back a certain amount to meet their claims. But on further consideration I do not think that is the true view to take, because the words of sect. 504 are to my mind very clear, and do give this court power to do what it has done—to fix a time within which claims must come in. It seems to me on principle important that this court should fix a time, to prevent claims from going on for an unlimited period. It would be contravening the object of the statute to hold that in limitation actions claims for loss of or damage to goods should be allowed to be brought in at any time within six years, the period allowed by the Statutes of Limitation, and it seems to me important that where there is a fund to be distributed persons should come forward and make their claim within the time fixed. I am impressed by the argument that you cannot deal separately with claims for loss of life and claims for loss of goods. On the whole, I am prepared to accede to the view that, as the effect of sect. 504 is to give the court power to do that which it has done, it is only a logical consequence that, after that period has expired, you must treat possible further claims as non-existent, and it would, therefore, be inconsistent to reserve a portion of the fund. One might arrive at a reasonable figure, but it would be highly uncertain, and in many cases it might be a mere guess to determine the amount which should be reserved for so hypothetical a claim. I therefore think this part of the report ought not to be confirmed. As regards the rest of the report I understand there is no objection, and it will be confirmed. The parties appearing on the motion will be allowed their costs against the plaintiffs personally.

(Before BUCKNILL, J. and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE DALLINGTON. (a)

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Duties of pilot—River Scheldt—Belgian law—Liability of owner.

Although the employment of a pilot by a vessel in the Belgian waters of the river Scheldt is compulsory by Belgian law, such pilot is not entitled to supersede the master and take charge of the ship, as is the case in England, but according to Belgian law the master remains in charge, the pilot being merely his adviser. Hence, although the master may in fact allow such pilot to take charge of the vessel, the owners are not exempted from liability for damage done to another vessel by the negligence of the pilot.

ACTION for damage by collision brought by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, the owners of the steamship Socotra, against the owners of the steamship Dallington.

The Socotra is a twin-screw vessel of 6009 tons gross register, and at the time of the collision was proceeding down the river Scheldt, in charge of a duly qualified Belgian Government pilot, on a voyage from Antwerp to London and the East.

The Dallington is a vessel of 2534 tons gross register, and was at anchor at the time in question.

The collision occurred about 6.30 a.m. on the 1st Feb. 1903 in Austruweel Roads, and both vessels suffered considerable damage.

At the trial of the action the learned judge found, on the facts, that the Socotra was alone to blame for the collision, but held that the collision had been solely occasioned by the negligence of the pilot in charge.

The plaintiffs alleged that they were not liable for the damage, on the ground that the pilot at the time in question was in charge by compulsion of law.

On the question of compulsory pilotage the plaintiffs and defendants, respectively, called a Belgian advocate to give evidence as to the law.

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that the pilot superseded the authority of the master, and that the master of the ship was bound to, and did in fact, give up the navigation of the ship to the pilot.

On behalf of the defendants it was alleged that the pilot only acted as adviser of the master, and in cross-examination of the plaintiffs' witness it was admitted that the Belgian Code was silent as to the matter, and that the general view of the law was that the pilot did not do more than act as adviser, and that the shipowner was liable in any event for damage done by collision. The defendants referred to art. 228 of the Commercial Code. (a)

The following is a translation of the article of the Commercial Code of Belgium referred to (p. 183 of Raikes' Maritime Codes of Holland and Belgium):

Art. 228. In cases of collisions between ships . . . If the collision be caused by the default of any person, all the damages are borne by the ship on board of which the default has been committed. The presence of a pilot on board is no defence to the liability imposed in the preceding paragraph.

Rowlatt (Finlay with him) for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted in this case that pilotage is compulsory in the sense in which that term is understood in England. The pilot in fact superseded the master. The ship had to take a pilot and pay for his services in any event. There is no provision in art. 228 that the pilot is only authorised or required to act solely in conjunction with or with the approbation of the captain. The facts are precisely the same as in The Halley (18 L. T. Rep. 879; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 131; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 193). In that case it was alleged that the vessel was compulsorily in charge of a pilot duly appointed or licensed according to Belgian law, and the fact that that plea was never traversed shows that it was accepted by the respondents, who, it must be assumed, only did so after due inquiry. It must be shown that Belgian law says in terms that a pilot is not what we call a compulsory pilot. It is not sufficient that it should be silent on the subject. The correct view of the law, it is submitted, is stated in Maude and Pollock's Law of Merchant Shipping, 4th edit., p. 282.

Aspinall, K.C. (Dawson Miller with him) for the defendants, contra.—The distinction must be borne in mind between a pilot who is (1) compulsorily on board and (2) a pilot who is compulsorily in charge. The plaintiffs must establish the fact that the relations between the master and the pilot were such that the pilot superseded the master. That is a question of fact in every case. In order to establish that fact they must show that by the foreign law the relations between the master and the pilot are the same as those which exist according to English law. The Halley (ubi sup.) has nothing to do with this case. Through ignorance of Belgian law, and wrongly, it was there assumed that, if the pilot was compulsorily on board, he was also compulsorily in charge. This was merely an allegation in the pleading, and it was not established by evidence. All that the court decided was that, assuming the ship to be in charge of a compulsory pilot, her owners were relieved from liability for a collision in Belgian waters caused by his negligence, although by Belgian law shipowners are liable for a collision so caused. The court refused to enforce a foreign municipal law, and give a remedy in respect of an act which, by English law, imposed no liability on the person against whom it was sought to recover damages. In all the cases abroad it has been held that the pilot is not compulsorily employed in the sense in which that term is understood in England. [He was stopped by the Court.]

Si l'abordage a été causé par une faute, tous les dommages sont supportés par le navire à bord duquel la faute a été commise. La présence de pilotes ne fait pas obstacle à la responsabilité établie par le paragraphe précédent.

Rowlatt in reply.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument:

The Guy Mannering, 46 L. T. Rep. 905; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 553; 7 P. Div. 132.

The Augusta, 57 L. T. Rep. 326; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 161;

The Agnes Otto, 56 L. T. Rep. 746; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 119; 12 P. Div. 56;

The Prins Hendrik, 80 L. T. Rep. 838; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 548; (1899) P. 177.

BUCKNILL, J.—Mr. Rowlatt has given me every possible assistance in the observations which he has made, but I am afraid the authorities are too strong for him. His argument comes to this: He asks me to say that, because there is no positive declaration in terms by the Belgian law that pilotage in the Belgian waters of the Scheldt is not compulsory, I am to assume that it is compulsory in the sense in which he argued. Now, we have had two Belgian lawyers here, and they both agree that according to their law, to the extent to which it is to be found in terms, the pilot is only an adviser and the owners remain responsible. In this case it may be, as a fact, that the captain had handed over entirely the navigation of his ship to the pilot. He told me that in fact he had done so, that the orders were all given by the pilot, and that the orders were all carried out by the crew. So in point of fact the pilot here was solely in charge. But the question I have to ask myself is contained in the language of Lord Esher in the case of The Augusta (57 L. T. Rep., at p. 327; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 163): "We are concerned with the law of England, and in an English action we are bound by the law of France because the law of France establishes what are the circumstances of the appointment and employment of the pilot." So far as we have the law in writing it is to be found in art. 228 of the Commercial Code. It seems to me it would be extraordinary, in face of that article, to find in any other way than that the fact that the pilot is on board or not makes no difference as to the responsibility of the owners where damage is caused in consequence of the negligence on the part of the ship doing the damage. At any rate the Belgian lawyers' opinion is that the owners are still responsible, because the pilot, although compulsory in one sense, is not compulsorily in charge according to English law. In Belgium ships must take a pilot, and if they do not take him they must pay his fee. A pilot comes on board and the master may say, "You may go away or you may come on board, and I will pay your fee, but I do not want you." Pilotage is compulsory in that sense, and if the master does not choose to take the pilot he cannot get out of the responsibility of paying the pilot's fee. As to the authorities, The Halley (ubi sup.) has nothing to do with the question. Secondly, the other cases of The Augusta (ubi sup.) and The Guy Mannering (ubi sup.) are so strong as to show that I am right in the view I am taking. I find as a matter of law, in Belgium, according to Belgian law, though a pilot may be compulsory in the sense that if he is not accepted he must still be paid for, yet he is not a person, in law, so in charge; and that if the ship does damage in consequence of negligent navigation, the owners are responsible according to Belgian law, although in point of fact the pilot is navigating and solely in charge of the ship.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

OCEANIC STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY v. WATERFORD STEAMSHIP COMPANY; THE OCEANIC. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Art 16 of Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Fog—Moderate speed.

The power of stopping in a short distance is one of the circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration in deciding whether a vessel is proceeding at a moderate speed or not. A passenger steamship fitted with twin screws and capable of being brought to a standstill in about 400ft., which was proceeding at six and one-third knots in a thick fog, was held not to be going at a moderate speed, although her engines were so constructed that she could not go slower without stopping them from time to time.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.J.J.), delivered in June 1902, who had affirmed a judgment of Sir F. Jeune, President of the Admiralty Division, delivered in Oct. 1901, by which he found both the appellants' and the respondents' vessels to blame for a collision which occurred between them.

Both the courts below had the assistance of nautical assessors.

The appellants (defendants below) were the owners of the steamship Oceanic, and the respondents (plaintiffs below) were the owners of the steamship Kincora.

The action was brought to recover damages for the loss of the Kincora, in consequence of a collision between that vessel and the Oceanic. The collision occurred in the Irish Channel about 1.5 a.m. on the 8th Aug. 1901.

(a) Reported by O. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

H. OF L.] OCEANIC STEAM NAVIGATION CO. v. WATERFORD SS. CO.; THE OCEANIC. [H. OF L.]

The Kincora was a screw steamship of 994 tons gross and 453 tons net register, and was at the time on a voyage from Limerick to Liverpool, manned by a crew of eighteen hands all told. She carried a general cargo and one passenger, and two stowaways were on board her.

The Oceanic was a twin-screw steamship of 17,274 tons gross and 6996 tons net register, fitted with triple expansion engines of 28,000 indicated horse-power, and at the time was on a voyage from Liverpool to New York with 1070 passengers, a general cargo, and the mails, and was manned by a crew of 448 hands all told.

The respondents' case was that the Kincora shortly before the collision was off the south-east coast of Ireland, between Barrels and the Tuskar Rock lightships, and was proceeding dead slow on a course E.½N. magnetic, making about two knots through the water. The weather at the time was a dense fog, the wind a light breeze from the westward, and the tide about half flood of the force of about a knot. The whistle of the Kincora was being sounded at regular intervals for fog, her regulation lights and a stern light were being duly exhibited and a good look-out was being kept on board.

In these circumstances several whistles were on the port side of the Kincora and duly replied to, when after an interval of about five minutes a whistle was heard on the port bow, and immediately afterwards the masthead and cabin lights of the Oceanic came into view about a ship's length distant and broad on the port bow. A short blast was at once sounded on the whistle of the Kincora, the helm ordered hard-a-port and the engines stopped, but the Oceanic with her stem and port bow struck the Kincora on the port side, cutting into her and doing so much damage that she sank in a few minutes and seven of her crew were drowned.

The respondents charged the appellants (inter alia) with navigating at an improper rate of speed in the circumstances, with not stopping to ascertain the position of the Kincora, and with failing to comply with arts. 16, 19, 22, 23, and 29 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The appellants' case was that the Oceanic was proceeding on her voyage and was about two miles S. 60 degrees E. of the Tuskar Light. The weather was foggy, the wind light from the west-south-west, and the tide flood running to the eastward at the rate of about two to two and a half knots.

The Oceanic was on a course of S. 31 degrees W. magnetic, and was making six and one-third knots through the water with engines working at slow, and her automatic whistle was being sounded for fog. She was exhibiting the regulation lights, an extra masthead light and stern light, and a good look-out was being kept on board.

In these circumstances a long blast was heard from the Kincora about one and a half points on the starboard bow, and immediately afterwards the Kincora came into sight showing her masthead and red lights; and although the engines of the Oceanic were immediately put full speed astern and her helm hard-a-port, the vessels collided, the Oceanic striking the Kincora on the port quarter and sinking her.

The appellants charged the respondents (inter alia) with neglecting to go at a moderate speed in the circumstances, with not stopping and navigating with caution when the whistle of the Oceanic was heard, and with not sounding her whistle properly for fog in accordance with the regulations. They also charged the respondents with neglecting to comply with arts. 15, 16, 21, 27, and 29 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

At the trial it was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that the Oceanic was, under the circumstances, being navigated at an excessive rate of speed, and that even assuming that her speed was not more than six and one-third knots, this was not a moderate speed within the requirements of art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

It was contended by the defendants that the Oceanic was being navigated at the lowest possible speed consistent with her safety, that owing to her great size and length she would become unmanageable if navigated at a lower speed, and the effect of stopping the engines from time to time in order to reduce the speed would be that knowledge of her exact position would probably be lost, and the interests of safety required her to keep her course. Evidence was given that at a speed of twenty-five revolutions of the engines, which was the speed at which she was going at the time of the collision, she could be brought to a standstill in 400ft., and the evidence of those on board was that the Kincora came into sight about 200 to 250 yards off, and that six and one-third knots was under the circumstances a moderate speed.

The President, in his judgment, after commenting on art. 16 of the regulations, held that those on board the Kincora were to blame for not stopping the engines when the whistle of the Oceanic was first heard, and also because the Kincora was being navigated under the circumstances at an excessive rate of speed. He found, as a fact, that the fog was denser than alleged by those on board the Oceanic, and that the Oceanic was making twenty-five revolutions a minute, and proceeding at a speed of six and one-third knots. He accepted the evidence of the witnesses that, at the speed at which she was going, she could be brought to a standstill in 400ft., but he was of opinion that the vessels were less than 700ft. apart when they came into view of one another. He further held that although the fact that the Oceanic could be brought to a standstill in a very short space was a material element for the consideration of the court, yet it did not suffice to relieve her from the consequence of going at the speed of six and one-third knots. He therefore found both vessels to blame for the collision. This decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

The owners of the Oceanic appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was in fact on appeal from the decision in The Campania, reported 83 L. T. Rep. 511; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 151, on appeal 84 L. T. Rep. 673; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 177; (1901) P. 289, which was the first case decided under art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea of 1897.

Robson, K.C., Butler Aspinall, K.C., and Dawson Miller appeared for the appellants.

Pickford, K.C., Laing, K.C., and C. Head for the respondents.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument:—

The Ceto, 62 L. T. Rep. 1; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 479; 14 App. Cas. 670;

The Ebor, 54 L. T. Rep. 200; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 560; 11 P. Div. 25;

The Beta, 51 L. T. Rep. 154; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 276; 9 P. Div. 134.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: I am of opinion that the judgments of the two courts ought to be affirmed. I am unable to rely upon the skilled assistance of which we have had the advantage, because unfortunately the two gentlemen in question differ in their views as to whether this was or was not a moderate speed within the meaning of the rule. That leaves me to free to exercise my own judgment upon that question. A good deal depends in each case upon the facts and circumstances as they are proved, and the President of the Admiralty Court had an opportunity of judging the evidence of the different witnesses in a way which we have not. So far as the judgment is affected by the particular facts put in proof I must accept what he has found, but, of course, a great deal turns, not upon any conflict of testimony, but upon the inferences which are to be drawn from facts which hardly appear to be disputed on either side. Now the rule appears to me to be a very intelligible and common sense one to avoid danger to vessels in the navigation of the seas, and the question what is or is not a moderate speed in a fog must depend in a great measure whether the fog is slight or dense, and whether there is an opportunity of seeing the near approach of a ship so as to know what can be done or ought to be done by nautical skill to avoid collision. Apart from any rule, one would think that where it was known that two bodies were approaching, and that there was no absolute means of knowing the direction in which they were coming and the danger which was to be avoided, the common sense thing would be to stop until the direction was ascertained, and also whether it was possible to avoid the serious danger which might arise. My own impression is that if two persons were running in opposite directions and they could not see but heard the approach of each other the natural instinct of self-preservation would induce them to moderate their pace or stop until they had ascertained that they were not running into each other. When one is dealing with these enormous masses of machinery ploughing the seas, and the danger, meaning possibly death, to all on board, the force of the observation is enhanced to a degree which need not be emphasised. The question here is what was the condition of things in which the Oceanic was placed, for we are only concerned at present with the conduct of one vessel, as it is not denied that the Kincora was negligent. Here is the Oceanic, the largest ship on the ocean, and the fact appears that she was going at a pace which she could have made more moderate if she had liked. If she had moderated it no collision probably would have taken place. She was going at a speed which rendered it impossible to stop within the limit of observation. These were circumstances of extreme danger, and I cannot disagree with either of the courts that in these circumstances the Oceanic was disobeying the rule and was going at a speed which was not moderate in relation to the circumstances in which she was placed. I should very much hesitate to adopt the notion that there is no relation between the power of stopping which a vessel possesses and the speed at which she may reasonably and properly go. I say that it would be of very material value, but I think that the President did give consideration to it. But he came to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the power of stopping quickly, the speed was not moderate in regard to the circumstances. I entirely agree that the power of stopping is a test to be considered, and is one of the circumstances which any tribunal ought to take into consideration when determining the question whether a ship is travelling at a moderate speed or not. I concur with what the President said as to the careful management and vigilance exhibited by those on board the ship, which I am compelled to find was also to blame. Except with regard to this matter of speed, it seems to me that the Oceanic did everything that could be done to avoid the danger. Still there is the question of speed, and on that account I have to move that the judgment appealed against be affirmed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN concurred.

LORD SHAND.—My Lords: It is not denied that the Kincora was to blame, and the question now is whether she was solely to blame. The Oceanic seems to possess a remarkable stopping power, and it was said that that power of stopping justified the speed at which she was going. I have come to the opinion after the full arguments which we heard that taking that power of stopping into account, the Oceanic, nevertheless, was not going at a moderate speed having regard to the circumstances of the case. The power of stopping within a short distance is no doubt a material circumstance to be taken into account in such a question as this, but here the fog was so thick that the power of stopping was not timeously exercised. As it was not timeously exercised the way on the vessel was such that she by her speed conduced to the collision, and so the Oceanic was also, in my opinion, to blame. It appears to me that in every other particular the Oceanic was carefully navigated; the single exception was with regard to the speed.

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords: I concur; but, in common with the Master of the Rolls, I wish not to be understood as expressing any opinion on the question whether the court ought to take into consideration any peculiarities in the construction of a vessel in determining whether or not she was going at a moderate rate of speed.

LORD ROBERTSON.—My Lords: I concur. It appears to me that the judgments appealed against make it clear that full weight was given in the courts below to the power of speedy stopping possessed by the Oceanic.

TAGART, BEATON, AND CO. v. JAMES FISHER AND SONS.

[CT. OF APP.]

Lord LINDLEY.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I cannot possibly assent to the idea that the power of stopping ought not to be taken into account. It is one of the most important factors in the consideration of what is a moderate speed. But, after making every allowance for that, I think the courts below were right in holding that the speed of the Oceanic was, in the circumstances, not moderate.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Friday, Feb. 13, 1903.

TAGART, BEATON, AND CO. v. JAMES FISHER AND SONS; WEST HARTLEPOOL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY LIMITED, Third Parties. (a)

Charter-party — Sub-freight — Lien of shipowner on sub-freight — Right of shipowner to exercise lien after freight has been paid.

A lien on sub-freights given in a time charter-party to a shipowner as security for the payment to him of the hire of the vessel, gives the shipowner a right to stop sub-freights only before such sub-freights have been paid to the time charterer or his agent; but when once sub-freight has been paid as freight to the charterer or his agent, the shipowner's lien or right to stop the freight is gone, and he cannot follow such freight after it has been paid.

APPEAL from the judgment of Bigham, J. in a commercial cause tried before him without a jury, dated the 10th Feb. 1902.

The plaintiffs, Tagart, Beaton, and Co., were timber brokers in London, and they acted as agents for the sale of timber shipped to England from Pensacola by a firm named Baars, Dunwody, and Co.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs against Messrs. Fisher and Sons of Barrow-in-Furness, who brought in the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Company Limited as third parties, and during the proceedings these third parties were ordered to be joined as defendants.

The facts were stated in the judgment of Bigham, J. as follows:—

By a charter-party dated the 6th Oct. 1900, the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Company Limited, who were the owners of the steamship Askehall, chartered the Askehall to Messrs. Baars, Dunwody, and Co. for three years (thirty-six calendar months).

The only material terms of this charter-party were that the captain was to be under the orders and directions of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other arrangement, the charterers indemnifying the owners from all consequences or liabilities that might arise from the captain signing bills of lading or otherwise complying with the same, and that the owners should have a lien upon all cargoes and sub-freights for any amount due under the charter.

The hire under the charter-party was to be 1750*l.* per month, payable monthly in advance; also by the terms of the charter-party the vessel was while in dry dock to be "off hire."

By the course of business between the plaintiffs and Baars, Dunwody, and Co., when Baars, Dunwody, and Co. made shipments of timber from Pensacola to the plaintiffs in London, they drew upon the plaintiffs for a part of the value of the shipments, and when the goods were sold the proceeds were placed by the plaintiffs to the credit of Messrs. Baars, Dunwody, and Co.'s account with them. In June 1901 Messrs. Baars, Dunwody, and Co.'s account with the plaintiffs was in debit to about 7000*l.*

The ship being at Pensacola, Baars, Dunwody, and Co. desired to load her with a cargo of their own, and they therefore, by a charter-party dated the 15th May 1901, purported to charter the vessel from some nominees of their own for a voyage to Barrow to carry timber at a fixed freight at so much per standard. Having entered into this charter-party, they shipped the goods and then drew out the bill of lading, in which they appeared as shippers and by which the goods were to be delivered to their assignees, he or they paying freight as per this charter-party of the 15th May 1901. The captain then, at Baars, Dunwody, and Co.'s request, signed bills of lading indorsing upon them a statement that he had received 3750*l.* on account of the freight. The captain also gave a freight note by which he acknowledged that he had received a further sum of 1000*l.* on account of freight.

The freight note for 1000*l.*, which was signed by the captain, was, so far as is material, in the following terms:

27th May 1901.—Five days after arrival at port of destination of the Askehall, of which I am master, I promise to pay to the order of myself one thousand pounds, value received, for account of freight on cargo now on board my said vessel, payable under terms of charter-party dated the 15th May 1901, and for the payment of this note I pledge my said freight, and the consignees of my cargo and (or) my agents are hereby directed to pay the amount of this obligation from the first amount due for freight.

This note was indorsed by the captain as follows:

Pay Tagart, Beaton, and Company or order.—A. TRITTON.

On the 29th May 1901, Baars, Dunwody, and Co. sent to the plaintiffs the shipping documents—namely, the bills of lading—for the quantity of timber shipped on the Askehall; the shipping value of the timber was represented as 3867*l.* These bills of lading, which were signed by the captain in the ordinary way, showed that the goods were shipped by Baars, Dunwody, and Co. to order, and that the freight was payable by the consignees as per the charter-party dated the 15th May 1901. The bills of lading contained an acknowledgment on their face that 3750*l.* had been advanced against the freight at the port of shipment, so that the value of the goods with the paid

TAGART, BEATON, AND CO. v. JAMES FISHER AND SONS.

[CT. OF APP.]

freight amounted to 7617*l.* Against this Baars, Dunwoody, and Co. drew on the plaintiffs for 6000*l.*, and instructed the plaintiffs to sell the goods on Baars, Dunwoody, and Co.'s account in the ordinary way and place the proceeds to Baars, Dunwoody, and Co.'s credit. In the same letter of the 29th May 1901 there was inclosed to the plaintiffs the above freight note for 1000*l.*, and it was referred to in the letter in the following way:

We inclose freight note per Askehall for 1000*l.* to credit of our account.

As a matter of fact the captain had received nothing on account of freight, nothing for the indorsement of the receipt of the 3750*l.* on the bills of lading, and nothing for the 1000*l.* freight note.

The receipt of the bills of lading and freight note was acknowledged by the plaintiffs in a letter of the 18th June 1901, the reference to the freight note being as follows:

We are very much obliged to you for freight note 1000*l.*, which we will pass to the credit of your account after collection.

On the 9th July 1901 the plaintiffs sold the timber to arrive to a firm of Crosfield and Co., the vessel being ordered to Barrow.

The defendants, Messrs. James Fisher and Sons, were shipping agents at Barrow, and they wished to secure the ship's business at that port. Accordingly on the 10th July they telegraphed to the plaintiffs asking if they might have the business. To this telegram the plaintiffs answered directing the defendants, Messrs. Fisher and Sons, to address their request to a Captain Dyason of Poole, who was the agent in England of Baars, Dunwoody, and Co. to attend to their shipping business. On the same day the defendants wrote to Captain Dyason asking for the consignment to them of the ship, and the business was given to them. It thus became the defendants' duty to superintend the delivery of the cargo and to collect from the buyers of the cargo so much of the freight as remained payable in England.

On the 13th July Captain Dyason wrote to the defendants giving the particulars of the freight to be collected:

So that the defendants knew that they had to collect 1635*l.*, of which 1000*l.* was to be used in redeeming the captain's freight note, and the balance was to be accounted for to Captain Dyason.

On the 15th July the plaintiffs sent a note to the defendants that they were the holders of the note for 1000*l.*, adding:

We will forward same for collection to your address in due time.

This notice was acknowledged by the defendants on the 16th July:

We note you have the captain's promissory note for 1000*l.* Bills of lading show 3750*l.* advanced freight, so it will be several days before we can get freight to meet your promissory note.

This meant that as so much freight had apparently been paid in advance, a great part of the cargo would have to be delivered before more freight could be asked for.

On the 19th July the Askehall arrived at Barrow, and on the 20th July the discharge began.

On the 25th July the plaintiffs sent the promissory note through their bankers for presentation to the defendants.

The note was duly presented on the 26th July, but the defendants, not having collected any freight from Messrs. Crosfield and Co., it was refused payment and was marked by the bankers:

Answer, cannot pay at present, not having been provided with funds for it.

On the 29th July Messrs. Crosfield and Co. paid the defendants 1000*l.* on account of freight, and the discharge of the vessel was completed.

On the 3rd Aug., the cargo having been measured, Crosfield and Co. paid a further 400*l.* to the defendants, so that by that time the defendants had ample funds in hand to pay the note. But in the meantime—namely, on the 1st Aug.—the owners of the vessel, the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Company, intervened by sending to the defendants the following telegram:

Don't pay either captain or time charterers' drafts out of freight. Hold same our account and risk; we hold you free all liability in consequence thereof.

Before this telegram was received, the defendants had sent word to the bankers that if the note was presented again it might be met in three or four days, and they wrote to the West Hartlepool Company telling them so, and adding:

We look upon the note as a first charge upon the freight.

On the same day, the 1st Aug., the West Hartlepool Company wrote a letter to the defendants which explained the reason of their intervention. It was as follows:

West Hartlepool, 1st Aug. 1901.—Messrs. James Fisher and Sons, Barrow-in-Furness.—Dear Sirs,—S.S. Askehall.—We telegraphed you this morning as per copy inclosed which we beg to confirm. The time charterers' representative, Captain Dyason, intimated to Captain Tritton to-day that time charterers did not intend continuing the charter although the Askehall is fixed for three years, and has so far only been six months under charter, and as the hire is also due to-day and has not been paid we intend exercising our lien on the freight in accordance with the terms of the charter for the hire unpaid and consequential damages. We therefore asked you not to make any remittance of any part of the freight due on present cargo to time charterers, not to pay either their drafts or captain's drafts drawn at the loading port against the freight and payable at this side, we of course holding you harmless in regard to any consequences resulting out of such action. For the present we wish you simply to hold the freight as trustees until we have been able to come to some agreement with time charterers and will keep you informed. In reference to bankers we may communicate with you again.

It appeared that it was inaccurate to say that on the 1st Aug. any chartered freight was due under the original charter-party of Oct. 1900, a month's hire in advance falling due on the 2nd Aug. at noon. It would have fallen due on the 1st Aug. but for the fact that the ship had gone into dry dock on completing her discharge, and did not come out until noon on the 2nd Aug.,

TAGART, BEATON, AND CO. v. JAMES FISHER AND SONS.

and while in dry dock she was, by the terms of the charter-party, "off hire."

On the 1st Aug. a formal notice of the alleged lien for chartered hire was served on the defendants on behalf of the West Hartlepool Company. On the 6th Aug. the note was again presented to the defendants for payment and was marked "still unable to pay."

The present action was then brought for 1000*l.*, the amount of the freight note, by the plaintiffs, Tagart, Beaton, and Co., against the defendants, James Fisher and Sons, who were defending the action under the direction and with the indemnity of the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Company.

BIGHAM, J. (after stating the facts as above set out :)—The question is whether the defendants, who have now, and who had on the 6th Aug., sufficient funds in hand from the freight to meet the freight note, are bound to pay the plaintiffs. The defendants are resisting the plaintiffs' claim under the directions and with the indemnity of the West Hartlepool Company, who, without any interpleader proceedings, have been brought in as third parties, and they rely, as I understand, on the absence of any title in the plaintiffs. I do not think that in the circumstances it lies in the mouth of the defendants, as between themselves and the plaintiffs, to deny the latter's title. The defendants received the money under authority from Captain Dyason, and with his consent and approval they undertook with the plaintiffs that if the plaintiffs would forward the note to them for payment they would meet it out of the moneys to be collected. I am satisfied that if the defendants had paid the money to the plaintiffs before the intervention of the West Hartlepool Company, no action would have lain against them at the company's suit, and it seems to me that having entered into a binding promise to pay, a promise for which there was good consideration, they ought to pay notwithstanding the company's intervention. When the company intervened, the defendants had become trustees for the plaintiffs of so much of the 1000*l.* already paid by Messrs. Crosfield and Co. as would be left in their hands after payment of their own charges in connection with the ship's business at Barrow, and they were bound to hold any further freight which they might subsequently receive subject to the same trust. But perhaps it is desirable to examine the nature of the plaintiffs' title outside any promise made or obligation incurred by the defendants, for it is said that the company received no consideration for the note, and that as it is not negotiable there is no obligation to pay it, however innocently or for whatever consideration the plaintiffs may have taken it. The circumstances under which the note was given are these: [Having stated the facts as to the giving of the note, his Lordship proceeded:] The captain then, at the request of Baars, Dunwody, and Co., signed bills of lading (that is, under the charter-party of the 15th May 1901), and indorsed upon them a statement that he had received a certain sum, and he also gave the freight note by which he acknowledged that he had received a further sum on account of freight. He had in fact received nothing on account of freight, nothing for the indorsement of the receipt of 3750*l.* on the bills of lading, and nothing for the 1000*l.* freight note. The defendants describe the charter-party of the 15th May 1901 and the freight note as bogus documents, and suggest that in some way they are fraudulent, but I do not take that view. Baars, Dunwody, and Co. had hired the ship, and they had regularly paid the stipulated monthly sum. They were therefore entitled to use the ship for their own benefit either by carrying in it other people's goods for an agreed freight, or by carrying their own goods and so enhancing the value of the same. They were entitled also to require the captain to sign bills of lading as they might choose to draw them—all freight paid if they so pleased; and bills of lading so signed would, in the hands of indorseees for value as the plaintiffs were, defeat the shipowner's lien under the time charter on the goods mentioned in the bills of lading, but the lien on so much of the freight as remained unpaid on the face of the bill of lading would not be affected. This would be a sub-freight in respect of which the shipowner might assert his lien. Can this right be taken away by the creation of a document such as this freight note? I think not. Unlike the bill of lading, this document is not negotiable, and if it comes into the hands of a third party it can give him no better right than the maker of it had; and certainly the captain had no right to make any arrangement between himself and the time charterers which would have the effect of varying the terms of the charter-party by excluding the owner's lien. Therefore in my opinion, when the plaintiffs received this note they only got the time charterers' right to receive the 1000*l.*, a right which was subject to the shipowner's lien. But in the present case these considerations appear to me to be immaterial, for before the lien could be exercised, there being then no chartered freight payable, 1000*l.* of the bill of lading freight had been paid to the defendants, who, for the purpose of the receipt of the money, stood in the position of the time charterers themselves, and no lien afterwards could be exercised on that sum, and, as to the balance of the bill of lading freight which was paid on the 3rd Aug., this also reached the constructive possession of the time charterers before any lien was exercised, for the notice of the existence of the lien served upon the defendants was of no value; it ought, in order to become operative, to have been served upon the persons who had to pay the freight, not upon the persons who were receiving it for the time charterers. It is alleged that, in addition to the chartered freight due on the 1st Aug., there were some arrears, about 150*l.*, due in respect of the July freight, and it was suggested that some lien had been exercised in respect of that sum. I am not satisfied that any such sum was due in respect of the July freight. It depends upon a very complicated account as to which the evidence was not to my mind satisfactory; and, even if there were, for the same reason I have already given I should hold that the lien had not been exercised. The judgment will therefore be for the plaintiffs for 1000*l.*, subject to the deduction of any proper disbursements made by the defendants as agents for and on account of the time charterers, as to which the defendants are entitled to a first charge.

TAGART, BEATON, AND CO. v. JAMES FISHER AND SONS.

[CT. OF APP.]

Judgment for the plaintiffs for 1000l., less proper disbursements by the defendants.

The defendants James Fisher and Sons and the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Company appealed.

Bankes, K.C. and Noad for the defendants.—By the terms of the charter-party of the 6th Oct. 1900 the shipowners were to have a lien upon all cargoes and sub-freights for the amount of the hire due under the charter-party. The defendants stand upon the right of the shipowners, and have, as against the plaintiffs, the same lien as the shipowners would have had against them; and the shipowners would have had a right under their lien for the sub-freight to seize the freight at any time, so long as it could be identified as freight. So long as the money paid as sub-freight can be identified it is subject to the shipowners' lien, and the shipowners can seize it even after it has come into the hands of the charterers' agents. The plaintiffs were at the most merely agents for collecting and handing over to Baars, Dunwody, and Co. the moneys received by them, and they can have no higher rights than Baars, Dunwody, and Co. They were not bonâ fide holders of this freight note for value. There is no case exactly in point, but upon principle the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Loehnis for the plaintiffs.—The shipowners did not exercise their lien until it was too late to affect the rights of the plaintiffs, and the rights of the plaintiffs are not affected. The question as to the lien on the cargo does not arise, as the cargo had all been delivered. No case seems to have been decided with regard to lien on sub-freights, and the question has been considered an open one. See Carver on Carriage by Sea, 3rd edit., s. 655.

The right claimed by the shipowners here is not properly a lien; it is at the utmost an equitable right or lien which can only be made effective by giving notice of it to the time charterers or their agents and to the consignees of the goods before the freight is paid by the consignees. It is simply a right to stop the freight on its way from those who have to pay it to the time charterers, and, once the freight has come into the hands of the time charterers or their agents, then it ceases to exist as freight and the shipowners' right to seize it under their lien is gone. The shipowners' right is a contractual right arising under the charter-party to have the sub-freight paid to them, instead of to the time charterers or other persons entitled to it, but this right can only be exercised so long as the sub-freight exists as freight, and when the freight has been paid the right is gone. In the present case the freight was paid by Crosfield and Co. to the defendants as agents for the time charterers, Baars, Dunwody, and Co., before the shipowners' lien was exercised, and the freight note operated as an assignment to the plaintiffs of that freight which was due to Baars, Dunwody, and Co., and the defendants had notice of that assignment before they had notice of the lien of the West Hartlepool Company. The plaintiffs therefore are entitled to recover.

Noad in reply.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—I am of opinion that the judgment in this case was perfectly right. Confining myself to the only question with which I think it is necessary to deal, I am of opinion that it is quite clear that the right—which is an important right, whether it is called a lien or is called by any other name—must be exercised at the time when there is freight to be paid. That really is the short point. If the freight has been paid the lien is gone, and the moment it is paid into the hands of the agents for Baars, Dunwody, and Co., who are the persons entitled to receive it, the shipowners' right to stop it on its way to them is gone. If it has been paid as freight, then it has been paid, and the thing has ceased to exist as freight. It is not necessary to descend into any subtleties to consider what is the freight in the sense of in what particular form it has been paid, whether it has been paid by a cheque or in what way as a matter of business it has been disposed of. The right to stop the payment of it to the person to whom it is due must be exercised while the right for such payment exists. If that payment has been already made, the opportunity of exercising the lien is gone; and I am of opinion that, as the freight had been handed by the consignees to the defendants, Fisher and Sons, who were the agents of Baars, Dunwody, and Co., it was as much paid in this case as if it had been handed over to Baars, Dunwody, and Co., and they had been physically there present and put it into their own pockets. Under those circumstances could it be contended that there was some right of stoppage of the money in their pockets? If that is not so, I am of opinion that it is exactly the same thing if their agents received it in the character in which it was paid, and that when it was so paid there was no longer any lien upon it. I am of opinion, therefore, that the judgment of Bigham, J. was right, and must be affirmed.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I only wish to add a few words, because the ground on which I concur is entirely that which has been stated by the Lord Chancellor; but I think that, as there are certain other matters referred to in the judgment of Bigham, J., I should indicate one or two on which I am not quite clear. If we had had to decide that it is being freight, and received by James Fisher and Sons as freight, and being still in their hands as freight, the shipowners could not claim it because James Fisher and Sons were trustees for Tagart, Beaton, and Co., I should have had very great doubt, and therefore I do not want to indorse that part of the judgment at all. It is, however, curious to note that, long before I delivered the judgment in a case recently before me, Bigham, J. has expressed what seems to me to be the right view about these freight notes, because he says: "The captain had no right to make any arrangement between himself and the time charterers which would have the effect of varying the terms of the charter-party by excluding the owner's lien." I only mention that because it bears out the judgment I gave a short time ago. The ground on which I desire to concur with what the Lord Chancellor has said and with the judgment of Bigham, J. is this, as stated by Bigham, J. in his judgment: "In the present case these considerations appear to me to be immaterial, for before the lien could be exercised, there being then no chartered freight payable"—I will leave that out of the question—"1000l. of the bill of lading freight had been paid to the defendants, who, for the purpose of the receipt of the money, stood in the position of the time charterers themselves, and no lien afterwards could be exercised on that sum." Then with regard to some arrears of freight said to be due, amounting to 150l., he finds in the same way that it got into the pockets of the agents of Baars, Dunwody, and Co. before any lien could be exercised. Putting the matter in my own way, as I understand it, a lien for sub-freight in these time charters means a right to stop freight and receive freight as such, and does not mean the right to follow the proceeds into the pockets of somebody else because the money which has been so received was paid in respect of a debt due for freight. Upon the grounds which the Lord Chancellor has put, I think that this judgment clearly ought to be supported; but I express no opinion on the other parts of the case, to which it is not necessary further to refer.

Sir FRANCIS JEUNE, P. — I agree entirely with the judgments which have been delivered, and have nothing to add.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C. — I may add for myself that I designedly avoided dealing with the question to which the Lord Chief Justice referred, and I desire to confine my judgment entirely to the point which has been mentioned.

ANDERSON v. RAYNER AND OTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Seaman — Injury in service of ship — Medical expenses and maintenance — Liability of ship-owner — Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 207, sub-s. 1.

Where a seaman is injured in the service of the ship, the owners of the ship are not liable under sect. 207, sub-sect. 1, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 to defray the expenses of providing the necessary surgical and medical advice and attendance and medicine after he has been brought back to port.

APPEAL by the defendants from the judgment of Wills, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff was master of the schooner Emily, of which the defendants were the owners.

The action was brought to recover the expenses of medical attendance and maintenance incurred in consequence of injuries received by the plaintiff while in the service of the ship, on a voyage from Liverpool to Falmouth.

The plaintiff's leg was broken, and he was taken back to Liverpool, where he remained for four months before he was able to come back to the vessel.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) provides as follows:

Sect. 207 (1). If the master of, or a seaman or apprentice belonging to, a ship receives any hurt or injury in the service of the ship, the expense of providing the necessary surgical and medical advice and attendance and medicine and also the expenses of the maintenance of the master, seaman, or apprentice until he is cured or dies or is brought back, if shipped in the United Kingdom, to a port of the United Kingdom, or if shipped in a British possession to a port of that possession and of his conveyance to the port, and in the case of death the expense (if any) of his burial, shall be defrayed by the owner of the ship, without any deduction on that account from his wages.

Wills, J. held that, upon the true construction of this section, the shipowners were liable for the whole of the expenses of the plaintiff in respect of the necessary surgical and medical advice and attendance and medicine both before and after he was brought back to Liverpool, but that they were only liable for the expenses of his maintenance until he was brought back to Liverpool; and he gave judgment for the plaintiff accordingly.

The defendants appealed.

Horridge, K.C. and Dawson Miller for the defendants. — The words "until he is cured or dies or is brought back" apply just as much to the expenses of surgical and medical attendance as to the expenses of maintenance.

W. F. Taylor, K.C. and Keogh for the plaintiff. — This is an enactment passed in favour of seamen, and it should therefore be construed in their favour rather than in favour of the shipowners. In the case of most merchant ships there is no surgeon on board, and there would be no expenses for surgical and medical advice and attendance until after the seaman has been brought back to port. So that, if the defendants' construction of this section is the right one, this enactment will in most cases have no effect at all. The provision at the end of the section as to burial expenses shows that the shipowner is not to consider himself free from all liability the moment he has put the injured seaman ashore.

WILLIAMS, L.J. — I cannot recognise as sound the canon of construction which Mr. Keogh suggested to us at the end of his argument. I do not mean to say that there is not a certain amount of authority for it in courts of high and of low degree, but I do not think that at present it is a recognised rule of construction of an Act of Parliament that a section which has been passed to benefit workmen ought therefore to be construed liberally in their favour. I believe that the well-known canon of construction still prevails, that, though an Act of Parliament may impose upon a citizen a liability beyond his common law liability, a section of doubtful meaning ought not to be construed as imposing such a novel liability unless the words of it are perfectly clear. It seems to me that it is by no means clear that this Act of Parliament was intended to impose upon shipowners any liability to provide the expenses of either medical attendance or maintenance after the injured sailor has been brought back to the home port. Looking at the various provisions in sect. 207, I think, notwithstanding the provision as to burying expenses, that the general intention of the Legislature, so far as one can gather it from the whole of the contents of the section, was to impose a liability on the shipowner until the sailor has been brought back to the home port and while he is on the voyage, and not otherwise.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot think from these words that the Legislature meant to impose on the shipowner the duty of providing medical attendance for the injured seaman during the whole residue of his life. It is only reasonable that the expenses of medical attendance and of maintenance should be treated in the same way.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If the contention of the plaintiff were correct, a very serious liability would be imposed on the shipowners of this country. Sect. 207 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 is practically a re-enactment of sect. 228 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. It has never yet occurred to anyone to construe the section in the way in which the plaintiff attempts to do. For nearly fifty years these words have been construed as meaning that a seaman injured on a merchant ship must be looked after at the expense of the owners while on board and be brought back to the home port. If he was unfit, while in a foreign port, to go back to his work before the ship left, he would be entitled to be left behind and would be entitled under this section to be sent back to his own country at the expense of the shipowner. That, I think, is the limit of the liability imposed on the shipowner.

MILLER v. LAW ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance—Marine—Construction of policy—"Restraint of princes and people"—"Warranted free of capture, seizure, or detention"—General decree forbidding importation of diseased cattle.

A policy of insurance was effected on a cargo of cattle on a voyage from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres. The risks insured against included "arrests, restraints, and detentions of all princes and people," but the policy contained a warranty against "capture, seizure, or detention."

On arrival at Buenos Ayres the cattle were found to be suffering from foot-and-mouth disease. In pursuance of a general decree of the Government forbidding the importation of cattle suffering from contagious disease, the Argentine officials forbade the landing of the cattle in question.

The assured gave notice of abandonment, and brought an action on the policy as for a total or partial loss.

Held, that the loss was covered by the words

"restraint of princes and people," but that by the terms of the warranty the underwriters were relieved from their liability under the policy.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from the judgment of Bigham J. (2 K. B. 694. 1902) at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover the amount of a total or partial loss of cattle under a Lloyd's policy of marine insurance for a voyage from Liverpool to Montevideo and (or) Buenos Ayres granted by the defendants to the plaintiff.

The risks insured against were described in the usual way, and included "arrests, restraints, and detentions of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality whatsoever . . . and all perils, losses, and misfortunes that shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandises or any part thereof."

The policy also contained the following clause:

Warranted free of capture, seizure, or detention and the consequences thereof, or of any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities, warlike operations, and all risks of riots and civil commotions, whether before or after declaration of war.

The plaintiff shipped a number of bulls by the steamer Bellevue to be carried from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres; and, having made the shipment, effected the policy sued on.

Some time before the shipment was made the Argentine Government had passed a decree forbidding the entry of animals suffering from contagious diseases or coming from countries where such diseases prevailed. The decree contained articles describing the diseases, and providing how animals suspected of being affected were to be dealt with.

On the 10th Sept. 1900 the Bellevue arrived at Buenos Ayres. The cattle were duly inspected on board the vessel by the Argentine officials, with the result that the Ministry of Agriculture came to the conclusion that they were suffering from disease within the meaning of the decree, and the same day the vessel was ordered to leave the port.

The order contained a provision that the captain, if he so wished, might tranship the cattle to another vessel outside the limits of the port for carriage to some other destination.

On the 11th Sept. the Ministry issued a general order forbidding the discharge of any cattle arriving from the United Kingdom until further notice.

At the trial of the action Bigham, J. found as a fact that the animals were suffering from disease within the meaning of the decree, and that the order forbidding their landing was lawfully made by the Argentine authorities.

In obedience to the order, the Bellevue left the dock in Buenos Ayres, and on the 14th Sept. the cattle were transhipped into lighters at Santiago, a place outside the limits of the port.

On the same day notice of abandonment was given.

The cattle remained in the lighters for some days, when a ship called the Sallust was found to take them on to Montevideo, at which place, after being forty days in quarantine, they were landed and sold at considerable loss.

BIGHAM, J. delivered a written judgment in which, after stating the facts, he said: It is in these circumstances that the plaintiff claims for a total or partial loss, alleging (to follow the words of the pleader) that the prohibition of the landing constituted a restraint of people within the meaning of the policy. The right to recover depends upon whether the loss is directly due to a restraint of people. I am of opinion that it is not. It is not necessary for me to give an exhaustive definition of the expression "restraint of people," and I shall not attempt to do so. It is sufficient to say that the mere operation of an ordinary municipal law affecting or preventing the delivery of the insured goods at their destination is no "restraint of people" within the meaning of the policy. As in the case of perils of the sea, there must be something violent and out of the ordinary course of things before the peril is brought within the meaning of the policy. The maker of a bill of lading protects himself by an exception of the acts and restraints of princes. Such an exception was held in Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (23 L. T. Rep. 251; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 487) not to cover the case of a judgment in a court of law of the United States of America directing the goods to be delivered to third parties who had claimed them. "The acts and restraints of princes," said Martin, B. in that case, "mentioned and provided against in the bill of lading have reference to the forcible interference of a State or of the Government of a country taking possession of the goods manu forti, and do not extend to the legal proceedings which, it is alleged in the plea, afterwards took place in the courts at New York." So in the present case the words do not, in my opinion, cover the operation of the ordinary law of the land, but relate only to some violent departure from the ordinary course of things. The plaintiff relied upon the authority of Rodocanachi v. Elliott (31 L. T. Rep. 239; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 518). In that case goods were in transit from Marseilles to London. They had to pass through Paris, and on their way they came within the lines of the German army by which Paris was then completely invested. In consequence of this state of things the goods could not be moved. This was held to constitute a restraint of princes. Bramwell, B. in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, says: "But it is said that there has been no loss of the goods by restraint of kings and princes in this case, because there has been no specific action on the goods themselves. It is true that there was no actual seizure or arrest of the goods, nor was there any specific or published order prohibiting the transport of goods from the besieged city; but the city in which the goods were was besieged and completely invested, all commerce was stopped, and the goods were as effectually prevented from coming out as if they were actually seized by the German army." This shows that the court was of opinion that the goods were, for all effective purposes, seized by the German army and taken out of the control and disposition of the owners—it was by the forcible, and therefore by the violent, act of the German army that the goods were prevented from reaching their destination. No other view of the facts in that case could have been taken, and, having regard to that view, no other conclusion could be arrived at than that the plaintiffs had lost their goods by a restraint of princes. But in the present case no force of any kind was used; the captain was required to obey the ordinary law existing in the country at the time when the goods arrived, and he obeyed it. To call the resulting consequence a loss by restraint of people or princes is, in my opinion, to give to the expression a meaning which it was never intended to bear. A further point arose in the case, on which also I think that I ought to give judgment for the defendants, although, having regard to my decision on the first point, it is not really necessary to consider it. The policy contained the following clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention." It was said that this exception ought not to be interpreted to include "restraint." I think, however, that the very object of this exception is to free the underwriters from liability under the words "arrests, restraints, and detentions" in the body of the policy. It is true that the same words are not used, but the exception must be taken to refer to something which has gone before—and to what, if not to the words I have mentioned? An attempt was made to bring the loss within the general words, "all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that shall come to the damage of the goods"; but as to this it is sufficient to say that these words only cover losses of a kind similar to those particularly enumerated in the previous part of the policy, and do not include a loss of an exceptional kind like that which has happened in this case.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Maurice Hill for the plaintiff.—The loss was caused by a "restraint of people" within the terms of the policy. The action of the Argentine Government was the direct cause of the loss. The frustration of the adventure by the decree of the Government which prevented the cattle from being delivered at Buenos Ayres caused a constructive total loss of the goods:

Arnould's Marine Insurance, 7th edit. ss. 1142, 1143
Barker v. Blakes, 9 East, 283.

In that case the voyage was frustrated by the port of destination being blockaded. In another case, a ship with a cargo of corn touched at a port where, in consequence of a scarcity of food, an embargo was laid on the cargo, and it was held that the assured were entitled to recover as for a total loss:

Cologan v. London Assurance Company, 5 M & S. 447.

The same was held in a case where an embargo was laid by the Government of the country at the loading port:

Rotch v. Edie, 6 T. R. 413.

A blockade which excludes a ship from getting into a port is just as much a "restraint of princes and people" as though the ship were prevented by the blockade from getting out:

Geipel v. Smith, 26 L. T. Rep. 361; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 268; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 404.

So, too, where some silk in transit from Marseilles was stopped by the siege of Paris by the German army, it was held that this constituted a "restraint of princes":

Rodocanachi v. Elliott, 28 L. T. Rep. 840; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 21, 399; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 649; affirmed 31 L. T. Rep. 239; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 518.

A ship with a cargo of explosives for delivery at Yokohama arrived at Hong Kong, when the master learnt that war had been declared between China and Japan. Explosives being contraband of war, the master, reasonably believing that the ship would be seized if he proceeded to Yokohama, landed the explosives at Hong Kong. It was held that delivery of the goods was prevented by "restraints of princes":

Novel's Explosives Company Limited v. Jenkins and Co., 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 181; 1 Com. Cas. 436.

Quarantine regulations have been held in America to come within that expression:

The Progreso, 50 Fed. Rep. 835.

In Brunner v. Webster (5 Com. Cas. 167) the importation of the goods was not in fact forbidden; that case, therefore, has no application here. The warranty does not relieve the defendants from liability. The words there used, "capture, seizure, or detention," are not the same as the "restraints and detainments" named in the perils insured against. They point to something in the nature of an act of warfare.

Scrutton, K.C. and Loehnis for the defendants.—The goods in this case were never really lost, and in fact they always remained in the custody of the assured. The only ground upon which a constructive loss is based is that the cattle never arrived at the port of destination, and it is said that the reason of their non-arrival was that there was a law of the country forbidding their arrival. The real cause of their non-arrival was not a "restraint of people." The condition of the animals which prevented their discharge was not the result of any "restraint" within the meaning of the policy. The plaintiff might have effected an insurance against loss by disease, but he had not done so. The words "arrests, restraints, and detainments" imply some forcible interference with a man's goods. They are not applicable to the effect of the enforcement of the ordinary law of the country:

Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company, 23 L. T. Rep. 251; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 487;

Crew, Widgery, and Co. v. Great Western Steamship Company, 4 Times L. Rep. 148.

No force was used at Buenos Ayres to compel the obedience of the captain. The immediate cause of the non-delivery of the cattle was not the Argentine law, but the voluntary act of the master, who acted merely from fear of what might happen if he persisted:

Hadkinson v. Robinson, 3 B. & P. 388;

Havelock v. Hancill, 3 T. R. 277;

Forster v. Christie, 11 East, 205;

Nickels v. London and Provincial Marine and General Insurance Company Limited, 6 Com. Cas. 15;

Phillips on Marine Insurance, 3rd edit., ss. 1114 and 1115.

A policy of insurance is not to be construed in the same way as a charter-party, and cases on the construction of charter-parties are not applicable in deciding on the meaning of "restraints of princes and people" in this policy. The reason of that is that the object of the contracts is different. A restraint may well operate so as to prevent a shipowner from arriving with the ship at a given port, without at the same time causing any damage to the cargo carried:

Arnold's Marine Insurance, 7th edit., s. 807.

The warranty relieves the defendants from any liability under the earlier part of the policy. The warranty is not limited to what may be done in warfare. It covers the case of a ship forcibly taken possession of by a foreign Government in order to be condemned for smuggling:

Cory v. Burr, 49 L. T. Rep. 78; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 109; 8 App. Cas. 393.

In a more recent case where the Government of the South African Republic, in accordance with a law of the republic, seized and kept possession of gold, the property of a mining company, the Court of Appeal held that, under a warranty similar to this, the underwriters were not liable:

Robinson Gold Mining Company v. Alliance Insurance Company, 86 L. T. Rep. 858; (1902) 2 K. B. 489.

They referred also to

Cunard Steamship Company v. Marten, 8 Com. Cas. 17.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. in reply.—The cases from Hadkinson v. Robinson (ubi sup.) to Nickels v. London and Provincial Marine and General Insurance Company Limited (ubi sup.) were cases where the captain had the right to go somewhere else, and, in the exercise of his discretion, did so. There it was rightfully held that no loss was due to "restraint of princes or people." But here the action of the Argentine Government was the direct cause of the loss. The regular application of the law of a country in the case of a private suit, though it may cause the restraint of a ship, is not a "restraint of princes or people" within the meaning of a policy of insurance.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal from Bigham, J. I concur in the conclusion my brethren have arrived at, but my voice is in a condition in which I wish to say as little as possible. In my judgment there can be no doubt that, so far as the words in the body of the policy are concerned, the events which occurred in this case would bring the case within the word "restraint," and therefore, that but for the warranty, which I will deal with presently, the underwriters would be insurers liable for the risk. I have no doubt myself, this being an insurance of cattle shipped to Buenos Ayres, which happened to be the only place where commercially it was worth while to sell them, that the result of what happened at Buenos Ayres was that the adventure was altogether defeated, so far as the cattle were concerned, and that the underwriters—if liable at all—are liable in respect of the value of the cattle. The only other thing that I have to say about this part of the case is that, in my judgment, that which was done here by the issuing of the decree and the other documents which were issued by the Government was an act of State, and comes within the words in the body of the policy, and really has no analogy whatever to a case where there has been an arrest or detention of a ship for the purpose of instituting a suit to enforce the rights of a private individual.

But then I come to the warranty. Now, if one were dealing with a document other than a policy of marine insurance, I should have been disposed to say, according to the natural meaning of the words, that a restraint of this sort was after all only a restraint in the nature of an injunction forbidding the landing of the cattle and the other cargo on board, but allowing the cargo other than the cattle to be landed upon certain conditions if the master of the ship thought fit to do so. I should not have said myself, according to the ordinary meaning of the English language, that such a proceeding was either capture, seizure, or detention. It is manifest that it is not capture, and I should have thought that it was not either seizure or detention, according to the ordinary meaning of the words. But I accept that which was put in argument, that really one must not construe a policy of insurance in the way one would construe any other document. Bigham, J. in delivering judgment, said: "It was said that this exception ought not to be interpreted to include 'restraint.' I think, however, that the very object of this exception is to free the underwriters from liability under the words 'arrests, restraints, and detentions' in the body of the policy. It is true that the same words are not used, but the exception must be taken to refer to something which has gone before—and to what, if not to the words I have mentioned?" I see Mr. Parsons in his book on the Law of Marine Insurance does not speak with any great certainty about it, but he suggests that the word "detention," which is the word that he seems to prefer, includes, perhaps, being lawfully restrained from entering a port of destination by a blockade in force. For this purpose I do not see that it makes any difference whether it is a blockade in force or a sanitary law, and under those circumstances I have not sufficient confidence in a conclusion founded merely upon the natural meaning of the words to say that the meaning which the authorities seem to say has been put upon the words of the exception in the warranty is wrong, and therefore I concur in the judgments which are going to be delivered. The result is that the judgment of Bigham, J. will be affirmed, not for the reason that he gives in the first part of his judgment—that, I think, is wrong—but for the reason that he gives in the latter part of his judgment, that is, the reason based upon the warranty.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As we are differing in part from Bigham, J., I desire to state as shortly as possible the grounds upon which I have arrived at the conclusion which has been expressed by the Lord Justice. In the first place, I think with him that the proceedings which took place in Buenos Ayres in Sept. 1900 amounted to an exercise of force by the Government of the Argentine Republic so as to bring the case within the perils insured against by the policy. What took place was substantially this, that the ship, having arrived, was visited by a veterinary surgeon, and it was discovered that certain of the cattle on board were or might be suffering from an infectious disease. Thereupon the Minister of Agriculture of the Government intervened and served the captain with a formal resolution, dated the 10th Sept. 1900, by which the consignees were informed that, the animals brought by the ship being attacked by apthose fever, "It has been resolved, in accordance with art. 5 of the regulations, that the said steamship go out immediately from the port, you being able, if it suits you, to effect the transhipment of the animals to another vessel outside the port, but the Bellevue must be previously and completely disinfected before the rest of her cargo can be landed, or she moored on the Argentine coast." And on the following day an order was made by the President of the Republic and the Minister of Agriculture that, in consequence of the arrival of this steamer having this live stock on board, a decree was made stopping until further notice the discharge of all cattle, sheep, and pigs which might arrive from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. I understand that what happened was this, that the captain of the steamship, being served with this resolution, took his ship outside the port, and, with the view of minimising the loss, transhipped the cattle to another vessel, by which they were carried to Montevideo and there sold at a great loss. I have already stated the conclusion at which I arrive upon these facts. It seems to me that this was an act of intervention of the Government, and it is none the less an exercise of superior force that neither the army nor the police force, nor any other force of the Government, actually intervened; but it is absolutely certain to my mind, as a matter of inference, that if the captain had not seen fit to do as he did the ship would have been taken possession of or entered and the cattle destroyed in accordance with what is described as art. 5 of the regulations. I think that the captain was well justified with a view of minimising the loss, in taking the steps which he did, and I think that, in fact, he yielded only to superior power in doing what he did. I think, also, that this is not the less an act on the part of the Government of the Argentine Republic that it is done in accordance with the laws in force in the country. It has been decided that the peril insured against in the same terms was within the policy in a case when the intervention of the Government took place in enforcing the revenue laws of the country; and I do not see that any effectual distinction can be drawn between the intervention of the Government for the purpose of enforcing the revenue laws and the intervention of the Government for the purpose of enforcing the sanitary laws for the benefit of the public. This seems to me to be recognised both in the case of Cory v. Burr (ubi sup.) where the seizure which took place was of a vessel which was engaged in smuggling, and also in the case of which was mentioned in the course of the argument of the Robinson Gold Mining Company v. Alliance Insurance Company (ubi sup.).

On behalf of the defendants, it was very much urged before us that a long line of authorities, of which Hadkinson v. Robinson (ubi sup.) is a leading example, applied to the case, but those were cases the effect of which is summed up by Lord Esher, then Brett, J., in the case of Rodocanachi v. Elliott (ubi sup.), where he puts it thus: "If the master of the ship, of his own accord, or in obedience to the orders of the officers of the Queen abstains from entering a blockaded port, the causa proxima is not the blockade, but the voluntary act of the master." It seems to me that the present case goes far beyond what was laid down there. In the view of the facts which I take, the master did not act voluntarily in any sense. If when he entered the harbour he had been informed by some person that there was a law forbidding the landing of such cattle as he had on board, and that the Government were likely to put it in force, and he had, nevertheless, gone on, the case, I think, would have been very analogous to Hadkinson v. Robinson (ubi sup.) and that class of authorities; but here he went as far as he could, and he only desisted from landing when the Government actually interfered and served upon him the notice which I have spoken of. I have already explained the view which I take of what he did, and in my judgment those cases do not apply. That being so, I regret that I find myself differing as I do from Bigham, J.; but having arrived at that conclusion, it is my duty to express it. On the second question, which was also decided by Bigham, J., I find myself unable to differ from him. I admit that the words are difficult to construe, but having regard to the opinion which was expressed by him, and the opinion about to be expressed by my brother Mathew, I do not feel myself at liberty to differ from the learned judge's conclusion in that respect.

MATHEW, L.J. read the following judgment:—The material facts may be stated in a few words. By the order of the Administration, the executive authority of Buenos Ayres, the vessel, the Bellevue, was stopped before she reached her berth. The discharge of the cattle was prohibited, and the animals were detained on board the vessel. The master was directed to leave Buenos Ayres and land the cattle at some other port. He obeyed. The animals were transhipped outside the port and sent to Montevideo. It was not disputed that the object of the assured in shipping the cattle to Buenos Ayres in consequence was altogether defeated. It was argued for the defendants that the loss thus occasioned was not due to "arrest, restraint, or detainment" within the meaning of the policy. The words, it was contended, implied the use of direct force, and none had in fact been employed. The case of Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (ubi sup.), upon which reliance was placed by the defendants' counsel, afforded no grounds for this position, and no other satisfactory authority was referred to. If actual force was not used it was because there was no opposition. The master submitted to the orders of the Administration. The result to the assured was the same as if force had been used, and even if the defendants were right in their interpretation of the words in question, the loss was ejusdem generis with the peril described in the policy, and was covered by the general words, "other losses and misfortunes," which end the enumeration of the perils insured against. It was further argued for the defendants that the loss was not within the policy because the acts of the Administration were illegal—that is to say, were out of the ordinary course of the law. There was no reason for saying that what was done by the Administration was out of the ordinary course of the law of the port of destination. Even if it were, I do not see how it would help the underwriters. I am of opinion that but for the warranty the underwriters would be responsible for the loss in question. This conclusion is in accordance with the decisions referred to in the argument with respect to the meaning of similar words in charter-parties when shipowners and charterers have been exonerated from the performance of their obligations by a blockade which renders access to a port commercially impracticable. No reason was given with respect to this insurance why the words "arrest of princes" in this policy and in an ordinary charter-party should have different meanings.

But the policy contains the warranty against "capture, seizure, and detention," commonly called at Lloyd's the f.c.s. clause; and it was argued for the defendants that their liability under the earlier part of the policy was cancelled. The warranty goes beyond the words "arrest" and "restraint." "Capture" and "seizure" are stronger expressions. It was suggested that what was meant were acts of warfare, but it is clearly settled that the words have no such restricted meaning: (see Cory v. Burr, ubi sup.). It is not, in my opinion, intended by the alteration of terms to describe a different class of perils from those previously mentioned. Counsel for the plaintiff failed to suggest any practical difference for the present purpose between the two sets of phrases. It seems to me sufficient to point out that the word "detention" in the warranty cannot be distinguished from the word "detainment" in the earlier part of the policy. The loss, in my judgment, is within the warranty, and the underwriters are not liable in this action. For these reasons I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

WESTERN ASSURANCE COMPANY OF TORONTO v.
POOLE. (a)

Marine insurance — Reinsurance — Constructive total loss — "To pay as may be paid thereon" — Suing and labouring clause — Exclusion of salvage charges.

Where underwriters reinsure a ship against total and (or) constructive total loss with an undertaking "to pay as may be paid" on the original policy and a suing and labouring clause, but an exclusion of salvage charges, then, in the event of the ship experiencing a disaster during the insured voyage which would have justified the owners in giving notice to the original insurers of abandonment, the reinsurers will not be liable, either as for a constructive total loss or under the suing and labouring clause, for money paid by the original insurers in respect of the cost of bringing the ship to port and of repairs, though such money amounts to 100 per cent. on the insured value of the ship, if in fact the owners gave no notice of abandonment.

WESTERN ASSURANCE COMPANY OF TORONTO v. POOLE.

[K. B. Div.]

Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company (60 L. T. Rep. 787; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405; 15 Q. B. Div. 11) considered.

ACTION tried before Bigham, J. without a jury.

By a policy dated the 21st Nov. 1900 the owners insured the ship Edmund with the plaintiffs for the voyage from Santa Rosalia to Portland (Oregon) and thence to the United Kingdom. The policy was in the usual Lloyd's form and covered partial as well as total loss, and the ship was valued therein at 19,000*l.* agreed value.

By a policy of reinsurance dated the 11th Dec. 1900 the plaintiffs reinsured with the defendant (among others) for 1500*l.* upon the same ship, valued as per original policy, for the same voyage. This policy was underwritten by the defendant for 100*l.*

It was in the ordinary Lloyd's form, but written on its face were four special clauses: First, "including valuation clause if in original policy"; secondly, "being a reinsurance subject to the same clauses and conditions as the original policy and to pay as may be paid thereon"; thirdly, "being against the risk of total and (or) constructive total loss only"; and, fourthly, "no claim to attach to this policy for salvage charges."

While on the insured voyage the Edmund stranded. The London Salvage Association, acting in the interests of the underwriters, sent a tug to her assistance, by aid of which she was floated, and ultimately towed to San Francisco, the nearest port at which permanent repairs could be done.

The cost of temporary repairs and of getting her to San Francisco amounted to 9000*l.* and the cost of the permanent repairs to 11,207*l.*, making altogether 20,207*l.*

It was admitted that the owners might have treated the ship when stranded as a constructive total loss, but, as her real repaired value was much more than the insured value, they did not elect to do so.

The plaintiffs had paid in all 107 per cent. on the original policy, made up partly of a large partial loss and a claim under the suing and labouring clause.

The plaintiffs in this action claimed against the defendant on the reinsurance policy 100*l.* as for a constructive total loss consequent upon the stranding, or, in the alternative, for 39*l.* 5*s.* under the suing and labouring clause.

Hamilton, K.C. and Loehnis for the plaintiffs.—This was a constructive total loss. If the owners had given notice of abandonment that could not be disputed. But notice of abandonment is not necessary where in fact the insurers are liable for the whole agreed value of the ship, at any rate where the reinsurer is by his policy "to pay as may be paid" on the original insurance:

Chippendale v. Holt, 73 L. T. Rep. 472; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 78;

Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company, 52 L. T. Rep. 787; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405; 15 Q. B. Div. 11.

If the defendant was only to be liable, not in case of a constructive total loss, but only in case the shipowners elected to give notice of abandonment, then the reinsurance policy would be open to the objection stated by Mathew, J. in Chippendale

v. Holt (sup.), that it is in the nature of a wagering contract. In the second place, if the defendant is not liable as for a total loss, he is at any rate liable under the suing and labouring clause. By the rule that if possible every part of a document is to be given effect, the "no salvage charges" clause is not to be read as rendering the suing and labouring clause meaningless.

Scrutton, K.C. and Mackinnon for the defendant.—The words "pay as may be paid thereon" refer only to money paid upon the original policy under a legal liability to pay. Here there was no legal liability to pay as for a total loss, since there never was a total loss. The defendant reinsured only against a total loss, and for moneys paid under any other liability he is in no way liable. Here the money was paid for a partial loss. There can be no constructive total loss without notice of abandonment:

Chippendale v. Holt (sup.);

Marten v. Steamship Owners' Underwriting Association, 87 L. T. Rep. 208; (1902) 7 Com. Cas. 195.

Secondly, the exclusion of salvage charges covers all claims under the suing and labouring clause, because, firstly, by custom salvage charges include charges under the suing and labouring clause, and the neglect to strike out the latter clause does not prevent this:

Cunard Steamship Company Limited v. Marten, 87 L. T. Rep. 400; (1902) 2 K. B. 624.

And, secondly, this being a reinsurance policy, if the salvage charges did not include the charges under the suing and labouring clause, there was no meaning in excluding them, since costs of volunteer salvage are a partial loss by the perils of the seas, and consequently are not covered by a reinsurance against total loss:

Cunard Steamship Company Limited v. Marten (sup.);

Aitchinson v. Lohre, 41 L. T. Rep. 323; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 168; 4 App. Cas. 755;

Dixon v. Sea Insurance Company, 43 L. T. Rep. 365; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 327.

Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company (sup.) is not an authority in favour of the plaintiff if, as we contend, the true explanation of that case is that given in sect. 866 of Arnould's Marine Insurance, 7th edit.

Hamilton, K.C., in reply, cited

Re Eddystone Marine Insurance Company; Ex parte Western Marine Insurance Company, 66 L. T. Rep. 370; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 167; (1892) 2 Ch. 423;

Livie v. Janson, 12 East, 648. Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 12.—BIGHAM, J.—This is an action brought on a policy of reinsurance dated the 11th Dec. 1900, and expressed to be for 1500*l.* upon the ship Edmund, valued as per original policy, from Santa Rosalia to Portland, and thence to the United Kingdom. It is subscribed by the defendant for 100*l.* The policy is in the ordinary Lloyd's form, but written on its face are four special clauses, which are in the following terms: First, "including valuation clause if in original policy"; secondly, "being a reinsurance subject to the same clauses and conditions as the original policy and to pay as may be paid thereon"; thirdly, "being against the risk of total and (or) constructive total loss only"; and, fourthly, "no claim to attach to this policy for salvage charges." The original policy, dated the 21st Nov. 1900, was issued by the plaintiffs to the shipowners, the ship being valued therein at 19,000*l.* This policy was also in the usual Lloyd's form, but it covered partial as well as total loss. Attached and incorporated with it was a clause to the effect that general average and salvage charges should be payable according to foreign statement if so claimed, and a further clause that the value of 19,000*l.* should be mutually admitted and taken to be the sound value of the ship for all purposes of constructive total loss under the policy. The plaintiffs claim on the reinsurance policy is for 100*l.* as a constructive total loss consequent upon a stranding, or, in the alternative, for 39*l.* 5*s.* under the sue and labour clause. The defendant, while admitting the interest of the plaintiffs and the stranding of the ship, denies that there ever was any total loss or that the plaintiffs ever became liable to pay such a loss, and that the plaintiffs ever incurred any suing or labouring expenses; and says that, if they did, their right to recover such expenses from him is barred by the clause in the reinsurance policy excluding claims for salvage purposes. Thus the question is whether any, and if so, what, loss has happened which can be brought within the meaning of the reinsurance policy. The material facts are very simple. On the 28th Nov. 1900 the Edmund while on the insured voyage stranded at a place near Santa Rosalia, which is on the coast of Mexico. On the 11th Dec. a tug was employed by the London Salvage Association for the purpose of getting her afloat again. She floated on the 16th Jan. 1901 and was then in safety. Temporary repairs were done to her at a neighbouring port called San Diego, and she was then towed to San Francisco, where she arrived on the 20th Feb. There she was dry-docked and permanently repaired. The cost of getting her to San Francisco under temporary repairs was 9000*l.* and the cost of the permanent repairs was 11,207*l.*—total, 20,207*l.* The defendant admits that the shipowners might in the circumstances have treated the vessel when on the bank at Santa Rosalia as a constructive total loss; in other words, that the probable cost of getting her to a repairing port, and then making good the damage she had sustained, would have exceeded her repaired value of 19,000*l.* as fixed in the original policy. But the shipowners did not take this course; they gave no notice of abandonment, but elected to keep the vessel and claim for a partial loss, and on this footing the plaintiffs have paid. They have paid in all 107 per cent. on the original policy, the amount being made up of a large partial loss and of a heavy claim for suing and labouring. A demand seems to have been made upon the plaintiff for even more than 107 per cent., but by some compromise the claim was settled at the smaller sum.

The first question is whether there has been any constructive total loss within the meaning of the contract sued on. It is quite a common practice for an insurer against total and partial loss to re-insure the risk of total loss while keeping himself uncovered as to partial loss. Of course he does this at a premium much lower than that which he himself receives for the double risk; and, in the event of the insured vessel sustaining damage by the peril insured against, it is very much to his interest that the damage should be sufficiently serious to constitute a constructive total loss, for in that event only can he get his loss recouped by his reinsurer and secure his profit—namely, the difference between the two premiums. So in the present case the plaintiffs are anxious to make that which the shipowners treated as a partial loss under the original policy into a total loss under the reinsurance policy. But can they? I think not. What the defendant promised by his contract was to indemnify the plaintiffs if they were called upon to pay a constructive total loss. What, then, constitutes a constructive total loss? I think that to constitute a constructive total loss there must be not only such damage to the vessel as to make her not worth repairing, but there must also be a notice of abandonment. "A constructive total loss in insurance law is that which entitles the assured to claim the whole amount of the insurance on giving due notice of abandonment": (Arnould, 7th edit., s. 1091). The notice of abandonment is a necessary preliminary to a claim for a constructive total loss; and this is so not only according to insurance law, but also according to the universal practice of merchants and underwriters. The notice of abandonment is an offer made by the shipowner to the underwriter to vest the property in the ship in the underwriter so that he may deal with it as his own. Without such an offer the underwriter cannot deal with the ship as his own; it remains the shipowner's property; and such a position is inconsistent with the existence of a claim for a constructive total loss. Of course the owner is not compellable to give any notice of abandonment; there is nothing in his policy which obliges him to divest himself of his property in the ship, and this is true whatever the extent of the damage may be. He can always keep his ship and claim for a partial loss, even though the cost of repairs may amount to 100 per cent. of the insured value. But, if he elects to take this course, his claim is a claim for a partial loss only. But it is said that the case is concluded in the plaintiffs' favour by the judgment in Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company. That was an action by reinsurers against second reinsurers. The original insurers had received and had ultimately accepted a notice of abandonment from the shipowners, and had settled on the basis of a constructive total loss. They did not, however, pay 100 per cent. There appears to have been some dispute between themselves and the shipowners as to whether the facts justified the abandonment and the claim for a constructive total loss, and this dispute was settled by the shipowners agreeing to take 88 per cent., giving up the ship to their underwriters. These underwriters had spent a large sum in suing and labouring which, after deducting the price at which they sold the ship, amounted to 24 per cent. of the insured value. Thus the original underwriters were out of pocket 88 per cent. and 24 per cent., or, in all, 112 per cent. The plaintiffs, who were the reinsurers of the original underwriters, paid the whole 112 per cent., and brought their action against their reinsurers to recover the amount. No notice of abandonment was served on the defendants. The case was heard before Mathew, J., when it was contended on behalf of the defendants that there was no constructive total loss. The learned judge rejected this contention. The case went to appeal, and upon this point the decision of Mathew, J. was affirmed. The reasons submitted in support of the contention (see the argument as reported) appears to have been that the compromise of 88 per cent. showed that the parties had elected to treat the loss as a partial and not a total loss. This reasoning was treated with scant courtesy by the members of the Court of Appeal. The then Master of the Rolls said "it is perfectly obvious there was" a constructive total loss, and there he leaves the matter. The two Lords Justices (Cotton and Lindley) dismissed the argument equally curtly. The point, however, received as much respect as it deserved. There had been a notice of abandonment, which the underwriters had accepted and acted on by taking the ship and selling it on their own account. That stamped the claim as one for a constructive total loss; and the mere fact that the amount of the claim was abated could not alter its character. The next point taken in the case on behalf of the defendants was that, whether or not there was a total loss as between the shipowners and the original underwriters, there certainly was none as between the plaintiff and the defendants; and this upon the ground that the defendants had not been served in their turn with any notice of abandonment. With reference to this point, the Master of the Rolls said: "It appears that notice of abandonment was given to the first insurers, and that, according to insurance law, was sufficient"; and Lindley, L.J. said: "The point has not perhaps been decided in this country, but it appears to have been considered in America that no notice of abandonment is necessary—at least it has been so laid down in Phillips on Marine Insurance, s. 1506. . . . It seems plain upon principle that no notice of abandonment is necessary in the case of a reinsurance." The soundness of this part of the judgment in Uzielli's case is questioned in a note to sect. 1191 in the last edition of Arnould, where it is suggested that when an original insurer has accepted a notice of abandonment from a shipowner he has become entitled to something which he in his turn ought to abandon to his reinsurer. I am not going to criticise the judgment of the Court of Appeal. It is my duty to accept it, and I do it with all the more alacrity because I think it is absolutely right. What is the contract which a reinsurer enters into when he underwrites a policy as existed in Uzielli's case and such as exists here? It consists of a promise to indemnify the reinsured against any liability that he may come under to the shipowner in respect of the risk reinsured, and "to pay as may be paid thereon." What is the effect of such a promise? What is the position as between reassured and reinsured? It is, in my opinion, this: the reinsured when called upon to perform his promise is entitled to require the reinsured first to show that a loss of the kind reinsured has in fact happened; and, secondly, that the reinsured has taken all proper and businesslike steps to have the amount of it fairly and carefully ascertained. That is all. He must then pay. He has nothing in his contract, either express or implied, which entitles him to have the ship or to deal with it in any way, though he is no doubt entitled to require that the original underwriters should realise it in such a way as to reduce the loss as much as may be reasonably possible. Nor is he entitled to rip up the settlement between the shipowner and the original underwriter, except upon the ground that it is dishonest or has been arrived at carelessly. So long as liability exists, the mere fact of some honest mistake having occurred in fixing the exact amount of it will afford no excuse for not paying; he has promised to "pay as may be paid thereon." Such is, in my opinion, the meaning and effect of these reinsurance policies, and it follows that a notice of abandonment is inapplicable to them. The third point decided in Uzielli's case was that in the circumstances of that case the plaintiffs could recover nothing under the sue and labour clause. It was held that the original underwriters who incurred the suing and labouring expenses were not the "factors or servants or assigns" of the plaintiffs within the meaning of the policy sued on, and that therefore the claim did not come within the clause. Mathew, J. had held differently at the trial. He regarded the original underwriters as the "factors" of everyone concerned in averting a loss, including the ultimate reinsurer, and had accordingly given judgment for 112 per cent.—88 per cent. for the total loss and 24 per cent. for the suing and labouring charges. If it were open to me and necessary to choose between these conflicting judgments, I should prefer that of the judge at the trial. It seems to me that where there is a chain of reinsurance policies and nothing in any of them to qualify the operation of the suing and labouring clause, the intention of all parties is that the clause shall operate to bind each successive underwriter to make good the expenses which have been incurred for his benefit. But it is not necessary to discuss this question. For the purpose in hand—to see whether Uzielli's case assists the present plaintiffs—it is sufficient to say that in conclusion the Court of Appeal allowed the plaintiff 100 per cent. It is on this circumstance that the present plaintiffs rely. Counsel for the present plaintiffs asks, "Why did the court give the 12 per cent. beyond the 88 per cent.?" And he answers the question by saying, "Because of the clause 'to be paid as may be paid thereon,'" and refers to the last sentence in the judgment of Lindley, L.J. He says the 12 per cent was no part of the total loss, for that had been compromised at 88 per cent.; then he says it was not recoverable under the sue and labour clause, because the court had already declared that no cause of action existed on that clause, and he therefore concludes that it was payable only because of the promise "to pay as may be paid thereon." From this he argues, as I understand, that it is sufficient in the present case to say that the plaintiffs have paid 100 per cent., and that it matters not whether the payment was accepted in satisfaction of a total or a partial loss claim; it was as much as, and no more than, could have been asked for on the basis of a total loss, and, having been paid, is recoverable in this action by virtue of the promise to pay as may be paid on the original policy. On the other hand, counsel on behalf of the defendant in the present case says that the reason why the Court of Appeal allowed the plaintiffs in Uzielli's case to recover the 12 per cent. was (as suggested in sect. 866 of

HERNE BAY STEAMBOAT COMPANY LIMITED v. HUTTON.

[K.B. Div.]

Arnould, 7th edit.) that it could be claimed as a loss due to perils of the sea, and therefore as within the reinsurance policy. Neither of these explanations appear to me to be very satisfactory, for I think that either the whole 24 per cent. ought to have been allowed as recoverable under the sue and labour clause, or none of it if that clause was not operative. But, whatever the explanation may be, I am quite satisfied that the court never meant to say that where there had been in fact no original liability for a constructive total loss the reinsured could recover from his reinsurer on the mere ground that he had paid a sum of money which amounted to what perhaps might have been claimed from him as the amount of such loss if such a loss had happened. The essential difference between the present case and Uzielli's case is that in the one there was and in the other there was not a constructive total loss. I think the one case has no application to the other, and that the plaintiffs' claim for a total loss fails.

The other question in the case is whether the plaintiffs can recover on the sue and labour clause. I think the answer to that question depends upon the meaning to be put on the written words "no claim to attach to this policy for salvage charges," and, in my opinion, those words are intended to exclude any claim under the printed words in the body of the policy. Counsel for the plaintiffs says that if it had been intended that the printed clause should not form part of the contract it would have been deleted; and he argues that it is possible to give effect to both the print and the writing if the writing be read as referring to salvage charges proper—that is, to a salvage claim arising out of volunteer services. Of course, if I am right in supposing, as I do, that "salvage charges" is an equivalent for suing and labouring expenses (and it will be observed that the word "charges" occurs in the print), then the printed clause and the written clause are inconsistent and the latter must prevail. But, even if I am wrong, I must still consider whether the printed words were intended to stand part of the contract or were by carelessness omitted to be deleted. If the latter, I ought to read the policy without the words; for, although carelessness should be discouraged, it is not to be punished by injustice. It is quite well known that in policies of marine insurance clauses are frequently left standing which are not intended to constitute any part of the contract. "It is," as was said by Walton, J. in Cunard Steamship Company v. Marten, "obviously necessary in every case to consider carefully the description of the risk or special kind of indemnity expressed in the written words of the policy in order to ascertain whether any particular clause of the printed form applies to the insurance effected by the policy. It is most unusual to find that the superfluous or inapplicable words have been struck out in the printed form." I do not forget the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs that the words in the present case are neither superfluous nor inapplicable. I am only drawing attention to the fact that in the hurry of business parties frequently omit to alter the printed words so as to make them exactly conform to the contract which they intend to make. Now, the contract which I have to interpret was first reduced into writing in the form of what is called a "slip"—a memorandum of the heads of agreement initialled by the different underwriters who were subsequently to subscribe policies. On this slip appear the letters "No s/c," which it is agreed means "no salvage charges." In pursuance of this slip the policy now sued on was issued, in which the printed words of the sue and labour clause were not struck out. But it was proved before me that other underwriters on the same slip had issued a policy in which the words were struck out. The plaintiffs apparently accepted both policies without objection. Was one policy right and the other wrong? I think not, for in my opinion both parties knew quite well that the words were inapplicable to the contract they were making, and thought that it was of no importance whether they were left in the print or struck out. "Salvage charges" may no doubt in some connections mean claims for volunteer salvage services. But it is quite common to use the words for the purpose of describing those expenses which come within the scope of suing and labouring expenditure; and several witnesses of great experience were called before me to say, and they did say very plainly, that, used in a policy such as this, they were always understood to bear that meaning and no other. Before the action was tried express notice was given to the plaintiffs that evidence of this kind would be called, and yet the plaintiffs called no one to refute it. I am quite satisfied that, if I were to allow the plaintiffs to recover under the sue and labour clause I should be inventing and giving effect to a contract which the parties never intended to make. Further, I think, on the authority of Aitchison v. Lohre and Dixon v. Sea Insurance Company, that volunteer salvage would not be recoverable at all under this policy. Such a claim would be a claim for a partial loss arising from perils of the sea, and could not be recovered under a policy limited to total loss only. And, if this is so, it was a useless form to insert the words "no claim for salvage charges" unless they were intended to exclude claims under the sue and labour clause. The fact is that this policy is an indemnity against total or constructive total loss only, and against nothing else, and such a loss has not happened. The plaintiffs' claim therefore wholly fails.

On the Naval Review being abandoned the plaintiffs telegraphed to the defendant: "What about C.? She is ready to start six to-morrow. Waiting cash." Receiving no reply, they continued the C. in her ordinary sailings.

Held, in an action to recover 200l., the balance under the agreement, that the plaintiffs could not recover.

Marquis of Bute v. Thompson (13 M. & W. 487) considered.

ACTION.

The plaintiffs' claim was for 200l., alleged to be due under an agreement dated the 23rd May 1902, the balance of the hire of the ss. Cynthia, and the defendant counter-claimed for 50l. paid by him under that agreement.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the Cynthia, and after negotiations the following agreement was entered into between the defendant and Henry C. Jones on behalf of the plaintiffs:

George Hutton, 28, Rembrandt-road, Lee, S.E. 23.5.1902.—The Cynthia to be at Mr. Hutton's disposal at an approved pier or berth at Southampton on the morning of June 28, perils of the sea, &c., permitting, to take out a party not exceeding the number for which the vessel is licensed to the position assigned by the Admiralty for the purposes of viewing the Naval Review, and for a day's cruise round the fleet; also on Sunday, June 29th, for similar purposes. Owners to provide crew, coals, and all necessary assistance. Mr. Hutton to pay all tolls, pier dues, &c. Owners to have the right of ten persons above crew, &c., on board. Price 250l., payable 50l. down, balance before ship leaves Herne Bay.—G. HUTTON; HENRY C. JONES.

The Cynthia was fitted for this trip, and supplied with coal.

When it became known that the review would not take place, the plaintiffs telegraphed to the defendant on the 26th June: "What about Cynthia? She is ready to start six to-morrow. Waiting cash.—JONES, Herne Bay."

No reply being received, the ordinary sailings of the Cynthia were continued by the plaintiffs on the days mentioned in the agreement of the 23rd May, and the difference between the takings on those days and the price under the agreement was 90l.

Hansell (Firminger with him) for the defendant.—The plaintiffs cannot recover in this action, which is covered by the decisions in Blakeley v. Müller and Hobson v. Pattenden (88 L. T. Rep. 90). There it was plainly laid down, following the decisions in Taylor v. Caldwell (8 L. T. Rep. 356; 3 B. & S. 826) and Appleby v. Meyers (16 L. T. Rep. 669; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651), that where performance of a contract becomes impossible, both parties are excused from any further performance under it. He also referred to Nicholl and Knight v. Ashton (84 L. T. Rep. 804; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 209; (1901) 2 K. B. 126.

Here the contract was to charter the vessel for the purpose of viewing the Naval Review, and as the Naval Review did not take place the balance of the money for the hire of that vessel cannot be recovered.

Montague Lush, K.C. (A. S. Poyser with him) for the plaintiffs.—This was a contract to hire the vessel for two days, and the principle which applies to the case of seats to view the Coronation does not apply here. Although the contract was that the ship was for the purpose of viewing the Naval Review it was also for a cruise round the fleet on the 28th June, and for a similar purpose on the 29th June. If a contract is made in the expectation that a certain state of things will exist, the contract may be binding although that state of things does not exist. He referred to Marquis of Bute v. Thompson, 13 M. & W. 487.

GRANTHAM, J.—I have no doubt what my judgment should be in this case, and that is for the defendant. I think the case is one which has been brought within the old authorities which have been cited, and which I think determine the principle upon which most of the latter cases have been determined. With regard to the case Mr. Lush has mentioned of Marquis of Bute v. Thompson (13 M. & W. 487), it is a very old case, a very much older case than Appleby v. Meyers (16 L. T. Rep. 669), decided by Blackburn, J. I do not say Blackburn, J.'s decision is not compatible with it, but I have no doubt that if the earlier case had been argued after the decision of Blackburn, J. the decision would have been different. It may be it was binding as far as it goes with regard to a dead rent which has to be paid under colliery contracts or mining contracts whether they work or do not. A great deal has to be said for that, and it has to be paid under all circumstances. In this case, to my mind, there are many distinctions between that case and what we have to determine here to-day. With regard to the differences between that case, and those Mr. Lush referred to, upon which he bases his claim for judgment, I think the difference is all against him. In the first place this is a ship, and the ship when complete with coal and with a crew is capable of going about and earning money for the person who has made a contract, and who is in the unfortunate position of not being able to fulfil it under the circumstances which arose. In the case of the seats put up they are absolutely useless. A person may be put to a very great expense indeed in erecting seats and paying money to the freeholder to view some spectacle, and yet if the spectacle does not take place the whole of the money spent by him has gone absolutely. The seats are useless and could not be used for anything else. In fact, not only that; not only do the persons incur very great expense in putting up the seats, but expense has to be incurred in pulling them down. Here the plaintiffs fortunately are in the position of being able to do something with the ship in the way of other employment, and the money which they spent no doubt in doing the ship up and paying the crew and buying coal was an available asset for the use of the ship afterwards. I do not mean to say they got the full value for it, for they did not, but at the same time they got something. The plaintiffs behaved very honourably in that matter by endeavouring to lessen the loss to the defendant (if he was liable) as much as they did. They keep her on her route and send her out as much as they possibly can. They could not do that with the seats; they would be fixtures and quite useless.

That being the position of the two parties, that shows the way this case differs from the others. The plaintiffs are in a little more fortunate position, and so is the defendant also, because he may reduce his liability. Now, it is said in the next place by Mr. Lush that there was a part of a contract which could be performed because the contract was a two-fold one. It purported to be for the Naval Review, and for a day's cruise round the fleet, and it was stated that the second part of the contract could have been performed. It seems to me there is something to be said with reference to that. The fleet was there, there is no doubt, although some of it may have gone, but I think the fair way to test it is to see what was the contract contemplated. Was it not a contract between these two parties which would put the defendant in a position to enter into a quasi similar contract with people who wanted to see the Naval Review—that is to say, the people who would go to see the Naval Review and go round the fleet? But if he had done what he would be obliged to do, to put up a notice, "The Naval Review is off; the fleet is there. Will you go down and see the fleet?" how many people would have taken a ticket? I do not think that the defendant is liable to pay the money to the plaintiffs. The primary part was the Naval Review, and the other was merely secondary to that, and without the primary part of the contract the other is useless. It cannot have been in the contemplation of the parties that this should be a contract for merely going round the fleet. That I find as a fact. Then, looking at the contract, I have to see whether or not the plaintiffs fulfilled their part of the contract. I do not think the plaintiffs did so as to entitle them to this money, because this money is not to be paid until the ship leaves. The sum contracted for was 200*l.* She never did leave, and therefore the plaintiffs have not performed their part of the contract. Why she did not leave was because the plaintiffs were endeavouring to reduce the loss as much as they could, but I have to determine this on the strict legal aspect of the contract which was made between the parties before they knew there was likely to be any difficulty. As the plaintiffs found there was this difficulty, and they would very likely have a difficulty in getting the money, they first of all telegraphed to the address given them, then to the defendant's home, and got no reply. That may have been quite accidental on the defendant's part, but there is no evidence to show anything about that except there is nothing to show that he did not receive the first one or either of them. Without waiting for any reply the plaintiffs themselves determined the contract because they, without getting any authority, and relying upon the full benefit of the contract, and the agreement made, took the boat off the route to which she was invited and to which the contract applies, and used her by sending her somewhere else, and making money out of her. Under these circumstances it seems to me the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover the 200*l.*, and my judgment is for the defendant.

SHILLITO v. BIGGART AND ANOTHER.

[K.B. Div.]

SHILLITO v. BIGGART AND ANOTHER. (a)

Mortgage of ship — Possession by mortgagee — Freight due but unpaid at date of possession by mortgagee—Right of mortgagee to unpaid freight.

A mortgagee of a ship, on taking possession of the ship under the mortgage, does not become entitled as against an assignee of the freight to receive freight which is due and payable to the ship-owner before the mortgagee takes possession, but which is unpaid at the time when the mortgagee so takes possession.

INTERPLEADER issue tried before Walton, J. as a commercial cause, the question being whether a sum of 527*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.* was the property of the plaintiff or of the defendants.

On the 11th Oct. 1900 Messrs. Woodruff, Shillito, and Co., by a mortgage of that date, mortgaged their ship Craigearn to the defendants, Messrs. Biggart and Fulton, and the mortgage was duly registered under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts then in force.

Under a charter-party dated the 26th March 1902 the Brazilian Coal Company Limited (whose agents in London were Cory Brothers and Co. Limited) owed a sum of 527*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.* for freight to Messrs. Woodruff, Shillito, and Co., owners of the Craigearn, in respect of the carriage of a cargo of coal from Cardiff to Santos by that ship. This balance of freight of 527*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.* became due and payable to Messrs. Woodruff, Shillito, and Co. on the 17th June 1902.

On or about the 9th Aug. 1902 Woodruff, Shillito, and Co. assigned to the plaintiff in the interpleader issue (Edwin Shillito) this sum of 527*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.*, due from the Brazilian Coal Company to Woodruff, Shillito, and Co. as registered owners of the Craigearn, and on the 24th Nov. 1902 they executed a legal assignment of the freight so assigned on the 9th Aug., and notice of this assignment was served upon the Brazilian Coal Company.

The vessel, after discharging her cargo of coal at Santos, loaded a cargo in the River Plate for Hull; she arrived in Hull on the 14th Aug. 1902, and on her arrival the defendants, Messrs. Biggart and Fulton, entered into possession of the vessel as mortgagees under the mortgage of the 11th Oct. 1900, and at the time when they so entered into possession the balance of freight of 527*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.*, although due and payable on the 17th June 1902, had not in fact been paid.

On the 22nd Oct. 1902 an action was commenced by Messrs. Biggart and Fulton against the Brazilian Coal Company Limited and their agents in London, Cory Brothers and Co. (in whose hands the money was), for the recovery of this balance of freight.

Messrs. Biggart and Fulton claimed the balance of freight as first mortgagees under the mortgage of the 11th Oct. 1900. The balance was also claimed by the plaintiff under his assignment as second mortgagee of the ship.

Ultimately it was ordered that the defendants Cory Brothers and Co. should pay the sum into court, after deducting the amount of the defendants' costs of the action to be taxed, and an interpleader issue was ordered in which E. Shillito was to be the plaintiff and Biggart and Fulton the defendants.

This issue recited that there had been paid into court the 527l. 9s. 11d. (less the taxed costs), being the balance due from the Brazilian Coal Company to Woodruff, Shillito, and Co., the then registered owners of the ship, in respect of the freight in question; that Edwin Shillito affirmed that the rights of the owners of the steamship to this balance of freight had passed to and been assigned to and were vested in him, and that he was entitled to have this balance paid to him; that Messrs. Biggart and Fulton affirmed that they as first mortgagees in possession (before payment of the balance of freight) of the ship were entitled to the balance of freight, and that their claim took priority of any claim by, or rights of, the owners of the steamship or those who claimed under them, in respect of the balance of freight.

The question to be tried was whether the sum of 527l. 9s. 11d. (less taxed costs) was the property of Edwin Shillito (the plaintiff in the issue) or of Messrs. Biggart and Fulton (the defendants in the issue).

For the plaintiff it was contended that the defendants, though they might have been entitled to freight which became due after they took possession as mortgagees, were not entitled to the freight which was earned and became due and payable before the date when the defendants as mortgagees entered into possession of the ship, although such freight had not been paid at the time when the mortgagees took possession; that such freight was still payable to the shipowners; and that the plaintiff was entitled to receive the same as assignee of the shipowners.

For the defendants it was contended that they were entitled to receive all freight which remained unpaid at the date of their taking possession, although such freight was due and payable before they took possession.

March 9.—WALTON, J. read the following judgment:—In this interpleader issue the question is whether a sum of 527l. 9s. 11d., which is in court, is the property of the plaintiff or of the defendants. The sum in question is a balance of freight which became due from the Brazilian Coal Company Limited to Woodruff, Shillito, and Co., who were owners of the steamship Craigearn, in respect of the carriage of a cargo of coals to Santos by such steamship. This balance of freight was earned and became due and payable on the 17th June 1902. The plaintiff claims it as the assignee of the shipowners, Messrs. Woodruff, Shillito, and Co. The defendants dispute his claim, and contend that they are entitled to the money in question as mortgagees of the steamship by a mortgage dated the 11th Oct. 1900. After discharging her cargo of coals at Santos the steamer loaded a cargo in the River Plate for Hull, where she arrived on the 14th Aug. 1902, and on her arrival the defendants entered into possession of the steamship as mortgagees. Although the freight in question had become due on the 17th June, it had not been paid when the mortgagees entered into possession on or about the 14th Aug. 1902. The defendants contend that they are entitled to all freight earned by the vessel and unpaid at the time when they entered into possession. The plaintiff, on the other hand, contends that, although the defendants are entitled to freight which became due after they took possession, they are not entitled to freight which became due and payable before, although it may not have been paid until after they took possession. It is somewhat surprising to find that the question which arises in the present case has not been settled by an express decision in some reported case. I am not satisfied that Chinnery v. Blackburne (1 H. Bl. 117, n.) is precisely in point. The judgment of Parker, V.C. in Cato v. Irving (18 L. T. Rep. O. S. 345; 5 De G. & Sm. 210) proceeds upon the assumption that the mortgagee of a ship is not entitled to freight unless he takes possession before the freight has accrued due. The Vice-Chancellor there says (18 L. T. Rep. O. S., at p. 346; 5 De G. & Sm., at p. 224): "The authorities referred to in the argument establish that the mortgagee of a ship, who takes possession before the conclusion of the voyage, is entitled to the then accruing freight. It was contended by the defendants that the present case does not come within this rule because the plaintiffs did not take possession until the ship was in the docks, and the voyage therefore concluded. I consider that a mortgagee who takes possession of the ship at any time before the cargo is discharged comes within the rule. The right to the freight does not accrue until the goods are not only conveyed to their destination, but are also delivered; and a mortgagee who takes lawful possession of the ship while the goods are still on board, and is thereby entitled to deliver the goods and receive the freight, to the exclusion of the mortgagor, must be as much within the reason of the rule when the ship is in the docks as where she is only on her way to the docks at the time when possession is taken." This was in the year 1852. In Brown v. Tanner (18 L. T. Rep. 624; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 94; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 597) the Lords Justices in the year 1868 had to deal with a question as to a mortgagee's right to freight. In delivering the judgment of the court, Page-Wood, L.J. said: "But it appears to us that this case must be determined in the appellant's favour on the ground of his having taken possession of the ship before the freight under the charter-party had become due. It is now settled beyond all dispute that the mortgagee of a ship becomes entitled to all the rights and liable to all the duties of an owner from the time of his taking possession. Amongst the rights so accruing to him is that of receiving all freight remaining due when possession is taken." The defendants rely upon the last sentence in this passage of the judgment as indicating that in the opinion of the Lord Justice the mortgagee on taking possession became entitled to all freights then due and unpaid. I think, however, that the Lord Justice meant no more than that the mortgagee on taking possession became entitled to all unpaid freight which the ship was then in the course of earning. This seems clear from what follows in the judgment. At p. 603 (L. Rep. 3 Ch. App.; 18 L. T. Rep., at p. 626) the Lord Justice says: "The only question then really is, Had the freight become due when the appellant took possession? And this point we wished to have reargued, the matter not appearing to have been fully discussed either in the court below or at the first hearing before us." And the Lord Justice proceeds to consider this question and comes to the conclusion that the freight had not been earned before the mortgagee took possession, and that therefore the mortgagee was entitled to it. In Liverpool Marine Credit Company v. Wilson (26 L. T. Rep. 717, at p. 719; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 324; L. Rep. 7 Ch. 507, at p. 511), James, L.J., in delivering the judgment of himself and Mellish, L.J., stated the law upon this subject as follows: "He (the mortgagee) had no absolute right to the freight as an incident to his mortgage; he could not intercept the freight by giving notice to the charterer before payment; but if he took actual possession, or, according to a recent decision in the Court of Exchequer, if he took constructive possession of the ship before the freight was actually earned, he thus became entitled to the freight as an incident of his legal possessory right, just as a mortgagee of land taking actual possession of the land before severance of the growing crops would have the right to sever and take the crops." In Keith v. Burrows (37 L. T. Rep. 291; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 481; 2 App. Cas. 636) Lord Cairns, as I understand him, states the law to the same effect at p. 646 (2 App. Cas.; 37 L. T. Rep., at p. 292), and Lord Blackburn at the top of p. 660 (2 App. Cas.); and in Anderson v. Butler's Wharf Company Limited (48 L. J. 824, Ch.) Hall, V.C. stated the result of the decisions as follows: "In the case of the mortgagee of a ship, which was referred to in the argument, the mortgagee is not entitled to the earnings of the ship, except the earnings thereof after the time of his taking possession." The defendants relied upon certain dicta of Malins, V.C. in Wilson v. Wilson (26 L. T. Rep. 346; L. Rep. 14 Eq. 32); but, when carefully considered, the language of the Vice-Chancellor does not appear to me to be really inconsistent with the statements of the law to which I have already referred. In the present case it is admitted that the freight in question became due and payable before the defendants entered into possession, and for this reason I think the defendants' claim fails, and that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

PRICE AND CO. v. UNION LIGHTERAGE COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

Carrier—Lighterman—Contract of carriage—Exemption in contract for "loss of or damage to goods which can be covered by insurance"—Loss by negligence of carrier's servants—Liability of carrier.

A contract of carriage, by which the owners of a barge contracted to carry a cargo of oil from a wharf in the river Thames to another part of the river, contained a clause that the barge-owners were not to be liable "for any loss or damage to goods which can be covered by insurance." The oil was shipped on the barge, and through the negligence of the barge-owners' servants the barge was sunk and the oil lost.

Held, that the clause did not exempt the carriers from the obligation of using reasonable skill and care in the carriage of the goods, and therefore did not exempt them from liability for loss or damage to the goods caused by the negligence of their servants.

If a carrier in such cases wishes to protect himself by contract from liability for the negligence of himself or his servants, he must do so in express and unambiguous terms.

COMMERCIAL CAUSE tried before Walton, J. without a jury.

The plaintiffs claimed 37*l.* damages for the loss of a cargo of petroleum oil on the defendants' barge Iron King.

The plaintiffs alleged that a verbal contract was made between them and the defendants in the month of Oct. 1902 for the carriage by the defendants in their barge Iron King of a cargo of petroleum from the Roumanian Oil Trust Company's wharf at Thames Haven to Belvedere; that there were breaches of this contract by the defendants whereby the barge sank at the Roumanian Company's wharf, and the plaintiffs' petroleum, amounting to 107 tons 13*cwt.*, and of the value of 37*l.*, was lost. They alleged in support of their claim that the barge was unseaworthy and unfit for the carriage of the cargo in certain specified particulars, and also that the defendants' servant in charge of the barge was negligent in certain respects, by reason whereof the barge became jammed under a projection from the wharf as the tide rose, and sank at her moorings. The acts of negligence alleged were that the defendants' servant improperly moored the barge to the wharf; that he did not properly attend to the mooring ropes as the tide fell and rose; that he did not stand by the barge as the tide rose, and that he did not, in accordance with the usual practice, remove the barge when loaded to one of the buoys provided for that purpose.

The defendants in their points of defence said that, as the plaintiffs well knew, they carried goods in the ordinary course of business on the terms that they were not liable for any loss of or damage to goods which could be covered by insurance, and that such insurance must be effected without recourse to lighterman; that these terms were part of the contract, and that, while admitting that the barge sank and the oil was lost, the loss was covered by insurance, and in the alternative they denied that the barge was unseaworthy or that their servant was negligent, and said that the loss was caused by the action of the wind and tide jamming the barge under the jetty, and that they were not liable therefor.

The contract was not in writing, but it was admitted by the parties that the lighterage was subject to the following clause which was printed on the defendants' forms:

The rates charged by us are for conveyance only, and we will not be liable for any loss of or damage to goods which can be covered by insurance. The terms of the marine or other policy should stipulate that insurance is effected without recourse to lighterman.

The oil was shipped on the barge about high water on the day in question, and the barge when loaded was allowed to remain moored to the jetty until after low water. There were projections from the face of the jetty, and as the barge rose with the rising tide its gunwale caught against one of these projections from the jetty, and as the tide rose the barge was held down and was in consequence submerged and sunk and the oil was lost. The barge was left unattended by the defendants' servants as the tide rose, and the plaintiffs alleged that the loss was caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants in so leaving the barge unattended while the tide was rising.

The defendants contended that the loss was a loss by perils of the seas and therefore one which could have been covered by insurance, and that therefore they were protected by the terms of the clause in question, even if the loss were caused by the negligence of themselves or their servants.

March 11.—WALTON, J. read the following judgment:—In this case the plaintiffs seek to recover damages from the defendants for the loss of a quantity of oil which was shipped at a jetty at Thames Haven in a barge of the defendants under a contract between them and the plaintiffs, by which the defendants agreed to receive and lighter the oil for the plaintiffs to Belvedere up the river Thames. The oil was shipped about high water early in the afternoon of the 31st Oct. 1902, and the barge when loaded was allowed to remain moored to the jetty until after low water. As the barge rose with the rising tide its gunwale caught under a projecting part of the face of the jetty, against which it was lying, and as the tide rose the barge was held down and so was submerged and sunk. The plaintiffs allege that the loss was caused by the negligence of the defendants' lightermen in leaving the barge unattended during the rise of the tide, or by the unseaworthiness of the barge, or by both causes. In my opinion the plaintiffs have failed to prove that the barge was unseaworthy, and it follows that if they are entitled to succeed at all it must be on the ground that the loss was caused by the negligence of the defendants' servant. As to this the defendants say that by the terms of the contract they are exempt from liability for a loss so caused, and they say further that there was no negligence. It is necessary, therefore, to ascertain what the terms of the contract were. The contract was not contained in any written document, but it is admitted that by the course of dealing between the parties the lighterage was subject to the terms of a clause which was printed on the forms of stationery used by the defendants in their business, and is as follows: "The rates charged by us are for conveyance only, and we will not be liable for any loss of or damage to goods which can be covered by insurance. The terms of the marine or other policy should stipulate that insurance is effected without recourse to lighterman. We will not be responsible for any consequences arising from strikes or other labour disturbances." In dealing with the question of construction, I shall assume that the loss was brought about by the negligence of the defendants' lighterman. Upon the question of construction, the controversy between the parties is as to whether the clause in question exempts the lighterage company from liability for a loss caused by the negligence of their servants. It is plain that such a loss as occurred in the present case is covered by an ordinary marine policy. The loss of cargo by the accidental sinking of a barge is a loss by perils of the sea, and is recoverable from underwriters as such whether brought about by the negligence of the lighterman or not. It may be and probably is true that when the clause speaks of losses which can be covered by insurance, it means losses which can be covered by insurance in the ordinary course of business. Negligence of lightermen is not one of the risks named in the common forms of policies on goods, but there is no doubt it can be insured against specifically without any difficulty, and, as I have said, a loss such as occurred in the present case is covered even by the ordinary form of a marine policy on goods, whether the loss was brought about by negligence or not. It follows that the words of the clause, "loss of goods which can be covered by insurance," are wide enough to include the loss which occurred in this case, even assuming that it was caused by negligence. And if it were right or permissible to deal with this case without regard to the rules of construction which have been laid down in a well-known series of cases and looking only at the language used, it might very well be said that its meaning was that the defendants were to be exempt from liability for insurable losses whether caused by negligence or not. But there is, I think, a well-established rule of construction applicable to the present case. The law of England, unlike in this respect to the law of the United States of America, does not forbid the carrier to exempt himself by contract from liability for the negligence of himself and his servants, but, if the carrier desires so to exempt himself, it requires that he shall do so in express, plain, and unambiguous terms. In Phillips v. Clark (29 L. T. Rep. O. S. 181; 2 C. B. N. S. 156) the damage was by leakage and breakage, and by the bill of lading the shipowner was "not to be accountable for leakage and breakage"; but it was held that if the leakage and breakage were due to the negligence of the servants of the shipowner he was not protected from liability by the exemption in the bill of lading. In that case Willes, J. said (2 C. B.

N. S., at pp. 163-4): "The introduction of the words in the margin of the bill of lading is sufficiently accounted for by the fact that without them the defendant would have been bound to the strictest care, so as to deliver the goods at the end of the voyage in the same state and condition as they were in when he received them, without reference to negligence. It appears from the observations of Lord Wensleydale in Walker v. Jackson (10 M. & W. 161, at p. 169), that, in the absence of fraud, the carrier is bound as an insurer to carry and deliver the goods as they are when he receives them—as is pointed out by some members of the court in Wylde v. Pickford (8 M. & W. 443). The defendant gets rid of that liability in the present case by the introduction of the words 'not accountable for leakage or breakage,' but not of the obligation which the law imposes upon him of taking reasonable care of the goods intrusted to him. . . . The true meaning of this contract is—I will take all reasonable care of the goods, but will not be accountable for a loss arising from leakage or breakage such as usually happens without the exercise of extraordinary care.' The owner engages only to abstain from negligence." In Steinman and Co. v. Angier Line Limited (64 L. T. Rep. 613; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 46; (1891) 1 Q. B. 619) the exemption in the bill of lading was from liability from losses caused by "thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not," but the court held that this did not protect the shipowner from liability for a theft committed by his servants. The general rule is stated by Bowen, L.J. in his judgment as follows (64 L. T. Rep., at p. 615; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 48; (1891) 1 Q. B., at pp. 623-4): "This question of construction must be decided on the broad principle which has been so long and so constantly invoked in the interpretation of contracts with carriers by sea as well as land—namely, that words of general exemption from liability are only intended (unless the words are clear) to relieve the carrier from liability where there has been no misconduct or default on his part or that of his servants. The exceptions in a bill of lading are not intended to excuse the carrier from the obligation of bringing due skill and care on the part of himself and his servants to bear both upon the stowing and upon the carrying of the cargo. Even in cases within the exceptions, the shipowner is not protected if default or negligence on his part or that of his servants has contributed to the loss. Accordingly, in Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Company Limited (14 L. T. Rep. 711; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 600; on appeal, 18 L. T. Rep. 485; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 77; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 476), an exception in a bill of lading of 'accidents of whatever nature or kind soever' was held not to cover a collision caused by the negligence of master and crew: (see also Phillips v. Clark, ubi sup.; Czech v. General Steam Navigation Company, 17 L. T. Rep. 246; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 14). It is the duty of the shipowner by himself and his servants to do all he can to avoid the excepted perils; the exception, in other words, limits the liability, not the duty." I understand the meaning of this to be that an exemption in general words, not expressly relating to negligence, even though the words are wide enough to include loss by the negligence or default of the carrier's servants, must be construed as limiting the liability of the carrier as insurer, and not as relieving him from the duty of exercising reasonable skill and care. If the carrier desires to relieve himself from the duty of using by himself and his servants reasonable skill and care in the carriage of goods, he must do so in plain language and explicitly, and not by general words.

I may refer to Mitchell v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (33 L. T. Rep. 161; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 256) as another illustration of this rule. There the carriers, who were the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, after the goods had arrived at their destination, gave notice to the consignees that the railway company held the goods to the order of the consignees "not as carriers but as warehousemen, at owner's sole risk." But it was held that the words "at owner's sole risk" amounted to no more than a notice that the railway company after giving such notice undertook no liability as insurers, and did not relieve them from liability for a loss arising from the negligence of their servants. It really comes to this, that if a carrier wishes to exempt himself from liability for the negligence of his servants, he must insert in his contract in one form or another something equivalent to what is well known as a negligence clause. I think that this view of the law as applicable to the present case is, at all events, supported by the judgment of the House of Lords in Sutton and Co. v. Ciceri and Co. (62 L. T. Rep. 742; 15 App. Cas. 144); and I may point out, as Lord Herschell did in that case, that the clause in question in this case, as in that, seems to refer to conveyance in contradistinction to insurance. I think that, in obedience to the rule laid down in the cases which I have cited, the clause must be read as meaning: "I will use reasonable skill and care in the conveyance of the goods, but I will not undertake any liability as insurer for loss or damage which can be covered by insurance with underwriters." In my opinion, therefore, if the loss was in fact caused by the negligence of the lighterman the defendants are liable. It may be convenient to add a reference to the case of Compania de Navigacion La Flecha v. Brauer (168 U. S. Rep., or 61 Davis, 104), in which the Supreme Court of the United States had to consider the effect of the English authorities upon this question. I have now to consider whether there was negligence in fact. I have considered the evidence given on each side, and have arrived at the following conclusion: There were projections from the face of the jetty against which the barge was moored, which, in my opinion, made it dangerous to leave the barge unattended after low water to rise with the tide. I think the danger was apparent. It is true that there was a floating boom attached to the jetty, which was intended to act as a fender to prevent barges whilst loading from striking against the woodwork of the jetty. But it is clear that this was insufficient to prevent barges, if unattended, from getting caught, as they rose with the tide, under the projecting parts of the jetty. I am satisfied from the evidence that it was not reasonable or proper to leave the barge unattended, relying on the boom to prevent such an accident as in fact occurred. It is said that no such accident had occurred before. But there is no evidence to show that it was usual to leave loaded barges unattended and moored to the jetty to rise with the tide. On the contrary, there were buoys provided just above and just below the jetty for loaded barges to moor at whilst waiting for their tugs; and in the present case, after the barge was loaded, the lighterman was told to take the barge to one of the buoys, but he neglected to do so because, in my opinion, he did not care to take the trouble to move the barge, and thought that his tug might perhaps come at or about low water. I am satisfied also upon the evidence that the lighterman did leave the barge without sufficient or proper attendance. He says that after leaving the jetty in the afternoon he returned two or three times to look after the barge. I cannot accept his evidence as to these visits as accurate; and I have no doubt that he neglected to attend to the barge reasonably and properly under the circumstances. I agree that it is not in all cases necessary that a lighterman should be in attendance upon a barge moored in the river. If, for instance, this barge had been moored at one of the buoys, it might, I think, have been left unattended without danger. But I am satisfied that it was not reasonably safe or proper, at all events after the tide began to rise, to leave this barge moored as she was without attendance. In consequence of the barge being so left her gunwale caught under a projection of the jetty and she sank. I think that the defendants are liable for the loss thereby occasioned. There will be judgment for the plaintiffs for 370l. 3s. 7d. with costs, except the costs of the issue of unseaworthiness, which are to be paid by the plaintiffs.

THE EMILIE GALLINE. (a)

Salvage—Collision—Service without engagement—Right to reward.

The steamship G. while coming out of dock with the tugs H. and S. G. in attendance fouled her propeller, and drove against the barque E. G., which was lying moored to the dock wall with three tugs fast to her, waiting to go into dock, causing her to break her moorings, and drift down with the G. on to a sandbank. The G. was eventually towed clear by her tugs, and the E. G. was then towed off. In an action for salvage by the five tugs against the E. G.:

Held, that the three tugs in attendance on the E. G. were, under the circumstances, entitled to salvage, but that there was not sufficient evidence, according to the principle laid down in The Vandeyck (47 L. T. Rep. 694; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 17; 7 P. Div. 42), from which a constructive acceptance of the services of the tugs H. and S. G.

could be inferred, and that they were not entitled to salvage.

ACTION for salvage by the owners, masters, and crews of the tugs Scotsman, Humber, Powerful, Huntsman, and Stephen Gray against the owners of the French barque Emilie Galline, the owners of her cargo, and freight.

The Emilie Galline was a steel barque of 2040 tons register belonging to Havre, and at the time the services were rendered was on a voyage from San Francisco to Hull with a cargo of grain, and manned by a crew of twenty-three hands all told.

The value of the Emilie Galline was 9750l., of her cargo 13,429l., and of her freight at risk 3201l., making 26,380l. in all.

The plaintiffs' case was that on the 31st Jan. 1903 the services of the Scotsman were engaged off Spurn Head to tow the Emilie Galline up to Hull, and in Grimsby Roads the Humber was also engaged to assist in docking her.

The vessels reached the Alexandra Dock about 8.15 a.m., and on her arrival the Emilie Galline was ordered by the dock master to wait alongside the eastern pierhead until her turn came to enter.

The weather at the time was a gale from the S.W., and there was a strong ebb tide running, and, in addition to being moored head towards the dock, the Scotsman was lashed to her port side, and the Humber, which was fast to her port quarter, towed to the W.S.W. to keep her stern in position, whilst the services of a third tug, the Powerful, were also engaged to straighten her as she went into the dock.

Under these circumstances the Gorjistan, a steamship of 3261 tons gross register, in water ballast, left the dock in tow of the tug Huntsman, and in doing so her propeller was fouled by a rope which had been used as her after check rope. She fell down towards the Emilie Galline under the force of wind and tide and with her forward davit on the port side fouled the jibboom of the barque, and, as she drove ahead, forced her bodily astern until she took the ground on the Hebbles Bank.

The Scotsman held on to the Emilie Galline, and by order of the pilot went ahead and prevented her being swept into the river, as all except one of her mooring ropes had parted.

The Humber also held on, and kept the barque's stern up, and in so doing was caught between the Gorjistan and the Emilie Galline and seriously damaged.

In the meanwhile the Emilie Galline lay heading about W.N.W., having grounded fore and aft, and with the Gorjistan locked to her on the port side and pressing against her owing to the force of wind and tide.

The Huntsman continued all this time fast to the Gorjistan, and towed off her starboard bow, and the Stephen Gray—which had previously been assisting the Gorjistan—was hailed to take a rope from her starboard quarter. After towing for about half an hour the Huntsman and the Stephen Gray got the Gorjistan clear of the barque, and subsequently the other three tugs towed the Emilie Galline off the bank and took her into dock.

The defendants did not admit the facts alleged by the plaintiffs, and contended that the Emilie

Galline was at no time in a position of real danger. They also contended that the services of the Scotsman, Humber, and Powerful were little more than towage within their towage agreements, and that no services were rendered by the Huntsman and Stephen Gray, and that such services as were rendered to the Gorjistan came within their towage agreement.

Aspinall, K.C. and Lauriston Batten for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted that the tugs Huntsman and Stephen Gray rendered valuable services to the Emilie Galline in towing the Gorjistan away. The services were of direct benefit to the Emilie Galline, and consequently should be remunerated by her. No prudent master would have refused the services of the tugs had they been offered him. The services were outside the ordinary towage agreement between the tugs and the steamship:

The Annapolis, Lush. 355;
The Vandyck, 47 L. T. Rep. 694; 5 Asp. Mar. Law
Cas. 17; 7 P. Div. 42.

The tugs Scotsman, Powerful, and Humber performed valuable services to the Emilie Galline, and are entitled to be rewarded for them.

Laing, K.C. and Stubbs for the defendants.—The Huntsman and Stephen Gray were under contract to assist the Gorjistan, and were bound to tow her clear. There was no request on the part of the Emilie Galline, and no request can be implied, nor can it be said that a prudent master would, under the circumstances, have engaged their services, for there were already three tugs fast to the Emilie Galline. Possibly the Huntsman and Stephen Gray might have a claim against the Gorjistan for salvage, but that question does not arise in this case:

The J. C. Potter, 23 L. T. Rep. 603; 3 Mar. Law
Cas. O. S. 506; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 292.

Aspinall, K.C. in reply.

BUCKNILL, J.—In this action salvage claims are made by five tugs—the Scotsman, the Humber, the Powerful, the Huntsman, and the Stephen Gray—and the question arises how many of them are entitled at law to salvage; and, secondly, how much is due to such of them as are so entitled. The facts of the case are not difficult, and may be taken to be almost admitted, so far as they raise the question of law. The barque Emilie Galline wanted to be docked in the Alexandra Dock, and she had two tugs in attendance on her under contract—the Scotsman and the Humber—and by accident, so far as those tugs are concerned, she eventually got aground on the East Hebbles. The way she got there was this. She had been brought up, in a gale of wind, to the entrance of the Alexandra Dock, where she had been properly made fast whilst waiting for certain vessels to come out of dock before she herself could go in. The first of those vessels passed out safely, but another vessel, the Gorjistan, a large steamer, was following the first steamer out, preceded by a tug, the Huntsman, which was made fast to her, and followed by the Stephen Gray, which was not fast to her, when by the negligence of somebody—not being the negligence of those on the Huntsman or the Stephen Gray, but by the negligence of some other person, either on the Gorjistan or the dock-head—the Gorjistan got a rope foul of her propeller, with the result that she fouled the barque, and squeezed down upon the tug Scotsman, pinching or nipping her between herself and the barque, and carrying away all the head-lines by which the barque was made fast to the dock-head, except one wire hawser. In that way the barque, the Scotsman, and the Gorjistan went down river until the barque was brought up by touching the ground, and the two ships, with the Scotsman in between them, remained in that position for about an hour, until the Gorjistan was towed free from the barque by the Huntsman and the Stephen Gray. Those two tugs are plaintiffs in this action, and the question is whether in law they are entitled to succeed. Two cases have been cited in support of their claim. The first is The Annapolis (ubi sup.), in which the Privy Council affirmed a decision of Dr. Lushington, and the other is the more recent case of The Vandyck (ubi sup.). Now, in neither of these cases are the facts the same as in this case. In the case of The Vandyck (ubi sup.) the facts were, shortly, that the plaintiffs' tug, the Stormcock, was lying alongside the Liverpool landing-stage when she saw two steamships in contact over on the Cheshire side of the river; that one of those vessels was at anchor, and the other was the Vandyck, which had driven down river until she got athwart the hawse of the other ship; that the vessels were grinding together, and, in consequence of the propeller of the Vandyck being fouled, that vessel was powerless to get away by her own steam; that the Stormcock went across the river, and, without any contract being made with the Vandyck, got hold of the other vessel and dragged her away. The question was whether the Stormcock was entitled to claim salvage from the Vandyck. The court said "Yes," on the ground that any prudent man in the position of the master of the Vandyck would, if asked the question, have said, in answer to it, "By all means get me away from this vessel as soon as you can," and the question I have to ask myself here is: Would the master of the Emilie Galline, as a reasonably prudent man, if he had been asked by the tugs Huntsman and Stephen Gray, or one of them, whether they should free the steamer from the barque, have said "Yes" or "No"? The evidence does not enable me to answer the question one way or the other. Therefore I have to look at the question from a broader point of view. Neither party has thought proper to ask the master the question—perhaps from excessive prudence. The position was this: He had two tugs in attendance on him, one of which was pinched and helpless and powerless, and the other, the Humber, was made fast to the port quarter, and I do not think she was in a position at that time, or was strong enough herself, to have taken the steamer away. But the master of the barque knew, or had reason to believe, that the Huntsman and the Stephen Gray were in attendance upon the steamer and were her tugs, bringing her out, and he knew that one was fast and he saw the other coming out. In the circumstances, is it more reasonable to come to the conclusion that the master would have said, "Let them tow her clear—they are in attendance upon her; let them do it; here I am aground"; or is it more reasonable to suppose that if he asked the question, he would have said, "Yes; tow away, and you shall be entitled to a salvage award hereafter from me"? It is so near the line that I am puzzled

to know what answer to give; but the answer I do give is that there is not sufficient evidence to justify me in coming to the conclusion that the master would have accepted the services of those tugs in the circumstances of the case, and that it is reasonable to draw the inference that he was satisfied that they would continue to tow at the ship which they had contracted to tow. I know of no case where the facts are exactly similar to this case; but I decide that those two tugs are not entitled to claim salvage from the Emilie Galline, and, therefore, the defendants are entitled to judgment against them. With regard to the other tugs, the case is simple. According to the log, the barque was considered to be in a precarious and critical position. Her master was afraid that serious consequences might arise if he was not towed off, and a third tug, the Powerful, had to be engaged to assist. The Scotsman did most of the work, and was the most powerful of the three tugs, but they all three did their work very well. The evidence of the master of the Scotsman was given with extreme fairness, without any attempt at exaggeration. I cannot make a large award, because the Elder Brethren advise me that, in their opinion, the barque was not in anything like serious danger, though she was in that danger which every vessel of her size is in when she finds herself aground, in a gale of wind, in a place where there is a strong tide running. The value is not large—26,380*l.*—and I award 650*l.* Of that sum, I give the Scotsman 300*l.*, the Humber 250*l.*, and the Powerful 100*l.*

HOUSE OF LORDS.

March 3, 5, and May 25, 1903.

Lords ASHBOURNE, MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, and LINDLEY.)

HULTHEN v. STEWART AND Co. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party—Discharge of cargo—Demurrage —“As fast as steamer can deliver”—“According to custom of port.”

By charter-party it was agreed that a steamer should proceed to a named port, and there deliver a cargo of timber “to be discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can deliver . . . according to the custom of the port,” with an exception in respect of delay caused by a strike or lock-out.

The ship arrived at the port, and was ready to deliver the cargo, but delivery was delayed by the crowded state of the dock to which she was ordered. There was evidence that she could not have been discharged more quickly, under the circumstances, elsewhere in the port, and that the consignees had used all reasonable means to procure the discharge.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below) that they had performed their obligation under the charter-party, and were not liable for demurrage.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Romer and Mathew, L.J.J.), reported 86 L. T. Rep. 397; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 285; (1902) 2 K. B. 199, who had affirmed a judgment of Phillimore, J. without a jury, in the Commercial Court, reported 6 Com. Cas. 65.

The appellant, as owner of the steamship Anton, claimed from the respondents, as indorsees of a bill of lading, which incorporated the terms of a charter-party, demurrage for the detention of the Anton at London, her port of discharge.

The respondents alleged that the detention was not due to causes for which they were responsible, and that, having regard to the then existing circumstances, the Anton was duly discharged according to the provisions of the charter-party.

The charter-party was dated the 22nd Aug. 1900, and its material clauses were as follows:

(1) . . . and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to London, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and deliver the same always afloat . . .

(3) The cargo to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports, Sunday, general or local holidays (unless used) in both loading and discharging excepted. Should the steamer be detained beyond the time stipulated as above for loading or discharging, demurrage shall be paid at 30*l.* per day, and pro rata for any part thereof. The cargo to be brought to, and taken from, alongside the steamer at charterer's risk and expense, as customary. (5) If the cargo cannot be loaded and (or) discharged by reason of a strike or lock-out of any class of workmen essential to the loading and (or) discharge of the cargo, or by reason of epidemics, the time for loading and (or) discharging shall not count during the continuance of such strike or lock-out or epidemic (a strike or lock-out of the shippers' and (or) receivers' men only shall not exonerate them from any demurrage for which they may be liable under this charter, if by the use of reasonable diligence they could have obtained other suitable labour), and in case of any delay by reason of the beforementioned causes, no claim for damages shall be made by the shippers, the receivers of the cargo, the owners of the ship, or by any other party under this charter-party.

The following facts were proved or admitted:—

The cargo of the Anton consisted of deals, battens, and boards, and in the most favourable circumstances could have been discharged in five days.

The usual place for discharging deal cargoes was the Surrey Commercial Docks.

From September onwards the timber trade had been very active, and the docks and quays were, during September and October, crowded with vessels and goods.

On the 12th Oct. 1900 a lightermen's strike in the Port of London commenced. The strike lasted till the 22nd Jan. 1901. During the continuance of the strike it was practically impossible to obtain barges. The strike increased the congestion already existing in the port.

The Anton arrived at Gravesend on the 12th Oct. 1900.

The master on arrival received from the respondents a letter, dated the 3rd Oct. 1900, ordering the Anton into the Surrey Commercial Docks to discharge. As these docks were full, the respondents applied both to the West India Dock and to the Millwall Dock to take in the Anton. The Millwall Dock were unable to offer even water space. The West India Dock could not offer a quay berth, but offered water space for overside delivery. They did not offer barges. Water space was useless from the impossibility of obtaining barges.

On the 18th Oct. 1900 the Anton entered the Surrey Commercial Dock, but could not get a discharging berth till the 20th Oct. (Saturday). The discharge commenced on the 22nd Oct., and was completed on the 29th Oct. The discharge was at various times interfered with by the whole quay not being clear for landing.

Phillimore, J. held that under the charter-party all that the respondents had to do was to exercise all reasonable means to enable the cargo to be discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer could deliver according to the custom of the port, and that as the respondents had done this, they were not liable for any demurrage. The Court of Appeal affirmed the decision.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Leck for the appellant.—The case is not within any of the exceptions in the charter-party, and the Court of Appeal drew a wrong inference from the decision of this House in Hick v. Raymond (68 L. T. Rep. 175; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1893) A. C. 22). The facts, which are not in dispute, show that the delay arose from the busy state of the port and the difficulty in procuring lighters, not from such a state of things as existed in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (42 L. T. Rep. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599), where the charterer was held not to be liable for demurrage. The time in which the steamer could discharge was known, and as the time to be occupied could be ascertained, the agreement must be read as if it had been expressed in it. The charter-party is in the common form used in this trade, and it must be taken that its meaning was well-known to both parties. They also referred to

Good v. Isaacs, 67 L. T. Rep. 450; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212; (1892) 2 Q. B. 555;

Robson, K.C. and Loehnis for the respondents.—We have discharged the ship in a reasonable time under the circumstances, which is all the respondents were bound to do under the charter-party. If the contention of the appellant is right the decision in Hick v. Raymond should have been the other way. See also the judgment of Lord Blackburn in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.). In Lyle Shipping Company v. Cardiff (ubi sup.) the same rule was laid down, and most of the authorities were considered. The obligation of the charterer is to do his best under the circumstances. In any case the charterer must discharge in a reasonable time, which means that he must avail himself of the ordinary appliances of the port, and the addition of such words as "according to the custom of the port," or "as fast as steamer can deliver," imposes no additional obligation on him. If more is intended a definite time should be named, or a definite rate of discharge fixed, which is not uncommon in the timber trade. They referred to

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 25.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case the question of fact has been disposed of by Phillimore, J., and I think that no one of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal entertained any doubt upon the question of fact which has been found, and found satisfactorily. Practically, there has been no serious dispute that the facts are as found by the learned judge. The sole question which really remains is as to the construction of a common clause in the charter-party. The charter-party is in these terms: "The cargo to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports, Sundays, general or local holidays (unless used) in both loading and discharging excepted. Should the steamer be detained beyond the time stipulated as above for loading or discharging, demurrage shall be paid at 30*l.* per day, and pro rata for any part thereof." I confess that I entertain some surprise that this question should have been debated, because, in my view, it has practically been decided by a somewhat long series of authorities, and also by decisions of this House. There are two forms in which charter-parties of this character can be made. In one case a specific number of days are given within which the discharge is to be taken, and if those days are exceeded, quite apart from the circumstances, the demurrage is due. If, on the other hand, the parties choose to agree not to a definite number of days, but to a charter-party such as is to be found here, they necessarily import into it the circumstances under which the discharge takes place. If the learned judge in this case was right in thinking that, humanly speaking, everything was done to enable the discharge to be taken, it is idle to suggest that that which is a well-recognised form in which an absolute unconditional obligation is taken is to be imported into that which of itself, I think, involves the necessity of considering the circumstances of the case. The reasonable amount of diligence which can be exacted is that which the circumstances of the case suggest.

HULTHEN v. STEWART AND CO.

[H. OF L.]

In this case the learned judge has, with great precision, as I think, taken every hypothesis. He has ascertained when the ship arrived, he has pointed out, by reasoning which I think it impossible to answer, that all the diligence which could be expected was exhibited by the charterers, and, as I said, it comes back to the question, What is the true construction of the words? Now, so far as I can understand the argument—and, as I said, I feel some little surprise that it should have been suggested after the series of cases which have been decided on this subject—it is that you are to take the capacity of a vessel as being equivalent to a number of days—that is to say, in this case you are to take the description of what was done in discharging in relation to the capacity of the vessel, which you say is equivalent to five days. Now, the discharging took seven days, therefore there are two days on demurrage. But the whole fallacy is involved in saying that because the capacity of the vessel was five days therefore you are to substitute in a contract between the parties, because that is what it comes to, the words “five days” for the words which you actually find, and that would be an absolute and unconditional term, and, if you take the capacity of the vessel as the test, that amounts to five days. Seven days are more than five, and therefore demurrage is due. It seems to me that this is reasoning for which there is no foundation. Without going through the cases it appears to me that every one of these attempts to impose an absolute unconditional burthen upon the charterers has always failed, because in this, as in every other contract where no specific time is mentioned, it is to be measured by the legal test—namely, what is reasonable under the circumstances of the case. It appears to me, therefore, that there is no doubt as to what the decision of this case ought to be.

Another argument which appears to me to have as little foundation, is that there is a strike clause here, and, inasmuch as the parties have provided for the event of a strike expressly, therefore everything which has delayed the discharge, but is not caused by a strike, must be imported into the contract as a thing for which the charterers are responsible. I am wholly unable to follow the urgency of that argument. It seems to me absolutely unreasonable, and one for which there is no foundation at all. Under these circumstances I move that the appeal be dismissed. I think that the judgments of Phillimore, J. and of the Court of Appeal are perfectly right, and should be affirmed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: The question in this case turns on the meaning and effect of the provisions of a charter-party in use in the White Sea Wood Trade, and commonly known as the Chamber of Commerce White Sea Wood Charter. The appellant, as the owner of the steamship Anton, sued the respondents, who were receivers of the cargo under a bill of lading which incorporated all the terms and exceptions of the charter-party in question. The claim was for demurrage or damages for detention of the Anton at London, her port of discharge. The charter provides that the cargo is to be “discharged with customary steamship dispatch as fast as the steamer can . . . deliver during the ordinary working hours” of the port of discharge, “but according to the custom” of the port, Sundays, general or local holidays (unless used) excepted. The question is, What is the meaning of this provision? Is it tantamount to fixing a certain definite number of days or hours as the period within which the discharge of the vessel is to be accomplished? Taking the words by themselves, apart from all authority, I should say certainly not. The words used do not specify, or even, I think, point to a definite period of time. What they do point to is the discharge of the cargo with the utmost dispatch practicable, having regard to the custom of the port, the facilities for delivery possessed by the particular vessel under contract of affreightment, and all other circumstances in existence at the time not being circumstances brought about by the person whose duty it is to take delivery or within his control. The learned counsel for the appellant laid much stress upon the fact that this was a charter in common form and in use in a particular trade. They urged that the convenience of the parties interested required that it should be expressed in general terms. The shipowner, they said, would know and the charterer would ascertain the time required for delivery of the cargo when the ship was working as fast as she could, and that time would, of course, be measured by days and hours. Their contention, therefore, was that the language actually used had precisely the same meaning and effect as if the obligation of prompt dispatch described by reference to the ship’s power of discharging her cargo had been translated into measured portions of time. That, however, is not, I think, the way in which such a provision would strike an ordinary person glancing over the terms of a printed form of charter, and at the moment perhaps more intent on securing an advantageous freight than on providing for strange emergencies. I cannot help thinking that any person who might happen to sign a charter-party in this form would be much astonished to be told that by so doing he had come under an unconditional liability to take delivery within a fixed limit of time. He would probably say that he had not meant to do anything of the kind; possibly he might complain that he had fallen into a trap. The suggestion, for it was nothing more than a suggestion, that the convenience of business requires that the charter-party, though intended in each case as between the contracting parties to impose a special and peculiar liability, should be expressed in general terms and in a common form is not, I think, one of much weight. Nothing, as it seems to me, would be easier than to add to this common form half a line which, if not wanted, might be struck out or left partly in blank, but could be filled up with the number of lay days allowed if the charterer were willing to take upon himself the burden of unconditional liability. That, and an appropriate note in the margin would, I suppose, answer every purpose.

I have only to add on this part of the case that the special exception in a subsequent clause of a “strike” a “lock out,” and “epidemics” does not, in my opinion, restrict or affect the meaning of the clause providing for prompt dispatch in delivery. I quite agree with Mathew, L.J. that ingenious arguments founded on such special exemptions savour of subtilty equally foreign to the way in which clauses in charter-parties have been put together and built up, and the manner in which mercantile instruments are understood by business men. So the case I think would stand if there were no authority on the subject. But it is certainly satisfactory to find that there is a series of decisions, some in this House and others of great weight both in this country and in Scotland, which leave little or no room for argument. It is, I think, established that in order to make a charterer unconditionally liable it is not enough to stipulate that the cargo is to be discharged "with all dispatch" or "as fast as steamer can deliver," or to use expressions of that sort. In order to impose such a liability the language used must in plain and unambiguous terms define and specify the period of time within which delivery of the cargo is to be accomplished. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed with costs. Lord Ashbourne has read this opinion, and concurs in it.

Lord DAVEY.—My Lords: Collins, M.R. in his judgment in this case says, "On the learned judge's findings the charterers have done all that they reasonably could do to give discharge to this vessel. That is a finding of fact, and so it then becomes a question of law, aye or no, are the defendants, the charterers here, liable by virtue of the terms of the charter-party, although they have done all that, humanly speaking, was reasonably possible for them to do in order to secure for the vessel reasonable dispatch?" Now, to that question I think that there can be but one answer, when you read the terms of the charter-party, because I think that it would be impossible to come to a conclusion favourable to the argument of the appellants, unless you imported words into the charter-party, and gave it a wholly different complexion from that which the words used by the parties naturally bear. I agree with the reasons which have been given by your Lordships already for coming to that conclusion, and I need not repeat them. Several cases were cited in the course of the argument. I have been through those cases, and I am of opinion that they support the argument of the respondents. I will not discuss them, because they have been very fully and satisfactorily discussed by the Master of the Rolls, and, as I am quite prepared to adopt the reasons for their judgments which were given by the Master of the Rolls and his learned colleagues in the Court of Appeal, I need not trouble your Lordships by saying more than that I concur.

Lord ROBERTSON.—My Lords: I entirely agree.

Lord LINDLEY.—My Lords: I agree, and I cannot usefully add anything.

ANGEL v. MERCHANTS' MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance—Marine—Constructive total loss—Ship ashore—Cost of repairs—Value of wreck.

By a policy of marine insurance on a ship the ship was valued at 23,000l., and it was provided that that sum should be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel was a constructive total loss.

The ship afterwards ran ashore, but, being temporarily repaired, was brought back to England. The cost of repairs, if the ship had been reinstated, would have been 22,500l.

Held, that, in deciding whether or not there had been a constructive total loss, the value of the damaged vessel as she lay on the rocks ought not to be added to the cost of reinstating her.

Dictum in Young v. Turing (2 M. & G. 593) disapproved.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by a shipowner against underwriters, claiming for a constructive total loss of the insured vessel.

The facts of the case are sufficiently set out in the judgment of Williams, L.J.

April 7.—WILLIAMS, L.J. read the following judgment:—This is an appeal from the judgment of Bigham, J. in favour of the defendants in an action claiming as for a constructive total loss on a policy on ship. The ship was wrecked on the coast of Sicily, being driven on the rocks. There was from the first the hope that the ship might be got off, but the plaintiff (the shipowner) gave a notice of abandonment to the underwriters, which they did not accept. The ship was floated and brought to Malta by the operations of the salvage association, acting for the benefit of all concerned, on the terms that they were to receive nothing unless the ship was salvaged. The cost of these operations was afterwards assessed at 3500*l.* The ship was to a certain extent repaired at Malta with a view to her proceeding under steam to Cardiff for permanent repairs. The underwriters agreed with the master for the navigation by the ship's crew of the ship when repaired from Malta to Cardiff for a sum of 1400*l.* The repairs somehow or other, although certified by surveyors to be sufficient, broke down almost immediately after leaving Malta; the fact being that it was only possible to get repairs of a very temporary nature done at Malta. The ship was nearly lost, but succeeded in getting into Tunis. She was again temporarily repaired there, but was not allowed to proceed to England under her own steam, and was towed to Cardiff. Estimates were obtained at Barry for the repair of the ship, but she was not actually repaired before the trial before Bigham, J. Bigham, J. arrived at the conclusion that 22,559*l.* less some 200*l.* which the shipowner admitted he could not support, was the proper amount to fix as the cost of repairs. The repaired value of the ship the learned judge took as 23,000*l.*, which by the terms of the policy was to be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel was a constructive total loss. Bigham, J., in estimating the cost of repairs, did not add anything for the expenses incurred by reason of the accident which compelled the ship to put into Tunis. This accident he attributed to the perils of the sea, and thought that the temporarily repaired ship could have been insured for the voyage to England for a premium of 150*l.*; and it was for this reason that he included nothing in the expenses of repairs for expenses incurred by reason of the accident, and only included the insurance premium. Bigham, J. deducted from the plaintiff's estimate of repairs certain items to which objection was taken by Mr. Griggs, the expert witness called on behalf of the defendants. As to several of these items, I am not sure that I should not have arrived at a different conclusion in fact. I do not, however, think that we ought to review the decision of the learned judge, arrived at after a five days' trial on matters which in a sense are all questions of fact; for I treat estimates based on facts as matters of fact. A different finding on some of these objections by the underwriters would have been sufficient to make the expenses exceed the repaired value. I accept, however, as I have already said, the findings of the learned judge; and I only mention the dispute on these points to show how little the figures relied on as constituting the items of the cost of repairs or the total arrived at thereby can be relied on as factors in a mere arithmetical conclusion; especially in a case in which the learned judge thought, to use his own expression, that it was a very close thing, and so very near a constructive total loss that the underwriters might very well have paid it. The shipowner gave his notice of abandonment immediately after the marine accident. Precise estimates are, of course, impossible; and it seems to me that unless the insured shipowner is to take upon himself risks which ought not to be borne by him (such as the risk whether the ship will be got afloat at all, or, having been got afloat, will arrive at a port for temporary repairs, and ultimately at home for permanent repairs) a large margin ought to be added to the figures of cost of repairs to cover risks of this sort—risks which a prudent uninsured owner would certainly take into consideration in determining whether he should repair or sell.

There is, however, another consideration which it is suggested the prudent uninsured owner would certainly in fact have regarded in determining whether he should repair—I mean the damaged value of the ship; that is, the price which could be got for her as she lay unrepaired, which was, it was said, about 7000*l.* But, unfortunately, this part of the case was not very thoroughly gone into. The plaintiff in the earlier part of the trial seems to have been content to rely upon the estimates of cost of repairs exceeding the 23,000*l.* Then, when it seemed likely that the deductions made by the judge would reduce the repairs below the 23,000*l.*, the claim to add the value of the damaged vessel was put forward and discussed, the judge, however, saying that there was no real evidence of the value. It seems unsatisfactory to have to discuss an important question of marine insurance law in a case in which the facts, perhaps, do not raise the question at all. I do not think that it could be or was denied that the value of the damaged ship must be included in the calculation, if the ship had, in fact, been sold where she was and as she was, and the question, after sale, had been whether the circumstances justified abandonment. But it is said that this item of calculation must be disregarded if there is no such sale. Now, in my judgment, the "prudent uninsured owner" test was already accepted as the proper test at least down to 1873. The recognition of the test in Irving v. Manning, in the House of Lords (ubi sup.), and in Rankin v. Potter, also in the House of Lords (ubi sup.), puts the matter, to my mind, beyond argument. Nor do I think that it is possible to say that Moss v. Smith (ubi sup.), which was cited in Rankin v. Potter, had then been recognised as substituting for the "prudent uninsured owner" test an arithmetical test turning on the difference between estimated totals. The "prudent uninsured owner" test was, I think, adopted for the very purpose of covering considerations which cannot be embodied in the figures of an arithmetical calculation. I wish to observe that in Moss v. Smith (ubi sup.) there was no approximation of the cost of repairs and repaired value, and that the alleged misdirection was a misdirection with regard to the freight (which was separately insured), inasmuch as the Chief Justice, it was said, omitted to tell the jury that, in determining whether or not there was a total loss of freight, they were to throw out of consideration the value of the ship and to consider only whether a prudent owner, acting with a view to earning freight, would have executed the necessary repairs either wholly or in part. The court held that there was no misdirection, and it is with reference to this that Maule, J. made the observations which are relied upon as either substituting the "arithmetical" for the "prudent owner" test, or for limiting the measure in applying the prudent owner test to a contrast of the figures of cost of repairs and repaired value. There can be no doubt, to my mind, but that Bramwell and Martin, BB. in delivering their opinions in Rankin v. Potter (ubi sup.) both recognised the value of the damaged ship as an item which was to be taken into consideration in the application of the "prudent uninsured owner" test; and, more than that, recognised the value of the damaged ship as an item going to make up the total of the figures to be contrasted with repaired value. This view has been applied by Phillimore, J. in Beaver Line v. London and Provincial Marine and General Insurance Company (5 Com. Cas. 269), and by Walton, J. in Wild Rose Steamship Company v. Jupe (19 Times L. Rep. 289). It is to be observed that in Rankin v. Potter (ubi sup.) the item of value of the damaged ship was essential to the conclusion that there was a constructive total loss. You cannot get the required result without it. It is further to be noted that in Rankin v. Potter (ubi sup.) the ship was not, in fact, sold. It seems to me that, perhaps, the authorities could be reconciled if one took the rule to be that the shipowner could only take into consideration the value of the damaged ship if the cost of repairs approximated the repaired value. If the damage to the ship by the perils of the sea is so extensive that it is clear that the cost of repairs will approximate the repaired value, it would not be reasonably practicable to repair her if a substantial sum could be obtained for her as she is and where she is, seeing that the expense of repairs would be such that, under the circumstances, no man of common sense would incur the outlay. Such a ship, as a matter of business, is, in my opinion, totally lost. Take, however, the case where the damage is slight, and the cost of repairs is small relatively to the value of the ship. The shipowner, as a matter of business, would not take into consideration the necessarily high value of the slightly damaged ship unless, instead of desiring to minimise the loss incurred by the perils of the sea, he regarded the marine accident as affording a market enabling him to sell his ship at a profit. In my judgment, a case in which the cost of repairs and the value of the ship so nearly approximate as they do in the present case would be just a case in which the "prudent owner" test, applied as I have suggested, would do justice, which the mere comparison of figures would fail to do. But there is no case which has recognised this modification in the application of the "prudent owner" test, and one hesitates to introduce such a modification in the rules of law governing so widely extended a business as that of marine insurance under British law, although the application of the "prudent owner" test, as understood by Bramwell and Martin, BB. in their opinions in Rankin v. Potter (ubi sup.), and also by Lord Abinger in Young v. Turing (ubi sup.), might lead to the results pointed out in a note by the editors of the last edition of Arnould on Marine Insurance—Mr. de Hart and Mr. Ralph

Simey—following a suggestion by Mr. McArthur in his work on marine insurance. The particular suggestion in the last edition of Arnould's Marine Insurance is that neither on principle nor on authority can the value of the damaged vessel be taken into consideration. The editors' note to sect. 1124 runs thus: "Suppose a vessel comes into port requiring repairs costing 1000*l.*, her damaged value being 10,000*l.*, and her repaired value being 10,500*l.* This, according to the argument derived from Young v. Turing"—and, I would add, from the opinions of Bramwell and Martin, BB. in Rankin v. Potter—"would be a case of constructive total loss. But it is submitted that it is absurd to say a vessel is a total loss, whether constructively or otherwise, which is only damaged to the extent of 10 per cent. or less." The contention seems to be that the old test of a "prudent uninsured owner" was adopted at a time when there was no telegraph and the means of communication were difficult, and at a time when there was no salvage association ready to step in to salve the ship and take charge of her until she could reach a port where permanent repairs could be effectively executed, and where, therefore, the cost of the repairs could be measured either by the actual execution of the work or by reliable estimates obtained on invitations to tender. It is said that at the time of the adoption of the "prudent owner" test, the master, through difficulty of communication and inability to secure with any certainty means of repair, was in practice apt to consider seriously the question whether he should sell the materials of the ship, or the ship as she lay, rather than make the attempt to repair. But it is said that nowadays such a case rarely arises, and that when it does the old test can be applied; but that now the conveniences of modern times, telegraphic communication, the salvage associations, and Lloyd's agents everywhere, throw on the master but rarely the old alternative, repair or sell; and that in modern times the shipowner ought to guide his conduct as an insured owner desirous to have regard to the interests of all concerned, and that the damaged ship ought, whenever it is possible, to be taken to the port where permanent repairs can be effected, and the arithmetical test applied with something like precision. Such a rule seems to me too favourable to the underwriter. I think that this contention is open to the criticism that the shipowner at the moment of election, when he has to exercise the option of giving notice of abandonment, has really no precise data upon which to act, and that there must always be a quantity of items, especially the cost of the temporary repairs and the getting of the ship to the ports of temporary and permanent repair, as there were in the present case, which do not admit of precision. I doubt whether under the absolute arithmetical test the underwriter really takes upon himself the whole of the risks of the perils of the sea. I think it was a doubt of this sort which made lawyers of the United States of America adopt the 50 per cent. rule. The final result in this appeal, I think, must be that the judgment of Bigham, J. must be affirmed; first, because I doubt whether in any case we ought to reverse the decision of Bigham, J. on this question of marine insurance law, having regard to the state of the evidence as to the value of the damaged ship, the manner in which the point was taken at the end of the trial, and the mode in which it was disposed of by the learned judge, and I am not prepared to do so. Secondly, even though my opinion were stronger than it is, I should not like to differ from my brethren on a point which does not properly arise on the evidence. I, therefore, do not differ from the judgment of my brethren that the judgment of Bigham, J. must be affirmed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree that in this case we ought to accept the conclusion of fact of Bigham, J. It is therefore to be taken that the value of the ship, when repaired, exceeded the expense of repairs by a sum of about 700*l.* or 750*l.* The learned judge arrived at a smaller figure, but I understand it to have been conceded in argument that some consequential corrections which would have been the result of his determination would have brought it to the figure I have mentioned. It is then contended that the loss ought nevertheless to be treated as a constructive total loss, because the value of the ship as she lay on the rocks exceeded that sum, so that a prudent uninsured shipowner would have sold her rather than repaired her. Bigham, J. rejected that contention, saying that there had not been adduced any evidence as to that value on which he could act. Now, the evidence stood thus: no one was called on behalf of the plaintiff to show what the value of the ship was at the time. Naturally none of the plaintiff's witnesses was cross-examined on the subject, nor has there been any evidence of these matters adduced by the defendants. In truth the plaintiff seems to have launched his case in the expectation that he would be able to satisfy the judge that the cost of repairs would exceed the value of the ship when repaired, and it was only when he failed in satisfying the learned judge on that point that he fell back on this question of the value of the ship, and he now seeks to establish the amount from expressions which occur in the correspondence and in the light of subsequent events. I think there is much to be said in favour of the view taken by Bigham, J. I think mere estimates of value not made at the time ought, in a case of this kind, to be closely scrutinised by the court, and I hesitate to rely on inference with respect to a matter in which direct evidence can be given. I am not, therefore, persuaded that it would be right to overrule the decision of Bigham, J., and this would be sufficient to dispose of the case, so far as I am concerned.

But a question of law has been argued, and unfortunately on it different views are entertained by my brethren, and it may be right, therefore, that I should express the opinion that I have formed. The case of Young v. Turing (ubi sup.) was decided in the year 1841 in the Exchequer Chamber, and Lord Abinger in giving the judgment of the court said: "The Chief Justice has laid down the usual and recognised rule that the jury ought to consider whether, under all the circumstances attending the ship, a prudent owner, if uninsured, would have repaired the vessel." Then he says: "Now to the value of the repairs must be added her value as she lay in the dock." It is upon that observation that the argument in this case is founded. It is to be observed it is a mere dictum: it was not necessary for the decision of the case, and, so far as appears from the report, did not form the subject of argument before the court. Now, in 1847 there was decided the case of Irving v. Manning (ubi sup.) in the House of Lords, and Patteson, J., who delivered the opinion of the learned judges who advised the House, says: "The course has been in all cases in modern times to consider the loss as total where a prudent owner, uninsured, would not have repaired." And again at a later point he says: "The established mode of putting the question, when it is alleged that there has been, what is perhaps improperly called, a constructive total loss of a ship, is to consider the policy altogether out of the question, and to inquire what a prudent uninsured owner would have done in the state in which the vessel was placed by the perils insured against. If he would not have repaired the vessel, it is deemed to be lost." In 1850 the case was decided of Moss v. Smith (ubi sup.), in which the question was very much considered, and judgments were given which are constantly referred to in subsequent cases. Maule, J. says: "If a ship sustains such extensive damage that it would not be reasonably practicable to repair her—seeing that the expense of repairs would be such that no man of common sense would incur the outlay—the ship is said to be totally lost. It is in that way alone that the question as to what a prudent owner would do arises. However damaged the ship may be, if it be practicable to repair her, so as to enable her to complete the adventure, she is not totally lost. The ordinary measure of prudence which the courts have adopted is this—if the ship, when repaired, will not be worth the sum which it would be necessary to expend upon her, the repairs are, practically speaking, impossible, and it is a case of total loss." Wilde, C.J. says this: "The underwriter undertakes to indemnify the owner against a loss of freight by perils of the sea. The law has fixed the meaning of this warranty against sea-damage in such distinct terms, that, for many years, every contract of insurance has been made with reference to the known and recognised principle, that a ship is prevented from performing her voyage, and consequently from earning freight, when she has sustained damage which can only be repaired at an expense which no prudent owner uninsured would incur; and that is when the outlay will exceed that which he will get by it—viz., when the ship, after the repairs are executed, will not be worth the sum which has been expended upon her." Now, it seems to me that in that case the court defined, as Maule, J. points out, the standard—the measure of prudence—which the courts have adopted with reference to such a case. In the year 1854 there was published the third edition of Phillips on Marine Insurance, and at sect. 1534 the learned author states the law thus: "In English jurisprudence the right to make an abandonment of the ship is governed by the rule just stated—namely, that the right to abandon on account of the damage and expense merely accrues where, and only where, the ship when recovered or repaired will not be worth the expense necessarily to be incurred for the purpose of recovering or repairing it." Then he adds: "This rule has reference to a case in which the amount merely determines the character of the loss. Other circumstances may come into consideration in determining the loss to be partial or total." I do not propose to go in any detail through the subsequent cases, but it appears to me that, notwithstanding the observations of Bramwell and Martin, B.B. in advising the House of Lords in Rankin v. Potter (ubi sup.), to which my Lord has referred, the weight of authority is in favour of the view which is based on the decision in Moss v. Smith (ubi sup.) and which is expressed in the language which I have just cited from Phillips on Marine Insurance. I should like, however, to refer particularly to the case of Aitchison v. Lohre (ubi sup.), where the question of whether or not there was a constructive total loss was discussed by the House of Lords. Lord Blackburn, in dealing with the point, says: "I think it convenient to pause here and inquire what would have been the loss to an uninsured owner from the perils of the seas under such circumstances." He then says: "If such an uninsured owner chose to sell the hull as it lay, his position would be this," and he goes through a calculation by which he arrives at a loss, amounting to 2521*l.*, and then he says: "And if the hull had been so damaged that to repair it would have cost more than the ship would, when repaired, have been worth, the prudent shipowner would have taken this course." Then he adds: "But in fact he not only could, but did repair it." Then he goes into a second calculation in which he ascertains the loss, having reference to the repairs and expenditure necessary for the purpose of repairing, and the value of the ship when repaired, and he arrives at an amount of loss which is smaller than that which he ascertained would have been suffered if a sale had been made. As I understand the figures, the result would have been the same whether the value of the vessel as the ship lay is taken into consideration or not, and therefore it appears to me not to be a decision which guides us in the present case. But the way in which the learned Lord lays down the law in a subsequent passage appears to me to agree with that which was contended for by the respondents to this appeal. He says: "The owner of an insured ship which is so damaged that, though it is capable of repair, the expense of repairing it will exceed its value, may treat the ship as totally lost, and recover a total loss, the underwriters who pay that total loss being entitled to all that is saved. The assured is not, even then, bound to do so. But if the ship can be practically repaired within the meaning of that phrase, as explained by Maule, J. in Moss v. Smith, the assured has not the option to treat it as a total loss; and on the figures stated in the special case the respondent here had not that option." It appears to me that the learned Lord there adopts the mode of stating the case which is laid down in the judgments of Moss v. Smith (ubi sup.), and the law as laid down in the same manner, as it seems to me, by Lord Watson in a subsequent case in the House of Lords in Sailing Ship Blairmore Company v. Macredie (ubi sup.). For these reasons I have arrived at the conclusion which I have stated. I only wish to add this, that I do not say that evidence of value in such cases as these can be entirely excluded, and therefore I do not differ from Phillimore, J. and Walton, J. in what they did in the cases before them, because their decisions were only on the admissibility of evidence. It may be that evidence of the value of the ship as a wreck might be material in ascertaining the question of fact whether or not there was a total loss. I agree, therefore, with the judgment that has been given.

MATHEW, L.J. read the following judgment:—The plaintiff sought to establish his right to abandon to the underwriters by evidence that the costs of the repairs of the ship would exceed the repaired value. Bigham, J. decided that the plaintiff had failed, and that there was no constructive total loss. It has not been easy to follow the steps of the learned judge through a mass of evidence and argument submitted to him in the course of a trial that lasted over five days. The vessel was insured by a time policy for 23,000*l.*, and by the terms of the policy the insured value of the ship was to be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel was a constructive total loss. The vessel, while covered by the policy, was cast ashore on the coast of Sicily, and upon news of the disaster the assured gave a notice of abandonment which the underwriters declined to accept. With the consent of all concerned salvage operations were undertaken by the salvage association, and the ship was floated and brought to Malta at a cost of 3500*l.* In her damaged condition she was worth about 7000*l.* Under the superintendence of surveyors, who represented the plaintiff and the underwriters, temporary repairs to enable the vessel to be brought home were done at a cost of about 550*l.* The learned judge has found that the repairs were properly done. The underwriters had provided a sum of 1475*l.* to cover the expenses of the voyage home. This sum, added to the value of the damaged ship, could be insured from Malta to a home port for 150*l.* The vessel sailed from Malta, but in a few hours, as it would seem from some peril of the sea, her steering gear gave way, and she was obliged to put into Tunis. Further repairs were found to be necessary, which were done at a cost of 218*l.* A tug was sent out from England to bring the vessel home at a cost of 750*l.* She was brought safely to Barry, and a tender was obtained to cover all necessary repairs. These sums of 218*l.* and 750*l.* would be covered by the insurance from Malta to a home port, and were held by the learned judge not to be charges which the owner would have had to meet. At the trial accounts were put in which had been prepared to show the plaintiff's estimate of the costs of reinstating the ship. The total amounted to the very large sum of 26,222*l.* These figures were reduced by the learned judge to 22,559*l.* In the discussion before us the items allowed on the one hand and struck out on the other were objected to, and we were asked to review the decision of Bigham, J. as to the cost of repairs. But I see no reason to differ from the conclusion that 22,559*l.* was a proper estimate of the outlay necessary to reinstate the ship.

But it was contended for the plaintiff that, upon the assumption that the entire cost of repairs did not exceed the sum of 22,559*l.*, the plaintiff was nevertheless entitled to treat the loss as total. It was argued that the question to be determined was whether or not a prudent uninsured owner would abandon the adventure and sell the wreck as she lay on the rocks. In arriving at a conclusion on this subject, the owner, it was said, would take into account the value of the damaged vessel, and would certainly sell rather than repair. I am unable to agree with this reasoning. The solution of the question whether there is a constructive total loss may sometimes be helped by considering what a prudent owner would do, where, for instance, a stranded vessel is immediately sold on the ground that salvage operations were difficult and the result uncertain. But it seems to me in such a case as the present, where the actual costs of repairs have been ascertained and are not a matter of estimate, the matter cannot be dealt with on that footing. The question is not what an owner would consider the course most advantageous to himself. What has to be determined is to what extent the ship has been damaged by the perils insured against, and thus to settle whether the loss is partial or total. It is total if the prosecution of the voyage has become commercially impracticable. In recent times, with the readier means of communication open to underwriters, the condition of a stranded ship is rarely left to mere speculation. When notice of abandonment has been given the skilled agents of the underwriters are enabled to visit the vessel, and they can generally form a sound judgment as to whether the ship can be saved. Where there is a fair prospect of reinstatement, salvage operations are undertaken on behalf of the insurers without requiring the owner to incur any expense. In this case the usual course was followed. The salvage operations succeeded, and the underwriters satisfied the learned judge that the loss was partial and not total. They arrived at this result by showing that the cost of rendering the ship as serviceable as she was when insured was less than the repaired value. The argument that the real question was what an imaginary owner would do when his vessel was still on the rocks seems to me not to be open to the plaintiff. Any such general principle would seriously prejudice underwriters, and might impose upon them losses which were not due to the perils insured against. The test applicable here is that sanctioned in the many decisions referred to by counsel for the underwriters from Moss v. Smith (ubi sup.) to Sailing Ship Blairmore Company v. Macredie (ubi sup.). The rule seems to me to have been properly applied by Bigham, J. But it was further urged for the plaintiff that, in determining the question of the right to abandon, the value of the damaged ship should be added to the cost of repairs. With this addition the valuation fixed by the policy would be largely exceeded. The application of this supposed mode of calculation would seem to involve unreasonable results, for, in adjusting the amount the assured could recover under his policy, what is saved from the perils insured against is treated as having been lost. The authority relied upon by the plaintiff's counsel was a dictum of Lord Abinger in his judgment in Young v. Turing (2 M. & G., at p. 601). It was admitted that the point had not been dealt with in that case, either at Nisi Prius or in the Court of Common Pleas, and the observation of the Chief Baron was not necessary for the decision of the court. Further, that with the exception of the recent judgments at Nisi Prius referred to in the argument, the authority of Young v. Turing (ubi sup.) upon this point had not been judicially approved. It is noticeable that at the trial no evidence was offered to show that average adjusters acted upon any such rule. The subject is discussed unfavourably to the plaintiff's contention in 2 Phillips on Insurance, s. 1534; Carver's Carriage by Sea, 3rd edit., s. 303; and 2 Arnould on Marine Insurance, 7th edit., s. 1124. I am of opinion that the plaintiff's contention fails, and that in determining whether the ship can be repaired the assured is not entitled to add the damaged value of the ship to the cost of repairs.

AKTIESELSKABET INGLEWOOD v. MILLAR'S KARRI AND JARRAH FORESTS LIMITED. (a)

Charter-party—Demurrage—Load as customary always afloat—Draught insufficient to complete loading—Obstacles to loading caused by charterers—Lay days.

By a charter-party a ship was to proceed to B. or so near thereto as she could safely get, and there load as customary, always afloat, at such wharf, jetty, or anchorage as the charterers' agent might direct, a certain cargo.

Owing to her draught the ship could not have loaded fully at the berth at the jetty, but according to the custom of the port she would be moved when partly loaded from the jetty to an anchorage to complete loading.

Held, that the lay days did not begin to run until the ship was at the jetty or anchorage the charterers' agent directed, and that the fact that she could not fully load there made no difference and did not prevent the charterers requiring her to come to the jetty and claiming that the lay days did not commence until she was at the jetty.

If a ship is prevented from going to the loading place which the charterer has a right to name by obstacles caused by the charterer or in consequence of the engagements of the charterer, the lay days commence to count as soon as the ship is ready to load and would but for such obstacles or engagements begin to load at such place.

COMMERCIAL CAUSE.

The plaintiffs' claim was for demurrage of their ship Inglewood against the defendants as charterers.

By a charter-party dated the 20th Nov. 1900 the defendants chartered the plaintiffs' ship to proceed to Bunbury or so near thereto as she might safely get, and there load as customary, always afloat, at such wharf, jetty, or anchorage as the charterers' agent may direct, a cargo of karri and (or) jarrah timber, and, being loaded, to proceed as ordered to a port in the United Kingdom.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B.] AKTIESELSKABET INGLEWOOD v. MILLAR'S KARRI AND JARRAH FORESTS LIM. [K.B.]

It was provided by the charter-party as follows:

Twenty-eight weather-working days, Sundays and holidays excepted, are to be allowed . . . for sending the cargo alongside . . . commencing twenty-four hours after written notice has been given of ship being wholly clear of ballast and ready to take in cargo.

The ship arrived at Bunbury, Western Australia, on the 26th May 1901.

She was ready in all respects, and notice was given by the captain on the 27th May, at that time the ship being moored in the outer harbour.

On the 28th May she was ordered by the charterers' agent to the jetty.

All the other material facts and the arguments of counsel appear in his Lordship's judgment.

KENNEDY, J. read the following written judgment:—I am of opinion that in construing this charter-party I am bound by the authorities, and especially by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Tharsis Copper Company v. Morel (65 L. T. Rep. 659; 7 Asp. Mar. Cas. 106; (1891) 2 Q. B. 647), followed by Collins, J. in Sanders v. Jenkins (1897) 1 Q. B. 93, to hold that under the words stating the shipowner's undertaking—viz., to "load as customary, always afloat, at such wharf, jetty, or anchorage as the charterers' agents may direct"—the effect is the same as if the jetty or anchorage had been named in the charter-party, so that the twenty-eight lay days, in the absence of special circumstances, would not run until the Inglewood had got to the jetty or anchorage. Mr. Carver, for the plaintiffs, contended that they began to run as soon as the Inglewood was, according to the master's notice to the charterers given on the 27th May (the day after her arrival at Bunbury), and when she was lying at a mooring buoy in the outer harbour, ready to load. I find myself unable to adopt this view after the decision of the Court of Appeal to which I have referred. I agree with Mr. Carver that the words in the cancelling clause "in all respects ready for loading" would be satisfied by a readiness to load anywhere in the port. But the purview of this clause is different from the purview of the demurrage clause; and, if the charterers possess, as they do here, a right to order the ship to a particular place of loading in the port, I think that I must hold that "ready to take in cargo" in the demurrage clause means ready alongside the ordered place of loading. When the charterers in this case ordered the Inglewood, as they did, to load at the jetty, the jetty became the place of loading, as though it had been originally named in the charter-party; and in the absence, as I have said, of special circumstances, the lay days could not commence until the Inglewood was ready to take in cargo at that place.

Two grounds for not applying the general rule were relied upon by the plaintiffs. First, that the jetty was not a place at which the Inglewood could "take on board all her cargo always afloat." This is true. Owing to her draught when partly loaded she was a ship which must be moved after being partly loaded from the jetty to an anchorage, as in fact she was moved on the 3rd July. But I do not think that this in itself prevented the defendants from requiring her to come to the jetty and claiming that the lay days did not commence till she arrived at the jetty. To load part of the cargo at the jetty at one or more berths there, and part afterwards at the anchorage, was, upon the evidence, a way, though not the most usual way, of loading at Bunbury. The words "load in the customary manner always afloat" have been interpreted by Lord Watson in Carlton Steamship Company v. Castle Mail Packets Company (78 L. T. Rep. 661; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 402; (1898) A. C. 486). "These words," he says, "according to their natural meaning, go no further than to impose a qualification of the charterer's right to load, by negating his right to put cargo on board except at times when the ship is afloat." I know of no authority compelling me to hold, nor do I consider that it would be a reasonable meaning to put upon this charter-party, that the charterer, in order to exercise properly his right to name a place of loading, when the loading and lay days are to commence, must name a place where all the cargo is to be put on board. I see nothing to prevent the charterer from ordering her to be shifted, as her safety in loading or convenience may require, to a better or more convenient berth either at the jetty or at an anchorage, for the further prosecution or the completion of the loading. The lay days here are a fixed number of days, and the shipowner therefore is amply protected, directly the vessel has been, in the first instance, taken to the loading place, so that her lay days commence to run. Directly that event has happened the charterer becomes bound to complete the loading, wherever it is done, within a definite time.

The second circumstance relied upon by the plaintiffs is a different one. If a ship is prevented from going to the loading place, which the charterer has the right to name, by obstacles caused by the charterer or in consequence of the engagements of the charterer, the lay days commence to count as soon as the ship is ready to load, and would, but for such obstacles or engagements, begin to load at that place. This is in substance the proposition deduced, and, in my opinion, rightly deduced, from the cases, by Mr. Carver in his work on Carriage by Sea, 3rd edit., s. 627. The law is stated by Barnes, J. in Ogmore Steamship Company v. Borner and Co. (6 Com. Cas. 110): "It appears to follow that if the charterers have other vessels which they have to discharge, and have arranged to discharge, in the dock before the vessel which by the charter is to proceed to the dock, and by the practice of the port will not be admitted into the dock while the charterers have the other vessels in the way, the charterers do prevent the shipowners from performing their contract until the charterers have cleared away the impediments." In Watson v. Borner and Co. (5 Com. Cas. 377) the particular facts were held not to justify the application of the principle; but at p. 379 the existence of the principle is stated by Lord Halsbury, L.C.: "No doubt if the charterers had presented any impediment preventing performance of the shipowners' obligation different considerations might have arisen." In the later case of Harrowing v. Dupré (7 Com. Cas. 157) my brother Bigham cites Barnes, J.'s statement of the law without expressing any dissent,

K.B. DIV.]

BOARD OF TRADE v. SAILING SHIP GLENPARK.

whilst holding that the facts of Harrowing v. Dupré gave no room for the contention which the plaintiffs sought to found upon it. What are the facts in the present case? On the 27th May, when the plaintiffs' captain gave notice of readiness to load, the defendants might have wholly loaded the Inglewood by means of lighters where she then lay. Such a course, though the less ordinary, was not an unprecedented method of loading at Bunbury. The defendants' manager at Bunbury says that the only reason why the steam lighter did not lighter cargo to the Inglewood in the stream was because he had told the captain to bring the vessel to the jetty. He had a perfect right to exercise the charter-party option in that way. The mere fact that there were no free berths on the east, the only practicable side of the jetty did not disentitle him from so exercising his option, for the charter-party contains no provisions entitling the shipowner to have a "free" or "ready" wharf or berth nominated by the charterer. Nor was there any permanent physical obstruction preventing the ship from getting to the jetty, so as to make the exercising by the charterer of his option as to the place of loading no real exercise of the option at all. But then comes in a consideration which seems to me materially to affect the rights and obligations of the parties. Of the four available berths on the eastern side of the jetty, which it is admitted here was the only side which was practically available for a vessel like the Inglewood at that time, three were taken up by the charterers' vessels which the charterers were themselves loading, so that in ordering the Inglewood to the jetty he was ordering her not merely to a jetty to which she could not go because other vessels were there, but to which she could not go because other vessels of the charterers were there. But for engagements made by him in relation to those other vessels the jetty would have been open to the Inglewood. Further, according to the evidence, there was nothing to prevent the charterer, if he chose, from making room for the Inglewood at the jetty by ordering any one of his other vessels at the jetty to complete loading at the anchorage. The evidence showed that vessels do so complete their loading, as, in fact, the Inglewood afterwards did on this voyage—and, indeed, vessels beyond a certain draught must do so, as they could not lie afloat at the jetty when fully loaded. I have no evidence of the particular contracts which the charterers had with regard to their other vessels. I cannot presume that they were prevented by the terms of any of the contracts from ordering them to make room for the Inglewood and complete their loading at the anchorage. The harbour-master's permission would be required, but there is no suggestion that if it had been asked for it would have been refused. In these circumstances I think that the principle stated by Barnes, J. applies, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to count the lay days as from the 28th May. But if they so commenced the master of the Inglewood had no right whatever to refuse to proceed to the jetty at the beginning of June, when the Gudrun, one of the vessels at the jetty, was temporarily moved away to the ballast ground. Whatever the uncertainty of the length of the Gudrun's absence might be, the master of the Inglewood had no right, in my judgment, if his lay days had begun to run, to refuse to give the charterers the opportunity of putting cargo on board the Inglewood at the jetty. How much could have been loaded in the time is disputed, but I think that the defendants are justly entitled to a liberal interpretation of the evidence, and I hold that 150 tons might have been loaded. Taking this view, and omitting from the total of lay days days which were not weather-working days and Sundays, but including Saturdays—for I cannot accept the defendants' view that Saturdays should be treated as holidays within the exception clause—I find that there were six days' demurrage, in respect of which the plaintiffs, at the charter-party rate, are entitled to 73l. 8s. 6d.

Judgment accordingly.

BOARD OF TRADE v. SAILING SHIP
GLENPARK. (a)

Seaman—Distressed—Wages in excess of expenses—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 193—Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44), s. 4.

A seaman shipwrecked abroad is no less a "distressed seaman" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts, because the wages due to him and paid to him abroad are in excess of the expenses incurred for his maintenance and passage home.

Production of the account of the expenses mentioned in sect. 193 (3) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 and proof of its payment are conclusive evidence of the right of the Board of Trade to recover such expenses.

ACTION.

The defendants were the registered owners of the Glenpark, a British ship within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

In May 1900 the Glenpark left Barry (Cardiff) on a voyage to Cape Town and (or) any ports or places within the limits of 75 degrees north and 60 degrees south latitude, the maximum time to be three years' trading in any rotation and to end in the United Kingdom or continent of Europe between the Elbe and Brest inclusive, at master's option.

On the 29th Jan. 1901 the Glenpark, in the course of the voyage left Port Germein, in South Australia, on a voyage to Algoa Bay, her crew consisting of twenty-six hands all told—nameiy, master, two mates, cook, steward, carpenter, sailmaker, boatswain, five apprentices (one of whom acted as third mate), twelve A.B.s, and one ordinary seaman.

On the 1st Feb. 1901 the Glenpark struck on a sunken rock near Wedge Island, in Spencer Gulf, South Australia, and became a total wreck. The crew lost the whole of their effects except the clothes they were wearing, but were saved and taken in the ship's boats to Port Victoria, in South Australia, arriving there on the 2nd Feb. 1901.

The log and agreement with the crew were lost with the vessel.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Between the 2nd and the 4th Feb. 1901 the crew were subsisted at Port Victoria by the Governor of South Australia on behalf of the Crown, acting by the Marine Board of South Australia, at a cost (excluding that incurred in respect of the master) of 13*l.* 1*s.*

On the 4th Feb. 1901 the crew were provided with passages from Port Victoria to Port Adelaide by the same authority at a cost (excluding that incurred in respect of the master) of 20*l.* 16*s.*

The crew on their arrival on the 4th Feb. at Port Adelaide were (except the master) subsisted there by the same authority at a cost of 26*l.* 5*s.*, and were also provided by the same authority with necessary clothing.

On the 6th Feb. 1901 the representatives of the owners of the Glenpark at Port Adelaide, in the presence of the superintendent of the Mercantile Marine Board of South Australia paid each member of the crew the balance of wages due to him under the agreement with the crew up to the time the vessel was lost.

The majority of the crew obtained employment at Port Adelaide, but eight members thereof failed to obtain any employment, and were provided with passages to the United Kingdom by the same authority at a cost of 63*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*

As regards the members of the crew (excluding the master) the total expenses incurred on their behalf by the authority were altogether the sum of 236*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*

The Board of Trade, on behalf of the Crown, paid the sum of 236*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.* to the authority as money due to them in respect of expenses incurred on account of distressed seamen within the meaning of sect. 193 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and the Board of Trade contended that they were entitled, on behalf of the Crown, to recover the whole of that sum from the defendants under the same section.

The defendants paid to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs accepted without prejudice, various sums amounting in all to 136*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* in respect of the expenses of members of the crew, fourteen in number, and with regard to the expenses of such members the defendants admitted liability, and no question of further payment in reference to such members arose.

As regards these fourteen members of the crew, the wages so paid to them were in every case less than the amount expended on their behalf as hereinbefore mentioned. The sum of 136*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* was, in fact, greater by 1*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* than the amount of the expenses, but the difference was for the purpose of this case to be treated as immaterial.

The balance of the total sum of 236*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*—namely, 99*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*—had never been paid to the plaintiffs by the defendants in whole or in part, and the plaintiffs now claimed such balance from the defendants in this action.

Such balance represented the amount of expenses incurred on behalf of the eleven remaining members of the crew other than the fourteen members above mentioned, the wages paid to whom as aforesaid were in every case greater than the expenses so incurred.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60):

Sect. 193 (1). Where any expenses on account of any such distressed seaman or apprentice as follows—namely: (a) Any seaman or apprentice belonging to a British ship who has been discharged or left behind abroad without full compliance on the part of the master with provisions in that behalf in this Act contained.

b) A subject of Her Majesty who has been engaged to serve in a ship belonging to the Government or to a subject or citizen of a foreign country either for his maintenance, necessary clothing, conveyance home, or, in case of death, for his burial or otherwise in accordance with this Act, are incurred by or on behalf of the Crown, or are incurred by the government of a foreign country and repaid to that Government by or on behalf of the Crown, those expenses together with the wages, if any, due to the seaman or apprentice, shall be a charge upon the ship, whether British or foreign, to which such distressed seaman or apprentice belonged and shall be a debt to the Crown from the master of the ship or from the owner of the ship for the time being, and also if the ship be a foreign ship from the person, whether principal or agent, who engaged the seaman or apprentice for service in the ship. (2) The debt in addition to any fines which may have been incurred may be recovered by the Board of Trade on behalf of the Crown either by ordinary process of law or in the court and manner in which wages may be recovered by seamen. (3) In any proceeding for such recovery the production of the account (if any) of the expenses furnished in accordance with this Act or the distressed seamen regulations, and proof of payment of the expenses by or on behalf of the Board of Trade shall be sufficient evidence that the expenses were incurred or repaid under this Act by or on behalf of the Crown.

By the Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44):

Sect. 4. Sect. 193 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (which relates to the recovery of expenses incurred on account of distressed seamen) shall extend to expenses incurred under that Act on account of any distressed seamen within the meaning of that Act except where it is certified in pursuance of sect. 188 of the Act that the cause of a seaman being left behind is desertion or disappearance, and paragraphs (a) and (b) in subsect. 1 of the said sect. 193 shall be repealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir E. Carson, K.C.), and H. Sutton for the Board of Trade.—The question here turns upon the construction of certain sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 as amended by the Act of 1898. Sects. 184 and 185 deal with “destitute” seamen, and they are so described, and are Lascars and coloured seamen. Sects. 186 to 189 are concerned with “leaving seamen abroad.” Under sect. 186 it is clear and unambiguous that where the service of a seaman belonging to a British ship terminates abroad he is entitled to his wages and his passage home at the expense of the owners. They referred to sects. 187, 188, and 189. Sect. 189 (7) (c) excepts such expenses as the owner or master is by this Act required to pay. That, we submit, refers to sect. 193 and sect. 207. The next group of sections runs from sect. 190 to sect. 194, and deals with “distressed” seamen. Sect. 190 gives the Board of Trade power to make regulations as to the maintenance and relief of distressed seamen. Sect. 191 contains provisions for their maintenance and relief, and by sect. 192 masters of British ships are compelled to take distressed seamen. They referred to sect. 193. The duty of determining whether those persons fall within the description of distressed seamen is cast upon the Board of Trade, and the production of the account of the expenses and proof of the payment of those expenses by the Board of Trade is conclusive.

[K. B. Div.]

BOARD OF TRADE v. SAILING SHIP GLENPARK.

[K. B. Div.]

They referred to sects. 207 and 208. That is the law as it stood in 1894. They referred to

Sect. 193 of the Act of 1894 as amended by this section is sufficient to cover this case. It cannot make any difference on this point as to whether a man is a distressed seaman or not, whether his wages have been paid to him. These men were in every sense distressed. They were absolutely destitute, for they had come on shore with nothing except the clothes they wore, and the authorities were bound under the Act to relieve and maintain them. It is clear from the statute that the words "distressed seamen" are used for the purpose of denoting sailors who by reason of shipwreck will have to incur expenditure for their maintenance and return home, and such a seaman does not cease to be distressed because the amount of his wages has been paid to him. He is distressed by the fact that he has to maintain himself in a foreign place, and has to find his way home. The word used here is not "destitute."

Danckwerts, K.C. and Leslie Scott for the defendants.—Here the service terminated by the wreck, and consequently under sect. 158 the seaman was entitled to be paid his wages up to date. If the wages are not paid then the seaman can be distressed, and the fact that the seaman is entitled to wages makes no difference, but while he has sufficient money to support himself he cannot be distressed. With regard to sect. 193 (3), the account is only to be evidence, not conclusive evidence. The word "sufficient" was considered in Barraclough v. Greenhaugh (8 B. & S. 623; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 612), and it was held that it did not mean "conclusive." They also referred to

Northard v. Pepper, 10 L. T. Rep. 782; 17 C. B. N. S. 39;

Reg. v. Fordham, L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 501.

The Solicitor-General in reply.

BIGHAM, J.—The first question which I have to determine in this case is whether those men who received wages in excess of the expenses incurred on their behalf were "distressed seamen" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60). The defendants say that they were not, upon the ground that the Act was not intended to assist men who are in a position to assist themselves. It is necessary, therefore, to look at the terms of the Act. Part 2 deals with the rights and duties of owners, masters, and crews of seagoing ships registered in the United Kingdom. One subdivision of this part is headed "Distressed Seamen," and it comprises sects. 190 to 193 of the Act inclusive. By sect. 190 the Board of Trade is empowered to make regulations for the relief, maintenance, and sending home of seamen found in distress abroad; and the section enacts that no seaman shall have any right to be relieved, maintained, or sent home except in the cases provided by those regulations. In pursuance of the directions in this section, the Board of Trade has made regulations, and by No. 86 it is declared that the persons to be relieved shall include seafaring persons who, having been engaged in merchant ships, are shipwrecked and found in distress in foreign ports. No relief, however, is to be afforded to shipwrecked seamen who refuse to work their passage home or who refuse to accept reasonable employment (regulation No. 90), nor are shipwrecked seamen who stand by the wreck to salvage property to be considered as distressed seamen during the time they are so earning money (regulation No. 95). Thus the regulations mention who are and who are not to receive relief. Then sect. 191 of the Act directs how distressed seamen are to be relieved. The duty of affording the relief is cast upon governors, Consular officers, and others who are named in the section, and who are referred to in the Act as the authorities. This section directs such authority to find a passage home for, and in the meantime to maintain, any seamen who, by reason of having been shipwrecked, are in distress in any place abroad, and enacts that the authority shall be paid, in respect of the expenses incurred, such sums as the Board of Trade may allow. Sect. 193, as amended by sect. 4 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44), directs that the amount of such expenses shall be a debt to the Crown from the shipowner and shall be recoverable by the Board of Trade on behalf of the Crown by ordinary process of law. These are all the material provisions, and there is nothing in any of them which in terms excludes from the category of distressed seamen those who, being shipwrecked, happen at the date of the disaster to be entitled to arrears of wages. Nor do I find anything from which I can imply such an intention. In a sense, no doubt, a shipwrecked sailor who happens to have money in his pocket, or a valuable ring on his finger, or a right to arrears of wages is not in so bad a plight as his shipmate who has none of these advantages; but both of them are, in my opinion, "seamen who by reason of having been shipwrecked are in distress" within the meaning of sect. 191 and of regulation No. 86. If the Legislature had intended to exclude from the benefits of the Act men who had means of their own at their command I think it would have said so. In the connection now under consideration the definition of distress is not to be found in the man's slender purse, but in the fact that he has been cast from his ship in a foreign country. I therefore come to the conclusion that all the men mentioned in this case were "distressed seamen" within the meaning of the Act.

Another question was raised during the argument—namely, whether the production of the account of the expenses, together with proof of payment thereof by the Board of Trade, was not of itself conclusive against the defendants. Having regard to the view I take on the first point, it is not necessary for me to decide this question; but I think it better to do so, for I may thereby save difficulty in future cases. By sub-sect. 3 of sect. 193 of the principal Act it is provided that in any proceedings for the recovery of the debt the production of the account (if any) of the expenses furnished in accordance with this Act or the distressed seamen regulations, and proof of payment of the expenses by or on behalf of the Board of Trade shall be sufficient evidence that the expenses were incurred or repaid under this Act by or on behalf of the Crown. I think "sufficient evidence" here means conclusive evidence, and for these reasons: The authority who makes the payments in the first instance acts in the interest of the shipowner as well as in that of the seamen. This is shown by such regulations as the 91st, 96th, and 97th, which direct the authority to confine the relief to what is actually necessary. And by sub-sect. 4 of sect. 191 the Board of Trade has a right to revise the account and to disallow in favour of the shipowner such items as it may think fit. The authority abroad and the Board of Trade at home are both to protect the shipowner from any undue burden. With provisions such as these for his protection I do not think the Legislature meant to allow the shipowner to dispute either the propriety of the demand made upon him or its amount. The production of the account and proof of its payment are therefore, in my opinion, meant by sub-sect. 3 of sect. 193 to be conclusive of the right of the Board of Trade to recover.

FARRELL (app.) v. SUNDERLAND STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED (resps.) (a)

Revenue—Income tax—Ship owned by company and other persons—Two assessments.

The S. Steamship Company owned the steamship B. and fifty-nine sixty-fourths of the steamship G., the remaining five sixty-fourths being owned by other persons.

Held, that the company was rightly assessed by two assessments, one in respect of the steamship B. and the other in respect of the steamship G., as the latter was an adventure carried on by them jointly with other persons within the third rule, applying to both the first and second cases under sect. 100 of the Income Tax Act 1842.

CASE stated by the Commissioners for the Income Tax Acts on an appeal by the respondents against assessments of 3101l. and 4951l. made under sched. D for the year ending April 1902, the first of such assessments being in respect of the steamship Glendochart, and the second in respect of the steamship Brookside.

The steamship Brookside was owned entirely by the respondents, and was the only boat owned by them or in which they held any interest from April 1897 to April 1900. During this period the steamship Glendochart was owned as follows: One person, twenty-four shares; one person, twenty-one shares; seventeen persons, one share each; one person, two shares; and was managed on behalf of the owners by Messrs. Crosby and Co.

In May 1900 the respondents purchased fifty-nine sixty-fourths in the steamship Glendochart, and thereupon became her principal owners and took over her management and kept her accounts.

The average profits of the steamship Brookside for 1898, 1899, and 1900 was 4951l., being the assessment for the year 1901-1902.

The profits in respect of the steamship Glendochart for the seven and a quarter months ending the 31st Dec. 1900 amounted to 1874l., which would be 3101l. for twelve months, which was the amount of the assessment for the year 1901-1902.

The respondents claimed that there should be only one assessment and not two, and that such assessment should be in respect of the business or concern carried on by them, and should be for one year's profits calculated upon the average of the total profits of the respondents during the three years ending the 31st Dec. 1900, arrived at as follows:

Profits of steamship Brookside	£	s.	d.	£	s.	d.
for twelve months ending the 31st Dec. 1898	...	...	...	4109	0	0
Ditto for twelve months ending the 31st Dec. 1899	...	...	...	4878	0	0
Ditto for twelve months ending the 31st Dec. 1900	...	...	...	5566	0	0
Fifty-nine sixty-fourths of 1874l. profits of the steamship Glendochart for seven and a quarter months ending the 31st Dec. 1900	...	...	...	1726	0	0
					£5526	6

The respondents submitted that if necessary a separate assessment should be made upon the manager of the respondents as representing the arrears of the remaining five sixty-fourths of the steamship Glendochart in respect of their profits.

The appellants contended that as the steamship Glendochart was not the sole property of the company and was a concern carried on by two or more persons jointly, and so it must be treated as a separate concern and be assessed separately.

The commissioners were of opinion that the fifty-nine sixty-fourths of the steamship Glendochart, having come into possession of the respondents in the ordinary way of a business already carried on and, as it were, as a mere extension or expansion of such business, the accounts for taxation ought to be made up as contended by the respondents, and they allowed the appeal.

The question for the court was whether the profits of the steamship Glendochart should be assessed as a separate concern or not.

Under the Income Tax Act 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, the duties under sched. D are to be assessed and charged under the rules there set out, and the first case under that section applies to duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of a trade.

The first rule under the first case states

That the duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern upon a fair and just average of three years ending on such day of the year immediately preceding the year of assessment on which the accounts of the said trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern shall have been usually made up. Provided always that in cases where the trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern shall have been set up and commenced within the said period of three years the computation shall be made for one year on the average of the balance of profits and gains from the period of first setting up the same.

The company's accounts were made up to the 31st Dec. 1900.

K.B. Div.] FARBELL, (app.) v. SUNDEBLAND STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIM. (resps.). [K.B. Div.]

The third rule of the rules applying to both first and second cases under sect. 100 states that

The computation of duty arising in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, or any profession carried on by two or more persons jointly shall be made and stated jointly and in one sum and separately and distinctly from any other duty chargeable on the same persons or either or any of them, and no separate statement shall be allowed in any case of partnership except for the purpose of the partners claiming an exemption as herein directed or of accounting for separate concerns.

In the first proviso to such third rule it is stated that the joint assessment shall be made in the partnership name, style, firm, or description.

Under the fifth rule of the rules it is stated that

Every statement of profits to be charged under that schedule shall include every source so chargeable on the person delivering the same on his own account, or on account of any other person, and every person shall be chargeable in respect of the whole of such duties in one and the same division by the same commissioners, except in cases where the same person shall be engaged in different partnership or the same person shall be engaged in different concerns relating to trade or manufacture in divers places, in each of which cases a separate assessment shall be made in respect of each concern at the place where such concern, if singly carried on, ought to be charged as herein directed.

Under sects. 40 and 192 of the Income Tax Act 1842 a company is included in the expression "a person" and is chargeable in like manner.

S. A. T. Rowlatt (the Solicitor-General, Sir E. Carson, K.C. with him) for the appellant.—The Glendochart and the Brookside are two separate adventures or concerns in the nature of trade within sect. 100, sched. D, first case, of the Income Tax Act 1842. The Glendochart being an adventure or concern carried on by the respondents and other persons jointly, the duty arising in respect thereof is to be computed separately and distinctly from any other duty chargeable on the respondents under the third rule of the first and second cases. These part owners are partners. It was laid down in Attorney-General v. Borrodaile (1 Price, 148) that the ownership of trading vessels let to freight is a trade or concern in the nature of a trade within the meaning of 46 Geo. 3, c. 65, the words of which statute are very much the same as those in the Income Tax Acts. It was further held in that case that the part owners of such ships are special partners, and the ship's husband or managing part owner is bound to make a joint return of the aggregate profits of the concern to the property tax. The fact that both concerns are carried on by the company and for its benefit is immaterial, and the commissioners were wrong in their determination.

A. A. Roche for the respondents.—The whole business of the company constitutes and consists of a single trade or concern and not of two trades or concerns in respect of the Brookside and the Glendochart. The appellant here has confused joint ownership and carrying on business jointly. Attorney-General v. Borrodaile (sup.) is not in point here, for the concern is not carried on jointly. The owner of the majority of the shares in a ship may deal with such ship as he pleases, and he alone carries on the concern. The profits derived by the respondents through their shares in the Glendochart or their controlling interest in the vessel are profits accruing in respect of a single trade or concern, and not in respect of a separate trade or concern. Therefore but one assessment should be made on the respondents, and that should be computed upon the whole amount of the profits of the respondents.

Rowlatt in reply.

RIDLEY, J.—I have had some doubt upon this matter. The point taken by Mr. Roche is that the fact that there are five sixty-fourths of the steamship Glendochart out of the whole number of shares not within the control of the company is not enough to make the owner or owners of those five sixty-fourths persons carrying on the "adventure" of that ship jointly with the company which owns the fifty-nine sixty-fourths. He says that the words in the third rule under sect. 100 of the Income Tax Act apply only to adventures or concerns or professions carried on by two or more persons jointly, and that in a case like the present the fact that there are persons who may be called sleeping partners, owning a minority of the shares, does not make them persons jointly carrying on the adventure with the company or whoever may own the majority of the shares. I thought that there might be something in the point when it was made—namely, that there might very well be a distinction between the partner who was merely the owner of some sixty-fourth shares of a ship who does nothing but receive his dividends or pay his losses on the one hand and the partner who does take an active share in the management of the adventure and directing the ship where she is to go, when she is to be kept in the dock or in the river, and when she is to be insured and so forth. If it could have been established that that distinction exists, it would then have followed that this decision of the commissioners would be a right one. But I have come to the conclusion that, whatever the consequence may be, Attorney-General v. Borrodaile (1 Price, 148) is a case precisely in point, and, that being so, I am not able to get over it. It has remained law ever since it was decided, as I believe, without any doubt being thrown upon it. It is quoted in the text-books upon the Income Tax Acts without any words to the effect that doubt has been thrown upon its authority. In that case the Court of Exchequer in the year 1814 decided that on precisely similar words under precisely similar circumstances the ship's husband or managing owner (which would be the company here) is bound to make a joint return of the correct profits of the concern, and they decided that under words which are the same in all material respects as those of the third rule in the Income Tax Act at present in force. Now, if that is the case, if he, as ship's husband or owner, is found by the court to have been bound to make the return on behalf of all the other partners, I do not quite see how the same rule is not to apply here. The Chief Baron in giving his judgment, after having dealt with others, comes to this point. "As to the power of these part owners among one another" (and this is put by way of illustrating the nature of the partnership subsisting between them), "it certainly is clear that the majority of the owners can send the ship to sea without the consent of the rest; and, if they do so and a loss happens, the others have no claim upon them," and so forth. I think they were dealing with what is precisely the situation here, and that therefore the third rule under sect. 100 of the Income Tax Act must be taken to have application. It may be inconvenient and it may be usual to act otherwise in respect of this particular matter; I should think that it is very probable, but I cannot help saying that I am bound, as it appears to me, by the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Attorney-General v. Borrodaile. If the two cases could be distinguished, the foundation of what I am saying would disappear, but, taking it to be correct, it seems to me that there must be a return made by the company or the managing owner (whoever he may be) of this steamship Glendochart according to the third rule, and that therefore what has been done in putting the fifty-nine sixty-fourths of that steamer for seven and a quarter months in the accounts of the Brookside is not a compliance with the Act of Parliament. It is said that the commissioners have as a matter of fact come to the opinion that these fifty-nine sixty-fourths of the Glendochart have come into possession of the company in the ordinary way of a business already carried on as a mere extension or expansion of such business, and that therefore the accounts ought to be made up as contended by the company. But although they may have come to that decision as a question of fact, and I am not in a position to overrule it, I think I must in this case look and see what the law is which regulates the return of this ship, and, if it is the third rule that applies, it seems to me to be obvious that whatever the proper conclusion as a matter of fact may be, even if the company have in the ordinary way of its business got these fifty-nine sixty-fourths by way of extension or expansion of such business, it does not matter if the return has to be made according to the third rule. Perhaps that is an inconvenient result, but I do not see how to get out of Attorney-General v. Borrodaile. I think the words "carried on" might be used in the sense contended for by Mr. Roche but for that case. I can see myself where a person might make a distinction and say that this does not apply because of a sleeping partner, and so forth; but, when one looks at the former decision, it is clear that that covers the facts of this case. Therefore I am of opinion that the Crown is entitled to judgment.

K.B. Div.]

CORNFOOT v. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION.

[K.B. Div.]

CORNFOOT v. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION. (a)

Insurance—Marine—Voyage policy—Risk thirty days after arrival—Duration of risk.

Where a ship is insured for a voyage to a given port "and for thirty days in port after arrival, however employed," and the risk is to continue "until she hath there moored at anchor as above in good safety," the thirty days are to be taken as thirty consecutive periods of twenty-four hours each, commencing from the precise time at which the ship arrives and is moored in good safety.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION by Bigham, J. after trial with a special jury.

The claim was for a total loss of the plaintiff's ship, the Inchcape Rock, under a policy of insurance which the defendants had underwritten.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment of the learned judge.

The question argued was shortly this: In an insurance in the ordinary Lloyd's form for a voyage to a certain port "and for thirty days in port after arrival, however employed," where the risk is described as running "until she hath there moored at anchor as above in good safety," whether the thirty days are to be construed: (1) Thirty periods of twenty-four hours from the hour the ship is moored in good safety; (2) thirty calendar days from midnight, including the day of her arrival; (3) thirty calendar days commencing at midnight, not including the day of her arrival.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Leck for the plaintiffs.—"Day" in law means a calendar day—that is, a day beginning at midnight—and, as the law in computing days takes no notice of a portion of a day, the thirty days cannot be taken to have commenced to run from the midnight preceding her arrival, but from the midnight following it. It has been held that "running days" in a charter-party means calendar days, and not periods of twenty-four hours:

The Katy, 71 L. T. Rep. 709; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 510; (1895) P. 56.

Counsel also referred to

Re Railway Sleepers Supply Company, 52 L. T. Rep. 731; 29 Ch. Div. 204.

Scrutton, K.C. and Loehnis for the defendants.—The meaning of "day" here must be a period of twenty-four hours commencing from the hour on which an uncertain event may happen—namely, the arrival of the ship. Otherwise the actual duration of the insurance would be uncertain:

Mercantile Marine Insurance Company v. Titherington, 11 L. T. Rep. 340.

If the expression is to be construed as calendar day, then the day of arrival must be included:

Migotti v. Colville, 40 L. T. Rep. 747; 4 C. P. Div. 233.

If it is not, then the ship is not insured on the day of its arrival from the hour it arrives till midnight.

Curr. adv. vult.

April 22.—BIGHAM, J.—In this case the defendants had underwritten the plaintiff's ship Inchcape Rock. The risk is described in the body of the policy in writing in the following words: "For a voyage from Portland, Oregon, by any route to Algoa Bay and for thirty days in port after arrival, however employed." The question I have to determine is whether at the time of the loss the thirty days here mentioned had run out; and the answer to the question depends upon the meaning to be attached to the word "days," whether it is to be taken to mean thirty consecutive periods of twenty-four hours or thirty calendar days. The print of the policy is in the ordinary

SEARLE v. LUND.

[K.B. Div.]

Lloyd's form, which describes the risk as running until the vessel "hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety"; but the printed words "twenty-four hours" are struck through with a pen and the words "as above" are written over them, the effect being to incorporate at this point the earlier written words which I have just read. Thus the duration of the risk may be described as extending until thirty days after the vessel's arrival and safe mooring at anchor in the bay. The case was tried before me with a jury; and they found the following facts: First, that the vessel arrived in Algoa Bay at 10 a.m. on the 2nd Aug. 1902; secondly, that she was safely moored at anchor in the bay at 11.30 a.m. on the same day; and, thirdly, that she was totally lost at 4.30 p.m. on the 1st Sept. Thus it will be seen that if the thirty days are to be calculated as periods of twenty-four hours beginning at 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd Aug. the risk had run off at the time of the loss; otherwise if the thirty days are to be taken as meaning thirty clear calendar days. I do not suppose that there could be any doubt about the duration of the risk if the policy had been issued in its original printed form, unaltered and without the written words which I have read. The risk would have lasted until 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd Aug., and from that moment until 11.30 a.m. on the 3rd Aug. It could not have been contended that the first of the twenty-four hours did not begin to run until noon on the 2nd Aug., for the period of time from 11.30 to 12.30 is as much an hour as the period of time from noon to 1 p.m. Why should the expression "thirty days" be read in a different way? No doubt in some cases the word "day" means a period of twenty-four hours starting from midnight and ending at midnight. That is a calendar day—a Monday or a Tuesday. But did the parties to this contract use the word in that sense? I think clearly not. The risk was to be a continuing risk. It was not to stop at 11.30 on the morning of the 2nd Aug. and then to revive at midnight. It was to run continuously from 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd Aug. until the expiration of the thirty days, and no longer. To interpret the contract in the way contended for by the plaintiff would have the effect either of imposing on the defendants a longer risk than they bargained to undertake or of relieving them from liability during the hours of 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd Aug. until midnight. Neither party intended to make such a contract. It follows, therefore, that the thirty days mentioned in the policy must be taken to mean thirty consecutive periods of twenty-four hours beginning at the time of the ship's safe mooring in the bay. After the jury had been discharged another point was taken on behalf of the plaintiff. It was said that the ship was not ready to discharge until 5 p.m. on the 2nd Aug., and that, as upon the authorities a ship cannot be said to be safely moored unless and until she is ready to discharge, the time did not begin to run until 5 p.m. I am, however, quite satisfied, notwithstanding some of the vivâ voce evidence, that the ship was an arrived ship within the meaning of the policy by 11.30 a.m., and was then ready to discharge, and this was what the jury meant to find, and did find, in answer to my questions. There must be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

SEARLE v. LUND. (a)

Bill of lading—Right to over-carry if discharge cannot be effected without undue detention—Detention caused by shipowner or his agents—Liability.

A bill of lading contained the following clause: "If in the opinion of the master discharge cannot be effected without undue detention, the steamer shall have liberty to over-carry the cargo to London at merchant's risk, and deliver there to consignees or their assigns."

Held, that the shipowner was not protected by this clause where the circumstances creating the undue detention were due to the default of the shipowner or his agents or servants.

ACTION brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover damages for the breach of a contract contained in a bill of lading.

The Yarrawonga, a steamship, belonged to the defendant, and formed one of a line of steamers known as the Blue Anchor Line, regularly running between Australian ports, of which Melbourne is one, Durban, the Cape, Las Palmas, and London.

The plaintiff's goods, consisting of a number of cases of perishable goods and bales of hay fodder, were shipped at Melbourne in Sept. 1901 to be carried from there to Cape Town.

In the bills of lading was the following clause:

If in the opinion of the master discharge cannot be effected without undue detention the steamer shall have liberty to over-carry the cargo to London at merchant's risk and deliver there to consignees or their assigns.

The Yarrawonga sailed from Melbourne on the 25th Oct., and at that port a wrong delivery of goods took place owing to the want of reasonable care on the part of the defendant, his agents or servants, which caused delay.

Owing to this delay at Durban the Yarrawonga did not arrive at Cape Town in time to use the special facilities for discharge which had been provided for her, and the master, being honestly of opinion that there would be undue detention if he waited to discharge the cargo at Cape Town, owing to the congested state of the harbour and the difficulty of getting a berth owing to the war, over-carried the goods to London.

Scrutton, K.C. and Leck for the plaintiff.

Hamilton, K.C. and Loehnis for the defendant.

KENNEDY, J.—This is a question of construction relating to well-known principles of law, though perhaps not easy to apply in this case, and I do not think I should benefit the parties if I delayed giving judgment, and, moreover, it is a test case which I daresay the parties would like to take a further judgment upon. It is the fact that there would have been no need for undue detention at Cape Town but for what happened at Durban, and is that fact such as would entitle the plaintiff to succeed? If he shows, as he has shown clearly, that but for the want of care, and reasonable care, in my opinion, with regard to the delay at Durban and the cause of it, that vessel might have been discharged without the undue delay at Cape Town, is that sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to judgment? I think it is. In the first place, as to the facts in this case, there is no dispute. There was a delay of two days at Durban, which frustrated the arrangements at Cape Town, and which produced the possibility of the undue delay. If that is so, it is said none the less by the learned counsel for the defendant that that cause is too remote. They contend that the only act or default in the sense of negligence of the owner or his servants which could, as it were, take away the protection of this clause, is something that happened at the Cape, and that it is too remote to say as a cause that if there had not been this unjustifiable delay at Durban, unjustifiable I mean so far as regards the plaintiff, in this case the mischief would not have happened. I have during the argument and since carefully considered that, and I think it is unsound. I agree that by the terms of the bill of lading with this clause the owner has a right (for that is what it is shortly) under certain circumstances to over-carry, but he must not produce those circumstances by the fault of his own agent or servant. He must not do that, it seems to me, and say, "I have produced the circumstance which has caused the undue detention upon which my captain's opinion is to be conclusive." I cannot see myself why anything that happens in the way of negligence or want of reasonable care from the time of the contract of the bill of lading being completed between the parties—that is to say, after the ship sails and the taking of the goods on board—why anything that affects the goods so as to prevent the contract being fulfilled is not one of the circumstances which may be looked at when we find the consequences following from it which are, apart from this special clause, a breach of contract. There can be no doubt that the action is brought for over-carrying these goods. They had a right to over-carry. Under the circumstances have they a right to say we can over-carry, although those circumstances are produced by the fault of our own agents and servants. There is an analogous question, and we are all of us rather afraid of analogies, but there is one thing I might mention tersely. Supposing it had been a clause fixing a date, or suppose it had been a question of reasonable dispatch, a consignee under a contract in a bill of lading has clearly a right to have the voyage performed with reasonable dispatch, having regard to the nature of the carrying vessel. An illustration of that, and, of course, only an illustration is afforded by the case of Fraser v. Telegraphic Construction and Maintenance Company (27 L. T. Rep. 373; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas 421; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 566), and the judgment of Cockburn, C.J. and Lord Blackburn in that case, where the vessel being a steam vessel did not use steam as she ought to have done. So, again, here, supposing, which makes the case a little simple (although I do not think in principle it differs), the clause had been in terms that the vessel shall over-carry the goods unless she leaves Cape Town by the 6th Nov., and it was clearly proved that owing to the delay in Durban she could not reach there by the 6th Nov., it cannot be said if it was proved that a want of care on the part of the managers of the voyage whether the ship's agents or master prevented her reaching Cape Town so as to leave it on the 6th, that she had a right to over-carry without an action for damages for not delivering the goods. It seems to me if it had been proved, as it had been, that this happened, it is not too remote. It is not suggested that even the delay in Durban might not under conceivable circumstances have produced the over-carrying. It seems to me, once granted that she has been delayed and prevented from reaching Cape Town at a certain date which affects the number of days she has to stay there, it does not lie in the mouth of the defendant to say that it might have happened that, even if she had come in time, she would have got a berth, or that it might have happened if she did not come in time she would have got a berth. Once show that there is a wrongful act—that is, a breach of contract—which produces a certain result in fact, it does not lie in his mouth to say that in fact things might have produced the same result without a breach of contract. The nearest analogy that I know that strikes one at once—and I do not say it is a perfect analogy—is the way in which the courts have always refused to listen to that argument in cases of deviation, for on proof that the vessel has deviated from the regular straight course, and is lost, it is not an answer to say she might have been lost if she had not deviated and broken her voyage in that respect. It is put by Tindal, C.J.—I am not quoting the words exactly—in the leading case, which I think is Garrett v. Davis, that it does not lie in the mouth of a wrongdoer where a consequence has followed from conduct which is a breach of contract, to say that the same mischief might have happened had he not done the thing complained of. Under those circumstances it seems to me that where there is the right of over-carrying, the circumstances which occasioned the exercise of that right, must not be produced by the fault, the negligence, and the want of reasonable care in the prosecution of the voyage on the part of the defendant and his agents. I think the plaintiff is entitled to recover. Judgment for the plaintiff.

voyage to a French port. On arrival the first defendants, who were British subjects, arrested the ship in respect of necessities which they had supplied and attached the freight, which was payable by certain French consignees. They also made executory in France a judgment obtained by default in the King's Bench Division against the mortgagors (a British company) in England in respect of the same debt. The mortgagees intervened in the proceedings instituted in France and, for the purpose of assisting their case in the French courts, commenced actions in England against the first defendants and against the mortgagors asking for certain declarations of right under Order XXV., r. 5. On a motion by both defendants asking that the actions against them should be dismissed or stayed as being frivolous and vexatious:

Held, that as it had not been shown that the declarations asked for by the mortgagees in the action against the first defendants could not be of use to them in the French court to protect their interests as mortgagees, and that, as there was no sufficient evidence that the action was an improper interference with the proceedings in France, the action should be allowed to proceed.

On a further motion by the liquidator of the defendant company praying that the action against the company should be dismissed or stayed, or in the alternative that the plaintiffs should indemnify him for costs:

Held, that the proceedings ought to be stayed as the mortgagors had not taken any step to dispute the validity of the mortgage held by the mortgagees, and the mortgagees had no right to force the mortgagors to try the issue in the present proceedings.

MOTIONS by the defendants Strachan Brothers, necessities men, and the Manar Steamship Company, owners of the steamship Manar, praying that the actions brought by the Northern Trust Limited, who were mortgagees of the steamship Manar, should be stayed or dismissed. The Manar Steamship Company also asked that the defendants should indemnify the liquidator of the company for any costs that might be incurred in respect of the action.

The facts were shortly as follows:—

The Manar Steamship Company Limited was incorporated on the 13th Jan. 1900, and on the 26th June 1900 a registered statutory mortgage of the British ship Manar was given by the Manar Steamship Company Limited, the owners of the Manar, to the Northern Trust Limited, who were trustees for debenture-holders, to secure the sum of 17,000l.

In 1901 Messrs. Strachan Brothers supplied necessities to the steamship Manar, for which they had not been able to obtain payment.

In March 1902 the Manar Steamship Company Limited made default under the mortgage, and the plaintiffs thereupon took possession of the Manar and let her on a charter dated the 28th April 1902 from Beaufort, South Carolina, to St. Nazaire, in France.

On the 5th May an extraordinary resolution was passed for the voluntary liquidation of the company, and that liquidation was proceeding.

In June 1902 the Manar arrived at St. Nazaire, and the consignees of the cargo took delivery of it, and became liable to pay freight.

Strachan Brothers, the necessities men, thereupon instituted proceedings in France to recover the sum of 745l. due to them in respect of the necessities they had supplied to the Manar, and arrested the Manar and caused the freight in the hands of the consignees to be attached.

The Northern Trust Limited also instituted proceedings in France, and on the 17th June the French court at St. Nazaire made an order directing the Northern Trust Limited to give bail to answer the claims made by Strachan Brothers, and directing Strachan Brothers to give bail to meet the claims of the Northern Trust Limited for damages if it should prove that the arrest of the Manar and the attachment of the freight by Strachan Brothers was wrongful.

On the 21st June the Manar was released, as the Northern Trust Limited had given the bail required by the French court, and on that date judgment by default was obtained in England in the King's Bench Division by Strachan Brothers against the Manar Steamship Company Limited for the amount of their claim for necessities and costs.

Further proceedings had by this time been instituted in the court at St. Nazaire by the Barry Graving Dock and Engineering Company in respect of a claim for repairs to the Manar, and by the master of the vessel for wages and disbursements.

On the 13th Oct., by a judgment of the Civil Tribunal at Paris, the judgment obtained by Strachan Brothers, in the King's Bench Division, was made "executory" in France as against the Manar and her freight.

On the 15th Nov. the court at St. Nazaire declared the attachment of the freight by Strachan Brothers to be valid, and on the 18th Nov. the same court made a similar declaration as to the mortgage of the Northern Trust Limited.

On the 2nd Dec. the plaintiffs, the Northern Trust Limited, commenced proceedings in the court at St. Nazaire to have the declaration of the validity of the attachment of the freight by Strachan Brothers set aside, and to have it declared that Strachan Brothers had no rights over the Manar on the 10th June 1902, the date on which proceedings were instituted in France. They also instituted proceedings against Strachan Brothers and the consignees of cargo praying for a judgment that all the arrests of freight were invalid, and asking for an order that the consignees of the cargo should pay the freight to them as mortgagees.

Strachan Brothers were served with notice of these proceeding in Newcastle on the 12th Dec. 1902, and entered an appearance to them in France.

On the 20th Jan. 1903 the plaintiff company issued the writs in the present actions.

On the 26th Feb. the plaintiffs closed the register of the Manar, selling the vessel to Swedish purchasers as mortgagees in possession.

On the 27th Feb. statements of claim were delivered by the plaintiff company in the present actions claiming a declaration: that throughout the year 1902 they were duly registered first mortgagees of the steamship Manar; that the mortgage was a valid one; that they were entitled to the Manar as owners, so far as was necessary for making the said ship available as a security for their mortgage debt, and entitled to the said ship and any bail given for the release of the said ship in priority to the Manar Steamship Company Limited, and Strachan Brothers; that they were entitled as mortgagees to take possession of the Manar in March 1902; that upon taking possession of the Manar they were entitled to the steamship and to any bail given for the release of the steamship in priority to the Manar Steamship Company Limited and Strachan Brothers; that they were entitled, in priority to the Manar Steamship Company Limited and to Strachan Brothers, to collect and keep all freights earned by the Manar while in their possession, and particularly the freight earned by the vessel under the charter party made for the voyage from Beaufort to St. Nazaire in 1902.

On the 30th Jan. 1903 Strachan Brothers issued a summons to have the action against them stayed or dismissed with costs.

On the 4th Feb. the liquidator of the Manar Steamship Company Limited took out a summons praying for the same relief, or alternatively that the action should be stayed until the Northern Trust Limited, the plaintiffs, indemnified the liquidator of the defendant company against all costs.

These summonses were adjourned into court, and came on for hearing on the 2nd March 1903.

During the argument in court affidavits of French lawyers, which had been filed by both the Northern Trust Limited and Strachan Brothers, were read. From these it appeared to be doubtful whether a declaratory judgment such as was sought in these actions could be used in the actions in France, and as to what its effect would be if it was so used.

Order XXV., rr. 4, 5, is as follows:

Rule 4. The court or a judge may order any pleading to be struck out, on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or answer, and in any such case or in case of the action or defence being shown by the pleadings to be frivolous or vexatious, the court or judge may order the action to be stayed or dismissed, or judgment to be entered accordingly, as may be just.

Rule 5. No action or proceeding shall be open to objection, on the ground that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby, and the court may make binding declarations of right whether any consequential relief is or could be claimed or not.

Robson, K.C. and Adair Roche for the defendants Strachan Brothers, in support of the motion—The action against the necessaries men in this country is quite irregular as the bail which represents the ship and the freight is in the power of the French court, which has all the parties, including the mortgagees, before it, and the questions raised in the present action will be determined in the court at St. Nazaire. Sect. 11 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) no doubt gave this court jurisdiction to deal with claims in respect of a duly registered mortgage, but in this case the court is asked to make a series of declarations about a mortgage with which Strachan Brothers have no concern, and to which they are not parties, and the declaration, if made, will not decide the rights of the parties, for they will be decided in France according to the lex fori. The court cannot make a binding declaration in this action within the meaning of Order XXV., r. 5, and the action cannot therefore be sustained under that rule, and as no cause of action is disclosed the action should be stayed or dismissed under rule 4 of the same order. The property charged being out of the jurisdiction, even though the charge be valid, English creditors have a right to enforce any rights given to them by a foreign law in respect of a debt which is enforceable in a foreign country:

Re Maudsley, Sons, and Field, 82 L. T. Rep. 378; (1900) 1 Ch. 602;

The court has power to restrain vexatious and oppressive litigation:

McHenry v. Lewis, 46 L. T. Rep. 567; 22 Ch. Div. 397.

They also referred to

Barraclough v. Brown, 76 L. T. Rep. 797; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; (1897) A. C. 615; Foreign Tribunals Evidence Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 113).

Scrutton, K.C. and Balloch for the plaintiffs contra—The judgment prayed for would assist the plaintiffs in the proceedings in France, for if obtained it could be made “executory” in France, and be used to prove that the ship and freight were the property of the plaintiffs. The onus is on the defendants to show that the action was vexatious:

Hyman v. Helm, 49 L. T. Rep. 376; 24 Ch. Div. 531.

The resolution for borrowing the money on the mortgage of the Manar was moved by William Dixon, who traded as Strachan Brothers, and consequently knew of the existence of the mortgage when his firm supplied the necessaries. Strachan Brothers have no maritime lien on the ship, and their claim, so far as the ship is concerned, should be postponed to the plaintiffs' mortgage. So far as the freight is concerned the plaintiffs as mortgagees in possession are entitled to the freight, and they are also entitled to the freight as charterers of the ship. The proceedings in France by the necessaries men are an attempt to gain priority over the mortgagees, but, even if they were successful, an English court could refuse to give effect to the decision of a foreign court which refused to recognise a title properly acquired according to the law of this country:

Simpson v. Fogo, 8 L. T. Rep. 61; 1 H. & M. 195; Liverpool Marine Credit Company v. Hunter (ubi sup.).

H. H. Wright for the liquidator of the Manar Steamship Company.—As to the action of the Northern Trust Limited v. The Manar Steamship Company, it is submitted the action is a frivolous one, and should be stayed; it is neither a foreclosure action nor an action to enforce a security, for the security has been enforced, and the ship has been sold under the plaintiffs' statutory power, and the purchaser has a good title. The liquidator if he should see fit is entitled to bring an action against the mortgagees for damages for a wrongful sale; and the sale may have been an improper one if the mortgage was a valid one owing to the shareholders of the Manar Steamship Company Limited not having passed the necessary resolution to authorise the directors to borrow money. This question may have to be determined, and the liquidator will then be plaintiff, and will select his own time to bring the action. At present the liquidator has neither the money nor the evidence necessary to raise the question, and he cannot be compelled to raise it now. The reasoning in Brooking v. Maudslay (58 L. T. Rep. 852; 38 Ch. Div. 636) supports this view. There the action was by underwriters to restrain the holders of a policy from proceeding on it; but the court declined to make any declaration with regard to it, Stirling, J. saying (58 L. T. Rep. 855; 38 Ch. Div., at p. 645): "It is difficult to see why the defendants having a claim which they may assert in a court of law at any time within the period fixed by the statutes of limitation should be compelled to try the issue on which the validity of that claim depends in a court of equity, and at another time than that which they may select as the most convenient for themselves." The plaintiffs knew the defendant company was in liquidation when they started their action, and, subject to certain exceptions, the practice is that an action against a company in voluntary liquidation will be stayed:

Walker v. Banagher Distillery Company, 33 L. T. Rep. 502; 1 Q. B. Div. 129;
Rose v. Gardden Lodge Coal Company, 38 L. T. Rep. 101; 3 Q. B. Div. 235;
Freeman v. General Publishing Company, 70 L. T. Rep. 845; (1894) 3 Q. B. 483.

He also referred to

The Wexford, 58 L. T. Rep. 28; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 244; 13 P. Div. 10;
Austen v. Collins, 54 L. T. Rep. 903.

Scrutton, K.C. and Balloch for the plaintiffs in the second action.—The liquidator has made no effort to stay the action brought by Strachan Brothers, and the result of Strachan Brothers obtaining that judgment is that they are now trying to satisfy their claim out of property in France which they had arrested as the property of the Manar Steamship Company. The plaintiffs, the mortgagees, have therefore to put themselves in a position to prove to the French court that the ship and the freight belonged to them, and not to the Manar Steamship Company. The liquidator does not expressly deny the validity of the plaintiff's mortgage, but, after permitting the plaintiffs to sell the vessel, leaves it to be inferred that there is some blot on the title of the mortgagees the plaintiffs in this action. If so, they are entitled to perfect their security if they can. The liquidator has no right to endeavour to tie up the property of the mortgagees possibly for years by threats of future action. In the cases cited the liquidator admitted the right of the creditor to prove his debt in the liquidation proceedings, and, on that ground, the action was stayed:

BUCKNILL, J.—This is an action brought by the plaintiff company claiming a declaration that a certain mortgage made between themselves and the Manar Steamship Company Limited, now in liquidation, was at all times material to this action, and is now a valid mortgage, and that the plaintiff company are entitled to certain freights which have been earned by the said steamship after they, as mortgagees, took possession of her under their security. This application now made to the court is by Strachan Brothers to stay or dismiss the action on the ground that it is oppressive and vexatious. [His Lordship then stated the facts of the case, and proceeded:] Affidavits have been filed by both parties, and they leave the court in doubt as to the procedure of the French courts, and as to the effect of any judgment of this court in the action before the French courts. That being so, I have to ask myself this question: In the circumstances of this case has it been made out to my satisfaction that these proceedings cannot be of any practical utility to the plaintiffs if they succeed, and do they amount to an improper interference with the proceedings of the foreign court, or are they in their nature oppressive or vexatious. On the affidavits which have been read it is not clear what effect a judgment in this action would have on the proceedings in France, and it has not been made out to my satisfaction that the declaration now sought for would not be of practical utility to the plaintiffs or would be an improper interference with the proceedings of the French court. I am not able to say that to ask for such a declaration is either vexatious or oppressive, or an abuse of the process of the court, and the result, therefore, is that the defendants have not made out a sufficient case for a stay of this action, and their application will be dismissed with costs.

In the second motion the plaintiffs claim a declaration similar to that claimed by them in the first, but the circumstances under which the second action is brought are not at all similar. Here the plaintiffs have attacked the Manar Steamship Company, though the steamship company have shown no desire to challenge the validity of the plaintiffs' mortgage or to challenge their right to the freight earned under the charter-party. The liquidator, it is true, states in the affidavit filed by him in this action that the mortgage may be invalid on the ground that the resolution passed by the company authorising the borrowing of the money was informal, and it is possible that some day the company now in liquidation, apparently without funds, and certainly without a desire to litigate, may choose to claim a declaration that the mortgage is an invalid one, and may seek to set it aside. The plaintiffs, the mortgagees, say that this question must be settled now; the liquidator of the defendant company says that he ought not to have his hand forced, and a passage has been read from a judgment of Stirling, J. in Brooking v. Maudslay (ubi sup) which supports that contention. The plaintiffs are in the position of having lent money on a mortgage of the ship; they have taken possession of the ship and chartered her and earned freight. The defendants, the Manar Steamship Company, have been aware of all these proceedings which have been taken by the plaintiffs, and have not been antagonistic to any of them. The defendants, the mortgagors, have not attacked the plaintiffs, and until the plaintiffs were attacked by Strachan Brothers in France the matters between the plaintiffs and the defendant company were at rest. But Strachan Brothers having brought an action against the Manar Steamship Company, to which the defendant company did not appear, the plaintiffs have chosen to put the law in motion in this action against the Manar Steamship Company for no other purpose than I can see except to get a declaration for use in France in litigation to which the Manar Steamship Company are not parties. Therefore I think the defendants in this case are entitled to say that this action ought not to be brought against them and cannot serve any practical utility. It seems to me to be vexatious, and I direct that the proceedings against the defendants in this action shall be stayed—not dismissed—and the costs of this application shall be paid by the plaintiffs.

Salvage—Information to subsequent salvors—Lifeboat crew.

Signals for assistance were exhibited by a vessel ashore, and, in response to a telegram sent by the operator at the S. Lighthouse, two tugs proceeded to her assistance. A telegram was also sent by the coxswain of the S. lifeboat, but arrived after that sent from the lighthouse.

In an action for salvage by the coxswain and crew of the lifeboat:

Held, that, although a person who has done no more than give information may be entitled to salvage, yet in fact no services had been rendered, as the tugs had prepared to proceed to the vessel on the receipt of the first telegram.

Held, also, that when a lifeboat crew have gone out for the purposes of saving life, the onus is on them to prove that they have afterwards become entitled to salvage against the property in peril.

ACTIONS for salvage brought by the owners, masters, and crews of the steam tugs Humber, Terrier, and J. W. Jewitt, and the coxswain and crew of the Spurn lifeboat, against the owners of the French barque Marguerite Molinos.

The Humber was a paddle tug of 131 tons gross register and 250 horse power effective, manned by a crew of seven hands all told, and of the value of 6000l.

The J. W. Jewitt was a paddle tug of 97 tons gross register and 240 horse power effective, manned by a crew of five hands all told, and was of the value of 1500l.

The Terrier was a screw tug of 78 tons gross register and 235 horse power effective, manned by a crew of five hands all told, and was of the value of 3000l.

The Marguerite Molinos was a French barque of 2005 tons gross register, and at the time was on a voyage from Hull to Swansea in ballast in tow of a tug, and manned by a crew of fifteen hands all told. Her value was 9500l.

On the 26th Feb. 1903 she met with heavy weather and had to turn back for shelter, and while making Grimsby Roads the hawser parted during the night and she drifted towards the Trinity Sand, let go her anchor, and brought up about one and a quarter miles N.N.W. of the Spurn Lighthouse. As the tide ebbed she took the ground, and at low water was left high and dry. Signals for the assistance of a tug were exhibited about 7 a.m. and answered from the lighthouse. The signals were also seen from the shore, and an attempt was then made to launch the tender of the lifeboat, but the first attempt failed owing to the heavy sea running, and the coxswain of the lifeboat thereupon telegraphed to Grimsby for the assistance of tugs. Eventually, about 12.30 p.m., the efforts to launch the tender were successful, but as the crew were unable to get to the lifeboat, which is kept afloat at moorings inside Spurn Point, they proceeded on in the tender, and reached the barque about 2 p.m. Five of the crew then went on board, and remained there until she came off, although they were told their services were not wanted. About 2.30 p.m. the Humber came up and passed a rope, and the Marguerite Molinos then got up her anchor and, while she was doing so, the two other tugs made fast, and as she floated with the tide she was towed to a safe anchorage.

The defendants admitted that salvage services had been rendered by the tugs, but denied that any services had been rendered by the lifeboatmen.

At the trial it appeared that the first intimation that assistance was required was a telegram sent by the operator at the Spurn Lighthouse, and it was in response to this that the tugs prepared to proceed to the vessel.

Aspinall, K.C. and Lauriston Batten for the plaintiffs the owners, masters, and crews of the tugs.

A. E. Nelson for the plaintiffs the coxswain and crew of the Spurn lifeboat.—The prompt arrival of the tugs was due to the telegram sent by the coxswain, and the giving of such information is in itself a salvage service:

The Nile, 33 L. T. Rep. 66; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 11; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 449.

In The Ocean (2 W. Rob. 91) a vessel which carried an order for a steamer to go out of harbour to a vessel in danger was held entitled to salvage.

Laing, K.C. and Bateson for the defendants contra.—The telegram was not necessary, as the tugs were already starting in response to a previous message sent from the Spurn Lighthouse. In The Chiltonford (Shipping Gazette, Feb. 22, 1901), a claim was made for salvage because a telephone message had been sent, but the claim was rejected.

BUCKNILL, J.—These are consolidated actions brought by the tugs Humber, Terrier, and J. W. Jewitt, and by the coxswain and crew of the Spurn lifeboat, for salvage services alleged to have been rendered to the French barque Marguerite Molinos on the 27th Feb. last. As in order of time the lifeboat's case has been taken first, I will deal with that at once. As regards what took place after the lifeboatmen in their tender got alongside the French barque, I accept the story of the master of the barque, and I find as a fact that his story is correct, and that the services of the lifeboatmen were never accepted as salvors. I have further to decide whether the coxswain of the lifeboat is entitled to any salvage by reason of the telegram sent about noon. It was handed in at 12.35, and was signed by Pye, the coxswain of the lifeboat. It ran: "Barque ashore, Trinity Sand, wants assistance." Until the tug owner was called, I was in some difficulty on the question of law; that is to say, I was not at all clear whether that telegram would in the circumstances entitle the coxswain or any other person connected with the lifeboat to hold the position of salvors under the authorities which have been cited. The law is clear that where a person does something, outside his duty, of such a nature as to be the cause of an act done by another which is a salvage act, he may himself hold the position of a salvor, although he has done no more than give information. A messenger from the sea coming in and telling another that a ship is in peril is entitled to be treated as a salvor if, in consequence of his information, the other goes out and renders salvage services to that ship. But each case must depend on its own facts. What are they here? The tug owner, being asked how he came to send out his tugs to the Marguerite Molinos, said that he had received a telegram from the coxswain of the lifeboat; but it turned out, on further examination of the tug owner, that he had received another telegram earlier in the morning, which was from the telegraph clerk at the Spurn Lighthouse, and that the crews of the tugs were already getting ready to start when the second telegram arrived. That second telegram was useless, and I so decide. I cannot, therefore, take into consideration the courageous endeavours of the lifeboat crew, lasting nearly four hours, to launch the tender of the lifeboat. Lifeboatmen must understand that when they have gone out to save life, as members of a lifeboat crew, the onus is on them to prove that they have afterwards become entitled to salvage reward as against the property alleged to be in peril. Here I find that they were not allowed to go on board the Marguerite Molinos as salvors, but were only as far as the coxswain was concerned invited to come, the others inviting themselves on board, not for the purpose, as the master of the barque thought, of rendering salvage services, but for the purpose of looking round—I am obliged to hold on the facts of the case that the little they afterwards did was not in fact salvage work. They were not salvors. Their suit must therefore fail, and I regret to say that it must be dismissed with costs. As to the three tugs, there is no doubt they are salvors. The ship was on the sands. She had been high and dry. She had received no injury, and she would have floated at the turn of the tide; but she had had very bad weather. It is satisfactory to know how it is that the vessel which was towing her was unable to render assistance. She was a screw vessel, and I gather she drew as much water as the barque; so there was ample reason, though we have not had that explained, why she did not go to the barque's assistance. These tugs got into position, and after ten minutes' towing got her afloat. The weather had been bad; but it was rapidly moderating, and I am advised that the tug Humber would have been able to get the vessel off. The master of the Humber did not attempt to exaggerate, and I think his evidence was very fairly given; but he had a doubt, and, having a doubt, he erred in the right direction. He said: "I may not be able to get the barque off myself. I will take the services of the other two tugs." The fact is that these three boats are all of them salvors; but I cannot give a heavy award. The tugs were not in any danger. It is not one of those cases where there was bumping or where they were girted. I am not sure if the barque had been there another tide she would have taken any harm. When the weather got down to the force of two, one tug would have been able to get her off; but they must be paid, and the result is that I award 500*l.*—300*l.* to the Humber and 200*l.* to the two other tugs, with costs. As the bail demanded—2600*l.*—was exorbitant, I order the salvors to pay the bail fees above 1000*l.*

THE KONING WILLEM I.

Collision—Fog—Failure to stop and ascertain position of approaching vessel—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 16—Statutory presumption of fault—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 418, sub-s. 2, 419, sub-s. 4, 424.

A collision occurred in the English Channel, in a dense fog, between the steamship B. and the Dutch steamship K. W. I. Neither vessel stopped her engines on hearing the fog signal of the other forward of the beam. It was admitted by the owners of the B. that their vessel was to blame. It was contended by the owners of the K. W. I. that, owing to the distance the vessels were apart when the whistle of the B. was first heard, the necessity to stop did not arise, as there was then no danger of collision, and that art. 16 did not therefore apply.

Held, that, under the circumstances, there was danger of collision at the time the whistle of the B. was first heard; that the K. W. I. ought to have stopped her engines, and that the fact that she did not do so contributed to the collision.

Query, whether the statutory presumption of fault created by sect. 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 applies to a foreign vessel outside British territorial jurisdiction, where the Order in Council applying the Collision Regulations to vessels of the country to which she belongs does not apply the provisions of Part 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

ACTION for damage by collision brought by the owners of the steamship Bittern against the owners of the Dutch steamship Koning Willem I.

The collision occurred about 4 a.m. on the 13th April 1902, in the English Channel, about six miles E.N.E. of Dungeness in a dense fog.

The Bittern was a steamship of 881 tons gross register, and at the time was on a voyage from Manchester to Ghent, with a general cargo on board, and manned by a crew of seventeen hands all told. The Koning Willem I. was a steamship of 4446 tons gross register, and was on a voyage from Amsterdam to Southampton, with a general cargo and passengers, and manned by a crew of ninety-six hands all told.

[ADM.]

The facts of the case appear sufficiently from the judgment.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants (inter alia) with a bad look-out, neglecting to stop their engines when the whistle of the Bittern was first heard, and with proceeding at an improper rate of speed under the circumstances. They also charged the defendants with neglecting to comply with arts. 16 and 29 of the Collision Regulations.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs with (inter alia) a bad look-out, navigating under the circumstances at an improper rate of speed, and not stopping when the whistle of the Koning Willem I. was heard. They also charged them with neglecting to comply with arts. 16 and 29 of the Collision Regulations.

Art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is as follows :

Art. 16. Every vessel shall, in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain storms, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions. A steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog signal of a vessel, the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.

The defendants also contended that, as the collision occurred outside the limits of British territorial jurisdiction, the statutory presumption of fault created by sect. 419, sub-sect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 did not apply to their vessel, as she was a Dutch vessel, and although the Government of the Netherlands had signified their willingness that the Collision Regulations should apply to Dutch vessels, and an Order in Council had been made accordingly, the provisions of Part 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 had not been applied to vessels of that country.

Sect. 418 (2). The Collision Regulations, together with the provisions of this part [Part 5] of this Act relating thereto, or otherwise relating to collisions, shall be observed by all foreign ships within British jurisdiction, and in any case arising in a British court concerning matters arising within British jurisdiction foreign ships shall, so far as respects the Collision Regulations and the said provisions of this Act, be treated as if they were British ships.

Sect. 419 (4). Where in the case of a collision it is proved to the court before whom the case is tried that any of the Collision Regulations have been infringed, the ship by which the regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary.

Sect. 424. Whenever it is made to appear to Her Majesty in Council that the Government of any foreign country is willing that the Collision Regulations, or the provisions of this part of this Act relating thereto, or otherwise relating to collisions, or any of those regulations or provisions should apply to the ships of that country when beyond the limits of British jurisdiction, Her Majesty may, by Order in Council, direct that these regulations and provisions shall, subject to any limitation of time, conditions, and qualifications contained in the order, apply to the ships of the said foreign country, whether within British jurisdiction or not, and that such ships shall, for the purpose of such regulations and provisions, be treated as if they were British ships.

During the trial of the action it was admitted that the Bittern was to blame for breach of art. 16 of the regulations.

Laing, K.C. and Adair Roche for the plaintiffs, the owners of the Bittern.—The Koning Willem I. must be found also to blame for not stopping when she heard the whistle of the Bittern forward of her beam, and for not stopping and reversing earlier. Art. 16 is imperative, and the provisions of the corresponding article (art. 18) of the regulations of 1884 were always rigidly enforced. See

The Ceto, 62 L. T. Rep. 1; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 479; 14 App. Cas. 670;

The Lancashire, 69 L. T. Rep. 663; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 376; (1894) A. C. 1.

In The Star of New Zealand (Shipping Gazette, Nov. 7, 1899) the vessel had a cargo of dynamite on board which was stowed aft, and it was attempted to show that it would have been dangerous for her to stop on account of the risk to other vessels following astern of her. This plea did not, however, succeed. In The Rondane (82 L. T. Rep. 828; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 106) the rule was strictly enforced. See also

The Bernard Hall, 86 L. T. Rep. 658; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300.

The Oceanic, 88 L. T. Rep. 303.

Pickford, K.C., Aspinall, K.C., and R. B. D. Acland for the defendants, the owners of the Koning Willem I.—Art. 16 does not apply in this case, because the position of the Bittern had been accurately ascertained. The master of the Koning Willem I. came to the conclusion, from her whistles, that the Bittern was on his starboard bow, as in fact she was, and at such a distance that there was no risk of collision. There must be danger of collision for the necessity to arise for stopping the engines, and the rule cannot apply to every case of a whistle being heard forward of the beam. The vessels were in a position to pass one another safely, and, had it not been for the improper porting of the Bittern, the collision would never have occurred. In all the cases cited there was a distinct finding of fact that the position of the approaching vessel had not been ascertained, and, as there was danger of collision, the court held that the rule as to stopping applied. It would have been imprudent for the Koning Willem I. to have reversed, as that would have caused her to cant to starboard and towards the Bittern. As the Koning Willem I. is a foreign vessel, and as, it is submitted, the collision occurred outside British territorial jurisdiction, the presumption of fault created by sect. 419 (a) is not binding on her. By sect. 424 there must be an Order in Council making the provisions of Part 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 apply to vessels of the country to which she belongs, and, although it is true that the Government of the Netherlands has consented to the Collision Regulations applying to vessels of that country, yet there is no evidence that they have consented that the provisions of Part 5 of the Act should apply to the ships of that country when beyond the limits of British jurisdiction. If, therefore, the court finds the omission to stop did not in fact contribute to the collision, the Koning Willem I. cannot be deemed to be in fault. They referred to

THE KONING WILLEM I.

Laing, K.C. in reply.—In practice, sect. 419, subsect. 4 has always been applied to a foreign vessel, whether within British territorial jurisdiction or out of it. The owners of the Koning Willem I. have submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, and are counter-claiming for damages. The words of the section give specific directions to the court before whom the case is tried, and the court is bound to draw inferences of blame. The court is therefore bound to try the case by the lex fori, and unless it is satisfied that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulations necessary, or that the breach could not possibly have contributed to the collision, they must find the defendants' vessel to blame if a breach of the regulations has been committed.

April 8.—BUCKNILL, J.—The Bittern was bound up Channel. The Koning Willem I. was bound down Channel, and a dense fog prevailed. The evidence of the Bittern was that her engines were working at dead slow, making a speed of about three knots; that the regulation fog signals were being sounded; that the whistle of what afterwards turned out to be the Koning Willem I. was heard ahead, and slightly on the starboard bow, far off, and was answered at once by the Bittern, and was heard again, this time apparently on the port bow, about a point and a half, and nearer; that that signal was answered and the helm of the Bittern was ported about two and a half points, until her head came to E.  $\frac{1}{2}$  S., and then the helm was steadied and the engines still continued working at dead slow; that then the whistle of the Koning Willem I. was heard apparently about four and a half points on the port bow, and was answered, and the helm was ported a little more, just as the lights of the Koning Willem I. were seen four to five points on the port bow and two ships' lengths away. That short distance indicates the density of the fog. Then the evidence is that the helm was at once hard-a-ported, and an order was given to put the engines full speed ahead as the only possible chance of avoiding a collision; but the Koning Willem I. came on at considerable speed, and her stem struck the Bittern in the way of the engine room, doing her such damage that she had to be run ashore. The place where the collision occurred was, as I find as a fact, about six miles E.N.E. of Dungeness—that is, outside the territorial limit. The evidence on behalf of the Koning Willem I. was that at about 1.30 a.m. she ran into a dense fog, and her engines were put at dead slow, and fog signals were regularly sounded, the vessel being stopped from time to time when other ships' whistles were heard, the position of which was not ascertained; that later on other whistles were heard, and in particular the whistles of two different ships about two or three points on the starboard bow, the positions of which were not then quite ascertained, and which were not ascertained until they were heard a second and a third time, and then they seemed to be broadening on the bow; that a whistle, which turned out to be that of the Bittern, was then heard a fourth time and seemed to be coming nearer, and the engines of the Koning Willem I. were at once stopped; that the whistle then seemed to be getting nearer ahead, and shortly afterwards the masthead and red lights of the Bittern were seen about one and a half points on the starboard bow, and the engines of the Koning Willem I. were at once reversed full speed, but the collision was inevitable. I find as a fact that the ships were not port to port, as alleged by the plaintiffs, but that they were shortly before the collision starboard to starboard, as alleged by the Koning Willem I., and I also find as a fact that the helm of the Koning Willem I. was not starboarded as alleged. From the time of the Bittern's signals being first heard, the helm of the Koning Willem I. was not altered, and she was kept on her course, which was about S.W. by W. westerly, magnetic. On the above facts it was admitted that the Bittern must be held to blame for disobeying art. 16 of the regulations.

The question remains whether the Koning Willem I. is also to blame. The reason given by her master for not stopping his engines when he first heard the whistle of the Bittern, or at the second or third whistle, was this—that his ship was going so slow, and the signal seemed to be so far off, that he thought it better to wait until he heard it again, and that so soon as he heard it more ahead—that is, finer on the bow—he stopped his engines immediately. Not having ascertained the position of the Bittern when her signals were first heard, in my opinion the engines should have been stopped, apart altogether from art. 16, but certainly in accordance with that article. I think, and the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House who assist me agree, that it was in that weather impossible to have ascertained with any degree of certainty the position of the Bittern—that is, the bearing and distance of the Bittern from the Koning Willem I.—when her whistle was first heard, and the master of the Koning Willem I. admits as much himself. I think his duty was, clearly, to have stopped his engines then. With regard to what has been said about signals in a fog, I think I may usefully read part of a paragraph in art. 18 of the Channel Pilot, part 1, 9th edit.: "Sound is conveyed in a very capricious way through the atmosphere. Apart from wind, large areas of silence have been found in different directions and at different distances from the origin of a sound, even in clear weather. Therefore too much confidence should not be felt in hearing a fog signal." Now I will refer to the judgment of the President in the case of The Bernard Hall (ubi sup.), the language of which I adopt. The learned President said: "The Elder Brethren point out that there would be extreme difficulty in knowing how far off the vessel would be in a fog, and therefore they do not think there was any such ascertainment as to justify the Holyrood"—in this case the Koning

Willem I.—"in not complying with the clear terms of art. 16, by stopping her engines when she first heard the whistle of the Bernard Hall; and that it is impossible to say that it would not have been a material matter if she had done so." Each case must, no doubt, be considered on its own facts; and in this case I hold without doubt that the master of the Koning Willem I., a man of great experience, should have grasped the fact that, as it was impossible for him to locate with any certainty in that dense fog the bearing of the Bittern or her distance away, he should have stopped his engines on first hearing her whistle. Instead of that, he waited until he found that the whistles indicated danger, because he heard them drawing ahead, proving that the Bittern was crossing his bows. So, in this part of the case, there has been a breach of the second part of art. 16. As has been pointed out to me by the Elder Brethren, if you stop your engines you can hear better than you can when the noise of the engines and propeller is going on. If you stop your engines you lessen the danger and give yourself better information than if you go on with engines moving, as was done in this case; and it may be that if the master of the Koning Willem I. had stopped his engines when he first heard the whistles, which he thought were far off, he might have come to the conclusion that the whistles were nearer than he thought they were—and I suspect they were nearer. I think it was negligent navigation on his part not to have stopped his engines when he first heard the whistle of the Bittern and to have waited so long as he did. But there is another matter to be considered in connection with the navigation of the Koning Willem I. Her engines were not reversed until the Bittern came into view about 150 yards off. The reason given by the master of the Koning Willem I. is that his way was already almost stopped; but that is a question of fact for my decision, and I find that it is not so. I cannot accept the statement that the engines of the Koning Willem I. were stopped five minutes before they were reversed, or that they were reversed for eighty seconds before the collision. The master was asked in cross-examination by counsel for the plaintiffs, "Have you not said before to-day that your engines were reversed three minutes before the collision?" and he said, "Yes, I have said so; but I find now, by experiments made since the collision, that I must have been wrong, and I prefer to say that the engines were reversed for eighty seconds." That looks very much as if he made experiments to see how long it took, when the engines were working, as he calls it, dead slow, to take the way off the ship. He preferred to put it at eighty seconds. The engines were stopped when the Bittern's whistle was heard narrowing on the bow more than before, and very shortly before the masthead and red lights came into view. Before they were stopped it is said the engines were working at dead slow. That is a very important question of fact which I have to decide. I am not satisfied on the point. I do not like to say that the master of the Koning Willem I. was trying to mislead the court—I do not think he was—but I think he must be mistaken. I have to examine the facts carefully, and I think they lead me to the conclusion that the vessel was not going dead slow when he said she was, and when he probably thought she was.

Take, for example, the entry in the engineer's log: "Steamed from 1.20 at slow, because of fog." "At times remained stopped." I know that in ships of this high class the logs and other documents are supposed to be kept with great care, and it is almost impossible to believe that, if the engines had been working at dead slow for so long a time, it would not have been recorded in the log. The log speaks only of "slow" and "stopped." The damage done to the stem of the Koning Willem I., which was driven in 16in. and set over to port indicates, in our opinion, that that vessel had substantial headway. I find as a fact that both vessels had substantial headway upon them, and, from the facts which I have found, I come to the conclusion that the engines of the Koning Willem I. had not been worked at slow so long as the master thought they had, and were not reversed anything like eighty seconds before the collision. The position, therefore, is this: The collision was, in the first instance, certainly caused or contributed to by the improper navigation of the Bittern—that is admitted; she not only broke art. 16, but her witnesses were not correct when they judged that the Koning Willem I. was on the port bow; in other words, the Bittern ported across the course of the Koning Willem I., and the Koning Willem I. did not starboard across the course of the Bittern. The Koning Willem I., in my own opinion, and in that of the Elder Brethren, distinctly contributed to the collision in two ways. First, by her master not stopping her engines when he ought to have stopped them in that dense fog with so many vessels about. Being in doubt, as he was on his own admission, he ought to have stopped his engines; and when he found shortly after, as he did find and as he admitted he found, that the other vessel was porting and that her whistle signals were narrowing on his bow, indicating to him a position of extreme danger—the position being then that a vessel which could only be seen at about 150 yards was porting across his course—he ought not only to have stopped his engines, but to have reversed them. That is not only required by the rules, but is necessary for proper navigation. These findings of fact render it unnecessary for me to consider the point of law which was raised with regard to the application of sect. 419, sub-sect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and the decree will be that both vessels are to blame.

Subsequently the Ac. took her in tow, and towed her 265 miles, when, owing to the hawser parting, she lost her during the night.

The M. then came up and supplied her with some provisions, and agreed to tow her to F., but, owing to being short of fodder for her cargo of horses, left after having towed her about twelve miles. Eventually the S. came up and towed her into F. Harbour, accompanied by the B. P., a vessel belonging to the same owners, and which had come up shortly after the S.

Held, that all the vessels were entitled to be rewarded.

The A. on the authority of The Benlarig (60 L. T. Rep. 238; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; 14 P. Div. 3) by way of payment for standing by at request, and for her attempts to tow; the Ac. and the M. on the principle laid down in The Atlas (Lush 518) and The Camellia (50 L. T. Rep. 126; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 197; 9 P. Div. 27) for having meritoriously contributed to the ultimate success of the salvage operations; the S. for having towed her to a place of safety; and the B. P. for standing by. A sum total of 8550*l.* awarded.

CONSOLIDATED actions for salvage by the owners, masters, and crews of the steamships Albuera, Acacia, Marquette, Snowflake, and Burgermeister Petersen against the owners of the August Korff, her cargo and freight.

The Albuera was a vessel of 3460 tons gross register, with engines of 1350 horse power indicated, and was on a voyage from Glasgow to Boston with a cargo of coal, manned by a crew of twenty-five hands all told. Her value was 45,000*l.*, and her cargo and freight 4250*l.*—49,250*l.* in all.

The Acacia was a vessel of 2885 tons gross register, with engines of 250 horse power nominal, and was on a voyage from Middlesbrough to Philadelphia, with a cargo of railway materials and pig iron, manned by a crew of twenty-five hands all told. Her value was 35,000*l.*, her cargo 11,775*l.*, and freight 1474*l.*—48,249*l.* in all.

The Marquette was a vessel of 7057 tons gross register, fitted with engines of 770 horse power nominal, and was on a voyage from New York to London with horses, sheep, and a general cargo, manned by a crew of 112 hands all told. Her value was 133,000*l.*, that of her cargo 130,510*l.*, and freight 6323*l.*—269,833*l.* in all.

The Snowflake was a tank steamer of 2710 tons gross register, fitted with engines of 247 horse power nominal, and was on a voyage from New York to Hull with a cargo of petroleum in bulk, manned by a crew of thirty hands all told. Her value was 30,000*l.*, that of her cargo 15,8000*l.*, and freight 2640*l.*—48,440*l.* in all.

The Burgermeister Petersen was a tank steamer belonging to the defendants of 2788 tons gross register, with engines of 225 nominal horse power, and was on a voyage from New York to Bremerhaven with a cargo of petroleum in bulk, and manned by a crew of thirty-four hands all told. Her value was 22,500*l.*, that of her cargo 16,737*l.*, and freight 2300*l.*—41,537*l.* in all.

The facts of the services rendered by the different vessels appear sufficiently from the judgment.

The August Korff was a tank steamer belonging to Hamburg of 4055 tons gross register. She was at the time the services were rendered on a voyage from Philadelphia to Nordenhamn with a cargo of petroleum and naphtha, and manned by a crew of thirty-seven hands all told. Her value in her damaged condition was 27,000*l.*, her cargo 14,578*l.*, and freight at risk 1743*l.*—43,321*l.* in all.

On the 1st Dec. 1902, while in the course of her voyage, and when in latitude 48deg. 19min. N. and longitude 32deg. 26min. W., and about 960 miles from Queenstown, she was struck by a heavy sea which carried away the rudder and part of the stern-post.

Signals of distress were exhibited, and in order to lighten the ship three of the tanks were pumped out, and with her engines and sails she made some progress to the eastward.

On the 2nd Dec. she fell in with a steamship which made fast astern in order to steer her, but gave up the attempt after a short time, and proceeded on her voyage.

The Albuera fell in with her on the 5th Dec., and after receiving assistance from the above-named vessels she was eventually towed into Falmouth Harbour, where she arrived on the 23rd Dec.

Aspinall, K.C. and Bateson for the owners, masters, and crews of the Albuera and Snowflake. The Albuera stood by and rendered services by request, and was delayed on her voyage, and had her ropes damaged and lost. In The Cambrian (76 L. T. Rep. 504; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 263) it was held that even if no benefit results, a vessel is entitled to be rewarded if she stands by or renders services by request. See also ing out a contract to attempt to tow. In neither of these cases has any actual engagement or request been proved. They cannot be distinguished from that of The Dart (80 L. T. Rep. 23; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 481), where the salvage action was dismissed on the ground that no material benefit had been rendered to the other vessel.

BUCKNILL, J.—This is a complicated case, in which I have been much assisted by the advice of the Elder Brethren. On the 1st Dec., in bad weather, the August Korff broke down in the Atlantic about 1000 miles from Falmouth, her rudder and part of the stern-post carrying away. In all other respects she was seaworthy and tight. Various vessels came to her assistance, and the first of these claiming in the present suit was the Albuera, which vessel I find as a fact was, on the 5th Dec., engaged to stand by, and her master undertook that he would, if possible, get the August Korff to the Western Islands. The Albuera tried from the 5th Dec. to the 7th Dec. and her services were by no means easy. The hawser parted at 12.30 p.m. on the 6th, and at 6.30 p.m. both hawsers carried away. She then stood by till daylight, and ultimately, finding it impossible to do more than she had done, proceeded on her voyage. She attempted to do what she had undertaken to do—that is, that she would do her best to tow to Fayal. Having so contracted and having so attempted, but failed in the attempt, I think the case comes within the language used by Butt, J. in The Benlarig (60 L. T. Rep., at p. 240; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 362; 14 P. Div., at p. 6.) as follows: ‘I am glad to be able to hold that they are entitled to some payment, because I think it would be very unfortunate in any way to discourage steamers from rendering assistance to vessels in distress.’ The next ship, the Acacia, certainly towed the August Korff 220 miles as the crow flies; she was four and a half days so engaged, and it is said that she lost in all seven days, and sustained damage to the extent of 188*l.* The weather was then very bad indeed, and the Acacia’s rope parted four times, and she herself was obliged to stop at night for the purpose of making some repairs to the engines, which had been strained or temporarily injured by the services, and she then lost sight of the other ship. It is to be remembered that she might have gone on with the service if it had not been for the accident to her engines which caused her to lose sight of the ship. Her salvage award will be what I call a salvage award pure and simple. I only wish to make part of my judgment the language of Sir James Hannen in The Camellia (ubi sup.) and the language of Dr. Lushington in The Atlas (Lush. 518). The effect of both of those judgments is set out in Kennedy on Salvage, at p. 29, in these words: ‘Whilst, however, the general rule which is illustrated by the above examples is clear, and in the words of Sir James Hannen in a recent case, ‘there can be no doubt that services, however meritorious, which do not in any way contribute to the ultimate safety of the ship are not entitled to salvage award,’ it is equally clear from several decisions, and indeed it has been expressly ruled by the Privy Council that, when a salvage is finally effected, those who meritoriously contribute to that result are entitled to a share in the reward, although the part they took, standing by itself, would not have produced it.’ Now, here the services of the Acacia did meritoriously contribute to the ultimate success. She towed her on her way 220 miles, and but for her the August Korff might never have seen the Snowflake. The services were well performed, and only abruptly ended in consequence of the accident to the salving ship; but whilst giving her a salvage award I must do it on a rather different scale from that on which salvage is awarded to the ultimate salvor who really brought the ship into port. The next ship is the Marquette, and it is a matter of regret that she was not more fortunate. She is a valuable vessel of 7000 tons, and had a large crew on board, and was accepted by the master of the ship in distress as an efficient but expensive instrument to effect his salvage. Now, the Marquette did not tow very much, and, in the difficulty I have felt as to her case, I have asked the Elder Brethren this question: ‘Do you think that that which the Marquette did was a contribution to the ultimate success?’ I will assume that she towed the August Korff twelve miles—that is to say, she probably towed her a distance which would represent hull down to a ship, and the Snowflake to pick her up must have been in sight of her, so that if the August Korff had not been where she was when she was picked up—in other words, had she been twelve miles to the westward of that place—the Snowflake might never have seen her. The Elder Brethren advise me that the mere fact of towing this vessel for twelve miles was a contribution, and an important contribution, to the ultimate success of the salvage operations. If that is so, then I find myself obliged, under the passage I have just read, to hold that the Marquette is entitled to a share in the award. The next case is that of the Snowflake. It is admitted that she was a salvor. To her services the salved ship is immediately indebted for being brought safely into port, and she is entitled to get the largest share of the award. Her services were not very difficult, but they were well performed. Then we come to the Burgermeister Petersen, and her case introduces what I think is a very pleasant trait in the story of the sea. There is no doubt the master of the salved ship, seeing another ship belonging to his owners coming up, might, if he had chosen, have directed the Burgermeister Petersen to get hold of his ship, but with that sort of spirit which, I am sure, prevails amongst sailors, he said: ‘No, she has got hold of me; she had better do her work, and you had better follow me.’ That being so, he was doing his duty to his owners in telling the Burgermeister Petersen to stand by. She did so, and I have now to consider what is to be given to her owners as against the 7000*l.*, the value of the naphtha cargo, the master and crew of the Burgermeister Petersen being entitled to recover against ship, cargo, and freight. The awards I make are as follows: The Albuera 800*l.*, of which her owners will receive 615*l.*, her master 60*l.*, and her crew 125*l.*; the Acacia 2500*l.*, 1900*l.* to the owners, 200*l.* to the master, and 400*l.* to the crew; the Marquette 800*l.*, owners 672*l.*, master 40*l.*, and crew 88*l.*; the Snowflake 4000*l.*, owners 3040*l.*, master 320*l.*, and crew 640*l.*; and the owners of the Burgermeister Petersen 300*l.*, her master and crew 150*l.* The total sum will come to 8550*l.*, for which I give judgment, with costs.

ALGOMA CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY v. THE KING. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF CANADA.

Law of Canada—Customs Tariff Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 16)—“Goods imported into Canada”—Ship—Registration—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60).

A foreign-built ship brought to Canada comes under the head of “goods imported into Canada” within the meaning of the Customs Tariff Act 1897, and the imposition of a duty upon such ship under the Act prior to registration in Canada is not repugnant to the provisions of the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

APPEAL of the suppliants by petition of right against the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, given on the 6th May 1902, reversing the judgment of the Exchequer Court of Canada of the 2nd Dec. 1901 with costs.

On the 15th Sept. 1900 the appellants presented in the Exchequer Court of Canada a petition of right asking: (a) A declaration that they were entitled on the 23rd Oct. 1899 to obtain from the chief officer of Customs at the port of Sault Ste. Marie a permanent certificate of British registry for the steamship Minnie M. free from payment of Customs duties. (b) Repayment of the sum of 3500 dollars paid under protest for Customs duties on the said vessel on the 5th May 1900 with interest. (c) 7500 dollars damages for detention.

By the statement of defence it was contended on behalf of the respondent that the said payment was properly exacted, and made on the ground that the appellants had imported into Canada, on the 23rd Oct. 1899, the Minnie M., a foreign-built vessel, and had thus become liable, on application for Canadian registry, to pay the said sum of 3500 dollars, the Customs duty imposed by the Customs Tariff Act 1897, item 409, and that in any event the appellants had no right to recover interest.

The case was signed on an agreed statement of facts, which was shortly as follows:

1. The appellants were incorporated by a special Act of the Parliament of Canada (62 & 63 Vict. c. 50) to construct a railway from a point at or near the town of Sault Ste. Marie, in the district of Algoma, on the St. Mary river, to a point on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway at or near Dalton station, and thence south-westerly to Michipicoten Harbour upon Lake Superior, with power for the purposes of their undertaking to acquire and run steam and other vessels for cargo and passengers upon any navigable water which their railway might connect with.

2. On the 10th Oct. 1899 the appellants acquired by purchase at Marquette, in the State of Michigan, United States of America, the steamship Minnie M., which had been built in 1884 at Detroit, in the said State of Michigan.

3. On the 16th Oct. 1899 the British Consul at Chicago granted the said vessel a provisional certificate of registry, to continue in force only until the 16th April 1900, or until the said vessel completed her voyage from Chicago to some port, at which there was a British registrar, whichever first happened.

4. On the 23rd Oct. 1899 the said vessel arrived at Sault Ste. Marie, in the Province of Ontario.

5. After the arrival of the said vessel, the appellants applied to the collector of Customs of the said port, who is the registrar of shipping there, for British registry of the said vessel in Canada.

6. The said collector informed the appellants that upon application for such registry the vessel would be chargeable with the duty imposed by item 409 of the Customs Tariff Act 1897, and declined to register the said vessel before such duty was paid.

7. On the 5th May 1900 the appellants paid the said duty, amounting to 3500 dollars, under protest, whereupon the said vessel was registered.

The Customs Tariff Act 1897 provides:

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

4. Subject to the provisions of this Act, and to the requirements of the Customs Act, chapter 32 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all goods enumerated (or) referred to as not enumerated in schedule A to this Act, the several rates of duties of Customs set forth and described in the said schedule, and set opposite to each item respectively, or charged thereon as not enumerated, when such goods are imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein.

Schedule A.—Goods subject to Duties.

409. Ships and other vessels built in any foreign country, whether steam or sailing vessels, on application for Canadian register on the fair market value of the hull, rigging, machinery, and all appurtenances; on the hull, rigging, and all appurtenances, except machinery, 10 per cent. ad valorem; on the boilers, steam engines, and other machinery, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

The word “goods” is defined by the Customs Act, R.S.C., c. 32, to mean, unless the context otherwise requires, Goods, wares, and merchandise or movable effects of any kind, including carriages, horses, cattle, and other animals, except where these latter are manifestly not intended to be included by the said expression.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is further provided by the Customs Act, s. 2, that

All the expressions and provisions of this Act, or of any other law relating to the Customs, unless the context otherwise requires, shall receive such fair and liberal construction and interpretation as will best insure the protection of the revenue and the attainment of the purpose for which this Act or such law was made according to its true intent, meaning, and spirit.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants: (1) That on the true construction of the Customs Tariff Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 16 of the Statutes of Canada) no Customs duty had been imposed for which the appellants became liable under the circumstances of the case. (2) That the provisions of the said Customs Tariff Act 1897 and the schedules thereto, if they did purport to impose such duty, conflicted with the statute of the Imperial Parliament, 57 & 58 Vict. c. 60 (the Merchant Shipping Act 1894), and were ultra vires and of no effect.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 provides as follows:

Sect. 2 (1). Every British ship shall, unless exempted from registry, be registered under this Act. (2) If a ship required by this Act to be registered is not registered under this Act she shall not be recognised as a British ship. (3) A ship required by this Act to be registered may be detained until the master of the ship, if so required, produces the certificate of the registry of the ship.

The preliminaries to registry are detailed in sects. 6 to 10, and the Act contains the following material sections:

Sect. 11. As soon as the requirements of this Act preliminary to registry have been complied with the registrar shall enter in the register book the following particulars respecting the ship: (a) The name of the ship, and the name of the port to which she belongs; (b) the details comprised in the surveyor's certificate; (c) the particulars respecting her origin stated in the declaration of ownership; and (d) the name and description of her registered owner or owners, and if there are more owners than one the proportions in which they are interested in her.

Sect. 14. On completion of the registry of a ship, the registrar shall grant a certificate of registry comprising the particulars respecting her entered in the register book, with the name of her master.

Sect. 22 (1). If at a port not within Her Majesty's dominions, and not being a port of registry established by Order in Council under this Act, a ship becomes the property of persons qualified to own a British ship, the British consular officer there may grant to her master, on his application, a provisional certificate stating (a) the name of the ship; (b) the time and place of her purchase, and the names of her purchasers; (c) the name of her master; and (d) the best particulars respecting her tonnage, build, and description which he is able to obtain; and shall forward a copy of the certificate at the first convenient opportunity to the registrar general of shipping and seamen. (2) Such a provisional certificate shall have the effect of a certificate of registry until the expiration of six months from its date, or until the ship's arrival at a port where there is a registrar (whichever first happens), and on either of those events happening shall cease to have effect.

Application of Part I (i.e., as to registry):

Sect. 91. This part of this Act shall apply to the whole of Her Majesty's dominions, and to all places where Her Majesty has jurisdiction.

The case was heard on the 2nd Dec. 1901 before Burbidge, J., who gave judgment for the appellants, ordering that they should recover from the respondent the sum of 3500 dollars with costs, and further ordering that the questions as to interest and damages should be reserved.

Burbidge, J. was of opinion that the provisions of the Customs Tariff Act 1897 were in no way repugnant to those of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, but that the vessel Minnie M. was not liable to the payment of duty under the provisions of the Customs Tariff Act 1897.

The questions of interest and damages raised in consequence of this judgment were argued on the 7th Dec. 1901 before Burbidge, J., who on the 15th Jan. 1902 gave judgment that the suppliants were not entitled to interest or damages.

The respondent appealed against the judgment of the 2nd Dec. 1901 to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the appellants gave notice of cross-appeal on the question of interest.

The appeal was heard on the 27th March 1902 before Taschereau, Sedgwick, Girouard, Davies, and Mills, JJ.

Judgment was given on the 6th May 1902 allowing the appeal, and dismissing the appellants' (the then respondents) action with costs.

Riddell, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar) and A. D. MacLaren appeared for the appellants, and contended that on the true construction of the Customs Act (Rev. Stat. Can. c. 32) and the Customs Tariff Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 16) no duty was imposed upon the vessel; or if the Acts purported to impose such duty they were inoperative and invalid, as being inconsistent with and repugnant to the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60). At the conclusion of the argument for the appellants their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—In this case their Lordships think it sufficient to express their concurrence in the judgments of the learned judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, to which, in their opinion, it is not possible usefully to add anything. A foreign-built ship was bought by the appellant company in the United States, and brought to Canada. An application was made for registration. When that application was made duty was claimed on the ship as coming under the head of "goods" imported into Canada. It is difficult to see on what ground that claim could be resisted. By sect. 4 of the Customs Tariff Act 1897 duties are imposed on the goods enumerated in sched. A. Sched. A. is headed: "Goods subject to duties"; and item 409 in the schedule is in these words: "Ships and other vessels built in any foreign country, whether steam or sailing vessels, on application for Canadian register, on the fair market value of the hull, rigging, machinery, and all appurtenances." Several difficulties have been suggested. In the first place, it is said that ships are not "goods." It is not necessary to refer to or discuss the language of the Canadian Customs Act, because the Customs Tariff Act 1897 itself places "ships in the schedule or list of 'goods' subject to duty." Secondly, it was argued that ships could not be "imported" into a country. It is not easy to understand that argument; this ship was brought into Canada. Nothing more can be required to satisfy the word "imported." In the next place, a difficulty was suggested with regard to the words "application for Canadian register" in item 409, the contention being that there had been no such application. Their Lordships agree with the Supreme Court in thinking that, as there was no such thing as an independent Canadian register in existence, the words must necessarily mean application for British register in Canada. Lastly, it was urged that the enactment in question is repugnant to the provisions of the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60). Their Lordships are unable to see any repugnancy. The duty is a duty imposed on goods imported, and it is to be collected at the time when the application for registration is made; but payment of the duty is not made a condition of registration. Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal ought to be dismissed. The appellant must pay the costs of it.

PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY v. KINGSTON. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF VICTORIA.

Law of Australia—Customs Act 1901, ss. 127, 192—Ship's stores in bond—Seals broken beyond limit of jurisdiction—Penalties.

By the Australian Customs Act 1901 (Act No. 6 of 1901) ships bringing into Australian ports dutiable articles carried as ships' stores are not liable to pay duty on such stores if they are sealed up by a revenue officer on arrival at the first port in Australia, and not used until after the departure of the ship from her last port of departure in Australia. A penalty is imposed for entering any port in Australia with such seal broken. Where the seal had been broken, and the stores used, by order of the master of a ship during a voyage between two ports in Australia, but on the high seas beyond the limit of Australian territorial jurisdiction:

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the master was liable to the penalty imposed by the Act. Such enactment is not ultra vires.

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court of Victoria, dated the 9th Dec. 1901, entering judgment for the plaintiff in an action to recover penalties for offences under sect. 192 and sects. 127 and 128 of the Customs Act 1901 (Act No. 6 of 1901) of the Commonwealth of Australia.

The action was brought in the name of the respondent, the Minister for Trade and Customs of the Commonwealth, suing in the court of the State pursuant to sect. 245 of the Act.

The judgment of the court was delivered on questions of law raised by the pleadings, all the facts in the plaintiff's statement of claim being admitted.

By the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act (63 & 64 Vict. c. 12) the Commonwealth was established and its Constitution contained in sect. 9 of the Act took effect on the 1st Jan. 1901. By the Constitution, chap. 1, part 5, s. 51, the Parliament of the Commonwealth is empowered, subject to the Constitution, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to (inter alia) (1) trade and commerce with other countries and (2) taxation. By chap. 4, s. 86, on the establishment of the Commonwealth the collection and control of duties of customs and excise passed to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, and by sects. 88 and 90 uniform duties of customs were to be imposed within two years after such establishment, and thereupon the power of the Parliament to impose customs and excise duties was to become exclusive.

By the Customs Act 1901 of the Commonwealth Parliament the administration, control, and management of customs duties is provided for and their collection secured and enforced (inter alia) by penalties. By sect. 31 all goods on board any ship within the limits of any port in Australia are under the control of the Department of Trade and Customs, whose officers have power to board and search any ship and to secure and seal up goods (sects. 186, 187, 190). All goods subject to customs control may be entered (inter alia) for home consumption (sects. 36, 68), and customs duties are to be paid on goods when so entered (sect. 132). By the Customs Tariff 1902 uniform duties are imposed and their collection under the tariff proposals validated as from the 8th Oct. 1901.

The questions in the present case were raised with respect to duties on ships' stores. Inasmuch as Australian vessels paid duty on dutiable articles carried as ships' stores when coasting between ports of the Commonwealth and oversea vessels were at liberty to compete and did compete with them in the coasting trade, the laws of the Commonwealth placed both classes of vessels on the same footing by requiring that duty should be paid on dutiable stores brought by vessels arriving from oversea at a port of the

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Commonwealth if and so far as such stores were available for consumption on board the vessel before her departure from her last port of call in the Commonwealth, and that stores not so available should be sealed up until such departure.

The Customs Act of 1901 (after providing by sect. 191 that no fastening, seal, &c., placed by a customs officer on any goods or on any door, &c., in any ship shall be opened, broken, &c., except by authority while the goods intended to be secured remain subject to customs control) proceeds by sect. 192 to further enact as follows:

No fastening, lock, mark, or seal placed by an officer upon any goods or upon any door, hatchway, opening, or place for the purpose of securing any stores upon any ship which has arrived in any port from parts beyond the seas and which is bound to any other port within the Commonwealth shall be opened, altered, broken, or erased except by authority, and if any ship enters any port with any such fastening, lock, mark, or seal opened, altered, broken, or erased contrary to this section the master shall be guilty of an offence against this Act. Penalty: One hundred pounds.

Sects. 127 and 128 of the Act of 1901 are as follows:

Sect. 127. Ships' stores, whether shipped in parts beyond the seas or in the Commonwealth, unless entered for home consumption or except as prescribed, shall only be used by the passengers and crew and for the service of the ship and after the departure of such ship from her last port of departure in the Commonwealth.

Sect. 128. No ships' stores shall be used contrary to the last preceding section or shall be unshipped except by permission of the collector. Penalty: Fifty pounds.

The statement of claim in this action delivered on the 22nd Nov. 1901 contained the following allegations, all of which were admitted:

(1) The British merchant ship Oceana arrived in the port of Sydney within the Commonwealth from parts beyond the sea on or about the 3rd Nov. 1901 having on board goods being ship's stores meant for consumption on board.

(2) That after the arrival of the ship within the Commonwealth goods being ship's stores meant for consumption on board were shipped within the Commonwealth.

(3) That before the departure of the ship from the port of Sydney the stores referred to were secured on board by the proper officer of customs fastening down or securing the hatchways, doors, or other openings into the holds and lock-ups and lazarettes containing such stores and by placing customs seals on the same.

(4) That the stores referred to were not at any time entered for home consumption or otherwise made available under the laws of the Commonwealth for consumption within the Commonwealth or before the departure of the ship from the last port of departure in the Commonwealth.

(5) That subsequent to the 15th Nov. 1901 the ship left the port of Sydney for Melbourne in the State of Victoria, another port within the Commonwealth, having on board the stores secured and sealed as aforesaid.

(6) That on her voyage between the above ports when the ship was on the high seas and at a distance of more than three miles from land the master caused the doors, hatchways, and openings of the holds, lock-ups, and lazarettes aforesaid to be opened and the customs seals securing the same to be broken.

(7) That between the above ports on her voyage and afterwards during the ship's stay in the port of Melbourne the stores aforesaid were by direction of the master used by the passengers and crew and for the service of the ship.

(8) That the ship arrived from Sydney at the port of Melbourne on her voyage on or about the 18th Nov. 1901 having the seals placed on the doors, hatchways, and openings by the proper officer of customs at the port of Sydney as hereinbefore stated broken without the authority of an officer of customs.

The plaintiff's claim was (a) for 100*l.* penalty in respect of the offence created by the ship's entering the port of Melbourne with the seals aforesaid broken; and (b) 50*l.* penalty for the use of stores while the ship was within territorial waters or in the port of Melbourne.

The defence delivered on the 26th Nov. 1901 raised the following points of law—viz.:

That section 192 (or alternatively so much as purports to impose the penalty in the case of a ship whose seals have been broken more than ten miles from land) and sections 127 and 128 of the said Act of 1901 are respectively ultra vires of the Parliament under the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act and void.

That the Act of 1901 imposes no penalty for the use of ships' stores within territorial waters or in the port of Melbourne.

That on the proper construction of the Act the penalties had not been incurred.

By an order of Hood, J. dated the same day the questions of law raised by the pleadings were with the consent of the parties referred for argument before the full court.

The questions of law came on for argument before the full court (Williams, Holroyd, and Hood, JJ.) on the 3rd, 4th, and 5th Dec. 1901, and on the 9th Dec. the court gave judgment deciding the said questions in favour of the plaintiff, and (the parties consenting) entered judgment for the plaintiff for 5*l.* penalty in respect of the offence (a) and 2*l.* 10*s.* penalty in respect of the offence (b) with costs.

Sir R. Reid, K.C., Haldane, K.C., and Rowlatt, for the appellants, contended that the Commonwealth of Australia had no power to make laws governing British ships on the high seas, and if that is the proper construction of sect. 192 it is ultra vires; but the preferable construction is to limit the operation of sect. 192 to acts done within the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth. They cited

Ray v. M'Mackin, 1 Vict. C. L. Rep. 274;

McLeod v. Attorney-General of New South Wales, 65 L. T. Rep. 321; (1891) A. C. 455.

Asquith, K.C. and Vaughan Hawkins, for the respondent, argued that the legislation was not ultra vires, and on the true construction of the sections the offence had been committed and penalties incurred. There are similar provisions in the English Customs Laws Consolidation Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36), s. 135. See also

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—The action which gives rise to this appeal was brought by the Minister of State for Trade and Customs of the Commonwealth of Australia against one Charles Gadd, the master of the

Priv. Co.] PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION CO. v. KINGSTON. [Priv. Co.]

British merchant ship Oceana, belonging to the appellant company, for penalties under two sections of the Act No. 6 of 1901 of the Commonwealth of Australia, being the Customs Act 1901. The facts are not in dispute, and are set out in the statement of claim and admitted by the defence. The Oceana had on her arrival in the port of Sydney goods liable to duty, and, after her arrival, more goods were shipped on board. Upon none of the goods in question were duties paid, although all of them were liable to duty, but by the arrangement contemplated and in pursuance of the Customs Act in question, the goods were secured on board the Oceana by the customs officer by placing customs seals upon parts of the ship in which they were stored. After the ship left the port of Sydney for Melbourne, and while on the voyage, the defendant caused the receptacles for these goods to be opened and the customs seals to be broken. During the voyage, and afterwards during the ship's stay in the port of Melbourne, the stores were used by the passengers and crew and for the service of the ship. The ship arrived from Sydney at the port of Melbourne having the seals broken without the authority of an officer of the customs. The plaintiff's claim was for 100*l.* by reason of the ship's entering the port of Melbourne with the seals broken; and for 50*l.* for using the stores while the ship was within territorial waters or in the port of Melbourne. The sections under which the action was brought were the 127th and 192nd. Sect. 127 is in these words: "Use of ships' stores.—127. Ships' stores, whether shipped in parts beyond the seas or in the Commonwealth, unless entered for home consumption or except as prescribed, shall only be used by the passengers and crew and for the service of the ship and after the departure of such ship from her last port of departure in the Commonwealth." The language just quoted prohibits the use of ships' stores by the passengers and crew or for the service of the ship unless duty is paid for them, or until the ship has departed from her last port of departure in the Commonwealth. So far as this section is concerned the meaning is obvious enough. All goods being liable to duty upon being imported, ships' stores, which are treated as being privileged from the payment of duty, are only to be used by the passengers and crew of the ship, and even then not until after the departure of the ship from her last port of departure in the Commonwealth. It is difficult to see what objection can be made to the authority to inflict the penalty of 50*l.* which is claimed in respect of the use of stores while the ship was within the territorial waters or in the port of Melbourne, in respect of which use alone the penalty is alleged by the statement of claim to have been incurred.

But the plaintiff claimed 100*l.* in respect of the offence created by sect. 192. That section is in these words: "192. No fastening, lock, mark, or seal placed by an officer upon any goods or upon any door, hatchway, opening, or place for the purpose of securing any stores upon any ship which has arrived in any port from parts beyond the seas and which is bound to any other port within the Commonwealth shall be opened, altered, broken, or erased except by authority, and if any ship enters any port with any such fastening, lock, mark, or seal opened, altered, broken, or erased contrary to this section, the master shall be guilty of an offence against this Act. Penalty: One hundred pounds." The objection urged appears to be that because the breaking of the seals took place on the high seas and outside the jurisdiction of the Australian Commonwealth, sect. 192 was beyond the power of the Australian Commonwealth to enact if applied to such a case as that now under debate. Their Lordships think that the objection is founded on a misapprehension of what the section enacts. The section assumes the lawful imposition of the customs seals for the purpose of exempting from duty goods upon which the Commonwealth might have exacted import duties. But in case of trade and commerce, and as a regulation for navigation, subjects all of which are within the competence of the Commonwealth Legislature, the shipowner is permitted to have on board in Australian ports goods so sealed up that they cannot be used while the seals remain unbroken. This is a privilege accorded to the shipowner who might be compelled to pay duties in respect of all goods on board his ship. The offence created by sect. 192 is the composite act of breaking the seals and coming into an Australian port with the seals broken. When the arrangement referred to has been permitted to the shipowner for the purpose of exempting him from paying duty, it is immaterial where the act of breaking the seals takes place. When he comes back into an Australian port with the seals broken, the offence is complete. As Hood, J. points out, the ship is, by arrangement, converted into a bond so that the stores cannot lawfully be used till the final departure of the ship. As has been pointed out by counsel, the legislation proceeds on precisely the same lines as sect. 135 of the Imperial Customs Laws Consolidation Act 1876, and under that section, if a foreign ship were to take goods so sealed from one bonded warehouse in the United Kingdom to another, although in the course of her voyage she might go outside the territorial limits of the United Kingdom, the very same question might be raised, and upon her arrival at any other port in the United Kingdom the master would undoubtedly, in their Lordships' opinion, be liable to the penalties created by that section. For these reasons their Lordships will humbly recommend to His Majesty to dismiss this appeal. The appellants must pay the costs of it.

COURT OF APPEAL.

July 8 and 9, 1903.

(Before VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, ROMER, and STIRLING, L.JJ.)

OLIVER v. NAUTILUS STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Employer and workman — Injury — Ship — Compensation — Option — Receipts "without prejudice" — Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 2, sub-sect. 1, s. 6.

The plaintiff, a workman who had been injured through the negligence of one of the defendants' servants, signed a receipt for a payment by the agent of an insurance (company with whom the plaintiff's employers had effected insurance) "on account of compensation which may be or become due to me under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897."

Subsequently the plaintiff informed the agent that he could only accept further payments "without prejudice."

He then accepted a payment and signed a receipt as before.

Ultimately he commenced an action against the defendants claiming damages for personal injuries.

Held, that the plaintiff had not exercised the option given to him by sect. 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

Decision of Jelf, J. reversed.

THE plaintiff, who was an engine fitter, entered the service of John Rodgers and Co. Limited, ship repairers, of Cardiff, on the 16th Nov. 1901.

He was on that day directed with others by Thomas Howells, the foreman of John Rodgers and Co. Limited, to go on board the steamship Elm Branch, owned by the defendants, the Nautilus Steam Shipping Company Limited, which was then lying in the Roath Basin, Cardiff, undergoing certain repairs at the hands of John Rodgers and Co. Limited.

On the morning of the 26th Nov. 1901 the plaintiff was at work on the vessel attending to some pipes and connections under the supervision of Thomas Howells and James Powell, the charge-man of John Rodgers and Co. Limited.

Before starting, however, he inquired of Thomas Howells whether everything was safe and in order, and Thomas Howells, in the presence of the plaintiff's assistant, answered in the affirmative.

The plaintiff and his assistant then proceeded to the tank where they were to work and commenced to work.

Suddenly, and without warning to the plaintiff, Lewis Price, the shore donkey man in the employ of the defendants, started the donkey engine for his own purpose and in the performance of his duties.

The exhaust pipe of the donkey engine being at the time disconnected, the exhaust steam found its egress at the nearest open joint or disconnection, which was at the spot where the plaintiff was then working, with the result that the steam suddenly came out with full force upon the plaintiff, who was very severely scalded.

The plaintiff had to be removed to the Cardiff Infirmary, where it was found that his injuries were of a serious nature, and he remained there from that day until the early part of the following year.

At the time of the accident Thomas Howells and James Powell were standing in the engine room, when they heard shouts to stop the donkey engine, and they immediately did so.

No one in the employ of John Rodgers and Co. Limited had occasion to use the donkey engine.

Lewis Price during the time that he was on the vessel was in the employ of the defendants and was paid by them, and was at all times under the supervision of the ship's engineer and liable to obey his orders.

The plaintiff held a first class marine engineer's certificate, and his wages when engaged with John Rodgers and Co. Limited were 2l. 1s. per week.

On the 2nd Dec. 1901 the plaintiff wrote to his employers acquainting them that he had met with an accident while in their employ and describing its nature.

On the 8th Jan. 1902 an agent of the British Employers' Mutual Indemnity Association Limited, with whom John Rodgers and Co. Limited had effected insurance against accidents to workmen in their employ, visited the plaintiff at the infirmary to ascertain his condition.

On the 15th Jan. the agent called again and paid the plaintiff the sum of 4l. 13s. 4d., being at the rate of 1l. a week for four weeks and four days up to the 11th Jan., at the same time handing to the plaintiff for his signature a form of receipt, stating that the sum had been received from his employers per the insurance company "on account of compensation which may be or become due to me under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 in respect of the accident which occurred to me on the 26th day of Nov. 1901." The plaintiff thereupon signed the receipt.

A few days afterwards the delegate for South Wales of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, a trade union of which the plaintiff was a member, called upon the plaintiff, and cautioned him against accepting any future payments unless he stipulated that he did so "without prejudice."

Accordingly when the insurance agent next called, on the 22nd Jan., and tendered the plaintiff 1l. as a payment for the week from the 11th to the 18th Jan., the plaintiff informed him that he could only accept that and any further payments "without prejudice," to which the agent neither assented nor dissented, but said that he would make a note of the fact, which he thereupon did in his notebook.

The plaintiff then accepted the 1l. and signed a receipt as before, though the receipt did not itself contain the words "without prejudice."

On the 1st April the plaintiff left the infirmary.

Weekly payments of 1l. continued to be made to the plaintiff upon similar receipts until the 29th May, when he refused to accept any further payments at all; and on the 5th June he commenced this action against the defendants, claiming damages for personal injuries.

[CT. OF APP.]

OLIVER v. NAUTILUS STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED.

[CT. OF APP.]

The action came on for trial before Jelf, J. sitting without a jury at Cardiff, the damages being agreed at 375*l.* in the event of the learned judge finding in favour of the plaintiff.

On the 31st July 1902 the following judgment was delivered:—

JELF, J.—This case, tried before me on the first day of the assizes, raises a difficult and important question under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. The case was admirably argued by counsel on both sides, and my mind has fluctuated considerably in the course of the argument, and also in dealing with the matter since. But I have come to a definite conclusion which I do not think likely to change on further consideration. Therefore I think it better to give my decision at once, so that the defeated party may, if desirous, go to the Court of Appeal. The plaintiff, a workman in the employ of certain contractors—namely, Messrs. John Rodgers and Co. Limited—sustained serious injury while engaged in work for them on board the steamship Elm Branch, belonging to the defendants, caused by negligence of the defendants' servants. The liability of the defendants was admitted, and damages were contingently agreed upon at 375*l.*, subject to the defence raised in the sixth paragraph of the statement of defence. That defence was that the action was barred by sect. 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, the plaintiff having elected to proceed against his employers for compensation under that Act. The 6th section is as follows: "Where the injury for which compensation is payable under this Act was caused under circumstances creating a legal liability in some person other than the employer to pay damages in respect thereof, the workman may, at his option, proceed either at law against that person to recover damages or against his employer for compensation under this Act, but not against both, and if compensation be paid under this Act the employer shall be entitled to be indemnified by the said other person." The gist of that section is that, where both remedies are open, the workman may, at his option, proceed at common law against the person liable for damages, or against his employer for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897; but not against both. Further, if the course is taken of proceeding against the employer for compensation under the Act, then the employer can claim as against the person liable at common law by way of indemnity, so that the sole question in this case is: Has the plaintiff proceeded against his employers under the Act within the meaning of sect. 6, and so determined his election and debarred himself from bringing the present action? The accident occurred on the 26th Nov. 1901, and a notice, which is a condition precedent under sect. 2 to proceeding under the Act, dated the 2nd Dec. 1901, was sent by the plaintiff to his employers, having been dictated by him to a cousin. This is the notice: [His Lordship read it, and continued:] The plaintiff admitted, and I find as a fact, that when he gave that notice he knew of the existence of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, and he knew that in order to get compensation under it notice of the accident must be given to his employers. And in sending that notice he meant to put himself right in that way.

Afterwards, on Wednesday, the 8th Jan. 1902, an agent of the British Employers' Mutual Indemnity Association Limited, with whom Messrs. John Rodgers and Co. Limited are insured against workmen's risks, and to whom notice had been handed by Messrs. John Rodgers and Co. Limited, visited the plaintiff in the hospital, and informed him that the directors of the association had considered his case and that he would come in a few days and pay him the money due to him up to a certain date. On the next Wednesday, the 15th Jan., the agent came again and paid the plaintiff 4*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, which works out at four weeks and four days' pay at 1*l.* per week, calculated from a fortnight after the accident—that fortnight being the time exempted by the Act up to the previous Saturday, the 11th Jan. This was equivalent to 50 per cent. of the wages which the plaintiff had been earning, and the maximum sum per week which he could obtain under the Act. The agent brought the plaintiff a form of receipt, which was signed by plaintiff in the following terms: [His Lordship read it, and continued:] I find as a fact that, though the plaintiff was low and ill at the time, he understood that sum to be, and he intended to take it, as payment under the Act, and as all that was due at that date in accordance with the terms of the receipt. On the 26th Jan. he received, in like manner, 1*l.* for the week due up to the 18th Jan. and signed a similar receipt for that sum. On that occasion, however, I find as a fact that the plaintiff, having been so advised by the local delegate of his trade union, gave the agent to understand that he took the money "without prejudice." The agent did not acquiesce in, or dissent from, this, but made a note of the fact and informed the insurance company thereof. The plaintiff, however, kept the money and received the 1*l.* per week weekly in like manner up to and including the 1*l.* due on the 29th May, signing similar receipts each time. I find also, as a fact, that the insurance company intended to pay the compensation under the Act, and that the plaintiff intended to take it under the Act; but that the plaintiff tried, after the first occasion when he got the 4*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, to keep open any other remedy if he could. In my opinion, however, this would be an abortive attempt to contract himself out of the provisions of the Act, and, moreover, he had taken the first sum of 4*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* without even making this attempt. In the meantime, in February, the insurance company had sent their doctor to examine the plaintiff, and the plaintiff raised no objection to such examination. This fact may have a bearing on the question of whether there was any proceeding under the Act, inasmuch as the workman is, by the terms of the Act, obliged to submit himself to the doctor of the employer if sent to examine him. Ultimately, after receiving in all 23*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.*, the plaintiff, on the 29th May, said that he had been advised not to take any more money and declined the 1*l.* tendered, and thenceforward no payments have been made. Then this action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendants on the 5th June. There was no evidence that any claim for compensation in writing or verbally was in fact made by the plaintiff to his employers or to the insurance company, who would be subrogated to their rights.

Under these circumstances I have to decide whether the plaintiff had, by reason of the facts above stated, exercised his option and proceeded against his employers under the Act. The main object of sect. 6 is obviously to prevent the workman from trying to avail himself of both remedies, and it would be unjust to allow him to do so, because (1) he would be or might be getting paid twice over; and (2) the employers or the insurance company (subject to the employers' rights) could recover from the person liable at common law the amount obtained from them under this statute, so that the persons liable at common law would have to pay twice over. If, therefore, this is the effect of what the plaintiff has been trying to do, it would be against the spirit and the intention of the Act. Would it also be against the letter of the Act? In answering this question the observations of Lord Halsbury in Powell v. Main Colliery Company Limited (24 C. C. C. Rep. 412; 83 L. T. Rep. 85; (1900) A. C. 366) must be taken into account. Those observations go to show that the scheme of the Act is intentionally non-technical, and the substance of what is done is to be regarded in this light. Apart from other legal decisions, I should be inclined to hold that the plaintiff had exercised his option, and had proceeded against his employers within the meaning of sect. 6, though he had made no formal claim, and indeed no claim at all. The acceptance of the sums and the terms of the receipt seem to me to show that, unnecessary forms being waived on both sides, the plaintiff did elect to take his remedy against his employers under the Act. This view is greatly strengthened by the recent Scotch case of Ryan (or Little) v. MacLellan (2 Fraser's Sco. Sess. Cas., 5th series, 387; 37 Sc. L. Rep. 287). That case arose under another section of the Act, namely, the 1st section, sub-sect. (2) (b), and that section is providing for an option between the two modes of proceeding against the same person—the employer. The section runs thus: "(1) If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this Act." Then comes sub-sect. (2): "Provided that . . . (b) When the injury was caused by the personal negligence or wilful act of the employer, or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this Act shall affect any civil liability of the employer, but in that case the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this Act, or take the same proceedings as were open to him before the commencement of this Act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and under this Act, and shall not be liable to any proceedings independently of this Act, except in case of such personal negligence or wilful act as aforesaid." It will be seen, therefore, that the decision upon that section is in pari materia with the question which I have to deal with under the 6th section. Indeed, in some respects, as has been pointed out in the argument, the words in this sub-sect. (2) (b) are more difficult words to get over than the words in the 6th section, because the words are that the workman may at his option claim compensation under this Act, and the case shows that in the opinion of the Scotch judges who tried that case there was a claim for compensation under the Act, although that was done in no formal way at all, and it was no claim under the Act at all, and the matter was worked out upon payments and receipts almost precisely in the same way as it was worked out in this case. I think that I ought to call attention to some of the words in that judgment. I take them from Fraser, and I think perhaps that this is the part of the judgment that puts most clearly the view to which I am calling attention. Lord McLaren says (at p. 389 of 2 Fraser's Sco. Sess. Cas., 5th series): "It is perfectly plain that compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 and compensation under the Workmen's Liability Act are mutually exclusive. If a workman accepts compensation under the one, he necessarily waives his rights under the other. Now, in so far as appears from evidence in writing, the pursuer has accepted payments under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and so it would appear that he had elected to take compensation under that Act." The words are not quite the same in the receipts in the present case. In the Scotch case some of the receipts were in full satisfaction, and some were on account of compensation. I am not able to make any distinction in my own mind as to the value of that authority on that ground, although I am not bound to follow this case. Although a Scotch case, I adopt the reasoning in it because it entirely accords with my view and contention of the purport of the Act. It seems to me that, in the absence of authorities obliging me to hold the contrary, I have a clear guide as to the course which I ought to pursue in this case by the very learned judges in that case. I must, however, deal with the cases which have been cited and relied upon by the other side. The principal difficulty arises from the case of Rendall v. Hill's Dry Dock Company (82 L. T. Rep. 521; (1900) 2 Q. B. 245), which was decided in May 1900 by the Court of Appeal. There the receipts were in the same form as in the present case, but there were these distinctions: There was no notice of the accident at all as there was in the present case, and there was no submission to the employers' doctor which I think there was in this case. The decision was that there was no evidence of an agreement such as would stop the employers from taking the objection that the request for arbitration was out of time. The case of Rendall v. Hill's Dry Dock Company (ubi sup.) is therefore to be distinguished not only on the ground of the notice—that is to say, the absence of the notice—and the absence of the submission in that case, but also as having been decided alio intuitu. The receipt might well afford no evidence of an agreement by the employers to give up what Smith, L.J., the late Master of the Rolls, calls one of the two lonely provisions in favour of the masters, and yet might afford some evidence of an exercise of option by the workman to proceed under the Act. Then it is not to be forgotten that that case of Rendall v. Hill's Dry Dock Company (ubi sup.) was decided before the light had been obtained from the decision in the case of Powell v. Main Colliery Company Limited (ubi sup.) in the House of Lords, and from the very strong observations of the learned Lords in that case upon the non-technical character of the Act and the necessity to look to substance rather than to form. The defendants' counsel called attention to the case of Wright v. John Bagnall and Sons Limited (82 L. T. Rep. 346; (1900) 2 Q. B. 240), decided by the Court of Appeal in April 1900, a month before Rendall's case (ubi sup.), on the same question as in Rendall's case. But the facts in the present case are more like Rendall's case than Wright v. John Bagnall and Sons Limited (ubi sup.), so that I do not think for my purposes that the latter case is very important. Then, of course, the plaintiff relies a good deal on the case of Powell v. Main Colliery Company Limited (ubi sup.) upon another part of the case than that which is relied upon by the defendants. The plaintiff's counsel used that case to show that the proceedings were initiated by a notice of claim, and that what precedes a notice of claim is not, therefore, part of the proceedings. It must be remembered that the attempt was to make out that there had been no proceedings taken at a stage for the statute to run, and that notice of claim even was not the commencement. Really all that the House of Lords held was that that was a wrong contention, and that the notice of claim was an initiation of the proceedings. They were not negatively deciding that nothing else could be a taking of proceedings; and I do not think they had before them the idea whether or not as between the parties that act was a sort of operation of law, and, by the application of facts to that law, might not amount to taking of proceedings. There are, no doubt, expressions by some of the learned Lords in that case seeming to point to the initiation of the proceedings as being the notice of claim, but there was none in this particular case that I am now deciding. At the same time, I think that the great trend of the case is to show that you have to look to the question whether in substance the workman has exercised the option of going under the Act or not. The only case cited under sect. 6 itself is the case of Parry v. Clements (49 W. R. 669; 17 Times L. Rep. 525), which was decided in May 1901 by Ridley, J. The facts there are clearly distinguishable from the present, as the employers in that case, as is expressly stated in the report, voluntarily continued paying the wages; that is to say, the employers did what some employers do with old workmen—they went on, without any reference to legal liability at all, paying wages that might stop at any time. There would be no obligation to continue paying, and at any rate it could not be said to be a proceeding under the Act. There was a case of Field v. Longden and Sons (85 L. T. Rep. 571; (1902) I K. B. 47) cited by the defendants' counsel in order to emphasise the consideration that the adjustment of compensation without hostile litigation is contemplated by the Act. I have no doubt, and it is probably the fact, that a great number of these cases are very wisely dealt with between employer and employed without having recourse to law at all, or to any sort of litigation, and, indeed, very often without having recourse to lawyers at all. I cannot help thinking that that is to a considerable extent the intention of the Act of Parliament. But when you look at the judgment of Lord Brampton in the case of Powell v. Main Colliery Company Limited (ubi sup.) you will see that he goes so far as to suggest that the initiation of the proceedings might be by the employers themselves. He says (at p. 381 of (1900) A. C.): "I equally disregard all the arguments as to alleged hardships which would be inflicted upon employers by admitting the possibility that threatened proceedings may vexatiously be allowed to hang too long over their heads, and I may add I am not satisfied that employers may not themselves initiate the proceedings by arbitration if they desire to do so; but this House is not called upon to decide that question to-day." I only cite that passage to show that in the opinion of Lord Brampton it was quite open to argument that the proceedings might be begun by the employers themselves, and therefore quite irrespective of a claim by the employer. Then there is the Irish case of Beckley v. Scott and Co. (K. B. Div. Ireland, Jan. 23, 1902), to which I have been referred. The only report I have is in the Labour Gazette, published by the Board of Trade, and I have taken it, by agreement of the parties, as a correct statement of what was decided. The decision in that case was supported in the court above (1902) 2 Ir. Rep. 504). It will be observed that the point, which makes it, in my opinion, of no assistance to us here, was that there the ground on which the claim purported to be made under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 failed because the workman had not been long enough in the employment of the firm to be entitled to compensation under the Act; in other words, that it was not a case under the Act at all.

It is the essence of these decisions that the man should have alternative remedies, and should be allowed to choose; and if he chooses one, that he shall not have the other. If he chooses what he thinks is his remedy, but which is not really a remedy at all by law, he clearly is not shut out from exercising his ordinary common law right of going against the person who is really liable to him. What he has done thinking he has got a cause under a particular Act of Parliament and failed is quite a different thing from the exercise of an option where he has got the two remedies. Therefore I do not think that the Irish case really assists us at all. My mind has been exercised to some extent over the question whether the plaintiff in this case, if I am right in giving judgment for the defendant, falls, so to speak, between two stools; whether he has lost the right to go back to his former line of proceeding under the Act and obtain compensation, and go on obtaining compensation which was paid to him regularly for a great number of weeks—viz., 1*l* a week—the maximum amount from his employer. I think that that is a very doubtful matter. The learned counsel on both sides differ as to it, and I do not think that it is necessary for me to go into it. I think that it is extremely doubtful whether he could or not. The Scotch case seems to point to the possibility of going back, and I do not think that it is necessary to go into the question of whether there is an agreement sufficiently certain to enable a registration of the agreement to be made, or to go, indeed, into any of the details of the matter. I must leave it as an uncertain question whether or not the plaintiff is shut out from going back upon the lines which he was formerly following. What I desire to say is this, that if he is shut out it is his own act. And I do not think that I ought to allow a man by a sort of appeal ad misericordiam to be enabled to do that which, in my opinion, is in the teeth of the Act of Parliament, which makes it necessary for him to exercise an option, and to adhere to that option when he has exercised it. If he chooses to follow the example of the dog in the fable, who dropped the substance and grasped at the shadow, it is a matter in which he has been ill-advised, and he must take the consequences. Also I cannot help feeling, as some little satisfaction in this case, that it is obvious, from what came out in the course of the examination of the witness, that in what he has been doing he has been advised by the secretary of his trade union, and in all probability there is an indemnity, or, at any rate, this is taken up as a test case in some way or another, and I must leave a hard case—if it is a hard case—without troubling myself thereby to make bad law. Under these circumstances I have come to the conclusion that the defendants are entitled to judgment upon the ground that the plaintiff has within the meaning of the 6th section of the Act exercised his option to go against his employers for compensation, and is therefore debarred from going also at common law against the persons who have by negligence rendered themselves liable to the plaintiff for the damages which might be recovered against them. I therefore give judgment for the defendants; but I wish to say this, that I do so, of course, with a full recognition of the importance and difficulty of the case, and with every desire to facilitate the consideration of the matter by the Court of Appeal. I think it is possible that if an application were made, seeing that this may be a far-reaching decision, the Court of Appeal might accelerate the hearing of an appeal, if it is desired to appeal, and if I can be of any use in helping that I shall be very happy. At present all I can do is to give judgment for the defendants, and I think I ought, if it is desired, to stay execution as to costs for a reasonable time, say a fortnight or a month, and, if within that time notice of appeal is given, until the hearing of the appeal.

From that decision the plaintiff now appealed.

S. T. Evans, K.C. (with him John Sankey) for the appellant.—The claim in the present case arose under sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. It is a claim which is admitted to be a just one against strangers, the defendants here. They were not affected by the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. That Act deals with workmen on the one hand and employers on the other. The Legislature apprehended that, if something was not done to protect persons liable at common law, workmen might be able to get compensation from two different sources. Sect. 6 was therefore inserted in the statute. Reading that section in the way in which the House of Lords did in Powell v. Main Colliery Company Limited (ubi sup.), the workman has not the right to obtain compensation against his employers and the strangers likewise. He may at any time before having his award exercise his option, and proceed at common law against the strangers for damages. But the statute makes it impossible for the workman to have his compensation twice over. In the present case it is an employee of strangers—the defendants—who has been guilty of negligence; and those strangers must show that they have been rendered free of their common law liability. All that has to be seen is that the workman does not get his compensation twice over. But so long as the award is not made, the workman can turn round and proceed against the strangers. You cannot eliminate from this case that right, for his option has not been exercised which will preclude him for ever from suing the defendants. The following are the cases which bear on the point:

Randall (or Rendall) v. Hill's Dry Dock Company, 24 C. C. C. Rep. 383; 82 L. T. Rep. 521; (1900) 2 Q. B. 245;

Wright v. John Bagnall and Sons Limited, 24 C. C. C. Rep. 346; 82 L. T. Rep. 346; (1900) 2 Q. B. 240;

Perry v. Clements, 49 W. R. 669; 17 Times L. Rep. 525;

Tong v. Great Northern Railway Company, 18 Times L. Rep. 566;

Field v. Lengden and Sons, 85 L. T. Rep. 571; (1902) 1 K. B. 47;

Ryan (or Little) v. MacLellan, 2 Fraser's Soc. Sess. Cas., 5th series, 387;

Beckley v. Scott and Co., (1902) 2 Ir. Rep. 504;

Thompson and Sons v. North-Eastern Marine Engineering Company Limited, ante, p. 93; 88 L. T. Rep. 239; (1903) 1 K. B. 428.

Abel Thomas, K.C. (with him A. Parsons) for the respondents.—There is a broad distinction between the present case and Randall (or Rendall) v. Hill's Dry Dock Company (ubi sup.). A workman cannot exercise any option unless he has two remedies—one against his employer and another against a stranger. But it is an option only which he has; he cannot proceed against both. The workman must stand upon his option, and the claim does not depend upon any agreement between him and his employers. The case of Randall (or Rendall) v. Hill's Dry Dock Company (ubi sup.) was decided upon something in sect. 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 which has not to be decided here. That case was therefore determined upon quite a different principle than has to be considered in the present case. The case of Wright v. John Bagnall and Sons Limited (ubi sup.) turned also upon a point quite immaterial to the question which the court has now to decide. The real and only question is whether the workman in the present case did in fact exercise an option. He has no remedy against both his employers and the strangers; he must not proceed against both. The only case actually in point here is Ryan (or Little) v. MacLellan (ubi sup.), and that, I submit, much assists my contention. I say, therefore, that Jelf, J. was right in finding that the workman had exercised his option. He referred also to

Ellen v. Great Northern Railway Company, 49 W. R. 395.

S. T. Evans, K.C. in reply.—The only cases referred to in the judgment in Ellen v. Great Northern Railway Company (ubi sup.) were

Prosser v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Accident Insurance Company, 6 Times L. Rep. 285;

Rideal v. Great Western Railway Company, 1 F. & F. 706.

The case of Ryan (or Little) v. MacLellan (ubi sup.) was very different from the present in all its particulars. There is nothing here to show an election or the exercise of an option. Whatever "exercise of an option" may mean—the words are not in the statute—the workman in the present case never did exercise his option. There is no evidence to prove that at the time of the accident there was any negligence on the part of the strangers; and this shows that the workman could not have been exercising his option when he accepted compensation from his employers through the insurance company, instead of proceeding at once against the defendants.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the plaintiff sues the Nautilus Steam Shipping Company Limited upon the ground that he has been injured under circumstances which throw upon the defendants prima facie a legal liability in respect of the injury which he has sustained. It is not in dispute that that is true. The defendants who are under this prima facie liability rely for their defence upon the 6th section of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. I will read that section in a moment, but I want to say beforehand that the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 is not a very easy Act of Parliament to construe. It is an Act of Parliament as to which I think I may properly say that the difficulties of construction are so great that it is not desirable that in any case judges should decide more than is absolutely necessary for the decision of the particular case before them. However, I do not propose to do so myself if I can help it. Now, sect. 6 says this: "Where the injury for which compensation is payable under this Act was caused under circumstances creating a legal liability in some person other than the employer to pay damages in respect thereof." I pause for a moment to remark that we have that here, because the defendants, the Nautilus Steam Shipping Company Limited, are persons other than the employer liable to pay damages in respect thereof. The section goes on to provide: "The workman may, at his option, proceed either at law against that person to recover damages, or against his employer for compensation under this Act, but not against both, and if compensation be paid under this Act the employer shall be entitled to be indemnified by the said other person." Now, "the said other person" in the present case are the defendants. They come here and they say that the plaintiff has proceeded "against his employer for compensation under this Act"; that he has not only proceeded "against his employer for compensation under this Act," but that he has succeeded in obtaining payment of compensation under this Act; and that, under those circumstances, by the very terms of the 6th section of the Act of Parliament, the workman cannot now bring an action against the other person legally liable to pay damages, because he has proceeded against his employer, and has received compensation from the employer under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. I do not understand Mr. Evans to argue that, if it was true to say in this case that a workman had received from his employer compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, as such, he could afterwards sue the "other person." I do not think he contends so; but, whether he does so or not, I say that in my judgment if that had happened it is perfectly plain, whichever view you may take of the 6th section, that a workman who has received compensation from the employer under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 cannot afterwards sue that other person. Therefore really the sole question in this case is: Has Mr. Oliver received compensation from his employer under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897? Mr. Evans addressed to us an argument which, I think, was based upon Rendall v. Hill's Dry Dock Company (ubi sup.). He says that in that case it was held—there being a receipt in the identical form of the receipt in the present case—that the plaintiff who had received moneys much as this plaintiff has received moneys had not thereby commenced proceedings so as to exempt himself from the operation of the limitation which is provided by sect. 2, sub-sect. 1. That is the section which says "Proceedings for the recovery under this Act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintainable unless notice of the accident has been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof and before the workman has voluntarily left the employment in which he was injured, and unless the claim for compensation with respect to such accident has been made within six months from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury." He said to us that, because the Court of Appeal held in the case of Rendall v. Hill's Dry Dock Company (ubi sup.) that the payment and the presence of the receipt in the same form as the receipt in this case was not held to be a claim for compensation within the six months so as to oust the operation of the statutory limitation, therefore we ought to hold in the present case that there has been no claim under the Act of 1897, and no payment under such a claim. I can only say that I do not agree with that argument. It must be remembered that, at the time when that case was decided, it was supposed—following the law as laid down by the Court of Appeal in Powell v. Main Colliery Company Limited (24 C. C. Rep. 412; 83 L. T. Rep. 85; (1900) A. C. 366) that the claim for compensation which must be made within the six months was a claim which must be made by a step in legal proceedings, such as filing a claim for arbitration in the County Court. Therefore I shall not trouble any more about that case, because I really do not think that it affects the question which we have to decide here at all. The only question, as I have already said, which we have to decide here is whether or not there has been money paid and received under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 by the employer to the workman. I should have been inclined to say if it had not been for the evidence about the receipt being "without prejudice"—which was expressed by the workman upon the occasion of receiving the second payment, and which, moreover, was noted by the agent who made that payment in his book—that the action against the person other than the employer could not possibly have been brought, having regard to the terms of sect. 6 of the Act of 1897. I think that that which was said by the workman in the hospital about "without prejudice" and accepted by the agent paying the money makes all the difference. Mr. Abel Thomas, who always is willing in any case which he argues to meet the real difficulty in the case, most frankly accepted the proposition that if there had been no first payment made without being subject to this expression of "without prejudice," he really could not have supported his case here. He accepted the position that the result of the expression "without prejudice" was that which was described by the learned judge in the court below. He says in his judgment: "I find also as a fact that the insurance company intended to pay the compensation under the Act, and that the plaintiff intended to take it under the Act; but that the plaintiff tried, after the first occasion when he got the 4*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, to keep open any other remedy if he could." If that was so, Mr. Abel Thomas was perfectly right in saying that, having regard to all those payments which were made under the reservation of "without prejudice," it could not be said that those payments were payments which prevented the plaintiff suing the "other person" mentioned in the 6th section of the Act, because those payments were made without prejudice (as the learned judge in the court below says) to any other remedy which the plaintiff might have. And I should go further myself and say: "Altogether without prejudice in any respect." Here there was an agent who was standing in the shoes of the employer, and who might be expected to act in the same way that an employer, taking an interest in his workmen, might be expected to act—that is to say, come to the man lying in a state of suffering, as he then was, and say: "You are entitled under the Act of Parliament, if you claim compensation, to receive each week a sum of money bearing the statutory proportion to your wage. Here it is, take it, and take it without prejudice; which means leaving you exactly in the same position as if you had not taken it, and not binding you to retain the money in any way if you, upon rising from your sick bed, should think it better not to accept this money from me, your employer, under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, but elect to take the remedy against the other person who has the legal liability described in the 6th section of the Act." Now, having said that, it seems to me that the only difficulty which remains is the difficulty which arises in respect of the first payment—that is, the payment which was made up on the 15th Jan. 1902. That was not made subject to any such reservation as "without prejudice." The real question is, Ought we to treat the first payment as having been made subject to the same condition as the later payments? I think we ought. My reason for that is this: After all, a receipt does not in itself create any estoppel of any sort or kind. You may take all the circumstances surrounding it into consideration and ask yourself the question what really was intended by the parties when the receipt was given and taken. One must not forget—although I am not going to quarrel with Jelf, J.'s findings—that the plaintiff understood what he was doing when he gave the receipt—understood, that is to say, that he was receiving a payment of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. I do not think that it would be a fair inference to draw that the plaintiff at that moment was in such a state of bodily health and mind that really he could make no election as to what would be the best course to pursue. To my mind, you cannot have a stronger piece of evidence that this is true as to the state of things upon the 15th Jan. 1902 than the evidence of the acts of the agent of the insurance company. What does the agent mean when, upon the next occasion, the next week, he accepted, as he clearly did accept, the receipt which was given subject to the qualification of "without prejudice"? He accepted it upon that occasion, and he accepted it upon all subsequent occasions until the month of May 1902, when the plaintiff refused to receive any more payments. What did the agent think it all meant when he accepted that qualification or that reservation? Did he really think, and did he ask the learned judge who tried the case, and does he ask us now to say—or do those who really rely upon his evidence ask us to say—that when this reservation was given and accepted by him it did not matter whether the plaintiff made a reservation or whether he did not make a reservation, because he had already committed himself by the first receipt and the first acceptance; and that it was idle for him to think of reserving any other remedy that he might have because he had already precluded himself from any further option by the first payment which was made, and in respect of which he was content to give a receipt? I do not think that the agent would be willing to have that view taken of his conduct. My own view is that by quietly accepting that reservation or qualification "without prejudice," which he entered in his book and communicated to his principals without making any protest or objection to it to the plaintiff, he agreed really that the qualification was to override the whole of the receipts. Once you have got it that that qualification is to override all the receipts, it seems to me that there is an end of the defence set up by the defendants here. It may be perfectly true to say that where there is a receipt which without any qualification acknowledges the receipt of money under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, there has been a claim or a proceeding within the meaning of sect. 6. But, in my judgment, that cannot properly be said where the payment in question is not an unqualified receipt of the money, but a receipt given by a sick man who, at the moment of giving the receipt, expressly makes the acknowledgment of the receipt subject to the qualification of "without prejudice." In my judgment, this is sufficient to dispose of the case. I think that, under those circumstances, the plaintiff was entitled to bring his action; and, as the damages have been agreed, I think that we ought to allow this appeal and reverse the decision of Jelf, J., and enter judgment for the plaintiff for 37*5*l. I only have to add that I have tried not to express any opinion, or give any judgment, upon any points other than those necessary for the decision of the present case, beyond saying that if there is a payment and a receipt of money under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, and that receipt is in no way qualified, I think that that is sufficient to bring the case within the operation of sect. 6, and put the workman in a position of a man who has proceeded against his employer for compensation and recovered it. I express no opinion whatsoever upon the numerous points which have been very properly raised in the discussion of this case before us.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. To my mind, the question upon which the present appeal turns is simply whether the plaintiff before he commenced this action had exercised the option given to him by sect. 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 by proceeding against his employers so as to preclude him, by virtue of that section, from now suing the defendants. The learned judge in the court below came to the conclusion that the plaintiff had exercised the option in the sense that I have mentioned. But this, to my mind, is chiefly because the learned judge drew certain inferences from the facts of the case which were really not much in dispute. It is quite open to us, in my opinion, to differ from the learned judge upon the conclusion of fact which he has come to in this case. This is not like a case where a judge has seen the witnesses and has had to decide a question of fact that depended upon which side the witnesses were speaking the truth, where there was a direct conflict of evidence. Where there is a direct conflict of evidence on the main issue of fact, and the judge has seen the witnesses and declared that he believes one side and not the other, naturally enough the Court of Appeal would not like to differ from the judge in such a case as that. That is, to my mind, wholly distinct from the present case. I think that this case is one, as I have said, where the learned judge has proceeded upon certain inferences which he has drawn from the facts, and from which facts it is as well open for us to draw inferences as the learned judge in the court below. I think, therefore, that I am at liberty to decide this question of fact for myself upon the evidence; and, looking at the evidence, I come to the conclusion that it would not be right for us to hold that the plaintiff had precluded himself by what he did from now suing the defendants. In the first place, let me point out that under sect. 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 it cannot, I think, be said that a workman must necessarily be held to have exercised the option given to him by that section as against his employers, or as against the stranger liable, because he has taken some proceedings either at law against the stranger or under the Act against his employers. Whether the proceedings would in fact be such as to bind the workman must depend upon the circumstances of each case, including a consideration of what has resulted from the proceedings, and whether or not any injury will result if the proceedings are held not to irrevocably bind the workman. Further, I should like for myself to say that, in dealing with any particular case, I should try and look at it as a matter of substance, and decide it on the substance rather than on matters of form. I will further add that, as at present advised, though it is not necessary for me to express a final opinion for the determination of this case, I am disposed to think that proceedings should not be held to irrevocably bind the workman unless those proceedings have resulted in some compensation as such having been paid to and received by the workman so as to bind the parties. With those observations, I proceed to deal with the facts of the present case. The workman, after he was injured, sent in a notice of injury. That was a proceeding taken, and properly taken, by him by way of caution, and certainly was an innocent act, and one that would not bind him in any way so far as concerns the point involved in this appeal. Now, until I come to deal with the question of certain payments that have been made to him, beyond sending that notice of injury it seems that the workman did absolutely nothing in this case; he did not make a formal claim; he sent in no notice of claim. The fact that a doctor subsequently visited him I only mention in passing, because it appears to me that it really has no materiality in it. I therefore proceed at once to the question of the payments that were made to the workman. To my mind, it is most material to see how those payments were made and in what respect they were paid, and how they were received by the workman. They were paid in this wise: The workman was lying seriously ill. I take it that, although seriously ill and in great pain, he understood sufficiently to know what was passing. An agent comes from the insurance company—who have indemnified the employers and therefore are the persons really bound to pay if the employers are liable—and offers to make a certain payment, something like a weekly payment, to the workman and takes a receipt. That receipt has been so often read that I need not repeat it. It purports to be a receipt of a sum on account of compensation which might be or become due to the workman under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. I will take it that the workman knew what was in that receipt, and that he knew that he had a claim, or might make a claim, under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. But when the receipt is considered this is at any rate clear, that it in no wise bound the employers to any recognition of liability on their part. It left everything open to them except—although I need not decide the question—that it is possible after the receipt had been given it might be implied, as between the parties, that a claim was supposed to have been made by the workman under the Act. But the payments were not made, as I have already pointed out, as admitting any liability on the part of the employers; nor can the payments be taken, therefore, as against the workman, to have been received by him irrevocably or as having been made on an admission, as between the parties, of liability on the one part and receipt in respect of an admitted right by the workman on the other. It seems to me to have left, even on the form of the receipt, the position of the parties in an intermediate state. Neither party, it appears to me, was absolutely bound by the payments, nor by the form of the receipt. But the matter does not stand there. After the first payment had been made, the agent of the insurance company comes again to make a further weekly payment. In the meantime, between the first payment and the second, the plaintiff is informed by an officer of his trade union that payments ought to be received by him expressly "without prejudice," and, accordingly, the next payment and all the subsequent payments are made to the workman on the terms that they are received by the workman expressly "without prejudice." I infer from the officer of the trade union having come to the workman, and from the evidence in this case, that between the first payment and the second the plaintiff had been informed of what he was previously ignorant, that he might have a claim against the defendants, and not necessarily a claim against the employers at all under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. At any rate, this is clear, that the second payment and all subsequent payments were made to and received by the workman expressly without prejudice. It is noticeable that no objection was made on behalf of the agent for the insurance company to the payments being made and received on that footing. It appears to me that under those circumstances we ought not to consider the first payment to be left standing, as it were, by itself as an isolated and fatal fact, but that we must look to see what subsequently took place. I think that the second payment and subsequent payments made expressly without prejudice show under the circumstances that the parties must have treated the first payment as being held, as between the parties, not to have irrevocably bound the workman, but to be taken also, for the purpose I am now considering, as being likewise without prejudice. It is admitted before us that for the purpose of this appeal the plaintiff cannot be said to have been at all prejudiced or affected by any of the payments after the first. But it is said, and the learned judge in the court below has so decided, that because of that one payment made, and that one without anything expressly being said by the workman at the time of payment—notwithstanding the form of the receipt and notwithstanding the other circumstances—that that first payment and retainer of the money irrevocably bound the workman, and made it impossible for him, notwithstanding all the circumstances thereafter, to say that the defendants remain liable to him, as they undoubtedly were liable, at common law. I think that under the circumstances we ought not to agree with the learned judge in that conclusion. It seems to me that, looking at the substance of this case, justice requires that we should hold that the workman has not irrevocably bound himself by what he has done; and that he has not exercised his option under sect. 6 in such a manner as to enable the defendants to say in this case that they are free from all liability to the plaintiff under the common law. I need only say in conclusion that, in my opinion, the case of Ryan (or Little) v. MacLellan (2 Fraser's Sco. Sess. Cas., 5th series, 387) is perfectly distinct from the present case. In fact, if the judgments of the learned judges who decided that case are looked at, it will be seen that they base their decision on grounds which emphasise the distinction between that case and the present. They found there, as a matter of fact, the payments were made to and received by the workman as payments due in respect of an admitted liability, and as a satisfaction pro tanto, as they went on, of the liability under the Workman's Compensation Act 1897. The circumstances of that case are quite distinct from the present; and, as I have said, the very reasons on which that case was based show, to my mind, that, if the learned judges had had to decide the present case, they would have decided it in the way in which we are doing. At any rate, it forms no authority against the views I am now expressing. I agree, therefore, that this appeal ought to succeed.

[CT. OF APP.]

STIBLING, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I respectfully differ from Jelf, J. on this point. I think, as my brethren do, that he has attached too little importance to the fact that all the payments after the first were made without prejudice. I do not differ from him or question any of his findings of fact as they stand. But I think, in the conclusion at which he has arrived, he neglected to give the weight which is attributable to that circumstance. And I agree with the view which my brethren have taken of the case, having regard to the fact that the payments subsequent to the first were so made. I wish, however, to say for myself that I have great difficulty in seeing how Jelf, J.'s decision is reconcilable with the decision in Rendall v. Hill's Dry Dock Company (ubi sup.), which was cited by Mr. Evans. That case must be read in connection with the case which preceded it of Wright v. John Bagnall and Sons Limited (ubi sup.). I understand Wright v. John Bagnall and Sons Limited to be a decision that, where an agreement is arrived at between the employer and the servant, there is a statutory liability on the part of the employer to pay compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897; but that if the parties leave the amount of compensation to be settled afterwards by a judge or arbitrator the employer will not be allowed to set up the defence that no claim was made within six months of the accident. That I understand to be in accordance with the decision in the Scotch case of Ryan (or Little) v. MacLellan (ubi sup.), which has been referred to. That being the state of things in Wright v. John Bagnall and Sons Limited (ubi sup.), the case of Rendall v. Hill's Dry Dock Company (ubi sup.) occurred shortly afterwards. There what took place was this: There was apparently no notice of the injury sent under the Act; nor was there any formal claim put forward. But payments were made by an insurance company on behalf of the employers and receipts were taken precisely in the same form as are found to have been taken in the present case. In that state of things the County Court judge before whom the case came held that a claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 did not mean only an application for arbitration. He further held that if, having regard to the defence of the appellants, it was open to them to object that the weekly receipts signed by the respondent were not claims for compensation, such receipts were either claims for compensation or were evidence that a claim had been made; and that the appellants, by taking such receipts and paying the weekly sums therein mentioned, either waived a claim for compensation or were estopped from taking their objection. He held, therefore, that the employers were not entitled to set up the objection that no claim had been made within the six months. I think that it is quite true, as has been pointed out by my Lord, that at that time the decision in Powell v. Main Colliery Company Limited (24 C. C. C. Rep. 412; 83 L. T. Rep. 85; (1900) A. C. 366) in the Court of Appeal was standing, and the case was decided with reference to that decision. But it does not seem to me that that exhausts the case, because Smith, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the court, after referring to the receipt, says (at p. 249 of (1900) 2 Q. B.): "Do these circumstances show a waiver of the six months' limitation, or amount to an estoppel against setting up that defence? Clearly they do not." Then, after referring to the case of Wright v. John Bagnall and Sons Limited (ubi sup.), he says: "What was the ratio decidendi in that case? There the claim for compensation had not been made within six months of the accident, and the County Court judge held, as my brother Collins says, that the parties had agreed that there was a statutory liability on the respondents to pay compensation, and that each of them had reserved the right to go to the court to have the amount determined. My brother Williams seems also, during the argument, to have said what was exactly to the same effect. Where is there any evidence in the present case that the parties agreed that there was a liability on the part of the employers to pay compensation? I can see no evidence of any such agreement." The evidence before the court in that case was exactly similar to the evidence which occurs here. And it seems to me that that case constitutes a great difficulty in the way of upholding Jelf, J.'s decision in the present case. I desire to abstain from expressing any opinion as to what might be held to be the true meaning of the word "proceed" in the 6th section of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, only saying that it seems to me that great weight should be attached to the judgments which have been delivered in the Irish case of Beckley v. Scott and Co. (1902) 2 Ir. Rep. 504).

THE CAYO BONITO. (a)

Collision—Compulsory pilotage in the London district—Ship carrying passengers—Meaning of "trader"—6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59—Order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 353, 379—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 603, 622.

The Order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854 extending the exemptions from compulsory pilotage contained in sect. 59 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, has not been repealed by any of the provisions of subsequent Merchant Shipping Acts, and applies to ships or vessels trading to ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic, whether carrying passengers or not.

In order to entitle a vessel to the exemptions contained in the Order in Council it is not necessary that she should be a "constant" trader. It is not necessary, in order to constitute a "constant" trader, that a vessel should be exclusively engaged in trading to ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic.

Judgment of Barnes J. affirmed.

APPEAL by the defendants in a collision action brought by the owners of the steamship British Prince against the owners of the steamship Cayo Bonito.

A report of the case below will be found in 86 L. T. Rep. 867; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 308; (1902) P. 216.

The British Prince, a steamship of 7326 tons gross register, was at the time on a voyage from New York to London and Antwerp with a general cargo, cattle, horses, and cattlemen.

The Cayo Bonito, a steamship of 3427 tons gross register, belonging to the Cuban Steamship Company, was on a voyage from London to Coatzacoalcas, via Antwerp, Havana, and Vera Cruz, with a part general cargo, and carrying one passenger.

The collision occurred about 10.15 p.m. on the 8th Feb. 1902, in the Thames estuary, near the Black Deep Lightship. Both vessels were in charge of pilots at the time of the collision.

The Pilotage Acts and Orders in Council dealing with the question are as follows:—

Sect. 1 of 5 Geo. 2, c. 20:

From and after the twenty-fourth day of June in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and thirty-two, if any person shall take upon himself the charge of any ship or vessel as pilot down the river of Thames or through the North Channel to or by Orfordness, or round the Long Sand Head into the Downs, or down the South Channel into the Downs, or from or by Orfordness up the North Channel, or the river Thames, or the river of Medway, other than such person as shall be licensed and authorised to act as a pilot by the said Master, Wardens, and Assistants [of the Corporation of the Trinity House] for the time being . . . every person so offending, and being thereof lawfully convicted . . . shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of twenty pounds: Provided, that nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to the obliging of any master or owner of any ship in the coal trade, or other coasting trade, to employ or make use of any pilot.

Sect. 2 of 48 Geo. 3, c. 104, provides:

That from and after the first day of October one thousand eight hundred and eight, it shall be lawful . . . for the Corporation of the Trinity House of Deptford Strand and they are hereby required to appoint and license under their common seal fit and competent persons, duly skilled, as pilots for the purpose of conducting all ships and vessels sailing, navigating, and passing up and down or upon the rivers of Thames and Medway, and all and every the said channels, creeks, and docks thereof or therein, or leading or adjoining thereto, as well as between Orfordness and London Bridge, as from London Bridge to the Downs, and from the Downs westward as far as the Isle of Wight, and in the English Channel from the Isle of Wight up to London Bridge, which vessels shall be conducted and piloted by such pilots so appointed and licensed, by no other pilots or persons whomsoever, except pilots appointed by the Society or Fellowship of the Trinity House of Dover, Deal, and the Isle of Thanet (commonly called Cinque Port pilots), so far as such pilots are hereby authorised to pilot ships and vessels from the westward up to London Bridge, and from London Bridge downwards to the westward; that is to say, from any port or place between the Isle of Wight and the said bridge, according to the provisions in that behalf hereinafter contained, and also save and except, as well all colliers, as also all ships and vessels trading to Norway and to the Cattegat and Baltic, and likewise round the North Cape and into the White Sea, and save and except all constant traders inwards from the ports between Boulogne inclusive, and the Baltic, such ships and vessels having British registers, and coming up or going down the North Channel by Orfordness, but not otherwise; and likewise save and except all coasting vessels and all Irish traders using the navigation of the river of Thames as coasters.

The material part of sect. 2 of 52 Geo. 3, c. 39, is as follows:

Save and except as well all colliers and also all ships and vessels trading to Norway, and to the Cattegat and Baltic, and likewise round the North Cape and into the White Sea; and save and except all constant traders inwards from the ports between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic, such ships and vessels having British registers, and coming up the North Channel by Orfordness, and not otherwise; and likewise save and except all coasting vessels, and all Irish traders using the navigation of the river Thames as coasters.

Sect. 59 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, is as follows:

Provided always and be it further enacted, that for and notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, the master of any collier, or of any ship or vessel trading to Norway, or to the Cattagat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, on their inward or outward voyages, or of any constant trader inwards, from the ports between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic (all such ships and vessels having British registers and coming up either by the North Channel but not otherwise), or of any Irish trader, using the navigation of the rivers Thames and Medway, or of any ship or vessel employed in the regular coasting trade of the kingdom, or of any ship or vessel wholly laden with stone from Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, and being the production thereof, or of any ship or vessel not exceeding the burden of sixty tons, or having a British register, except as hereinafter provided, or of any other ship or vessel whatever whilst the same is within the limits of the port or place to which she belongs, the same not being a port or place in relation to which particular provision hath heretofore been made by any Act or Acts of Parliament, or by any charter or charters for the appointment of pilots, shall and may lawfully, and without being subject to any of the penalties by this Act imposed, conduct or pilot his own ship or vessel when and so long as he shall conduct or pilot the same without the aid or assistance of any unlicensed pilot or other person or persons than the ordinary crew of the said ship or vessel.

By sect. 1 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 129, so much of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, as related to the Cinque Port pilots was repealed, and the Trinity House and Cinque Ports pilots were amalgamated.

The material part of sect. 21 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 129 is as follows:

And whereas it is expedient to give facilities for amending the system of pilotage . . . Be it enacted that it shall be lawful for every pilotage authority, by regulation or by-law made with the consent of Her Majesty in Council, from time to time to do all or any of the following things in relation to pilots and pilotage within their respective districts—viz.: To exempt the masters of any ships or vessels, or of any classes of ships or vessels, from being compelled to employ pilots, and to annex any terms or conditions to such exemptions, and from time to time to revoke and alter any exemptions so made, and to revise and extend any exemptions now existing by virtue of any Act of Parliament or charter, upon such terms and conditions and in such manner as such authority, with such consent as aforesaid, may think fit.

Order in Council, 18th Feb. 1854. Regulation for the extension of the exemptions from compulsory pilotage now existing under the provisions of the 59th section of the Act 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, submitted by the Corporation of Trinity House for the consideration of Her Majesty in Council, pursuant to the provisions of the 21st section of the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 127:

The masters of the undermentioned ships and vessels shall, subject to the provisions contained in the 59th section of the Act of Parliament, 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, in respect of the employment of unlicensed persons, be exempted from compulsory pilotage—viz.: Of ships and vessels trading to Norway, or to the Cattagat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, when coming up by the south channels. Of ships and vessels trading to ports between (Boulogne) (inclusive) and the Baltic on their outward passages, and when coming up by the south channels. Of ships and vessels passing through the limits of any pilotage district on their voyages from one port to another port, and not being bound to any port or place within such limits nor anchoring therein.

Sects. 3, 353, and 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) are as follows:

Sect. 3. This Act shall come into operation on the first day of May 1855.

Sect. 353. Subject to any alteration to be made by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the power hereinbefore in that behalf given, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory immediately before the time when this Act comes into operation; and all exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing within such districts shall continue in force.

Sect. 379. The following ships, when not carrying passengers, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district and in the Trinity House outport districts; that is to say . . . (3) Ships trading to Boulogne or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne.

The material part of the Order in Council of the 21st Dec. 1871 is as follows:

And whereas the Trinity House of Deptford Strond, being the pilotage authority for the said districts, hath submitted for the consideration of Her Majesty in Council the following by-law (that is to say): That all ships trading from any port or place in Great Britain within the London district or any of the Trinity House outport districts to the port of Brest in France, or any port or place in Europe north and east of Brest, or to the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, or from Brest, or from any port or place in Europe north and east of Brest, or from the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man to any port or place in Great Britain within either of the said districts, when not carrying passengers, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage within such districts. Now therefore Her Majesty . . . is pleased to declare her consent to the same.

Sects. 603 (1) and 625 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) are as follows:

Sect. 603 (1). Subject to any alteration to be made by the Board of Trade or by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the powers hereinbefore contained, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts where it was compulsory immediately before the commencement of this Act, but all exemptions from that compulsory pilotage shall continue to be in force.

Sect. 625. The following ships when not carrying passengers shall, without prejudice to any general exemption under this part of this Act, be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district, and in the Trinity House outport districts (that is to say): (3) Ships trading from any port in Great Britain within the London district or any of the Trinity House outport districts to the port of Brest in France, or any port in Europe north and east of Brest, or to the Channel Islands or Isle of Man. (4) Ships trading from the port of Brest, or any port in Europe north and east of Brest, or from the Channel Islands or Isle of Man to any port in Great Britain within the said London or Trinity House outport district.

Sect. 1. As and from, &c., sect. 603 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, so far as it continues the exemptions granted by sect. 59 of the Act passed in the sixth year of King George the Fourth, chapter 125, and extended by the Order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854, and the said Order in Council shall cease to operate in the case of vessels on voyages between any port in Sweden or Norway and the port of London.

THE CAYO BONITO.

At the trial of the action before Barnes, J. and Trinity Masters, the learned judge came to the conclusion that the collision was solely caused by the negligence of the pilot in charge of the Cayo Bonito. On further argument of the question whether the pilot was or was not compulsorily in charge at the time of the collision, he held that the Order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854, which extended the exemptions from compulsory pilotage contained in sect. 59 of the General Pilotage Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), applied only to ships and vessels "constantly" trading between Boulogne and the Baltic inclusive, and that under the circumstances the Cayo Bonito was a "constant" trader between the ports of London and Antwerp, as the words "ship or vessel trading" were descriptive of the vessel, and not merely of the particular voyage. He therefore held that the Cayo Bonito was not at the time of the collision compulsorily in charge of a pilot, and found her alone to blame.

The defendants appealed.

Asquith, K.C. (Laing, K.C. and Balloch with him) for the appellants.—Primâ facie pilotage is compulsory in the Thames estuary: (sect. 603 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894). The Order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854 is no longer in force. This could not be argued in the court below in view of the decision in Reg. v. Stanton (8 E. & B. 445). Dr. Lushington also felt he was bound by it in The Earl of Auckland (5 L. T. Rep. 558; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 117; Lush. 387; 15 Moo. P. C. C. 304). Sect. 59 of the General Pilotage Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125) applies to British ships only. By the Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 129) the Trinity House and the Cinque Ports were amalgamated. Then came the Order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854, which provided for the exemption of vessels trading to ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic on their outward passages, and when coming up by the south channels, and then followed the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which did not by sect. 3 come into force until the 1st May 1855. Sect. 379 of that Act repealed all previous legislation quoad the Trinity House districts, and it provides for the exemption of certain vessels, except when carrying passengers. It would be absurd that in one and the same statute there should be a provision that one class of vessel should not be exempted and also a provision re-enacting the previous Acts and Orders in Council which expressly exempt the same class of vessels. This is the logical consequence of the respondents' contention that, although these Acts have been repealed, the Order in Council is still in force. Sects. 330, 331, 353, 360, 368, 376-479 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 formed a complete code for the Trinity House districts. It is submitted that the decision in Reg. v. Stanton (ubi sup.) is wrong. The decision was distinguished in The Temora (1 L. T. Rep. 418; Lush. 17). In deciding whether or not a vessel is a "constant trader," the terminus of the voyage must be looked at—e.g., whether it is the United Kingdom, or a port within the area mentioned in the Act. See

Courtney v. Cole, 57 L. T. Rep. 409; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 169; 19 Q. B. Div. 447;

The Rutland, 76 L. T. Rep. 662; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 270; (1897) A. C. 333.

Sect. 625 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 corresponds with sect. 397 of the Act of 1854, except that it embodies the provisions of the Order in Council of the 21st Dec. 1871 by extending the western limit from Boulogne to the port of Brest. He also referred to

The Vesta, 46 L. T. Rep. 492; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; 7 P. Div. 240.

Aspinall, K.C. and Dawson Miller for the respondents contra.—If the Act of 6 Geo. 4 and the Order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854 are still alive, then the Cayo Bonito was a ship trading to a port between Boulogne and the Baltic. The intention of the Legislature in the Act of 1894 was to leave the law as it was before, and to re-enact the sections of the Act of 1854 and the Orders in Council as interpreted judicially in The Earl of Auckland (ubi sup.). It gives the sanction of the Legislature to the decision of the Privy Council. Part 10 of the Act of 1894 keeps alive all the old exemptions from compulsory pilotage. The Pilotage Act of 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 61) removes the exemptions in the case of vessels on voyages between Sweden and Norway and London, but it expressly affirms the exemptions under the Act of 6 Geo. 4 and the Orders in Council. The Cayo Bonito was in fact a "constant trader" between London and Antwerp, but Barnes, J. was wrong in saying that it is necessary the trading should be "constant" in order that a vessel should be exempt. Trading is used in the sense of being engaged in a commercial adventure, and one must look at the particular act of trading and the intention of the owner:

The Rutland (ubi sup.).

If this were not so, when could a new vessel be said to become a "constant trader"? It would be absurd to say that if she was put on a regular line trading between certain ports that she was not a "constant trader" simply because she had not made the voyage before.

Asquith, K.C. in reply.

Collins, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of Barnes, J., who has held in the case of a collision between the British Prince and the Cayo Bonito that the Cayo Bonito was in charge of a pilot, and that the collision was entirely due to the negligence of the pilot; and that raises a question whether or not pilotage was compulsory. If pilotage was compulsory, the owners are not liable; and, therefore, the question which was argued before Barnes, J., and which is raised again in this appeal, is whether or not it was compulsory. The learned judge, after very careful consideration, and very elaborate examination of the statutes and authorities bearing on the matter, has come to the conclusion that pilotage was not compulsory, and therefore finds that the owners are liable for the consequences of the collision. Now, the case, on the face of it, turns apparently on an examination of the authorities. Barnes, J.'s judgment, which was one of very great elaboration, has been narrowed down for us by the very able and concise arguments which have been addressed to us on both sides in this case, and I do not propose, therefore, for my part, to enter upon a discussion of the many points upon which he, with great advantage and assistance to the court, embarked.

There is no doubt whatever that prima facie pilotage is compulsory in these waters. That, as was pointed out by Barnes, J., is expressly provided by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 603, subject to any alteration made by the Board of Trade or any pilotage authority in pursuance of powers conferred upon them. That section provided that "The employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in any district where it was compulsory immediately before the commencement of this Act." That brings us to the question whether it was or was not compulsory under the circumstances of this case. I do not think I need go behind the Act of 6 Geo. 4, which was a consolidating Act. Barnes, J. went back to an Act before, but it is not necessary for my purpose to go behind the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125. Now the vessel in question was upon a voyage which is described in Barnes, J.'s judgment in this way. She was a vessel of 3427 tons gross register, and at the time of the collision was on a voyage from London to Antwerp, and then from Antwerp to Goatzacoalcos in Mexico, with about 800 tons of cargo and one passenger, and it was in the course of the voyage from London to Antwerp that the collision between her and the British Prince took place. Now I get to the provisions of the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, and it is in these words: [His Lordship then read the material part of the section.] After that statute there was another of 1853, and it was in pursuance of that Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 129, s. 21, that the Order in Council was made. That Act was one enabling the proper authority, by Order in Council, to enlarge the exemptions at that time existing, and accordingly the Order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854 was made consolidating the regulations for the exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing under the provisions of sect. 59 of 6 Geo. 4, and that order contained two paragraphs. First, there is the exemption from compulsory pilotage of ships and vessels trading to Norway and the Cattegat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, when going up by the south channels. This is an exemption including the south as well as the north channels. The second paragraph extended the exemption to ships and vessels trading to ports between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic on their outward passages, and when coming up by the south channels. Thus were added outward to inward, and south to north channels, and that is the joint result of the statute and the Order in Council. If that exemption exists still, notwithstanding the subsequent legislation, it would cover the case of a vessel which could bring itself within its terms. In this case, subject to questions of fact, the contention is that the voyage was one within the meaning of the terms "vessel trading between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic" on her outward passage. Now, this vessel was undoubtedly engaged in a passage from London to Antwerp. She proposed to do a great deal more when she got to Antwerp, but the question is whether the exemptions included such a voyage under such conditions as we have here—whether this vessel has brought herself within the terms of it.

Now, first of all, has that exemption granted by the Act that I have read and the Order in Council been preserved, or has it been annulled?

The argument for the appellants here is that the subsequent statute—the Merchant Shipping Act 1854—did, in point of fact, abolish that exemption and substitute other enactments in its place. Now that argument, I think, would have been a very powerful one if it had not, as it has, in my opinion, been precluded by authority. It is strongly argued that the exemption is in terms preserved in the 353rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 in these terms: [His Lordship then read the section.] That prima facie contains certain exemptions from compulsory pilotage, and it is headed by the words "Compulsory Pilotage: General." But that is followed by another reference, which is headed "Compulsory Pilotage: Trinity House," and Mr. Asquith, in a very able argument, has pointed out that the 379th section of that statute included, in fact in terms, the very same provisions that are contained in the 59th section of the earlier Act constituting the exemptions; that they are re-enacted, but re-enacted with a difference, and the section limits the exemptions to the cases of ships not carrying passengers, whereas the former exemption in the earlier statute did not contain that condition. He puts to us a very powerful argument as to whether you can in one and the same statute have a provision which puts vessels carrying passengers outside the exemption, and a subsequent provision which re-enacts the provisions then existing. That is a strong argument, and one very well worthy of consideration if it had not already been discussed and decided, as it seems to me, first of all in the case of Reg. v. Stanton (ubi sup.), which decided that the two were not incompatible, and that the earlier provision of exemption did continue to exist in a vessel that was carrying passengers. That decision was adopted and followed in the case of The Earl of Auckland (ubi sup.), and was affirmed on appeal by the Privy Council. That was as far back as 1862, and even if that decision of the Privy Council, being, as it was then, the final court of appeal having jurisdiction in Admiralty matters, is not in the strictest sense binding upon us, yet after this interval of time, it being the decision of the very highest authority at that time, I do not think we should be at liberty to depart from it. It is not necessary absolutely to decide whether it is formally and technically binding on us in the same sense as a decision of the House of Lords would be, though my impression is that it is. When the position is that the law is declared by the highest tribunal more than forty years ago, and has been acted upon since, I do not think we should be justified in departing from it. But it does not rest there. The later statute of 1897 has, I think, practically put its imprimatur upon the view taken in those cases—adopted the view that the earlier exemptions and those in the Order in Council are in existence, and treats them as still in existence, though to a certain extent modified in the latter Act. Accordingly I think that with regard to the main part of the argument, the authorities, followed by the Legislature, have decided against Mr. Asquith's contention; that is to say, that notwithstanding subsequent legislation the earlier exemptions and the exemptions of the Order in Council based upon the 59th section of the Act of 1854 still exist. With regard to the question, partly of fact and partly of law, whether this particular ship comes within the exemption or not, Mr. Asquith, in arguing to the contrary, is obliged to contend that the exemption does not extend to the case unless the ship can be described as a "constant trader," and he says that the exemption referring to that condition was not applicable in this case, because this particular vessel had only made one voyage, and she was beginning the second at the time when she was in collision, and therefore it cannot be contended that such a vessel was a "constant trader." He also raises other points—whether, for instance, she was a trader at all in the sense of the exemption; but that is the main point. That rests upon this: You find in the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, these words: [His Lordship then read the material part of the Act.] Now, it is said that that provision in favour of the constant trader is really the same provision which was adopted, with certain enlargements, in the Order in Council; that in the two paragraphs of the order ships and vessels constantly trading is meant; and that that meaning is to be imported into the words of this Order in Council, although the words are not in terms expressed in it; and that contention is based on the authority of the case of The Vesta (ubi sup.), decided by Sir Robert Phillimore in the Admiralty Court. But that case was not decided in respect of these very words, but on the question whether or not foreign vessels were to be considered as embraced in the term "ships or vessels"; and Sir Robert Phillimore held that in the words "ships or vessels" foreign vessels ought not to be included, because they were expressly excluded by sect. 59 of the statute, and the Order in Council could not be taken by simply omitting the words to have the effect sought to be given to it. It seems to me that there is a good deal to be said in favour of the view that the real meaning is analogous; but I think myself that we are not bound to apply it here, because this is really a different case. The case before Sir Robert Phillimore was certainly a case carrying much larger consequences than are likely to follow upon the decision of such a case as this. It was a matter of large policy whether foreign vessels should or should not be embraced within the order extending the earlier section, and by a special enactment referring to British vessels. It was thought that to extend the decision of the Legislature in that particular direction simply because it had used the words "ships or vessels," without confining them to British vessels, would be a large and impolitic extension, and ought not to be implied without more solid grounds. I do not think that the grounds which weighed with Sir Robert Phillimore apply in such a case as this. Whether that be so or not, Barnes, J. has found in this case that if "constant trader" was a condition, that condition has been fulfilled, because, he says—and I agree with him—that you must not measure the question whether the vessel is a constant trader by the particular facts of one particular voyage of that vessel. Take the case of a line of vessels trading constantly between London and New York. A new vessel is put on for the first time. You cannot say that that vessel is not a constant trader simply because it has not made the voyage before. It seems to me clear, as the learned judge has found, that you must look to what is the purpose for which this vessel was put on, and how it is going to trade. Possibly it is put on as an instrument for carrying on the same trade then being carried on by other vessels; and if you find there is a line established trading with Antwerp, and a particular vessel was put on and has made one voyage to and from Antwerp, it seems to me that the inference in respect to that is that it is a constant trader, and is intended to be a constant trader, within the meaning of these words.

That brings me to the last point, and that is whether a vessel which, like this, has gathered its cargo somewhere, say in the East, comes with that cargo to London, and there discharges the greater part of it, and then goes on from London—taking in no cargo from London, but taking what remained of her cargo to Antwerp—whether that can be said to be a vessel trading between London and Antwerp? I think there is a good deal to be said for the contention that a vessel cannot be said to be trading when it does not take any part—does not carry on—any trade between London and Antwerp. In this particular case the ship was taking cargo, but not cargo loaded in London for Antwerp; its object was to deliver the residue of the cargo taken on board at some remote point on the voyage. The argument raised here has been concluded by authority. The very point was raised in the common law courts and decided in the first place by Lord Coleridge and Smith, J., as he then was, in Courtney v. Cole (ubi sup.). It was afterwards raised in another case, The Rutland (ubi sup.), before Barnes, J., and ultimately went to the House of Lords, and there, in a case practically indistinguishable from this, it was held that the fact that the vessel was not taking cargo out did not affect the question. In point of fact, the result of the two cases seems to be that when a vessel sails out on a particular adventure from London or elsewhere to distant ports, she is then, within the meaning of the words, trading with such ports. The only other point is, Does the fact that the voyage to one of these ports is only, as it were, a step in a very much longer cruise make any difference? It seems to me that the authorities cover that as well as the other matter, and that the only question which we have to consider is whether she was on a trading adventure to one of the ports in the exemption. It seems to me she was, and therefore on all the points made the admirable judgment of Barnes, J. in this case was right, and must be upheld.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first and most important point made by Mr. Asquith was that of exemption. That has been settled by the authorities which have been quoted by the Master of the Rolls. With reference to the question of fact, it seems to me there was abundant evidence here to justify the conclusion that this vessel was constantly trading, if it were necessary that that should be determined. I am of opinion that "constant" trading is not necessary, and that trading alone is sufficient here to exempt the vessel from compulsory pilotage. This vessel was commencing her career, and it is said that it cannot be successfully contended that she was trading. But the facts established are these: The vessel was assigned to a line of steamers, her business was to take cargoes from a home port to another, and then continue her voyage. It seems to me absurd to insist that she must acquire the character of a "constant" trader by frequent voyages. It is quite enough that she was intended by her owners to continue in a certain line. That is established here, and the conclusion of the learned judge is perfectly correct. I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. The first and main point raised in the case, respecting the Order in Council, was decided not only by the Court of Queen's Bench, but by the Privy Council, in The Earl of Auckland (ubi sup.). Now it may be that the decision of the Privy Council has not quite the same effect in an Admiralty appeal as a decision of the House of Lords; but the jurisdiction of the Privy Council in Admiralty appeals is, by sect. 18, sub-sect. 5, of the Judicature Act of 1873, transferred to this Court of Appeal, and, putting it at the lowest, it seems to me that a decision of the Privy Council in a matter of this kind should be treated by us with at least the same amount of respect as a decision of the Exchequer Chamber would be in a Revenue appeal. Whether it is technically and absolutely binding on this court or not, it would be very wrong, after a lapse of forty years, for this court to reverse a decision of the Privy Council on a statute of this kind. But it really does not rest there. I can see no answer whatever to the argument founded upon the statute of 1897. I think the declaration therein contained makes it plain that the Legislature regarded the exemptions under the statute of George IV., extended by the Order in Council, as in force at the date of the passing of this Act. That seems to me to be clear. Therefore I think that the main point of Mr. Asquith's argument fails. The second point is, What is trading? That has been decided by the House of Lords in the cases cited. The third point is as to whether the word "constant" ought to be incorporated in the Order in Council from the statute of George IV.? It does not really arise here, for on the facts I agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls and Mathew, L.J. that we have here what amounts to constant trading. But, further than that, I entirely share the view of Barnes, J. that there is no ground for importing the word "constant" into the Order in Council. The Order in Council was made in pursuance of an Act expressly authorising the extension of the exemptions, and there is no reason whatever for holding that it did not extend the exemptions by omitting the word "constant" found in the earlier Act.

Goods were shipped under a charter-party, a clause of which protected the shipowners from liability for "the act of God . . . and all other accidents excepted, even though caused by negligence, fault, or error of judgment on the part of the pilot, captain, sailors, or other servants of the owners in the management or navigation of the vessel, or otherwise."

Held (affirming the judgment of Phillimore, J.), that the shipowners were not liable for damage done to the goods due to the negligence of the stevedores by the improper use of hooks and slings in the discharge of the cargo, as such loss was an "accident" within the meaning of the clause.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Phillimore, J.

The case is reported 87 L. T. Rep. 656; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 358; (1903) P. 35.

The appellants were owners of cargo, and claimed damages for short delivery and in respect of damage done to the cargo.

By a charter-party, dated the 30th Jan. 1902, the appellants shipped 8000 bags of sugar at Dunkirk for London by the respondents' steamship Torbryan. The sugar was shipped in bags, and after the cargo had been discharged it was found that seven of the bags were missing, seven others had been damaged by coal dust, and several more had been torn and a portion of the contents lost, partly owing to their striking the deck or hatch-coamings as they were being discharged, and partly owing to the stevedores having used hooks. The appellants claimed 178*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.* in all for the damage done and loss of the contents of the bags. They alleged that during the discharge complaints were made about the negligence of the stevedores.

The respondents admitted that the bags were shipped apparently in good order and condition, and that the number and weights were correct, and paid into court 12*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* in respect of the bags lost, and those damaged by coal dust.

At the trial of the action they contended that the damage to the remainder was caused by the bags being too thin and weak, and also by the negligent stowage of them by the defendants' agents or servants at Dunkirk, in consequence of which the various marks got mixed up together, and rendered the discharge very difficult. They also contended that they were protected by the exceptions in the charter-party, which were as follows:

The act of God, fire, perils of the seas, barratry on the part of the captain or crew, enemies, pirates, or robbers, strikes, arrests or restraint of princes, rulers, and people, collisions, strandings, and all other accidents excepted, even though caused by negligence, fault, or error of judgment on the part of the pilot, captain, sailors, or other servants of the owners in the management of the vessel, or otherwise.

Phillimore, J. held that the case was governed by the exceptions in the charter-party, and gave judgment for the defendants accordingly, except as to the money paid into court.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Scrutton, K.C. and Balloch for the appellants.—We do not propose to argue the point raised in the court below that the words “or otherwise” referred to the navigation of the ship. There was satisfactory evidence that the stevedores, who were the defendants’ servants, were negligent, and persisted in using hooks for discharging the cargo, although they were forbidden to do so. Complaints were made about this, and also as to the carelessness of the men in hitting the coamings while discharging, and so injuring some of the bags. If the cargo was discharged in this way, it was obvious that the result would be that damage would be done. It cannot therefore be said that it arose through “accident.” The damage was inevitable. See

Carson, K.C. and A. E. Nelson for the respondents contra.—The loss is covered by the words “all other accidents.” Whatever may have been the cause of the loss it was not intentional; it was none the less an accident because it was caused by negligence. They referred to

The Xantho, 57 L. T. Rep. 701; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; 12 App. Cas. 503.

Balloch in reply.—The words “other accidents” must refer to accidents ejusdem generis with collisions and stranding. In The Cressington (ubi sup.) and Blackburn v. Liverpool, &c., Steamship Company (ubi sup.) the damage resulted from negligence clearly not anticipated in either case. Here the damage to the cargo was the necessary consequence of the use of the hooks in discharging it.

COLLINS, M.R.—The point in this case is whether the defendant, the shipowner, is protected by a clause in the charter-party, a common clause to this effect: [His Lordship then read the clause.] What happened was that in the process of unloading the stevedores’ men were said to have used, and have been proved to have used, in a very reckless manner, the hooks called the can hooks for the purpose of discharging the sugar in the bags. If these hooks are used recklessly it is exceedingly probable that either the bags or the hooks will give way, and a considerable amount of damage may be done to the cargo by the use of these hooks. As to other parts of it they would seem to have been only the ordinary accidents of unloading—that is to say, in lifting the bags out of the hold until they are in a position for passing over the rail on to the wharf. There is evidence of remonstrance made by the cargo-owners, and also by persons representing the stevedores, and that notwithstanding that remonstrance the men continued to use these hooks, and so damage was done to the cargo. Now, the point is whether damage arising in that way by the negligence of these men was damage covered by this clause. After hearing the matter argued, I agree with the learned judge in the court below that it does come within the clause. It does come within the heading “all other accidents excepted.” One has to arrive at the meaning of the word “accidents” here, as in every other case, by looking at the contract between the parties, and so ascertain what in these provisions are meant to be exceptions. In this case we have to deal with the contract between the shipowner and the cargo-owner, by which it is provided that the shipowner is to be excused from accidents caused by negligence, and looking at it from that standpoint it is an accident to him, a fortuitous and unexpected occurrence, that the persons employed in unloading the cargo should resort to such reckless means, and, even though it is something more than recklessness, nevertheless I think it might, notwithstanding, be an accident. In that view it seems to me the judgment of the learned judge is right.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear to me that the right way to look at this clause is to look at it as the language of the shipowner and of the charterer. From that point of view it is quite clear that the words are used in their popular sense. The exceptions named run: “Act of God, fire, perils of the seas, barratry on the part of the captain or crew, enemies, pirates, or robbers, strikes, arrests or restraints of princes, rulers, and people, collisions, strandings, and all other accidents excepted.” They are all acts which are to be treated as accidents. Now, an ingenious attempt is made to get rid of the word “accident” in connection with the earlier perils enumerated. It was said there was a semi-colon, and that the words “collisions, strandings, and all other accidents excepted” applied only to cases of that description—that the word “excepted” comes at the end of that paragraph, and applies only to accidents so caused. That is made more clear by the words that follow: “Even though caused by negligence, fault, or error of judgment on the part of the pilot, captain, sailors, or other servants of the owners in the management or navigation of the vessel, or otherwise.” I am perfectly of opinion that this clause protects the shipowner, and I can hardly see how the argument on the other side that where negligence is shown, whatever followed was an inevitable consequence, and that it could not be regarded as an accident. That is not the interpretation I put on the position of the parties as to what has been excepted. The case to me appears clear. The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed.

CUNARD STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v. MARTEN.

Tuesday, July 21, 1903.

(Before VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, ROMER, and STIRLING, L.JJ.)

CUNARD STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v. MARTEN. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance, Marine—Policy—Construction—Suing and labouring clause—Insurance against shipowners' liability owing to omission of negligence clause in contract of affreightment—Applicability of suing and labouring clause.

Shipowners who had entered into a contract of affreightment which contained no negligence clause exempting them from liability for loss arising through the negligence of their servants, effected with an underwriter a policy of insurance on their ship to cover their liability of any kind to the owners of the cargo up to a certain specified amount owing to the omission of the negligence clause in the contract. The policy was an ordinary printed form of Lloyd's policy, and contained a suing and labouring clause entitling the assured to sue and labour for the defence and recovery of the goods and ship. During the insured voyage the vessel stranded owing to the negligence of the shipowners' servants and part of the cargo was lost, and the shipowners became liable in respect thereof. The shipowners incurred expenses in saving the cargo which was saved and in trying to save the cargo which was lost, and in attempting to tow the vessel off the rocks; and they sought to recover these expenses from the underwriter, not as a direct loss under the policy, but under the suing and labouring clause in the policy as being suing and labouring expenses.

Held, that the suing and labouring clause in the policy had no application to the subject-matter of the insurance, and did not form any part of the insurance; and that therefore the shipowners could not recover under that clause the expenses so incurred by them.

Decision of Walton, J. (87 L. T. Rep. 400; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 342; (1902) 2 K. B. 624) affirmed.

THIS action was brought by the Cunard Steamship Company Limited, as the owners of the steamship Carinthia, against the defendant, who was one of the subscribers to a policy of marine insurance effected on behalf of the plaintiffs.

By the policy, which was dated the 9th May 1900 the plaintiffs were insured against perils of the seas from New Orleans to ports in South Africa on the plaintiffs' steamship Carinthia:

To cover shipowners' liability of any kind to owners of mules and (or) cargo up to 20,000*l.*, owing to the omission of the negligence clause in contract and (or) charter-party and (or) bill of lading.

The policy was an ordinary Lloyd's printed form of policy with special clauses added, and it contained a suing and labouring clause in the following form:

In case of any loss or misfortune, it shall be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue, labour, and travel for, in and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said goods and merchandises, and ship, &c., or any part thereof without prejudice to this insurance.

In a special clause on a slip gummed to the policy the plaintiffs were given "all liberties as per contract of affreightment and (or) charter-party and (or) bill or bills of lading new or old, including negligence clause."

The defendant subscribed this policy for 1000*l.* The Carinthia had been chartered by the Government in April 1900 for the purpose of carrying mules from New Orleans to South Africa.

The terms of the contract of affreightment were contained in a letter of the 5th April 1900 from the Admiralty Director of Transports to the plaintiffs, and by the terms of the contract the Carinthia was to carry some 1500 mules in consideration of the freight and on the terms therein specified.

The contract of carriage contained no negligence clause exempting the plaintiffs from liability for loss arising from the negligence of their servants, the shipowners' liability to the Admiralty being that of common carriers.

In these circumstances the plaintiffs insured themselves by the policy against all liability which might result to them by reason of the omission of the negligence clause in the contract of affreightment.

The Carinthia sailed from New Orleans for Cape Town on the 11th May 1900 with the mules on board.

On the 15th May, owing to the negligence of the master, she stranded at Cape Gravois, in the island of Hayti, and was wrecked, and a large number of the mules were lost, and considerable expenses incurred in saving those which were saved and in trying to save those which were lost, and in attempting to tow the vessel off the rocks.

The plaintiff thereby incurred a liability to the Admiralty.

The plaintiffs in their points of claim alleged that by reason of the stranding of the vessel many mules were totally lost, and the plaintiffs were under liability in respect of the same and in respect of increased freight paid on the mules saved, which were sent on in another vessel, but that the extent of the liability had not yet been ascertained, and that, to reduce or avert a loss which would be recoverable under the policy, the plaintiffs incurred expenses under the suing and labouring clause in the policy to the amount of 7744*l.*; and the plaintiffs claimed in this action only in respect of those suing and labouring expenses.

The defendant's proportion of these expenses on his insurance of 1000*l.* was 387*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.*, and that was the sum which the plaintiffs now claimed.

The defendant in his defence admitted that the vessel was stranded during the insured voyage owing to the negligent navigation of the plaintiffs' servants, and he alleged that the policy sued on was expressed to be upon shipowner's liability to owners of mules owing to the omission of the negligence clause in the contract of carriage; that the sue and labour clause in the printed form of policy had no application to such a subject-matter of insurance, and was not part of the contract. Alternatively, the defendant alleged that if the sue and labour clause applied, none of the expenses claimed had been incurred within the meaning of the clause by the plaintiffs, their factors and assigns, in averting from the subject-matter insured loss by perils insured against as alleged or at all. In the further alternative the defendant alleged that if he under the policy sued on was liable for sue and labour expenses, the expenses claimed therein were incurred by the plaintiffs to avert the whole of their possible liabilities to the owners of the mules and (or) cargo which far exceeded the liability covered by the policy.

On the 11th and 12th July 1902 the action came on for trial before Walton, J., sitting without a jury, when his Lordship reserved judgment.

On the 11th Aug. 1902 the learned judge delivered a written judgment in which he decided (87 L. T. Rep. 400; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 342; (1902) 2 K. B. 624) that the suing and labouring clause was inapplicable to the subject-matter of the insurance actually effected, and formed no part of the contract; and that the plaintiffs were therefore not entitled to recover the expenses incurred by them.

From that decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

Pickford, K.C. and Loehnis for the appellants.—Owing to the negligence of the plaintiffs' servants, the plaintiffs have incurred liability to the Admiralty in respect of the loss of the mules. The plaintiffs' claim in this action is confined to a claim under the suing and labouring clause in the printed form of the policy in respect of expenses incurred by them to avert or reduce the amount of the loss, and they are entitled to recover under that clause. The policy ought to be construed as a contract on the part of the underwriters by which they agreed to indemnify the shipowners against any liability up to 20,000*l.*, which the shipowners might incur to the owners of the mules owing to the omission of the negligence clause in the contract of affreightment; so that, if the loss does not exceed 20,000*l.*, they are entitled to recover the whole loss, but if it exceeds 20,000*l.* then they are entitled to recover 20,000*l.* Here the liability of the shipowners to the Admiralty arose owing to the omission of the negligence clause in their contract with the Admiralty, and upon the construction of the policy the suing and labouring clause is applicable, and the underwriters are bound to indemnify the plaintiffs. They referred to

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of Walton, J. is right, and that this appeal must fail. Now, I start with one common proposition in this case and that is this, that everyone is agreed that, whatever was the subject-matter of this policy, it is quite plain that the mules were not. Nobody says that they were. Each side agrees in that. Then we look to see what was the subject-matter of this policy. The policy was effected to cover shipowners' liability of any kind to owners of mules and (or) cargo up to 20,000*l.* owing to the omission of the negligence clause in contract, and (or) charter-party, and (or) bill of lading. That is a proposition which is common to both sides. I do not understand the appellants here to say for one moment that they can recover the expenses which were incurred in salving these mules as a direct loss under this policy. It is because they feel the impossibility of doing that that they are obliged to have recourse to the suing and labouring clause. Now, that being so, let us see how the matter stands. The suing and labouring clause runs thus: [His Lordship read it, and continued:] As was pointed out by Walton, J. in his judgment, primâ facie those words "said goods and merchandises" have no application to the subject-matter of this policy. It cannot be contended that they have. Then it is said that although these words do not directly apply, and that although the mules were not the subject-matter of this policy, yet if you save the mules you really avert a liability to the owner of the mules; and that as that is so, the suing and labouring clause does apply. That is the argument that really has been chiefly urged upon us both by Mr. Pickford and Mr. Loehnis. I do not myself think that one ought thus to strain the words of this policy in this case to make them apply to this subject-matter. My own view is that the parties really never could have intended it. In this particular case the value of the goods (the mules) was 40,000*l.* and the amount insured to cover this liability was 20,000*l.* In case the expenses thus incurred had amounted to the whole 20,000*l.*, the assured would have been entitled, if this argument is right, to recover in respect of the whole of that loss although his insurance was an insurance for only half the value of the mules. Really, although in this case both sides are agreed that this is not an insurance on the mules, we are being invited to apply the suing and labouring clause just as if it was. I think that it is unnecessary to go any further into the matter. I can only say that I adopt in full the reasoning of Walton, J., and feel that he has put the case in a way that it is quite impossible for me to improve upon.

ROMER, L.J.—I also do not see my way to differ in this case from Walton, J. The point involved is a very short one, and I can state my reasons for my opinion very shortly too. It is admitted on behalf of the appellants, and it is part of their case, that this policy of insurance is not one upon mules or goods or ship at all. It is what it purports to be, solely an insurance to cover shipowner's liability of any kind, mules or cargo up to 20,000*l.*, owing to the omission of the negligence clause. Now, that is the only subject-matter of insurance, and it is inserted in a policy which in the printed part applies to a policy of insurance on ship and goods and cargo. Naturally enough you find that most (if not all) of the printed matter has little or no application to the precise risk insured against. But it is said that one of the printed clauses can be extracted as it were from the others and made applicable, and that clause is what is commonly called the "suing and labouring clause." How does it run? [His Lordship read it and continued:] The clause refers to "said goods and merchandises and ship" because, as I have pointed out, the form of this policy is confined to a policy of insurance on the ship and on the goods. Therefore this refers to "the said goods and merchandises and ship." Admittedly to my mind this is a policy of insurance not on any goods or merchandises or ship at all. Of course, I should apply that clause, if I could do so reasonably, to the present case. But it appears to me, putting it shortly, that I cannot reasonably apply it to any such case even if you take the words immediately before the express statement of what was insured. If you treat those as a definition of the risk insured against still less, or at least not a bit better, are you able to apply the suing and labouring clause to such a subject-matter of insurance. I need scarcely point out that I think those very words that I have read are, like the rest of the printed portions of this policy, not intended to apply at all. As I have already said, I should apply the suing and labouring clause, if I could do so reasonably, to the subject-matter of this policy of insurance; but, in my opinion, I cannot reasonably apply it. It never was intended to apply to any such subject of insurance; it was intended to apply on the very face of it, to my mind, to an insurance on "goods, merchandises, and ship."

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree. I cannot usefully add anything to what was said by the learned judge in the court below, and to what has been said by my learned brethren here.

DE HART v. COMPANIA ANONIMA DE SEGUROS "AURORA." (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance—Marine—“General average payable according to foreign statement”—Jettison of deck cargo—Foreign law—Special contract.

By a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiff on his ship with the defendants, who were underwriters, it was provided: “General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up.”

The ship being chartered to third persons for carriage of timber, it was provided by the charter-party that the ship might carry a deck load of timber, and that “In case of average . . . jettison of deck cargo (and the freight thereon) for the common safety shall be allowable as general average.”

In the course of a voyage to Antwerp it became necessary for the common safety to jettison part of the deck cargo; and, upon the average statement being made up there, this was included in general average.

Apart from any special provision in the charter-party, the jettison of deck cargo and the freight thereon would not by Belgian law be the subject of general average; but that law recognises any special provision as to what shall be the subject of general average.

Held, that as the statement had in fact been made up at Antwerp, the proper place for making it up, and the charter-party imported no terms of a special and unusual character such as could not reasonably have been contemplated by the parties to the policy of insurance, the defendants were bound by the statement, and were therefore liable to indemnify the plaintiff against the contribution that had to be made up by the ship in general average relating to the loss on the jettison of the deck cargo.

Harris v. Scaramanga (26 L. T. Rep. 797; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 339; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481) considered and applied.

Decision of Kennedy, J. (87 L. T. Rep. 716; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 345; (1903) 1 K. B. 109) affirmed.

THIS action was tried upon the following joint admissions of fact made for the purpose of the action only:—

The plaintiff effected with the defendants two policies of insurance, each for 500*l.*, dated the 31st Aug. 1900 and the 28th Sept. 1900 respectively, on the steamship Henriette H. for twelve months, the former from the 28th Aug. 1900 to the 28th Aug. 1901, and the latter from the 7th Sept. 1900 to the 6th Sept. 1901 inclusive.

Each of the policies contained the clause:

General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up or York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with contract of affreightment, and (attached to the policy) the Institute Time Clauses 1900, which include the following clause—viz.:

General average and salvage charges payable according to foreign statement or per York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with the contract of affreightment.

By a charter-party dated the 11th Oct. 1900, made between the plaintiff and Messrs. Baars, Dunwody, and Co., it was agreed that the Henriette H. should carry a cargo of pinewood, including a deck load (if required by the master), from Pensacola to Antwerp.

It is the regular and usual course of trading for vessels from Gulf timber ports to carry deck loads of timber to Continental ports.

Clause 11 of the charter-party was as follows:

In case of average the same to be settled according to York-Antwerp Rules 1890, excepting that jettison of deck cargo (and the freight thereon) for the common safety shall be allowable as general average.

The Henriette H. sailed from Pensacola on the 29th Nov. 1900, carrying a deck load, and on the voyage she suffered damage, and it became necessary for the safety of the ship and her cargo, in consequence of perils insured against, to jettison part of the deck load.

The remainder of the cargo was delivered at Antwerp.

If the defendants were liable to pay to the plaintiff on the policies a proportionate part of the ship's proportion of the loss on the jettison of the part of the deck cargo, the plaintiff was entitled to be paid by them the sum of 53*l.* 11*s.*

If the defendants were not liable in respect of the loss, the plaintiff was only entitled to be paid by them 30*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.*, which latter sum the defendants were and had always been ready and willing to pay to the plaintiff in full satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim.

It was not contended that the general average statement made at Antwerp, and which included the deck cargo jettisoned and the freight thereon, was contrary to the law of Belgium, but by mutual admissions it was agreed that the average statement was made, and that by it the deck cargo jettisoned and the freight thereon were, as required by the contract of affreightment, treated as general average, although apart from the conditions in the charter-party such loss would not have been so treated; also that by Belgian law, apart from any special provision in the contract, the jettison of the deck cargo and the freight thereon would not be the subject of general average.

The following is a translation of the material articles of the Belgian Code of Maritime Commerce:

Art. 100. Failing special agreements between all parties concerned, average losses are settled according to the following regulations.

Art. 109. Goods carried on the ship's upper deck contribute if saved. If they are jettisoned or damaged by jettisoning, the owner has no claim to contribution. He can only make use of his rights against the master.

Art. 118. The statement of losses and damages is made up by experts (average staters) in the place where the ship is discharged at the instigation of the commander. The experts are nominated by the Tribunal of Commerce if the discharge takes place in a Belgian port.

Art. 119. The specialists nominated in accordance with the preceding article apportion the losses and damages. The apportionment becomes legally binding on approval by the Tribunal.

On the 31st Oct. 1902 the action came on for trial before Kennedy, J. without a jury in Middlesex, when his Lordship decided (87 L. T. Rep. 716; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 345; (1903) 1 K. B. 109) that the proper construction was that the defendants were bound to pay according to the foreign statement, if the foreign law recognised as a constituent of general average the terms of the contract between the parties; and that the defendants were, therefore, bound to recognise the foreign statement if made up according to foreign law. His Lordship accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff.

From that decision the defendants now appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and J. R. Atkin for the appellants.—In the various cases where the words "general average as per foreign statement" have been used, the general average statement made up abroad has been made up in accordance with the general law of the foreign country. The foreign law was that which dominated the general average. In Mavro v. Ocean Marine Insurance Company (32 L. T. Rep. 743; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 590; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 414) the statement of the foreign adjuster was made at Constantinople, by the law of which port the adjustment ought to be made according to the law of France. And the construction put upon the words "general average as per foreign statement" was that the adjustment was not intended to be conclusive unless made in conformity with the foreign law. In that case Blackburn, J. said: "I construe the words 'general average as per foreign statement' to mean that general average in the policy shall include such losses as the French law regards as intentional sacrifices made for the benefit of the whole adventure, not only such losses as a foreign average adjuster shall actually state." And Cockburn, C.J. said that what is general average is to be determined by the law of the foreign place to which the ship is bound. In the case of Hendricks v. Australasian Insurance Company (30 L. T. Rep. 419; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 44; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 460) Lord Coleridge, C.J. and Brett, J. treated Harris v. Scaramanga (26 L. T. Rep. 797; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 339; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481) as having decided that "upon such a policy English underwriters are bound by the foreign adjustment as an adjustment, if made according to the law of the country in which it was made." See also The Brigella (69 L. T. Rep. 834; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 337; (1893) P. 189, at p. 199), where Barnes, J. discussed the decision in Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.). The general law of the land in accordance with which the foreign statement is to be binding upon the defendants in the present case is the Belgian code, the provisions of which they have the means of ascertaining. But special provisions contained in a contract to which the defendants were not parties ought not to be coupled to the Belgian code. They did not intend to leave it in the power of the plaintiff to enlarge their liability. They referred also to

Carver, K.C. and De Hart for the respondent.—The statement was made up at Antwerp by the average stater—the place where it ought to have been made up. It therefore was a foreign statement within the meaning of the policy. It was in accordance with the law of Belgium, which recognises the special provisions of the contract of affreightment, treating as the subject of general average that which the parties to the contract have agreed shall be so treated. Deck cargoes are allowed in general average where, as in the present instance, they are permitted according to an established custom of navigation:

Strang, Steel, and Co. v. A. Scott and Co., 61 L. T. Rep. 597; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 419; 14 App. Cas. 601, 609.

Even if the average statement was not in accordance with the law of Belgium, the defendants are nevertheless bound by an average statement prepared at Antwerp, for the words "foreign statement" mean nothing more than a statement made up in a foreign country. The parties must be taken to have agreed to treat the foreign average stater as an arbitrator, and to be bound by the statement whether in accordance with the law of the country where made up or not. See the observations upon this subject of Bovill, C.J. and Keating, J. in

Harris v. Scaramanga, 26 L. T. Rep. 797; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 339; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481, at pp. 489, 490.

[They were stopped by the Court.]

J. B. Atkin replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the plaintiff, who is a shipowner, effected with the defendant company, who are underwriters, a time policy of insurance upon his ship containing the following clause: "General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up or York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with contract of affreightment." The plaintiff sub-chartered the ship to third persons, and by the terms of that charter-party it was provided that the ship might carry a deck load of timber; and that "in case of average the same to be settled according to York-Antwerp Rules 1890, except that jettison of deck cargo (and the freight thereon) for the common safety shall be allowable as general average." The ship sailed for Antwerp with a deck load, and in the course of the voyage and during the currency of the policy she suffered damage, so that it became necessary for the steamer's safety, in consequence of perils insured against, to jettison part of the deck cargo. On her arrival at Antwerp an average statement was then made up, and the average stater, in accordance with the terms of the charter-party, included the jettison of deck cargo in general average. Then there were some admissions between the parties, and there were also letters which passed between the solicitors as to the Belgian law. I may as well read the most important letter in full, as it is very short: "We are in receipt of your letter, dated the 24th inst., and are prepared to admit that a foreign general average statement was prepared, and that by it the deck cargo jettisoned and the freight thereon were, as required by the contract of affreightment, treated as general average subject to your admitting that, apart from the condition in the charter-party, such loss would not have been so treated, as it is not, in accordance either with York-Antwerp Rules or Belgian law, the subject of general average." Now, that being the nature of the action, what Kennedy, J. decided was this: He decided in favour of the plaintiff on the ground that the average statement as made up was in accordance with the Belgian law, because the Belgian law recognises in regard to general average the terms of any special contract of affreightment that the parties—meaning there the parties to the sub-charter, the contract of affreightment referred to really in the policy—may have chosen to make. Kennedy, J. takes notice also of another contention that had been made on behalf of the plaintiff, which contention was to the effect that, having regard to the judgment of Bovill, C.J. and Keating, J. in Harris v. Scaramanga (26 L. T. Rep. 797; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 339; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481), these words in the policy of insurance, "general average payable according to foreign statement if so made up," were words which bound the underwriters, whether the foreign statement was made in accordance with the Belgian law as proved, or whether it was not. But, having noticed it, Kennedy, J. says that it is unnecessary for him to decide whether or not that assumption or that statement of law by Bovill, C.J. and Keating, J. was correctly made or not. Now, that being the state of things, we have to consider whether the judgment of Kennedy, J. is right. I am not at all prepared to say that Kennedy, J.'s judgment may not be supported upon the ground upon which he has put it himself. A passage from the foreign code was read to us, and it would appear from that passage that, according to Belgian law, if there is a special contract as between the parties who are primarily interested in the law of contribution—that is, the shipowner and the cargo owner—effect is given to that special bargain in making up the foreign statement. It is also said, with regard to the particular provision of Belgian law, that a deck cargo does not come within the rules as to contribution; that that rule is subject to the special agreement of the parties to the contract of affreightment. Speaking for myself, I always have some doubt as to whether foreign codes are by themselves admissible as evidence of foreign law. I have always thought that the practice was not to give effect to a foreign code unless the court had a foreign expert present to construe the foreign code and to inform the court, or to assist the court, not so much in construing the foreign code, but in the conclusion of fact that would have to be arrived at in the English courts as to what was the foreign law. That would be done by informing the court what has been recognised by the law in the foreign country. I do not think that it is part of the duty of English judges to take a foreign code and, unassisted by a foreign expert, to construe that foreign code, because that is to make the question of the foreign law a question of law and not a question of fact. I always understood that it was a question of fact and not a question of law, and for that, amongst other reasons, I prefer myself to look and to inquire and see whether the judgment of Kennedy, J. can be supported upon other grounds.

Now, in the first place, I am myself disposed to support it upon the passage in the judgment of Bovill, C.J. and Keating, J. in Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.). In Harris v. Scaramanga the statement, so far as it is material to the particular part of this paragraph in the policy that I am referring to, was almost identical with the paragraph here, because the paragraph in Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.) was "to pay general average as per foreign statement, if so made up," and upon p. 489 of L. Rep. 7 C. P. Bovill, C.J. first says this: "It seems to me that the general effect of the memorandum is to make the underwriters liable as for general average for whatever the owners of the goods might be called upon to pay on that account by the foreign statement of adjustment. This memorandum"—that is, the memorandum of the foreign statement, if so made up—"was probably introduced in order to avoid all questions, not only as to the propriety of particular items being treated as the subjects of general average, but also as to the correctness of the appointment; and I find it difficult to place any other reasonable construction upon the terms of the policy and memorandum." Then he deals with the question of the law of England and the law of Bremen, and goes on: "It seems to me, however, that under the terms of this policy the underwriters and the assured have both agreed to accept the adjustment and statement of the average stater in the foreign port, if and when made, as conclusive between them, both in principle and in details, as to the loss which the underwriters are to undertake in respect of general average, subject to the exception of any matters, such as capture or seizure, which are excluded by the express terms of the policy." And then, on the top of p. 490, he says: "It seems to me that, by the express agreement of the parties contained in the memorandum, it is not open to us to determine it"—that is, the question whether the claim was to be determined by the English court or by the statement of the foreign average stater at Bremen—"and that we have only to see whether the foreign adjustment which gives rise to this claim has been in fact made or not. Has there, then, been such a statement of general average made in Bremen with respect to the amount now claimed? And how does the matter stand upon the facts as stated in the special case?" I think myself that, so far from there being anything inconsistent with mercantile usage and mercantile convenience in so reading this statement appearing in this policy, and which has appeared in hundreds of policies before, being a very usual clause, I think it is in accordance with mercantile convenience. The parties primarily interested in the adjustment for the purpose of carrying into effect the rights to contribution based upon the law of general average may conveniently be left to deal with questions of contribution both in their contracts of affreightment and in other respects. If adjustment has to be effected in a foreign port, it seems to me obviously convenient that there should be an express provision that the underwriters in such a case shall stand in the shoes of the parties primarily liable. In my view of the law it is perfectly plain that in the absence of any special provision such would be the law. You would not require any special clause to say this; it would be the law without a special clause.

Then in this particular clause are the words following: "If so made up or York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with contract of affreightment." It is said that the effect of those latter words is that the only case in which the shipowner is to be entitled to affect the matter of contribution by the contract of affreightment is in case he adopts the York-Antwerp Rules without any qualifications. And it is said that the result of that is that in this case the court ought to apply the Belgian law here, and to give no effect whatsoever to the York-Antwerp Rules as qualified by the words of exception; and that that means that the court ought to go back to the simple Belgian law unqualified by this special bargain. I cannot so read these words. I think that there is nothing—at all events in these words—which in the slightest degree prevents us from applying the rule laid down by Bovill, C.J. and Keating, J. in Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.). Taking this view of the case, it seems to me unnecessary to consider the other questions that have been raised in this case. The ground of my decision is simply that I apply here the rule laid down by Bovill, C.J. and Keating, J. in Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.); and, applying that rule, I think that the underwriters here are bound by the foreign statement so made up. It was said in this case, in addition, that we ought not to come to this conclusion for the reason of several passages which were read to us, one from the case of Mavro v. Ocean Marine Insurance Company (32 L. T. Rep. 743; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 590; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 414) in the judgment of Cockburn, C.J., where he says: "The only sensible construction appears to be this: the underwriter is only to be liable for a general average, but what is general average is to be determined by the law of the foreign place to which the ship is bound." I quite agree, but that only means in the absence of a special bargain; and in my judgment in this particular case there was a special bargain, if this contract is properly construed, whereby the underwriters agreed to accept the average statement abroad, if so made up, as binding upon all parties. I think, therefore, the judgment of Kennedy, J. must be affirmed and this appeal dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. It is admitted by the appellants' counsel in the case before us that with regard to the clauses of the policy of insurance which are material, the general average was not to be made up according to the York-Antwerp Rules inasmuch as having regard to the special terms of the contract of affreightment here which purported to incorporate these clauses with some exceptions, it could not be said that in the meaning of this policy of insurance the general average could be provided by the contract of affreightment to be per York-Antwerp Rules; the appellants' counsel rested their contention accordingly on this: They said that the general average ought to have been made payable according to foreign statement, whatever that term "foreign statement" may have meant in this policy of insurance. Now, there are two clauses in the policy of insurance dealing with the same subject-matter. They only differ in this, that in the clause in the body of the policy the words are "general average payable according to foreign statement if so made up," and the words "if so made up" are omitted from the corresponding clause in what are called the Institute Time Clauses 1900. But it is clear to my mind that the two clauses must be read together; and I have no hesitation, therefore, in coming to the conclusion that in this policy the foreign statement which is meant is the foreign statement if so made up. Now, I think that, by agreeing that general average shall be payable according to foreign statement if so made up, the parties have in effect agreed to be bound by the foreign statement if so made up as it exists in fact, only subject to two observations which I am about to make. In the first place, I think in order to bind the parties that the statement so made up must have been made up in good faith. It is not challenged here by the appellants that the statement has not been made up in good faith. Moreover, I should like to make a reservation for further consideration if the case I am about to mention should hereafter arise—that is to say, if the statement be made up according, say, to the law of the port which recognised the special terms of the contract of affreightment. I doubt if the parties to the policy of insurance in a case like the present would be bound by the statement if the contract of affreightment imported terms as to general average of a special and unusual character, which could not reasonably have been contemplated by the parties to the policy of insurance. If such a case arises I should like to further consider it; but such a case does not arise here. I may point out that jettison of deck cargoes is in many cases allowable as general average—for example, by English law in the case of voyages where deck cargo is permitted by the established custom of navigation. And I may point out that in the present case the voyage was one where deck cargo was so permitted, and in the present case, therefore, it could not be said that the contract of affreightment so far as it referred to deck cargoes was of so special or unusual a character as to be outside the reasonable contemplation of the parties to the policy of insurance. In the present case, therefore, I have no hesitation in saying for myself that I think the parties are bound by the statement, which was, in fact, made up at Antwerp, and which decides to my mind the rights of the parties. I agree, therefore, in thinking that the appeal fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. For myself I agree with the reasoning of Kennedy, J. The appellants invite us to deal with the present case reading as applicable thereto the words "General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up" as meaning a statement made up in conformity with foreign law. Now, the statement was made up at Antwerp, which was the proper place for making it up, and what is sued for in the present case is the contribution as defined by that foreign statement. But it is said that that statement was not in accordance with the general law of Belgium, and that these words which I have already read ought to be treated as meaning that the general average is to be payable according to the general law of the country where it is made up, and not in accordance with any specific agreement which may be made between the parties, even if such could be recognised by the law. Now, I am unable for myself to construe these words as referring to the general law of the country. It seems to me that to do so is to give no effect to the words "if so made up." By those words I think the parties meant in some sense or other to bind themselves to a statement actually made up in the foreign country. And the utmost, it seems to me, that could be introduced as qualification would be that, if it is not the actual statement made up by the average adjuster holding the official position there, it should be in accordance with the law of that country, so as to be valid and binding in that country when made. Now, I understand it to be conceded by both the learned counsel for the appellants that, in point of fact, the law of Belgium does recognise the existence of special agreements, and does give effect to them in respect of any contract which they might contain with respect to general average. For these reasons, which are those of Kennedy, J., I should be prepared to follow his decision. I also agree with the view which has been expressed by my brethren, if that be not the case, as to the effect which ought to be given to the clause.

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Carriage of goods—Damage to cargo—Exceptions in bills of lading—Harter Act (Act of Congress of U.S.A. 1893)—“Faults or errors in the management of vessel.”

By sect. 3 of the Harter Act (U.S.A.) 1893, which was incorporated in certain bills of lading under which butter was shipped at New York for carriage to London, if the owner of any vessel transporting merchandise shall exercise due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy and properly manned and equipped, then the owner is not to be held responsible for damage or loss “resulting from faults or errors in navigation, or in the management of the said vessel.” Owing to the negligence of the persons in charge of the refrigerating apparatus with which the ship was fitted, the butter was damaged.

Held, that the phrase “faults or errors in . . . the management of the said vessel” meant in the management of the said vessel quâ vessel; that the refrigerating apparatus not having been introduced into the vessel for the special purpose of the butter, but for the purpose of cooling the vessel and to be used for its provisions available for consumption during the voyage, management of the refrigerating apparatus was, in the particular circumstances, management of the vessel; and that, the damage to the butter having resulted from the negligence of the crew in working this part of the vessel, the shipowners were relieved from liability in respect of such damage by virtue of sect. 3 of the Harter Act. Decision of Kennedy, J. (87 L. T. Rep. 717; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 347) affirmed.

SEVERAL parcels of butter, amounting in all to 206 tubs and 170 boxes, were shipped at New York on board the defendants' ship for carriage to London under two bills of lading each signed by the defendants and dated the 29th June 1900.

It was thereby provided that the shipment should be subject to all the terms and provisions of, and all the exemptions from liability contained in, the Act of Congress of the United States approved on the 13th Feb. 1893, and entitled "An Act relating to navigation of vessels, &c."—commonly known as the "Harter Act."

By that Act it is provided as follows:

Sect. 1. That it shall not be lawful for the manager, agent, master, or owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property from or between ports of the United States and foreign ports to insert in any bill of lading or shipping document any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby it, he, or they shall be relieved from liability for loss or damage arising from negligence, fault, or failure in proper loading, stowage, custody, care, or proper delivery of any and all lawful merchandise or property committed to its or their charge. Any and all words or clauses of such import inserted in bills of lading or shipping receipts shall be null and void, and of no effect.

Sect. 2. That it shall not be lawful for any vessel transporting merchandise or property from or between ports of the United States of America and foreign ports, her owner, master, agent, or manager, to insert in any bill of lading or shipping document any covenant or agreement whereby the obligations of the owner or owners of the said vessel to exercise due diligence, properly equip, man, provision, and outfit said vessel, and to make said vessel seaworthy and capable of performing her intended voyage, or whereby the obligations of the master, officers, agents, or servants, to carefully handle and stow her cargo, and to care for and properly deliver same, shall in anywise be lessened, weakened, or avoided.

Sect. 3. That if the owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property to or from any port in the United States of America shall exercise due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy, and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, neither the vessel, her owner or owners, agent, or charterers shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of said vessel . . . or the inherent defect, quality, or vice of the thing carried.

The butter, which was in apparent good order and condition when shipped at New York, was delivered in London to the plaintiff, the indorsee of the bills of lading, to whom the property in the goods passed by such indorsement, in a damaged condition, the depreciation on the same amounting, as the plaintiff alleged, to 250l.

The butter was carried in insulated chambers connected with the refrigerating apparatus with which the ship was supplied for the purpose of enabling her to carry perishable goods during the summer months.

There were eight of such chambers, of which six were used for the cargo carried, and two for the purpose of preserving the ship's provisions.

At the time of the shipment the insulated chambers were cooled down to a proper temperature for the reception of the butter, and the refrigerating machinery was in good working order.

The damage to the butter was caused by the failure on the part of those in charge of the refrigerating machinery during the voyage to properly work the same, whereby the insulated chambers were not kept at a proper and sufficiently low temperature.

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants claiming 250l. damages, with interest thereon at 5 per cent. from the 31st Aug. 1900.

The defendants contended that the negligence in the management of the refrigerating machinery was a fault or error in the management of the vessel.

In Nov. 1902 the action came on for trial before Kennedy, J. sitting without a jury, when his Lordship decided (87 L. T. Rep. 717; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 347) that the neglect to keep the chambers sufficiently cooled during the voyage was a fault or error "in the management of" the "vessel" within the meaning of the bills of lading; and that the defendants were consequently exempted from liability for the damage to the goods.

From that decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Loehnis (with them Ricardo) for the appellants. — The questions which the court has to consider in this case are, first, what is the meaning of "seaworthy" in sects. 2 and 3 of the Harter Act; and, secondly, what is the meaning of "management of the said vessel" in sect. 3. The terms, provisions, and exceptions of that Act are to be treated as if they had been set out verbatim in the bills of lading:

Dobell v. Steamship Rossmore Company, 73 L. T. Rep. 74; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 33; (1895) 2 Q. B. 408.

In the absence of anything to the contrary contained in the bills of lading, there is implied in it an absolute warranty by the shipowners that the refrigerating machinery in the ship was fit at the time of the shipment of the butter to properly preserve it:

Owners of Cargo on Board the Steamship Maori King v. Hughes, 73 L. T. Rep. 141; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; (1895) 2 Q. B. 550.

The English cases which have dealt with the question of "management" are

The Ferro, 68 L. T. Rep. 418; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 309; (1893) P. 38;

The Glenochil, 73 L. T. Rep. 416; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 218; (1896) P. 10;

The Rodney, 82 L. T. Rep. 27; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 39; (1900) P. 112;

The Acomac, 63 L. T. Rep. 737; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 579; 15 P. Div. 208.

There are also American authorities, with judgments in which the observations upon the Harter Act are in point here, and are of considerable weight:

Botany Worsted Mills v. Knott, 76 Fed. Rep. 582; 82 Ib. 471;

The Prussia, 92 Fed. Rep. 838; on appeal, 93 Ib. 837;

Calderon v. Atlas Steamship Company, 170 U. S. Rep. 271.

Another point is that sect. 3 of the Harter Act is a negligence clause. The principle has over and over again been laid down that when shipowners stipulate for exemption from the exercise of care, they must do so in clear and explicit terms. The best authority for the proposition, in which all the authorities are summarised, is

Steinman and Co. v. Angier Line (1887) Limited, 64 L. T. Rep. 613; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 46; (1891) 1 Q. B. 619, at p. 623.

Burton and Co. v. English and Co., 49 L. T. Rep. 768; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 12 Q. B. Div. 218.

Robson, K.C. and D. Stephens for the respondents.—The first question is what is the vessel itself. It must not only be a ship to go through the water, but a ship as affecting the cargo—to carry the cargo. The shipowners are bound to give the shippers a ship which can safely carry their cargo—a ship which is fit for the purpose for which it is employed. The refrigerating machinery is part of the ship for the purpose of carrying the cargo of butter; it is part of the ship to which the obligation of "seaworthiness" applies. That is a conclusive test as to what is and what is not part of the ship. The refrigerating machinery is as much a part of the ship as the material by which it is connected or the rudder or any other part. It is the necessary part of that which carries the cargo. As to the question of seaworthiness or fitness for the purpose of carrying a cargo, see

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This case seems to me to be rather on the border line. But the question that we have to decide is really a question of fact, and not a question of the construction of the clauses that have been imported into this bill of lading from the Harter Act. Now, the decision, as I understand it, of Kennedy, J. comes to this: He finds that the vessel at the moment of starting on this voyage carrying this butter was, in all respects, seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied. Having come to that conclusion, he also comes to another conclusion of fact, which is that the damage which admittedly occurred in respect of this butter, by reason of its not being kept cool in the refrigerating chambers, was a damage which arose in the management of the vessel. I do not think that anyone dealing with these clauses imported from the Harter Act would deny that if those two conclusions of fact of Kennedy, J. are right, his ultimate judgment is right. If it is really true that at the moment of commencing the voyage the ship was seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, and if it is also true that the damage which has occurred to this butter is damage resulting from the management of the vessel, it would seem to be an irresistible conclusion that the shipowner is relieved from liability in respect of the damage. Now, one has to consider first what are the facts in this case, and see whether the evidence is such and the facts which are admitted are such, as to justify the conclusion of Kennedy, J. But before doing that I want to say a word or two about these clauses which have been imported. Clause 1 is the first which is imported. That is a section which deals with the improper care of the cargo, and it forbids clauses being introduced by the shipowner which shall relieve him from liability for the improper care of cargo. Clause 2 is rather more complicated, and it is better therefore to read it in this case: "It shall not be lawful for any vessel transporting merchandise or property from or between ports of the United States of America and foreign ports, her owner, master, agent, or manager, to insert in any bill of lading or shipping document any covenant or agreement whereby the obligations of the owner or owners of the said vessel to exercise due diligence, properly equip, man, provision, and outfit said vessel, and to make said vessel seaworthy, and capable of performing her intended voyage. . . ." There is the first part of clause 2 preventing the ship-owner relieving himself in any way from the obligation of seaworthiness. Then it goes on with a further prohibition that he is not to introduce any clauses "whereby the obligations of the master, officers, agents, or servants to carefully handle and stow her cargo, and to care for and properly deliver same, shall in anywise be lessened, weakened, or avoided." Now we have not got to apply either of these two clauses to the present case, for the present case is not of a character, and the claim is not of a character, which raises the question whether there are clauses in this bill of lading which are prohibited by these words. But we have heard a good deal about these two clauses, and for this reason, that Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Robson take a different view of the three clauses as a whole. Mr. Hamilton says you must construe clause 3 in the light of clauses 1 and 2, and he says when you find in clauses 1 and 2 that it is prohibited to introduce into a bill of lading or other shipping document anything which shall relieve the shipowner of his liability to stow properly or to carefully handle and stow a cargo, and to care for it properly and deliver the same, or by which such obligations shall in anywise be lessened, weakened, or avoided, it is quite plain that you must not put upon the words "in navigation or in the management of the said vessel" which occur in clause 3 any meaning which will neutralise or take away the effect of the provisions in clauses 1 and 2. Further he says that if you come to the conclusion that Kennedy, J. did, that the mismanagement of this refrigerating machine was mismanagement of the vessel, the effect of that is really that you are neutralising and reducing to nothing the provisions in clauses 1 and 2. Mr. Robson, on the other hand, says clauses 1 and 2 are merely two independent prohibitions — these are things you shall not do. Then he says that clause 3, instead of allowing the shipowner and the shipper to determine what their respective positions are, the Act, by clause 3, defines what those obligations shall be for the future. He says that that is the proper way of construing clause 3, and that you have no right to read it as a connected clause with clauses 1 and 2. There is a good deal to be said for both sides, but the conclusion I have come to myself is that they are neither of them quite right; that the one makes the dependence stronger than it really is, and the other alleges more independence than we should really find in these clauses. Taking that view, when I come to read these words I so far agree with Mr. Hamilton that I think that "in the management of the said vessel" means in the management of the vessel quod vessel. I do not think that "the management of the said vessel" is at all the same thing as "in navigation." What you have to ask yourself, in my judgment, is: What, for the purpose of clause 3, is the meaning of "in the management of the said vessel?" I repeat it means in the management of the said vessel quod vessel. Now, under those circumstances, if you had had in this case some appliance placed in the refrigerating chamber where the butter was, simply for the purpose of refrigerating the butter, I should have hesitated very much to say that the refrigerating apparatus was part of the vessel; and I should, I think, not have been able to persuade myself to come to the conclusion that mismanagement of that special apparatus was a mismanagement of the vessel. But it is not the fact here that this refrigerating machine was introduced into this ship with special reference to this butter. It was no more, to my mind, introduced into this ship with reference to this butter than the port-holes or the removability of the hatches for the purpose of ventilation, or any other ventilating apparatus, could be said to be introduced for the purpose of a particular cargo. I think that on the evidence this refrigerating machine was put in the ship for the purpose of cooling the ship. It is quite true that when you get the refrigerating machine there you could apply it either to cool the butter, which in this case happened to be in chambers A, B, C, and D, or the meat, which happened to be in chambers E and F, or the store-room of the ship, in which the provisions for consumption on the voyage were kept. You could use it for any of those purposes. But, in my judgment, we ought not, sitting as a Court of Appeal here, to say that Kennedy, J. was wrong in holding, as he seems to me by his judgment to have done, that this particular refrigerating apparatus was part of the ship; that the management of it was management of the vessel; and that therefore the mismanagement of it was the mismanagement of the vessel. That is the conclusion I have come to in this case. I have not got to construe clauses 1 and 2, but I do construe them to this extent: It is the contrast between the dealing with the stowage of the cargo and the dealing with the vessel itself that makes me say, when I come to clause 3, that "management of the vessel" means management of the vessel quâ ship, not quâ navigation, but quâ ship. The moment I arrive at the conclusion that I cannot say that Kennedy, J. was wrong in finding as he did, in effect, do, that this refrigerating machine was a part of this vessel, it seems to me that all the rest of his conclusion follows. I think it was part of the vessel, and I think that this damage to this butter resulted from negligence in the management of this part of the vessel, and, therefore, of this vessel. The appeal will therefore be dismissed with costs.

ROWSON v. ATLANTIC TRANSPORT COMPANY.

[CT. OF APP.]

ROME, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. Under the first two clauses of the Harter Act it is clear that the common law liability of the shipowner in respect of the necessity for due care being taken in respect of the cargo was carefully reserved, except so far as that liability may have been expressly cut down by the provisions of clause 3. When I look at clause 3 I think it is reasonably clear that that clause was directly aiming at negligence of the owners, agents, or charterers of the ship in respect of the navigation or the management of the vessel properly so called. The shipowners are free from negligence in the management of the vessel, regarded as, as has been said, a vessel. But I also agree that in considering what is a vessel you must bear in mind that it is to be regarded as a cargo-bearing carrier, and, moreover, it may be regarded specially by consideration of the particular cargo which may have been injured in the course of the voyage. Cases of difficulty may often arise, as they do in the present case, as to whether the negligence which has resulted in an injury to cargo is to be regarded as negligence in the care of the cargo within the earlier clauses of the Act, or negligence in the management of the vessel under clause 3. I think it is difficult, if not practically impossible, to attempt successfully to lay down any general principles as to how any particular case is to be dealt with. I think you must look at the facts of each case as it arises, and determine on those facts on which side of the line the case falls. In considering those special facts I think the following that I am going to mention are worthy of consideration, or may be, in determining the question. For example: What was the act of negligence complained of; by whom was it committed; in particular, was the man who was guilty of the negligence acting at the time as an ordinary member of the officers, engineers, or crew of the ship; was he, or not, acting in the ordinary course of his duties and on behalf of the vessel regarded as a whole, or was he acting solely or in particular in looking after the cargo and for the purposes of the cargo? Further, in some cases it may be important to consider: Was the injury to the cargo caused directly or indirectly by the act of negligence? I do not, as I have said, attempt to lay down any general principle; I only say that, in considering the circumstances of each case, attention may well be had, so far as they are applicable, to the kind of considerations I have indicated. In the present case the facts which prevent me from differing from the learned judge in the court below in his conclusion of fact are these: It appears that as part of the vessel there were several refrigerating chambers, and there was a pipe, in particular, the operation of which when properly worked was to keep the air of the refrigerating chambers properly cool. Now those chambers were not all used for cargo, and in the case of the particular voyage we have to consider in this case that two of those chambers were being used for the ordinary purposes of the ship in this sense: They were used for the storage of provisions which required refrigerating, those provisions being required for the ordinary purposes of the ship's crew or passengers, if there were any, during the course of the voyage as a sea-going carrier. The man who had to attend to this pipe was an engineer of the ship, employed in the ordinary way in looking after this pipe, regarded as part of the vessel. He had not been specially told, nor was it his special duty, to look after the cargo in particular or any part of the cargo. The pipe he had to attend to was wanted, as I have pointed out, for the general purposes of the ship, as well as for the requirements of some of the cargo. But, so far as the engineer attending to it was concerned, all he had to look upon it as was as a pipe required for the general purposes of the vessel. He had not to consider it as affecting any special or particular part of the cargo. Indeed, I may point out that the engineer would have had to attend to this pipe, as it appears from the facts of the case, even if there had been no cargo requiring refrigerating, for he would have had to keep the pipe at work for the purpose of keeping cool the two chambers which contained the provisions of the ship; and the injury to the cargo which was caused by the act of negligence was only indirectly caused by the act. The effect of this act was to prevent the pipe acting properly so as to cool the refrigerating chambers as a whole, and the effect of that upon one of the refrigerating chambers was that the temperature got above the proper temperature necessary for proper preservation, and part of the cargo became injured. But, as I have said, it really was, properly regarded, only an indirect injury to the cargo, so far as the pipe itself was concerned; the pipe was intact. The mismanagement of the pipe was a mismanagement of it in working the pipe quod pipe, as I have said, and as part of the vessel. When I look at all these facts of the case, the conclusion I have come to is that what this engineer did was, to be guilty of an act of negligence in the management of the ship regarded as a vessel, and even regarded as a vessel carrying cargo. In any point of view you like it was, as far as I can see, an act of negligence by an officer of the ship performing his duties to the ship as a ship, and not with regard to any particular cargo, and such an act as really was concerned in the management of the vessel as a whole, and which, therefore, in my opinion, really came within the express limitation of clause 3 of the Act.

STIRLING, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. I am bound to say that I think this is a case of very considerable difficulty. We have here to deal with a bill of lading which stipulates that the shipment is to be subject to all the terms and provisions of and all the exceptions from liability contained in the Harter Act. We have been invited by counsel on both sides to deal with this case on the same footing as if those terms and provisions and exceptions had been set out verbatim in the bill of lading. Whether that is the true construction it is unnecessary to say. The course we adopt has been sanctioned by the Court of Appeal in former cases, and particularly in that of Dobell v. Steamship Rossmore Company (73 L. T. Rep. 74; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 33; (1895) 2 Q. B. 408). The general scheme of the Harter Act was this, that the first section forbids the introduction into any bill of lading or other shipping document any clause relieving the shipowner from liability in respect of negligence, fault, or failure in proper loading, stowage, custody, care, or proper delivery of the cargo. The second clause deals, first of all, with prohibiting the shipowner from introducing into any bill of lading or shipping document anything which exonerates him from his obligation to exercise due diligence in proper management, equipping, and outfitting the vessel, and making the vessel seaworthy and capable of performing her voyage. It also, secondly, prohibits introducing any clause which exempts the owner from liability in respect of the "master, officers, agents, or servants to carefully handle and stow her cargo and to care for and properly deliver same." Then the third clause provides: "That if the owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property to or from any port in the United States of America shall exercise due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, neither the vessel, her owner or owners, agent or charterers, shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of said vessel." The question we have to deal with here is whether a fault or error has been committed in the management of the vessel within the meaning of that third clause. This question has been considered both by the courts of this country and by the courts in the United States. I say nothing as to the decisions of the United States, because we are not, on the present occasion, dealing with American law. But I understand them to have gone on the same lines as the cases which have been dealt with in this country—namely, two cases in the Probate Division of The Glenochil (73 L. T. Rep. 416; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 218; (1896) P. 10) and The Rodney (82 L. T. Rep. 27; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 39; (1900) P. 112). I agree with the general view which has been taken of the sections in those two cases—namely, that there is a broad distinction drawn in the Act between the dealing with the cargo and the management of the vessel. Those two matters seem to be distinguished one from the other in the Act, and I accept the view which is taken by the President of the Probate Division in The Glenochil (ubi sup.), where he says at p. 14 of (1896) P. that the object of sect. 1 is to prevent the insertion of clauses in mercantile instruments "which would exempt the carrier from want of proper care in regard to the cargo." Then he says: "It is obvious that those words cannot be taken in their largest sense, because in a secondary, though not primary, sense, any mismanagement of the ship, in navigation or otherwise, is want of proper care as regards the cargo. But it is clear that it was intended by sect. 3 to exempt from liability for damage or loss resulting from faults and errors of navigation or in the management of the vessel; and the way in which these two provisions may be reconciled is, I think, first that the Act prevents exemptions in the case of direct want of care in respect of the cargo, and, secondly, the exemption permitted is in respect of a fault primarily connected with the navigation or the management of the vessel, and not with the cargo." And Barnes, J., who also took part in the decision, says this (at p. 18 of (1896) P.): "But I think if those sections [in the Harter Act] are looked at there will be found a strong and marked contrast in the provisions which deal with the care of the cargo and those which deal with the management of the ship herself; and I think that where the act done in the management of the ship is one which is necessarily done in the proper handling of the vessel, though in the particular case the handling is not properly done, but is done for the safety of the ship herself, and is not primarily done at all in connection with the cargo, that must be a matter which falls within the words 'management of the said vessel.'" In the subsequent case of The Rodney (ubi sup.) the same lines are adhered to, but the learned judges both say that in that case the learned County Court judge had limited their meaning too narrowly, and the President says (at p. 117 of (1900) P.); "The acts need not be done merely for the safety of the vessel or for her maintenance in a seaworthy condition. If you extend them to keeping the vessel in her proper condition, then the act in this case is an act done in the management of the vessel, and falls within the principle of The Glenochil (ubi sup.)." And Barnes, J. says: "I think that the words 'faults or errors in the management of the vessel' include improper handling of the ship, as a ship, which affects the safety of the cargo." Kennedy, J. in his judgment in the present case, taking, I think, the words from the prior judgment of Walton, J. in an action by other plaintiffs against the present defendants, says this: "One part of this machine is a compressor in which carbonic acid gas is put under very great pressure by means of a piston. In order that that work may be done effectively it is necessary that the carbonic acid gas should not escape. One place by which it would very naturally escape, unless special precautions were taken, is the gland in which the piston rod works, and to prevent escape there the gland has to be very securely packed. It is packed and made tight by means of leather rings, and that is supplemented by driving into the gland lubricating oil, which acts both as a lubricant and also as a kind of additional cushion, and makes the gland work perfectly tight so that the gas cannot escape at all." Now what was done here was that, for the purpose of saving trouble, the engineer in charge, more particularly of this portion of the apparatus, saw fit to turn a handle, by means of which the passage of the oil into the gland was stopped; the result was that the temperature was very much raised in the refrigerator, and the butter was damaged. The learned judge in the court below found that the damage was done by the engineer in working the refrigerating apparatus in the vessel.

The question is whether this is a fault or error committed, within the language of the Act, in the management of the vessel, or is it a fault or error committed in taking care of the cargo, which is the duty of the shipowner to see to. That ultimately comes down to a question of fact, the general meaning of the clauses having been ascertained in the way which I have pointed out. It raises questions which are not by any means easy to decide in many cases, but let me put an example or two to see how the case can be put. Suppose, for example, by negligence, if you will, but by some fault or error committed in the engine-room, a rod which worked the piston was broken and it was impossible afterwards to set the refrigerating apparatus in motion. Which side would that lie? It seems to me it would be impossible to say that that was not a fault or error committed in the management of the ship. On the other hand, if the refrigerating chambers or refrigerating machines were entirely devoted to cargo, and the neglect had been, as it was in the present case, that of turning a handle which intercepted the supply of oil to this particular spot in the machine, I should have felt very great hesitation in saying that was not neglect in taking proper care of the cargo. And for a long while I was under the impression that that really represented the state of things here, and that the negligent act had nothing to do really with anything connected with the vessel at all, but simply a portion of the vessel which was appropriated to the cargo. But it now turns out that the refrigerating portion of the vessel does include chambers which are applied and used for carrying provisions for the ship, and these are worked with precisely one and the same apparatus as the chambers which are devoted for the preservation of the cargo. The duties of the particular engineer in charge were not limited, as I understand, to taking care of the cargo or, indeed, to this particular portion of her refrigerators, and although I think the case, on the whole, is very near the line, it does seem to me that I must come to the conclusion that the fault or error was committed in the management of the vessel within the meaning of this clause. I therefore agree with my learned brethren that I think the appeal should be dismissed.

GREENOCK STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. MARITIME INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance—Marine—Voyage policy—Warranty of seaworthiness—Breach—Negligence of master—Insufficient supply of coal for steamship—Burning ship's fittings and cargo—"Held covered" clause in policy.

Owners of a steamship insured their vessel with a marine insurance company under a policy which contained (inter alia) the following provisions: "At and from . . . to port or ports in any order in the United Kingdom and (or) Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both inclusive, and while there and thence to port or ports, place or places, on west coast of South America, backwards and forwards, and forwards and backwards, in any order or rotation, while there and thence to port or ports of call and (or) discharge in any order in the United Kingdom and (or) Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both inclusive, and while there, however employed, until expiry of thirty days after arrival or until sailing on next voyage, which may first occur; with leave to call at any ports and places for all purposes, and any ports and places on the east coast of South America and (or) Falkland Islands, both outwards and homewards."

The perils insured against were of the seas, &c., subject to clauses annexed to the policy, which provided (inter alia): "This insurance also to cover loss through the negligence of master, mariners, engineers, or pilots. Including all risks incidental to steam navigation. General average salvage and special charges payable as per official foreign adjustment, if so made up, or per York-Antwerp Rules 1890 if in accordance with the contract of affreightment. Held covered in case of any breach of warranty, deviation, and (or) any unprovided incidental risk or change of voyage, at a premium to be hereafter arranged." During the voyage the ship called at Monte Video, and through the negligence of the master sailed thence without having sufficient coal on board to take her to St. Vincent, her next place of call, where in ordinary course she would coal again. After leaving Monte Video the ship experienced strong head winds and seas. Her coal supply failing between Monte Video and St. Vincent, the master burnt as fuel some of the ship's fittings, spars, and a portion of the cargo, and if he had not done so she would have been in danger of becoming a total loss. The plaintiffs did not know until after the ship reached St. Vincent that she had left Monte Video without sufficient coal, and no premium had been arranged under the "held covered" clause. The shipowners brought an action against the insurance company on the policy to recover in respect of the loss of the fittings, spars, and cargo.

Held, that the case was governed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Vortigern (80 L. T. Rep. 382; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 523; (1899) P. 140); and that there was an implied warranty of seaworthiness which the shipowner had broken.

Decision of Bigham, J. (88 L. T. Rep. 207; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 364) affirmed.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a decision of Bigham, J. (88 L. T. Rep. 207; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 364).

The action was tried before the learned judge, sitting in the Commercial Court, upon the following statement of facts agreed by the plaintiffs and the defendants:—

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Gulf of Florida, and the defendants were a marine insurance company who had insured the steamship by a policy dated the 19th July 1897.

The more important terms of the policy were as follows:

For 3000*l.* on the Gulf of Florida valued at 30,000*l.* At and from . . . to port or ports in any order in the United Kingdom and (or) Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both inclusive, and while there and thence to port or ports, place or places on west coast of South America, backwards and forwards, and forwards and backwards, in any order or rotation, while there and thence to port or ports of call and (or) discharge in any order in the United Kingdom and (or) Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both inclusive, and while there, however employed, until expiry of thirty days after arrival or until sailing on next voyage, whichever may first occur; with leave to call at any ports and places for all purposes, and any ports and places on the east coast of South America and (or) Falkland Islands, both outwards and homewards. The risk not to commence before the expiration of previous policies; against the risk of total loss only but including collision clause, general average and salvage charges. Perils insured against of the seas, &c. Subject to and including Gulf Line voyage clauses as annexed.

Such clauses were, so far as material, as follows:

This insurance also to cover loss through the negligence of master, mariners, engineers, or pilots. Including all risks incidental to steam navigation. General average salvage and special charges payable as per official foreign adjustment, if so made up, or per York-Antwerp Rules 1890 if in accordance with the contract of affreightment. Held covered in case of any breach of warranty, deviation, and (or) any unprovided incidental risk or change of voyage, at a premium to be hereafter arranged. It shall be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue, labour and travel for, in and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said ship, &c., and any part thereof without prejudice to this insurance, to the charges whereof we, the assurers, will contribute each according to the rate or quantity of this sum herein insured. In the event of any inaccuracy in the description of voyage, interest, name of vessel, clauses, or conditions, it is agreed to hold the assured covered at a premium to be arranged.

The previous policies, before the expiration of which the risk was not to commence, were all in similar terms.

One of them was dated the 1st Jan. 1897, and was subscribed by the defendants.

The events giving rise to disputes between the parties took place after the Gulf of Florida left Monte Video on the 18th Dec. 1897.

Stated shortly, they were as follows:—

On arrival at Monte Video the Gulf of Florida had on board 232 tons of bunker coals. She took on board a further 330 tons, and sailed on the 18th Dec. with 562 tons in the bunkers, the bunkers being full and the quantity, apparently, more than sufficient for the passage to St. Vincent, where in the ordinary course she would coal again.

On the same day that she left Monte Video she put back in consequence of an accident to the condenser door. This was renewed, and the voyage resumed on the 23rd Dec.

By this time about 20 tons of the bunker coals had been used, but those on board considered she had still sufficient for the passage to St. Vincent.

After leaving Monte Video the Gulf of Florida experienced strong head winds and seas.

On the 7th Jan. 1898 the coal was found to be burning very quickly, at a rate equal to 36 tons per day. As the rate of consumption continued very high, the speed was reduced on the 9th Jan., and to save steam the steam steering gear and electric light were shut off.

On the 10th Jan. some of the ship's fittings were used for fuel, and on subsequent days further fittings and spars, and portions of the cargo were burnt to assist in keeping up steam. If this had not been done the Gulf of Florida would have been unable to reach port without assistance, and without such assistance would have been helpless and in danger of being totally lost.

The quantity of coal with which the Gulf of Florida left Monte Video, both on the 10th and 23rd Dec., was, in fact, insufficient for the passage to St. Vincent.

This insufficiency happened owing to the negligence of the master and engineers.

The value of the ship's fittings and spars burnt was 312*l.* 4*s.*

The plaintiffs had paid the consignees of cargo for the cargo used as fuel 662*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*

The plaintiffs claimed that they were entitled to the defendant company's proportion of the value of the ship's fittings and spars burnt, and of the sums paid for cargo burnt. Alternatively they claimed the defendant company's proportion of the value of the fittings and spars burnt, and of the ship's contribution in general average of the value of the cargo burnt. In the further alternative, the plaintiffs claimed to be entitled, as above, on payment of an additional premium to be fixed by the court, or as the court might direct.

The defendants denied that the plaintiffs were entitled to any of the said sums, or any part thereof, even on payment of an additional premium.

It was decided by Bigham, J. that an implied warranty of seaworthiness existed when the ship left Monte Video, and that there was a breach of that warranty in not there providing her with sufficient coal, so that the policy then ceased to attach to the risks insured against; also that the clause with respect to loss through the negligence of the master did not apply, because his negligence was not the proximate cause of the loss; and that the implied warranty of seaworthiness was a warranty to which the "held covered" clause applied, but that, as the premium which the defendants might reasonably have charged if they had known of the breach of warranty before the loss occurred was at least equal to the amount of the loss, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover anything.

From that decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

Carver, K.C. and D. C. Leck for the appellants.—The question raised by this appeal is whether upon the terms of the policy of insurance a warranty of seaworthiness is to be implied. We submit not. A warranty of the kind ought not to be implied by a court of law unless it appears that the parties contemplated that such an implied term was to be part of their contract. There is no difference between the rule applicable to maritime contracts and the rule applicable to other contracts. The general principle upon which the court acts in interpreting contracts appears from the observations of Lord Esher, M.R. in Hamlyn and Co. v. Wood and Co., 65 L. T. Rep. 286; (1891) 2 Q. B. 488, at p. 491.

There is no authority for a warranty of seaworthiness of this kind; or, if there is any such warranty, it is only as to the first part of the insurance. The case of The Vortigern (80 L. T. Rep. 382; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 523; (1899) P. 140), upon which Bigham, J. relied, does not, we submit, apply to the present case having regard to the facts. There was no warranty of seaworthiness, at any rate at the time the loss in question occurred. Assuming that this was a voyage policy, the warranty of seaworthiness, if any such existed, was of seaworthiness at the commencement of the voyage. Even allowing that this warranty reattached at every port of call, and that the departure of the vessel from Monte Video with an insufficient supply of coal was a breach of such warranty, such breach, and therefore the consequent loss, arose through the negligence of the master and engineers, and was covered by the policy. The plaintiffs are consequently entitled to recover the defendants' proportion of the value of the ship's fittings which were burnt as for a general average loss. They are also entitled to recover from the defendants the contribution which had to be paid as general average to the cargo owners. The sacrifice of the fittings and cargo was made for the safety of the whole adventure, and it is the subject of general average:

A definition of "voyage policy" and "time policy" appears in Gibson v. Small (ubi sup.).

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (with him R. I. Simey) for the respondents.—The points are whether a warranty of seaworthiness is to be implied, and, if so, what that warranty is. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The sole question now raised appears to be whether upon the terms of this particular policy of insurance we ought to imply a warranty of seaworthiness.] This was clearly, having regard to the terms of the policy and the attached clauses, a voyage policy for a voyage by stages; and there was an implied warranty that the vessel was seaworthy at the commencement of each stage of the voyage. Being a voyage policy, the fact that the vessel in commencing her voyage had not sufficient coal in her bunkers to enable her to complete the voyage made her prima facie then unseaworthy. But this unseaworthiness may be cured when the voyage is by stages by her recoaling at each port of call sufficiently to enable her to complete the next stage:

The Vortigern (ubi sup.).

Here on the facts stated the ship was not coaled sufficiently when she left Monte Video. She therefore commenced that section of the voyage in an unseaworthy condition. [He was stopped by the Court.]

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion this case is covered by the decision in the case of The Vortigern (80 L. T. Rep. 382; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 523; (1899) P. 140). Mr. Carver's argument, although he was not invited to have it so expressed, really was an argument to show that the policy here in effect was a time policy. I feel impressed by the words of the policy, which not only do not describe the risk to be taken as being a "time risk," but so describe it that it is obvious that the real risk was to continue from the time of leaving one of the optional ports, either in the United Kingdom or on the Continent, until the arrival back again of the ship at one of the optional ultimate ports. In the stress of having to satisfy those words, he attempted to say that this was neither a time policy nor a voyage policy; and that therefore there was absolutely no warranty of seaworthiness by the shipowner at all. I do not myself think that it very much matters what you call this policy—whether you call it a "time policy" or whether you call it a "voyage policy." One has to look at the policy, and what was contemplated by the shipowner, and the underwriters respectively, and see whether, having regard to what they both contemplated, the ship was seaworthy. I utterly, myself, reject the notion that under this policy you could say that there was no warranty of seaworthiness at all. In fact, Mr. Carver himself shrank from saying that there was no warranty of seaworthiness at the commencement of the voyage. Once assume that there was an original warranty of seaworthiness, then it seems to me that the principle of the decision in the case of The Vortigern (ubi sup.) absolutely covers this case. If you look at the judgments in The Vortigern, it seems to me that, whether you regard the judgment of Barnes, J. in the first instance or the judgments in the Court of Appeal, you will find that the whole of the reasoning of the learned judges applies to the present case. I am for the purposes of my judgment assuming that under the circumstances of this case there was a plainly implied warranty of seaworthiness at the commencement of the voyage. If that is so, I repeat that it seems to me that the present case is entirely covered by the judgments of Barnes, J. and of the Court of Appeal. I called attention just now to the passage in the judgment of Barnes, J., on the top of p. 147 in the report in (1899) P., and it seems to me that that entirely accords with the statements of Smith, L.J. on p. 153 of the same report, where the learned judge said: "To obviate this difficulty—and a very great difficulty it is in cases of long voyages of cargo-carrying steamships, for it is manifest that no cargo-carrying steamship can ever be seaworthy when she starts on such a voyage as the present by reason of the impossibility of her having on board such an equipment of coal as will be sufficient to take her to the port of destination—it has become the practice, by reason of the necessity of the case, for cargo-carrying steamship owners to divide these long voyages into stages for the purpose of replenishing their ships with coal, and thus, as far as practicable, complying with the warranty of seaworthiness which attached when the ship commenced her voyage." If you look at that passage and look at the passage on p. 155, you can see that in each case really the warranty of seaworthiness in the case of these long voyages is not broken because the steamer does not start in a seaworthy condition, but that the shipowner is entitled to satisfy the implied warranty by taking on board coal at the commencement of each stage. It is plain that really so to hold that there is no breach is a concession made by the law in favour of the shipowner, rather than in favour of the underwriters. And it is also plain that the way in which the court regards these stages is to look at the voyage which is contemplated at each point where the ship takes advantage of this liberty and stops to coal. The shipowner must coal before the contemplated voyage. That does not mean in a case like the present a voyage which is defined in terms upon the face of the policy, but it means that the shipowner, taking advantage of this method of satisfying the implied warranty, must make up his mind where he intends to proceed; and he will only satisfy the warranty if he takes on board a sufficiency of coal for that contemplated voyage.

I do not know that it is necessary to say anything more about this particular case. I cannot help saying, however, that I have never been quite able to understand the ways of underwriters and shipowners—they are too hard for me. Here is a case which, having regard to the enormous extent of sea carriage in the present day, must be arising every day. This particular voyage which was contemplated by the shipowner and the underwriters here, including, as it does, undefined coasting voyages upon the west coast of South America, obviously must be apt to give rise to occasions when the master of the ship is put in great difficulty, not only in respect of the quantity and quality of the coal which he may be able to obtain, but also as to the time when he really will be able to reach another coaling station. In such cases a very great stress must be thrown upon the master—even the most prudent master. One would have thought that it must have occurred to the shipowners that, unless they wished to go to sea under such conditions, it was by no means impossible that even with a fairly prudent master they might find themselves uninsured through the breach of warranty of seaworthiness—a warranty which ex hypothesi it is impossible to satisfy at the starting of the ship. One would have thought that as between the contracting parties the underwriters would have charged a sufficient premium in such a form that the shipowners' insurance should not be entirely dependent upon the judgment of the master in the decision of this difficult question as to the quantity and quality of the coals which he might require. But for some reason or other the parties to these contracts of insurance seem to consider that the interests of commerce are forwarded by leaving things in a more or less uncertain state, and in such a condition that the shipowner undertaking a voyage of this sort can never feel very confident that he is really covered by his insurance. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. I think that this case is covered in principle by the case of The Vortigern (ubi sup.), by which this court is bound. The form of the policy on which the case before us turns is one which to my mind shows that the policy is what is commonly termed "a voyage policy"—a voyage policy properly so called. I may remark that the policy is so described by the parties to it on the face of it. It is a voyage from any port or ports in the United Kingdom and the Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg to any port or ports on the west coast of South America and back again to corresponding ports from which the steaming takes place. Undoubtedly this voyage is a curious one, because it may cover voyages between ports on the west coast of South America. If the case had been one simply for a voyage, say, from any port at any part to be selected in a defined portion of Europe to a port to be selected in any defined portion of the west coast of South America and back again, nobody could for a moment have suggested that that was not a voyage policy in the strictest sense of the term to which the ordinary insurance law applicable to an implied warranty of seaworthiness would apply. The difference between that case and the present is really only one of degree. No doubt the voyage that is defined in this policy was a very onerous one for shipowners to undertake to insure against on one policy, but that was for them to consider. If the shipowners had wished to negative the implied warranty of seaworthiness on such a voyage to any extent, it was for them to do so by express bargain and by express stipulation in the policy. As at present matters stand according to insurance law there are only two kinds of insurance policy known—a time policy and a voyage policy. I am referring, of course, to the kind of question we have to decide on for the purpose of this appeal. Speaking for myself, I think it would be most unfortunate for commercial law, and therefore for commercial people, if we had been obliged in this case to say that there was also a policy of a third kind known to the law—a kind of policy not hitherto supposed even by lawyers or by commercial men to exist. I do not mean to say, of course, but that one document might cover two policies—a voyage policy and a time policy. But in the present case the policy is not really two policies. The document does not cover two distinct insurances, and the policy is not in any true sense in part a time policy. It is, as I have pointed out, a voyage policy and nothing else; and I may add, as has been frequently stated before, that the case of The Vortigern (ubi sup.) was really decided in favour of the shipowners. It was to free them in long voyages from what would otherwise have been a most onerous obligation on their part in the case of steamers—namely, that they would have been obliged, however long a voyage, to have shipped coal sufficient to last the whole of the voyage. In the present case but for the principle of The Vortigern (ubi sup.)—which applies in favour of the shipowners here notwithstanding the curious nature of the voyage—it would have been obligatory on the part of shipowners to have taken care that when their vessel started from the port of departure it was reasonably coaled for the coming voyage. With reference to an argument that was used before us in which it was said that it was impossible for any shipowners to have coaled for such deviations of voyages on the west coast of South America as appears to have been contemplated by this policy, I need only remark that this is not necessarily so. What the shipowners would have to do would be to coal to the extent that was reasonable having regard to the probable nature and duration of the voyages likely to take place on the west coast. As I have said, if shipowners choose to undertake voyages with steam vessels—particularly such a voyage as this, so described, and so long—it is for them to protect themselves, if they do not wish to incur the ordinary obligations that are cast upon them as shipowners in respect of such a voyage. For the reasons I have given I think that this appeal fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I entirely agree with what was said by Bigham, J. in his judgment. He rested his decision to a large extent on the case of The Vortigern (ubi sup.). That is a decision of the Court of Appeal. It was binding on Bigham, J. and it is no less binding upon us, and, unless it can be effectually distinguished, it seems to me that the result is that Bigham, J.'s decision must be affirmed. Now, how is it sought to distinguish that case from the present? In the first place, it is said that case related to a contract of affreightment, whereas the present relates to a contract of insurance. In the case of The Vortigern (ubi sup.) I observe that the learned counsel who argued for the appellants said in his reply that the doctrine of stages which was relied upon was a doctrine of insurance and ought not to be extended to a case of affreightment. Here the argument is the other way, that this is a doctrine which relates to cases of affreightment and ought not to be applied to cases of insurance. Now it seems to me that the Court of Appeal and Barnes, J. rejected that argument in the passage which is referred to by Bigham, J. in his judgment which I think has already been read in this court and treated the case as being the same whether it arises between the steamship owner and his underwriter on a voyage policy or between the steamship owner and the cargo owner upon a contract of affreightment. I think, therefore, that the two cases can be distinguished on that ground.

But then it is said in the second place—and this is really the main contention—that the contract in the case of The Vortigern (ubi sup.) related to specified points, and that the present contract relates to a voyage of a different character. In The Vortigern (ubi sup.) the voyage was in substance from Manila to Liverpool, with liberty to coal at any ports in order, and it was held there that this doctrine of stages applied. Now we have before us undoubtedly a case in which the voyage is described in much wider terms. It is from a port or ports in the United Kingdom or within specified limits on the Continent to a port or ports, or place or places, on the west coast of South America, and then back to a port in the United Kingdom, and between specified limits on the Continent, with power to go backwards and forwards, and forwards and backwards, on the west coast of South America. The risk is extended also until the expiry of thirty days after arrival or until the sailing of the next voyage, whichever first happens. Now Bigham, J. held that that was what is termed in the language of insurance a "voyage policy," and it seems to me that it was. If the voyage had simply been described as one from a port in the United Kingdom to a port on the west coast of South America and back from there to the United Kingdom, it would have been precisely within the decision in The Vortigern (ubi sup.). And although it reduced the power to go backwards and forwards on the west coast of South America it really would not in my opinion affect the substance of the case. It seems to me that there are reasons which may be urged against the law as laid down in The Vortigern (ubi sup.). But if such there be, I express no opinion one way or another upon them. They must be considered, it seems to me, by a higher tribunal. I think that The Vortigern (ubi sup.) cannot be distinguished for the purposes of the present case.

RATHBONE BROTHERS AND Co. v. MACIVER, SONS, AND Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bill of lading—Construction—Exceptions—"Unseaworthiness"—Ship unfit to receive cargo—Liability of shipowner.

Bills of lading provided that certain sheepskins should be delivered in good order and condition with several exceptions, amongst which were loss or damage resulting from the consequence of any injury to or defect in hull, tackle, or machinery, or their appurtenances, however such defect or injury might be caused, and notwithstanding that the same might have existed at or at any time before loading or sailing of the vessel, and whether the loss or injury arising therefrom was occasioned by the negligence of the owners, master, officers, or crew, and whether before or after or during the voyage, or for whose acts the shipowner would otherwise be liable, or by unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or at any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means had been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness.

Some of the sheepskins were damaged by fresh water which escaped from a pipe which was broken when they were put on board. It was admitted that the vessel was not fit to receive cargo at the time when it was loaded, and that reasonable means had not been taken to provide against such unfitness.

Held, that "unseaworthiness" in this bill of lading included unfitness to receive the cargo, and was not limited to the unfitness of the ship to meet the perils of the sea; and, the shipowners not having taken all reasonable means to provide against such unseaworthiness, they were liable for the damage.

Decision of Wills, J. reversed.

THIS action was brought by the indorsees of four bills of lading signed by the defendants' agents against the owners of the steamship Barbary for damages for injury to some bales of sheepskins.

The sheepskins were shipped at Buenos Ayres for conveyance to Liverpool, and were damaged while on board by fresh water which escaped from a broken pipe which supplied a fresh-water tank for domestic service and which was already broken at the time when the sheepskins were put on board the ship at the commencement of the voyage.

The bill of lading was as follows :

Shipped in apparent good order and condition . . . at Buenos Ayres . . . to be delivered in the like good order and condition at Liverpool (the act of God . . . loss or damage resulting from effects of climate, heat of holds, vermin, rain, spray, insufficiency in strength of wrappers and packages, non-marking, obliteration or insufficiency of marks, and all injury to the same, sweating . . . and all damage arising from other goods . . . or from errors, obliteration, insufficiency, or absence of marks . . . risk of lighterage to or from the vessel, risk of craft or hulk or storage or transhipment, or transhipment from or to craft, explosion, heat, fire, before loading or in the ship or after unloading, and at any time and place whatever, boilers, steam machinery or their appurtenances, or from the consequence of any damage, breakdown, injury to or defect in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery or their appurtenances, refrigerating engine or chamber, or any part thereof, outfit, tackle, or other appurtenances, however such damage, defect, or injury may be caused, and notwithstanding that the same may have existed at or at any time before the loading or sailing of the vessel, collision, stranding . . . or any other peril of the sea . . . and whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom, be occasioned by the wrongful act, negligence, or error in judgment of the owners, master, officers, pilots, mariners, crew . . . or other persons employed in or about the ship, and whether before or after or during the voyage, or for whose acts the shipowner would otherwise be liable, or by unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or at any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means have been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness, or by any cause whatever excepted).

The defendants admitted that the vessel was not fit to receive cargo at the time when the sheepskins were loaded, and that reasonable means had not been taken to provide against that unfitness.

The action was tried by Wills, J. without a jury at the Liverpool Summer Assizes on the 25th and 30th July 1902, and he held that the shipowners were not liable, on the ground that the latter part of the exception as to "unseaworthiness" extended only to unseaworthiness of the ship as a ship—i.e., to her unfitness to meet the perils of navigation with safety to the ship, and not to her unfitness to carry the cargo.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Pickford, K.C. and Leslie Scott for the appellant.—The defendants have broken the warranty for seaworthiness in these bills of lading. "Unseaworthiness" has now a wide meaning in a commercial sense; it means more than the perils of the sea, and includes unfitness of the ship to convey the goods included in the bills of lading. The defect in the fresh-water pipe which caused this damage to the sheepskins made the vessel unseaworthy within the usual commercial meaning of that term; there are no words to restrict the meaning of "unseaworthiness" to the strict meaning of the term—viz., unfit to encounter the perils of the sea—and therefore shipowners are liable. The decision of Wills, J. that the words which follow the expression "unseaworthiness" in the bill of lading—viz., "at the beginning or at any period of the voyage"—showed that the word was used in its strict sense is wrong :

Horridge, K.C. and Maurice Hill for the defendants.—Apart from the proviso as to unseaworthiness at the end of the exceptions, the shipowners would not be liable under this bill of lading. The shipowners are not liable for any defect, even before the loading of the vessel. The exceptions relieve them from liability under the warranty of seaworthiness, and the addition as to "unseaworthiness" refers to anything which comes within it which is not included in the former clause, provided reasonable care has been used. Therefore the owners were under no obligation to provide a ship fit to receive the cargo :

There is a distinction between a warranty of sea-worthiness and a warranty of fitness. A warranty of seaworthiness proper begins at the commencement of the voyage :

Carver's Carriage by Sea, s. 21.

The term "unseaworthiness" refers to fitness to encounter the perils of the sea unless there are words which show a contrary intention. Wills, J. was right in holding that here the word must be read strictly, and means only unseaworthiness proper. It refers strictly to cases of the entry of sea water. A warranty of "fitness" applies when the loading is commenced, before the commencement of the voyage. A ship may be unfit and yet seaworthy :

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I do not think that this judgment can be supported. I am not sure that it is necessary for us to differ from Wills, J. on any point that he really decided, but I may say at once that we should be prepared, if it were necessary, to take a wider view of the meaning of the word "unseaworthiness" in this bill of lading than that which was taken by him. I wish, before I go more into detail in this case, to point out the broad principle which I think ought to be applied in the construction of a bill of lading, or of any other contract relating to carriage of goods by sea, just as much in the case of a charter-party as of a bill of lading. It is the principle laid down both by Bigham, J. and by the Court of Appeal in Owners of Cargo on Board Steamship Waikato v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.), that with reference to carriage by sea the law implies certain warranties on the part of the shipowner ; it puts upon him certain obligations which will always bind him unless there are clear and express words in the contract which, without ambiguity, relieve him from what I may call his common-law obligations. In that case Bigham, J. says : "The common-law obligation of a shipowner is to provide a ship reasonably fit to carry the cargo that is shipped upon it. If a shipowner desires to evade this responsibility he must, I think, use very plain and distinct words to give notice of his intention to get out of this obligation." That obligation applies, in my judgment, to all these common-law warranties which are implied by the law in the absence of words excluding them. Collins, L.J. in the Court of Appeal in the same case says : "I am not sure myself that the shipowners did not really mean to cover by the exception all defects at the beginning of the voyage whether latent or patent. I am inclined to think that they probably did mean to do so. But they are the persons setting up the exception, and who have to make out their exemption. I do not think they can sustain that onus, unless by unambiguous language they have excluded the liability which would prima facie rest upon them. I think that the language used in this case is far too ambiguous for that purpose." Shortly, the basis of my judgment here is the same as that expressed by Collins, L.J. The same thing was said by the other judges, Smith and Rigby, L.J.J., but I have quoted from the judgment of Collins, L.J. because the principle is very conveniently expressed there. I think that those observations apply to the present case, and that the language of this bill of lading is far too ambiguous to exclude the common-law warranties of the shipowner. I will also refer to what was said by Lord Blackburn in Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (ubi sup.) : "I take it, my Lords, to be quite clear, both in England and in Scotland, that where there is a contract to carry goods in a ship, whether that contract is in the shape of a bill of lading, or any other form, there is a duty on the part of the person who furnishes or supplies that ship, or that ship's room, unless something be stipulated which should prevent it, that the ship shall be fit for its purpose. That is generally expressed by saying that it shall be seaworthy ; and I think also in marine contracts, contracts for sea carriage, that is what is probably called a 'warranty,' not merely that they should do their best to make the ship fit, but that the ship should really be fit." I read that to show the view that Lord Blackburn took of these warranties, that they can only be got rid of by a clear and express stipulation. Having said that, I will now consider the terms of this bill of lading. [His Lordship read the exceptions, and continued.] I think it is plain that it was not intended by the clause relating to unseaworthiness to create any new exception. In my judgment, the clause is a qualification which overrides the exceptions before mentioned, and it is not a new exception.

Having dealt thus with the bill of lading, I wish to deal with the case with regard to the point on which Wills, J. seems to me to have based his judgment solely and entirely—namely, the construction of the word "unseaworthiness" in this bill of lading. I think that Wills, J. considered that the effect of the clause that I have just been commenting on was to add an additional exception ; but whether he did so or not, he based his judgment upon the meaning of the word "unseaworthiness," and he says (8 Com. Cas. 5) : "But, in my opinion, the words which follow the expression 'unseaworthiness' in this bill of lading—viz., 'at the beginning or at any period of the voyage'—conclusively show that the expression 'unseaworthiness' as used, means what I may call unseaworthiness proper, because if it were used with regard to the cargo, and the fitness of the particular portion of the vessel to receive it, the phrase by which it is followed, instead of being 'at the beginning or at any period of the voyage,' would certainly be 'at the time of loading,' or some equivalent phrase, because the time of loading would be the critical time at which provision would be made for the obligation of seaworthiness to arise. But in the bill of lading it is not till the beginning of the voyage that the obligation arises, and it therefore seems to me that the intention was to confine the meaning of the word to unseaworthiness proper—that is to say, unseaworthiness of the ship as a ship." In my judgment, it is not right to put this narrow construction on the word "unseaworthiness." I think that after what was said by Lord Blackburn in Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (ubi sup.) and by the Lords Justices in Owners of Cargo on Maori King v. Hughes (ubi sup.) we ought not so to limit this word "unseaworthiness," but to hold it covers not only the unseaworthiness of the ship in the sense that it was not fit to meet the perils of the sea, but also in the sense that the ship was not in a fit condition to carry the cargo. This opinion of mine, however, does not, if it is right, dispose of the whole case, because counsel for the defendants urged an argument upon us upon which, if correct, his clients would succeed, whether the wider or the narrower construction be put on the word "unseaworthiness" in this bill of lading. The point does not seem to have been raised before Wills, J., and I cannot find that he expressed any opinion whatsoever upon it. The point is this. Even if the shipowners cannot get rid of what I will call their common-law liability—that is, the warranty of seaworthiness, taking it as including fitness of the ship to receive the cargo; or, if the warranties are to be treated as separate, the warranty of seaworthiness and the warranty of fitness of the vessel to carry the cargo—without some plain and unambiguous words in the bill of lading excluding them, it is said that those express words are in this bill of lading. Counsel rely on the words "before the loading or sailing of the vessel," and say that, there being two admissions by the defendants—that the vessel was not fit to receive the cargo at the time when the sheepskins were loaded, and that reasonable means had not been taken to provide against such unfitness—there is a defect in hull, tackle, or machinery which existed before the loading, or at all events at the time of loading, and this loss has resulted from that defect; and whether that defect amounts to unseaworthiness, or whether it amounts to unfitness of the vessel to carry the cargo, it is equally covered by these words; and, under those circumstances, they are entitled to say that there are plain words exempting the shipowners from their common-law liability in respect of this particular defect, this damaged pipe. They say if the word "unseaworthiness" is taken in its wider sense as covering unfitness of the vessel to receive the cargo, yet the clause must be read together with the clause to which I have already called attention, and the effect of them is that the shipowners are not to be liable on the implied warranty of seaworthiness. It seems to me that the answer is tolerably plain. It is impossible for anyone who reads the proviso to say that it is manifest on the face of this bill of lading that the parties did not intend the shipowners to have any responsibility for unseaworthiness. On the contrary, it says in the plainest possible manner that their exemption from their common-law liability for unseaworthiness is to be limited to the particular case mentioned in the proviso. Then counsel ask us to read "unseaworthiness" in that portion of the bill of lading as being limited to what Wills, J. calls unseaworthiness proper. For the moment, although it does not agree with my opinion, I will assume that "unseaworthiness" ought to be limited in that way. What counsel are really saying, then, is that the clause which comes at the end of the exception, having regard to the prior words about the time of the occurrence of the peril, or of the damage or loss resulting from the peril, exempts the shipowners from all liability in respect of things occurring before the loading, or at the time of loading, of the vessel, and therefore from the warranty of seaworthiness generally. They say that if the word is read as meaning unseaworthiness proper, then there is nothing here to prevent the exceptions applying to the warranty of fitness, because the warranty of fitness is not in any way asserted by the clause at the end with its proviso. The answer to that is, that really the argument ought to go the length of saying that the words of the exception exclude every defect and every loss resulting from the defect which was in existence before or at the time of the sailing. If that is so, it follows that they ought to say that it excludes the warranty of seaworthiness in its widest sense. But they are bound to admit that the words cannot, having regard to the express mention of unseaworthiness have that effect. The result is that it is plain that their contention, that the parties ought to be taken on the words of this contract to have included everything in the exceptions which occurred before or at the time of loading, is an unsound argument, and if that is so, the common-law warranty of fitness is left untouched. In my judgment, we ought in this case to hold that the parties said nothing to save the shipowners from the warranty of fitness, if it is treated as a separate warranty. On the other hand, if you treat the warranty of fitness as part of the warranty of seaworthiness, then it seems to me upon any reasonable construction of this document that that warranty, so far from being negated, is positively affirmed, unless the shipowners can save themselves under the words in the proviso. For the reasons which I have given, I think that the warranty of fitness really is untouched by anything in this bill of lading, and I have no doubt, having regard to the admissions, that the warranty of fitness, at all events, has been broken, and I think that under those circumstances the shipowners must be held liable for the consequences. As I have said before, though I base my judgment on this ground, I need not differ from Wills, J. at all. Not only was this point not argued before him, but he expressed no opinion upon it at all; but if it should be necessary to fall back on the question of what is the proper meaning of the word "unseaworthiness" in this bill of lading, in my judgment the wider and not the narrower meaning is the right one.

ROMER, L.J.—I cannot say that the question we have to decide on this appeal is an easy one, but after the best consideration that I can give to it I also am of opinion that the appeal ought to succeed. A bill of lading in respect of the matters that we have to consider on this appeal has been the subject of a very large number of decisions, and the general principles according to which bills of lading should be interpreted are well known at the present day; and the general construction to be given to them, in some respects of an artificial character, is well ascertained. In my opinion, it is advisable not to depart from these principles in dealing with any special bill of lading that comes before the court, and, so far as possible, not to allow small variations in the form to affect the general construction which has hitherto been put upon such documents. I understand that for a long time shipowners have been trying to limit the general liability cast upon them as sea-carriers by putting in special exceptions from their general liability without going the length of refusing, or seeking to exclude their liability in respect of a warranty of seaworthiness, and they have from time to time been extending the special exceptions. I think, however, that I am right in saying that as a principle of construction the warranty of seaworthiness will not be held to have been excepted by the special exceptions, unless it plainly appears that it was intended to except it. In other words, the court will not readily infer an exception of the warranty. I think, moreover, that nowadays, whatever views may have been entertained in years gone by, the warranty of seaworthiness includes, and is well known to include, the warranty that the ship and her equipment are fit for the purpose of safely carrying to their destination the goods which the shipowners know are to be carried; and, further, I think that in a bill of lading of the present day the expression "seaworthiness" or "unseaworthiness," and so forth, would be used, and would be understood as being used, with reference to the well-known extent of the warranty. In the present bill of lading the special exceptions are very numerous. In part they are very general expressions, and in part they are expressions minutely detailing special injuries, or injuries arising in respect of special parts of the ship or its equipment. The exceptions, so far as they are general and essential, are, all damage arising from the consequence of any injury to or defect in hull, tackle, machinery, outfit, or appurtenances, however the damage may be caused, notwithstanding that the same may have existed at or at any time before the loading or sailing of the vessel, and whether the loss or injury was occasioned by the negligence of the officers or crew before or after or during the voyage, or by unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or at any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means had been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness. In the first place, I ask myself, Does that make it clear to me that the general warranty of seaworthiness is intended to be swept away, as it would undoubtedly practically be if all the special exceptions enumerated were treated as being absolutely without limit? In my opinion, not only is it not clear that that was intended, but I think the wording shows that the numerous and wide exceptions to which I have referred are not intended to extend or refer to unseaworthiness unless all reasonable means have been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness. To my mind, the very way in which these exceptions are wound up, by reference to the unseaworthiness, points to this—that the shipowners were, notwithstanding the prior exceptions, intended to be made liable for unseaworthiness unless reasonable means had been taken to provide against it. I think, therefore, on the construction of this bill of lading, that the list of exceptions must all be taken to be subject to this—that the shipowners were to be under liability as specified for unseaworthiness. Therefore, in my opinion, the general argument for the respondents, that the special exceptions must first have given to them their full effect, and then that the warranty as to seaworthiness must be cut down accordingly—that is to say, practically destroyed—fails. I agree that the construction which I put upon these provisions in this bill of lading cuts down to a very great extent the operation of the special exceptions; but it does not destroy their effect. Therefore, as I have said, the first argument, and really the main argument, on behalf of the respondents appears to me to fail.

There is, however, a further argument on behalf of the respondents, which I understand was the one acceded to by Wills, J. It is said that in this bill of lading the word "unseaworthiness" is not to receive its ordinary meaning, but is to be limited to unfitness of the ship as a ship to meet the ordinary perils of navigation without special regard to the cargo. On consideration of the case, I think that it would not be right on this bill of lading to cut down the meaning of the word "unseaworthiness" in that way. In the first place, it is important to bear in mind that the word is being used in a mercantile document by mercantile men, and ought to receive its well-known meaning unless there are overwhelming considerations which compel the court to depart from that meaning of the word. To my mind, there is nothing in this bill of lading, taken as a whole, which prevents the court from giving to the word "unseaworthiness" its ordinary meaning. The exceptions cover defects in the hull itself before, during, or after the voyage, and if all the exceptions are to be given their full effect, then the word "unseaworthiness" cannot even have the limited meaning that Wills, J. gave to it. That would practically take away from the term "unseaworthiness" the whole of its meaning. Then, lastly, with regard to the point relied upon by Wills, J., which depended upon the expression used in the bill of lading, "unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or at any period of the voyage," I think that it is not sound to infer from that phrase that it was intended to expressly exclude the period of loading. I think that the expression "at the beginning or at any period of the voyage" was used, not with a view of narrowing the term "unseaworthiness," but with a view of showing that it was not to be limited. There are cases in which similar expressions have been dealt with by the courts, which show that such expressions ought to have the full meaning that I am indicating now, and ought not to have such a limited construction as is sought to be put upon the words here. For example, in The Carron Park (ubi sup.) the shipowners had stipulated that they should not be liable for neglect or default of their servants during the voyage, and it was contended that "during the voyage" would only apply to the time at which the voyage commenced, and that, at any rate, the voyage could not begin before the ship's loading was completed. But it was pointed out by the President, Sir James Hannen, following other authorities, that, the expression being a general one, it would cover, in the case he had before him, the period during which the ship was going from her then berth to the port of loading and was being loaded. In fact, in the case of a warranty of seaworthiness "at the beginning of or during the voyage," I think that expression by itself, without any context to cut it down, would clearly cover, so far as concerns the cargo, the period of loading. The fact is, that for the purposes of the cargo and of that part of the warranty which extends to the ship being fit to receive the cargo, the voyage really begins when the cargo is put on board; and I think that prima facie the expression that we have to deal with here ought not to receive another interpretation, as contended by the respondents. To my mind, there is nothing to justify us in giving it such an interpretation. It appears to me, therefore, that this argument on behalf of the respondents also fails, and, in my opinion, the appeal must succeed.

STIRLING, L.J. — I have come to the same conclusion, and substantially for the same reasons as have been given by my learned brothers; but as we are differing from Wills, J., and out of respect to the very able arguments which have been addressed to us, I shall endeavour, as shortly as possible, to give the general grounds on which I come to the conclusion that the appeal ought to be allowed. We have here to deal with a bill of lading which on the face of it presents difficulties of construction; it bears marks of not having been all framed at the same time, but of having been added to or altered from time to time, probably to meet the exigencies of commerce as various difficulties arose; but the general object is to limit the liability of the shipowners, and to relieve them from the general obligations imposed by law and attaching to such contracting parties. The shipowners contract to deliver the goods in good order and condition at the port of discharge, but they except from that liability various matters, and, amongst others, all damage from the consequence of any defect in the hull or machinery or other appurtenances of the ship, "however such damage may be caused, and notwithstanding that the same may have existed at or at any time before the loading or sailing of the vessel." It is contended on behalf of the respondents that if those words stood alone they would be sufficient to exonerate the shipowners from liability by reason of the unseaworthiness of the vessel, which would be one of the liabilities attaching to them by law. Cases were referred to to establish this, and it may be that such would be the effect of the clause in the absence of any context; but in construing documents, especially documents of this kind, it is not safe to deal with the contract piecemeal, but in ascertaining the meaning of one portion of it one must examine the context. In the latter portion of the document we find this: [His Lordship read the bill of lading from "Whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned" down to the end of the exceptions, and continued:] This portion of the document was not introduced for the purpose of enlarging the perils, causes, or things which are to be excepted, because it begins by reference to "the perils, causes, or things above mentioned." The object of it, therefore, must be to define the limits of exemption with reference to the perils, causes, and things which have been already mentioned in the prior part of the bill of lading. Consequently it seems to me that the earlier part of the document cannot be read in the wide sense in which the respondents desire that it should be read, as excluding all liability whatever on the part of the shipowners by reason of unseaworthiness. I think the two portions must be read together; and so reading them, I come to the conclusion that the shipowners were to be liable in respect of unseaworthiness unless all reasonable means had been taken by them to provide against it. That being so, the question arises, What is the meaning of the word "unseaworthiness"? The learned judge in the court below says that it admits of two meanings—one relating to the fitness of the ship to encounter the perils of the sea, and the other including not only that fitness, but also the fitness of the ship and her equipment to carry the particular goods with which she is to be loaded. He thinks that the word is appropriate to both species of fitness, and in that I agree with him. He, however, came to the conclusion that in this particular bill of lading it is limited to what he calls the narrower sense of unseaworthiness—namely, the unfitness of the ship to encounter the perils of the sea. I am unable to agree with the learned judge in that. Looking at the object of this clause, I cannot doubt that the shipowners intended to exempt themselves as widely as possible from liability, and that their meaning was that everything which the term "unseaworthiness" would appropriately cover was to be excluded. But it is not absolutely necessary to decide that point. The cases already referred to show that when a shipowner desires to relieve himself from his common-law liability he must do so in plain and unambiguous language; and the result is that either unseaworthiness must be read in the wider sense, or else that the unfitness with respect to the cargo to be carried is not to be excluded. In either view the shipowners here fail.

HERNE BAY STEAMBOAT COMPANY LIMITED v. HUTTON. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Contract—Failure of consideration—Foundation of contract—Charter of ship for review—Review postponed.

A ship named C. was chartered to be at the defendant's disposal on the 28th June 1902 to take out a party "for the purposes of viewing the Naval Review and for a day's cruise round the fleet; also on Sunday, the 29th June, for a similar purpose. . . . Price 250l., payable 50l. down, balance before ship leaves H. B." On the Naval Review being postponed, the defendant repudiated the contract on the ground that it ceased to be binding.

Held, that the object with which the defendant hired the vessel, though stated in the contract, did not concern the shipowners; that the happening of the Naval Review was not the foundation of the contract so as to discharge the parties from further performance of it in accordance with the doctrine of Taylor v. Caldwell (8 L. T. Rep. 356; 3 B. & S. 826); and therefore the defendant was liable to the plaintiffs for breach of contract. Decision of Grantham, J. (88 L. T. Rep. 269; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 394) reversed.

(a) Reported by W. C. BISS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE plaintiffs' claim was for 200*l.* alleged to be due under an agreement dated the 23rd May 1902, the balance of the hire of the steamboat Cynthia, and the defendant counter-claimed for 50*l.* paid by him under that agreement.

The plaintiff company were the owners of the steamboat Cynthia, which was usually employed in carrying passengers daily between Herne Bay, Gravesend, and other places. It having been announced that there would be a Naval Review at Spithead by the King on the 28th June, the defendant entered into negotiations with the plaintiff company for the hire of a steamboat, and the following agreement was entered into between the defendant and Henry C. Jones on behalf of the plaintiff company:

The Cynthia to be at Mr. Hutton's disposal at an approved pier or berth at Southampton on the morning of the 28th June, perils of the sea, &c., permitting, to take out a party not exceeding the number for which the vessel is licensed to the position assigned by the Admiralty for the purposes of viewing the Naval Review and for a day's cruise round the fleet; also on Sunday, the 29th June, for similar purposes. Owners to provide crew, coals, and all necessary assistance. Mr. Hutton to pay all tolls, pier dues, &c. Owners to have the right of ten persons above crew, &c., on board. Price 250*l.*, payable 50*l.* down, balance before ship leaves Herne Bay.

The Cynthia was fitted for this trip, and supplied with coal.

On the 25th June it was officially announced that the review was postponed, and the plaintiffs telegraphed to the defendant on the 26th June:

What about Cynthia? She is ready to start six to-morrow. Waiting cash.—JONES, Herne Bay.

No reply being received, the ordinary sailings of the Cynthia were continued by the plaintiffs on the days mentioned in the agreement of the 23rd May, and the difference between the takings on those days and the price under the agreement was 90*l.*

The action was tried by Grantham, J. without a jury, the claim being reduced by deducting the 90*l.* from the 200*l.* and leaving a balance of 110*l.* Judgment was given for the defendant on the claim with costs, and also on the counter-claim with costs.

The plaintiff company appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C. and A. S. Poyser for the appellants.—This was a contract to hire the vessel for two days, and the principles which apply to the case of the hire of seats to view the Coronation procession, and which have recently been discussed in Krell v. Henry, but in which judgment has not yet been delivered [Judgment delivered on the 11th Aug.; see ante, p. 328; (1903) 2 K. B. 740], do not apply here. The purpose of the contract was not entirely frustrated. Although there was no Naval Review, the fleet remained at Spithead, and the vessel could have cruised round it on both days. Besides, the vessel was absolutely chartered at a certain date, and the price was to be paid before the event took place. Therefore it made no difference whether the event took place or not. This case is therefore not within Taylor v. Caldwell (8 L. T. Rep. 356; 3 B. & S. 826). The purposes of the hirer under this contract did not concern the shipowner. The motive of the contract is different from the consideration: (per Jessel, M.R. in Besant v. Wood, 40 L. T. Rep. 445, 448; 12 Ch. Div. 605, 617).

Hansell and Ferminger for the defendant.—The foundation of the contract was that the Naval Review should take place as announced, and, as it did not do so, the performance of the contract became impossible, and both parties were excused from any further performance under it:

Nickoll and Knight v. Ashton, Edridge, and Co.,

Sorntton on Charter-parties and Bills of Lading,
p. 6;

Dean v. Hogg, 10 Bing. 345;

Lucas v. Nockells, 4 Bing. 729.

Besides, under the contract the plaintiffs had the right to have ten persons on board above the crew, so it was a joint venture. The plaintiffs repudiated the contract by using the vessel for their own purposes on the days referred to in the contract.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. I wish first to call attention to the fact that what the plaintiffs originally claimed in this action was 200*l.*, the balance of the agreed price which was to be paid. In my judgment they were not entitled to recover that sum, and I do not think that counsel for the appellants bore in mind that that was the plaintiffs' original claim, and therefore he took some of the observations of Grantham, J. dealing with the original claim as if they were intended to deal with the amended claim. I think here that before the time came for the performance of this contract there was a plain repudiation by the defendant of his obligations under it. He refused to carry out his contract, and the plaintiffs, very properly, under the circumstances, used the steamer in her usual daily services, and made what profit they could out of it during the two days on which, under the contract, the defendant was to have the use of her. Under those circumstances the action is really one for damages caused by the defendant's refusal to carry out a contract, and the amount of the damages has been agreed at 200*l.*, less the profit made by the plaintiffs from having the use of the ship after the repudiation of the contract by the defendant. To those damages the plaintiffs are in my opinion entitled. This contract, I think, placed the ship at the disposal of the defendant for those particular days, and does not contain a demise of the ship. A charter-party seldom contains a demise of the ship. Generally the ship is not demised, but remains under the control of the shipowner. Under this contract this ship remains under the management and control of the master, but it is placed at the disposal of the defendant in the same way as under a charter-party a vessel is placed at the disposal of the charterers. Then, what is there in this case besides that? The defendant when hiring this boat had the object in view of taking people to see the Naval Review, and on the next day of taking them round the fleet and also round the Isle of Wight. But it does not seem to me that, because those purposes of the defendant became impossible, it is a legitimate inference that the happening of the Naval Review was contemplated by both parties as the foundation of the contract, so as to bring the case within the doctrine of Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.). On the contrary, when the contract is properly considered, I think that the purposes of the defendant, whether of going to the review or going round the fleet or the Isle of Wight with a party of paying guests, do not make those purposes the foundation of the contract within the meaning of Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.). Having expressed this view, I do not know that there is any advantage to be gained by in any way defining what are the circumstances which might or might not constitute the happening of a particular contingency the foundation of the contract. I will only say I see nothing to differentiate this contract from a contract by which some person engaged a cab to take him on each of three days to Epsom to see the races, and for some reason, such as the spread of an infectious disease or an anticipation of a riot, the races are prohibited. In such a case it could not be said that he would be relieved of his bargain. So in the present case it is sufficient to say that the happening of the Naval Review was not the foundation of this contract.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is not a case where the subject-matter of the contract is a mere licence to the defendant to use the ship for the purpose of seeing the Naval Review and going round the fleet. It is really a contract for hiring the ship by the defendant for a certain voyage, though the object of the hirer is stated—viz., to see the Naval Review and the fleet. But that object was one with which the defendant as hirer of the ship was alone concerned, and not the plaintiffs, the owners. This contract cannot, in my opinion, be distinguished from many common cases of the hiring of vessels in which the object of the hiring is stated; very often the contract states the details of the voyage and the nature and details of the cargo to be carried. If the voyage is a pleasure trip it might also state the object in view, which is a matter which concerns the passengers. But this statement of the objects of the hirer would not, in my opinion, make the owner of the ship as much concerned with these objects as the hirer himself. The ship-owner would say: "I am concerned with the ship only as a passenger or cargo carrying machine. It is for the hirer to concern himself with the objects." In the present case it is suggested that the provision that the plaintiffs were to have the right of having ten persons on board besides the crew changed the nature of the hiring; but there is nothing in that provision to prevent the court treating the transaction as a hiring of the vessel by the defendant. It does not make it in any sense a joint speculation. It only amounts to this, that the defendant, being the hirer, gives the owners a licence to put ten men on board. This view of the general effect of the contract is borne out by this consideration. The ship itself had nothing to do with the review or the fleet. It was only a carrier of passengers to see it, and many other ships would have done just as well. It is similar to the hiring of a cab or other vehicle, on which, though the object of the hirer was stated, that statement would not make the object any less a matter for the hirer alone, and would not affect the person who was letting the vehicle for hire. There was not here, by reason of the review not taking place, a total failure of the consideration, nor anything like a total destruction of the subject-matter of the contract. Nor can I on this contract imply any condition which would relieve the defendant from liability to carry out the contract. Conditions are only implied to carry out the presumed intentions of the parties, and I cannot find any such presumed intention here. It follows that in my opinion, so far as the plaintiffs are concerned, the objects of the passengers on this voyage with regard to sightseeing do not form the subject-matter or essence of the contract. On the question of fact on which the defendant relies, that the owners of the ship had put themselves in a position of not being able to carry out the contract, I do not think the defendant has proved his case.

STERLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiffs are owners of a steam vessel used for carrying passengers from Herne Bay to Gravesend and other places. The defendant formed the idea of making a profit by carrying passengers on the 28th and 29th June from Southampton to see the Naval Review, and afterwards to cruise round the fleet. The correspondence appears to me to show that the venture was a venture of the defendant's alone, and, although the plaintiffs assisted him by selling some tickets and posting notices of what was proposed to be done, yet the venture was entirely that of the defendant. In that state of things the defendant entered into this contract by which the steamship belonging to the plaintiffs was to be employed by the defendant for the purposes of his venture, and the contract was put into writing. The most material part of it is that the vessel is to be at the defendant's disposal to take out a party of passengers. I agree that this contract did not amount to a demise of the ship. It was, however, a contract entered into for a valuable consideration for the employment of the ship on those days. It conferred at least this interest on the defendant, that if the plaintiffs had attempted to violate the agreement, the defendant could have obtained an injunction to prevent them. That is established by De Mattos v. Gibson (4 De G. & J. 276). It is said that, in consequence of the reference in the contract to the Naval Review, the existence of the review formed the basis of the contract, and therefore, as the review did not take place, the parties were discharged from further performance of the contract, as in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.). I cannot come to that conclusion. It seems to me that the reference in the contract to the review is explained by the object of the voyage, and I am quite unable to treat the reference to the voyage as the foundation of the contract so as to entitle either party to the benefit of the doctrine in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.). I come to that conclusion more readily as the object of the voyage was not to see the review only, but included a cruise round the fleet. The fleet was there, and the passengers might have been willing to go round it. It seems to me that that was the business of the defendant, whose venture it was. I am therefore unable to agree with the decision of Grantham, J., and I think the defendant was not discharged from the performance of the contract. I also agree that there is no evidence that the plaintiffs repudiated the contract before any breach of it by the defendant.

UPPERTON AND WIFE v. UNION-CASTLE MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Carriage of goods—Passengers' luggage—Conditions on ticket—Stowage in lavatory—Damage by water—Fitness of ship—Seaworthiness.

A steamship company received passengers on board a vessel at an intermediate port on her homeward voyage. The ticket issued by the company contained a condition exempting them from liability for damage to passengers' luggage although the damage be caused by negligence or default of the company's servants, or by unseaworthiness or unfitness of the ship, provided that reasonable diligence had been used by the company to render the ship at starting seaworthy and fit for the voyage.

In consequence of the crowded state of the vessel, the only available place for stowing the passengers' luggage was a lavatory, and their luggage was accordingly put in there and the lavatory locked.

This lavatory was separated from an adjoining lavatory by a bulkhead which did not quite come down to the floor. A water-closet in the adjoining lavatory became stopped up and overflowed. The overflow, running underneath the bulkhead into the lavatory in which the passengers' luggage was stowed, damaged the luggage.

In an action by the passengers against the company claiming damages for injury to the luggage, Bigham, J. at the trial found that the damage was not caused by negligence of the company's servants, but by unseaworthiness or unfitness of the ship, and that reasonable diligence had not been used by the company to render the ship at starting seaworthy and fit for the voyage, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs. On appeal:

Held, affirming Bigham, J., that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment.

APPEAL by the defendant company from the decision of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover damages for injury to the luggage of the plaintiffs, who were passengers on a ship of the defendant company from Las Palmas to Southampton.

The ship in question started from East London on a voyage to Southampton.

On her voyage she called at Cape Town, and afterwards at Las Palmas.

At Las Palmas the company received the plaintiffs on board the ship as passengers to Southampton upon the terms contained in a printed ticket.

By the terms of the ticket the plaintiffs were entitled to have the amount of luggage which they brought with them carried free of freight.

The ticket contained several conditions, one of which, No. 5, provided that, upon making certain extra payments, passengers might put their luggage "under the company's charge," whereupon the company would hold themselves liable in respect of it up to certain amounts provided by the condition.

Condition 9 was as follows:

The company will not (except on the conditions prescribed in condition 5 hereof) be liable for loss or damage to, or detention or delay of, passengers' luggage at or between the point of departure and arrival, however caused, although such loss, injury, detention, or delay be caused by negligence or default of the company's servants, or although such loss, injury, detention, or delay be caused by unseaworthiness or unfitness of the ship, provided that reasonable diligence has been used by the company to render the ship at starting seaworthy and fit for the voyage.

In consequence of the crowded state of the ship all the hold space usually reserved for the stowage of passengers' luggage was filled when the plaintiffs' luggage came on board, and the plaintiffs' luggage was thereupon put by the proper officer of the ship into one of the lavatories, the door of which was then locked.

At the trial of the action Bigham, J. found that, considering the crowded state of the ship, and the risk of pilfering to which the luggage might have been exposed if placed on deck under tarpaulins, the lavatory was not in itself an improper or unsuitable place in which to put it.

This lavatory was separated from an adjoining lavatory by a bulkhead which did not come down to the floor, but left a space of about an inch for the convenience of sluicing the two lavatories at once.

In the adjoining lavatory was a water-closet, which, being improperly used by someone during the voyage after the plaintiffs had come on board, became stopped up and overflowed.

The overflowing water ran under the bulkhead into the lavatory where the plaintiffs' luggage was stowed, and the luggage became thereby damaged.

The amount of damage was agreed by the company to be 100l.

The company contended that under the conditions of the ticket they were not liable for this damage.

Bigham, J., in giving judgment, said that, having regard to the contingency of an overflow from the other lavatory and a consequent ingress of water under the dividing bulkhead, the place was not a proper place; and the ship, in sailing with the luggage so stowed, was not seaworthy, in the sense that she was not properly fit to carry out the contract with regard to the carriage of the plaintiffs' luggage. In his opinion reasonable diligence was not used by the company to render the ship at starting seaworthy and fit for the voyage within the meaning of condition 9; and he therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs for 100*l.*, the agreed amount of damages.

The company appealed.

Scrutton, K.C. and Loehnis for the company.—First, the damage was caused by the negligence of the company's servant in not stowing the luggage properly, and the company are therefore relieved under condition 9. Secondly, the ship was not unseaworthy. The matter at fault in this case was one which could have been cured at any moment, and this distinguishes the case from such a one as Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72), where the fault was the insufficient fastening of a port just above the water line which could not be got at, after the ship had started, except with the greatest difficulty in consequence of its being covered up with a cargo of wheat. A neglect of duty by a servant of the company in using the proper equipment of the ship does not render her unseaworthy:

Hedley v. Pinkney and Sons Steamship Company Limited, 70 L. T. Rep. 630; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 483; (1894) A. C. 222.

Marshall Hall, K.C. and R. E. Moore, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Collins, M.R.—In this action brought by two persons who had been passengers in a ship belonging to the defendant company, the plaintiffs complain that their luggage was damaged in the course of the transit. The damage is admitted by the company, but they contend that, upon the true construction of the terms of the ticket taken by the plaintiffs, they are under no liability for the damage. The action was tried before Bigham, J., who came to the conclusion that upon the facts and in law the defence set up by the company does not protect them. Now, the luggage in question was stowed in a lavatory immediately adjoining some water-closets and a urinal. The bulkhead separating the lavatory from these adjoining places did not come right down to the floor, but left a space of an inch or so through which any water which might be on the floor of the part where the water-closets were would easily run. As a matter of fact one of the water-closets got stopped up, and the filthy water which consequently overflowed found its way underneath the bulkhead into the lavatory on the floor of which the plaintiffs' luggage was stowed, and thus damaged the contents of their portmanteaus. Now, the company rely on condition 9 of the plaintiffs' ticket, which runs thus: [His Lordship read it.] Bigham, J. found as a fact that reasonable diligence had not been used by the company to render the ship at starting seaworthy and fit for the voyage. To be seaworthy for the purpose of carrying passengers and their luggage, the ship ought to have had a fit and proper receptacle for passengers' luggage, and in the evidence given by the company's officer it was repeatedly admitted that this lavatory, with the conditions attendant thereon that I have already described, was the only available space for stowing the plaintiffs' luggage. Prima facie, therefore, this ship at the time of starting was not properly supplied with a special receptacle appropriated to passengers' luggage. Now, it was suggested that the case falls within the class of case where a ship is adequately equipped at starting on her voyage, but where damage has accrued by reason of some negligence on the part of the officers of the ship in misusing the equipment that has been provided. But on the question of fact it appears to me that this ship was not at starting properly equipped with an adequate receptacle for passengers' luggage. The officer whose duty it was to attend to the storage of passengers' luggage put the plaintiffs' luggage in the best place he could find. It was not proved that there was any negligence on his part in choosing a place to put the luggage. The lavatory seems to have been the only available space. The learned judge at the trial has not found that any negligence on the part of the company's officer was the cause of the damage. He was of opinion that the ship was not seaworthy at starting, in the sense that she was not properly fit to carry out the contract with regard to the carriage of passengers' luggage. I see no reason to differ from Bigham, J. There was plenty of evidence in support of his finding of fact, and he has made no mistake as to the law. I therefore think that the appeal fails.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This vessel, after sailing from her port of loading, touched at various places, and the company at one of these places issued tickets to passengers who brought on board a quantity of luggage. Up to that time passengers' luggage had been properly stowed in the hold, but, occasion having arisen to find some place for stowing the luggage brought on board by passengers under the tickets I have referred to, the chief officer had to do his best; and the evidence is clear that, as there was no other receptacle, but the lavatory in which to stow the plaintiffs' luggage, he was obliged to put it there. Now, the contract was that reasonable diligence should be used to take means to insure that the ship should be fit to carry the luggage of passengers on the voyage. Has that contract been broken? Bigham, J. clearly thought that it had been: that there was no proper provision for the luggage that was intended to be put on board, or anticipated to be put on board, in the course of the voyage. We have been referred to the case of Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (ubi sup.) and cases which followed it, but those authorities were cases in which the ship was properly equipped, but from some default of those on board the equipment was not used. This is a totally different case, because no place was provided in which the plaintiffs' luggage could be properly stowed. The only place available for that purpose was one in which nobody would have dreamt of putting luggage if the owners of it had had the option of saying where it should be stowed. I agree with the judgment of Bigham, J., and the appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

CIVIL SERVICE CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY LIMITED
v. GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY
LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Contract—Subsequent impossibility of performance—Money paid before that event—Right to recover back—Charter of ship to visit Naval Review—Payment of hire—Subsequent abandonment of review on account of King's illness—Costs—Successful defendant—Deprivation of costs—Discretion of judge—Case tried without a jury.

The plaintiffs chartered the defendants' ship for three days to attend the Naval Review to be held in the following June or July on the occasion of the King's Coronation. The money to be paid for the hire of the ship was paid, in accordance with the terms of the charter-party, ten days before the day fixed for the review. A week later the review was postponed on account of the King's illness, and was not in fact held either in June or July.

In an action by the plaintiffs to recover back the sum they had paid for the hire of the ship :

Held (affirming the decision of Bigham, J.), that the defendants were entitled to retain the whole sum.

Blakeley v. Muller (88 L. T. Rep. 90) approved.

At the trial of the action without a jury Bigham, J. gave judgment for the defendants, but, because the defendants had refused to let him act as arbitrator to say what he considered ought to be done in the matter, he ordered that each of the parties should bear their own costs.

Held (reversing the order of Bigham, J.), that there were no materials before him on which he had power to exercise any discretion with regard to depriving the defendants of their right to costs.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury, and cross appeal by the defendants against the order of the judge that each party should bear their own costs.

The action, which arose out of the postponement of the King's Coronation, was brought to recover a sum of 1500*l.* which had been paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants under the terms of a charter-party.

The charter-party was dated the 22nd March 1902, and, so far as is material, was in the following terms :

It is this day mutually agreed between the General Steam Navigation Company, owners of the steamship Hirondelle, and the Civil Service Co-operative Society Limited, of 28, Haymarket, London, charterers, that the said General Steam Navigation Company will let and the said charterers will hire the said steamship for the term of three days from the hour she is placed at the charterers' disposal in London on the day preceding that of the Naval Review to be held at Spithead on the occasion of the Coronation of His Most Gracious Majesty King Edward the Seventh in June or July 1902. The hour of departure from London to be mutually agreed, but to be sufficiently early to permit of the steamer reaching her berth at Spithead at the time appointed by the naval authorities after calling at Southampton to embark further passengers. After the review, should the charterers desire it, the steamer is to proceed through the lines of the fleet and return to her berth to witness the illumination of the fleet in the evening. . . . The amount to be paid by the charterers for the hire of the steamer is 1500*l.* lump sum, payable 250*l.* on signing the charter and the balance ten days before the date of the review. . . .

The plaintiffs paid 250*l.* on signing the charter and the balance—viz., 1250*l.*—on the 18th June, the Naval Review having been fixed, shortly after the signing of the charter-party, for the 28th June.

On the 25th June a notice was issued by the Admiralty that owing to the King's illness the review would be postponed, and thereupon the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants saying that they would not require the steamer.

The steamer was accordingly not placed at the plaintiffs' disposal.

The review was not in fact held until the following August.

Under these circumstances the plaintiffs claimed that they were entitled to be repaid the whole of the 1500*l.* which they had paid to the defendants under the charter-party.

Evidence was given at the trial to show that the defendants had spent a considerable sum of money in fitting out the steamer for the intended employment, and the learned judge at the trial found that the amount which the defendants were out of pocket by reason of work done or money spent, either under the contract or in preparation for it, amounted to 500*l.*, which sum would include compensation for loss of time in finding other employment for the vessel.

Before the action negotiations took place between the parties for a settlement of the dispute, the General Steam Navigation Company offering to return 750*l.*, but this offer was refused by the Civil Service Co-operative Society, who claimed a right to the whole of the 1500*l.*

At the trial of the action without a jury, Bigham, J. was desirous that the parties should leave the matter to him to say what under the circumstances, apart from the parties' strict legal rights, should be done, but the defendants would not agree to that course. The learned judge thereupon held that in law the defendants were entitled to retain the whole of the 1500*l.*, and he gave judgment for them accordingly; but he said that the circumstances out of which the action arose were such that he thought that neither party ought to avail themselves of their strict rights, and that the defendants ought to be satisfied with 500*l.* and the costs of the action; and he therefore made an order that, if no compromise was made, each party should bear his own costs of the action.

The plaintiffs appealed against the judgment, and the defendants appealed against the order depriving them of their costs.

Bray, K.C. and Eustace Hills for the plaintiffs. —The hiring of the ship never really began, and the defendants were never able to perform their part of the contract and place the vessel at the plaintiffs' disposal on the day preceding the review. There has therefore been a total failure of consideration, which entitles the plaintiffs to the return of all the money that they have paid under the contract. Bigham, J. held that the moment that the day of the review was fixed, the expression in the contract, "day of the Naval Review," must be read as meaning "28th June." That cannot be right, because no alteration in the date, provided that the review had taken place in the following June or July, would have affected the validity of the contract. It could not have been the intention of the parties that the defendants should have all the benefit of their contract and yet be relieved from any liability to perform it, if the ship did not go to the review. There must be an implied term in the contract that, if the contract could not be performed by reason of there being no Naval Review, it should be treated as rescinded. The latest case on the subject is a decision of the Court of Appeal in which the court held that the owner of rooms overlooking the route of the Coronation procession could not recover from the defendant, who had agreed to take the rooms for the 26th and 27th June, the money which the defendant had agreed to pay for the use of the rooms on those days, the Coronation having been postponed on account of the King's illness:

Krell v. Henry, 89 L. T. Rep. 328.

But in that case the point which now arises, the right to recover back money which has been paid by the hirer to the owner, was expressly left open. The following principle was laid down by Blackburn, J.: "The principle seems to us to be that, in contracts in which the performance depends on the continued existence of a given person or thing, a condition is implied that the impossibility of performance arising from the perishing of the person or thing shall excuse the performance":

Taylor v. Caldwell, 8 L. T. Rep. 356; 3 B. & S. 826.

Nothing there suggests that money paid under a contract which has become impossible in the manner there mentioned cannot be recovered back. Reference was also made to

Appleby v. Myers, 16 L. T. Rep. 699; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651;

Blakeley v. Muller, 88 L. T. Rep. 90.

Scrutton, K.C. (Maurice Hill with him), for the defendants, was only called upon as to the defendants' appeal. Bigham, J. had no jurisdiction to deprive the defendants of their costs:

Cooper v. Whittingham, 43 L. T. Rep. 16; 15 Ch. Div. 501.

The defendants had been guilty of no misconduct. The sole ground upon which the learned judge seems to have acted is that the defendants refused to accept him as an arbitrator, and stood upon their legal rights. This court has held that the fact of a defendant successfully pleading the Gaming Act 1892 was not good cause for depriving him of costs:

Granville and Co. v. Firth, 88 L. T. Rep. 9.

Eustace Hills in reply.—The question was one for the discretion of the judge. Cooper v. Whittingham (ubi sup.) cannot now be relied upon, because the discretion of the judge has been enlarged by sect. 5 of the Judicature Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44), which provides that, subject to certain express provisions, "the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court . . . shall be in the discretion of the court or judge, and the court or judge shall have full power to determine by whom and to what extent such costs are to be paid."

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—It appears to me that, without overruling a considerable body of authority, we cannot doubt the correctness of the decision of Bigham, J. on the main question in dispute, which was whether the defendants were entitled to retain the money that had been paid to them by the plaintiffs in accordance with the terms of the charter-party. I think that the learned judge rightly construed the obligations of the parties. A similar point was recently raised in Blakeley v. Muller (ubi sup.), and I agree with what was there said by the Lord Chief Justice. In that case Channell, J. used these words: "In Krell v. Henry (ubi sup.) it does not appear whether there was any express contract as to when the money was payable. If the money was payable on some day subsequent to the abandonment of the procession, I do not think it could have been sued for. If, however, it was payable prior to the abandonment of the procession, the position would be the same as if it had been actually paid, and could not be recovered back and could be sued for. All Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) says is that the parties are to be excused from the performance of the contract, and Appleby v. Myers (ubi sup.) says from the further performance. It is impossible to import a condition into a contract which the parties could have imported and have not done so. All that can be said is that when the procession was abandoned the contract was off, not that anything done under the contract was void. The loss must remain where it was at the time of the abandonment. It is like the case of a charter-party where the freight is payable in advance, and the voyage is not completed and the freight therefore not earned. Where the non-completion arose through impossibility of performance, the freight could not be recovered back. Of course, if the contract for seats had been made subsequent to the abandonment of the procession, that would be different altogether. There the money could be recovered." I concur in every word of that, which exactly applies to the present case, substituting "Naval Review" for "procession." I think, therefore, that the appeal of the plaintiffs must be dismissed.

Then comes the defendants' appeal as to the costs. No doubt when a judge has exercised his discretion upon the materials before him, the Court of Appeal would be very slow to overrule his decision. But here there were no materials whatever before the learned judge upon which any discretion could be exercised in the matter of depriving the defendants of costs. The defendants have successfully in point of law resisted the plaintiffs' claim, and the learned judge has deprived them of their prima facie right to costs because they would not submit to him as arbitrator to say what he considered ought to be done. A judge cannot deprive a suitor of his legal rights upon grounds such as that. The defendants' appeal must therefore be allowed.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the merits of the case I have nothing to add to what has been said by the Lord Chancellor. As to the defendants' appeal, sect. 5 of the Judicature Act 1890 has not altered the law as to the nature of a judge's discretion or as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal.

THE PORT CALEDONIA AND THE ANNA.

[ADM.]

It merely brought into the ambit of a judge's discretion certain cases as to which there had formerly been a doubt whether or not they were subject to his discretion. Before a judge can exercise any discretion, there must be some materials before him on which it can be exercised. Here there were no such materials. The case of Granville and Co. v. Firth (ubi sup.) is exactly in point. There we held that a successful reliance by the defendant upon the rights expressly given him by the Gaming Act 1892 was no ground for depriving him of his costs.

THE PORT CALEDONIA AND THE ANNA. (a)

Salvage—Agreement to pay an exorbitant sum—Compulsion.

The ship P. C. while at anchor dragged down towards the ship A.

In response to signals a tug came up, but her master refused to render assistance except for 1000l.

The services of the tug were accepted, and the P. C. was towed to her former berth.

In an action against the P. C. to enforce the agreement, and also claiming salvage against the owners of the A, her cargo and freight:

Held, that the agreement was made under compulsion, and must be set aside on the ground of its being inequitable and exorbitant. An award of 200l. with County Court costs made.

Held, also, that the action against the A. must be dismissed with costs, as she was in no real danger and no salvage service had been rendered to her.

ACTION for salvage by the owners, master, and crew of the tug Sarah Jolliffe against the owners of the barques Port Caledonia and Anna.

The Sarah Jolliffe was a screw tug of 299 tons gross register with engines working up to 900 horse power effective, and was manned by a crew of eleven hands all told.

The Port Caledonia was a four-masted barque of 2426 tons register, and at the time the services were rendered was on a voyage from San Francisco to Queenstown with a cargo of grain. Her value was 15,000l., cargo 21,715l., and freight at risk 4417l.—41,132l. in all.

The Anna was a four-masted German barque of 2663 tons register, and was on a voyage from Tacoma to Queenstown with a cargo of grain. Her value was 16,000l., cargo 20,906l., and freight at risk 5000l.—41,906l. in all.

Both vessels had met with bad weather, and had put into Holyhead Harbour for shelter. The Anna arrived on the 27th Feb. 1903, and anchored inside the breakwater with her starboard anchor and thirty fathoms of chain out, and the Port Caledonia came in on the 28th Feb., and brought up with both anchors down about four ships' lengths to the S.W. of the Anna.

During the night the weather was very heavy, and the port anchor of the Anna was let go, and fifteen more fathoms of chain paid out on the starboard anchor, and on the morning of the 1st March it was found that the Port Caledonia had dragged down towards the Anna.

Signals were hoisted by the master of the Port Caledonia for a tug and a pilot, and in response to them the tug Sarah Jolliffe put off with a pilot on board.

On coming alongside the master of the Sarah Jolliffe refused to put a rope on board except for 1000l.

The master of the Port Caledonia offered 100l., and also suggested the matter should be left to the respective owners to settle, but the master of the Sarah Jolliffe refused, and the master of the Port Caledonia therefore told him to make fast.

This the Sarah Jolliffe did, and held the Port Caledonia until she had got her anchors, and then towed her to her former berth.

There was some dispute as to the respective positions of the Port Caledonia and Anna.

According to the evidence of the plaintiffs the Anna's jibboom was nearly overlapping the port quarter of the Port Caledonia, and the Anna was in great danger of being fouled by her.

According to the evidence of both the defendants the Port Caledonia had dragged down to within about 200ft. of the Anna and then brought up; the wind shifted to the W.N.W. in the course of the morning, and consequently, even if the Port Caledonia had continued to drag, she would have been in no danger of fouling the Anna.

The plaintiffs claimed 1000l. from the owners of the Port Caledonia under the agreement, and such salvage as the court might see fit to award for the services rendered to the Anna.

The defendants, the owners of the Caledonia, admitted the verbal agreement, but pleaded that it was exorbitant and inequitable, and asked that it should be set aside.

The owners of the Anna denied that their vessel was at any time in any danger, or that any services had been rendered to her.

Aspinall, K.C. and Bateson for the plaintiffs.

Pickford, K.C. and Balloch for the defendants the owners of the Port Caledonia.

Living, K.C. and Christopher Head for the defendants the owners of the Anna.

BUCKNILL, J.—[His Lordship summarised the facts as above set out, and continued:] I may as well say at once that I find as a fact that the Port Caledonia was nothing like as near the Anna as the master of the tug would have me believe. I accept the evidence of the master of the Port Caledonia and of the master of the Anna as to the distance between these two ships, as nearly as they can give it, and of the assistant lighthouse-keeper at Holyhead, an intelligent man, who gave his evidence very fairly and very well. Now, the Port Caledonia wanted to be shifted; she had dragged and she might drag again, although I find as a fact that at the time the tug came alongside her she was firm to her anchors and was not dragging, but there was always a possibility that she might drag, and if she had dragged with the wind S.W., and remaining in that quarter, serious consequences might have ensued. She probably would have got foul of the other ship, and they might both of them have got adrift, and if the wind had remained in the S.W. they might have got on the rocks, but that is just what did not happen; the wind did not remain in the S.W.—it got round to the W.N.W., and at last to the N.W. Shortly after the tug got alongside the wind was W.N.W., and from that direction there would have been no danger to the two ships. Then came the question what was the tug master to get, and what was the master of the Port Caledonia to offer for the tug's help. The tug master said—I hope there are not many tug masters who would say it—that he wanted “1000*l.* or no rope.” I stopped him before he gave an answer to a question which was put to him by counsel for the Port Caledonia, because if he had given a certain answer I am sure his owners would not have allowed him to remain in their employ. But he did say, “I should not have let them go on the rocks. I should have let them break each other adrift, and when they were adrift I should have gone to their assistance, but not unless they gave the 1000*l.*” I shall not attempt to describe what the Elder Brethren and I think of conduct like that. Language could not be too strong. It was most reprehensible conduct, and, I will add, cowardly. But the master of the Port Caledonia, finding himself in a difficulty, promised to give 1000*l.* for the tug's services, which I value at very much less. The tug, having without much difficulty put a hawser on board, held the Port Caledonia up so that she could get her anchors. The tug did her work very well. I have no fault to find with that. I am advised that it would have taken some time for those on board the Port Caledonia to get in her chain by the manual labour which would have to be used, there being no steam power. In all the tug was engaged about one hour and forty-five minutes. What she did do she did well. There was no danger to the tug, as the wind had moderated. The case has been described as one of towage, but the owners of the barque have admitted that the plaintiffs are entitled to a salvage award. With the 1000*l.* agreement on one side, and that which I think was the value of the services on the other, I have to ask myself whether the bargain that was made was so inequitable, so unjust, and so unreasonable that the court cannot allow it to stand. The first question to consider is, What was the position of the two persons who made the agreement? The position was this: One man was in a position to insist upon his terms, and the other man had to put up with it. He could not help himself. He says in his letter to his owners: “He demanded 1000*l.* to take me away. I offered him 100*l.* or to leave it to the owners, but he would not agree, so I agreed to give 1000*l.* rather than foul the Anna.” He appreciated the possibility of fouling the Anna if the weather had remained bad, and if the wind had remained in the S.W., neither of which things happened. So he found himself obliged to give way to a person who would not move him, and who would have allowed him and the Anna to drift towards the rocks, and who would, I think, have seen them go there without putting a hawser on board unless he got a promise of 1000*l.* I have expressed my opinion about the matter. This opinion is shared by the Elder Brethren, and I hold that this agreement cannot be allowed to stand, and I set it aside. I hope that those who perform such grand services in tugs from time to time in worse weather than this, and, in peril of their own lives, save property around the coast, will note that this court will keep a firm hand over them if they attempt to do what has been done in this case. This was an inequitable, extortionate, and unreasonable agreement, and I think that the services rendered will be well rewarded by the sum of 200*l.* and with County Court costs.

Now with regard to the claim against the Anna. The Anna was not, in my judgment, at any time in such a position as that a prudent master would have thought it right and fit or to be his duty to call upon a tug to take the Port Caledonia away from him. His own letter shows that. I have asked the Elder Brethren this question in the language of the decisions which are well known, Would he as a prudent man have found himself called upon, in the position in which he then was with regard to himself and the Port Caledonia, to engage a tug to take the Port Caledonia from the place where she was? And the answer is “No,” because there was no danger, or very little danger, and not that sort of danger which allows towage to be turned into salvage. By easing away his own cables he could have increased, as he said, the distance between the two ships; but there was no reason to believe, as the wind was moderating and getting more westerly, that there would be any necessity to do that. In his letter to his owners he said: “I do not consider the Anna was in danger as regards the Port Caledonia when the gale was blowing. She was 100 yards from our jibboom and we were ready to pay out more cable if required.” Then again he says: “The Port Caledonia, which had dragged to within about 100 yards towards us, had to engage a tug to avoid collision later on, but that cannot concern the Anna.” I am reading a translation, and I do not know exactly the idea that was passing through the master's mind; but I think I may say that his idea was that if the wind had got round to a dangerous quarter again, and had blown with a force which would have made it possible for the Port Caledonia to have done what she did before, then, if steps were not taken, there might have been a collision between the two ships. There, therefore, was appreciable danger, which made it necessary that, as far as the Port Caledonia was concerned, she should not continue to give the Anna what she had done, namely, a foul berth; but the Anna was in no danger according to the language of the master in his letter to his owners. The result is that there will be judgment against the Port Caledonia for 200*l.* with County Court costs, and there will be judgment for the Anna with costs.

THE ELSWICK PARK. (a)

Salvage—Signals of distress—Sect. 434, sub-sect. (2), of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60).

Sect. 434 (2) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, which penalises the master of a vessel who unnecessarily uses or displays signals of distress, does not apply when such signals have been properly used.

Where, therefore, signals of distress were properly displayed, and a vessel put off in response to them, and on her arrival her services were not required:

Held, that she was not entitled to be compensated for the labour undertaken, or loss sustained in consequence of answering the signals.

ACTIONS for salvage by the owners, masters, and crews of the steam-tugs Dragon, Petrel, Verne, Queen, and Albert Victor, against the owners of the steamship Elswick Park.

The case is reported on the question of the proper interpretation of sect. 434 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and the services of the Queen are alone material.

The Queen was a steam-tug of 169 tons gross register, with engines working up to 350 horse power indicated, and was of the value of 6000*l*.

The Elswick Park was a screw steamship of 3403 tons gross register, and at the time the services were rendered was on a voyage from London to Cardiff in water ballast.

About 11.45 a.m. on the 26th Feb. 1903, when about seven miles S.W. by W. of Portland Bill, the Elswick Park's tail shaft broke. Signals for assistance were made, and two tugs, the Queen and Albert Victor, both of which belonged to the same owners, came up and made fast, and eventually, in conjunction with the tugs Dragon, Petrel, and Verne, which came up subsequently, towed the Elswick Park into Portland Roads, where she came to anchor.

During the night and early morning of the 27th Feb. it blew hard, and the Elswick Park dragged her anchors and collided with the steamship Gwentland. Signals of distress were made, and in response to them the crew of the Queen were mustered and she proceeded to her assistance; but, on coming up to the Elswick Park, her services were not accepted, as the two vessels had been lashed together, and were riding safely to their anchors. Subsequently the Elswick Park was towed by the tugs Dragon and Petrel to another berth.

At the trial of the action it was contended that the Queen was entitled to a salvage award for the services rendered on the 26th, and also to remuneration for the labour undertaken and risk incurred in going out to the Elswick Park on the 27th, in response to her signals of distress.

Sect. 434 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 is as follows:

(1) Her Majesty in Council may make such rules as to what signals shall be signals of distress, and the signals fixed by those rules shall be deemed to be signals of distress. (2) If a master of a vessel uses or displays or causes or permits any person under his authority to use or display any of those signals of distress, except in the case of a vessel being in distress, he shall be liable to pay compensation for any labour undertaken, risk incurred, or loss sustained in consequence of that signal having been supposed to be a signal of distress, and that compensation may, without prejudice to any other remedy, be recovered in the same manner in which salvage is recoverable.

Batten for the owners, master, and crew of the Queen.—Sect. 434 (2) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 especially provides for the remuneration of a vessel that goes out to the assistance of another in response to signals of distress, if those signals have been wrongly made. A fortiori then, if such signals were properly exhibited, she is entitled to remuneration although her services may not have been required when she came up. The Elswick Park, it is submitted, was always in a position of danger even when the Gwentland was lashed alongside of her.

Laing, K.C. and C. Robertson Dunlop for the defendants, contra.—The sub-section is only intended to penalise the improper use of distress signals. Vessels are not entitled to salvage for going out in answer to signals of distress. It is quite a different thing from rendering services upon request. The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument:

The Ranger, 3 Notes of Cases, 589;

The Undaunted, 2 L. T. R. p. 520; Lush. 90.

BUCKNILL, J. (after referring to the services of the other tugs).—Now, with regard to the Queen. Her services are first of all that she towed the head of the Elswick Park round and on to the course and then she steered astern. That is admitted. It is a good service and a valuable one. And the next morning she went out in answer to signals made by the Elswick Park when, as we know, by the evidence in another case, she was dragging her anchors and dangerously approaching another ship with which she afterwards came into collision. In consequence of those signals the Queen went out on the early morning of the 27th and tendered her services, which were not then accepted or wanted, because, as I have found as a fact in the other case, the two vessels after they came into collision were lashed together, and were both riding to their anchors safely at that time; and so there was no necessity for assistance, and it was not wanted. Although the Queen came out in response to signals from the Elswick Park she did not do anything and her services were not wanted. Now, it has been argued before me that, under sect. 434, sub-sect. (2), of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, the Queen is entitled to be remunerated for labour undertaken, risk incurred, or loss sustained in consequence of having answered the signals which were properly made by the ship which made them. The second sub-section runs in this way: [His Lordship then read the sub-section.] I read that sub-section as clearly meaning that where a person makes an improper use of signals, attracting a vessel, that the improper use of those signals is to be penalised by paying the vessel which comes out compensation for labour, risk, or loss sustained in consequence of answering those signals. I think it does not apply in this case. The signals were made properly at the time they were made, but by the time the Queen got out her services were not required. [His Lordship subsequently awarded the sum of 850l. to the Queen and Albert Victor in respect of the services on the 26th Feb.]

THE MANAR; NORTHERN TRUST LIMITED v. STRACHAN BROTHERS. (a)

Practice—Mortgage—Action for declaration of rights to assist action in foreign country—Order XXV., r. 5.

The plaintiffs, as mortgagees of the steamship M., on default being made, took possession of her, and chartered her for a voyage to a French port. On her arrival the defendants, who were British subjects, arrested the ship in respect of necessities which they had supplied, and attached the freight, which was payable by certain French consignees.

They also made executory in France a judgment obtained by default in the King's Bench Division against the mortgagors in England in respect of the same debt.

The plaintiffs intervened in the proceedings instituted in France, and, for the purpose of assisting their case in the French courts, brought an action against the defendants claiming under Order XXV., r. 5, a judgment declaratory of the validity of the mortgage, and the rights of the mortgagees in possession to ship and freight.

Held, that they were entitled to the judgment asked for, subject to certain modifications.

ACTION by the Northern Trust, as mortgagees of the steamship Manar, against Strachan Brothers, creditors of the Manar Steamship Company claiming certain declarations.

The facts of the case will be found fully set out in 89 L. T. Rep. 26; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 420; (1903) P. 95.

The facts material to the present action were as follows:

By a mortgage dated the 26th June 1900 the Manar Steamship Company mortgaged their steamship Manar to the Northern Trust as security for the repayment of 17,000l.

In Dec. 1901 the mortgagors made default in payment of an instalment, and continued to do so, and consequently the plaintiffs took possession of the vessel under their mortgage.

The plaintiffs then gave notice to the charterers terminating the charter under which the vessel then was, and on the 28th April 1902 entered into a fresh charter-party under which the vessel was to take a cargo of phosphates from Beaufort, South Carolina, to St. Nazaire.

On the 5th May the Manar Steamship Company went into voluntary liquidation.

The Manar arrived at St. Nazaire on the 9th June, and the French consignees of cargo took delivery, and became liable for the freight.

On the 10th June the defendants Strachan Brothers, who were ships' chandlers at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and who had supplied necessities to the ship, took proceedings in the Tribunal of Commerce at St. Nazaire, and arrested the vessel, and attached the freight in the hands of the consignees. Bail was subsequently given, and the vessel released.

On the 13th June the defendants commenced an action in the King's Bench Division against the Manar Steamship Company for the amount of their debt, and obtained judgment by default on the 21st June. This judgment was subsequently made executory in France.

The plaintiffs also took proceedings there to have their mortgage made executory, and also asked for a declaration that the defendants had no rights over the vessel, and that the arrest of freight was invalid.

On the 12th Dec. notice of these proceedings was served on the defendants, who entered an appearance at St. Nazaire. It was stated that if the plaintiffs' mortgage was made executory in France it would have the same force and validity there as a French mortgage.

On the 20th Jan. 1903 the plaintiffs commenced two actions, one against the Manar Steamship Company and the other against the present defendants, claiming a declaration that their mortgage was valid, that they were entitled to take possession, and that as mortgagees in possession they had a right to the freight carried by the ship.

The learned judge, on the motion of the Manar Steamship Company, stayed proceedings in the first action, but refused to stay proceedings in the present action, although the defendants applied to him to do so.

At the trial of the action both the plaintiffs and the defendants called certain French advocates to give evidence as to the French law relating to mortgages, but the witnesses did not agree as to what would be the practice of the French courts with regard to an English judgment, and as to how far they would give effect to it.

Order XXV., r. 5, of the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883 is as follows:

Rule 5. No action or proceeding shall be open to objection on the ground that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby, and the court may make binding declarations of right whether any consequential relief is or could be claimed or not.

Scrutton, K.C. and Balloch for the plaintiffs.—We ask for a declaration as to what the English law is. There is a conflict between the French lawyers as to what use we shall be able to make of the judgment of an English court, but that question can be decided when the case is heard by the French court. Such a judgment will not prejudice the defendants in any way. They referred to

Liverpool Marine Credit Company v. Hunter, 18

L. T. Rep. 749; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 128;

L. Rep. 3 Ch. 479;

(1900) 1 Ch. 602.

Robson, K.C. (Adair Roche with him) for the defendants, contra.—The question is not whether the judgment will or will not be of use to the plaintiffs, but whether they are entitled to it. In the absence of the mortgagor no declaration can be made as to the validity of the mortgage. The mortgagor has in effect said that the mortgage is invalid, and on the authority of Brooking v. Maudslay (58 L. T. Rep. 852; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 296; 38 Ch. Div. 636) he is justified in taking up such a position as has already been decided in The Manar (ubi sup.). In Barraclough v. Brown (76 L. T. Rep. 797; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; (1897) A. C. 615) the Court of Appeal laid down that two processes must not be made out of one. Here the plaintiffs have instituted two processes on the ground that the judgment in one may be useful in the other. If the French courts decide the case by French law, then the English law is immaterial; if they decide it according to English law, evidence as to what is the law in England can be called, and it can be proved in the usual way. Order XXV., r. 5, is only intended to apply where the plaintiff can get relief, but not immediately. The office of the court is to decide cases, not to make academic declarations of law. He referred to

July 14.—BUCKNILL, J.—This case has come before me twice, and has been very fully argued by counsel. The facts are as follows: The Manar Steamship Company, being in want of money about the time of this mortgage, which is dated the 26th June 1900, went to the Northern Trust, and the latter lent, or rather provided them with, the sum of 17,000*l.* As to 16,000*l.* the money was the money of the Northern Trust. To secure the repayment the Northern Trust took a statutory mortgage of the steamship Manar, then belonging to the Manar Steamship Company, and in course of time—there having been some payments on account of interest—the company made default, and the moment was reached when the Northern Trust was entitled to say: “You are in default; we are now entitled to take possession of the ship as security for our loan, and we intend to do it.” The correspondence which has been put in sets out very clearly all the steps taken between the parties—namely, the persons to whom the ship was then chartered, the Manar Steamship Company, and the Northern Trust. It is sufficient to say here that the Northern Trust were held by the company entitled to, and were allowed to take possession of, the Manar; and Captain Denton, the master of the Manar, consented to become the servant of the Northern Trust. The next step in the history of the case is that the ship was then chartered to take a cargo from South Carolina to St. Nazaire, in France. That charter-party was made between the Northern Trust and the owners of the cargo. The ship arrived safely. The next thing that happened was that the defendants in this action, who were creditors in respect of goods supplied to the Manar Steamship Company, for a sum exceeding 700*l.*, took steps in France, whilst the ship was being discharged, to prevent the freight being paid over to the Northern Trust; and the Northern Trust also took steps to protect their interests. Other persons then came in. The steamship was arrested and released on bail, and the freights are still in custodia legis at St. Nazaire. The next material step in the history of the case was that Strachan Brothers sued in this country the Manar Steamship Company, then and now in liquidation, for the sum of money due and owing to them, in order to place themselves in the position of judgment creditors. The liquidator of the company did not appear, and judgment was given in favour of Strachan Brothers for the amount of their debt and costs. The Northern Trust also took steps to have their mortgage declared valid, and that is as far as they have gone. Two actions were then commenced by the present plaintiffs—one against Strachan Brothers, and the other against the Manar Steamship Company—for substantially the same declarations as the court is now asked to make. Applications were made to me by both sets of defendants to dismiss or suspend both of those actions as vexatious. I did so in the action against the Manar Steamship Company for the reasons which I then gave; but with regard to this action I refused the application. This case then came on for hearing, and learned counsel from France have given evidence as to their view of the French law. Before I deal with their evidence, let me say exactly what are the questions to be decided in France. The first question is as to the right of the defendants Strachan Brothers to arrest the ship; the second is as to their right to the freight in the hands of the French consignees; thirdly, or alternatively perhaps, as to the right of the Northern Trust to be treated as owners of the ship, instead of the Manar Steamship Company; and fourthly, as to the right of the Northern Trust to all the freights in question. These are the main questions to be decided by the French court.

In this case the plaintiffs ask for declarations under the jurisdiction of the court which existed before the Judicature Acts were passed; but Order XXV., r. 5, introduced a novelty in the sense that “no action or proceeding shall be open to objection on the ground that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby, and the court may make binding declarations of right, whether any consequential relief is or could be claimed or not.” It is under that rule I am now asked to make the declarations claimed in this action. Now, putting the plaintiffs’ case quite shortly, it comes to this. They say: “We want to be in as good a position in the French courts as Strachan Brothers are in. They have brought their action and have obtained judgment against the company, and that judgment has been made ‘executory’ in France; and what we ask is that the court should make such a declaration as to the English law in relation to the mortgage of this ship and the consequent rights of the mortgagees who have taken possession, that we may be enabled to make that declaration ‘executory’ in France, and so stand on the same footing as do Strachan Brothers in regard to their judgment.” Now, one sees at once that the two things are not exactly alike. There is no doubt that Strachan Brothers were entitled to bring their action in this country, and to get judgment against the company for the amount owing to them, and in due course were entitled to make that judgment executory in France. The objection taken by counsel for the defendants is that to make Strachan Brothers defendants in this action is, as it were, to take hold of a man in the street, and to say: “Come along and see the English court make a declaration in my favour, and you can stand by, or oppose it if you like. You are not a party to the mortgage, it is true, but come in and fight the case.” Is that the correct way of looking at the matter for the purpose of seeing that justice is done? Strachan Brothers, being creditors, and now judgment creditors, of the Manar Steamship Company, say: "We do not know, we do not care, and we will not inquire, whether the mortgage between you, the plaintiffs, and the Manar Steamship Company is valid or not. It is no concern of ours, and you have no right to bring us in for the purpose of making use of us with regard to the declaration which you seek to-day, more particularly as the court has stayed your action against the Manar Steamship Company, in which you asked for a similar declaration." I think one must look at this from a common-sense point of view. I can understand Strachan Brothers taking up the position they do—it is the best position they can take up—but there can be no possible doubt that Strachan Brothers were aware that the Northern Trust had taken possession of the vessel under their mortgage, and that when they took steps to arrest the ship, and tried to get payment of the freight from the consignees of the cargo, they knew perfectly well that the charter-party was not made between the Manar Steamship Company and the French consignees, but between the Northern Trust, who had taken possession of the ship, and the consignees. If I am right in that conclusion, is it quite true to say that to bring them in as defendants in this action is like bringing in a man from the street? Each case must be decided upon its own particular and peculiar facts; and the position being as I have found, I think it is not correct to say that this is an action which cannot be brought against the defendants. I quite admit the force of the argument that I cannot make an order giving any remedy or relief against the defendants. I can only make a declaration. All I am asked to say, and all I can say, is that as between the plaintiffs and the defendants in this country there is evidence to satisfy me that the plaintiffs were mortgagees of this steamship, that as such mortgagees they took possession, that for certain purposes they were to be treated as owners, and, having chartered the ship, they would be entitled, according to English law, to the freight earned under that charter-party. I do not think that any of the cases cited bear directly upon this case. It is one which stands entirely by itself. It is in the nature of an experiment, a novelty. It is the first time I ever heard of a case of the kind being brought in one country for a declaration to be used in legal proceedings in another country. But, if I am satisfied that it is just and right that the tribunal in France should know by the judgment of an English court what the legal position of the Northern Trust was at the time when the steamship Manar delivered her cargo in France, then I think I ought to make that declaration in order that the French court may have the best information that can be given it, more particularly because I am told that it is not the custom of the French courts to receive the evidence of English counsel in the same way that we receive the evidence of foreign lawyers to prove a foreign law. Is there any hardship here? Certainly not. I find as a fact that Strachan Brothers knew beyond a shadow of a doubt that the possession of the ship had been taken by the Northern Trust, and that the Northern Trust were entitled to receive the freights for the voyage.

THE MANAR; NORTHERN TRUST LIMITED v. STRACHAN BROTHERS.

[ADM.]

Then let us see what is the evidence of the French advocates. Can I give credence to one side rather than to the other? On the one side there is M. Gouzet and the gentleman who supports his view; and on the other side there is M. Govare and the gentleman who supports him. They are all gentlemen well versed in commercial law. They disagree, but they all agree upon this point—namely, that the French court might receive the judgment of this court as evidence to guide them in their decision. In the judgment I am about to give, I shall not in any way attempt to state what the French law is, nor what the remedy of the French court should be. Seeing that these gentlemen disagree, it is impossible for me to say which is right as to the effect of this judgment; but as they agree that the French court will look at it as evidence, I am entitled to conclude that it may be of some use to the plaintiffs; and though it may not be, I must do that which I think is right and proper and just in this particular case. The plaintiffs ask for: "(1) A declaration that the plaintiffs are, and were throughout the year 1902, the duly registered first mortgagees of the steamship Manar, a duly registered British ship, under a mortgage dated the 26th day of June 1900." I think they are entitled to that declaration. So also with the second, which is as follows: "(2) A declaration that the said mortgage is and was during the year 1902 valid." Now we come to No. 3, which reads in this way: "(3) A declaration that from the date of the said mortgage the plaintiffs were, so far as was necessary for making the said ship available as a security for the mortgage debt, the owners of the said ship and entitled to the said ship and any bail given for the release of the said ship, in priority to the Manar Steamship Company, and to the defendants." Now, the words in the Merchant Shipping Act, I think, are "deemed to be the owners," and, if so, those words should be inserted and the paragraph should read, "deemed to be the owners of the said ship and entitled to the same." The words "by English law" will be inserted after the words "declaration that." The words "and any bail given for the release of the said ship in priority to the Manar Steamship Company and to the defendants" will come out; for this reason, that, the bail having been given for the release of the ship in the French court in the French proceedings, I shall not attempt to say what the position of that would be according to French law. I do not deal with it at all. No. 4 is as follows: "A declaration that the plaintiffs, as such mortgagees, were in the month of March 1902 entitled to take possession of the said steamship." That will stand as it is, except that it will be a declaration "that by English law," &c. The next is: "(5) A declaration that the plaintiffs, upon and after taking possession of the said steamship, were entitled to the said steamship and to any bail given for the release of the said steamship in priority to the Manar Steamship Company and to the defendants." I shall alter that by striking out all the words after the word "steamship" and altering the first part so as to read, "A declaration that by English law the plaintiffs upon and after taking possession of the said steamship were entitled to the same." Then comes the following: "(6) A declaration that upon taking possession of the said steamship, the plaintiffs, as mortgagees in possession, were entitled to collect and keep all freights carried by the said steamship while in their possession, and in particular the freight carried by the said steamship under the charter-party on the voyage from Beaufort (South Carolina) to St. Nazaire in the year 1902." I alter that, and I give "A declaration that by English law upon taking possession," &c. I stop at the second "possession," and strike out all the rest of the words, because, in my opinion, they again would be an infringement upon the jurisdiction of the French court. No. 7 asks for "A declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to collect and to keep the said freight as parties to the said charter-party." I cannot grant that, because it would introduce a doubt in the mind of the French court as to whether I had been dealing with the French law, which is not the same as English law, as to the consequences of a mortgage. In France mortgages on ships are valid, but after that the French and the English law cease to agree as to the rights of a mortgagee to take possession of the ship, and trade with her, and take the freights. Therefore my duty is to leave that alone. So, also, with regard to par. 8, which asks for "A declaration that the plaintiffs are and were entitled to all freights carried by the said steamship, and in particular to the freight under the said charter-party as aforesaid in priority to the Manar Steamship Company Limited, and to the defendants." I alter that to "A declaration that by English law the plaintiffs are entitled to all freights carried by the said steamship whilst in the possession of the plaintiffs as mortgagees." I give nothing more than that. To sum up, I cannot accept the statement of either of the French advocates as being conclusive of the case, because they disagree, and I cannot say which side is right. I think this declaration should be given in order that the French court may, in applying its own remedies, have this information, and the best information as to what is the English law; and I give it in this particular case because I am satisfied upon the facts that the defendants knew what the real facts were, and I cannot draw any other inference than that they knew that the freight would, according to English law, be recoverable by the plaintiffs, and they tried—quite properly, and there was nothing wrong in their doing so—to see if they could not get an advantage. I shall hold over the question of costs, with liberty to either party to apply to me hereafter.

YOUNG v. STEAMSHIP SCOTIA. (a)
ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NEWFOUNDLAND.

Property of Colonial Government—Salvage—Action in rem—Liability of property of Crown to arrest.

An action in rem is a method of impleading the owners of a vessel, and if the owner is the King the action cannot be maintained.

A vessel which is the property of a Colonial Government, although built to be used as a ferry boat for the purpose of carrying passengers and merchandise for hire between one part of a railway owned by the Government and another, enjoys the same immunity from arrest as other property of the Crown, and is not liable to an action for salvage.

The Cybele (37 L. T. Rep. 773; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 532; 3 P. Div. 8) discussed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland in favour of the respondent.

The appellant was the master of the steamship Furnessia, and, acting on behalf of the owners and crew of the Furnessia, had brought an action in rem against the steamship Scotia to recover salvage reward for services rendered to her by the Furnessia in the North Atlantic on the 19th and 20th Sept. 1901.

The Furnessia was a steamship belonging to the Anchor Line of 5495 tons gross register, and at the time of rendering the services was on a voyage from Glasgow to New York, manned by a crew of 160 hands all told, and with 975 passengers on board, and a general cargo.

The Scotia was a twin-screw steam ferry boat of 1461 tons gross register, specially designed and constructed for the carriage of railway cars in Canada.

On the 29th Aug. 1901, after having passed through her trials, she left Newcastle-on-Tyne for Port Mulgrave, Nova Scotia, manned by a crew of twenty-seven hands all told. On the voyage she met with bad weather and ran short of coal and provisions, and by the 18th Sept. nearly all the available woodwork, including the woodwork which filled the open space at the bow and stern and her temporary bulwarks, had been burnt as fuel, and she only had sufficient coal on board to work the steam steering gear for twenty-four hours. The Scotia was then in lat. 48° 10' N. and long. 49° W.

About 9.30 a.m. on the 18th Sept. the Furnessia came up, and with some difficulty made fast; she eventually towed her into St. John's, Newfoundland, a distance of 155 miles, where she arrived about 5.30 on the following day, having had the Scotia in tow for about twenty-seven hours.

On her arrival there the Scotia was arrested in an action for salvage, an appearance was duly entered on her behalf, and, on bail being put in for the sum of 60,000 dollars, she was duly released.

A statement of claim, defence, and reply were filed and delivered, and on the 9th Dec. a date was fixed for the hearing of the action.

On the 16th Dec. the Scotia was registered at Ottawa in the name of the Minister of Railways and Canals of the Dominion of Canada, for the time being, in respect of sixty-four sixty-fourth shares.

On the 30th Jan. 1902 a protest was filed on behalf of His Majesty the King, and on the 3rd April the defence in the action was, by leave of the court, amended by adding the plea that the Scotia was at the time the services were rendered, and still was, the property of the Crown.

In support of this the building contract, the vouchers for payment of the purchase price, the permit of the Commissioners of Customs allowing the vessel to sail from Newcastle-on-Tyne without being registered, the Board of Trade certificate of survey, and the certificate of registry at Ottawa were put in.

From these documents it appeared that the Scotia was built at Newcastle-on-Tyne by Sir W. G. Armstrong, Whitworth, and Co. Limited in pursuance of a contract between the builders and the Minister of Railways and Canals of the Dominion of Canada, acting on behalf of Her late Majesty the Queen.

The vessel was built for the purpose of carrying railway cars across the Straits of Canso, between Port Hawksbury and Port Mulgrave, the termini of the Inter-Colonial Railway of Canada. The railway is the property of the Dominion Government, and managed by the Minister and Department of Railways and Canals.

The following are the material clauses of the contract:

7. Security.—The steamer shall, from the date of the first instalment being paid until final delivery, be considered the property of the purchaser, subject only to the builders' lien for and rights with respect to any unpaid balance due to them in respect of or in connection with the steamer.

9. Price and Payments.—The purchaser shall pay to the builders the sum of 47,000*l.* in the manner following—viz.: One-fifth on the signature of this agreement; one-fifth when the steamer is framed (or equivalent work performed); one-fifth when the steamer is plated (or equivalent work performed); one-fifth when the steamer is launched (or equivalent work performed); one-tenth on satisfactory trial trip of the steamer off the river Tyne; one-tenth on arrival of the steamer at Port Mulgrave (Nova Scotia), or in case of loss during the voyage. Should the delivery of the steamer from Newcastle to Port Mulgrave be undertaken by the builders, the purchaser agrees to pay the last construction instalment previous to the departure of the steamer from the river Tyne. Should the purchaser request the builders to deliver the steamer at Port Mulgrave, the builders agree to prepare and navigate the steamer from the river Tyne to Port Mulgrave for the sum of 1400*l.* (including the wages of the engineers for the voyage), plus the insurance premium if purchaser decides to insure, which the builders shall arrange on the most advantageous terms possible, and the purchaser agrees to pay this sum and the insurance premium to the builders on arrival of the vessel at Port Mulgrave.

10. If the purchaser fails to pay any instalment as and when the same becomes due . . . the builders may . . . either cancel this contract, retaining any sums previously paid on account of the purchase money, or they may sell the steamer in its then state or complete the steamer and then sell it, and charge the purchaser with any loss they may sustain or be put to by the non-performance of this contract by the purchaser.

A certificate of survey was obtained from the Board of Trade, and a pass granted by the Commissioners of Customs at Newcastle-on-Tyne under sect. 23 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, enabling the Scotia to proceed to Canada without being previously registered, and, after passing through her trials, she sailed for Port Mulgrave in the possession and under the control of the builders.

At that time the last instalment of the purchase money was due under the contract, and the sum of 11,450*l.* was due to the builders under the contract and for extras supplied, out of a total sum of 49,050*l.* On the 5th Sept., while the Scotia was on her voyage, a sum of 1955*l.* was paid on account.

On release of the Scotia from arrest at St. John's the builders retook possession of her, and delivered her at Port Mulgrave to the purchaser. At the date of her release from arrest the balance of the purchase money, amounting to 9495*l.*, was due to the builders, and the sum of 1400*l.* for navigating the ship. On the 18th Oct. and the 22nd Nov. the builders received payments amounting in all to 10,895*l.*, being the balance of the purchase money unpaid.

At the trial of the action, before Little, C.J. and Emerson, J., the court held that the Scotia was at the time of the salvage services, and still was, the property of the Dominion of Canada, and could not be arrested or proceeded against, and they therefore dismissed the plaintiffs' suit.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir Robert Reid, K.C. and Robertson Dunlop (Aspinall, K.C. with them) for the appellants.—To exempt a vessel from arrest it is not sufficient to say that she is the property of His Majesty the King. She must be in the possession of the Crown, and held and used by the Crown for public purposes. In The Parlement Belge (42 L. T. Rep. 273; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234; 5 P. Div. 197) and all the earlier cases where immunity from jurisdiction was claimed, a declaration was made on behalf of the Sovereign or State that the property was public property employed in the public service. The reason for the exemption of Crown property from arrest is that such arrest would be a derogation of the dignity of the Crown, or that property employed in the public service ought not on grounds of public policy or international comity to be suddenly withdrawn from the public service. The Scotia was not a public ship used for public purposes, but was a ferry boat constructed and intended to be used as part of the plant of a railway owned and managed by a department of the Canadian Government. In The Cybele (37 L. T. Rep. 773; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 532; 3 P. Div. 8) a tug belonging to the Board of Trade was held not to be a Queen's ship, and therefore entitled to claim salvage without the consent of the Admiralty. The grounds of that decision were that the vessel was employed for commercial purposes, was not under the special control of Her Majesty, and was not performing the ordinary duties of a Queen's ship. The Crown can waive its privilege by using property for ordinary trading purposes.

This was the opinion of Lord Stowell in The Swift (1813, 1 Dods. 320), of Sir Robert Phillimore in The Charkieh (23 L. T. Rep. 513; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 581; L. The Parlement Belge (ubi sup.).

The Prins Frederik, 2 Dods. 451.

The Scotia, it is submitted, was at the time of the services in the possession and control of the builders, who had a lien on her for the unpaid balance of the purchase money, and the further right to cancel the contract if the balance remained unpaid. The master and crew were the servants of the builders, and employed and paid by them, and not by the Crown. The Crown must be held to have impliedly authorised the builders to subject her to such claims as in the ordinary course of her employment might give rise to maritime liens—e.g., wages of her master and crew:

The Ripon City, 77 L. T. Rep. 98; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 304; (1897) P. 226.

The Crown did not treat the Scotia as a King's ship, but registered her and in other ways dealt with her under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, which by sect. 91 applies to Canada, but, by sect. 741, not to ships belonging to His Majesty. She enjoyed the privileges of a private ship registered under the Act, and must also be deemed to have been subjected to the liabilities imposed by the Act, of which one is to pay salvage. There is nothing in the Canadian statutes which relieves the owners of the Inter-Colonial Railway from the ordinary liabilities of a railway company. Sect. 74 of 44 Vict. c. 25 expressly provides that nothing is to relieve the department from the consequences of negligence. The Scotia would be liable to arrest for a collision in the Strait of Canso caused by her negligence. Further, the Crown did not make any objection to the jurisdiction until after bail had been put in, pleadings closed, the plaintiffs' evidence taken, and the builders had been enabled to deliver the vessel to the Minister of Railways. Where privilege is claimed it must be set up within a reasonable time after the Crown has notice of the arrest:

Briggs v. The Light Boats, 11 Allen, 157.

Newcombe, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar) and Loehnis for the respondents, contra.—The immunity of our Sovereign in his own courts is at least as wide as the immunity of foreign Sovereigns. In The Cybele (ubi sup.) there was no question as to the immunity of Crown property from arrest. The British North America Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 3) authorised the Canadian Government to make the Inter-Colonial Railway, and sect. 2 of 31 Vict. c. 13 provided that the property of the railway should be vested in the Crown. No action will lie against the Crown, and the only remedy is by petition of right, for the Crown cannot be sued in its own courts. The question was finally raised and decided in Mighell v. Sultan of Johore (70 L. T. Rep. 64; (1894) 1 Q. B. 149). In that case The Parlement Belge (ubi sup.) was approved of and followed. But the present case goes further than the case of The Parlement Belge (ubi sup.), for there the court held a foreign Sovereign was not answerable to the jurisdiction, while here it is sought to make our own Sovereign liable in his own courts. An action in rem is only a means of enforcing a personal liability by attaching the res. If the res is insufficient to satisfy the claim, then the owner of the res can be proceeded against for the balance due. They also referred to

Sir Robert Reid, K.C. in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland in a salvage suit in which the steamship Scotia was arrested for salvage services. The salvage services, which will be referred to hereafter, were of no ordinary character, but the only question of law before the board is whether the vessel so arrested was, or was not, liable to seizure, she being (as it is alleged) the property of the Crown. The Scotia was built for the Crown upon a contract which is before their Lordships, and the first piece of evidence which (it is suggested) makes the ship—at all events for some period of her existence—not the property of the Crown, although she was built for the Crown and money was paid for her on behalf of the Crown, is that the money had not been paid in its entirety at the time when this question arose. Their Lordships are not disposed to give any weight to that consideration. Even if the ship was still in the possession of the builders and subject to the builders' lien for the unpaid balance, that would not, in their Lordships' opinion, affect the question arising on this appeal. The seizure is intended to be a preliminary to the sale of the ship, and what would be sold would not be the mere possession, but the proprietary right. If the proprietary right could not be sold by reason of the ship's belonging to His Majesty, the question of possession may be passed by as immaterial. But their Lordships are not disposed to take the view that there was any such possession independent of the proprietary right of the Crown. If there was anything exceptional or unusual in the contract, or not in accord with its provisions, that was a question of evidence which ought to have been dealt with at the trial. The natural presumption from the contract, apart from any evidence to the contrary, is that its provisions were followed. One of these provisions was that possession should be given to the Crown immediately after the trial trip, if such trip proved satisfactory. There was an ancillary provision for the passage of the ship across the Atlantic, which, however, was not necessarily to be carried out by the builders, but only if the parties should agree at the proper time, and elect that that should be the mode of delivery. In that case, from the moment such delivery took place, the persons navigating the ship and acting on her behalf were doing so as servants, or agents, of the Crown. But the possession would then be in the Crown; and although their Lordships are not disposed to think any different question would arise, whether the possession was in the Crown or in the builders at the moment, it is as well that that matter should be cleared up upon the evidence which is now before their Lordships. Their Lordships are of opinion that the reasonable presumption arising upon the facts before them is that the possession was in the Crown, and not in the builders. If the proprietary right was in the Crown, the matter before their Lordships is reduced to one of those propositions of law which are almost beyond the reach of argument. The question has been discussed in the courts for a very long period, and, after the catena of authorities that have been brought before their Lordships, it is vain to argue that, where the property belonged to the Crown, the Crown can be impleaded, whether in this form or in any other form. Where you are dealing with an action in rem for salvage, the particular form of procedure which is adopted in the seizure of the vessel is only one mode of impleading the owner, and if the owner is the King, the action cannot be maintained, since it is impossible to contend that the King can be impleaded in his own courts. The only mode in which an application can be made to the Crown in respect of contractual rights is that which is provided by statute. This is not one of the cases so provided for, and it is, therefore, impossible to maintain that the power of seizing a vessel belonging to the Crown can be exercised as against the Crown. It is, however, suggested that, although (speaking in the widest sense) the Crown cannot be impleaded, this particular vessel, under the circumstances of its employment, was not, strictly speaking, a vessel belonging to the Crown. In support of this proposition counsel for the appellant cited the case of The Cybele (ubi sup.). Their Lordships think that it is quite possible to defend that case on the ground suggested in the course of the argument—namely, that in taking care of the harbour of Ramsgate, the Board of Trade, to whom that harbour with all its incidents had been transferred, was not, strictly speaking, acting as a Government department, but in the character of trustees of a particular trust. But unless The Cybele (ubi sup.) is defensible on that ground, it is not a case that their Lordships would be disposed to follow. It is then suggested that the particular use for which the Scotia was to be employed—viz., as a ferry boat to connect one part of a railway owned by the Government of Canada with another—although forming, in a general sense, part of Government administration, yet was not sufficient to vest the property in the Crown. Having regard to the various Acts of Parliament which were cited by counsel, their Lordships are satisfied that the land in question, including the railway, belonged to His Majesty. The case falls, therefore, within the general proposition that the Crown cannot be impleaded in its own courts, and the action must fail. Their Lordships are accordingly of opinion that the judgment of the Supreme Court ought to be affirmed.

PRIV. CO.]

YOUNG v. STEAMSHIP SCOTIA.

[PRIV. CO.]

Sir Robert Reid, on behalf of the appellant, has pointed out with great force the extraordinary condition of things which would arise if the services which were rendered by the Furnessia, and which were undoubtedly of the greatest value, were not to receive their appropriate reward. No objection can properly be taken to the defence to this action. It is the duty of those who represent the Crown to place the privileges of the Crown very definitely before the courts, and if the claim in the present case had been allowed to pass without the protest which has been made on behalf of the Crown, the case would undoubtedly have been quoted, and perhaps acted upon, in circumstances where it would not have been so appropriate to give a reward as in this instance. No observation can, therefore, be properly directed against those responsible for advising the Government to resist the present claim in the form in which it was made. The moment the vessel reached St. John's she was arrested for salvage, and, without attributing blame to anybody, it is impossible to say it was wrong either for those who had rendered services to seek to obtain salvage by the appropriate method, or for those who were advising the Crown to resist a claim which it was thought might be made a precedent. Having, however, said this much, their Lordships desire to call the attention of the Canadian Government to the condition of things which this case discloses, and to the most unfortunate results which would ensue if the refusal to compensate those who rendered the services were persisted in. Nothing could be more pitiable than the condition of the vessel as described, not by the parties themselves, but by the learned judges of the Supreme Court, who nevertheless felt compelled to adjudicate in favour of the Crown. "It must be admitted," they say, "that an ordinary steamship, not fitted with towing appliances, with another ship in tow, is at considerable risk if she is suddenly compelled to slow down on meeting an iceberg or an approaching ship, especially in such foggy weather as prevailed on the night of the 19th. Those experienced in maritime affairs will appreciate the risk to a large steamer with another large steamship in tow in mid-ocean, in the absence of those towing appliances which in tugs and other vessels specially equipped for such purposes enable the latter to manœuvre easily at all times when meeting approaching ships or obstacles to navigation. The Furnessia was enabled to steam from three to seven knots, according to the weather, while she had the Scotia in tow, and in about twenty-seven hours reached St. John's in safety, whence, after a delay of a few hours, she proceeded on her voyage to New York. . . . We have no doubt that the services rendered by the plaintiff to the defendant were of a meritorious character and worthy of recompense upon as liberal a scale as could be awarded by this court in the event of its being subsequently held that the plaintiff is entitled to recover against the defendant ship in this action. The Scotia was undoubtedly in an extremely dangerous position at the time the Furnessia came up with her. It was a season of the year when strong equinoctial gales usually prevail in these latitudes; she was without coal for her engines, and had only about twenty-four hours' coal for steering purposes; and had actually burnt all, or nearly all, the available woodwork about the ship, such as wooden bulwarks and the woodwork specially built at her bow and stern. (The Scotia is a ship built open at the bow and stern for railway ferry purposes, and but for the woodwork specially built for the voyage she would be completely unprotected from the water sweeping her 'tween decks in a heavy sea.) She would have become unmanageable when her fuel for steering purposes was exhausted. She was short of provisions, and was on the northern edge of the 'northern lane' of ocean traffic, and must have soon drifted, with the then prevailing winds, further to the north, and her chances of assistance would become therefore less and less daily. Her means of signalling passing ships were evidently very defective. Two steamers had already passed without seeing her distress signals, which can only be accounted for by the fact that she had no means by masts or poles of hoisting these signals to an altitude sufficiently high to attract passing ships distant over two miles. Altogether she seems to have been in a more helpless condition than an ordinary broken-down steamer would be in mid-ocean. The services rendered were timely, and, though not performed with extra hazardous risk to life or property, there was some considerable risk and danger; first, in getting the towing hawser on board by the officer and crew of the Furnessia, and subsequently in the performance of the work of towing. The Furnessia had on board a large crew, a valuable cargo, and a large number of passengers, and in addition to the risk to his ship in the performance of his undertaking there was the danger to his passengers and cargo, and the responsibility to his owners and others for the voluntary adoption of a contract [sic in the record] under such dangerous circumstances, and involving deviation and delay. These are elements, in addition to others, which must weigh with the court in deciding upon the amount of compensation to be awarded for salvage services." Their Lordships cannot forbear from expressing their hearty concurrence with the view of the Supreme Court as to the meritorious nature of the services rendered, and they also concur in the very cogent observation with which Sir Robert Reid concluded. He pointed out that no question can possibly be raised in this case which would entitle the policy holder to compensation. If, therefore, the refusal to make compensation is insisted on—properly enough insisted on, in the first instance, as a matter of right against the Crown—and if it comes to be thought that the Government will not feel called upon to pay compensation in any circumstances, not even in such circumstances as the present—in which their Lordships are sure that a foreign Government would feel called upon to pay compensation—what would be the result? As Sir Robert Reid most justly said, the result would be to warn everybody not to assist a ship belonging to His Majesty in however great distress she might be, and thereby incur any risk, because any claim for services would be met by the technical objection—in that respect it would be a technical objection—that no one is entitled, as a matter of right, to recover salvage from the Crown. While, therefore, on the one hand their Lordships think that it was quite right to raise the question of the Crown's privilege in this case, they would deeply lament to learn that the Canadian Government, when the circumstances are brought to their attention, refused to give effect to the hearty recommendation of the court below, which their Lordships desire emphatically to indorse and to repeat. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty to dismiss the appeal. As the respondents do not ask for costs, there will be no order as to the costs of the appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Nov. 7 and 10, 1903.

CORNFOOT v. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION. (a)

APPLICATION FOR A NEW TRIAL.

Insurance — Marine — Voyage policy — Insurance for "thirty days" after arrival — Computation of "days."

By a policy of insurance a vessel was insured for a voyage to a certain port until she had "moored in anchor in good safety," and "for thirty days in port after arrival however employed."

Held (affirming the judgment of Bigham, J.), that the words "thirty days" in the policy meant thirty consecutive periods of twenty-hours commencing from the precise time of the day at which the vessel arrived and was moored in safety.

APPEAL of the plaintiff from the judgment of Bigham, J. after the trial of the action with a jury.

The plaintiff brought this action upon a policy of marine insurance, underwritten by the defendants, to recover for a total loss of his vessel, the Inchcape Rock.

The policy was on a printed form, being the ordinary form of a Lloyd's policy, which described the risk as running until the vessel "hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety."

The printed words "twenty-four hours" were struck through with a pen, and the words "as above" were written over them.

The risk was described in the body of the policy, in an earlier part than the above clause, in the following words: "For a voyage from Portland, Oregon, by any route to Algoa Bay, and for thirty days in port after arrival however employed."

The vessel came into Algoa Bay on the 2nd Aug. 1902 and there anchored. She remained there until the 1st Sept. 1902, when she was driven ashore in a gale and lost.

The action was tried before Bigham, J. with a jury. The jury, in answer to questions left to them by the learned judge, found: (1) That the vessel arrived in Algoa Bay at 10 a.m. on the 2nd Aug. 1902; (2) that she was safely moored at anchor in the bay at 11.30 a.m. on that day; and (3) that she was totally lost at 4.30 p.m. on the 1st Sept. 1902.

The learned judge, on further consideration, gave judgment in favour of the defendants upon the ground that "thirty days" meant thirty consecutive periods of twenty-four hours from 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd Aug. 1902, and that therefore the policy had expired before the vessel was lost: (89 L. T. Rep. 179).

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Leck for the appellant.—The judgment of the learned judge was wrong because he wrongly construed the policy of insurance in this case. The insurance during the voyage and for thirty days after was all one insurance. The vessel was insured by one insurance for the period of the voyage and thirty days after. The "days" within the meaning of the policy were calendar days, to be computed from midnight to midnight, the first day commencing at midnight of the day on which the vessel arrived at Algoa Bay. The law takes no notice of a fraction of a day, and therefore the remaining part of the day on which the vessel arrived cannot be reckoned as one of the thirty days. A day does not mean a period of twenty-four hours commencing from some point of time in a calendar day:

Stone and others v. Marine Insurance Company, 34 L. T. Rep. 490; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 152; 1 Ex. Div. 81.

Scrutton, K.C. and Lochnis for the respondents.—Upon the true construction of this policy the words "thirty days" must mean thirty consecutive periods of twenty-four hours commencing from the point of time at which the vessel arrived and was anchored in safety. If that were not so, there would be an interval of time, between the arrival and the end of the day of arrival, during which the vessel would be uninsured. That could not have been the intention of the parties. This is made clear upon looking at the words in the printed clause which have been struck out, "twenty-four hours in good safety," for which these words "thirty days" were substituted.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Bigham, J. after the trial of the action with a jury. The question turns mainly upon the true construction of a clause in the policy of insurance. The defendants are the underwriters. The insurance was upon the plaintiff's vessel, the Inchcape Rock, for a voyage from Portland, Oregon, to Algoa Bay, "and for thirty days in port after arrival however employed"; and then the policy describes the risk as running until the vessel "hath moored at anchor as above in good safety," the words "as above" being written over the printed words, which were "twenty-four hours." This last clause defined the limits during which the policy on the vessel would have lasted but for the addition of the words in the earlier part, "for thirty days after arrival in port." The insurers would therefore have to ascertain the time of the arrival of the vessel in order to ascertain when the thirty days would begin to run. From that point of time the thirty days must run. That is the obvious and natural construction of the policy.

That is made even more clear by the printed clause as to "twenty-four hours in good safety," from which the words "twenty-four hours" were struck out. That makes the time from which the thirty days were to run the same as that from which the twenty-four hours would have run if those words had not been struck out. The period begins to run from the time when the vessel can properly be said to be an arrived vessel. The jury have found when the vessel arrived and when she was moored; they have found that she was anchored in safety at 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd Aug. The thirty days from that time would expire at 11.30 a.m. on the 1st Sept., and therefore the vessel ceased to be insured in respect of any damage which occurred after that time. The crucial question then is, At what time was the vessel lost? It is a question of fact at what hour she was lost. The jury have found that the vessel was moored in safety at 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd Aug., and that she was lost at 4.30 p.m. on the 1st Sept. Those findings have been challenged, but there was evidence both ways, and the jury could properly find as they did find. Those findings, then, fix the time of the expiration of the policy at 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd Aug., and the time of the loss of the vessel at 4.30 p.m. on the 1st Sept. The plaintiff, therefore, cannot recover upon the policy, and the judgment of the learned judge was right. The appeal fails and must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The findings of the jury dispose of the case, and there was ample evidence to support those findings. Upon the question with regard to the thirty days, the policy describes the risk as for a voyage to Algoa Bay "and for thirty days in port after arrival." In the ordinary printed form of the policy the words "twenty-four hours" have been struck out and the words "as above" substituted. It seems to me that there is only one possible construction of the policy, and that is that the thirty days are to run from the same time as the twenty-four hours would have run. It was intended to be a continuous insurance without any interval between the arrival of the vessel and the commencement of the thirty days. That intention is carried out, and the provisions of the Stamp Act satisfied, by construing the words "thirty days" as meaning thirty consecutive periods of twenty-four hours. There was ample evidence to justify the findings of the jury as to the time when the vessel was moored in safety and the time when she was lost. The judgment of Bigham, J. was therefore right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

KESLAKE (app.) v. BOARD OF TRADE (resps.). (a)

Merchant shipping—Desertion of seamen while abroad—Forfeiture—Private settlement—Promise not to prosecute—Payment of wages earned after desertion subject to deduction—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 131, 221, 232.

By sect. 131 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, when a seaman is discharged before a superintendent in the United Kingdom he is to receive his wages through or in the presence of the superintendent unless a competent court otherwise directs, and if in such case the master or owner of a ship pays his wages within the United Kingdom in any other manner, he shall for each offence be liable to a fine not exceeding 10*l.* By sect. 221, if a seaman deserts his ship he shall be guilty of the offence of desertion and be liable to forfeit . . . the wages he has earned and also, if the desertion takes place abroad, of the wages he may earn in any other ship in which he may be employed until his next return to the United Kingdom, and to satisfy any excess of wages paid by the master or owner of the ship to any substitute engaged in his place at a higher rate of wages than the rate stipulated to be paid to him: and also, except in the United Kingdom, he shall be liable to imprisonment. By sect. 232, where any wages . . . are under the Act forfeited for desertion from a ship . . . those wages . . . shall be applied towards reimbursing the expenses caused by the desertion to the master or owner of the ship, and, subject to that reimbursement, shall be paid into the Exchequer.

M. was engaged for a voyage in the ship S. to the River Plate and back as a fireman. When at the River Plate he deserted. The master of the ship S. was compelled to engage another fireman in his place at higher wages. M. obtained employment on a voyage home in the ship U. G. On the arrival of the ship U. G. in England the owners of the ship S. sent a written request to the master of the ship U. G. not to pay M. his wages without deducting 15*s.* 3*d.*, the amount of extra expense caused to them by M.'s desertion. They promised if M. consented to this not to prosecute him for desertion. M. consented to the deduction, which was made by the master of the ship U. G. in the account of M.'s wages. On the master coming to pay M.'s wages in the presence of the superintendent, the latter objected to this deduction as illegal, and, when the master insisted on making it, left the office. The master then paid M. subject to the deduction, and M. signed a receipt and discharge. A summons having been taken out against the master of the ship U. G. for paying the wages otherwise than in the presence of the superintendent, contrary to sect. 131 of the Act, the magistrate convicted on the ground that the deduction was a forfeiture and there could be no forfeiture under the Act except by order of a court of competent jurisdiction, and so, the payment being made in an illegal manner, the superintendent was justified in refusing to be present at it.

Held, that the magistrate's decision was right.

CASE stated by a metropolitan magistrate sitting at the Thames Police-court.

On Thursday, the 16th Dec. 1902, an information was laid by the solicitor to and on behalf of the Board of Trade (hereinafter called the respondents) against Walter Keslake (hereinafter called the appellant), master of the foreign-going British steamship Urmston Grange, then lying in the West India Dock, for that the appellant did on the 11th Dec. 1902, at the Mercantile Marine Office, 133, East India Dock-road, Poplar, E., unlawfully pay the wages of Charles Mellen, late fireman of the steamship, otherwise than through or in the presence of the Superintendent of Mercantile Marine, contrary to the statute in such made and provided:

Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60):

Sect. 131 (1). Where a seaman is discharged before a superintendent in the United Kingdom he shall receive his wages through or in the presence of the superintendent, unless a competent court otherwise direct, and if in such case the master or owner of a ship pays his wages within the United Kingdom in any other manner he shall for each offence be liable to a fine not exceeding ten pounds.

Sect. 221. If a seaman lawfully engaged or an apprentice to the sea service commits any of the following offences, he shall be liable to be punished summarily as follows: (a) If he deserts from his ship he shall be guilty of the offence of desertion, and be liable to forfeit all or any part of the effects he leaves on board, and the wages which he has then earned, and also, if the desertion takes place abroad, of the wages he may earn in any other ship in which he may be employed until his next return to the United Kingdom, and to satisfy any excess of wages paid by the master or owner of the ship to any substitute engaged in his place at a higher rate of wages than the rate stipulated to be paid to him, and also, except in the United Kingdom, he shall be liable to imprisonment for any period not exceeding twelve weeks, with or without hard labour.

Sect. 226. Nothing in the last preceding sections or in the sections relating to the offences of desertion or absence without leave shall take away or limit any remedy by action or by summary procedure before justices which an owner or master would but for those provisions have for any breach of contract in respect of the matters constituting an offence under those sections, but an owner or master shall not be compensated more than once in respect of the same damage.

Sect. 232 (1). Where any wages or effects are under this Act forfeited for desertion from a ship those effects may be converted into money, and those wages, effects, or the money arising from the conversion of the effects shall be applied towards reimbursing the expenses caused by the desertion to the master or owner of the ship, and, subject to that reimbursement, shall be paid into the Exchequer, and carried to the Consolidated Fund.

At the hearing before the learned magistrate the following were found as facts:—

Charles Mellen, mentioned in the information, signed an agreement, as provided by sect. 115 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, to serve as a fireman on board the foreign-going British steamship Saxony, owned by D. MacIvor, Sons, and Co., of Liverpool, on the 14th June 1902, for a voyage from Liverpool to the River Plate and back for a period not exceeding twelve months at the rate of 4*l.* per month wages. He received in advance the sum of 3*l.* 10*s.*

On the 15th July 1902, after the arrival of the Saxony at Buenos Ayres, in the River Plate, on the voyage contemplated in the agreement, and before she sailed thence, Charles Mellen, in breach of the agreement, went ashore and deserted the Saxony, and failed to serve on board during her passage from Buenos Ayres to Liverpool.

In consequence of such breach of agreement the master of the Saxony was compelled, for the safe and proper working of the vessel, to engage a fireman as substitute, to whom he paid wages at the rate of 4*l.* 10*s.* per month. This was the rate then prevailing at the port.

By reason of this breach the owners of the Saxony incurred a loss of 15*s.* 3*d.*

On the 21st Oct. 1902 Charles Mellen, being still at Buenos Ayres, signed an agreement as foreman on board the British foreign-going ship Urmston Grange at Buenos Ayres at 4*l.* 10*s.* per month.

On the 7th Dec. 1902 the Urmston Grange arrived at the West India Docks, London.

On her arrival the appellant received the following letter addressed to him from the office of the Shipping Federation Limited, of which the owners of the Saxony were members:

The Shipping Federation, 101, Leadenhall-street, London, E.C.—Dec. 4, 1902.—To the Master, es. Urmston Grange, care of Messrs. Houlder Brothers and Co. Limited, London, E.C.—Dear Sir,—

1. The Shipping Federation is informed that C. Mellen, now serving on your vessel, deserted the Saxony at Buenos Ayres previous to engagement with you.

2. Under sect. 221 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 the penalty for desertion is forfeiture of wages due at desertion and subsequently earned until the deserted returns to the United Kingdom. From such forfeiture the owners of the vessel from which the desertion took place are entitled to be reimbursed the extra expenses incurred by them in hiring a substitute in place of the deserter, and the excess wages, if any, paid to such substitute. The balance of the forfeiture is payable to the Exchequer.

3. It is the intention of this federation to prosecute if necessary in the present instance with the object of enforcing the penalty provided by law.

4. I have therefore to ask on behalf of the owners of the Saxony that you will be good enough to withhold payment of the wages earned on your vessel by the above-named seaman pending the issue of the proceedings which are contemplated.

5. The amount of the owners' claim is 15*s.* 3*d.* Please give the above-named the option of agreeing to one of the two following courses: (a) If the balance of wages due exceeds the amount of the owners' claim by 2*l.* or over, give him the opportunity of voluntarily agreeing to the deduction of the claim from such balance of wages. (b) If the balance of wages is less than or does not exceed by more than 2*l.* the amount of the owners' claim, give him the opportunity of voluntarily agreeing to the deduction of all but 2*l.* from such balance of wages.

6. If a voluntary settlement is arrived at, the seaman should sign the inclosed form of request and authority. Before he does so kindly read over to him the first four paragraphs of this letter and the form of request and authority in the presence of the ship's officer, and explain the matter to him fully if he so desires, obtaining an assurance from him in the presence of the said officer that he clearly understands what he is doing.

7. The amount so agreed to be deducted must be entered up in the account for wages by you under the heading "other deductions" in the following words—namely, "Deducted by your authority."

8. Please to be careful to see that the seaman receives his account of wages containing the entry as above at least twenty-four hours before he is paid off, in accordance with sect. 132 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

9. If the deduction (which is suggested in the interest of the seaman to save the cost and delay of litigation) is agreed to, there will be no need to withhold the balance of wages thereafter remaining; if, on the other hand, it is not agreed to, kindly stop the entire wages as requested above, and let me know the seaman's reasons for refusing to come to a settlement.

10. The Shipping Federation will hold you and your owners indemnified against any action for the recovery of such wages.

11. A copy of this letter (which is addressed to you direct, in order to save time) has been forwarded to your owners with the request that they will confirm the course suggested.

Yours faithfully,

CUTHBERT LAWS, General Manager.

This letter was put before C. Mellen on board the Urmston Grange, and was read over and thoroughly explained to him on behalf of the owners of the Saxony by the chief officer of the Urmston Grange in the presence of the second officer. C. Mellen, who was a man of fair education, read over the letter, and thoroughly understood the terms of it.

He then agreed to 15*s.* 3*d.*, the amount of the claim, being deducted from his wages earned on board the Urmston Grange, and signed a form of authority which had also been read to him and which he thoroughly understood.

In consequence of this agreement and authority the appellant entered in the amount of wages on the form approved by the Board of Trade under the heading "Other Deductions" the words "Deducted by your authority, 15*s.* 3*d.*," and handed the account of wages to Mellen in pursuance of sect. 132 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, who raised no objection to it.

On the 11th Dec. 1902 the appellant attended at the shipping office for the purpose of paying Mellen and the other members of the crew of the Urmston Grange in accordance with sect. 131 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Mellen also attended. The appellant was then and there ready and willing to pay Mellen his due wages, less 15*s.* 3*d.*, in the presence of the Superintendent of Mercantile Marine, and Mellen was ready and willing to receive payment in this manner. The superintendent then read to the appellant sub-sect. 1 of sect. 221 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and expressed his view that the deduction of the 15*s.* 3*d.* from the wages of Mellen was not legally made, and refused to accept the wages with such deduction or to allow them to be paid to Mellen in his presence. The appellant then asked to see the articles of the Urmston Grange, which were supplied to him; and the superintendent then left the office where the interview had taken place, and the appellant, while still in the office, but in the absence of the superintendent, paid the balance shown by the account of wages to be due after deduction of the sum of 15*s.* 3*d.* to Mellen, and Mellen thereupon signed the account of wages,

K.B. Div.]

KESLAKE (app.) v. BOARD OF TRADE (resps.).

[K.B. Div.]

and signed a release upon the ship's articles of agreement.

On these facts it was at the hearing before the learned magistrate contended by counsel on behalf of the respondents that it was not competent for the appellant to deduct the sum of 15s. 3d. from the wages of Mellen, even with his consent, as compensation to the owners of the Saxony on account of his desertion from that ship, for that such deduction could only be made by a court of summary jurisdiction for a forfeiture of wages on the offence having been proved according to the true construction of the provisions of sects. 221, 232 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

It was further contended that before any sum could be deducted from a seaman's wages in respect of desertion: (1) That the seaman must be proceeded against summarily; (2) that he must be convicted of the offence of desertion; (3) that a forfeiture of his wages must be decreed by the court; (4) that a quantum of forfeiture of wages as compensation in respect of the desertion must also be decreed.

It was also contended that in deducting the sum of 15s. 3d. from Mellen's wages the appellant was attempting to usurp the functions of a court of summary jurisdiction as defined by the Legislature, and that therefore the superintendent was right in refusing to accept the wages on behalf of Mellen or allow them to be paid to him in his presence, and as the appellant paid the wages in the absence of the superintendent he ought to be convicted of the offence alleged in the information.

Counsel on behalf of the appellant contended that: (1) Mellen by deserting the Saxony committed a breach of his agreement with the owners of that vessel and put them to direct expense, amounting to 15s. 3d., which, by sect. 226 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, they were entitled to recover by civil procedure; (2) the owners of the Saxony were entitled to compromise their right of action, and did so by the agreement concluded as above stated between the master of the Urmston Grange, acting on their behalf, and Mellen; (3) the right of the Board of Trade (if any) to take proceedings against Mellen under sect. 221 of the Merchant Shipping Act for an offence under that Act was not prejudiced by such agreement; (4) a full and true account of the seaman's wages in the form approved by the Board of Trade had been delivered to the seaman as required by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894; (5) the deduction of 15s. 3d., as shown on this account, was a proper and lawful deduction and not contrary to the provisions of the Act; (6) the appellant was ready and willing to pay off Mellen in manner provided by the Act, but was prevented from doing so by the absence of the superintendent, who improperly withdrew his presence; (7) by reason of the premises the summons ought to be dismissed.

The learned magistrate was of opinion that a forfeiture for desertion of any part of a seaman's wages must be determined by a court of competent jurisdiction in accordance with the provisions of sects. 221 and 232 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894; that it could not be the subject of private arrangement, and that the deduction of 15s. 3d. from the seaman's wages was illegal. He accordingly convicted the appellant and fined him the sum of one shilling, and ordered him to pay the respondents the sum of seven guineas for their costs.

The learned magistrate declared that he would not have so convicted him had he not agreed with the view taken by the Superintendent of Mercantile Marine, for if the appellant was legally entitled to have made the deduction from the seaman's wages he should have held (as was conceded by counsel for the respondents) that the superintendent should have afforded the appellant facilities for paying the wages, less the deduction, in his presence, and that the payment must be taken to have been so made.

The appellant now appealed against the learned magistrate's decision.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (Noad with him) for the appellant.—All that has been done here is to compromise a right of action. The seaman Mellen entered into a contract with the owners of the Saxony. Subsequently he broke that contract. His breach caused the owners of the Saxony damage which they estimated at 15s. 3d. The master of the Urmston Grange, acting as their agent, proposed that their claim should be settled for this amount, and the seaman agreed. How can this be illegal? Sect. 226 of the Act expressly reserves all civil remedies for desertion, notwithstanding the penal provisions for that offence which the Act contains. The respondents were in no way concerned in this compromise. Their right to prosecute and to forfeiture were not prejudiced by it. The owners of the Saxony were under no obligation to prosecute, and so their undertaking not to do so if the damage inflicted upon them by the seaman's breach of contract was made good was no breach of duty. If the appellant was justified in making the deduction there is no offence in paying the wages after the superintendent withdrew, since by withdrawing the superintendent rendered it impossible to pay the wages in his presence.

Sir Edward Carson (S.G.), H. Sutton, and Howard Smith, for the respondents, were not called on.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the magistrate is right for the reason that he has given. But I am anxious it should not be thought that I have expressed any opinion except upon the facts which are before us. In this case the captain was summoned for not paying the seaman his wages in the presence of the Superintendent of Mercantile Marine, and if it is merely a question of paying wages, and they are paid otherwise than as provided by sect. 131 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894—that is to say, through, or in the presence of a Superintendent of Mercantile Marine—it is undoubtedly clear that an offence has been committed. Those words "through or in the presence of a superintendent" are not merely formal words to show that the man gets his money—not merely to show that it does not pass through the hands of a crimp or anybody who will deduct a portion of the money. The Superintendent of Mercantile Marine is there for another purpose. Under sect. 132 an account has to be delivered, and any deduction from the wages must appear in the account which is delivered at the time the wages are paid. Now, the superintendent, of course, on the face of the document would see nothing but

"Deducted by your authority 15s. 3d." That might mean anything; but it was in fact a deduction made in pursuance of the bargain made between the captain and the fireman, which, I take it, for this purpose he thoroughly understood. That being so, what did the bargain practically amount to? By sect. 221 it is provided that if a seaman commits the offence of desertion he shall "be liable to forfeit all or any part of the effects he leaves on board and of the wages which he has then earned and also, if the desertion takes place abroad, of the wages he may earn in any other ship in which he may be employed until his next return to the United Kingdom, and to satisfy any excess of wages paid by the master or owner of the ship to any substitute engaged in his place at a higher rate of wages than the rate stipulated to be paid to him." By sect. 232, "Where any wages or effects are under this Act forfeited for desertion from a ship those effects may be converted into money, and those wages and effects or the money arising from the conversion of the effects shall be applied towards reimbursing the expenses caused by the desertion to the master or owner of the ship, and, subject to that reimbursement, shall be paid into the Exchequer and carried to the Consolidated Fund." Therefore, in proceedings before a magistrate the claim of the owners of the Saxony in this case would be a first charge upon any money which the magistrate thought fit or directed should not be paid over to the seaman. It is plain, therefore, to my mind that this particular bargain was a bargain which purported not merely that the captain should receive a sum of money on account of the owners of the Saxony, but also purported to place the seaman in a different position with reference to the consequences of deserting as provided for by sects. 221 and 232. In other words, the agreement had dealt with his liabilities under the forfeiture without the sanction of the court. Now, the effect of the superintendent being present to see that the money is paid, which is shown on the face of that bill, having regard to the terms of that bill, would have been to make him—certainly indirectly and I think, to a certain extent, directly—sanction the deduction so made. It seems to me the superintendent was right in saying that he would not be a party to a deduction made upon the basis of this statement, and therefore he declined to be present when the wages were paid. That being so, the man is paid without the superintendent being present; therefore the payment when the superintendent was not present was not a lawful payment, and the master took the responsibility of making it. There is nothing in sect. 226 which conflicts in any way with the view which I have expressed. Sect. 226 does reserve certain rights. I express no opinion at present as to what may be the actual rights of a shipowner apart from the rights given to him which are reserved by sect. 226. Of course, it is quite possible there may be other matters to which our attention has not been called which may have a bearing upon that point; but that I do not know. All I say is that the rights reserved by sect. 226 of a remedy by action or by summary procedure have no bearing, in my opinion, upon sects. 131, 221, and 232, under which this arrangement was purported to be carried out. Therefore, I am of opinion that, for the reason stated by the learned magistrate, his decision is perfectly right.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I also wish to limit my judgment entirely to the facts of this case. Undoubtedly sect. 226 preserved certain civil remedies; and whether there is any objection to their application in such a case as this, I really do not know. It has been intimated that even upon that point there might be a question, and, therefore, inasmuch as I have not had my attention necessarily directed to anything which might conflict with the prima facie meaning of sect. 226, I desire to say that I express no opinion that, under sect. 226, exactly what has been done here could be done, although the compromise of the criminal proceedings has been admitted. That question must be considered when it arises. The utmost that can be said about sect. 226 and its application to this case is, supposing that it would entitle the Shipping Federation to do what they have done with different expressions as to the nature of the reservation of the 15s. 3d., and omitting anything which could be construed into a promise not to prosecute—supposing that could be done—that is not the present case. The case here, to my mind, was perfectly plain. The letter which has been written, and after reading which the seaman signed the authority, seems the clearest possible intimation that if he signed that authority the owners of the Saxony would not prosecute him, and, inasmuch as they are the only people who are likely to prosecute, that is a strong consideration leading him to agree to this, because, by the compromise, he would get rid of the criminal proceeding. It is quite true that, under sect. 231 (1), as far as the owners of the Saxony were concerned, all that they could get was the 15s. 3d. It is also clear that if proceedings were taken under sect. 221 nothing could prevent the magistrate, if he thought right, from forfeiting the whole of the seamen's wages. Therefore, the bargain is one by which the seaman gets rid of the liability to criminal proceedings which may result in a fine or a forfeiture to the Exchequer of the whole of his wages. I therefore think, under these circumstances, that the superintendent was perfectly justified in going into the matter and refusing to be present when the payment was made. Sect. 137 of the Act clearly shows that the superintendent has a good deal more to do than to be merely mechanically present when the wages are paid over; his functions are of a different character from that. I think, therefore, the superintendent was right, and the magistrate right in the decision at which he has arrived.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the magistrate was quite right in saying that a forfeiture for desertion of any part of a seaman's wages must be determined by a court of competent jurisdiction and cannot be the subject of private arrangement. It is clear that these provisions as to forfeiture are in the nature of criminal proceedings. It is only in some cases that the man may be liable to imprisonment. The forfeiture is a penalty according to the section, and it speaks about the "offence" and so on. There can be no doubt about that part of the case. There is also no doubt that the private bargain which was, in point of fact, come to in this case was in the nature of an arrangement with respect to forfeiture of seamen's wages. The document refers to that. It refers not only to the forfeiture of the wages in the first ship, but to the wages subsequently earned; and it says if the man does not agree, then they ask the present appellant to retain all his wages earned on the second ship. The result, therefore, is that this is an arrangement which is arrived at by the seaman with full knowledge of what he is doing, and it is an arrangement settling what is to be done in respect to that claim for forfeiture. As to the case which might arise, although it would not be so effective—namely, the Shipping Federation sending to the captain of the second ship a notice to the effect that the seaman has committed a breach of contract and would be liable to be sued in the County Court for damages, and requesting the seaman to agree that those damages should be deducted from his wages—as to what would happen in such a case as that it is not for the court now to say. All we do say is that it would be a very different case from the present. What answer there may be to such a case I do not know; but one thing is obvious, and that is that it would not be so effective in inducing the seaman to agree that the money should be deducted, and, therefore, it would not be quite so satisfactory even if it is valid. As to whether it is valid or not, I do not think it would be right for the court to express any opinion until the question arises.

TURNER, BRIGHTMAN, AND Co. v. BANNATYNE AND SONS LIMITED. (a)

Demurrage—Lay days—Grain cargoes—London Corn Trade Association Contract—Construction—Number of days to be allowed in discharging.

The London Corn Trade Association Contract, No. 22, provided as to the discharge of grain cargoes from vessels, "Sufficient days to be left for unloading," and, by clause 4, "Sufficient days (counting quarter days) shall be as follows: One running day for every 400 tons up to 2800 tons of grain, and for all quantities in excess 500 tons per day (as provisionally invoiced)," but in no case were less than five days to be allowed.

Held, upon the construction of this clause, that for all vessels of whatever size the time to be allowed for discharging the cargo was one day for every 400 tons of cargo up to 2800 tons, and one day for every 500 tons above 2800 tons, subject in every case to the minimum of five days; and that consequently, in discharging a grain cargo of 3800 tons, one day was to be allowed for every 400 tons up to 2800 tons—that is, seven days—and one day for every 500 tons for the excess above 2800 tons—namely, 1000 tons—making in all nine days.

COMMERCIAL ACTION tried before Walton, J.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Zodiac, of 2918 tons gross register.

The defendants were the holders of a bill of lading, dated the 9th Dec. 1902, for a cargo of maize laden upon the Zodiac at Buenos Ayres, and under the bill of lading the defendants took delivery of the cargo at Limerick in the month of Jan. 1903.

By the charter-party the cargo had to be discharged as per London Corn Trade Association Contract, No. 22, and demurrage at the rate of 4*d.* sterling per gross register ton per day was payable for any detention in taking delivery of cargo at the port of discharge.

The contract No. 22 provided:

Sufficient days to be left for unloading (Sundays, Good Friday, Easter Monday, Whit-Monday, and Christmas Day excepted).

And, further, by clause 4:

Sufficient days (counting quarter days) shall be as follows: One running day for every 400 tons up to 2800 tons of grain, and for all quantities in excess 500 tons per day (as provisionally invoiced).

The Zodiac arrived at Limerick on Saturday, the 17th Jan. 1903. The provisional invoice for her cargo showed an amount of 3839 tons, and the discharge of the cargo began on Monday, the 19th Jan., and was completed at 6 p.m. on the 28th Jan., being a period of eight and three-quarter days.

The plaintiffs said that at the stipulated rate of discharge of 500 tons per day the defendants had the period up to and including three-fourths of a day on the 26th Jan. for the discharge, and that, as the discharge was not in fact completed until 6 p.m. on the 28th Jan., there was demurrage for two and a quarter days due from the defendants to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs claimed as demurrage 4*d.* per ton on 2918 tons gross register—48*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.* per day, which for two and a quarter days amounted to 109*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*

The defendants said that the vessel was not ready to discharge on Saturday, the 17th Jan.; and that by the custom of the port of Limerick the day of entry did not count in the computation of lay days and also that they were not bound to begin discharging on a broken day, and that the discharge properly began on Monday, the 19th Jan., and, according to their construction of the contract, the stipulated rate of discharge—one running day for 400 tons up to 2800 tons of grain and for all quantities in excess 500 tons per day—gave the defendants nine and a quarter days for the discharge, and that as the actual period of discharge—from Monday, the 19th Jan., to 6 p.m. on the 28th Jan.—was only eight and three-quarter days, no demurrage was payable by them to the plaintiffs.

Scrutton, K.C. (A. A. Roche with him) for the plaintiffs.—The question is as to the construction of the contract, and how the lay days are to be computed under the contract. If the cargo does not exceed 2800 tons, then one lay day is to be allowed for every 400 tons of cargo, subject to the minimum of five days. If the cargo were exactly 2800 tons, then the number of days to be allowed would be seven. Up to this point there is no dispute. If the cargo exceeds 2800 tons, then it is submitted that the true construction of the contract is that the cargo must be discharged at the rate of 500 tons a day, and that one lay day must be allowed for each 500 tons of the cargo. In that case the whole number of lay days is ascertained by dividing the whole cargo by 500. Thus in the present case, where the cargo is 3800 tons, the lay days are ascertained by dividing 3800 by 500, which gives seven and three-quarter days. The reason for the difference is that the larger ships have larger and better appliances for discharging cargoes.

Bray, K.C. (Clavell Salter with him) for the defendants.—The true construction of the contract is that, whatever be the amount of the cargo, one day is to be allowed for every 400 tons up to 2800 tons, and one day for every 500 tons above 2800 tons, subject in all cases to the minimum of five days. Applying that to the present case, where the cargo is 3800 tons, there is one lay day to be allowed for every 400 tons up to 2800 tons—namely, seven days—and one day for every 500 tons for the excess above 2800 (that is, for 1000 tons)—namely, two days—making nine days in all. If the plaintiffs' construction be adopted, it would follow that for a cargo of 2800 tons seven lay-days would be allowed, being one day for each 400 tons; but if the cargo were, say, 2801 tons, then only one day would be allowed for each 500 tons, in all only five and a half days. That result shows that the plaintiffs' construction cannot be correct.

Nov. 11.—WALTON, J.—In this case the plaintiffs, who were the owners of a steamer called the Zodiac, sued the defendants for demurrage which they claimed under a charter-party dated the 17th Nov. 1902. The only question which I have to deal with is as to the construction of a clause in that charter-party. The charter-party is in a printed form adapted for steamers loading wheat or maize in the Argentine, and provides, amongst other things, in clause 16, which is headed "Demurrage," as follows: "Demurrage as above"—that is, at the rate which had been mentioned above—"shall be payable for any detention in taking delivery of cargo at port of discharge, the same having to be discharged as per London Corn Trade Association Contract, No. 22." The printed form originally stood thus, "the same having to be discharged as customary at the port of discharge," but those words "customary at the port of discharge" were struck out, and for them were substituted in writing the words: "Per London Corn Trade Association Contract, No. 22." The result is that, to find out what lay days are to be allowed to this steamer at the port of discharge, it is necessary to refer to the London Corn Trade Association Contract, No. 22. It is called "La Plata grain contract, steamer cargoes," and, it being a contract for the sale of a cargo of grain on terms as to price of cost, freight, and insurance, it provides for the conditions and terms upon which the cargo is to be shipped and received by the purchaser in the United Kingdom, and, amongst other things, it provides that sufficient days are "to be left for unloading (Sundays, Good Friday, Easter Monday, Whit-Monday, and Christmas Day excepted), or to discharge as per custom of port if so provided by charter-party." In the charter-party it is not provided that the discharge is to be in accordance with the custom of the port, but is to be in accordance with the terms of this Corn Trade Association Contract; and therefore the contract says that sufficient days are to be allowed for loading, Sundays and other days excepted. To find out what "sufficient days" means, we have to turn to the back of the contract, and amongst the conditions and rules applicable to the contract printed on the back of the form there was this: "Provisional invoice based on bill of lading weight, with ship's name and date of bill of lading, is to be sent by the seller to his buyer within seven days after arrival of the documents in due course in Europe." Then lower down comes condition No. 4: "Sufficient days (counting quarter days)—that is, counting quarters of days—shall be as follows: One running day for every 400 tons up to 2800 tons of grain, and for all quantities in excess 500 tons per day (as provisionally invoiced), whether for direct port or for orders, but in no case less than five days." Then follow the same exceptions: "Sundays, Good Friday, Easter Monday, Whit-Monday and Christmas Day excepted." It thus appears that the clause as to the lay days in this case is not a clause originally written into the charter-party, but is in truth the merchant's clause intimating the merchant's requirement, and that requirement, as stated by the contract form, is accepted by the shipowner; but that perhaps has no real bearing on the construction of the contract. What I have to construe is the meaning of these words: "Sufficient days shall be as follows: One running day for every 400 tons up to 2800 tons of grain, and for all quantities in excess 500 tons per day (as provisionally invoiced), but in no case less than five days." Certain things are agreed. First, it is agreed and plain that the bill of lading weights are to be the basis for the computation to be made in order to ascertain the number of lay days at the port of discharge. It is intended that the master should know as soon as the bills of lading are signed what number of lay days are to be allowed at the port of discharge; and it is intended that the consignees, as soon as they get the provisional invoice setting out the bill of lading weights, should also know at once by an easy calculation what lay days are to be allowed, as I have said, at the port of discharge. Again, it is plain, and there is no dispute about it, that at least five days are to be allowed, and it is suggested, and probably rightly suggested, that this is stipulated for because there is always certain work preliminary to the actual discharge which has to be done, and which, speaking generally, will very likely occupy more or less the same length of time in the case of a small ship as in the case of a larger ship. So that the consignees stipulate that they must have, whatever the weight of cargo to be discharged may be, at least five days. Then the next question which arises is, What number of lay days are to be allowed over and above the minimum of five? Here, again, it cannot be disputed that if the cargo does not exceed 2800 tons in weight, the number of lay days is to be computed at the rate of one day to every 400 tons of cargo, subject, of course, to the minimum of five days. Thus for 2800 tons the lay days would be seven. So far there can be no dispute as to the meaning of the clause. Then comes the question, How many lay days are to be allowed where the cargo exceeds 2800 tons in weight? Counsel for the shipowners contends that in such a case the number of lay days is to be computed by taking

THE CHALLENGE AND DUC D'AUMALE.

[ADM.]

one day for every 500 tons of the cargo. Applying that to the present case, where the cargo was about 3800 tons, counsel for the shipowners says that the lay days are to be arrived at by dividing 3800 by 500, which gives seven and three-quarter days, and that therefore there are seven and three-quarter days allowed for discharging this cargo. On the other hand, counsel for the defendants says that that is not the true construction of the clause. He says that the lay days are to be ascertained by taking one day for every 400 tons up to 2800 and one day for every 500 tons of the quantity in excess of 2800—that is to say, the difference between 2800 and in this case 3800 tons, which was the weight of the whole cargo. This gives seven days for the 2800 tons and two days for the balance (1000 tons) of the cargo at the rate of 500 tons per day—that is, nine days altogether. Whether the plaintiffs' or the defendants' construction of the clause is adopted, the number of the lay days can be ascertained without any difficulty from the bill of lading weights by a simple calculation. At first sight I was much impressed by the contention for the shipowners that the clause must be read as distinguishing between large vessels and small vessels, drawing the dividing line at vessels which carried 2800 tons; and that for small vessels the lay days were to be calculated at the rate of one day for every 400 tons, and for the large vessels at the rate of one day for every 500 tons. The language of the clause is, I think, capable of this construction, and there is no doubt that the explanation of the scale is to be found in the fact that larger vessels, from their construction and appliances, can easily be discharged at a more rapid rate than smaller vessels can. But a closer consideration of the plaintiffs' construction of the clause discloses considerable difficulty. A vessel carrying a cargo of 2800 tons is allowed seven days to discharge; according to the plaintiffs' construction, a vessel carrying a cargo of 2850 tons is allowed five and three-quarter days only, and a vessel carrying 3000 tons is allowed six days only. There would in all probability be no practical difference, so far as facilities for discharging are concerned, between a vessel carrying 2800 tons and a vessel carrying 3000 tons; indeed, the printed form of charter-party used in the present case indicates that in the same vessel it may be uncertain whether the cargo carried will be 2500 or 3000 tons. The charter-party, no doubt, provides for a full cargo, but by clause 22 it is provided as follows under the head of "Capacity": "Owners undertake that the steamer shall not load more than 3960 tons and not less than 3240 tons, English weight, of wheat or maize, the quantity between these limits to be in captain's option." This gives a margin of 720 tons, which may or may not be carried at the master's option. There is no reason to suppose that cargoes of from 2800 to 3500 tons are at all uncommon. It seems very improbable that the scale provided by the clause in question was intended to make such a surprising and inexplicable difference in the number of lay days to be allowed to vessels carrying 2800 tons and to vessels carrying from 2800 to 3800 tons.

On the other hand, if the clause is construed according to the contention of the defendants, it provides for a gradual acceleration of the discharge in proportion to the size of the vessel. For 2800 tons seven days are allowed, which is at the rate of 400 tons a day; for 3800 tons, nine days are allowed, which is at the rate of about 422 tons a day on the whole cargo; for 4800 tons, eleven days are allowed, which is at the rate of about 436 tons a day; for 5800 tons, thirteen days are allowed, which is at the rate of about 446 tons a day. It must be remembered that the clause is not indicating a definite fixed quantity to be discharged each day. If it did, there might be more difficulty in accepting the defendants' construction of it. The clause provides a scale by which anyone who knows the bill of lading weights can readily ascertain the total number of lay days to be allowed at the port of discharge. Whether the plaintiffs' scale or the defendants' scale is adopted, the lay days can be ascertained without difficulty from the bill of lading weights. So far as the language of the clause is concerned, it appears to me at least as capable of the defendants' construction as of the plaintiffs'. Perhaps the use of the word "quantities" in the plural to some extent favours the plaintiffs' construction; but I think that "all quantities" means any quantity, whatever it may be, large or small. On the other hand, the expression "quantities in excess" seems to me very aptly and accurately to describe the quantity by which the total cargo exceeds 2800 tons. On all such excess the discharge is to be at the rate of 500 tons a day. The clause construed according to the contention of the defendants takes into account, in my opinion, not unreasonably the fact that the larger the vessel is usually the greater are her facilities for discharge. I have come to the conclusion that upon this question of construction my judgment must be for the defendants. I ought to mention that my attention has been called to a case in which the Commercial Court at Antwerp had to consider the construction of this same clause, and held that the construction for which the plaintiffs contend was the true construction. I have not lightly, nor without much consideration, arrived at a conclusion which differs from that of a court for which I have the highest respect, but I am, of course, bound to exercise an independent judgment upon the question, the more especially because it is a question as to the meaning of a clause in an English contract.

the position of which is not ascertained, to, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines.

A steam-tug with a vessel in tow, on hearing the whistle of an approaching steamship in a fog forward of her beam, is not justified in proceeding, if she can stop without encountering difficulty with regard to her tow.

The Lord Bangor (73 L. T. Rep. 414; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 217; (1896) P. 28) distinguished.

Where the plaintiffs, in order to prevent the arrest of their vessel in Belgium, gave security to answer any judgment that might be obtained against them in France, and the defendants, having obtained a judgment in France against the plaintiffs in default of appearance, took proceedings in Belgium to have the French judgment made executory there, and the plaintiffs appeared to such proceedings, and the Belgian courts, without inquiring into the merits, declared the French judgment executory in Belgium:

Held, that the plaintiffs were not debarred from bringing an action for damages in respect of the same collision.

ACTION for damage by collision brought by the Marychurch Steamship Company Limited, the owners of the steamship Camrose, against the Elliott Steam-tug Company Limited, the owners of the tug Challenge, and La Compagnie Maritime Française, the owners of the barque Duc d'Aumale.

The Camrose was a steamship of 2565 tons gross register, and at the time of the collision was on a voyage from Ibrail to Antwerp with a cargo of grain.

The Duc d'Aumale was a French four-masted barque of 2297 tons gross register, and was on a voyage from London to San Francisco, via Cherbourg, with a part cargo on board, in tow of the tug Challenge, a steam-tug of 137 tons gross register.

The collision occurred in a dense fog, about 7.40 a.m. on the 22nd June 1902, in the English Channel, between the Royal Sovereign lightship and Dungeness.

The plaintiffs' case was that the Camrose was on a course of E.  $\frac{1}{2}$  N. magnetic, making from two to two and a half knots an hour through the water, with engines working dead slow, when a prolonged blast, followed by two short blasts, were heard from the tug Challenge, apparently about two points on the port bow, and a good distance off. The engines were immediately stopped, and the whistle sounded in reply. Shortly afterwards the helm was ordered to be ported, but, before the order could be effectively carried out, the whistle of the Challenge was again heard, apparently more ahead, and at the same time she came into sight between one and two ships' lengths off, and about a point on the starboard bow. The engines of the Camrose were at once put full speed astern, and as the Duc d'Aumale came into sight between one and two ships' lengths off, and about a point on the port bow of the Camrose, the helm was starboarded, but the Duc d'Aumale came on across the bows of the Camrose, and struck the starboard bow of the Camrose with her starboard side about amidships.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants (inter alia) with not stopping when the whistle of the Camrose was heard forward of the beam, with attempting to cross ahead, and with not stopping and reversing their engines. They also charged them with breach of arts. 16, 19, 22, and 23 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The case of the defendants, the owners of the tug Challenge, was that the Challenge was on a voyage from London to Cherbourg with the Duc d'Aumale in tow and a scope of about eighty fathoms of hawser, and was on a course W.S.W. magnetic, making about two knots an hour through the water. In these circumstances the loom of the Camrose was seen from two to three points on the starboard bow, and about two cables' lengths distant, and shortly afterwards the Camrose collided with the Duc d'Aumale.

The other defendants, the owners of the Duc d'Aumale, admitted that the whistle of the Camrose was heard on the starboard bow, and that the tug continued on her course.

Both defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with not stopping, the owners of the tug Challenge also charging them with not stopping and reversing when the whistle of the Challenge was first heard forward of the beam, with improperly failing to keep clear, with improperly porting the helm, and with proceeding at too great a speed. They also charged them with breach of arts. 16, 22, and 23 of the regulations.

Art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is as follows:

Art. 16. Every vessel shall, in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain storms, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions. A steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.

After the collision the Duc d'Aumale was towed by the Challenge to Calais for repairs.

On the 25th June, the Camrose being at Antwerp, the owners were compelled to give security, in order to prevent the arrest of their vessel under process of saisie conservatoire, to answer any judgment which might be obtained against the master of the vessel and which might have legal effect in Belgium, and their agents, Ruys and Co., on behalf of the owners of the Camrose, gave security for 250,000 francs.

On the 1st July the owners of the Duc d'Aumale commenced an action against the owners of the Camrose in the Tribunal of Commerce at Nantes. The owners of the Camrose did not appear, and on the 20th Aug. judgment was given against them in default of appearance. The judgment held the Camrose liable for the damages sustained by the Duc d'Aumale in the collision, and ordered an inquiry as to damages, and judgment was given for the amount at which they were assessed in favour of the owners of the Duc d'Aumale.

On the 15th Dec. 1902 proceedings were commenced in the Civil Tribunal, Court of First Instance, at Antwerp against the owners of the Camrose and their agents Ruys and Co. to obtain an exequatur of the judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce at Nantes. The owners of the Camrose appeared in the proceedings, and the court held that the conditions necessary to make a decree of a French court executory in Belgium had been complied with, and decreed, without inquiring into the merits of the collision, that Ruys and Co., being merely the agents of the owners of the Camrose, ought to be dismissed from the suit, and that the decision of the French court was to have full force.

The defendants now contended that the plaintiffs were debarred from recovering in the present action by reason of the proceedings abroad, and that the matter was res judicata. They also contended that by appearing in the proceedings at Antwerp the plaintiffs had submitted to the jurisdiction of the foreign courts and were therefore bound by their decisions.

BARNES, J.—This is a case of collision between the plaintiffs' steamship Camrose and the sailing ship Duc d'Aumale, which was in tow of the steam-tug Challenge. The defendants to the action are the Elliott Steam-tug Company Limited, the owners of the Challenge, and the Compagnie Maritime Française, the owners of the Duc d'Aumale. There have been two defences put in, and a point, partly of fact and partly of law, is taken by the Compagnie Maritime Française, which I will deal with later. The collision took place on the 22nd June 1902, at about 7.40 in the morning, and no doubt a good many of the discrepancies in the evidence are due to the fact that such a long time has elapsed since the collision took place. My experience in this court always has been that unless these cases are tried very soon the nautical witnesses are apt to forget all about the facts in detail, and only remember some of them, the outline of their story. I am sure that is not to be wondered at. They go to sea again, and have other business to occupy them. The collision took place, in very foggy weather, in the English Channel, between the Royal Sovereign lightship and Dungeness, five miles west of Dungeness and about seventeen miles from the Royal Sovereign lightship. It occurred between the Camrose and the Duc d'Aumale, the Camrose with her stem and starboard bow striking the Duc d'Aumale on her starboard side about amidships, at an angle of somewhere about three points. The Camrose was proceeding up Channel on a voyage from Ibrail to Antwerp, with a cargo of grain, and her course was E.  $\frac{1}{2}$  N. mag. With regard to her speed, the case made for her is that at the time in question she was only proceeding at two to two and a half knots, with engines working at dead slow, and was not exceeding a moderate speed in the circumstances. I do not think it necessary to go over the details of the cases presented with regard to the manœuvres. It is sufficient to deal with the points that are pressed against the Camrose, and

I will only refer to the fact that the Challenge was towing the Duc d'Aumale on a voyage from London to Cherbourg—she was going on afterwards to San Francisco—with a part cargo consisting to a large extent of cement. The course which the tug and tow were on was about W.S.W., and that shows, so far as a comparison between the courses of the Camrose and the tug and tow is concerned, a difference of one and a half points, possibly a little more, between the opposite courses. Now, the points made against each of these vessels have been very fully and very well argued before me. Substantially they make the same points against each other, with one exception. They each say that the other was going at too great a speed, they each say that the other improperly altered her course, and they each say that the other did not stop. The defendants—the owners of the Challenge—further say that the Camrose ought in addition to have reversed her engines. I have very little difficulty in deciding some of the points in this case. With regard to both these vessels—there are three of them, but for the purpose of this case I speak of the two defendants as one—I think both the plaintiffs and the defendants were going at a moderate speed prior to being near to each other. With regard to the helm action, which is charged by the plaintiffs as being an improper starboarding on the part of the tug and tow, and with regard to the helm action of the Camrose, which is charged by the defendants as being improper porting, I have come to the conclusion, assisted by the Elder Brethren, that there was no material alteration of the helm on either side which would in any way really influence one's decision in this case, and although I may make a few more remarks about that, I think the principal points are the question of stopping on the one side and stopping on the other, and also the question of the reversing of the engines which is suggested by Mr. Aspinall against the Camrose.

Dealing first with the case against the Camrose, I have said that I do not think there was any substantial alteration in her course. I cannot help thinking that the angle of the blow practically shows that the vessels had not substantially altered their courses. It is true it is a little larger than the divergence between opposite courses, but it is easy to explain that by the action of the Camrose with her engines. There are these further broad considerations, that the effect of the evidence of the defendants' witnesses appears to me to be that the Camrose did not substantially alter her course. She appears to have been heading E. by N., according to the master of the Duc d'Aumale, when she came in sight, which is practically the same as the course she originally was on. The principal point about the alteration of course is made by minute criticisms of the logs, one or two of which have had additions and alterations made to them. I am not satisfied that they were made at a subsequent time with the intention of making a case. The story told by the captain of the Camrose and extracted as far as one can generally from the features of the case and the evidence, appears to me to be that the whistle of the tug was heard sounding a towing signal, and the engines of the Camrose were stopped. There is then a confusion about the orders. There seems to have been an order given to port, but almost immediately after that a second whistle was heard from the tug and the order to port was countermanded and the helm was steadied according to the helmsman without any appreciable porting at all. Then the tug was seen and the engines were reversed and the helm put hard a-starboard. That seems to have been the order of events, and it seems to me in accordance with the more or less independent evidence of the Belgian pilot. So that the case of improper action of the helm on the part of the Camrose to my mind fails. I have already said that her speed was moderate. The place of collision seems to me to show that. There is nothing in the damage to the contrary, and, as Mr. Laing reminded me at the last, I think the surveyor, M. Plisson, was not able to say that the damage must have been due to any substantial forward motion on the plaintiffs' vessel as compared with any substantial motion on the other vessel. I do not think he was able to form an opinion. It seems to me, and the Elder Brethren agree, there was nothing in the damage to show immoderate speed or any failure to act properly on the part of the Camrose. Now, as to the next point, the stopping. I think there cannot be any doubt that the engines were stopped at the time when the first whistle was heard from the tug. That is in accordance with the whole evidence of the case, and I do not think there has been any real contest about that at all. The point made by Mr. Aspinall was that the engines ought to have been reversed when the first whistle was heard, and the way entirely taken off. The rule does not prescribe that that should be done. She did what is mentioned in the second part of the rule, art. 16, and I have asked the Elder Brethren whether, in the circumstances which the master of the Camrose has described, he was called upon to reverse upon hearing the first whistle of the other vessel. Their opinion is that the steamer was not in the circumstances called upon to reverse when the first whistle was heard; that it was enough in the circumstances at first to stop, and then, of course, on the second whistle, to take further action by reversing, if necessary. So it seems to me that the case which was cited, of The Merthyr (ubi sup.) is a different case from this. I need not explain why. That deals with the case against the plaintiffs. Now I come to a question that I have some little difficulty in determining, and my opinion is based mainly upon the advice that I have received from the Elder Brethren. In the first place, it appears to have been admitted that if the tug is to blame the ship is to blame also. I have already said that I see no reason for imputing any fault to the tug or tow on the ground of speed. They were going at a moderate speed in the circumstances which prevailed. The next point I have, I think, practically dealt with—namely, that the tug and tow improperly starboarded their helms. It is difficult to arrive at an exact conclusion as to what was done, having regard to the conflicting stories told by the master and mate of the tug and the ship's witnesses, but I am not satisfied that the master's account is quite right about this. I do not think I can find as a fact that there was any improper alteration in the courses of the tug and tow by helm action at any time prior to the collision. What was done when the ships were in sight was done in extremis. I rather prefer to accept the evidence of the mate of the tug than that of the master, who seemed to me to get rather in a fog in giving his evidence. The real point in the case which I think is important is the question whether the tug ought to have stopped her engines. It is a singular fact in the case that the defence set up by the tug makes no mention of hearing any whistles from the Camrose prior to seeing her. The first mention of the Camrose is, "In these circumstances those on board of the tug saw the loom of a steamship, which proved to be the Camrose, coming from the westward, from two to three points on the starboard bow and about two cables' lengths distant." When evidence was given by the master of the tug he practically admitted that the whistle of the Camrose was heard at the same time as she was seen, and when he came to be cross-examined it seemed clear, both from his fuller evidence and from his mate's evidence, that the whistle of the Camrose had been heard at an interval before she was seen, and that she was seen and the whistle was heard about the same time. The master said, "We heard two signals from him, one before we sighted him and one when we sighted him; four minutes between the two." I doubt whether his four minutes is right, but he certainly heard one and then another. The mate said, "I heard one blast before we saw her, some distance off. Nothing was done to the helm or engines then. I heard another blast, and then saw the steamer only 600ft. off." That is quite a different story to that pleaded by the tug, and it is, substantially, as I read it, the story told by the Duc d'Aumale's witnesses, whose story is that, "In these circumstances the whistle of a steamship was heard by those on board the Duc d'Aumale on the starboard bow. The Duc d'Aumale was kept on her course, and the whistle of the tug continued to be sounded one long and two short blasts at proper intervals. Soon afterwards the whistle was again heard, and after a short interval a steamship, which proved to be the Camrose, came in sight, two or three points on the starboard bow of the Duc d'Aumale, and about a quarter of a mile distant." That is substantially what the captain of the Duc d'Aumale said. So there seems no doubt that the steamer's whistle was heard, and then there was an interval, and then it was heard again and the vessel was seen. That gives rise to the point whether the tug ought to have stopped her engines in the position which her master and mate described, when their evidence is considered as I have considered it, and when the evidence from the ship is considered. The point made by the defendants is that the tug and tow ought not to have, in the circumstances, stopped at all, but ought to have kept on, as avowedly they did. That they kept on at the speed at which they were going, whether it was two or three knots—possibly it was only two—there is no doubt whatever, practically until the collision took place. The tow-rope was taut all the time, and therefore the ship was making the same progress as the tug was making. The defendants say in these circumstances that they had no reason to stop. The plaintiffs' contention is that the tug ought to have stopped and let the way run off the ship, so that danger of collision or danger of any serious blow might have been averted. Let us first look at the positions of the vessels. The Camrose was heading up Channel, approaching Dungeness on an up-Channel course. The tug and tow were heading down Channel, but heading W.S.W., making for Cherbourg, and, therefore, they were crossing, or rather parting to the southward from the usual Channel course there, and it seems to me that the moment the whistle was heard on the starboard bow the position probably was—almost a certainty—that that steamer was on a crossing course to theirs, and, the whistle being heard on the starboard bow, every movement forward brought those vessels into closer proximity. Therefore the position is such that the greatest precaution should be taken to avoid danger and to minimise it in every way possible. That seems to me absolutely clear, and, when I have listened to the evidence given by the master of the tug and the mate, I cannot see that they have suggested that there was any difficulty whatever in the tug stopping so as to allow the way to run off the ship. I have asked the Elder Brethren their advice on this, which is a nautical question, and I have had some difficulty about it, especially because of what I have been referred to in the case of The Lord Bangor (ubi sup.). That is why I have pointed out in this case that the circumstances were such that, if it could possibly be done, such action should be taken to avert all danger of collision. The Elder Brethren have advised me that in this case the tug could have stopped without encountering any difficulty with regard to her tow, sufficiently to let the way run off the tow—that the circumstances of the case which I have described admitted of this being done, and in the position of the vessels it would have been proper seamanship to do so. That seems to me to put an end to the matter, because if the ship's way had been taken off by the tug's stopping it is quite obvious that the collision which took place would not have taken place. I do not think that that leaves anything more to consider in connection with the navigation of the vessels. The result is that I find there was no blame in this case on the part of the Camrose, but, on the other hand, that the Challenge and the Duc d'Aumale must be held to blame.

The next point taken by the defendants, the Compagnie Maritime Française, is that there has been a decision between the plaintiffs and the owners of the Duc d'Aumale which binds the plaintiffs, so that they cannot proceed with the present case. When the matter is discussed objection is taken by the plaintiffs that the questions at issue, which decide the merits of the case, have never been determined at all between the plaintiffs and the defendants in this case. They certainly never have been determined between the plaintiffs and the tugowners; and it is said they have never been determined in any shape or form between the plaintiffs and the owners of the Duc d'Aumale. The matter has been treated in a very summary way before me. I have had nothing handed in except some admissions, a copy of a judgment obtained at Nantes by the owners of the Duc d'Aumale, and copies of some pleadings and form of judgment at Antwerp. But giving the best judgment I can on the way the matter has been discussed before me, as I understand, what has taken place is this: The owners of the Duc d'Aumale arrested the Camrose at Antwerp in order to, if possible, levy upon that ship, or the bail given for it, the amount of a judgment which they might afterwards obtain in Nantes. Proceedings were instituted by them at Nantes subsequent, as I understand, to the time when the ship was arrested at Antwerp, and those proceedings were entered in the Commercial Tribunal at Nantes for the purpose of obtaining a decision that the Camrose was to blame for the collision, and liable for the damages which the owners of the Duc d'Aumale sought to recover from the owners of the Camrose. The owners of the Camrose did not appear in that suit, as is recorded in the admission that has been made. They were not at the commencement of the suit, nor at any time subsequently, within the territory of the Republic of France, and not subject to the jurisdiction of the said court, and they never appeared in that suit. The suit was proceeded with, and treated as a suit by default, and a judgment was obtained in the tribunal at Nantes, which, in effect, appears to me to hold the owners of the Camrose responsible for damages sustained by the owners of the Duc d'Aumale. Then, having obtained that judgment, the plaintiffs in the French proceedings took steps to enforce their proceedings in which they had arrested the Camrose at Antwerp. As I understand from the copied judgment before me the Civil Tribunal at Antwerp determined that an exequatur of the judgment given by the tribunal at Nantes is to be granted, but they have no jurisdiction as regards Ruys and Co., who have given bail to prevent the arrest of the Camrose. The only point that is taken for the present defendants, the owners of the Duc d'Aumale, is that by appearing in Belgium to stop their ship being arrested they have in some way assented to the jurisdiction of the French Tribunal at Nantes. I confess I am wholly unable to follow that point at all. It seems to me that the owners of the Camrose were in no way bound to submit to the jurisdiction of the court in France. They did not appear and were not there, and they owed no allegiance. It is now said they were bound to appear at Nantes, because their ship had been arrested in Belgium to enforce a judgment not yet obtained at Nantes. It may be that, by not appearing at Nantes, they have left themselves in the position of having this judgment somehow enforced against them in Belgium; but I am not informed at present how that is going to be done. There is no evidence before me of any jurisdiction over the bail, or to try the merits. There is no doubt whatever that the question of the merits has never been tried anywhere; and that being so, as I say, the whole point is that, somehow or other, because the owners of the Camrose have appeared, when no suit had been instituted in France, to stop the arrest of the ship in Belgium, they have submitted to the jurisdiction of the tribunal in France. I fail to understand how that is substantiated. It seems to me that that is no bar to the judgment I have pronounced, holding the two sets of defendants to blame.

THE DUC D'AUMALE (No. 2). (a)

Salvage—Tug and tow—Collision partly due to negligence of master of tug—Rights of crew of tug to be rewarded.

The fact that under a contract of towage the tug is to be considered the servant of the tow does not entitle the tug owners to claim salvage for services to the tow rendered necessary by a collision, partly brought about by the negligence of the master of the tug.

Where a tug has caused damage to the tow through the negligence of the master of the tug, and the assistance of the tug has had to be taken by the tow in order to save her, the other members of the crew are not entitled to recover salvage.

ACTION for salvage by the owners, master, and crew of the steam-tug Challenge against the owners of the French barque Duc d'Aumale.

A collision occurred on the 22nd June 1902, in the English Channel, between the steamship Camrose and the Duc d'Aumale, which at the time was on a voyage from London to Cherbourg in tow of the plaintiffs' tug Challenge. The Duc d'Aumale was considerably damaged in consequence, and, at the request of her master, was towed by the Challenge into Calais for repairs.

At the trial of the collision action brought by the owners of the Camrose against the owners of the Challenge and the Duc d'Aumale, the learned judge came to the conclusion that the collision was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Challenge and the Duc d'Aumale.

By the contract of towage entered into by the owners of the Duc d'Aumale and the Elliott Steam-tug Company Limited, the owners of the Challenge, it was agreed (inter alia):

That the owners of the steam-tugs are not to be answerable or accountable for any loss or damage whatsoever, by collision or otherwise, which may happen to or be occasioned by any of the cargoes on board of the same while such vessel is in tow, whether arising from or occasioned by any accident or by any omission, breach of duty, mismanagement, negligence, or default of them or their servants . . . and that the owner or persons interested in the vessel or craft so towing, or of the cargo on board of the same, shall and do undertake, bear, satisfy, and indemnify the tugowners against all liability for the above-mentioned matters; and especially that to all intents and purposes whatsoever the master and crew of the tug or tugs so towing shall be deemed and considered to be the servants of the owners, master, and crew of the vessel or craft towed, the tugowners being in no way liable for any of their acts or for any of the consequences of the causes above excepted. The acceptance, hiring, or employing of a steam-tug is not to prejudice any claim the steam-tug owners may have to salvage remuneration for any extra services that may be rendered to the ship or cargo from or arising out of circumstances not existing or contemplated at the time of such acceptance, hiring, or employment.

The services consisted in towing the Duc d'Aumale after the collision to Calais.

There was a dense fog at the time, and the Duc d'Aumale was making water rapidly, and had 6ft. of water in the hold on her arrival at Calais.

The facts, except as to the alleged depth of water in the hold of the Duc d'Aumale after the collision, and the danger of her sinking, were admitted by the defendants, but it was contended that the plaintiffs were not entitled to salvage at all as they had themselves been guilty of negligence in causing the collision.

It was agreed between the plaintiffs and defendants that the negligence of the tug was that of the master alone.

Aspinall, K.C. and Nelson for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted the plaintiffs are entitled to salvage. Under the towage contract those on the tug were the servants of the tow, and the right to claim salvage was expressly reserved. Apart from contract, the tug is the servant of the tow:

The Romance, 83 L. T. Rep. 488; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 149; (1901) P. 15.

There was no breach of duty between the tug and the tow, and the owners of the tug are not to be deemed to be wrongdoers:

Milburn v. Jamaica Fruit Company, 83 L. T. Rep. 321; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 122; (1900) 2 Q. B. 540.

As between the tug and her tow, there was no negligence on the part of those in charge of the tug. They were merely obeying the orders of the tow, and they were bound to obey them:

The Altair, 76 L. T. Rep. 263; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 224; (1897) P. 105.

The parties have agreed that the owner of the tow shall be responsible, and the master is for all such purposes his servant. The tug must continue to perform her contract if possible, but on salvage terms:

The Minnehaha, 4 L. T. Rep. 810; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 111; Lush. 335.

In The Five Steel Barges (63 L. T. Rep. 499; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 580; 15 P. Div. 142) the tug was bound to stop and rescue the barges, but it was held she was entitled to salvage for so doing. Even if the owners cannot claim salvage owing to the collision having been partly caused by the negligence of the master, the crew are entitled to do so. The point has never been argued, and it seems to have always been assumed that they are identified with the wrongdoing of the ship. This is no longer good law:

The Bernina, 58 L. T. Rep. 423; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 257; 13 App. Cas. 1.

If there has been no personal wrongdoing on the part of the claimants, it is submitted they are entitled to be rewarded.

Carver, K.C. and Noad for the defendants contra.—The accident did not put an end to the towage contract. A man who has been negligent and rendered salvage necessary cannot claim salvage, and nobody ought to profit by his own wrongdoing:

The Cargo ex Capella, 16 L. T. Rep. 800; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 552; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 356;

The Robert Dixon, 42 L. T. Rep. 344; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 246; 5 P. Div. 54.

Here the court has expressly found that there was negligence on the part of the tug, and it has

(a) Reported by CHRISTOPHER HEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE DUC D'AUMALE (No. 2).

[ADM.]

been agreed between the parties that the negligence of the tug was that of the master alone:

The Alairt (ubi sup.).

No doubt there are cases where the crew can make a claim and the shipowners cannot:

The Maria Jane, 14 Jur. 857;

The Sappho, 24 L. T. Rep. 795; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 521; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 690.

All that the crew did in this case was what they would be bound to do under their contract of service. Where salvage is claimed, it must be shown that the person claiming it was under no duty to do the work, and, in order to be entitled to claim salvage, the crew must show that they have done something outside their ordinary duties:

The Cargo ex Capella (ubi sup.).

The following cases and authority were also referred to in the course of the argument:

The Glenfruin, 52 L. T. Rep. 769; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 10 P. Div. 103;

BARNES, J.—In this case the Elliott Steam-tug Company and others, the owners, master, and crew of the steam-tug Challenge, are seeking to recover salvage for services rendered to the Duc d'Aumale, her cargo, and freight. The facts in the statement of claim are admitted, except that "6ft." shall be substituted for "13ft." of water in par. 4, and that the probability of the vessel sinking shall be judged of by the court, subject to the evidence of the defendants' master and his documents. It was admitted also that what was decided in the previous case which I heard—the suit between the Camrose and the Challenge and the Duc d'Aumale—namely, that the collision which took place was caused by the negligence both of the Challenge and of the Duc d'Aumale, and that the negligence of the Challenge was that of her master. That has been admitted in this present case, so that the facts are not in dispute. They give rise to certain questions of law. The Challenge and the Duc d'Aumale were somewhat to the west of Dungeness when the collision took place, and after the collision the Challenge towed the Duc d'Aumale to Calais. The services for which salvage is claimed consisted in what was done subsequent to the collision and up to the time when the vessel was left at Calais. It is said, first of all, that the plaintiffs, the owners, master, and crew of the Challenge, can recover no salvage remuneration at all because the collision and what happened afterwards, as a consequence of it, were due to the negligence which I have referred to on board the Duc d'Aumale and on board the tug. I deal for a moment with the general question, because a second question has been discussed—namely, whether the crew or the owners of the tug—anybody other than the person who was the actual negligent person—can recover salvage. The first point appears to me to depend upon the decisions and principles which have guided this court in arriving at its judgments on the subject of salvage services. There is only one matter to refer to further before dealing with this case. Mr. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, relies on the towage contract which was entered into between the owners of the Duc d'Aumale and the Elliott Steam-tug Company, under which the Duc d'Aumale was to be towed from London to Cherbourg. There are conditions on the back of it which he says affect the present case. Those conditions are very long. I have read them carefully, and I take the view presented by the defendants in connection with the exceptions referred to—namely, that they really are exceptions which excuse the owners from liability, but do not affect this present question of salvage services. The question of the general position where what has happened is due to the negligence both of the tug and of the tow has been discussed in one or two cases, amongst others in The Minnehaha (ubi sup.), in which that well-known judgment, which is set out in so many subsequent cases, and in the text-books, is to be found. There is one passage in it which is of importance (4 L. T. Rep., at p. 812; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S., at p. 112; Lush., at p. 348): "If the danger from which the ship has been rescued is attributable to the fault of the tug; if the tug, whether by wilful misconduct, or by negligence, or by the want of that reasonable skill or equipments which are implied in the towage contract, has occasioned or materially contributed to the danger, we can have no hesitation in stating our opinion that she can have no claim to salvage." It has been said that such observations do not apply where both tug and tow are negligent, but in my judgment that cannot be said in face of such a case as The Alairt (ubi sup.). There a tug was held responsible for the direction of the course, and having been found negligent in respect of it and in not taking soundings, her claim for salvage was dismissed. There was in that case a counter-claim by the defendants. It was also dismissed, because their master was held guilty of contributory negligence in allowing the tug to run on instead of ordering her to haul off when approaching a difficult port in foggy weather. There was negligence of both tug and tow, and both claim and counter-claim were dismissed. The Robert Dixon (ubi sup.) has been cited to me, but I do not think there was any point there of negligence on the part of both tug and tow. But one part of the judgment of the late Lord Esher, then Brett, L.J., is very important, where he says: "The plaintiffs, being under a towage contract, bring this action, in which they assert that the towage service was altered into salvage; and it seems to me that the plaintiffs are in this position, that it lies on them to show that the change occurred without any want of skill on their part, but by mere accident over which they had no control. The burden of proof on both the affirmative and the negative issues is on the plaintiffs—that is, both that there was an inevitable accident beyond their control and that they showed no want of skill." It appears to me, apart from the question of individuals, with which I will deal in a moment, that where there is an occurrence—I will not use the word accident—which requires services of a salvage nature, and that occurrence has originated in the negligence of both tug and tow, the tug cannot claim any salvage for services afterwards rendered in extricating the ship from the difficulty in which she has been placed by that joint negligence.

THE DUC D'AUMALE (No. 2).

The next point which has been taken is that at any rate those persons on the tug who were not negligent, and even her owners, because they were not negligent personally, can recover for salvage services. Mr. Aspinall argues for the crew, other than the master, on this point, and for the owners. As far as the owners are concerned, it seems to me that this point depends partly upon this contract which he has referred to and which to my mind does not affect the question of salvage at all; and that they really stand or fall by the negligence of their master, and cannot recover, for the reasons I have already given, for salvage services. I do not think it true in this case to say, as he contended, that the tug was under no obligation whatever afterwards to do anything for the ship. It seems to me not carrying out the principles to be found in The Minnehaha (ubi sup.), in that part of the judgment set out 4 L. T. Rep., at p. 811; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. O. S., at p. 112; Lush., at p. 347. I cannot regard the tug, in a case of this kind, as released from all duty towards the tow. It seems to me that after the accident happened she was not relieved from all obligation towards the ship, but that if salvage services were performed in getting the ship out of difficulty, there would be, to use the language of the Privy Council, "services of a different class and bearing a higher rate of payment," and it would be "held to be implied in the contract that the tug" should be "paid at such higher rate." But in this case there would be no payment for reasons I have already given, because there was negligence on the part of the master contributing to the situation from which the ship had to be relieved. So I cannot accept the view that the tug was under no obligation whatever to the tow, as contended for by the plaintiffs. A good deal seems to me to follow from that, because I have no doubt whatever, for the reasons I have given, that the tugowners and the master cannot recover in this case, because of the negligence of the master. But the contention further is that the crew at any rate can recover—those, I mean, who are not responsible for this disaster. So far as I know it is the first time this point has been raised, so as to endeavour to separate the crew from the master or the negligent person in a case of this kind, of tug and tow. There have been one or two cases which have practically no bearing, to my mind, upon this particular question. There is first of all The Sappho (ubi sup.), where services were performed to ships belonging to the same owner, and the master and crew were held entitled to salvage. There is also the case of The Glengaber (ubi sup.), where by the improper navigation of a steam-tug a vessel at anchor was sent adrift and placed in jeopardy. Another steam-tug, the Warrior, rendered assistance to the drifting vessel, and it was held that the owners of the Warrior were entitled to an award, although some of them were also owners of the vessel which occasioned the mischief. Sir R. Phillimore, in giving judgment in that case, said (27 L. T. Rep., at p. 387; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 402; L. Rep. 3 A. & E., at p. 535): "With regard to the Warrior, it has been contended that that vessel is not entitled to be considered as a salvor, because it appeared in evidence that some of her owners were also owners of the Black Prince. This objection, if allowed to prevail, could not affect the claim of the crew, nor could it affect those owners of the Warrior who are not owners of the Black Prince, and in my opinion it cannot be sustained. I know of no authority for the proposition that a vessel wholly unconnected with the act of mischief is disentitled to salvage reward simply because she belongs to the same owners as the vessel that has done the mischief. I shall therefore hold that the Warrior is entitled to salvage reward." That judgment, in the part which I have read, showed the difference between the claim of the crew and the claim of those owners who were not owners of the Black Prince, and he allowed the whole claim—at least he allowed, as I understand, salvage for all. But that case differs from the view expressed by Butt, J. in The Glenfruin (ubi sup.), where it was held that the master and crew were entitled to salvage. The headnote to that case is as follows: "A steamship, laden with cargo, became disabled at sea in consequence of the breaking of her crank shaft. Such breakage was caused by a latent defect in the shaft, arising from a flaw in the welding, which it was impossible to discover. Her cargo was shipped under bills of lading which contained among the excepted perils, 'all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and of navigation of whatsoever nature or kind.' Another vessel belonging to the same owners towed the disabled vessel to a place of safety. In an action of salvage brought by the owners, master, and crew of the salvaging vessel against the owners of cargo on the salvaged ship: Held, that the master and crew were entitled to salvage, but that the owners were not, for that there was an implied warranty by them that the vessel was seaworthy at the beginning of the voyage." He awarded salvage to one owner who was not owner of the ship under contract, and he awarded some to the master and officers and crew of the other ship. I can quite understand that where the vessel which renders salvage services is entirely unconnected with the ship that is salvaged, persons, like the master and crew or owners, who are in no way owners of the ship that is salvaged, or under no liability to persons on board that ship, can recover salvage. But I do not think that applies to the case of a tug and her tow. I cannot help thinking one must consider a little more fully upon what principle the court proceeds in awarding salvage. The court is guided—I am speaking generally and without that minute consideration which I should give if I were writing my judgment—by due regard to the benefit conferred, combined with due regard to the general interests of ships and commerce; I mean the policy of what is to be done comes into consideration as well as the mere benefit received. It seems to me that both as a principle and matter of good policy it would not be desirable to encourage a crew to recover a salvage reward in such cases of tug and tow where their master had been one of the causes of the disaster from which the ship to which salvage service had been rendered was rescued. There is a case which supports that view—the case of the Cargo ex Capella (ubi sup.). In that case Dr. Lushington said (16 L. T. Rep., at p. 800; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S., at p. 552; L. Rep. 1 A. & E., at p. 357): "In my mind the principle is this, that no man can profit by his own wrong. . . . The rule would bar any claim for services rendered to the other ship which was a co-delinquent in the collision; but the present claim, it is to be observed, is a demand for salvage against the cargo, the owners of which were perfectly innocent." That, therefore, was a claim by the master and crew of one of the colliding vessels. In the case of The Glenfruin (ubi sup.), to which I have referred, the people on the salving vessel had nothing whatever to do with the accident that happened to the salved vessel. In the case of The Glengaber (ubi sup.), the steam-tug which came up and rendered assistance had nothing to do with the accident which originally brought about the difficulty; and it is a remarkable fact, I think, that no case has been cited to me in which any similar suggestion has been made of the crew in a towage case recovering salvage where the master and owners could not. The point must have arisen. It was capable of being made in the Cargo ex Capella (ubi sup.). It was capable of being made in The Altair (ubi sup.) and in other cases. But it has never been suggested, and it seems to me that it may be that the right view to take is this, that the tugowners are not relieved entirely from their contract by what has happened, and when they proceeded to render services afterwards they were extricating themselves and their ship from a difficulty in which both had been placed by joint negligence. In this case what the tug did was, in fine weather, to tow the ship to Calais. The owners and master could not recover, and the crew did nothing more than their ordinary duties on the tug, without any risk, that I can see. They did nothing more than, it seems to me, their ordinary duties towards their owners and master. It may very well be that there might be a case of joint negligence producing a disaster to a tow, where a man might be put on board the tug, or required to perform services entirely outside the ordinary duties of tug and tow. When such a case arises it can be dealt with. But this case, I think, can be dealt with on that argument alone with which I have already dealt. It seems to me it would be bad policy to encourage sailors to hope and expect that their master might get the ship he was towing into danger, so that they would have to render services for which they could recover. I think that would be introducing something extremely novel into this court, and what seems to me to be a dangerous kind of policy. On the whole, although this matter has been very fully discussed, and I have given judgment without reserving it, it seems to me that I am right in holding that no salvage award can be recovered in this case by anybody connected with the tug. One word more. I only wish to refer to the cases of The Bernina (ubi sup.) and Milburn v. Jamaica Fruit Company (ubi sup.). They appear to me to have nothing whatever to do with the present case. My judgment, therefore, must be that the suit of the plaintiffs is dismissed. I think, in the circumstances under which the case has come before the court—they are peculiar—the proper order is that each should pay their own costs.

APPEAL from a judgment of the County Court judge of Pembroke Dock, sitting with Nautical Assessors, in an action for salvage brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Bessie Barr against the owners of the schooner Prince Llewellyn.

The Bessie Barr was a steamship of 406 tons gross register, manned by a crew of eleven hands all told, and at the time was on a voyage from Garston to Bristol with a cargo of coal.

The Prince Llewellyn was a small schooner, and at the time the services were rendered was on a voyage from Treport to Amlwch with a cargo of 170 tons of phosphate. While on her voyage she met with bad weather, sprung a leak, and lost some of her sails, and on the 16th Jan. 1903 she was about three miles N.E. of the Bishop's Light, when, in response to her signals of distress, the Bessie Barr took her in tow, and brought her safely into Fishguard Bay, where she came to anchor.

The distance towed was about sixteen miles, and there was a gale of wind blowing at the time.

The value of the Prince Llewellyn at the time the services were rendered was 100*l.*, of her cargo 85*l.*, and of her freight 31*l.* 15*s.*, making the sum of 216*l.* 15*s.* in all.

The learned County Court judge, on the advice of his assessors, awarded the sum of 160*l.* to the salvors.

The defendants appealed.

Batten and Samson for the appellants.

Bailhache and Rogerson, for the defendants, contra.

The court allowed the appeal, and reduced the amount awarded to 70*l.*

Batten submitted that, on the authority of The Kilmahoe (16 Times L. Rep. 155), the successful appellants were entitled to the costs of the appeal.

Bailhache contra.—The general rule of practice is not to allow costs. See

The Gypsy Queen, 72 L. T. Rep. 454; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 586; (1895) P. 176.

The Court of Appeal there refused to give the successful appellants in an action for salvage the costs of the appeal.

BARNES, J.—It is clear there is no hard-and-fast rule as to costs, but in the present case the successful appellants ought to have the costs of the appeal. The costs in the court below will remain as they are.

Collision—Limitation of liability—Foreign vessel—Foreign certificate of registry—Order in Council—Double bottom—Water ballast—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 81, 84, 543, 745.

In an action for limitation of liability by owners of a French steamship, the French certificate of registry supported by affidavit giving the gross tonnage exclusive of double bottom, and the Order in Council of the 5th May 1873, extending the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) as to measurement to French vessels, were put in. A further affidavit was filed alleging that the double bottom for water ballast was not used for the purpose of carrying cargo, stores, or fuel. Held, that this was sufficient evidence, and that it was not necessary that the certificate of a Board of Trade surveyor under sect. 81 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 should be also adduced.

ACTION by the plaintiffs, the Société Anonyme des Chargeurs Réunis, owners of the French steamship Cordilleras, to obtain a decree of limitation of liability under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, in respect of a collision between the Cordilleras and the steamship Poplar.

The collision occurred on the 8th Feb. 1902 in the River Thames, and in consequence the Poplar was considerably damaged, and was abandoned by her crew, and subsequently came into collision with the steamship Morocco and seven barges, doing further damage.

On trial of the action the Cordilleras was found alone to blame for all the collisions, and her owners now sought to limit their liability in respect of the damages.

The tonnage of the Cordilleras without deduction for engine-room space was 3262·26 tons, and the sum of 26,098l. 1s. 7d. was paid into court, being the amount of the plaintiffs' liability calculated on the basis of 8l. a ton.

In support of their case the plaintiffs filed an affidavit by a director of the company, and also put in the certificate of French nationality and registry of the Cordilleras. From this it appeared that the tonnage of the Cordilleras for the payment of the subsidies allowed by the law of the 30th Jan. 1893 was 3353·72 tons. From this 91·46 tons were deducted for the space between the inner and outer plating of the double bottom of the vessel occupied by the water ballast tanks, leaving the gross tonnage at 3262·26 tons.

It was contended by the plaintiffs that the Order in Council of the 5th May 1873 extending the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) as to the registry of French vessels made it no longer necessary that they should be remeasured in England, and that the certificate of nationality, supported by an affidavit, was sufficient; further, that the space occupied by the double bottom for water ballast was not included in the measurement of the gross tonnage and that it had been properly deducted.

The Order in Council of the 5th May 1873 is as follows:

Whereas by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 it is enacted that whenever it is made to appear to Her Majesty that the rules concerning the measurement of tonnage of merchant ships for the time being in force under the principal Act have been adopted by the Government of any foreign country, and are in force in that country, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty by Order in Council to direct that the ships of such foreign country shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in the certificate of registry or other national papers, and thereupon it shall no longer be necessary for such ships to be remeasured in any port or place in Her Majesty's dominions, but such ships shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry or other papers in the same manner and to the same extent and for the same purposes in, to, and for which the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry or other papers in the same manner, to the same extent, and for the same purposes in, to, and for which the tonnage denoted in the certificates of registry of British ships is to be deemed the tonnage of such ships. And, whereas it has been made to appear to Her Majesty that the rules concerning the measurement of tonnage of merchant ships now in force under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 have been adopted by the President of the French Republic and are in force in the French dominions, Her Majesty is hereby pleased, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, to direct that the ships of France, the certificates of French nationality and registry of which are dated on or after the first day of June one thousand and seventy-three, shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in the said certificate of French nationality and registry.

The material sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) are as follows:

Sect. 81. In the case of a ship constructed with a double bottom for water ballast, if the space between the inner and outer plating thereof is certified by a surveyor of ships to be not available for the carriage of cargo, stores, or fuel, then the depth required by the provisions of Rule 1 relating to the measurement of transverse areas shall be taken to be the upper side of the inner plating of the double bottom, and that upper side shall, for the purposes of measurement, be deemed to represent the floor timber referred to in that rule.

Sect. 84 (1). Whenever it appears to Her Majesty the Queen in Council that the tonnage regulations of this Act have been adopted by any foreign country, and are in force there, Her Majesty in Council may order that the ships of that country shall, without being remeasured in Her Majesty's dominions, be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry or other national papers, in the same manner to the same extent upon the same purposes as the tonnage denoted in the certificate of registry of a British ship is deemed to be the tonnage of that ship.

Sect. 503 (2). (a) The tonnage of a steamship shall be her gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine room . . . (b) Where a foreign ship has been or can be measured according to British law, her tonnage, as ascertained by that measurement, shall, for the purpose of this section, be deemed to be her tonnage. (c) Where a foreign ship has not been and cannot be measured according to British law, the Surveyor-General of ships in the United Kingdom, or the chief measuring officer of any British possession abroad, shall, on receiving from or by the direction of the court hearing the case, in which the tonnage of the ship is in question, such evidence concerning the dimensions of the ship as it may be practicable to furnish, give a certificate under his hand stating what would in his opinion have been the tonnage of the ship if she had been duly measured according to British law, and the tonnage so stated in that certificate shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be the tonnage of the ship.

Sect. 745 (1). (a) Any Order in Council, licence, certificate, by-law, rule, or regulation made or granted under any enactment hereby repealed shall continue in force as if it had been made or granted under this Act.

Laing, K.C. and Stubbs for the plaintiffs.—The Order in Council of the 5th May 1873 was made under sect. 60 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, and continued in force under sect. 745 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Sect. 84 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 covers this case. The Cordilleras must therefore be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in her French certificate. The measurement of the space occupied by water ballast tanks has never been included in the measurement of her gross tonnage, and the plaintiffs ought not, therefore, to be made to include it now.

Batten for the owners of the Poplar.

D. Stephens for the owners of the Morocco.—The owners of the Cordilleras are not entitled to the deduction of the 91.46 tons in respect of the space occupied in the double bottom by water ballast. The certificate produced is not sufficient. The Zanzibar (68 L. T. Rep. 297; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 258; (1892) P. 233) does not support the plaintiff's contention. They must produce a certificate of a surveyor of ships appointed by the Board of Trade, showing that the space is not available for the carriage of cargo, stores, or fuel. See

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894, ss. 81, 724 (2) and sched. 2, r. 1 (2).

Sect. 21 (2) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 provided for the measurement to be to the upper side of the floor timber. Sect. 5 of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 43) provided that in the case of a ship with a double bottom for water ballast the upper side of the inner plating of the double bottom was to be taken to represent the floor timber, but under it the certificate of a surveyor appointed by the Board of Trade was necessary in order to show that the space was not available for the carriage of cargo, stores, or fuel. Sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 provides the mode of measurement for a foreign ship. Although sect. 84 provides for the acceptance of a foreign certificate of registry, that does not override the provisions of sect. 81, and the result is that the Act cannot be complied with by the owners of a foreign ship:

The Cathay, 82 L. T. Rep. 823; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 100.

It was there held that the owners of a Danish ship could not avail themselves of the provisions of sect. 503, sub-sect. 2 (a) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 with regard to the crew space, as they were unable to produce the required certificate under sched. 6 of the Act.

Balloch for owners of cargo on board the Morocco.

Laing, K.C. in reply.—The Cathay (ubi sup.) is not in point. There it was held that the owners of a foreign ship were not entitled to make any deduction from the gross tonnage because the certificate under sched. 6, par. 3, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 had to be given by a surveyor of ships to the collector of customs at the time when the ship was registered. No deduction is sought to be made from the gross tonnage in the present case. In ascertaining the gross tonnage under the Act, the space occupied in the double bottom by water ballast is always deducted. The effect of the Order in Council is to prevent the necessity for remeasurement, and the tonnage denoted in the certificate of registry of a foreign ship must be deemed to be the tonnage of the ship. It is submitted that if this evidence is produced the requirements of the Act are satisfied.

On conclusion of the arguments the learned judge adjourned the case in order that a copy of the Order in Council might be produced, and affidavits filed showing that no loss of life or personal injuries had resulted from the collisions, and that the space used in the double bottom was not available for the purpose of carrying cargo, stores, or fuel.

Nov. 17.—BARNES, J.—The plaintiffs in this action are the owners of the Cordilleras, and seek to limit their liability in accordance with the 503rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, which applies to the owners of a ship, whether British or foreign. There seems no doubt that, subject to certain points which have been discussed, they are entitled to the usual decree of limitation of liability. Although there is a somewhat complicated claim in the first paragraph of the claim, I think that a decree in the ordinary form will be adequate to provide for all claims—there being no question raised, as I understand, of all these claims we have heard of being dealt with in the present suit. If anything is heard of these there will be liberty to apply. The points discussed turn on the question of the tonnage upon which the owners of the Cordilleras are to be held entitled to limit their liability. According to the section to which I have referred, the tonnage of a steamship shall be her gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine room. This was a steamship, and according to the affidavit of M. de Clermont, one of the directors of the plaintiff company, the Cordilleras is a steamship of the gross tonnage, without deduction on account of engine room, of 3262.26 tons. Annexed to the affidavit is the certificate of French nationality, with a translation. The translation is before me, and in that I find that the gross measurement, according to what is referred to as the 1889 decree, is mentioned as the figure which I have referred to. The only points that really are material, upon which this case stood over from last motion day, were—first, that the affidavit did not adequately negative the fact that there was not any loss of life or personal injury. But there have been two affidavits, one by the pilot and one by the solicitor, who has made inquiries, showing there was no loss of life or personal injury caused by these collisions. The tonnage which is mentioned in the affidavit and certificate was arrived at after deducting from a larger figure the measurement of the water ballast tanks which were in the bottom of this ship. The director of the company says in his affidavit that those water ballast tanks are 91.46 tons.

THE MADELEINE AND ANDRÉ THÉODORE.

Now, it was contended, first of all, that under sect. 503 this ship ought to be measured according to British law, either under sub-sect. (b), where she has been and can be measured, or under sub-sect. (c), where she has not been and cannot be measured, but provision is made as to what is to be done. It is, however, contended by the plaintiffs that there is no necessity to have the ship measured under British law, because the 84th section of the Act of 1894 provides that: [His Lordship then read the section.] It is said, we have here the tonnage certificate of this ship measured in France under the Order in Council of the 5th May 1873, by which Her Majesty directed that the ships of France, the certificates of French nationality and registry of which are dated on or after the 1st June 1873, shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in the said certificates of French nationality and registry; and the 745th section (1) (a) of the Act of 1894 provides that: [His Lordship then read the section.] So it was contended that by virtue of the 84th section of the Act of 1894 and the Order in Council, the tonnage certificate of this ship, which was granted on the 27th Feb. 1896, and therefore long after the date mentioned in the Order in Council, was adequate for the purpose of this limitation suit. It was objected that at any rate that certificate did not show compliance with the 81st section of the Act of 1894 with regard to the space in the water ballast tanks. As I understood from the last argument, counsel for the owners of the Morocco was quite satisfied that the present case should go through on the certificate produced, if there was sufficient evidence to show, as a matter of fact, that the water ballast spaces were not available for cargo. Accordingly, affidavits have been made to show that the water ballast tanks in this ship were not and cannot be used for the carriage of cargo of any kind, and the question is whether the court will act upon the certificate obtained in France and produced here, coupled with these affidavits. The case of The Zanzibar (ubi sup.) was referred to, and I think it is tolerably clear that the learned President in that case was of opinion, dealing as he was with the sections of the Acts of 1854, 1862, and 1889, that the words of the Act of 1854 would never have allowed the measurement of these water ballast tanks to be included in the gross tonnage. But he said that at any rate in that case the Act of 1889 had made the point quite clear, and that the space was to be excluded in accordance with one or other of the Acts. Now, all that he had before him appears to have been a copy of the register, fortified by affidavits. So he had nothing to show that the 5th section of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act 1889 had been complied with by obtaining the certificate of a surveyor appointed by the Board of Trade. It seems to have been taken for granted that when the certificate of a British ship was put in, showing the gross tonnage, that gross tonnage would be taken as practically certified, and that all that was necessary to be dealt with in arriving at it had been dealt with by proper certificates. No point seems to have been taken that there was no certificate specially brought before the court. So it seems to me that in an ordinary limitation suit where the certificate of registry is put in and supported by affidavit, the gross tonnage will be taken in the ordinary way, and the limitation amount calculated upon that certificate without the necessity of adducing at the hearing the certificate of a surveyor under sect. 81 of the Act of 1894. So that for two reasons, apparently, one may say that there ought to be no difficulty in dealing with a British ship. First, because by the construction of the measurement sections and schedules the water ballast tanks ought never to have been included at all, as the learned President indicates—though there is possibly a difficulty about that because of the words in the second schedule, “subject, however, to the provisions of this Act in the case of a ship constructed with a double bottom for water ballast.” But if that be not correct, there is the prima facie evidence of the certificate, showing the tonnage, and the inference that what has been necessary to show that tonnage properly has been complied with. Then we come to the case of a foreign ship and the application of sect. 84 of the Act of 1894. Here, again, we get a denotation of the gross tonnage—the amount I have already referred to; and I see no reason why I should not hold that that may be treated, for the purpose of limitation proceedings, just in the same way as the denotation of tonnage in the certificate of registry of British ships. The result will be the usual decree of limitation of liability. Pending actions will be stayed upon payment being made into court in the usual way, and upon security for the costs of the defendants to the limitation suit and for the costs of the cargo-owners of the Morocco being given to the satisfaction of the registrar. I am asked to limit the time for advertisements, and I think two months will be adequate. The plaintiffs must pay all the costs of the limitation suit.

sum of 300*l.* against the Société de Navigation du Sud-Ouest of Bordeaux.

By two contracts dated the 15th Dec. 1902 and the 16th Jan. 1903, and made between the plaintiffs and R. W. Leyland and Co., as agents for the defendants, the plaintiffs agreed to tow the defendants' two sailing ships Madeleine and André Théodore from Havre to Antwerp, and thence to a position abreast of Falmouth for 150*l.* respectively. The plaintiffs duly carried out the contract, and rendered accounts to the defendants; but these were not paid. The defendants carried on business at Bordeaux, and on the 15th Oct. 1903 the plaintiffs applied to Bucknill, J. in chambers, and obtained leave to serve notice of an intended writ out of the jurisdiction, and the learned judge fixed the time for appearance to be within twelve days of the service of the writ. On the 16th Oct. a specially indorsed writ was issued, and notice of it was duly served on the defendants on the 19th Oct. The defendants did not appear, and the time for appearance having elapsed, the plaintiffs applied in the Admiralty Registry to enter judgment under Order XIII., r. 3, for the amount claimed. The registrar, however, refused to do so on the ground that no book was kept in the Admiralty registry in which judgment could be signed in the ordinary course, as in other divisions. The plaintiffs therefore moved the court for judgment.

Order XIII., r. 3, of the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883 is as follows:

Where the writ of summons is indorsed for a liquidated demand, whether specially or otherwise, and the defendant fails, or all the defendants, if more than one, fail to appear thereto, the plaintiff may enter final judgment for any sum not exceeding the sum indorsed on the writ, together with interest at the rate specified (if any) or (if no rate be specified) at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum to the date of the judgment, and costs.

Nelson for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted we are entitled to enter judgment under Order XIII., r. 3. A doubt has been expressed as to what is the practice of the Admiralty Court in actions in personam on p. 334, note (n), of the third edition of Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice. Two cases—The County of Salop and The County of York (Adm. Div., May 14, 1889)—are there cited. Neither of these cases are reported; but from the report it appears that they were two actions of co-ownership in personam to which the defendants did not appear, and the court refused to grant the plaintiffs' application to enter judgment, and intimated judgments would not be given in such actions unless the statements of claim were supported by evidence. In The Hulda (58 L. T. Rep 29; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 244), however, the plaintiff in a default action in rem for necessaries, where the writ, though not specially indorsed, contained particulars of the claim, was allowed to enter judgment.

BARNES, J.—It seems to me a book ought to be kept in the registry. I cannot see why the expense of coming into court should be necessary. I think Order XIII., r. 3, applies to this case. There will be judgment for the plaintiffs for 300*l.* and costs.

THE SUNLIGHT. (a)

Collision—River Mersey—Vessel coming out of dock—Duty to keep out of the way—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 19.

A steamship coming out of Prince's Dock into the river Mersey came into collision with another steamship coming down the east side of the river in tow of two tugs.

Held, that art. 19 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea did not apply, and that there was no duty under the article on the down-coming vessel to keep out of the way of the vessel leaving the dock.

Observations on the powers of a dockmaster in the Mersey.

ACTIONS for damage by collision brought by the owners of the steamship Maiorese against the owners of the steamship Sunlight, and for negligence by the owners of the Sunlight against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

About 11.15 p.m. on the 22nd Sept. 1903 a collision occurred in the river Mersey, off the north end of the Liverpool landing-stage, between the steamships Maiorese and the Sunlight.

The Maiorese was a screw steamship of 1739 tons gross register, and at the time was being moved from the Herculaneum Graving Dock to her loading berth at the Wellington Dock in charge of the two tugs Stormcock and Fighting Cock, she herself having no steam.

The Sunlight was a screw steamship of 388 tons gross register, and at the time had just left Prince's Dock, being about to proceed on a voyage from Liverpool to Swansea with a general cargo.

The weather was fine and clear, the wind moderate from the S.E., and the tide flood of the force of four to five knots an hour.

The plaintiffs' case in the collision action was that the Maiorese was proceeding down the river, keeping well to the eastward of mid-channel, and making about three to four knots over the ground, and that her tugs at intervals, as they passed the entrances to the various docks, were sounding their whistles. The regulation lights were being duly exhibited, and the Maiorese was in charge of a duly qualified pilot.

Under these circumstances, when the Maiorese was about off the north end of the stage, and about 300 to 400 yards from it, the masthead light of a steamship, which proved to be the Sunlight, was seen in the Prince's Half Tide Dock entrance.

The Sunlight was immediately afterwards heard to blow a long blast, and rapidly came out from the entrance, showing her masthead and red lights and heading about west.

As soon as the masthead light was seen, both tugs were ordered to stop their engines, and the helm of the Maiorese was put hard-a-port, but the Sunlight came on, and, although the hawsers of the tugs were slipped, she struck the starboard side of the Stormcock with her stem, and then cleared her and struck the stem of the Maiorese with her port side.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants (inter alia) with failing to give proper and sufficient notice of their intention of coming out of the dock, and with failing to keep clear of the Maiorese and her tugs. They also charged them with breach of art. 29 of the Collision Regulations.

The defendants' case was that between 10 and 11 p.m. the Sunlight was being undocked under the direction and control of the servants of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and was brought from her berth in the Trafalgar Dock to the entrance to Prince's Dock, where she was directed to wait. She was shortly afterwards ordered by the dock officials to let go and come ahead so as to proceed into the river. The ropes were thereupon let go, and a long warning blast was sounded on her whistle, and she proceeded out at full speed under a hard-a-port helm. As she cleared the entrance the towing lights and green lights of the two tugs that were towing the Maiorese were seen broad off on the port bow, and about 200 to 250 yards off. As she was unable to do anything to avoid a collision, the Sunlight kept her course and speed, blowing a short blast to indicate how her helm was, but the tug Stormcock and the Maiorese, instead of keeping clear of her, collided with her.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with neglecting to keep clear, not stopping and reversing, with improperly attempting to cross ahead of the Sunlight, and with navigating too close to the dock entrances. They also charged them with breach of arts. 19, 22, and 23 of the regulations, and counter-claimed for the damages suffered by their own vessel.

Arts. 19, 22, and 23 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea are as follows :

Art. 19. When two steam vessels are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, the vessel which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Art. 22. Every vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, if the circumstances of the case admit, avoid crossing ahead of the other.

Art. 23. Every steam vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, on approaching her, if necessary, slacken her speed or stop or reverse.

By the statement of claim in the action against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board it was alleged that those on board the Sunlight were bound to and did obey the orders of the dock officials, that they had been under their orders throughout the operation of undocking, and that the collision was caused by the negligence of the officials in ordering her to proceed out into the river when they knew, or ought to have known, that it was not safe for her to do so.

The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board denied that the Sunlight, at the time in question, was acting under the orders of the dock officials or other of their servants, and pleaded that if any such orders as alleged were given, they were not within the scope of the authority of their servants. They also alleged that if it was not safe for the Sunlight to proceed out into the river, those on board of her were guilty of negligence which caused or contributed to the collision by casting off and proceeding out, although warned by the dockmaster to look out or the Maiorese and her tugs, and by failing to take any, or timely, or sufficient steps to avoid the collision.

Sect. 49 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidated Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 92) is as follows :

Any harbour-master, deckmaster, or piermaster may direct the time and manner of any vessel coming into or going out of any dock, and also the time of opening or shutting the dock gates ; and if the master of any vessel shall act contrary to the directions or neglect to obey the orders of such harbour-master, dockmaster, or piermaster, in relation to the manner of coming into or going out of such dock, or shall obstruct or hinder him in the opening or shutting of any dock gate, such master shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty of not exceeding twenty pounds.

By sect. 53 power is also given to the harbour-master to remove vessels from the entrances to the dock.

Pickford, K.C. and Glynn for the plaintiffs.

Laing, K.C. and Bateson for the owners of the Sunlight.—It was the duty of the Maiorese and her tugs to keep out of the way of the Sunlight. She was on their starboard hand, and art. 19 applied.

Aspinall, K.C. and Maurice Hill for the defendants the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

Dec. 10.—BUCKNILL, J.—On the 22nd Sept., between eleven and twelve o'clock at night, a collision occurred in the river Mersey between the steamships Maiorese and Sunlight. An action was commenced on the 27th Sept. by the owners of the Maiorese against the Sunlight, and on the 28th Sept. an action was begun by the owners of the Sunlight against the Maiorese. Those actions were consolidated. On the 20th Oct. a statement of claim was delivered by the owners of the Maiorese, and on the 27th Oct. a defence and counter-claim were put in by the owners of the Sunlight. On the same day a letter was written by the solicitors for the owners of the Sunlight to the solicitor for the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, drawing attention to the fact that it was alleged that improper orders had been given by the dock board's officials to those on board the Sunlight to proceed into the river, and asking what course the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board proposed to take in the matter. That was answered the next day by the solicitor to the harbour board denying liability. On the same day that that letter was received the owners of the Sunlight commenced an action against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. The case of the Maiorese is that she was being moved by two tugs, the Stormcock and the Fighting Cock, from the Herculeanum Graving Dock to her loading berth at the Wellington Dock. The tugs were on either bow, the Maiorese herself having no steam up, and the tide was flood of the force of about five knots. The pleaded case is that the Maiorese was being towed down well to the eastward of mid-stream, making about three to four knots over the ground. Then the pleadings allege that when the Maiorese, in charge of a compulsory pilot, was about off the north end of the Liverpool landing stage, about 300 to 400 yards off it, the masthead light of the Sunlight was seen in the Prince's Half Tide Dock entrance ; that then a long blast was heard from the Sunlight, whose red light was seen, and which rapidly came out from the dock entrance, heading about west, that the tugs of the Maiorese were told to stop, and they did so and cast off, but a collision took place between the Sunlight and the Stormcock, and then the port side of the Sunlight, about in the way of the engine-room, was struck by the stem of the Maiorese, which penetrated so far into her as to leave her in a condition in which she might soon have sunk had she not been towed ashore. The defence set up by the owners of the Sunlight is that the Sunlight was in the entrance to the Prince's Dock, having been stopped there by the dock officials; that she was ordered by the dock officials to let go and come ahead; that she thereupon blew a long blast, and under a hard-a-port helm proceeded out into the river at full speed; that as soon as she cleared the entrance the towing and green lights of the tugs towing the Maiorese were seen broad off on the port bow, and about 200 to 250 yards distant; that the Sunlight kept her course and speed, blowing a short blast to indicate how her helm was, and the collision took place. In the defence the charges made against the owners of the Maiorese are that the Maiorese and her tugs neglected to keep clear of the Sunlight, and also to slacken their speed or to cast off the tow ropes or stop or reverse their engines. Then it is charged that the Maiorese and her tugs neglected to avoid crossing ahead of the Sunlight, and negligently navigated too close in to the dock entrances. It is further said that if the Sunlight came out of dock improperly, it was in obedience to the orders of the dock officials, whose orders those on the Sunlight were bound to obey. Now, as to the claim by the owners of the Sunlight against the docks and harbour board. The statement of claim alleges that the Sunlight was stopped by the authorities in the place where we know she was lying; that throughout the operation of undocking she was acting under the orders of the dock officials, which orders those on the Sunlight were, pursuant to the Mersey Dock Act, bound to obey; and that the collision was caused by the negligence of the dock officials in ordering the Sunlight to proceed out into the river at a time when they knew, or ought to have known, that it was not safe for her to do so. That is denied by the docks and harbour board in their defence.

The first question I have to decide is, Where in fact did this collision take place in regard to mid-channel? The river off the landing-stage may be said, roughly, to be 1100 to 1200 yards wide, and on the part of the Maiorese it is said that she was proceeding down the river—that is to say, to the northward—in tow of these two tugs, which were ahead of her, about 300 yards off the eastern shore, or off the stage. I find as a fact that this vessel was going down with her tugs, I will not say exactly 350 to 400 yards, but very much further off the stage than the witnesses of the Sunlight allege they were. If I may put it roughly, I should say they were going down about one-third of the width of the river off, perhaps a little less, from the stage—that is to say, I believe the story told by the Maiorese. It is also probable that the hopper went down about ahead of the Maiorese, or, putting it in another way, the Maiorese went down in the wake of the hopper, which was said to have been 300 yards off the landing-stage, and that has not been denied.

But there is a stronger point than that which leads me to this conclusion, and that is that the hopper had rounded and gone down inside the Maiorese and then got ahead of her. All this shows that there was much more room than the Sunlight alleges between the Maiorese and the landing-stage. The second question is, Where was the collision with regard to the bearing of the dock gates? Now, the dock gates are not in a line with the landing-stage, because at the northernmost part of the landing-stage the jetty runs N.E., and inside the line of the landing-stage and not quite N.E. of this line are the so-called two islands at the entrance to the Prince's Half Tide Dock. I am satisfied on the evidence that the collision took place about off the north end of the landing-stage, and a little northerly of that—that is to say, if a line is drawn from the jetty about one-third of its way up and taken about west, that would be about the place where the collision happened. The third question is this: Could those on the Sunlight have seen the lights of the tugs or tow whilst the Sunlight was still in the half-tide gateway? This has been a very important question to decide—one not free from difficulty, and one upon which a great deal depends. The matter stands in this way: The Sunlight, which is 194ft. long or thereabouts, had been stopped by the dockmaster in what I may call the first position—that is to say, she would be further in, or further from the river, than in the second position. Could those on the Sunlight—that is, anybody in authority at the moment for the purpose of looking out—the master on the bridge, or the look-out man forward—have seen in the first position the lights either of the tugs or one of them, or of the tow, or the lights of all three? If either the master on the bridge or the man forward could have seen the towing lights of one of the tugs, or the side-lights of one of the tugs, or the starboard side-light of the Maiorese, that would be quite enough, because he would be able to see there were moving lights in the river coming towards the north. In spite of what has been said by the dockmaster, who was not sure whether in the first position the look-out man on the fore-castle head, or the master on the bridge, could have seen these lights, I am of opinion that one of them could have seen them; in other words, I find that in position No. 1 all the lights of the tugs and tow would not be concealed from both the look-out man forward and the master on the bridge. They might be concealed from one, but they would be open to the other, and it must be remembered that the lights on the jetty, &c., which have been referred to, would be stationary, and these lights of the tugs and tow were all moving; and it is clearly the duty of the master or the look-out man of a vessel which is in dock and about to go out into the river to watch for moving lights. But that does not conclude the case at all, because there is the position No. 2 of the Sunlight, when the Sunlight had come more towards the river, but not into it, with her starboard check-rope made fast to the third or fourth bollard, and there was a moment when that rope led aft. If the Sunlight is put into that position and is stationary, with her engines still at rest, I am satisfied beyond all doubt that then the look-out man on the Sunlight must have seen, if he had looked, the lights of the tugs, or, at all events, of the Stormcock, and, I believe, the starboard light of the Maiorese. He saw nothing. I find as a fact they could have been seen. They were seen by others. The dockmaster says he saw them himself, but he is not quite certain of the position in which he was when he saw them, and therefore I do not place much weight upon his evidence on that point. But I find as a fact that the man who was placed on the corner of the knuckle to the northward of the dock entrance did see, and did report, not only the lights of the hopper, but the lights of the vessels which were coming down astern of her. The master of the Sunlight said that if the down-coming ship, the Maiorese, and her tugs were where it is alleged by the plaintiffs they were—that is to say, not 150 yards, but between 300 and 400 yards off the landing-stage—those on the Sunlight ought to have seen them. Finding, as I do, that these vessels coming down were from 300 to 350 yards off, and that their lights were reported by the look-out man on the knuckle, I have come to the conclusion of fact that those on board the Sunlight could have seen the lights of the down-coming ship. It does not follow that they did not see them, though they said they did not. The next question is, Could the Sunlight have avoided the collision after she was in the river? This is a question with regard to which I rely upon the judgment of those who sit here to assist me on nautical matters. I have asked the Elder Brethren this question, Could the Sunlight, by the exercise of reasonable care and skill, have avoided this collision? I am advised by them, and I have no doubt of it myself, that by the exercise of reasonable skill the Sunlight might have avoided the collision after she got into the river. There was, in my opinion, and I am so advised, ample room and opportunity for the collision to have been avoided if, instead of keeping on full speed ahead under hard-a-port helm, the engines had been stopped and reversed, and the helm not kept hard-a-port, but eased off, so that she would have been then drifting up, broadside, to the southward. There would have been plenty of room between her and the down-coming ships. I am also advised that she might have done something else. After she came out into the river her head was N.W. by W., and when she struck the Stormcock her head was W. by S., so that she had altered four points. If, instead of keeping on under hard-a-port helm, she had hard-a-starboarded her helm and had altered two or three points, she would have been able to have gone, the tide being with her, up river to the southward, and in all probability clear of the Maiorese and her tugs. But I am not so firm on this point as I am on the first. I am advised that there were two ways in which the collision could have been avoided; but I prefer to put my judgment upon the first. Not taking such steps was negligence on the part of the master of the Sunlight, who in all probability thought that the starboard-side rule applied, and that he was justified in keeping on full speed ahead under hard-a-port helm, and that it was the duty of the other vessel to keep out of his way. I do not consider that art. 19—that is, the starboard-side rule—applied. I find that the Sunlight was negligently navigated, and had a bad look-out, which contributed to the collision. But did it not cause it entirely? I am of opinion that it did. It is alleged in the pleadings that the Maiorese might have done something to avoid the collision, but I find as a fact that she could not have done anything more than was done. Those in charge of the Maiorese ordered the tugs to stop, and they did stop as soon as they saw this other vessel coming down.

The next question I have to determine is whether the excuse pleaded by the Sunlight is good in law or in fact. The owners of the Sunlight, having made the dock board defendants to the action brought by them, allege that if the navigation of the Sunlight was negligent it was the fault of the dockmaster in ordering the vessel out into the river at a time when he ought not to have done so. That is a mixed question of fact and law. I have no doubt that the dockmaster had, under the Act of Parliament, power to order a ship, which has paid her dues and is ready to go, to leave the premises of the dock board. But, though that is the legal position, looking at it generally, one must apply the facts in each particular case. First of all, as a fact, did he order the Sunlight out? I am satisfied that the dockmaster did not order the vessel out, or say anything which amounted to an order. I find that, in fact, no order was given by the dockmaster to the Sunlight to go out, and that the master of the vessel went out at his own risk, and navigated his own ship out—not against the order of the dockmaster, the dockmaster could not stop him; but he cast off his own rope, by his own men, who were there for the purpose, by his order; and I find as a fact that the dockmaster did point out to him and warn him of the lights of the down-coming ship. The probable solution of this case is that the master of the Sunlight wanted to get to sea and miscalculated the strength of the tide, and, having cleared the hopper, satisfied himself that he could clear the other vessel too, and so ran the risk. The result must be that the Sunlight as against the Maiorese is solely to blame, and that the owners of the Sunlight must lose their case against the dock board because they have not made good the allegations contained in their statement of claim.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Monday, Jan. 25, 1904.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., COLLINS, M.R., and ROMER, L.J.)

BORTHWICK v. ELDERSLIE STEAMSHIP COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bill of lading — Construction — Exceptions — Damage to goods — Unseaworthiness — Liability of shipowner.

Frozen meat was shipped on a steamer under a bill of lading, which contained two clauses relating to exceptions. The first clause, printed in Roman type, provided: "Neither the ship nor her owners shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under this bill of lading, nor for any loss or damage thereto whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any cause whatsoever, whether existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not." The second clause, printed in small italics, provided: "The act of God . . . and loss or damage resulting therefrom or from any of the following causes or perils are excepted—viz. . . . or from any accidents to or defects, latent or otherwise, in hull . . . or otherwise (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded or the commencement of the voyage) . . . if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness."

The vessel, being tainted with carbolic acid, was not in a fit condition to carry the meat when it was shipped, and the meat was thereby damaged during the voyage. If reasonable care had been taken to cleanse the ship before the meat was shipped the damage would not have occurred.

Held (reversing the judgment of Walton, J.), that, reading the two clauses together, the shipowner was not exempted from liability for damage caused by the unfit condition of the vessel.

APPEAL of the plaintiff from the judgment of Walton, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendants damages for breach of contract and of duty in and about the carriage of frozen meat by sea.

The meat was shipped on the defendants' steamship Nairnshire at Melbourne, Australia, to be delivered at London, under several bills of lading, all in the same form, by which it was acknowledged that the meat had been shipped in good order and condition.

The plaintiff was the indorsee of the bills of lading.

The Nairnshire was fitted with refrigerating chambers for the purpose of carrying frozen meat. Before the voyage in question she had made two voyages with cargoes of horses. For the purpose of cleansing the vessel whilst she was carrying the horses, and in order to disinfect her for the purpose of carrying frozen meat, a quantity of carbolic acid was used.

The bills of lading were headed "Refrigerating Bill of Lading," and contained two clauses relating to exceptions.

The first clause was printed in Roman type and was as follows:

Neither the steamer nor her owners nor her charterers shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under this bill of lading nor for any loss or damage thereto, whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not, nor for detention; nor for the consequences of any act, neglect, default, or error of judgment of the masters, officers, engineers, refrigerating engineers, crew, or other persons in the service of the owners or charterers, nor from any other cause whatsoever, and steamer shall be at liberty to jettison the whole of the goods, or any part thereof, considered necessary on account of decomposition or otherwise.

The second clause was printed in small italics and was as follows:

The act of God, the King's enemies, pirates, robbers or thieves on land or sea (but not pilferage), arrests or restraints of princes, rulers, or people, riots, strikes, lock-outs, or other labour disturbances, or delay or hindrance caused directly or indirectly thereby and loss or damage resulting therefrom or from any of the following causes or perils are excepted—viz., insufficiency in packing or in strength of packages, loss or damage from coaling on the voyage, rust, vermin, breakage, leakage, drainage, sweating, evaporation, or decay, resulting from bad stowage or otherwise, or from the breakage or flow of or from contact with the urine, manure water, or drainage from horses, cattle, sheep, or other animals carried on the said ship or from their stalls, however caused, or otherwise howsoever; injurious effects of other goods, whether arising from bad stowage or otherwise; effects of climate, insufficiency of ventilation, or temperature of holds; risk of craft, of transshipment, and of storage afloat or on shore; fire on board, in bulk, in craft, or on shore; rain, hail, snow, frost, or ice; explosion, barratry, jettison; collision, whether with another ship or any other obstacle; stranding, lying upon, or touching the ground; perils of the seas, rivers, or navigation of whatever nature or kind, or howsoever caused; whether or not any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom, be occasioned by or arise from any act or omission, negligence, default or error in judgment of the master, pilot, officers, mariners, engineers, crew, stevedores, ship's husband or managers, or other persons whomsoever in the service of the owners or charterers; whether on board the said ship or on shore, or on board any other ship belonging to or chartered by them, or for whose acts they would otherwise be liable whether such act, omission, negligence, default, or error in judgment shall have occurred before or after the commencement of or during the voyage, or any other causes beyond the control of the owners or charterers or by or from any accidents to or defects latent or otherwise in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, refrigeration, or otherwise, [or their appurtenances (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded, or the commencement of the voyage), or insufficiency of coals at the commencement or any stage of the voyage, if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness.

The plaintiff contended that the clause in Roman type must be read with and be limited by the clause in small type, and that the defendants were not protected from liability because reasonable means had not been taken to provide against unseaworthiness.

The defendants contended that the clause printed in Roman type protected them from any liability for the damage to the meat caused by the vessel being tainted with carbolic acid, and that it was not limited by the clause in small type.

The action was tried before Walton, J. without a jury.

March 9, 1903.—WALTON, J.—This is an action in which the plaintiff asks for a declaration that he is entitled to recover damages in respect of damage to a certain cargo of frozen meat which was shipped under bills of lading which are dated in Dec. 1901, and of which the plaintiff is indorsee, and he alleges the property in the goods passed to him by the indorsement. The case raises a question of construction of the bill of lading and a question of fact, and although my decision in this case will not depend upon my findings of fact, it will, no doubt, be convenient, as I have heard the evidence, to state what conclusion I have arrived at upon the question of fact. The cargo was shipped on the defendants' steamer called the Nairnshire at Melbourne, and was, as I have said, a shipment—not a full cargo—of frozen mutton. On the two voyages preceding the voyage in question upon which the mutton was carried, the Nairnshire had carried horses for the Government to South Africa, one voyage, I think, from Fiume to South Africa, and the second voyage from Australia to South Africa. On those voyages the horses were carried in different parts of the ship; but, amongst other parts, in the 'tween decks. For the purpose of those voyages a quantity of carbolic acid had been shipped before the commencement of the first of the voyages. The quantity was admitted—there were eighty five-gallon drums shipped, and of those drums a considerable quantity was made use of. After completing the second voyage with the horses the vessel went to Australia, and got orders on arrival in Australia to load frozen meat at various Australian ports. At Sydney the holds and the 'tween decks were cleaned out, and for this purpose a quantity of carbolic acid and chloride of lime was used to sweeten or disinfect the bilges. At any rate it is admitted by the defendants that it was used to an extent for that purpose. On the two voyages with horses it is also admitted by the defendants that carbolic acid to some extent—to what extent we do not know—had been used for the purpose of sweetening or disinfecting the stalls or spaces which were occupied by the horses, and, as I have said, horses were carried in the 'tween decks. The vessel was cleaned out at Sydney and then proceeded to other ports in Australia before going to Melbourne, where the frozen meat, the damage to which is in question in this case, was shipped. At Townsville, which was one of the ports at which the vessel called, all the carbolic acid that was left on board the vessel was landed with an exception—two or three drums (I think three) were kept on board by the chief engineer for the purpose of sweetening the engine-room. These three drums were kept during the voyage in question—that is the voyage home with frozen meat—in the engine-room, and I think it is reasonably clear, and I do not think it is disputed, that those drums had nothing to do with the damage which it was afterwards found the frozen meat had sustained. More than twenty drums of carbolic acid had been used for one purpose or another in the course of the two voyages with horses, or in cleansing and disinfecting the ship at Sydney before the frozen meat was shipped. With the exception of the three drums in the engine-room and what was actually in the ship, that is what remained in the bilges or wherever else the carbolic acid may have been used, no carbolic acid was left on board the vessel. The vessel proceeded to Melbourne, and at Melbourne the frozen meat in question was shipped. With that frozen meat and other cargo the vessel made her voyage from Australia to this country, calling at the Cape, and at Durban, and at Cape Town discharged a quantity of cargo. I do not think it is necessary for me upon this question of fact to go very much further into the details. I have considered the evidence which I have heard and I have considered all that was said on both sides upon this question, and it seems to me that there is nothing to show that any kind of accident occurred during the voyage to cause the frozen meat to become tainted by the smell of carbolic acid. I am satisfied that if the frozen meat was tainted by the smell of carbolic acid it must have arisen from a taint in the ship or from carbolic acid in the ship at the time the ship sailed from Melbourne. I know there are some difficult things to explain; I do not need to dwell upon them; I have not forgotten them, but it is sufficient for me to say that I have arrived at the conclusion that nothing happened in the course of the voyage, independently of the condition of the ship at the commencement of the voyage, to cause a taint to the frozen meat, or to cause the damage which is complained of in this action. The vessel arrived, and I find as a fact that the meat in question on arrival was found to be tainted with the smell of carbolic acid and was damaged. I have not to say anything as to the amount of damage, but I find as a fact that the meat was damaged by having become tainted during the voyage with the smell of carbolic acid. I find, as I have said already, that that arose from the condition of the ship at the commencement of the voyage, and I further find that if proper care, skill, and attention had been paid to the cleansing and preparation of the ship before she started on her voyage from Melbourne, the damage would not have occurred. I think that sufficiently disposes of the questions of fact, and expresses the conclusions at which I have arrived upon the material questions so far as they are questions of fact.

As I have said, there is another question, and that is a question of construction of the bill of lading under which the frozen meat in question was shipped. It is a bill of lading which is headed "Refrigerator Bill of Lading," and it contains two clauses which may be called exception clauses—one of them is in larger print, and the other in smaller print. I do not attach much importance to the difference of type. I will only say this, that the clause which is in larger print, and is more legible, is not of the less importance at any rate on that account. But I deal with the clauses themselves. The clause in the larger type is a very far-reaching clause. It contains exceptions of the widest possible kind, and it seems to me to be perfectly plain and easy to understand. It says this: "Neither the steamer nor her owners nor her charterers shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under this bill of lading, nor for any loss or damage thereto, whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not, nor for detention; nor for the consequences of any act, neglect, default, or error of judgment of the master, officers, engineers, refrigerating engineers, crew, or other persons in the service of the owners or charterers, nor from any other cause whatsoever, and steamer shall be at liberty to jettison the whole of the goods, or any part thereof, if considered necessary on account of decomposition or otherwise." Applying that to the present case, the damage here arose from a defect; that is to say, a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage, the defect being the taint in the ship—the fact that the ship was impregnated with the smell of carbolic acid, or was carrying carbolic acid in such a way as to taint the cargo and, therefore, I think the damage comes clearly within the words of this clause in the larger type. It was damage to the cargo arising, not from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, but certainly within the words, "or from any other cause whatsoever," and it arose from a defect which existed at the commencement of the voyage, or at the time of shipment of the goods. It was the consequence of a neglect or default on the part of the crew, notwithstanding that it was a defect arising at the commencement of the voyage. And, the defect arising from the neglect or fault of the crew, it seems that if this clause in the larger type stood alone it would be perfectly plain that the shipowners had in unambiguous language protected themselves from liability arising from such defect. But now it is said that the clause in the larger type must be read together with the clause in the smaller type, and that the effect of reading the two clauses together is to qualify and cut down the extent and effect of the first clause, which is the clause in the larger type. Coming to the clause in the smaller type, in the first place, reading it through, one is struck with this—that it refers to a great many things, possible causes of damage and matters which do not seem at any rate very appropriate to a bill of lading for the carriage of carcasses of mutton. It is a very long clause; it is very much more verbose than the clause in large type. It contains a longer enumeration of excepted perils in detail, and then that enumeration of excepted perils—which I need not read, and which is very long—is followed by these words: "Whether or not any of the perils, causes or things above mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom be occasioned by or arise from any act or omission, negligence, default, or error in judgment of the master, pilot, officers, mariners, engineers, crew, stevedores, ship's husband or managers, or other persons whomsoever in the service of the owners or charterers, whether on board the said ship, or on shore, or on board any other ship," and so on. I just stop to observe that in this long clause in the smaller type the negligence clause, to begin with, is much more limited than the negligence clause in the larger type, because the negligence clause in the smaller type is a negligence clause which is limited to the negligence of the persons in the employment of the ship bringing about any of the enumerated perils which are enumerated separately and particularly; whereas the negligence clause in the larger type is a perfectly general one, applying to loss arising in consequence of any negligence of persons in the employment of the shipowner. Returning to the clause in the small type, after the negligence clause, which is limited in the way I have mentioned, there come certain general words which add something to the perils which have been enumerated in detail, and they are these: "Or any other causes beyond the control of the owners or charterers." I may say in passing I cannot find that the negligence clause in the small type refers to these other causes; it seems to refer only to perils which are enumerated in detail. I only point that out as going to show that the negligence clause in small type is more limited than the negligence clause in the larger type. With regard to these general words, I may point out that in the small type the general words which sweep in other causes are these: "Any other causes beyond the control of the owners or charterers." In the clause in the larger type the general words are not so limited at all, but they are: "Loss arising from any other cause whatsoever." Then comes the clause with regard to the seaworthiness, in the small type: "Or by or from any accidents to or defects, latent or otherwise, in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, refrigeration or otherwise, or their appurtenances (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded, or the commencement of the voyage) or insufficiency of coals at the commencement, or any stage of the voyage, if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness." So that the exception with regard to seaworthiness in the small type is no doubt qualified in that way—that is to say, the shipowner is not to be liable for defects or other losses arising from defects existing at the commencement of the voyage if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness. So it is obvious that the clause in small type, although, as I have said, much longer, is in reality very much narrower and much more limited than the clause in the larger type. The question is whether I am to restrain the plain sense of the first clause, the more general one, by reading with it the longer clause in small type—whether I am to say that the wider clause is to be cut down by the narrower clause, or whether I am to say that the narrower clause is to be extended by the more extended clause. It seems to me the plain common sense is that the clause in the larger type has been put in for the express purpose of giving a wider scope to the narrower clause in the small type. It seems to me a most unnatural reading of this bill of lading to say that the clause in large type is cut down by the clause in the smaller type—I am not saying on account of the size of the type, but for the reasons which seem to me fairly obvious. The shipowner has had his doubts about this very long and somewhat complicated clause in small type, and to make the matter clear he has inserted a perfectly plain, intelligible, but very far-reaching clause, which is the clause in the larger type, and I think that must prevail. That being so, as the loss does fall within the exception expressed in the clause in the larger type, which I think is the governing clause, I think the shipowners are exempt from liability in this case, and therefore there must be judgment for the defendants.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Loehnis for the appellant.—The decision of the learned judge, that the defendants were protected from liability by the provisions of the large print clause was wrong. Even if that clause stood alone in the bill of lading, it would not protect the shipowner from liability for this damage. The learned judge has found as a fact that the damage was caused by the unseaworthy condition of the vessel at the time the meat was shipped, and not by any failure or breakdown of the machinery or insulation. The prima facie construction of that clause is that it applies only to something happening during the voyage and that it does not protect the shipowner from liability caused by the ship being unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage. The shipowner is bound to provide a ship which is seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, and this clause does not exempt him from that obligation:

Steel v. State Line Steamship Company, 37 L. T. Rep. 333; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72;

Tattersall v. National Steamship Company, 50 L. T. Rep. 299; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 206; 12 Q. B. Div. 297.

The words “or from any other cause whatsoever” in this clause must be construed as referring to matters ejusdem generis with the specifically enumerated perils—that is, failure or breakdown of machinery, &c.—and not as wide general words intended to include every kind of peril:

Richardsons and Samuel and Co., Re an Arbitration between, 77 L. T. Rep. 479; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 330; (1898) 1 Q. B. 261.

The large print clause and the small print clause must be read together as far as possible, and, when they are so read together, the true construction of the document plainly is that the shipowner is not exempt from liability for damage caused by unseaworthiness unless reasonable means have been taken to provide against unseaworthiness. The learned judge has found as a fact that reasonable means were not taken to provide against unseaworthiness, and therefore the defendants are not protected. The vessel was not in a fit condition to receive and carry a cargo of this kind, and therefore was not seaworthy:

Owners of Cargo on Ship Maori King v. Hughes, 73 L. T. Rep. 141; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; (1895) 2 Q. B. 550.

If a shipowner wishes to except the implied warranty of seaworthiness, he must do so in clear and unambiguous language:

Price and Co. v. Union Lighterage Company, 88 L. T. Rep. 423; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 398; (1903) 1 K. B. 750;

Rathbone Brothers and Co. v. MacIver, Sons, and Co., 89 L. T. Rep. 378; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 467; (1903) 2 K. B. 378.

It cannot be said that, in any view of this bill of lading, the shipowner has clearly protected himself against this liability.

Carver, K.C. and D. C. Leck for the respondents.—The learned judge rightly held that the large print clause was the governing clause, and was not cut down or qualified by the small print clause. The small print clause only limited the liability of the shipowner for unseaworthiness in a qualified manner, and it was a very long clause not too clearly expressed. The shipowner, therefore, inserted the large print clause in order to clearly protect himself by using the widest possible language. The clause containing the lesser protection cannot control or qualify the clause which gives the larger protection. By the large print clause the shipowner is protected from liability for “loss or damage arising from . . . or any other cause whatsoever.” Those words clearly cannot be intended to refer only to matters ejusdem generis with breakdown or failure of machinery. They are clear and unambiguous words, exempting the shipowner from liability for any damage arising from anything existing at the commencement of the voyage. Even if the words of the large print clause are to be construed as referring only to breakdown or failure of machinery, &c., this damage was caused by failure of the insulation, for if the meat had been properly insulated it could not have been tainted.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C.—The learned judge has found that there was no failure or breakdown of the insulation. If there had been, the meat would have become putrid instead of being tainted with carbolic acid.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—With all deference to the weighty opinion of Walton, J. in a case of this kind, I have come to the conclusion that in this case he has overlooked and not given effect to certain broad considerations which must, I think, be borne in mind in construing commercial documents, and, indeed, all documents which have to be considered from a legal and business point of view. In my opinion, it is true in the case of a bill of lading, as in the case of other documents, that where there are a number of clauses they are as far as possible to be read together, as being consistent with one another, and that a clause is not to be treated as being mere surplusage, or as inoperative, unless the language of the document leads to the conclusion that it cannot be read consistently with rest of the document. There is one other general rule of construction to which I think the learned judge did not give sufficient attention, which I will state in the language of Williams, L.J. in his judgment in the case of Rathbone Brothers and Co. v. MacIver, Sons, and Co. (89 L. T. Rep. 378; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 467; (1903) 2 K. B. 378). In that case Williams, L.J. said: “With reference to the carriage of goods by sea, the law implies certain warranties on the part of the shipowner. It puts upon him certain obligations which will always bind him, unless there are in the contract clear and express words which without ambiguity relieve him from that which I may call his common law obligations." I think that Romer, L.J., in that case, was referring to that principle when he said: "Shipowners have been for a long time endeavouring to limit the general liability cast upon them by law as carriers by sea by inserting special exceptions, without going the length of excepting their liability in respect of the warranty of seaworthiness, and they have been, as I understand, from time to time extending the special exceptions. I think, however, I am right in saying that as a principle of construction the warranty of seaworthiness will be held not to have been excepted unless it plainly appears that it was intended to except it. In other words, the court will not readily infer an exception of that warranty." It seems to me that those statements in the judgments in the Court of Appeal lay down in the clearest possible language the principles which were applied in many earlier cases. In the present case I think that the learned judge has not given sufficient effect to the fact that the small print clause undoubtedly deals with unseaworthiness. Mr. Carver has argued that the small print clause leaves the matter of unseaworthiness where it was, except to the extent to which it limits it. In other words, there being a warranty of seaworthiness, the small print clause provides that the shipowner excepts damage caused by or from any "accidents to, or defects, latent or otherwise, in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, refrigeration, or otherwise, or their appurtenances (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded, or the commencement of the voyage), or insufficiency of coals at the commencement or any stage of the voyage, if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness." Therefore I accede to the first part of Mr. Carver's argument, that the small print clause leaves the warranty of seaworthiness where it was except to the extent that it affords further protection to the shipowner by providing that, if reasonable means have been taken to prevent unseaworthiness, the shipowner shall be protected. I am, however, unable to follow the other part of Mr. Carver's argument, that the large print clause, in the construction of which there is undoubtedly considerable difficulty, is intended to be an overriding clause exempting the shipowner from liability for unseaworthiness, whether existing at the commencement of the voyage or not, and that by reason of the words, "from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage, or at the time of the shipment of the goods or not," the shipowner is protected in this case notwithstanding the limited protection given to him by the small print clause. I am unable to come to the conclusion that, construed fairly and with every wish to give the fullest possible effect to the exception, the large print clause further limits the warranty of seaworthiness beyond the limitations contained in the small print clause. I will not repeat the reasons which have been given why the two clauses should as far as possible be read together as being consistent with each other and operative. The large print clause says: "Neither the steamer, nor her owners, nor her charterers shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under the bill of lading, nor for any loss or damage thereto, whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation, or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not, nor for detention." Then, it is very material to observe that the clause proceeds: "Nor for the consequence of any act, neglect, default, or error of judgment of the master officers, engineers, refrigerating engineers, crew, or other persons in the service of the owners or charterers, nor from any other cause whatsoever, and steamer shall be at liberty to jettison the whole of the goods or any part thereof." It is, therefore, quite plain that this clause cannot be considered as having been framed to put in the words, "or from any other cause whatsoever," so as to completely get rid of any liability for unseaworthiness. We find those words, "or from any other cause whatsoever," whether existing at the commencement of the voyage, &c., following the words which relate specially to failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation, or other appliances, and I have no doubt that we ought to read those words, "or from any other cause whatsoever," as relating to the subject-matter there dealt with and not to read them as a general clause exempting the shipowner from the consequences of unseaworthiness. I read this clause, therefore, in this way—that the shipowner is protected from liability from loss or damage arising from failure or breakdown of the machinery, &c., or from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect in the machinery, &c., which existed at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not. I adopt the argument of Mr. Hamilton that those words were intended to widen the exception, which was put in for the purpose of protecting the shipowner, and relates to breakdown of machinery, &c.

That being so, I have now only to deal with the argument for the respondents that, even if that view of the clause ought to be adopted, and they are wrong in their contention that the clause was intended to cover unseaworthiness however occasioned, and whether existing at the commencement of the voyage or not, yet this was a defect of insulation. I think that that point was not really raised in the court below. I cannot think that Walton, J. would have dealt with the case in the way in which he did deal with it if that point had been really raised. I think that this was not a defect or breakdown of machinery, insulation, &c., within the meaning of this clause. The learned judge has found, as I understand, that the ship was tainted with carbolic acid, and was, therefore, unfit to carry a cargo such as frozen meat, independently altogether of the particular chamber in which the meat was being carried, and independently of any function which the insulation, as insulation, had to fulfil. That being so, I think that the facts do not bring this case within the narrower and proper construction of the large print clause; and, inasmuch as that clause cannot be construed as a general exception protecting the shipowner from liability for the consequences of unseaworthiness, I think that, in the words of Williams and Romer, L.J.J., which I have quoted, he has failed to indicate in plain language that the warranty of seaworthiness is cut down to any greater extent than by the small print clause. Therefore, I have come to the conclusion that this appeal must be allowed.

LONDON TRANSPORT COMPANY LIMITED v. TRECHMANN BROTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Freight at per ton shipped payable on right delivery—Lump sum freight—Loss of part of cargo by jettison—Payment by consignees of bill of lading freight—Rights of charterers against shipowners.

By a charter party it was agreed that a ship was to load at Fiume a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, and therewith proceed to Boston and there deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading, on being paid freight at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton gross weight shipped, payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash; charterers' liability to cease when cargo was shipped and bills of lading signed, provided all the conditions called for in the charter had been fulfilled, but vessel to have a lien for freight, dead freight, and demurrage; the master to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight as presented, without prejudice or reference to the charter, any difference between the charter-party and the bills of lading freight to be settled at Fiume on clearance of vessel, if required by master.

The charterers had previously agreed with an American company at Boston to ship by the vessel named in the charter-party, a cargo of sugar in bags from Fiume to Boston at 10s. per ton.

On the vessel being loaded, the difference between the charter-party and the bills of lading freight—i.e., 6d. per ton—was paid, and bills of lading were signed.

In the course of the voyage the vessel went aground and part of the cargo was jettisoned. On the arrival of the vessel the remainder of the cargo was delivered, and the consignees thereupon paid to the shipowners the bill of lading freight payable on the gross weight shipped.

In an action by the charterers against the shipowners to recover so much of the freight paid by the consignees to the ship owners as represented the freight upon the cargo which was not delivered.

Held (by Lord Alverstone, C.J. and Collins, M.R., Romer, L.J. dissenting), that the shipowners were not entitled to a lump sum freight, and that the charterers were entitled to recover the sum claimed.

Judgment of Walton, J. affirmed.

APPEAL by the defendants from the judgment of Walton, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the charterers of the steamship Wilster against the owners to recover a sum of 545l. 8s. 3d., part of the freight paid by the consignees of the cargo under the bill of lading, which the charterers claimed had been collected by the shipowners for the charterers' use.

On the 11th Dec. 1901 the plaintiffs entered into a contract with the American Sugar Refining Company of New York, by which they undertook to ship from 3000 to 3150 tons of sugar in bags, quantity at steamer's option, by the steamship Wilster, "Fiume to Boston, at 10s. per. ton of 1000 kilogrammes gross weight shipped."

On the 16th Jan. 1902 an agreement for the chartering of the steamship Wilster was entered into between the plaintiffs as charterers and the defendants as owners.

A printed form of charter-party was made use of, some of the printed words being struck out, and other words being written in. In the following copy of the material parts of the charter-party, the words within brackets are the printed words that were struck out, and the words that are in italics are those that were put in in writing.

London, 16th Jan. 1902—It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. Trechmann Brothers, of the good steamship called the Wilster of the measurement of 1322 tons, net reg., classed 100 A1. and 30 min. 3150 max. tons deadweight cargo capacity guaranteed now Fiume discharging . . . that the said steamer . . . shall . . . sail and proceed to Fiume . . . and there load . . . a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags [lawful merchandise] in the customary manner [including the usual deck cargo] which the said charterers bind themselves to ship, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, fuel, and furniture [but charterers having the full reach of the holds and spare bunkers, the same as if the steamer was loading for owner's benefit], and being so loaded shall therewith proceed immediately to Boston . . . and there deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading on being paid freight in full of all port charges, wharfages, consular, pilotages, and other charges customarily paid by steamers [for the full reaches and burden of the steamer's hold and every available space, the lump sum of or] at the rate of ten shillings and sixpence per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped [delivered], payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash at the current rate of exchange for sixty days' sight bills on London. [In the event of steamer not carrying the guaranteed dead weight as above, or owners failing to prove to the satisfaction of charterers that the steamer can carry same, owners to be responsible for the consequences thereof, and the above-mentioned lump sum to be reduced in proportion.] If required by master, one-third of freight payable here less 3 per cent. to cover interest and insurance. . . . The ship to be addressed at port of destination to charterers' agents on usual terms paying 2½ per cent. address commission on signing bills of lading. Charterers' liability to cease when cargo is shipped and bills of lading signed, provided all the conditions called for in this charter have been fulfilled, but vessel to have a lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage. The master or person appointed by him shall sign bills of lading, at any rate of freight as presented without prejudice or reference to this charter; and, if required, he is to give charterers' agents in Fiume written authority to sign them for him in accordance with mate's receipts; any difference between this charter-party and bills of lading freight shall be settled at Fiume on clearance of vessel it required by master; if in charterers' favour by captain's draft payable three days after arrival at port of discharge, if in steamer's favour, in cash, less 3 per cent. for all charges. . . .

The bills of lading signed by the plaintiffs' agent contained the words "freight and other conditions as per agreement."

The agreement there referred to was the agreement of the 11th Dec. 1901 between the plaintiffs and the American Sugar Refining Company.

The vessel was loaded at Fiume with a cargo of 31,025 bags of sugar.

Bills of lading were signed, and the difference between the charter-party and the bills of lading freight—viz., 6*d.* per ton—was paid to the shipowners at or about the time when the vessel sailed from Fiume.

When close to Boston the vessel went aground, and there was very considerable difficulty in floating her.

Part of the cargo was jettisoned, and many of the bags of sugar were damaged by water, so that on the arrival of the ship at Boston only 27,743 bags out of the 31,025 that had been shipped were delivered to the consignees; and out of these 27,743 bags 7716 were empty.

The consignees of the sugar, the American Sugar Refining Company, paid to the defendants the whole of the bill of lading freight, that is to say, freight upon the whole cargo shipped at shipping weights, amounting to 155*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*

The plaintiffs alleged that under the charter-party they were not liable to pay full freight upon the whole cargo shipped at shipping weights, but were only liable to pay freight on the cargo actually delivered, and they brought this action to recover from the defendants the sum paid to the defendants by the consignees as freight in respect of the sugar which was not delivered, amounting to 545*l.* 8*s.* 3*d.*

At the trial of the action without a jury the following judgment was delivered:—

WALTON, J. (after stating the facts his Lordship continued):—Now the question of the charterers' liability for freight must, of course, depend upon the terms of the charter-party. The shipowners say to the plaintiffs, the charterers: "We are entitled to the full freight which has been paid because we have just the same rights as you say you have under your bill of lading against the consignees." Under the charter-party the shipowners say: "We are entitled to recover the freight upon the total weight shipped, whether delivered or not, and therefore we are entitled to keep the 155*l.* which we have in fact collected; it is not your freight, it is not a balance of freight over and above what we as shipowners are entitled to; we are entitled to the whole of it; we did not collect it for you the charterers." In support of that contention Mr. Carver referred to a number of cases, the last of which was the case of Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage (29 L. T. Rep. 809; 2 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 51, 185; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 99). The headnote in the Law Reports is this: "By charter-party a ship was to load at Colombo or Cochin from the charterers' agents a full and complete lading and proceed to London and discharge there, fire and other dangers of the sea excepted, a lump sum freight of 5000*l.* to be paid after entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo in cash two months after the date of the ship's report inwards at the Custom House. Part of the cargo loaded in accordance with the charter-party was lost by fire without any default of the master or crew and the remainder was delivered in London. Held, that the shipowner was entitled under the charter-party to the full sum of 5000*l.*" In that case the freight was a lump sum of 5000*l.* indivisible. The cargo was shipped and the whole of it was not delivered. Part of it was lost by fire, and it was there contended that the shipowner was not entitled to the lump sum of 5900*l.*, but only to some part of it. It was held that he was entitled to the full freight. Lord Bramwell, then Baron Bramwell, in giving judgment, said this: "The claim is 'a lump sum freight of 5000*l.* to be paid after entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo in cash two months after the date of the ship's report inwards at the Custom House.' Now, Mr. Williams says that until the ship is discharged and there is a right delivery of the cargo the lump sum is not due. It may possibly be that verbally he is right. If so, what is the meaning of 'the cargo.' In my opinion it is the cargo which she has to deliver. It does not mean the cargo she has shipped but which she is not bound to deliver, which the shipowner is excused from delivering; it means the right delivery of the cargo which is to be delivered, not the right delivery of the cargo which was originally shipped on board of her. Now, there is a cogent argument in favour of this construction. Suppose that 5*l.* worth of these goods had been stolen by the crew, that would not be within the exceptions; then would it have been possible to have said that the whole lump sum was lost? Would not the common rule have applied? The defendants would have had to pay the freight and seek their remedy by a cross action. If that is so, is it not very odd that the shipowner is worse off, because he is not subject to an action than if he had been subject to an action—that is to say, he is worse off because fire has caused the loss than he would have been if it had been owing to a depredation of the crew? I venture to think some interpretation must be put upon the clause to preclude the entire delivery of the whole cargo being a condition precedent." Therefore in that case the court felt that it would be so unreasonable to say the shipowner must lose the whole of his lump sum freight if he failed to deliver any part, however small, of the cargo, that they were driven to put the construction upon the contract that the entire delivery of the whole cargo was not, and could not have been intended to be, a condition precedent. No doubt, then, if this charter-party were a charter-party for a lump sum freight as in that case I should be governed of course by that case, and I have no desire to distinguish it in any way, and should follow it. The question really is whether this charter-party is a charter-party similar to that which the court had to construe in the case of Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage

(ubi sup.). It seems to me that the reasoning upon which that judgment was arrived at depended essentially upon the fact that the freight payable was a lump sum freight in this strict sense, that it was an indivisible freight. I am not at all certain that if in that case the freight had been, not an indivisible lump sum, but a sum to be arrived at at a rate per ton upon the cargo shipped—and the delivery of the cargo intended to be carried and intended to be delivered under the bill of lading was prevented by some of the excepted perils—that the judgment would have been the same, I doubt whether in such a case as that, even though the freight was to be a freight payable upon the weight shipped, and in that sense perhaps a lump sum freight, it would have been regarded as an indivisible freight, and whether the court would have felt itself constrained, as it did in that case, to treat the words which correspond to the words of this charter-party, “payable on right and true delivery of the cargo” as something not amounting to a condition precedent. However, it is necessary to look at the clauses of this particular charter-party and see what is a fair construction of them with regard to the freight payable. I do not know that there are any clauses other than what I have read which really help in coming to a conclusion upon this matter. There is this clause which I have referred to which provides that: “Any difference between this charter-party and bills of lading freight shall be settled at Fiume on clearance of vessel, if required by master.” That does seem to contemplate an adjustment at Fiume. It seems to contemplate that the freight payable under the charter-party is such a freight that at Fiume it would be possible to compare it with the bills of lading freight, and to settle once for all whether there is any difference either one way or the other, and if there is any difference it seems to contemplate that that difference should be paid at Fiume, whether it is in favour of the shipowners or the charterers. That, no doubt, as far as it goes, is rather in favour of the view put forward on behalf of shipowners by Mr. Carver, because if you cannot tell until the cargo is delivered in a case of this kind what the freight payable is going to be, and assuming the bill of lading bears the construction which is put upon it by the charterers, then it would be impossible to adjust the difference of freight at Fiume. I think to that extent, and to that extent only, does that clause throw any light on the matter. At the hearing I was rather inclined to think it might be carried further, but now I do not think it can. I think that the most that can be said about that clause is that it does appear to contemplate that any adjustment or difference of freight can be settled at Fiume. Of course it is to be observed that that clause is subject to this. The difference is to be settled at Fiume on the clearance of the vessel, “if required by master;” and only if required by the master; so that it is not absolute, and one is really thrown back upon the very words of the clause which provided for the payment of freight. That clause provides that the vessel being loaded as required is to proceed to Boston “and there deliver the cargo agreeably to the bills of lading on being paid freight;” I leave out some words, “at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash at the current rate of exchange.” The cargo as provided in the charter-party is a “cargo of sugar in bags,” and I have looked through the bills of lading and I find mentioned in each bill of lading the number and the weight of the bags for which that bill of lading is given. I have gone through them, and I find that the weight per bag in all the bills of lading, although the quantities differ, is uniform. Therefore, I come to the conclusion, that in the ordinary course of things at Fiume, when a shipment is made of sugar in bags and bills of lading are given in the way they were given in this case, the weight of each bag is approximately ascertainable. It is taken to be a uniform weight, and according to these bills of lading it is 1008 kilogrammes. In some of the documents it is treated as 100; but at any rate, whatever it may be, it is uniform. Therefore we have this. It is a shipment of sugar in bags, the weight of the bags being ascertained by the bills of lading. So that you have the shipping weight of the parcels which are shipped. That is certain. That being so, what is the meaning of the clause saying that the cargo is to be delivered “on payment of freight at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped payable on right and true delivery of the cargo.” Does that mean that the freight is to be paid on the cargo which is rightly and truly delivered, or does it mean that freight is to be paid which shall be equal to 10s. 6d. per ton on the total weight shipped, and in that sense a lump sum not depending or referable in any way to the quantity of cargo delivered? I do not think that the cases which I have been referred to really help one very much. Those cases all proceed on the assumption, or rather upon the fact, that in those cases the freight was a lump sum freight. Is it a lump sum freight here? It is by reading the words as one must read words of the English language that one finds out the intention of the parties, unless there is some strict rule of construction which one must follow. Taking the words which make the cargo deliverable “on being paid freight at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped payable on right and true delivery of the cargo,” and reading those words in their natural sense, I cannot help thinking that the only proper meaning which can be given to them is that freight is to be paid upon the cargo which is delivered. I do not find much difficulty with regard to the words “per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped.” I think they are quite satisfied and quite naturally interpreted as meaning that there is to be no dispute about weight. The weight is to be the weight as shipped. There is no need to alter the words at all, merely to interpret them, and it seems to me that, although no doubt it is expressed briefly and not quite fully, the meaning is that the freight is to be paid at shipping weights upon the cargo which is delivered. There might be a difference in the weighing of the bags at Boston and Fiume. The bags might have become wet and the sugar might have drained away and disputes might have arisen one way or the other. I think this charter-party fixes the weight per bag, and that weight is to be the shipping weight, and is to be ascertained and can be ascertained from the bills of lading. Therefore I think with regard to this point that the contention of the charterers must be accepted.

Now, so far I have gone upon the mere language of the charter-party as it stands; but I think that to some extent I am confirmed in that view by noticing this. The charter-party is a printed form which has been adapted by certain alterations to the particular case, and I observe that the printed form itself is so framed that the form can be used, by striking out various passages, either for a lump sum freight or for a freight which is not a lump sum freight. That appears, for instance, in the sentence which fixes the freight. The printed form runs thus: "And there deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading, on being paid freight in full of all port charges, wharfages, consulage, pilotages, and other charges customarily paid by steamers for the full reaches and burden of the steamer's hold, and every available space, the lump sum of or at the rate of per ton of 20cwt. gross weight delivered, payable on right and true delivery of the cargo." So that the printed form may be adapted either to a lump sum freight, or to a freight which is at so much per ton on the cargo delivered, and here those parts of the form which are appropriated to a lump sum freight are struck out. For instance, the clause "but charterers having the full reach of the holds and spare bunkers, the same as if the steamer was loading for owner's benefit," is struck out. That is a clause which is put in to entitle a charterer, who pays a lump sum, to the full use of the ship, and is not appropriate in a case where a full cargo is to be shipped and to be paid for at so much per ton. Then in the clause which relates directly to the freight, the words "for the full reaches and burden of the steamer's hold and every available space, the lump sum of or" are struck out. So this printed form which can be adapted either to a lump sum charter-party or to a charter-party at so much per ton on the cargo delivered, is altered for the purposes of this case so as not to make it a lump sum charter, but a charter of a different kind. I do not say that is conclusive, because they might have made out a charter of a different kind, and yet such a charter that the freight would be payable on the whole quantity shipped, notwithstanding that some of it was lost, but it does point to this, that the parties did not intend it to be a lump-sum charter such as that which the court had to deal with in the case of The Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage (ubi sup.). I only mention that as a matter confirming me in the view which I have arrived at on merely reading the words and giving them what I believe to be their natural and proper sense. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that this sum of 545*l.* 8*s.* 3*d.* is a freight which the shipowners are not entitled to keep. It was freight which was not payable by the charterers to the shipowners under the charter-party. If that is so I do not see how I can hold, having regard to the way in which business is done under a charter-party like this, that it was not collected by the shipowners from the charterers. It was collected under and upon the bills of lading from the holders of the bills. I am assuming that the consignees under the bills of lading were bound to pay it. I am not deciding that; I am expressing no opinion about it. They did, in fact, pay it, and it was a sum which, if I am right in my view of this charter-party, was not payable by the charterers, although it was receivable by the charterers under their bills of lading. Therefore, if I am right in my construction of the charter-party, and, indeed, whether the consignees were or were not strictly bound to pay it, I think that it was a sum received by the defendants under the bills of lading. It was paid on the bills of lading, and it is not chartered freight, which I think the shipowners are entitled to retain, and I think they have collected for, and must account for it, to the charterers. The consignees do not appear to have intervened in any way or to have attempted to get this money back, and as, in the present case, I am not dealing with their rights, I do not say whether they are entitled to get it back. Whether the consignees were bound to pay or not I think the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the money from the defendants. I ought to have said a word about the empty bags, because Mr. Carver said as to those empty bags, on 7716 at any rate, the freight was payable, because, even although the bag was empty you must take it as weighing the shipping weight. I appreciate what there is to be said in favour of that, but I think the freight was to be payable on the sugar in bags. No doubt the weight of the bag was to be included, but where there was no sugar in the bags I do not think that any sugar was delivered, and therefore the freight is not payable on the empty bags.

From this judgment the defendants appealed.

Carver, K.C. (Jeck with him) for the defendants.—This case turns on the question whether upon the construction of the charter-party the freight payable is a lump sum freight, or whether it is to be paid upon the delivery of the cargo at the rate of the amount of sugar shipped. I submit that the freight is a lump sum freight, and if so the shipowners are entitled to retain all the freight which they collected from the consignees under the bills of lading. The charter-party freight is not payable with reference to the number of bags, but with reference to the number of tons shipped. The freight was therefore fixed as soon as the cargo was put on board, and it was in fact, according to the true construction of the charter-party, a lump sum freight. This view is supported by the provision that any difference between the chartered freight and the bills of lading freight was to be settled at Fiume. The governing case here is the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in

Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage, 29 L. T. Rep. 809; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 51, 185; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 99.

In that case Bramwell, B. said: "What is the meaning of 'the cargo'? In my opinion it is the cargo which she has to deliver. It does not mean the cargo she has shipped, but which she is not bound to deliver, which the shipowner is excused from delivering; it means the right delivery of the cargo which is to be delivered, not the right delivery of the cargo which was originally shipped on board of her." In that case the court approved of the decision in

The Norway, 13 L. T. Rep. 50; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 254; 3 Moo. P. C. N. S. 245;
Robinson v. Knights, 28 L. T. Rep. 820; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 19; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 465.

He referred also to

Blanchet v. Powell's Llantwit Collieries Company, 30 L. T. Rep. 28; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 224;
L. Rep. 9 Ex. 74;

Hansen v. Harrold Brothers, 70 L. T. Rep. 475;
7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 464; (1894) 1 Q. B. 612.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and A. M. Talbot for the plaintiff.—The cases cited are cases of lump sum freight. But the question here is whether under this charter-party the freight is a lump sum freight. It is to be observed that the parts of the printed form which are specially applicable to a case of a lump sum freight have been struck out. Freight is prima facie a sum which is not earned until the cargo for which it is demanded has been delivered. That is well established:

Dakin v. Oxley, 10 L. T. Rep. 268; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 6; 15 C. B. N. S. 646.

That prima facie rule, that freight is only payable on delivery of the cargo, may be altered by the parties by some special agreement, but the burden of showing that the general rule is not applicable in any particular case lies on the person who contends that the rule does not apply. There are difficulties in the construction of this charter-party, but that is not enough to take the case out of the rule of Dakin v. Oxley. In the case of lump sum freight there is no relation between the freight paid and the nature of the cargo delivered. The clause here "at the rate of," &c., is irreconcilable with the freight being a lump sum freight. In the court below a case which turned on the words in a charter-party, "freight payable on deals and sawn lumber on the intake measure of quantity delivered," was cited for the defendants:

Spaight v. Farnworth, 42 L. T. Rep. 296; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 251; 5 Q. B. Div. 115.

But I submit that the decision of Bowen, J. is really in favour of the plaintiffs.

Carver, K.C. in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case is one, to my mind, of very great interest, and at the same time presents very great difficulty; but after the interesting and able arguments we have heard I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of my brother Walton is right. Now the terms of the contract must be carefully looked at, in order to ascertain what are the real rights of the parties in this case. I say, carefully looked at, because, it seems to me, that the real point in this case depends upon whether the contract in the case can be treated as a lump sum contract—that is to say, a contract for the use of the ship, and whether the argument as to a full cargo for a lump sum applies to this contract or not. Now, I think it is convenient that I should, in the first place, construe the contract and then see within what category it falls. It is a contract that the charterers are to load a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags which the charterers bind themselves to ship, and the ship being so loaded shall proceed to Boston and there "deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading on being paid freight in full of all port charges"—so far it is a contract which contemplates the payment of the freight on delivery of the cargo—"at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped, payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash at the current rate of exchange for sixty days' sight bills on

London." I pause there, for the purpose of pointing out that the words "deliver the cargo on being paid freight in full of all port charges," "at the rate of," and the words "payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash," all indicate an ordinary contract for payment of freight upon delivery of the cargo. The difficulty arises because after the words "at the rate of" you have "at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped. Now, the real question we have to consider is this: Does the fact that the rate of freight is to be fixed solely with reference to the gross weight of the cargo shipped justify the defendants in turning this into, or in saying that this is, a contract which is subject to the incidents of a contract for a lump sum freight? It seems to me that there is another class of contract from which we must distinguish it, having regard to the principle we have to apply, before we can say it must be a lump sum contract, and that class of contract is one of which Spaight v. Farnworth (ubi sup) is an instance, where the freight is said to be freight payable on delivery and freight payable on right and true delivery, but at a rate to be fixed according to the weight of cargo shipped. As in the timber case, there was a contract to pay freight on delivery at the rate of the weight or quantity of the timber shipped, so it seems to me quite possible that in a sugar case, as this is, you may have a contract to pay freight on delivery at the rate of the weight of cargo shipped, and the real difficulty in this case is within which class of contract this contract falls. Does it fall within the class of contract which is subject to the conditions which attach to a lump sum contract, or does it fall within that class of contract where the freight is payable upon delivery, but at a rate to be fixed on the weight shipped? The only two other clauses that have any bearing are these ordinary clauses: "Charterers' liability to cease when cargo is shipped and bills of lading signed, provided all the conditions called for in this charter have been fulfilled, but vessel to have a lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage." Then the other clause is: "Any difference between this charter-party and bills of lading freight shall be settled at Fiume," that is the port of loading, "on clearance of vessel if required by master; if in charterers' favour by captain's draft, payable three days after arrival at port of discharge, if in steamer's favour in cash, less 3 per cent. for all charges."

At first I thought that was a very strong argument in favour of Mr. Carver's view, because it seemed to contemplate the ascertainment of the actual payment due from the one party to the other in respect of the cargo of the ship at the time that the vessel was loaded and left, but I think that I have attached too much importance to that, and for these reasons: It is quite plain that might apply to either class of contract, because it is merely for the purpose of adjusting the rights of the parties at the time, ex hypothesi there is a difference between the bill of lading freight and the charter-party freight, either in favour of one side or the other, which has to be adjusted, but when it has to be adjusted the only matter to be dealt with will be the balance between the two parties. The rest will remain at the same risk as before; in other words, the shipowner, though he has received the extra 6d., will still have to insure, and may be liable to lose his freight if he does not fulfil the conditions of the contract; and on the other side it is a clause which must be, or which may be, made use of in favour of the charterer, who will have got the bill of lading from the captain, and still the shipper will have to look for delivery of his cargo to get back that money, part of which he has already paid, and part of which he expects to repay himself when he has delivered the cargo. I therefore come to the conclusion, in accordance with the view of the learned judge, that it is open on this contract to say it is a contract whereby the cargo is to be delivered on being paid freight; or, in other words, the time of payment of freight is to be when the cargo is delivered, and it is to be paid on right and true delivery of the cargo at the rate of the sugar when it is put on board. I am fully alive to the difficulties in actually ascertaining what is to be paid when a cargo arrives short in quantity; but I cannot help thinking that these were the very difficulties which were pointed out by Bowen, J., and for the reasons which I will give in a moment, I do not think that the difficulty in the application of the contract justifies us in bringing it within the category of those contracts which are for lump sums. Now, why do I say that I think, at any rate in this court, we ought to hold that this language is not sufficient to turn this into or make it equivalent to a contract for a lump sum? I do not refer again to the provisions beyond saying that they are the ordinary provisions for payment on the chartering of a ship—freight to be payable upon delivery—except the one condition that it is at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton gross weight shipped. Ever since Dakin v. Oaley (ubi sup.), which was decided in 1864, I think that it has been recognised that Willes, J. laid down the law correctly when he said that “The true test of the right to freight is the question whether the service in respect of which the freight was contracted to be paid has been substantially performed; and according to the law of England, as a rule, freight is earned by the carriage and arrival of the goods ready to be delivered to the merchant, though they be in a damaged state when they arrive. If the shipowner fails to carry the goods for the merchant to the destined port, the freight is not earned. If he carry part, but not the whole, no freight is payable in respect of the part not carried and freight is payable in respect of the part carried unless the charter-party make the carriage of the whole a condition precedent to the earning of any freight.” Under what circumstances is that departed from? I believe it is accurate to state, as has been stated in the course of the arguments by both of the learned counsel, that, as far as authority goes, that rule has never been departed from, except in the case of lump freight, or, in other words, freight paid for the use of the ship, and which would be due however much cargo the charterers put on board the ship. It is quite true that in the Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage (ubi sup.) you have the same words: “A lump sum freight of 5000*l.* to be paid after entire discharge and right delivery of cargo,” and it was held that that 5000*l.* was due because it was a lump sum, and that the right delivery of the whole cargo could not defeat or could not prevent the shipowner being entitled to receive that lump sum. That was following the cases of The Norway

(ubi sup.) and Knights v. Robinson (ubi sup.), and therefore if, as I have said, the only reasonable construction to put on this charter-party is that it is to be a charter-party for a lump sum, which lump sum is to be ascertained by paying 10s. 6d. per ton upon every ton shipped—if that is the true construction of this charter-party, of course the principle of the Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage (ubi sup.) would apply. But I think it does require special words in order to deprive the word “freight” of the meaning which has been attached to it by the law of England for so many years, and I think that the mere fact that there would be difficulties in ascertaining what is due, because when the cargo arrives it has to be measured by the weight at shipment, is not sufficient, but only brings the case within that category of contract where freight in the ordinary sense of the word has to be measured, not by the weight of the goods when they arrive, but by the weight of the goods when they are shipped. I fully recognise the difficulties there are in working out the contract, but those are difficulties in application, and must not be allowed to prevent us applying the rules of law; and I think, although the case does present very considerable difficulties, this contract is in its terms an ordinary contract for payment of freight at a rate to be so ascertained, and is not a contract which has the incidents of a lump sum freight. For that reason I think my brother Walton has come to the right conclusion on the construction of the contract. With regard to the other point, in my opinion it does not arise, because I think the charterers were, on the construction I put upon the charter-party, only liable to pay to the shipowner the rate of freight which Walton, J. has assessed. If the case could be argued on the basis that the other sum of money, the larger sum of money, was not due from the consignees to the charterers, different considerations might have arisen; but it seems to me, to the extent to which they received the money beyond that which was due from the charterers to them, they certainly did receive it by virtue of their position under the charter-party and as agents for the charterers. I therefore think this appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of the same opinion, and I have very little to add, because I not only agree with the judgment delivered by the Lord Chief Justice, but also with that of Walton, J. It seems to me that the basis of the whole question here is, what is the right of the shipowner to freight? It is perfectly clear law that prima facie freight is not payable except upon delivery of the cargo. You have to find some special provisions sufficiently clearly expressed in the contract between the parties to oust that prima facie presumption. Therefore, in approaching this case, you must start with supposing that where freight is stipulated for, it is a condition precedent to the earning of that freight that the goods should be carried to their destination. Now, what do I find here on the face of this charter-party? To begin with, it is not a contract written out de novo between the parties, but it is a contract based upon a printed form, some parts of which are allowed to stand, and some parts of which are excluded, and on the face of this printed form there is a provision for agreeing distinctly for what is called a lump sum freight, and there is also a provision for the ordinary agreement of ordinary freight, i.e., freight to the earning of which delivery is a condition precedent. The contract is to load a full and complete cargo and deliver it at a certain place agreeably to bills of lading, on being paid freight in full, and then, "At the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped, payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash, at the current rate of exchange for sixty days' sight bills on London?" Is there anything in those terms incompatible with the primâ facie obligation to deliver the cargo before you can earn your freight? The only thing that can be suggested as incompatible with it is that the rate at which the freight is to be paid is the rate per ton of the gross weight shipped. What is there inconsistent with that in the obligation to deliver the cargo before you have earned your freight? It seems to me nothing. It is a convenient way of measuring that which is to be paid for—the freight—and it is convenient in this way, that for many causes the weight may be altered during the course of transit without any fault on the part of the shipowners, and therefore it is thought a fair provision that they should have a perfectly indisputable weight, the weight when the cargo is shipped, as the basis on which the freight was to be paid; and if it should happen that that weight is diminished by causes outside the shipowners' responsibility, they are not to suffer in that respect, but are to be paid on the weight of the cargo shipped, not on the weight of the cargo delivered, which may be less. That is a very intelligible provision, and one which the parties might perfectly well have in mind when they made the stipulation, without any intention whatever to qualify the always underlying obligation to deliver your cargo before you earn your freight. Now, that being what I should myself treat as the primâ facie inference from the word "freight," I find that it is considerably strengthened in the particular circumstances of this case. In the printed form used for this charter-party I find after the provision for the delivery of the cargo on payment of freight, a clause "for the full reaches and burden of the steamer's hold, and every available space, the lump sum of." That provision, which would have supported the contention of the shipowners that the contract was for a lump sum freight, was scratched out, and what is left in is the clause beginning "at the rate of," which is the other and alternative form, which indicates freight in the ordinary way. So it is not merely a case, as I have said already, of writing out the contract as if it was written out on a new sheet of paper; but it was a deliberate deletion of that part of the printed contract which would have formed the obligation which the shipowner now sets up as the one between him and the charterer. The Lord Chief Justice has gone through the rest of the charter-party and referred to the leading authorities on the matter, and I not think it is necessary to repeat anything that he has said. I agree in all he has said as to the right of the charterer to recover back from the shipowner the surplus which he has received over and above the freight to which he alone has any right—namely, the freight payable on the cargo actually delivered. I agree therefore with the learned judge, and I think that this appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I am extremely sorry that I feel obliged to form an opinion which differs from that of my Lords and from that of Walton, J. Inasmuch as the question involved in this appeal is one concerning charter-parties, I need scarcely say that I differ with the greatest diffidence, for I have no doubt that in all human probability my opinion is wrong. At the same time, I have formed that opinion, and my duty is, sitting here, when I have formed an opinion to express it. I have come to the conclusion, stating the matter somewhat briefly, that the case before us cannot be distinguished in principle from that which was decided in the case of Merchant Shipping Company Limited v. Armitage (ubi sup.), and the cases there cited. To my mind, when this charter-party is looked at it will be found in effect that the cargo which is the subject of it is treated as one cargo, not as something broken up into portions, and that in substance the amount that is to be payable for freight is in effect a lump sum though it is not called so. The cargo which is to be loaded under this charter-party, is a full and complete cargo; and the tonnage of the ship and its carrying capacity is stated. That cargo, of course, might vary by a few tons either way, according to the minimum or maximum capacity of the ship, but it was to be a full and complete cargo; and then you find that the freight was to be estimated with regard to that cargo at so much per ton. That appears to me to have been a short way of arriving at the amount of the freight directly the cargo was shipped and the ship was ready to depart. The method of ascertaining the sum that had to be paid for freight was, of course, fixed by reference to tonnage, because, as I have pointed out, the exact amount of the tonnage contained in the full and complete cargo could not be ascertained until the whole cargo was on board. Then when I come to the part of the charter-party which states as to when the freight is payable, how do I find the question of payment is dealt with with reference to the cargo? Is it dealt with with reference to tonnage, or anything of that sort; or is it dealt with with reference to the cargo as a whole? It is clearly dealt with with reference to the cargo as a whole. It is payable on the right and true delivery of the cargo in cash. Then it is stated that in substance this is to be treated as a provision for payment of the freight according to the tonnage of the cargo, or according to the bags in which that cargo was packed at the moment of delivery, so that you can only ascertain the freightage payable by seeing what tonnage is delivered or how many bags are handed over. Now let me first consider the question of tonnage. Is it a natural inference or a proper inference from this charter-party that it was contemplated that the freight would be payable according to the tonnage of the goods as delivered? In what shape was this sugar to be shipped? On the face of the charter-party, it was to be shipped in bags. Those bags, on the face of the charter-party, might be of any size; they might be of any weight. I find, nevertheless, that the freight is to be ascertained with reference to the gross weight of the cargo shipped, which would include the weight of the bags. You could not ascertain, then, with regard to this cargo, except by weighing it as a whole, what portion of it would be delivered on arrival of the ship, if any portion of it was lost. If the freight was payable according to tonnage on delivery (which is one of the views put forward by the respondents on this appeal) let me see what would have to be done. Could it be contemplated by this charter-party that there would have to be a re-weighing of the cargo on delivery? How could you properly re-weigh it if the whole cargo did not arrive—properly weigh it when it has been delivered in such bags as I have indicated? You could not possibly do it, nor do I think it could have been contemplated that the weight on arrival was supposed to be a matter on which the payment of freight depended; and, when you bear in mind that sugar must of necessity change in weight, it seems to me almost inconceivable that they could have supposed that the amount of freight payable on this charter-party had to be considered with reference to the weight of the sugar on arrival, especially, as I have said, when you bear in mind that it would be impossible to tell from the cargo, when it arrived, if the whole did not arrive, how much had been wasted, or what was the tonnage of the cargo that arrived when it was shipped. Of course, if I had come to a conclusion in other respects as to the true meaning of this charter-party, and thought that it did not come within the principle laid down in Merchant Shipping Company Limited v. Armitage (ubi sup.), I should not be deterred by difficulties of that sort from trying to do what was right between the parties, but I do point out the difficulties as showing that it could not have been contemplated in this case, as it appears to me, that there should have been any sort of re-assessment of this cargo with reference to tonnage in order to ascertain the freight which is payable.

Then I come to the next suggestion, which, I think, really was the main suggestion of the respondents on this appeal—namely, that a charter-party has to be construed as if it were a provision for payment of freight according to delivery of the bags in which the sugar was. I have already pointed out that there is nothing in this charter-party which says anything about the size or weight of the bags, and, except in saying that the cargo is to come in bags, there is nothing in this charter-party to show that the bags had anything whatever to do with the freight, and if it had been contemplated that the payment of the freight would have depended on the number of bags that arrived more or less filled with sugar, nothing could have been more easy than to have said so in this charter-party. If the freight was to depend upon the number of bags which were delivered it appears to me difficult to see why the charter-party, in dealing with the question of freight, referred at all to the gross weight of the cargo as it was shipped. It appears to me, therefore, that to hold that this charter-party means that the freight is payable only on the cargo in bags as per bag when delivered, is to do violence to this charter-party, and to put upon it a construction which it really will not bear. Then I may point, as supporting the view that I am taking, to one of the later clauses in this charter-party. I refer to the clause about what is to happen when the master signs the bill of lading, and the rate of freight in the bills of lading differs from that in the charter-party. That provision, to my mind, points to this: that it is contemplated that the freight which is payable under this charter-party is a sum then ascertainable and which can be finally adjusted, if there is a difference between the bill of lading and the charter-party, by a sum in cash then ascertainable. It appears to me, therefore, that this charter-party, when looked at as a whole, is, in substance, a charter-party for a cargo as a whole, not split up into items which can be separately identified, and in respect of which you can fairly put on them a separate rate of freight. It is, therefore, as I have said, as it appears to me, within the principle of the cases I have referred to. Now, I will only say with reference to Spaight v. Farnworth (ubi sup.) that that really is no authority whatever in the present case, nor has it, to my mind, any material bearing upon it. There was no question of the construction of a charter-party. There it was admitted that the freight was payable according to the timber delivered, and the only question was with reference to a provision as to the measurement of the timber, with reference to the kind of measurement adopted at the port of shipment. If that case is looked at, as I have said, it is no authority at all on the present question. Given the respondents in this case were right in the construction of the charter-party, I should not hesitate to carry out that construction merely because it occasioned difficulties, but I do think, apart from all other considerations, the construction contended for by the respondents in this case does lead to almost incredible results—at any rate, to me, incredible. It would really appear from their contention, if they are right as to the bags, that in a case of jettison, if the parties had only jettisoned portions of the sugar—three parts of the sugar out of every bag—they would be able to say that the whole freight was payable, but that if they jettisoned the whole of the sugar out of a certain number of bags, then they could be entitled to say the freight was only payable in respect of the remaining bags which contained the sugar. At any rate, that does not seem to be a result that could be desirable, nor does it appear to me to be a result which ought to follow from the charter-party. I have expressed my opinion, but I do so with very considerable diffidence.

Carver, K.C.—Your Lordship has not dealt with the point of the 7716 bags which were empty. The learned judge has taken the bags delivered as that on which the freight has to be paid. I have submitted, out your Lordships have not dealt with the matter, that the freight ought to be paid on those as well as on the others.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—A point arises, as I understand it, on this passage at the end of the judgment of Walton, J.: "I ought to have said a word about the empty bags, because Mr. Carver said as to those empty bags, on 7716 at any rate, the freight was payable, because even although the bag was empty you must take it as weighing the shipping weight. I appreciate what there is to be said in favour of that, but I think the freight was to be payable on the sugar in bags. No doubt the weight of the bag was to be included, but where there was no sugar in the bags I do not think that any sugar was delivered, and therefore the freight is not payable on the empty bags." Your claim is in respect of the bags being taken to be empty for this purpose?

Carver, K.C.—Yes.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—We need not trouble you, Mr. Hamilton, I am sorry I did not notice the point yesterday; I ought to have done so, especially after it was clearly mentioned by Mr. Carver. We must take it for this purpose that the bags were empty. On the view that the Master of the Rolls and I take of this agreement, confirming Walton, J., Walton, J. had to find how much sugar in bags was delivered at the weight which that sugar in bags was shipped; and he has gone through some calculation and arrived at that. It is said that ought to be increased, because in addition to what he has found for that, 7716 empty bags were also delivered. I think that was not sugar in bags, and, therefore, on the principle on which we have decided this case, whether we are right or wrong, Walton, J. was right in excluding those.

Carver, K.C.—Might I state that the learned judge did not make any calculation?

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—We have had no argument on the question whether he arrived at the right figure or not. We are here to discuss the important question of law.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Nov. 18 and Dec. 7, 1903.

(Before WALTON, J.)

APOLLINARIS COMPANY LIMITED v. NORD-DEUTSCHE INSURANCE COMPANY. (a)

Marine insurance—Deck cargo—Inland voyage by canal or river—Damage to cargo stowed on deck—Liability of underwriters under policy.

The rule which exempts underwriters from liability for the loss of deck cargo under an ordinary policy on goods for a voyage by sea where there is no well-known usage to carry such cargo on deck does not apply to inland voyages by canal or river contemplated by the policy, on which voyages it has been the usage and practice to carry cargo on deck; and consequently, if in such a case the goods stowed on deck be damaged or lost by perils insured against in the policy, the underwriters will be liable for the loss.

COMMERCIAL CAUSE tried before Walton, J.

The action was brought upon a policy of marine insurance, underwritten by the defendants, to recover a loss caused by the destruction or damage to certain bales of corks which were stowed on the deck of a Rhine steamer, called the Amsterdam, for carriage by canal and river to the plaintiffs' spring in Germany, and which were, as the plaintiffs contended, covered by the policy at the time of the loss.

The facts and the material terms of the policy, which was dated the 21st Aug. 1902, are sufficiently set out in the judgment.

Scrutton, K.C. (Leck with him) for the defendants.—At the time of the loss of the corks they were stowed on deck, and were deck cargo, and for that reason they were not covered by the policy:

Phillips on Insurance, vol. 1, sect. 460.

That section shows that before the underwriters can be made liable under the policy for the loss or damage to deck cargo there must be a usage for underwriters to pay for it when so carried, as well as a usage to carry it. The reason of the exemption of the underwriters from liability in such a case is that the risk is greatly enhanced by the goods being on deck. But there might be a usage proved to carry particular goods on deck, in which case the underwriters would be liable for their loss:

Da Costa v. Edmunds, 4 Camp. 142.

There was no evidence of any usage here to carry corks on the deck of a Rhine steamer:

Royal Exchange Shipping Company v. Dixon, 56 L. T. Rep. 206; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 92; 12 App. Cas. 11;

Arnould on Marine Insurance, 7th edit., ss. 60, 225.

They also referred to

Neale and Wilkinson v. Rose and others, 3 Com. Cas. 236.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (Loehnis and A. M. Talbot with him) for the plaintiffs.—The corks were stowed on deck only for their carriage by canal and river to the Apollinaris spring. The case is, therefore, wholly different from that of deck cargo on an ordinary voyage by sea. The defence set up is that the corks were at the time of the loss stowed on deck. There are two ways of meeting that defence. In the first place, there was a regular practice to carry these goods on the deck of the Rhine steamers; and, secondly, there is no authority for saying that the rule which exempts underwriters from liability for damage to cargo stowed on deck in the case of an ordinary voyage by sea applies to river traffic. In the case of canal or river traffic, goods on deck are covered by the policy. The reason why goods stowed on deck on an ordinary sea voyage are not covered by a policy in the ordinary form is that the risk to goods on deck in such cases is much greater than if they were properly stowed:

Blackett v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 2 C. & J. 244;

Ross v. Thwaite, 1 Park on Marine Insurance, 7th edit., p. 26;

Miller v. Titherington, 3 L. T. Rep. 893, 9 L. T. Rep. 231;

Arnould, ss. 225, 860;

Phillips, s. 460.

That reason does not apply to traffic by canal or river. Where it is the usual course to put goods on deck the underwriters are liable:

Stewart v. Bell, 5 B. and A. 238.

The plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to judgment.

Curr. adv. vult.

Dec. 7, 1903.—WALTON, J. read the following judgment:—This is an action upon a marine policy, underwritten by the defendant company, under which the plaintiffs, the Apollinaris Company Limited, claim to be indemnified against a loss which they have suffered by the destruction or damage by fire of certain bales of corks which were, as the plaintiffs allege, covered by the policy at the time of the loss. The policy was upon "corks, bottles, and other goods by steamer or steamers and conveyances, including parcel post, at or from London to Rotterdam and (or) Antwerp and (or) Cologne, and while there and thence by any conveyance or conveyances to Remagen or the Apollinaris Company's spring Neuenahr, or by any other route whatsoever, including all risks on quays or elsewhere during transit or until warehoused and (or) safely delivered into the hands of the consignees." The corks were shipped in London by steamers belonging to the Holland Steamship Company under through bills of lading, by which the Holland Steamship Company undertook, in consideration of the payment to them of a through freight, to deliver the corks safely at Amsterdam, when the responsibility of the Holland Steamship Company as carriers was to cease, and to have them dispatched from Amsterdam to Neuenahr, in Germany, at the expense of the Holland Steamship Company, but at the risk of the shippers, the Apollinaris Company. The goods arrived safely at Amsterdam, and were there shipped on board a Rhine steamer called the Amsterdam III. for carriage by canal and river to Remagen or some landing-place on the Rhine, whence they would be forwarded to the Apollinaris spring. There is no evidence before me which enables me to ascertain the contract under which the bales of cork were shipped by the Holland Steamship Company on the Amsterdam III. Apparently no bill of lading for these goods was signed by the master or by any person on behalf of the owners of that steamship. A printed form of bill of lading was put in at the trial which appears to be a common form in use for shipments made by the Holland Steamship Company on steamers of the Rhine Steamship Company, who were, as I understand, the owners of the Amsterdam III. This form of bill of lading is intended to be signed by the shippers as well as by the master, and bears the printed signature of the Holland Steamship Company as shippers. By the first of its conditions the Rhine Steamship Company reserve to themselves, among other liberties, the right to load goods on deck. But there is no evidence upon which I can find that the corks were shipped under the terms of this bill of lading. The corks were shipped at some time between the 15th and 17th Jan. 1903. They were stowed on deck with the intention that, so stowed, they should be carried to their destination on the Rhine. On the night of the 17th Jan., while the Amsterdam III. was still lying at Amsterdam, a fire broke out on board by which some of the bales of cork were destroyed and some damaged. The amount of loss is admitted to have been 1021*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* The facts as I have stated them are admitted, and the only defence pleaded by the defendants is that "at the time of the loss the goods were stowed and carried on deck and were not covered by the policy." This case cannot, of course, be disposed of upon any technical point of pleading. But it is not irrelevant to observe that in 1842 the Court of Queen's Bench, in Milward v. Hibbert (3 Q. B. 120), held that a plea substantially in the form of the defence here pleaded by the present defendants did not disclose a good defence in an action upon a marine policy for a loss caused by the jettison of deck cargo. The claim there was by the owner of the ship under a policy on the ship for the amount of the ship's contribution to general average in respect of some pigs which were carried on the ship's deck and were jettisoned. The defendant pleaded that the pigs were carried on deck. The plaintiff replied that there was a custom to carry pigs on deck on the voyage on which the ship was engaged. To this replication the defendant demurred. Although the question arose upon a demurrer to the replication, the judgment of the court proceeded upon an exception to the validity of the plea, and the court held that the plea was bad. The technical point actually decided is not important, but the judgment is useful, as it was necessary for the court, from the nature of the question before them, to consider the principle upon which the earlier decisions as to the carriage of deck cargo were founded. The judgment was delivered by Lord Denman. After referring to the early authorities to the effect that goods should not be stowed on deck and to a passage in the 5th edition of Lord Tenterden's book on Shipping, in which it was pointed out that there are exceptions to the rule, as where usage has sanctioned the practice, and where the master has the merchant's consent, the Lord Chief Justice says (at p. 136): "Now, it is obvious that there may be other and valid reasons for stowing goods on deck; indeed, some goods could be stowed, in no other place, such as timber, and on some voyages live animals; and they may certainly be there stowed with proper skill and care, so as not to be in the way of the crew in their operations." The Chief Justice was here referring to one of the reasons for forbidding the stowage of cargo on deck which was relied on by Valin and others who wrote at a time when navigation by steam had not been invented. He proceeds: "These matters of fact may vary with every different trade, or, even, with every single adventure," and in conclusion he says that "the mere fact of stowing them (the goods) on deck will not relieve the underwriter from responsibility, inasmuch as they may be placed there according to the usage of the trade and so as not to impede the navigation or in any way increase the risk." Without pushing the decision in Milward v. Hibbert (ubi sup.) too far, it certainly seems to point to this—that the question whether stowage on deck is improper is strictly and properly a question of fact, and, apart from express contract, must be decided, whether as between different owners of goods in the same vessel or as between assured and underwriters, according to the circumstances of each case, having regard especially to the nature of the voyage and of the cargo and to the usages of the trade. It is, however, quite clear from all the authorities upon this question that it is a fact which has long been well recognised by all who are interested in maritime adventures, and by our courts, that on ordinary voyages by sea goods which are carried on deck are exposed to peculiar and extraordinary danger. It follows from this, for reasons which are clearly analogous to those upon which the implied warranty of seaworthiness in contracts of marine insurance depends, that, under an ordinary policy on goods for a voyage by sea, where there is no well-known usage to carry on deck goods such as are described in the policy on the voyage thereby insured, underwriters are not liable for the loss of deck cargo. Where, from the description of the goods or the voyage, or both, it is apparent that, in accordance with a well-known practice or usage of trade, the goods will or even probably may be carried on deck, then, even in the case of voyages by sea, where goods so carried are necessarily exposed to peculiar dangers, still the underwriters will be deemed to have consented to take this risk, and will be liable for any loss of deck cargo by perils insured against.

The question which arises as to the right to contribution in cases of general average where deck cargo has been jettisoned is very similar to the question between assured and underwriters as to the loss of deck cargo. The questions are not identical, because the obligations in the two cases are different in their nature and origin. But the underlying and governing principle applicable to each is the same. In the ancient collections of customs of the sea, such as the Consolato del Mare, and in the earlier codes, such as the Ordonnance de la Marine of 1681, the question is dealt with in connection with general average. Valin, in his commentary on that article of the Ordonnance which enacts that the owner of deck cargo which has been jettisoned cannot claim contribution in general average, says that it does not apply to boats or small vessels going from port to port where the custom is to load goods on deck as well as below. He is in this passage obviously referring to small coasting craft—sailing vessels, of course—which make short trips from port to port. Emerigon follows Valin, and adopts the same exception to the general rule of the Ordonnance. The same view has been recognised in our own courts. Thus in Wright v. Marwood (45 L. T. Rep., at p. 299; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 451; 7 Q. B. Div., at p. 67), in the year 1881, Lord Bramwell, referring to the general rule which requires contribution to be made in general average for cargo jettisoned and to the exception to such rule in the case of deck cargo jettisoned, says: "There are two exceptions (to the exception) which perhaps resolve themselves into one—viz., that coasting vessels are without the exception, and also those cases where by custom the deck cargo is one customary in the trade and perhaps also from the port." The exception of coasting vessels, apart from custom, is intelligible only on the ground that in the short trips made by coasting vessels deck cargo is not exposed to peculiar danger, at all events to an appreciable extent. And when Lord Bramwell says that the two exceptions resolve themselves into one I think he means that when the voyage is such that the cargo is carried on deck without peculiar risk it will in practice be so carried whenever it is convenient. I have considered the authorities at some length, and endeavoured to arrive at the principle upon which they rest, because I have to deal with a question which, so far as I know, has not been considered in any reported English case—the question, that is to say, whether there is any general rule exempting underwriters on cargo from liability for loss of goods stowed on deck upon an inland voyage by canal and river. As it is well known that there is a great trade upon inland waters in the United States of America, I have thought it desirable to look into the American cases. I am afraid that my investigation has not been exhaustive nor quite up to date. The decisions of the American courts are not, of course, in any sense binding authorities, but we read them with respect, and they afford useful illustrations. In a case of Harris v. Moody in the Court of Appeal of the State of New York (30 N. Y. C. of A. 266) I find it was decided that the rule that underwriters are not liable for the loss of deck cargo is not applicable to vessels which navigate smooth land-locked waters—in that case it was Long Island Sound—and where deck cargo can be carried without extraordinary peril. This case is cited as an authority by Parsons in his well-known treatise on insurance. The American decisions, however, are not altogether uniform. The decision of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Taunton Copper Company v. Merchants' Insurance Company (39 Mass. 108) is not perhaps consistent with the judgment in Harris v. Moody (ubi sup.). But it proceeded upon different considerations, and is not approved by Phillips (see Insurance, vol. 1., sect. 460). The true view of the matter appears to me to be that the rule against carrying goods on deck is really involved in and depends on a larger and wider rule, which is that goods carried on a vessel should not be stowed so as to be exposed to unnecessary and extraordinary peril during transit. Every one admits that on an ordinary voyage by sea deck cargo is exposed to peculiar and extraordinary danger, and it follows that cargo should not upon such voyages be stowed upon deck. Where, however, the voyage is not by sea, but is a voyage of a very different kind, other considerations may apply. In order to apply the principle to be gathered from the authorities to the present case I must add something as to the evidence and facts. On the part of the plaintiffs evidence was called to show that it is the usage and practice to carry deck cargo on the Rhine steamers. As against this a Dutch lawyer, who practices also as an average adjuster, was called, who referred to certain articles of the Dutch code by which the owner of a vessel is liable to the shipper for all damage of goods carried on deck without the written consent of the shipper. He said that these articles applied to a steamer such as the Amsterdam III. carrying goods by canal and river. I assume that this is a correct account of the Dutch law. The Dutch code has a hard-and-fast rule which, though intended primarily, as I am satisfied, to apply to sea-going vessels, is wide enough to include river steamers. The effect of this is to impose a certain liability on the shipowner. But the same gentleman who proved the Dutch law also proved that deck cargoes are very commonly carried on the Rhine steamers. I understood from his evidence that the usual form of bill of lading used by the Rhine steamer gives express liberty to stow cargo on deck. The form of bill of lading of the Rhine Steamship Company to which I have referred is an example of this, and the Dutch law explains why such form provides for signature not only of the captain, but also by the shippers. I have come to the conclusion that it is, and has been for many years, the practice and usage to carry deck cargoes on Rhine steamers plying from Amsterdam. This is a fact which is not altered by the

REED (app.) v. GOLDSWORTHY (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

Dutch code. The fact that the shipowners undertake a greater liability for cargo on deck than for cargo carried under deck does not appear to me to affect the question as between the assured and the underwriters. If there is such a liability in the present case the underwriters are entitled to the benefit of it. Mr. Scrutton relied upon certain letters written by the plaintiffs to the Holland Steamship Company, in which they maintained that the goods ought not to have been carried on deck. These letters were written with the knowledge and approval of the underwriters, who quite properly desired to make the shipowners pay for the loss if they were liable for it. I do not think that they ought to affect my decision. I may add that if the goods had been shipped under a bill of lading in the form which was produced, by which liberty was given to stow the goods on deck, the defendants would, in my opinion, have been liable under the clause in the policy, "Including all liberties and exceptions as per bills of lading." It could not have been said that the bill of lading was not in an ordinary form. In that case the defendants would have had no right over by subrogation against the shipowners. But there is, as I have said, no evidence that the goods were shipped under any such bill of lading. There is only one other point which ought perhaps to be mentioned. It was said that even on an inland voyage goods on deck were exposed to a greater danger of fire, at all events than were goods under deck. I do not think that this is well founded. Goods on deck in case of fire have certain advantages and certain disadvantages as compared with goods under deck. I am not sure on which side the balance of advantage lies. But there is certainly no peril from fire or other causes to goods carried on the deck of a Rhine steamer which is in any way comparable with or similar to the peculiar and extraordinary peril to which deck cargo is exposed at sea. I am by no means satisfied that the rule which exempts underwriters from liability for the loss of deck cargo applies to inland voyages by canal or river. I am satisfied that it does not apply to an inland voyage by canal and river plainly contemplated by the policy on which voyage it is and has been for years the practice and usage for steamers and other vessels to carry cargoes on deck. There must, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiffs.

REED (app.) v. GOLDSWORTHY (resp.). (a)

Pilotage—Port of Bristol—Compulsory pilot—Vessel bound from Newport to Bristol—Vessel in Newport pilotage district, but within port of Bristol—Necessity of Bristol pilot—Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 (47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxxiii.), s. 9—Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. cxxxvi.), ss. 4, 29—Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. clx.), schedule, s. 3.

By the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 it was provided in sect. 9 that all vessels navigating or passing up, down, or upon the Bristol Channel to the eastward of Lundy Island, except coasting vessels and Irish traders, should be piloted and navigated by pilots licensed by the Bristol Corporation.

By the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 it was provided in sect. 4 that so much of the 9th section of the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 as related to vessels navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from either of the ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester should be repealed, and by the same Act pilotage boards and pilotage districts—which in some cases overlapped the port of Bristol—were created for the ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester, and power was given to these boards to license pilots for their districts.

By the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 it was provided that, notwithstanding anything contained in the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807, a vessel navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel to or from the port of Bristol should be exempted from all obligation to be piloted by pilots licensed by the Bristol Corporation, except when within the limits of that port, which were therein defined.

Held, that the Act of 1861 was not intended to deal with and did not deal with or include vessels going to or from the port of Bristol, although such vessels were bound from or to one of the ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, and that therefore in the case of a vessel which is not exempt from compulsory pilotage in the port of Bristol there is still the obligation under the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 to have a compulsory pilot licensed by the corporation of Bristol when the vessel, bound to the port of Bristol, gets within the limits of that port, although the vessel may be bound from Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, and may still be within one of those three pilotage districts which overlaps the port of Bristol. Consequently, when a vessel on her voyage puts into Newport, and then proceeds from Newport with a Newport pilot on board to the port of Bristol, as soon as the vessel gets within the limits of the port of Bristol the Newport pilot is bound to give up the charge of the vessel to a Bristol pilot demanding such charge, although the vessel is still within the Newport pilotage district, and within the district for which the Newport pilot is licensed.

on the 31st Jan. 1903 an information was preferred by John Reed (the appellant) under the statute 47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxxiii, s. 9, against Henry Goldsworthy (the respondent), for that the respondent on the 29th Jan. 1903, within the limits of the port of Bristol, unlawfully continued in charge of a certain steamship or vessel, called the Beacon Grange, not exempted from compulsory pilotage navigating within the port of Bristol, after a pilot licensed by the Lord Mayor, a dermen, and burgesses of the city of Bristol,—namely, the appellant—had offered to take charge of the steamship or vessel, contrary to the form of the statute in that case made and provided.

The information was heard and determined by the justices on the 19th Feb. 1903, when they dismissed the same.

By an Act of Parliament 47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxxiii. (the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807), being an Act for (amongst other things) “the better regulation of pilots and pilotage of vessels navigating the Bristol Channel,” it was provided as follows:

Sect. 9. And be it further enacted that, from and after the first day of October next after the passing of this Act, all vessels sailing, navigating, or passing up, down, or upon the Bristol Channel to the eastward of Lundy Island, except coasting vessels and Irish traders, shall be conducted, piloted, and navigated by pilots duly authorised and licensed by the mayor, burgesses, and commonalty of the said city of Bristol, by warrant under their corporate seal; and that the master, owner, or owners of every ship or vessel which shall be navigated in the limits aforesaid, without a pilot licensed as aforesaid, shall forfeit double the sum which would have been demandable for the pilotage of such ship or vessel, together with five pounds for every fifty tons burthen of such ship or vessel.

Sect. 11. And be it further enacted, that no person shall take charge of any vessel or in any manner act as a pilot, or receive any compensation for acting as a pilot within the limits aforesaid, unless authorised by licence under the seal of the said mayor, burgesses, and commonalty (which licence it is hereby declared shall express the name of the pilot so acting and the district aforesaid); and no such pilot shall act without having his licence at the time of his so acting in his personal custody, ready to be produced, which shall actually be produced to any person who shall lawfully require to see the same, or shall act in the British seas out of the limits expressed in his licence, on pain of forfeiting a sum not exceeding ten pounds, for the first offence, and for any second or subsequent offence any sum not exceeding twenty pounds.

Sect. 14. Provided always, and be it further enacted, that it shall be lawful for any licensed pilot to supersede any person not licensed as a pilot in charge of any ship or vessel within the limits aforesaid; and every master who shall within the limits aforesaid continue any person not licensed as hereinbefore mentioned after any pilot licensed as aforesaid to act within the said limits shall have offered to take charge of such ship or vessel, and every person assuming or continuing in the charge or conduct of any ship or vessel within the limits aforesaid, without being duly licensed as hereinbefore mentioned, after any other pilot licensed as aforesaid shall have offered to take charge thereof, shall respectively forfeit for every such offence a sum not exceeding ten pounds.

By the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. cxxxvi)—which was “an Act for establishing a separate system of pilotage for the several ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester in the Bristol Channel”—after reciting in the preamble the 9th section of 47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxxiii., and also reciting that “owing to the great extension of trade in the several ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester since the passing of the said Act it is expedient that a separate system of pilotage should be established in the Bristol Channel in connection with those respective ports, under the supervision of local boards for each of such ports,” it was provided:

Sect. 4. From and after the first Wednesday in the month of January next after the passing of this Act, so much of the ninth section of the said Act of the second session of the forty-seventh year of King George the Third, chapter thirty-three, as relates to vessels navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from either of the said ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, shall be and the same is hereby repealed.

By sects. 5, 6, and 7 pilotage boards for Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester respectively were appointed.

Sect. 8. The district over which the Newport board shall have jurisdiction shall be that portion of the Bristol Channel which lies eastward of Lundy Island up to and including Kingroad, and the river Usk as far as the Caerleon Bridge.

Sect. 23. Subject to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 the board may from time to time license and appoint such number of proper persons to act as pilots within the pilotage district and to or from the port for which such board may have been appointed as they may think necessary, and may remove or suspend the licence of any such pilot at their pleasure, and may establish such rates and fees to be levied and paid for the risk, trouble, and labour of such pilots as to such board shall from time to time seem just and reasonable; and if any person shall pretend or hold himself out to be a licensed pilot, or in any manner act as a pilot without having been so licensed, or after his licence may have been revoked or suspended, he shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding fifty pounds.

Sect. 29. The master of every vessel bound from any of the ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester may, if he shall think it expedient so to do, require the assistance of any pilot licensed by the board for that port, and on being so required any pilot shall take on himself the charge of such vessel, and shall pilot the same for such distance within the pilotage district for which he may be licensed as the master of such vessel shall require, and any pilot who shall in any such case refuse to pilot such vessel to any such distance as aforesaid shall forfeit his right to receive any sum of money for piloting such vessel, and may also, at the discretion of the board by whom he may have been licensed, be suspended or deprived of his licence.

Sect. 3 [the interpretation clause]. The word “pilot,” shall mean any person licensed under this Act to act as a pilot for piloting vessels into or out of the port for which such licence has been granted.

By the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. clx)—an Act to confirm a provisional order made by the Board of Trade under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, relating to the pilotage district of Bristol—it was provided (in sect. 1) that the order set out in the schedule should be and the same was thereby confirmed. The order was an “order for exempting from compulsory pilotage, except within the port of Bristol, vessels bound to and from that port,” and was called the Bristol Pilotage Order 1891.

Clause 3 of this order provided:

Notwithstanding anything contained in the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807, the masters and owners of all vessels sailing, navigating, or passing up or down the Bristol Channel to or from the port of Bristol shall be and they are by this order exempted from all obligation to be conducted, piloted, or navigated by pilots authorised or licensed by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Bristol, except when within the limits of that port, which limits are as follows—namely, from the westwardmost part of the Flat and Steep Holms, up the course of the Bristol Channel eastward to Aust in the county of Gloucester, and from the said Holms southward athwart the channel to Uphill, and from thence along the coast eastward in the counties of Somerset and Gloucester to Aust aforesaid, and also from Holesmouth in Kingroad up the Avon to the city of Bristol, together with the several pills lying on the said river.

Clause 4. All existing by-laws, rules, and orders of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Bristol relating to pilotage shall be read and have effect in accordance with the provisions of the Bristol Wharfage Act 1807, as amended by this order.

The appellant was a pilot duly licensed by the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Bristol by warrant under their corporate seal, pursuant to the Act of the second session of 47 Geo. 3, c. xxxiii., s. 9.

The respondent was a pilot duly licensed by the pilotage board for the port of Newport, pursuant to the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861.

On the 29th Jan. 1903, the steamship Beacon Grange was in course of a voyage from Liverpool to the River Plate via Newport and Avonmouth Dock, which is in the port of Bristol, and in the prosecution of her voyage the steamship entered the port of Newport for the purpose of taking in a portion of her cargo and coal for bunkering purposes, and was piloted into the Newport Dock by the respondent. Upon leaving Newport the steamship was piloted out of Newport Dock by the respondent, and proceeded on her voyage towards Avonmouth.

The appellant offered his services to pilot the vessel to Avonmouth Dock, which is in the port of Bristol, but his services were not accepted until Kingroad was reached, and with the permission of the master the appellant remained on board the steamship, and after entering the port of Bristol (but within that portion of the Bristol Channel which lies to the eastward of Lundy Island up to Kingroad) the appellant again offered his services with all proper formalities, and claimed to supersede the respondent. The respondent, however, claimed to pilot the steamship to Kingroad, and the master allowed him to do so.

Upon arriving at Kingroad, which is an anchorage immediately outside the mouth of the river Avon, the respondent gave up charge of the steamship, and the appellant took her into the Avonmouth Dock.

The steamship was not a coasting vessel or an Irish trader, and when within the port of Bristol was not exempt from compulsory pilotage.

On the part of the appellant it was contended: (1) That, inasmuch as the vessel had commenced a voyage under foreign articles from Liverpool to the River Plate and only touched at Newport in the performance of such voyage, she was not bound "from" Newport within the meaning of the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861. (2) That the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 does not in any case contemplate a vessel as bound "from" Newport when she is proceeding from that port to Bristol. (3)

That after entering the port of Bristol the steamship was then (even if not previously) a vessel bound for Bristol, and that the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 left all vessels bound for Bristol subject to the provisions of the Act 47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxxiii. (4) That the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 confirmed the rights of the appellant and other pilots licensed by the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Bristol.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended: (1) That from and after the first Wednesday in the month of Jan. 1862, so much of sect. 9 of the Act 47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxxiii., as related to vessels navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from either of the ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, was repealed. (2) That the steamship came from Liverpool without any cargo to the port of Newport on the 25th Jan. 1903, for the purpose of taking in a portion of her cargo and coal for bunkering (that is, for her own steaming purposes), and left the port of Newport for Bristol on the 29th Jan. 1903, and was therefore a vessel bound "from" Newport within the provisions of sect. 29 of the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861, and might, if the master thought it expedient, be piloted within the district of the Newport Pilotage Board (which extends to Kingroad) by the respondent. That, the master having required the assistance of the respondent, the respondent was entitled to pilot the steamship up to Kingroad. (3) And, further, that if the respondent had refused to pilot the steamship he would have rendered himself liable to forfeit all his pilotage fee, and, at the discretion of the Newport Pilotage Board, might have been suspended, or deprived of his licence. (4) That the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 was merely an Act for exempting from compulsory pilotage, and did not repeal, and was not intended to repeal, sect. 4 of the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861. (5) That the steamship was under the circumstances in question as much bound from Newport as she was bound for Bristol.

All the provisions of the Acts of Parliament and Pilotage Order, so far as applicable to the circumstances, were deemed part of the case.

The justices held that, upon the facts as found and stated in the case, the respondent had not, in point of law, committed an offence, and they therefore dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, upon the facts above stated, the justices came to a correct determination in point of law. If so, their determination was to stand; if otherwise, the case was to be remitted to the justices with the directions of the court thereon.

After the Act of 1807, already referred to, came the Bristol Dock Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. xliii.) which provided:

Sect. 66. The corporation [that is, the corporation of Bristol] may from time to time hereafter appoint and license any persons, duly qualified for that purpose, to be and officiate as pilots within the port of Bristol, and, at their discretion, suspend and discharge such persons from being pilots; and if any person, not being so appointed and licensed, shall take or hold the charge of or attempt to pilot any vessel within such port, unless such vessel be in distress, and there be no such pilot in sight, or shall otherwise act or attempt to act as such pilot within such port, and also if any person having the charge or pilotage of any vessel within such port, but not being such pilot, shall not, upon the approach of any such pilot, shorten sail for and take on board such pilot, and resign to him the charge or command of such vessel, every person shall for every such offence forfeit any sum not exceeding ten pounds.

Scrutton, K.C. (Clavell Salter with him) for the appellant.—The justices were wrong in refusing to convict the respondent. Sect. 9 of the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 requires that all vessels, except those which are there exempted, passing up or down the Bristol Channel shall be piloted by Bristol pilots duly licensed by the corporation; and sect. 66 of the Bristol Dock Act 1848 gives the corporation power to license duly qualified persons to act as pilots within the port of Bristol, and that section imposes a penalty upon any person, not being a duly licensed Bristol pilot, who takes charge of or pilots any vessel within the port of Bristol when there is a Bristol pilot available. So that under those Acts pilotage by a Bristol pilot was compulsory for all vessels (except exempt ships) passing up or down the Bristol Channel, eastward of Lundy Island. Then came the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861, which in sect. 4 exempts from the operation of sect. 9 of the Act of 1807 vessels passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from one of the three ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, and the only effect of that section is to cut out from the previous compulsion, vessels bound to or from these three ports. Then came the Pilotage Order, &c., Act 1891, which in clause 3 of the order extended the exemption still further, and provided that vessels passing up or down the Bristol Channel to or from the port of Bristol should be exempted from all obligation to be piloted by Bristol pilots, "except when within the limits of that port." This exemption is important as showing that, although vessels are exempted from taking Bristol pilots on board when going to or from the port of Bristol, they are not so exempt when within the limits of the port of Bristol. The limits of the port of Bristol are there defined, and it is not disputed that this vessel was within the port of Bristol. Upon the construction of these statutes it is contended that sect. 4 of the Act of 1861 does not apply to this case, and there is no exemption in this case from the operation of sect. 9 of the Act of 1807. The repeal of sect. 9 of the Act of 1807 by sect. 4 of the Act of 1861 is a repeal only in so far as it relates to vessels bound to or from the three specified ports, and does not affect vessels bound to or from the port of Bristol. Here the vessel was not bound "from" Newport within the meaning of sect. 4; she was bound—at all events after entering the port of Bristol—"for" Bristol. The Legislature, in passing the Act of 1861, had not in their minds the port of Bristol, and were dealing with the ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester only, and that legislation leaves untouched the case of vessels going to or from the port of Bristol. Then the Act of 1891, while granting still further exemption from the obligation to have Bristol pilots on board under the Act of 1807, by exempting from that obligation vessels going to or from the port of Bristol, was careful to say "except when within the port of Bristol." The justices expressly find that this vessel when within the port of Bristol was not exempt from compulsory pilotage. Therefore this vessel was not a vessel bound "from" Newport within sect. 4, and, even if she were bound from Newport, at all events when she came within the port of Bristol she was bound to have a Bristol pilot. The decisions of the Court of Appeal in The Charlton (73 L. T. Rep. 49; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29, affirming 72 L. T. Rep. 198; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 569) and of the Exchequer Chamber in General Steam Navigation Company v. British Colonial Steam Navigation Company (20 L. T. Rep. 581; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 327; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238) show that a compulsory pilot was necessary in this case as soon as the vessel entered the port of Bristol, and that that pilot must be one licensed by the corporation of Bristol.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (Evans Austin with him) for the respondent.—The justices were right in dismissing the information. The Act of 1861 recites that owing to the great extension of trade in the ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester it was expedient to establish a separate system of pilotage for those ports, and the scheme of that Act was to create new pilotage areas or districts for those places. By sect. 4 of that Act the 9th section of the Act of 1807 is repealed as regards those vessels which were bound to or from those three ports. The vessel in the present case was at the time in question a vessel bound "from" Newport, and she was none the less bound from Newport because she happened to be going to Bristol. The object of sect. 4 of the Act of 1861 was to exempt a vessel from the obligation imposed by sect. 9 of the Act of 1807 to take a Bristol pilot on board when the vessel was bound to or from Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester. The pilotage areas of some of these districts overlap, and that of Newport overlaps part of the port of Bristol. At the time when the respondent refused to give the charge of the vessel to the appellant, the vessel was still within the pilotage area or district of Newport, and therefore the Newport pilot was properly in charge as pilot. Sect. 29 of the Act of 1861 is important. This vessel was a vessel bound "from" Newport within the meaning of that section, and therefore the master could require—as he did—the assistance of a pilot licensed by the Newport Board, and, on being so required, the Newport pilot was bound to take upon himself the charge of the vessel, and to pilot the vessel for such distance within the pilotage district for which he might be licensed as the master of the vessel might require, and if the pilot refused to pilot the vessel to such distance, then he not only forfeited his right to any remuneration for his services, but he was also liable to be suspended or deprived of his licence. Therefore, in the first place, the provisions of sect. 9 of the Act of 1807 do not apply at all in this case by reason of the repealing provisions in sect. 4 of the Act of 1861, inasmuch as this vessel was a vessel bound from Newport; and in the next place, even if the pilotage was compulsory within the port of Bristol, it would not be so for that part of the port of Bristol which was overlapped by the pilotage area of Newport, and by sect. 29 the Newport pilot (the respondent) was entitled to pilot the ship to the furthest limit of the district for which he was licensed, and he was therefore entitled to remain in charge of the vessel, even after the vessel had entered the port of Bristol, so long as she was still within the Newport pilotage district. The refusal by the respondent to give up the charge of the vessel to the appellant took place within the Newport pilotage district, although it may have been within the port of Bristol, and therefore no offence was committed. He referred to The Charlton (ubi sup.), The Rutland (76 L. T. Rep. 662; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 270; (1897) A. C. 333), and to the Act of 1891.

Clavell Salter in reply.—Taking these Bristol Acts together, they create the offence charged in this case, and that offence was committed unless the vessel was exempt under the Act of 1861. The effect of the Acts is that if a vessel is going into the port of Bristol and is in this area which is common to the port of Bristol and to the pilotage district of Newport, she is not exempt from compulsory pilotage because she happens to have been also at Newport.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case presents to me very considerable difficulties, and, but for the assistance that I have received from the arguments, I think I should like to have taken time to go through the statutes referred to; but, after the best consideration I can give to the case, I think that this appeal must be allowed. The general purview of these statutes may, in my opinion, be stated with fair accuracy and conciseness without going through the whole of their enactments in detail. Originally, as appears from the history in the case of The Charlton (ubi sup.), and as I should gather from the statutes themselves, Bristol was, practically speaking, the only port of importance upon the Bristol Channel for this purpose, and according to the earlier statutes—and for this purpose I need only commence with the Bristol Wharfrage Act of 1807—the authority for licensing pilots on the Bristol Channel was the Bristol Corporation. The respondent was summoned for an offence against the statute 47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxxiii. (the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807), in that he had continued to navigate this vessel within the port of Bristol when a Bristol pilot had offered his services. Therefore it seems to me that what we have really got to consider is the true state of the law at present as regards the area over which pilotage is compulsory in and out of Bristol, and as regards the vessels in respect of which pilotage is compulsory in and out of Bristol. I may say at once that we ought to deal with this case upon the theory that this vessel was bound “from” Newport. Upon the facts in this case it is not, in my opinion, open to the appellant to say that this vessel was not treated by the magistrates, who decided in favour of the respondent, as being bound from the port of Newport; but, on the other hand, it must be observed that it is admitted that the pilotage was compulsory within the port of Bristol. A paragraph of the case says this: “The steamship was not a coasting vessel or an Irish trader, and when within the port of Bristol was not exempt from compulsory pilotage.” Therefore we must take it that the ship in respect of which this right to be navigated in the port of Bristol by a Newport pilot is claimed can only succeed if she is able to establish that, under the sections to which I am about to refer, pilotage was not compulsory within the port of Bristol in respect of that area which was common to the port of Bristol and to the ports or pilotage districts of Cardiff, of Newport, or of Gloucester. I was for a considerable time very much impressed with the argument of counsel for the respondent. It seemed to me that it was open to grave consideration, apart from the language of the sections to which I am about to refer, that the scheme of the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 was to create two or three other pilotage areas, the areas overlapping among themselves, as we are told that the pilotage areas of Newport and Cardiff do, and also overlapping that part of the Bristol Channel which is within the port of Bristol; and that it was intended to create certain authorities which should license pilots and should give to those pilots what I may call full rights within those geographical areas, even although the areas overlapped or were in certain parts in common. It seems to me that if we took that view, having regard to the fact that the pilotage was found to be compulsory in the Bristol district, we should be obliged to come to the conclusion that the Newport pilot would be a good compulsory pilot and would protect the ship, even although the Newport pilot was within the port of Bristol and had not, of course, ex hypothesi been licensed by the corporation of Bristol. That being so, we have to consider whether that is the effect of the Act of 1861. It may be said, no doubt, that the Act of 1861 does recite that the great extension of trade in the several ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester made it expedient “that a separate system of pilotage should be established in the Bristol Channel in connection with those respective ports, under the supervision of local boards for each of such ports,” and that, therefore, there is no doubt that certain privileges and rights in connection with pilotage and pilots were intended to be created by the Act of 1861. Then comes the section—namely, sect. 4—to which so much argument has been addressed, and with which we have to deal in this case: “From and after” a certain date “so much of the ninth section of the said Act”—that is, the Act of 47 Geo. 3, the Act of 1807—“as relates to vessels navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from either of the said ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, shall be and the same is hereby repealed.” I was for some time impressed with the view that that did mean to exempt from the provisions of sect. 9 of the Bristol Wharfrage Act of 1807 a vessel coming from Newport, Cardiff, or Gloucester, even though it went into Bristol, and that, at any rate within the area which was common to the two ports, or I should rather say to the port of Bristol and to the pilotage district of Newport—taking Newport in this case—created by sect. 8 of the Act of 1861, pilotage was no longer compulsory. It is to be observed that sect. 9 of the Act of 1807 says that “all vessels sailing, navigating, or passing up, down, or upon the Bristol Channel to the eastward of Lundy Island . . . shall be conducted, piloted, and navigated by pilots duly authorised and licensed by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Bristol”; and the subsequent section (sect. 11) prevents unauthorised persons—that is to say, persons not sanctioned and authorised and licensed by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Bristol—from navigating these ships. It is with some doubt that I have come to the conclusion that it was not intended

REED (app.) v. GOLDSWORTHY (resp.).

by the Legislature in sect. 4 of the Act of 1861 to include and deal with the case of vessels going into and out of the port of Bristol; that it was intended to deal with the case of vessels which were going to and from Cardiff, to and from Newport, and to and from Gloucester, by way of the Bristol Channel, and that the section did not purport to deal specifically with the case of vessels which were going into or out of Bristol at all. The concession was a very valuable one, as I pointed out in the course of the argument, because up to the passing of that Act in 1861, east of Lundy Island, all vessels, whether they went to Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, were bound to take Bristol pilots under the Bristol Wharfrage Act of 1807. The subsequent sections of the Act of 1861 also, I confess, for a time impressed me in the respondent's favour. The power to license in sect. 23, the compulsion in sect. 29 which compels a pilot to take a vessel to the limit of the district for which he is licensed, and the power in sect. 26 to license the old existing port pilots of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester for the whole pilotage area of the new pilotage authority certainly do tend in favour of the view put forward on behalf of the respondent, that these persons were intended to have licences to navigate ships throughout their whole pilotage area. I cannot, however, help thinking that this is all subject to the general observation that the Legislature, in sect. 4 of the Act of 1861, were not thinking of or dealing with vessels that were going into or out of the port of Bristol at all. They were dealing with the case of the other ports there specified which were reached by the Bristol Channel; and therefore we must look at the other sections to see what are the provisions as to compulsory pilotage, and as to the persons who may be the compulsory pilots within the port of Bristol in the case of vessels going to and from the port of Bristol. In other words, to adopt the very comprehensive, accurate, and concise way in which counsel for the appellant put it in his reply, the effect of these statutes is not to exempt from compulsory pilotage vessels that are going into the port of Bristol, in this common area, simply because they happen to have been also at one of the ports which are mentioned in the Act of 1861. Therefore, though, as I have said, sect. 29 of the Act of 1861 and the other sections of that Act may afford arguments which have to be carefully considered, they are not, in my opinion, sufficient to support the argument of counsel for the respondent. I thought at first that possibly a distinction might be drawn between vessels bound from Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, and vessels bound to those ports. For this purpose, I doubt whether that distinction is sound. I think sect. 29 was passed for the purpose of compelling the Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester pilot to take the vessel as far as his district would allow him, otherwise he was to forfeit certain rights which he enjoyed under the Act. I am supported in that view by the curious enactment in sect. 3 of the provisional order of the Act of 1891. I quite agree, and I think it is fairly put by both of the learned counsel, that the real enacting effect of this provisional order, which has the force of a statute, was only to alter the old geographical areas to which the Act of 1807 did apply, and it is quite possible, and I think it is true, that the new geographical area was subject to all the enactments both in the Act of 1807 and in the amending Act of 1861, and any other statute which has been mentioned. But I think that the language of sect. 3 does confirm the view that in dealing with the Act of 1807 and the other legislation with respect to the Act of 1807, particularly that in sect. 4 of the Act of 1861, they were not dealing with the case of vessels going into and out of the port of Bristol, because the provisional order does appear to recognise that vessels going to or from the port of Bristol shall be exempted from all obligations except when within the limits of that port. I therefore come to the conclusion, on a consideration of the statutes themselves, that this vessel was not an exempt ship; that she was bound, within the port of Bristol, going to Bristol, when she got within the area of the port of Bristol, to have a compulsory pilot, and that the man who was navigating her—namely, the respondent—who might well think that under sect. 29 of the Act of 1861 he had the right to take her, was not the compulsory pilot contemplated by the earlier Act.

Then it is said that the case of The Charlton (ubi sup.) is an authority in favour of this view. I do not think it is an authority at all. In my opinion the court were there dealing with a different case, and had not really before them the difficulties with which we have to deal in this case. I very much doubt whether the point which we have had to consider in this case was very carefully considered by the learned judges in that case. It is certain that they had not got all the statutes before them, and I doubt whether the point was carefully considered. But it is very obvious that in that case the only important question was, Was the duty of the compulsory pilot as such ended at the time of the collision, because, although he had been taken on board as a compulsory pilot, the vessel at the place where the collision occurred was outside the district for which the pilotage was compulsory, though still within the district for which the pilot was licensed? And unless the ship was an exempt ship outside Kingroad, or at any rate at the place where the collision occurred, no argument could have been raised. The case of General Steam Navigation Company v. British Colonial Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.) was referred to, and it was dealt with in the judgments in the case of The Charlton (ubi sup.), and, to put the matter shortly, as it was put by Kay, L.J. in The Charlton case, the pilot in that case came on board as a compulsory pilot, and he continued to be in the position of, though in fact he was not, a compulsory pilot at the time when the collision happened. There are certain expressions in those judgments which do support the view that their Lordships thought in that case that pilotage within the area of the port of Bristol was still compulsory. To that extent opinions were expressed in favour of the view which I have adopted after hearing the arguments for the appellant. But I do not want to base my judgment simply upon the authority of that case, because I do not think it is an authority in that sense. I come to the conclusion that the legislation upon which counsel for the respondent based his argument is not sufficient to exempt the ship, and does not remove the obligation to have a compulsory pilot on board when the vessel, bound to the port of Bristol, gets within the limits of that port; and in this case, inasmuch as the respondent, who was purporting to pilot the ship, was not licensed by the corporation of Bristol, but was only licensed to take vessels in and out of Newport, and, incidental thereto, to take them across this part of the area which was common to the various licensing districts when the vessel was leaving Newport, it does not enable the master to say that the statute was satisfied because he had got this pilot on board. I think, therefore, that the magistrates ought to have convicted in this case.

LAWRANCE, J.—I entirely agree, for the reasons given by my Lord.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree, and I only wish to add a very few words. One paragraph of this case states that this steamship, when within the port of Bristol, was not exempt from compulsory pilotage. If this is an area (the area ending with the point at Kingroad) within which she was not an exempt ship—in other words, within which she still had an obligation to take on board a compulsory pilot—then there was no power, as it seems to me, in the Newport pilotage authorities to create a compulsory pilotage for the Bristol port. The pilot who was on board was a pilot licensed by the Newport authorities; and, while under sect. 29 of the Act of 1861 he might be required to take an outward-bound vessel from Newport to the utmost limit within the Newport pilotage district that the master of the vessel wished, he could not thereby become a pilot who would be able to assert a right to be taken on board for the port of Bristol as a compulsory pilot. I am dealing with this case upon the basis of a statement in the case itself that this vessel was not an exempt ship from compulsory pilotage coming into Bristol, and, if that be so, then it seems to me, for the reasons which my Lord has given, that the Act of 1861 did not get rid of the obligation of compulsory pilotage, and that the post of a compulsory pilot could not be held by a pilot who had started as a Newport pilot and not as a pilot of the port of Bristol.

THE HAWTHORNBANK. (a)

Collision—Vessel "not under command"—Duty to keep course—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 4 (a) (c) (d).

A vessel exhibiting two red lights under art. 4 (a) of the Collision Regulations as a signal that she is "not under command" ought to keep her course when approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision.

A collision occurred between the brigantine R. and the barque H. The R. was at the time close- hauled on the starboard tack; the H. was sailing free, but, having been recently in collision with a steamship, was exhibiting "not under command" lights. The helm of the R. was put up in order to pass ahead of the H., while the helm of the H. was ported.

Held, that the H. was to blame as she ought to have kept her course and let the R. get out of her way.

ACTION for damage by collision brought by the owners of the brigantine Ringleader against the owners of the barque Hawthornbank.

The collision occurred about midnight on the 16th Oct. 1903, in the English Channel, some five miles S.W. of Dover.

The Ringleader was a brigantine of 162 tons register, and at the time was on a voyage from the Tyne to Folkestone with a cargo of coals, and manned by a crew of seven hands all told. She also had a pilot on board. The Hawthornbank was a steel barque of 1369 tons register, and was on a voyage from Antwerp to San Pedro, U.S.A., with a cargo of rails, and with a pilot on board, and manned by a crew of twenty-two hands all told.

The Hawthornbank had been in collision with the mail steamship Ovinoco, and had received considerable damage. Her foretopmast and headstays and sails and gear had been carried away, and her bows had been stove in. The services of a tug had been engaged, and she was at the time putting back to the Thames for repairs.

The weather was clear but overcast, the wind was a strong breeze from W.N.W., and the tide was running to the westward with the force of about a knot an hour.

The plaintiffs' case was that under these circumstances the Ringleader was sailing close-hauled on the starboard tack, heading about S.W.  $\frac{1}{2}$  W. magnetic, and making from two to three knots an hour with jib, foretopmast staysail, two topsails, two mainstay sails, and single-reefed mainsail, when a red light was seen nearly ahead, but on the starboard bow withal, and distant one or two miles. The Ringleader kept her course, and shortly afterwards another red light was seen a little broader on the starboard bow, and, after a further interval, a third red light appeared about a quarter of a mile off. Those in charge then came to the conclusion that the vessel approaching, which proved to be the Hawthornbank, was not under command, and the helm of the Ringleader was starboarded, as she was unable to port owing to the presence of a steamer showing her masthead and green lights on the starboard bow, and nearer to her than the vessel exhibiting the three red lights. The Hawthornbank, however, still keeping her port light open, continued to come on, as if under port helm, with considerable speed, and with her stem struck the Ringleader on the starboard side of the bowsprit, carrying it away and doing so much damage that she sank shortly afterwards, and her pilot was drowned.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants (inter alia) with proceeding at an improper rate of speed for a vessel carrying "not under command" lights, with failing to keep her course and speed, and with improperly porting. They also charged them with the breach of arts. 4 and 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

(a) Reported by CHRISTOPHER HEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants' case was that the tow-line of the tug that had been engaged to tow the Hawthornbank had slipped before it was hauled on board, and the tug was following and hauling in the tow-line, while the barque, under her lower main topsail, was moving through the water, making about three knots an hour, and heading about E.N.E. magnetic. The regulation side lights and a stern light and the red lights for a vessel not under command were being duly exhibited.

Under these circumstances the red light of the Ringleader was seen about two miles off, and bearing about three or four points on the port bow of the Hawthornbank. The Ringleader approached, with her red light open, on the port bow of the Hawthornbank, and, as she approached, the helm was ported a point and steadied. The Ringleader, however, shut in her red light and opened the green light, and appeared to be attempting to cross the bows of the Hawthornbank, and, coming on as if under a starboard helm, with her jibboom and stem struck the port bow of the Hawthornbank.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with improperly starboarding and attempting to cross the bows of the Hawthornbank. They also charged them with breach of art. 29 of the regulations.

Arts. 4 and 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea are as follows :

Art. 4. (a) A vessel which from any accident is not under command, shall carry at the same height as the white light mentioned in art. 2 (a), where they can best be seen, and if a steam vessel in lieu of that light, two red lights, in a vertical line one over the other, not less than six feet apart, and of such a character as to be visible all round the horizon at a distance of at least two miles. . . (c) The vessels referred to in this article, when not making any way through the water, shall not carry the side lights, but when making way shall carry them. (d) The lights and shapes required to be shown by this article are to be taken by the vessels as signals that the vessel showing them is not under command, and cannot therefore get out of the way.

Art. 21. Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course and speed.

Aspinall, K.C. and Nelson for the plaintiffs.—The Hawthornbank was in fact under command, and was proceeding at a considerable speed. If she was in fact not under command under her lower main topsail only, she had brought herself to this condition by improperly reducing sail, and art. 4 (a) did not apply. The red lights were exhibited too late and not at a proper time. In any event the "not under command" lights are a signal to other vessels to get out of the way; and it is therefore the duty of a vessel in such circumstances to keep her course and speed. The Hawthornbank is to blame for porting her helm. There was a bad look-out on board the Hawthornbank, and the light of the Ringleader was not reported to the pilot.

Pickford, K.C. and Adair Roche, for the defendants, contra.—The Hawthornbank was justified in exhibiting "not under command" lights. See

The P. Caland, 68 L. T. Rep. 469; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 317; (1893) A. C. 207.

There was a bad look-out on board the Ringleader, and hence the collision. The steamer alleged to have hampered the movements of the Ringleader was the tug, which was much further astern, so that she was not really in the way.

Nelson in reply.

BARNES, J.—This is an action by the owners, master, and crew of the brigantine Ringleader, and the owners of her cargo, against the owners of the barque Hawthornbank in respect of a collision which occurred at about midnight on the 16th Oct. 1903, in the English Channel, off Dover. The result of it was that the Ringleader was so damaged that she sank shortly afterwards and was lost with the cargo and crew's effects, and the pilot which she had on board was unfortunately drowned. The case of the Ringleader is in substance that those in charge of her noticed the red light of the Hawthornbank nearly ahead, but slightly on the starboard bow, about a mile and a half off; that afterwards a second red light was seen about in the same position; and that afterwards a third red light was seen in the same position, or thereabouts; that when the third red light came into sight the vessels were about a third of a mile apart. The plaintiffs also say that they saw the lights of a steamer a little broader on the starboard bow than the lights of the Hawthornbank; and, according to the evidence of the master of the plaintiffs' vessel, the lights of that steamer seemed to him to be about the same distance off as those of the barque. On that point there was a conflict of evidence, because the defendants sought to make out that the lights of this steamer, which proved to be the tug of the Hawthornbank, were really a good deal further away from the brigantine than the plaintiffs' witnesses put them. However that may be, the case for the plaintiffs is that, when they got all those three red lights of the barque in sight, pretty close to, they came to the conclusion that she was a vessel not under command, and that they must act; and thereupon they acted by starboarding their helm, in the hope of getting across the barque's bows, being unable, according to the view of the master, who was the responsible man to act, to do anything else, because, if they had luffed by porting, they would have thrown themselves under the bows of the steamer, and, if they had kept on their way, they would have gone into the barque, and so he starboarded. The case of the Hawthornbank, shortly stated, is that she had, the day before, received damage by collision in the English Channel, and was putting back in distress with the object of making the Thames, and, no doubt, procuring the repairs rendered necessary by the first collision, which had, according to her master, damaged her stem, forcing it across to starboard, carried away all the headgear and foretopmast, stove in her bows, and done some other damage. The Hawthornbank had taken a pilot, had engaged a tug, and was endeavouring to make fast to that tug. There had been two attempts to get a tow line on board. The first attempt failed just as the line was about to be made fast, and the second attempt also failed, and the tug had again to occupy itself in hauling in the steel hawser. From that time up to the collision the Hawthornbank, which, when they first tried to take a tug, had broached to,

ADM.]

THE HAWTHORNBANK.

was proceeding with only the lower maintopsail set; that is to say, for about two hours before the collision she sailed under the lower maintopsail, and during those two hours the tug was getting in the tow rope after the first attempt, and was making the second attempt to get fast. There is no doubt that two red lights, in addition to the side lights, were put up, and the case for the Hawthornbank is that those two red lights were put up at about 10 p.m. in the mizzen rigging, on the starboard side, at a proper height, so as to show that the vessel was not under command. They then say that they saw the red light of the Ringleader something like two miles, or thereabouts, away, three or four points on the port bow. That is the pleaded case; but the master of the Hawthornbank said a mile or two miles off. It is then stated that the red light of the Ringleader kept open and gradually broadened on their port bow, and that, after they saw the light, when the Ringleader was a considerable distance off, they ported about a point, and then steadied, so as to give, according to the master of the defendants' ship, more room, and to enable the Hawthornbank to steer better. Then their case is that the Ringleader shut in her red light, when about four or five ships' lengths off, and about six points on the port bow, and showed her green light, as if attempting to cross the bows of the Hawthornbank, and shortly afterwards the collision happened. Now, those two cases present certain difficulties.

The first question is, what were the manœuvres of these two vessels, involving the further questions, at what time were the lights put up on the Hawthornbank—the plaintiffs contending that the extra red lights were only put up at the last moment before the collision, and the defendants contending that they were put up about two hours before—and what was the relative position of the two vessels to one another at the material time. I think that the weight of the evidence is in favour of the view, which I adopt, that the two extra red lights were put up somewhere about 10 p.m. I think it is probable that was so from the fact that that seems to have been about the time when the vessel was in difficulties with her tug; and they seem to have had those lights up from that time onwards to the collision. With regard to the manœuvres of the two ships, I accept the plaintiffs' view that the vessels were green to red—that is, that the Ringleader had the other vessel slightly on the starboard bow—whereas the defendants' case is that the two vessels were red to red; but I cannot see how the defendants' story can be correct on this point. In the first place, the courses on which the vessels were favours the view which the plaintiffs present. In the second place, if the vessels were red to red, as the defendants suggest, there could be no reason for the plaintiffs starboarding in the way it is said by the defendants they did; because, if they were red to red, the Ringleader had only to keep her course and avoid the two difficulties in her way—namely, the Hawthornbank, which they would pass easily, and the steamer, which would have to keep out of her way. Again, I cannot see how the collision—which undoubtedly took place between, in the first instance, the starboard side of the Ringleader's bowsprit and afterwards her bows, and the port bow, near the stem, of the Hawthornbank—could have occurred on the story told by the defendants; because, if it were correct to say that the plaintiffs' vessel got six points on the port bow of the defendants' vessel and then starboarded, and the ships were proceeding at the same speed as they had been going, I do not see how it is possible to bring about a collision with the bows of the Hawthornbank, and at an angle leading aft. I therefore accept the view of the position of the ships and the general outline of the story of the navigation told by the plaintiffs. There are still left some questions of difficulty. The first relates to the charge against the plaintiffs that their helm was improperly starboarded. That involves, I think, bad look-out, because it is said that, if these two extra red lights were up, those in charge of the Ringleader ought to have seen them; but I think a good look-out was being kept on the Ringleader. I think the men were doing their duty and looking out as well as they could. They saw the first red light—that is, the side light—of the Hawthornbank at a considerable distance, although they did not see the other two lights at the same time. They first saw one and then they saw another, and I think it is quite possible that the lights may have had some obscuration from the masts or rigging of the Hawthornbank, because they were hung three or four feet to starboard of the mizzen mast. It is obvious that anybody on the port bow, fine on the bow, might have something between them and those lights, especially if the vessel were not keeping quite steady on her E.N.E. course. The exact obscuration would depend upon how the vessel was moving. Then again, the lights were globular, which would not necessarily come into view so readily or so brightly as the side light which was first seen. I am satisfied that those on board the Ringleader saw the two extra side lights as soon as they reasonably could be expected to do so. The question whether those in charge of the Ringleader were wrong in starboarding depends very much on the opinion of the nautical assessors who are assisting me. If the plaintiffs are right in saying that the steamer which they saw appeared to be about the same distance off as the ship, there certainly was a position of very considerable difficulty, because there was the Hawthornbank intimating by her signals that she was out of command, a little ahead of the Ringleader, and the steamer on the starboard bow. The master of the Ringleader did not know that it was a tug at the time. It might be any steamer coming up. It might be a large steamer, and, if he luffed, it would throw him right under the bows of that steamer. To get rid of that difficulty the defendants try to make out that the tug was farther away. My view is that the master of the Ringleader was justified, from what he saw, in thinking that the steamer was pretty close to him, in the same way as the barque was, when he made out that the barque was not under command. It must not be forgotten that the tug's side lights may have been showing more brilliantly than those of the barque, and therefore may have produced the appearance of being closer. I am not prepared to accept the defendants' view of this case, that the tug was so far astern as they make out. Some time had elapsed since the last attempt to get the tow rope fast, and I see no reason why the tug would not make up to the barque again as fast as she could. That being my view, I have consulted the Elder Brethren, and they agree that the plaintiff's vessel cannot reasonably be expected to have done differently—in other words, there was no negligence or breach of any rule on her part in starboarding in the circumstances. The reasons appear to be these: As her master says, it would have been risky to have gone about and ported under the steamer's bows; it would have been a very serious danger if the steamer had been close up; he could not keep straight on with safety, because the vessels were approaching, and so he starboarded and tried to get across the bows of the barque. The only point that can be made against him for doing that is that he said something to the effect that sub-sect. (c) of art. 4 (1) was not properly in his mind; but I think that, when his evidence is fairly considered, what he meant to convey was very much what he said in his evidence in chief—namely, that he had made up his mind that the vessel showing the three red lights was a disabled vessel, scarcely having any way through the water, and if he had thought that she was going at any great speed he would not have starboarded. That seems to me very much a nautical question, and the Elder Brethren take the view that the plaintiffs' master could not reasonably have done in the circumstances other than what he did do. I think, therefore, he cannot be considered to blame.

THE GERMANIA.

Now, the other side of the case is also a matter of considerable difficulty. The broad points taken by counsel for the defendants are that the barque was not under command, that she had her proper lights showing in the circumstances, and that she did nothing wrong. Was the barque under command? Or was she not? She was proceeding in the damaged condition which I have already described, with only the lower maintopsail set, for something about two hours before the collision, and she was put into that position with the object of getting her tug and getting safely into the Downs. The question is, Was she at this time under command, or not under command from any accident? There is no doubt that her condition was due to the previous collision, which was an accident, and I have asked the Elder Brethren—it is a matter purely for them—whether she was under command or not. Their view is that the defendants' ship was, in the circumstances, not under command, having regard to all the conditions of the traffic and the action which she might be called upon to take—to act promptly and properly for other vessels. I understand by that, that although it would be possible for a vessel going, as she was, to alter her course slowly, or to take action in some way for the purpose of altering her course for a vessel which she might meet, and so get out of the way, she had not only one vessel to consider when she put up these lights. She had to consider the traffic in the Channel, and all the vessels out of the way of which she might have to keep. I may add these observations. Either she would pay off very slowly indeed, or she might, if she tried to come up, come up very quickly, and then she would not be in a position, certainly not in the latter case, to act for other vessels. That is the answer to the first broad point in connection with the defendants' case. Then another point was made—namely, that she was proceeding negligently, having regard to the circumstances of the case, in reducing herself only to this sail that she had set at the time. I have asked the Elder Brethren a further question about this, and they advise me that the circumstances were not such as to justify the court in holding that she was proceeding in an improper manner. There is positive evidence from the defendants' master, and from the surveyor, to the effect that she could not set her headsails, and it must not be forgotten that what she was doing was being done with the object of proceeding to the Thames, and she was, it seems to me, acting reasonably in endeavouring to take a tug to proceed to the Downs. A further point was taken—namely, that if the defendant vessel says, in effect, "Here I am in a crippled condition, and not under command," and exhibits "not under command" signals, she should act accordingly, and leave other vessels to get out of the way; but the evidence is that she, some time before this collision actually happened, ported her helm. I have already said that I do not accept the view that they ported because of a position of lights such as they contend for, but they ported their helm to a green light. The Elder Brethren take the view, and I agree, that that was a material cause in bringing about this collision. The helm was ported, the vessel paid off, and I think, but for that having taken place, there was a great probability that the plaintiffs' ship would have got across the bows of the barque. My view, therefore, is that, having signalled that she was not under command, and that the other vessel must act for her, she ought not to have acted in the way she did, but should have kept her course and let the brigantine get out of the way. She did not do so, and the result is that the Hawthornbank must be held alone to blame. There is one other matter. As I have already said, the story told by those on the Hawthornbank, that they ported to a red light in order to give more room and to steer better, I do not accept as regards the light that was seen. I think the vessels were green to red. I think, therefore, that the look-out was defective on board the Hawthornbank, and that the pilot was not properly informed that there was a green light in sight, which light really must have been visible at the time the helm was ported. It seems to me that, if that is so, the Hawthornbank must be held alone to blame, and her owners liable, because the look-out was defective—perhaps because they were looking after the tug and not paying sufficient attention to the navigation ahead. That disposes of the question of compulsory pilotage.

ACTION for salvage.

The plaintiffs were the White Star Fishing Company Limited, the owners of the trawler Waago, and her master and crew. The defendants were the owners of the German steamship Germania.

The Waago was a steam trawler of 155 tons gross register, fitted with engines of 350 horsepower effective, and was at the time on a voyage from the Faroe fishing grounds to Grimsby with fish, and manned by a crew of ten hands all told.

The Germania was a steamship of 2607 tons gross register, and was bound for Kratzwick to Newcastle-on-Tyne in water ballast.

About 7.30 a.m. on the 3rd Dec. 1902, the Waago was about thirty miles E.S.E. of Girdlestone Light, in Aberdeen Bay, when the Germania was seen flying signals of distress. On coming up to her it was found that she had broken her tail-end shaft and lost her propeller the day before, and was drifting to the N.N.W. with two anchors down. The master of the Germania hailed the Waago, and it was agreed that she should render assistance. After three attempts, during one of which the hawser parted and the Germania collided with the quarter of the Waago, a connection was made, and towing commenced about noon for Aberdeen. About 5 p.m. Aberdeen Bay was reached, and the Waago held the Germania head to wind while flares were exhibited for a tug and a pilot. A tug came alongside, and, after signalling the Germania, told the master of the Waago that there was too much sea for a pilot boat to cross the bar. The tug offered to take the Germania into the harbour, but her services were refused. The tug then left to fetch a pilot. Between 8 and 9 p.m. the master of the Germania hailed the Waago to slack away the warp, and the Waago accordingly dropped astern to do so, but as she did this the Germania drifted to leeward, and, on the Waago being again hailed to go ahead, the hawser parted. The Germania then dropped anchor, and steps were taken to make the Waago fast again, but before this could be done the Germania drifted ashore. She was eventually floated off at a cost of 1150*l.*, and the subsequent repairs due to the stranding cost 5600*l.*

The value of the Waago was 5000*l.*, and of her cargo 254*l.* after allowance had been made for deterioration of the fish owing to the delay caused in rendering the services. The value of the Germania at the time the services were rendered was 8500*l.*

It was contended by the defendants that no salvage was due to the plaintiffs, as the Waago had not completed the services she had agreed to render. They also contended that, if any salvage was due, the cost of floating her off and the repairs due to the stranding ought to be deducted from her value.

Aspinall, K.C. and Batten for the plaintiffs.—The services were completed when the Germania was brought into Aberdeen Bay when the tug offered to take her in. The master of the Germania neglected to avail himself of the services of the tug. It was an error on the part of the master to order the Waago to be slack away, and in consequence of his mistake the hawser parted and the Germania's anchor dragged, and she drifted ashore. It is submitted that the value of the vessel before she stranded—viz., 8500*l.*—must be taken as her value for the purposes of the award.

Laing, K.C. and Stubbs, for the defendants, contra.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to any salvage award. The Waago ought to have towed the Germania into Aberdeen Harbour, and it was owing to unskilful towing that the hawser parted and the Germania drifted ashore. Assuming, however, that the plaintiffs are entitled to some award, it is submitted that the value on which the award is based must be what she was actually worth to her owners—namely, 1750*l.*

Batten in reply.—The services of the Waago came to an end when signals were made by the master of the Germania for a pilot and a tug. The intention of the master was to employ others to take him into harbour, and, as far as the Waago was concerned, her services were then completed.

BARNES, J.—The question is whether any salvage is to be given in this case, and, if so, upon what basis. The plaintiffs contend that they ought to be treated as having brought into safety, at the time they finished their services, property to the value of 8500*l.*; whereas the defendants contend that there was no salvage at all, and that, in any event, the value of the Germania can only be taken at 1750*l.*, as 6750*l.* has to be deducted, made up of 5600*l.*, the cost of repairs, and 1150*l.*, the cost of the salvage operations to get her off. The Germania had met with bad weather, in which she had broken her tail-end shaft and lost her propeller. When she was found by the Waago she had two anchors down, but they did not prevent her drifting generally in a north-westerly direction. The Waago was asked to assist her, but there was some confusion as to the exact words used by the English master of the Waago and the German master of the Germania in connection with the arrangement made for the towage. It has, however, been practically agreed by counsel that the matter, so far as salvage is concerned, must be treated as an open arrangement—to render salvage services with the object of getting her into a place of safety—and on that basis I propose to treat the case. The Waago was made fast to the Germania about midday on the 3rd Dec., and started to tow her. It took her a long time—I think some four hours—to make fast, and afterwards the vessel was towed in the direction of Aberdeen. They appear to have reached Aberdeen Bay at about 5 p.m., or a little later, in the afternoon; and, so far, matters went fairly well. It had been bad weather, with a strong wind and sea from the

S.E., and I think—and the Elder Brethren agree—that if the vessel had not had assistance from towing she would have been in danger of going on the coast further to the northward than she did. When the vessels came near to Aberdeen, according to the master of the plaintiffs' vessel, a white flare was burnt for a tug and a pilot, and I think it is fairly obvious that the master of the trawler is right in saying that he would not like to have taken such a large vessel as the Germania by himself into Aberdeen, but that he could take her where she would be in a position to get tugs, and I think his statement is correct that signals were made for tugs. In response a tug came out and came alongside the Germania, and a conversation ensued between the two masters. The master of the tug said that he told the master of the Germania that he could not have a pilot, because it was too rough for a pilot to come out; but he himself had a licence for Aberdeen for the tug and could take the Germania safely in, and get a pilot afterwards; that he could go ahead, and the trawler, if wanted, might make fast astern, and the remuneration could be settled ashore. Then there was a discussion, according to his evidence, as to the price; but the master of the Germania said he would not give more than 10*l.* There the negotiations, such as they were, broke off, without anything further being done. There is one point which it is material to mention here. The master of the tug said that it was not safe for the trawler alone to take the Germania in, and that he told the master of the Germania he must dismiss the trawler from ahead, but she could work astern. Now, the master of the Germania says that when he had this conversation he understood the master of the tug to say, "Clear out the trawler altogether; I will bring you into a safe place"; and that he himself said to the master of the tug, "You had better let one of your men go on board the trawler, and you can go astern, inside." Then he went on to say that the tug went to the trawler, but came back and "asked if I would pay him if he brought out a pilot. I said he had better bring two, and that I would pay him 6*l.* to 7*l.* He asked 200*l.* for going astern, and I offered him 10*l.*, and he laughed at that and went to the trawler." It seems to me that there may have been some confusion between what these men understood each other to say; but one thing I do not think is established by the defendants, and that is that any stipulation was made by the tug that the trawler should be absolutely dismissed. The general inference I draw is that there was bargaining going on, and that the defendants' master had the offer of a tug; but that he seems to have thought that if he could obtain a pilot he could get in with the trawler, and probably would have to pay but a very little more for a tug astern. My view is that the trawler's master was right in saying that he would not like to take the big ship in alone, but would bring her to a place where she could get a tug, and that those in charge of the ship should have recognised that position and never have allowed the tug to go. The master of the Germania should have taken that tug, and then this disaster would not have happened. However, the two vessels remained out in this weather, and the hawser near the steamer began to chafe. Those on the steamer started to get it in, but could not, because it was weighted between the two vessels by a chain cable. The master of the trawler seems to have thought, from their calling constantly to him to go astern, that he must take the weight off somehow, and that there might be some risk in doing it, but that he must, as they were drifting nearer the shore, get a taut hawser between them. I have consulted the Elder Brethren about this, and they do not see that there is any ground for suggesting that the master of the trawler was doing anything wrong in the circumstances at all. Their view is that it was not his fault that the hawser parted and that this misfortune happened. I think the evidence of the master of the trawler must be accepted, and that he tried to make fast again and could not. Unfortunately the steamer's anchor did not hold, and she went ashore. What is the general result? It seems to me that the plaintiff trawler had done what she could to bring the defendants' vessel into a place of safety, and that if the tug had been taken there would have been no difficulty. I regard it as a case in which there ought to be a salvage award made on the basis of the plaintiffs' vessel having assisted the Germania from where she was taken in tow to a place in Aberdeen Bay, close to Aberdeen. Looked at from that point of view, it is a case of towage, though for a very short time, of a very valuable character, because it was from a position where the vessel, if unassisted, would have been in danger of going ashore at a spot more northerly than Aberdeen, to a place where she could get a tug. I have considered the case very carefully, with the assistance of the Elder Brethren, and I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled, on a value of 8500*l.*, to an award of 750*l.*

Damage to cargo—Bill of lading—Exceptions—Marginal clause.

*The plaintiffs were indorsees of bills of lading under which a cargo of maize, barley, linseed, oats, and wheat was shipped on the defendants' steamship. By the bills of lading it was provided in clause 2 that "the . . . owners . . . shall not be responsible for loss, damage, or injury arising from sweating . . . or consequences arising therefrom . . . or heat"; and in clause 3 that "the . . . owners . . . shall not be responsible for any loss or injury to the said goods occurring from any of the causes above mentioned, or from any loss or injury arising from the perils of the seas . . . whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned . . . be occasioned by any act or omission, negligence, default . . . of stevedores . . . or other persons in the service of the shipowners . . ." case is the steamship to be held liable for heating or any other damage occurring to the within mentioned goods." Part of the maize became heated on the voyage, and the other cargo was damaged through improper stowage.

In an action by the plaintiffs to recover damages :

Held, that the second set of words "above mentioned" did not refer to the matters in clause 2, and that the word "heat" referred to heat arising from some extraneous cause.

Held, further, that if the owners desired to relieve themselves from liability for the negligence of their own servants there should have been express words to that effect, and that the clause in the margin did not apply in the case of negligence.

Price v. Union Lighterage Company (89 L. T. Rep. 731; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 398; (1904) 1 K. B. 412) followed.

ACTION for damage to cargo by indorsees of bills of lading.

The plaintiffs were Robert Procter, Sons, and Co. Limited, and the defendants the owners of the steamship Pearlmoor.

The cargo consisted of maize, barley, linseed, oats, and wheat shipped on board the defendants' steamship Pearlmoor, at Buenos Ayres, in May and June 1902. The maize and barley and linseed were all shipped in bags, the oats partly in bags and partly in bulk, and the wheat was all in bulk.

On arrival of the vessel at Hull it was found that some of the wheat had been damaged by coal dust, some of the oats were mixed with the barley, and some of the linseed was mixed with the wheat, and it was also found that the bulk of the maize was in a heated condition, partly owing, it was contended by the plaintiffs, to its having been in contact with the sides of the ship.

The plaintiffs alleged that the damage was due to insufficient dunnage, to the bags having been cut by the stevedores so as to give more room for stowage, through the bulkhead between the bunkers and one of the holds not being proof against coal dust, through insufficient ventilation, and generally owing to bad stowage. They also alleged that the vessel was unseaworthy, but this point was not proceeded with.

The plaintiffs claimed 55*l.* 1*s.* for the damage to the maize, and 2*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.* for the damage to the remainder of the cargo—57*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.* in all.

The defendants denied that the cargo was badly stowed, or that their vessel was unseaworthy, and alleged that the damage to the maize was due to inherent vice. They also alleged that, if the damage was caused by improper stowage, that was due to the negligence of the stevedores, and such negligence was covered by the exceptions in the bills of lading.

The material clauses in the bills of lading were as follows :

1. The Act of God, the King's enemies, &c.
2. That the master, owners, or agents of the vessel or its connections shall not be responsible for loss, damage, or injury arising from sweating . . . bursting of packages, or consequences arising therefrom . . . decay, hook marks, or injury from hooks . . . explosion, heat, fire at sea or on shore, at any time or in any place.

3. That the master, owners, or agents of the vessel or its connections shall not be responsible for any loss or injury to the said goods occurring from any of the causes above mentioned, or for any loss or injury arising from the perils or accidents of the seas . . . whether any of the perils, causes, or things above-mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom be occasioned by or from any act or omission, negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, stevedores, or other persons in the service of the shipowners

On the margin of the bills of lading under which the maize was shipped there was in addition stamped the following clause :

In no case is the steamship to be held liable for heating, or any other damage accruing to the within-mentioned goods, nor for insufficient strength of bagging.

The defendants in the further alternative, while denying liability, paid into court the sum of 30*l.*

Evidence was called by the plaintiffs and defendants in support of their respective cases, and

BARNES, J. in dealing with the facts of the case said :—It is necessary in this case to dispose first of the questions of fact, because there is a question of the construction of the bills of lading under which these goods are carried to be disposed of afterwards. The plaintiffs appear to be the consignees under certain bills of lading—a copy of one of which has been put in—for some maize, barley, linseed, oats, and wheat shipped on the Pearlmoor at Buenos Ayres, for Hull, in May 1902. It is said that the grain arrived at Hull damaged to a certain extent. The question of importance in the case is in connection with the maize, because the claim made relating to the maize amounts to 55*l.* 1*s.*, whereas the other matters are quite trifling. The plaintiffs' contention with regard to the maize may be put in this form : That for some reason or other a large number of the bags were cut in order to stow more cargo into the hold; that the crevices were filled up with loose maize; and that the loose maize got into the spaces at the ends of the cargo, against the fore and after bulkheads, and also into the wings of the ship; and that, in that condition of things, the ventilation was not such as it should have been in the course of the voyage, and the damage was thus occasioned. With regard to the voyage, there seems to have been some bad weather, when the ventilators were closed, but the captain says he had often had such bad weather before, and that there was nothing out of the usual in the weather that was experienced. He had previously said that very bad weather was experienced on the 7th June and for several days afterwards, and the ventilators had to be closed for two or three days sometimes. There was undoubtedly closing of the ventilators for a certain time. The next matter is that the shipment was made under bills of lading which described the cargo as in good order and condition; but that does not mean anything more than that there was nothing specially noticeable about it which would require to be marked on the mate's receipts. [His Lordship then dealt with the evidence as to the number of bags that were cut.] The conclusion to which I have come upon the whole is that while no doubt there is always a certain quantity of loose grain, there was in this case an unusual quantity; and I think that must have been due to the cutting of the bags at shipment, for some reason or other—it does not matter what. It seems to me there was an undue proportion of loose grain, for the reasons I have given, and that that grain was in the places where the ventilation should be—namely, in the wings and the ends where the bulkheads should be separated from the cargo, and that there was therefore less free ventilation than there should have been. Now, I think it is not made out that the whole of this damage by heating is due to the cause which I have been considering, but I think some of it was. I think the ship's ventilation became defective to a certain extent owing to this excessive quantity of loose grain which was about for the reasons I have given; and I have asked the Elder Brethren what is their view. They think that as there was more loose grain than usual it might aggravate the heating. That is, I believe, all one can say about this case. I do not attribute the whole of this heating to this cause. The probability is that a portion of this heating was due to the state of the cargo itself, and to its being confined in the hold of the ship. It appears to me that the proper and only conclusion I can come to is to put down half of this heating to that cause. If the damage by heating amounts to 400*l.*, I think 200*l.* of that is due to this choking up of the ventilation.

ADM.]

THE PEARLMOOR.

The next matter to discuss is what has been called the iron damage. It does not seem to me to be quite the right term. It means the damage to the bags which have been against the ironwork of the ship, and, in consequence of the accumulation of water, have been thereby damaged. The bags were described as being so wet that they burst when moved, and the grain poured out and was damaged. Now, the quantity that is said to have met with damage in this respect is 920 bags, in all, equivalent to 344 quarters, and it is said that the damage amounted to 81*l.* Was that due to bad stowage, or was it not? I understand the contention of the defendants was that it was due to the working of the ship in bad weather if any bags got out of place—that everything was right at the start, and that any cargo which got against the side of the ship got there in the course of the voyage. Here again there is a question of fact to decide. The broad contention of the plaintiffs is that some of the cargo battens were not in their places when the ship arrived, so that some of the cargo got against the sides and frames and stringers. On the other hand, the case for the defendants is that the battens were all in their places when the ship started. I think myself that the evidence for the plaintiffs is better than that for the defendants on this point. My opinion is that the places where this grain had got against the ironwork of the ship were not adequately protected, in the way they should have been, when the ship started. I accept, broadly speaking, the view presented on this part of the case by the plaintiffs, and I find that the damage was due to improper stowage. So that matter will depend, as also the point I have already decided, upon what effect is to be given to the bills of lading. With regard to the other small items, wheat and coal dust got mixed, and it seems to me that could not have happened without there being some defect in the bulkhead. So also with regard to the mixing of wheat and linseed. It was a temporary bulkhead, and seems to have been in such a condition that the grain got through the interstices. Lastly, there was an item for the mixing of barley and oats in No. 5 hold. I cannot see how that happened unless the sail cloths were not properly fixed. Those are my findings on this matter, and the next question is what is the law.

Pickford, K.C. and Bateson for the plaintiffs.—Negligence is at the root of all the damage, and the exceptions in the second and third clauses, even if they cover this damage, are of no avail. As Walton, J. says, in Price v. Union Lighterage Company (88 L. T. Rep. 428, at p. 430; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 398, at p. 400; (1903) 1 K. B. 750, at p. 754): "If the carrier desires to relieve himself from the duty of using by himself and his servants reasonable skill and care in the carriage of goods, he must do so in plain language and explicitly, and not by general words." With regard to the marginal clause the words "in no case" do not explicitly cover negligence. In Taubman v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company (26 L. T. Rep. 704; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 336) there was a provision that the shipowner would not be answerable for loss of luggage "under any circumstances whatever." That, however, was a special contract between a shipowner and a passenger by sea, not part of a bill of lading contract. The case was commented on by the Court of Appeal in Price v. Union Lighterage Company (89 L. T. Rep. 731; (1904) 1 K. B. 412). It is submitted the second group of words "causes above mentioned" in clause 3 only refer to the first group in the same section. They cannot be said to refer to the exceptions in clause 2. This is clear because the defendants have put in the words "whether occasioned by negligence" in the one class of perils, and left it out in the other. The damage to the maize was caused by heating, which was caused by fermentation. It is not therefore within clause 2 as "sweating" or as "heat"; for the words before and after the word "heat" show that heat means outside action.

Laing, K.C. and Adair Roche, for the defendants, contra.—The damage by heating is within clause 2, and comes under the heading of "sweating." Heating causes moisture, and the result of such moisture is what is termed "sweating." It also comes within the marginal clause. This is a rubber stamp clause specially used in the case of maize cargoes, and the words "any other damage" are expressly intended to cover any damage like the present. If there had only been room the marginal clause would have been stamped at the end of clause 3, and it must be read as if it were there. The words "In no case is the steamship to be held liable for heating," &c., by themselves cover negligence. See Ashenden v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, 42 L. T. Rep. 586; 5 Ex. Div. 190.

Mitchell v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, 33 L. T. Rep. 161; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 256.

The perils mentioned in clause 2 cover negligence, for the second group of words, "causes above mentioned," in clause 3 refer to clause 2.

Pickford, K.C. in reply.

BARNES, J.—Having disposed of the questions of fact, I now have to apply the law. That brings me to consider the terms of these somewhat extraordinary bills of lading. They are all in the same form, but the marginal clauses are stamped only on the bills of lading relating to the maize. They contain very long clauses of exceptions, and if it had not been for the courtesy of counsel in providing me with a type-written copy I do not know how I should have been able to get on without the assistance of a magnifying glass to read these exceptions, which are contained in several paragraphs of very small print. I cannot understand why at the present day shipowners do not take the opposite course to that which these bills of lading take—of excepting a mass of detailed perils, causes, and things—and state what they are willing to be responsible for. However, the exceptions seem to grow and grow, based upon the old form of bill of lading. The first point that is taken is a general point, and that is that what I may term the negligence clause—the third clause of exceptions—does not apply to those exceptions which have been relied upon by the defendants. The third clause begins thus: “That the master, owners, or agents of the vessel or its connections shall not be responsible for any loss or injury to the said goods, occurring from any of the causes above mentioned.” I suppose “the causes above mentioned” must there mean the causes referred to in the first and second paragraphs of the exceptions and stipulations, because those are the only causes that so far have been above-mentioned. But then there comes a long string of words, which commences thus: “or for any loss or injury arising from the perils or accidents of the seas,” &c. This ends with the words “whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom be occasioned by or from any act or omission, negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, stevedores, or other persons in the service of the shipowners, whether on board the said ship or any other ship belonging to or chartered by them, or otherwise howsoever, for whose acts they would otherwise be liable.” Now, it is quite clear that the words “above mentioned,” which I have just read, cannot have precisely the same meaning as the words “above mentioned” at the beginning of paragraph 3; because the first part only refers to the first and second sets of exceptions, and if it only refers to the first and second sets of exceptions, to use the words “above mentioned” where they occur again in precisely the same way would then only refer to the first and second sets of exceptions. No one has contended that it means that. The contention for the plaintiffs is that where you find the words “above mentioned” a second time they refer to what is just above—namely, in the third paragraph, beginning with the words “or for any loss or injury arising from the perils.” The contention for the defendants is that they must include those perils, causes, or things, and also the causes or things mentioned in Nos. 1 and 2. I have considered this matter with as much care as I can, and the view that I take is that when the words “above mentioned” are used a second time, having regard to their collocation, they only refer to the specific causes and things which are set out in paragraph 3. It is extremely doubtful whether one is really right or wrong about that particular view, but that is a construction which I hold, and it seems to me that that is the proper one to adopt.

ADM.]

THE PEARLMOOR.

[ADM.]

If that is right it makes an end of this case; but, assuming that is not the view to take, I have still to consider the effect of the words in paragraph 2, on which the defendants rely. What are those words? He relies first on the word “heat.” I think that the contention of the plaintiffs is correct, that that word, having regard to its collocation, which is between the words “explosion” and “fire at sea or on shore” does not refer to the heating of the cargo from its own spontaneous combustion or generation of heat, through the action of moisture coming against it, or its own moisture causing it to develop heat, but that the word “heat” refers to some extraneous source, such as heat coming from the engine-room. So much for that point. The next word relied upon was the word “decay.” The argument upon that was very faintly pressed, and I do not think myself that any of the loss with which I have had to concern myself in dealing with the facts can be attributed to the ordinary meaning which is attached to the word “decay.” Then comes the word “sweating”—“loss, damage, or injury arising from sweating.” Now, in this case I have already found that the damage was due to the causes which I specified in my judgment upon the facts, and it seems to me that those causes do not include the idea of sweating. I think the correct view of that word is that expressed by Mr. Pickford—viz., of moisture dropping on to the bags from condensation, which arises if there is moisture which evaporates and then condenses in the hold. The damage, in my opinion, was not caused by that class of injury. There is the further point taken on the marginal clause, which is as follows: “In no case is the steamship to be held liable for heating or any other damage accruing to the within mentioned goods nor for insufficient strength of bagging.” Now, there are several cases referred to in connection with this point, the last of which is Price v. Union Lighterage Company (ubi sup). I only propose to refer to one paragraph in the judgment there, which summarises what I wish to say upon this matter. That is as follows: Walton, J. in the course of his judgment, said: “I understand the meaning of this to be that an exemption in general words, not expressly relating to negligence, even though the words are wide enough to include loss by the negligence or default of the carrier’s servants, must be construed as limiting the liability of the carrier as insurer, and not as relieving him from the duty of exercising reasonable skill and care. If the carrier desires to relieve himself from the duty of using by himself and his servants reasonable skill and care in the carriage of goods, he must do so in plain language and explicitly, and not by general words.” There are general words in this case, not expressly referring to negligence, and, it seems to me, they do not include negligence on the part of the shipowner or those for whom he is responsible. But, of course, in this case the view which I take about that clause is fortified by the fact that this marginal clause only occurs in a bill of lading which does deal with negligence in certain specific cases; and negligence being thus dealt with in certain specific cases leads more than ever to the conclusion that—general words being used somewhere else—if in such a marginal clause as this the negligence of the shipowner or his servants is to be excluded, the language should expressly refer to that exclusion. There is a further point to be dealt with—that what has been discussed in the course of

THE MINNETONKA.

[ADM.]

this case and called the iron damage is, as the defendants contended, sweating damage. If the first point that I dealt with, as to the construction of the words in clause 3 so far as they affect clause 2, is right, then any difficulty as to the construction of the word "sweating" is got rid of. But even if the view I take is not correct, it appears to me, having regard to the facts, that it is not shown by the defendants that the damage I have dealt with is, strictly speaking, damage done by sweating. There are only some other small matters to refer to—namely, the damage to the wheat and linseed and the barley and oats by mixing. It was not contended that those small items could be really brought within any of the terms of the exceptions in the bill of lading, and therefore the defence as to them fails. The result, in my opinion, is that the 30*l.* which has been paid into court in this case is not sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim, assuming, of course, that the damage which I have found, but which will have to be definitely ascertained by the registrar and merchants, exceeds that amount, which it almost certainly must do. My judgment must be for the plaintiffs, for an amount to be ascertained by the registrar and merchants in accordance with my judgment.

Collision—Both to blame—Damages—Payment by cargo owners to shipowners—Right of cargo owner to recover money so paid from wrong-doing vessel—Registrar and merchants.

A collision occurred between the steamships U. and M., for which both vessels were found to blame. The U. had on board at the time a cargo of coals shipped by and the property of the Admiralty, *and, in order to avoid expense of storage and reshipping, an agreement was come to by which the owners of the U. waived their right to carry the cargo to its destination, the coals were discharged and sold, and the Admiralty agreed to pay the owners 1000*l.* The owners of the U. recovered against the owners of the M. a moiety of their claim for repairs and detention. A claim was made by the Admiralty, as owners of the cargo on board the U., against the owners of the M. for their proportion of the sum agreed to be paid to the owners of the U.*

Held, affirming the report of the registrar, that they were not entitled to recover, as such a payment could not be said to be the natural result of the collision, and that, if the owners of the M. were liable, the sum recovered would be payable to the owners of the U., who had already been paid a moiety of all the losses they had incurred by reason of the collision.

MOTION in objection to the report of the assistant registrar.

A collision occurred on the 9th June 1902, in the English Channel, between the steamships Uskmoor and Minnetonka. The Uskmoor at the time was on a voyage from the Tyne to the Cape with a cargo of coals shipped by and the property of the Admiralty. After the collision the Uskmoor put into the Thames for repairs, and after some correspondence as to the coals, which is sufficiently dealt with by the learned judge in his judgment, the following letter was written on behalf of the Director of Navy Contracts to the managing owner of the Uskmoor:

Admiralty, S.W., 18th June 1902.—Gentlemen,—With reference to your letter of the 13th June, I have to acquaint you that, to minimise loss in the interests of all concerned, the Admiralty is prepared to agree to the following arrangement, to which it is understood that you and the underwriters have given your concurrence—viz.: The voyage to be terminated and the coal sold. The owners to be paid the sum of 1000*l.*, to be apportioned as a substituted expense, in lieu of those which would otherwise have been incurred, on the basis shown by the following approximate figures:

		General Average		Cargo.		Freight.
£664	10 0	.....	Hire of barges	£166	2 6	.....	£166 2 6
106	17 6	.....	Shifting, &c.	53	8 9	.....	53 8 9
424	10 10	.....	Reshipping	—	.....	.....	424 10 10
£1195	18 4	.....		£219	11 3	.....	£332 5 0
£996	15 0	.....	Apportioned in substitution for the above	£182	19 11	.....	£276 18 4
							£536 16 9

For 1000*l.* the figures will, of course, be slightly different. The Uskmoor to load another cargo on completion of repairs, on same conditions as charter of the 15th May, and at rate of freight current at date of signing the new charter, provided the owners give proper notice to Messrs. Mathwin and Sons, of Newcastle, of the date when steamer will be ready to load after repair. I shall be glad to have your confirmation of this arrangement by return of post, and to have a letter from you agreeing on these conditions to allow the cargo to be handed over to whomsoever it is sold to. The name of the buyers for insertion in such letter will be communicated to you as soon as sale is definitely arranged—I am, Gentlemen, your obedient servant, PERCY MINTER, for Director of Navy Contracts.—Messrs. W. Runciman and Co.

(a) Reported by CHRISTOPHER HEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was agreed to by the owners of the Uskmoor, and the cargo was duly discharged and sold.

An action was brought by the owners of the Minnetonka against the owners of the Uskmoor and heard before the President (Sir F. H. Jeune) and Trinity Masters, and both vessels were found to blame for the collision. The case will be found reported in 87 L. T. Rep. 55; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 316; (1902) P. 250.

An action was then brought by the Admiralty, as owners of cargo on board the Uskmoor, against the owners of the Minnetonka, but was settled upon the terms of both vessels being to blame. At the reference before the assistant registrar and merchants to assess the damages, the Admiralty claimed (inter alia) the above-mentioned 1000*l.* The assistant registrar found that there was nothing due from the defendants except a sum of 5*l.* 5*s.* in respect of surveys.

The assistant registrar in his report dealt with the claim as follows :

The first item of the claim is for the difference between the cost of the coal and the price realised. It was contended by the defendants that nothing was due from them, on the ground that the cargo owners had not acted with reasonable diligence in not accepting a better price than that ultimately obtained. We are of opinion that the defendants' contention is right, and that this head of the cargo owners' claim must be disallowed. A sum for the cost of surveys is, however, payable to them—namely, 5*l.* 5*s.*—of which a moiety is recoverable against the defendants. The second head of the claim was for 1000*l.* agreed to be paid by the Admiralty to the shipowners for abandoning the voyage. It is not clear from the evidence that the whole of this sum was to be paid. In our view of the case, however, this doubt is not material, for we are of opinion that under all the circumstances the reasonable and business-like course for all parties was for the cargo to be sold in the Thames, and the payment of any sum to the shipowners by the cargo owners was not a consequence of the collision for which the wrongdoers are liable. The shipowners have recovered from the wrongdoers the cost of repairs and damages for the detention of their ship, and at the end of the period of detention they were in a position to, and did, take up a fresh charter. The duty of the shipowner being to carry the cargo to its destination, it was to his advantage to make an arrangement with the cargo owners whereby he would be free from this duty, and be able to take a new cargo when the repairs were finished. Any payment therefore made by the cargo owners to the shipowners is not a natural and reasonable result of the collision, and therefore is not recoverable against the wrongdoer.—(Signed) E. S. ROSCOE, Assistant Registrar.—12th June 1903.

The Admiralty appealed.

Bucknill, J. referred the case back to the assistant registrar for further information as to whether or not the amount claimed by the Admiralty had or had not been paid to the owners of the Uskmoor in their action against the Minnetonka.

The following is the material part of the further report of the assistant registrar :

By the report dated the 12th June 1903, I found that the cargo owners could not recover this sum from the owners of the Minnetonka, and the cargo owners appealed against the report. The hearing of the appeal on the 13th July was adjourned by Bucknill J. in order that I might report whether any part of the sum of 276*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*, a moiety of which is now claimed by the cargo owners, had been allowed to the owners of the Uskmoor by the report on the claim against the Minnetonka dated the 22nd Dec. 1902. The claim in respect of this sum of 276*l.* is based on several letters which were put in at the previous reference; the particulars of the claim are set out in the letter of the Director of Navy Contracts dated the 18th June. It is to be noted that in the letters of the 13th and 17th June the proposed payment is spoken of as being in respect of freight, a word which would be proper, since, if the ship was repairable, her owners were entitled to carry on the cargo and earn this freight, and in the letter of the 20th June it is stated that the sum payable by the cargo owners would follow the completion of "the general average adjustment." The claim is, however, now put forward as being in respect of the hire of and barges for the purpose of warehousing the cargo, and expenses which would have been incurred had the voyage not been abandoned, but which was not in fact incurred and were therefore saved. I have to report that, as in the reference on the claim by the Uskmoor only the actual expenses incurred for discharging the cargo and for the hire of barges were allowed (item No. 7), no part of the present claim has been dealt with in the ship's reference. In the ship's reference, however, all sums in respect of loss of freight, and for expenses at the port of loading, were allowed to the shipowners (see item No. 35). At the further hearing further arguments were addressed to us by counsel for the claimants and the defendants, and I was asked to make several findings on points submitted to us. The points submitted by counsel for the cargo owners and our findings thereon are as follows : (1) That the voyage was not commercially at an end; we find that the voyage was not commercially at an end. (2) That on the 18th June repairs were expected to take six weeks; we find that the repairs were expected to take six weeks. (3) That 1000*l.* was agreed to be paid on terms contained in letters of the 18th June, explained by those of the 19th and 20th; we find that 1000*l.* was agreed to be paid on the terms contained in these letters. (4) That the Admiralty has been called on to pay their share. There is no direct evidence as to this, but the solicitor for the owners of the Uskmoor, who was present at the further reference, stated that the cargo owners would be called on to pay the sum claimed. (5) That the agreement was beneficial to all concerned, and a reasonable and proper one to reduce loss which would have been occasioned had the parties insisted on their strict rights to have voyage concluded. I find, as stated in the previous report, that it was reasonable and for the benefit of all concerned that the voyage should be abandoned, so that expenses in the Thames might be lessened, and that there should be no risk of the deterioration of the cargo. I further find the agreement by the Admiralty to pay 1000*l.*, or a part thereof, was not a reasonable agreement, because the object of the abandonment of the voyage was to save further expenses, and it was unreasonable for the cargo owners to pay any sum to the shipowners, since it was the duty of the shipowners to take all measures necessary to enable them to carry the cargo to its destination (see Carver on Carriage by Sea, 3rd edit., sect. 302); and, as the voyage was not commercially at an end, the cargo owners could have insisted on their cargo being carried to its destination without any payment to the shipowners except that of the agreed freight. I further find that the agreement, so far as it related to the payment of 1000*l.*, or any part thereof, was one arising out of the relation between ship and cargo, and that the collision was not the cause of it, and that the sum claimed is inadmissible as a head of damage in an action against the wrongdoing ship: (The Marpessa, 66 L. T. Rep. 356; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 155; (1891) P. 403). (6) That none of the items shown in the previous reference were allowed in respect of the expenses included in the 276*l.* The finding on this head has already been stated. The points submitted by counsel for the defendants were : (1) That by the arrangement made in June 1902 on the basis of a reshipment of cargo, which was alleged to be necessary and reasonable, the owners of the Uskmoor recovered from the owners of the Minnetonka a complete indemnity for all damages actually incurred arising out of the collision. I find that this was so. (2) That that indemnity, being obtained on the basis of voyage being abandoned, included all loss of expenses and all loss of profits from the date of eleven days before collision when the Uskmoor commenced her voyage by bunkering in the Tyne. That under these circumstances the owners of the Uskmoor could not claim from the owners of the Minnetonka any further sum in respect of the abandonment of the voyage, and that therefore the Admiralty cannot claim any such sum. I find the facts stated in the affirmative. I also find that the owners of the Uskmoor have obtained damages on the basis of the voyage being abandoned, and that the owners of the Uskmoor, if they recover the sum claimed in this reference by the cargo owners from them, should deduct this amount from the sum awarded to them in this claim against the Minnetonka: (see The Marpessa, ubi sup.). I was further asked to vary the previous order as to costs, but, having regard to my finding, I cannot vary the order as to the costs of the previous reference. The costs of this further reference I leave to be dealt with by the court.—(Signed) E. S. ROSCOE, Assistant Registrar.—20th Nov. 1903.

Acland, K.C. for the plaintiffs.—The agreement was to pay a sum of money which should be a substituted expense, and as such ship, cargo, and freight would have to contribute if it was a case of general average. The proportion of the £1000 or substituted expense which the cargo would have to bear is 277*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*, and the Admiralty is entitled to recover that sum from the wrongdoer. The assistant registrar has found that the parties did the right thing under the circumstances, and that the course taken of discharging and selling the cargo was a reasonable and businesslike one:

Carver on Carriage by Sea, 3rd edit., sect 302;

Notara v. Henderson, 26 L. T. Rep. 442; 1 Asp.

Mar. Law Cas. 278; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 225.

The agreement was made to minimise the loss. The expenses of warehousing cargo would not have been general average losses at all, as they would have been incurred after the ship had arrived in a place of safety. It may be that the owners of the Uskmoor recovered more than they ought to have done from the owners of the Minnetonka, but that is no answer to our claim.

Aspinall, K.C. (Pritchard with him), for the defendants, contra.—In The Marpessa (ubi sup.) the question was whether the owners of the ship could recover money actually paid, and the President (Sir F. H. Jeune) found that the alleged loss had not legally been caused by the collision. In the present case there is the same class of claim, but the alleged losses are only hypothetical expenses. The claim has first of all been made on the ground that it is in the nature of loss of freight, then of general average, and now it is called a substituted expense. It is really some sort of suggested liability which arises out of an arrangement between the parties by which they may have saved themselves from some hypothetical expense.

Acland, K.C. in reply.

BUCKNILL, J.—This is an application by way of appeal from the report of the registrar, on the ground that that report cannot be supported in law. The matter has been before the court on two occasions. On the last occasion the court referred the matter back to the registrar to find whether any part of the amount claimed by the Admiralty—namely, 277*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*—had in fact been allowed to the Uskmoor, in the reference between the owners of the Uskmoor and the owners of the Minnetonka, for the damage sustained by the Uskmoor in consequence of a collision between those two ships, for which they were found both to blame. The registrar has found that this amount had not been dealt with in that reference. The Uskmoor was on a voyage from the Tyne to South Africa, laden with a cargo of coal, the property of the Admiralty. During the voyage she came into collision with the Minnetonka, in consequence of which the Uskmoor herself was damaged, and also, to a certain extent, the cargo on board. The Uskmoor was then taken to the river Thames to be repaired, and it was ascertained that the repairs would take, it was estimated, about six to eight weeks, and the Admiralty and the owners of the Uskmoor very properly tried to see what could be done in the circumstances for the benefit of each other. On the 12th June the Admiralty wrote to the owners of the Uskmoor asking them what arrangements they had made with regard to the storage of the cargo on shore or in lighters during the repairs to the ship. The letter ended with this paragraph: "Until the receipt of the surveyor's (Mr. Lewis') report it will not be possible to form a definite opinion as to the best course to pursue, but I should be glad to have your views as soon as possible as to the advisability of selling the coal and considering the voyage terminated, so as to avoid the expense of storage and re-shipping." The expense of re-shipping would not fall entirely upon the cargo owners, but the expense of storage, subject to general average, would fall upon the cargo owners. That letter was answered by the owners of the Uskmoor on the 13th June, when they said the repairs would take about eight weeks, and it was impossible for them to advise the Admiralty as to the termination of the voyage, but that if the Admiralty wished to do so they would do so for the consideration of 7*s.* 6*d.* per ton "as full freight." Then on the 17th June Mr. Lewis wrote to the Admiralty, amongst other things, this: "Messrs. Runciman will now accept 1000*l.* in respect of the freight, which is a trifle more than Messrs. Hopkins, Son, and Cookes had advised you. They had written their letter to you before they could make sure whether it was 996*l.* or 1000*l.* All that is wanted from you now is a letter to Messrs. Runciman stating that you offer them 1000*l.* in respect of the freight and stating that you will give them another cargo to replace the present one at the 16*s.* rate or more if the freights should rise in the meantime, of course they giving you proper and sufficient notice when the vessel is expected to be ready, and Messrs. Runciman to have the option of refusing the offer." On the same day Messrs. Hopkins, Son, and Cookes wrote to Mr. Lowrey, the secretary of the Salvage Association, and they put the case in this way: "We beg to inform you that we have carefully considered the facts and circumstances of this case, and assuming the voyage is terminated in London and the ship-owners are paid 4*s.* 6*d.* per ton, equal 996*l.* 15*s.*, this amount will be apportioned as per annexed sheet as a substituted expense in lieu of hire of barges: Six weeks 664*l.* 10*s.*, shifting ditto 106*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, re-shipping cargo 424*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*, total 1195*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*; and in addition to the above expenses which will be saved, the expected deterioration by breakage of coal, estimated by Mr. Lewis at about 10 per cent. at least on Cape Town values, and 2 per cent. for loss of weight, is avoided. It will, of course, be necessary to obtain the agreement of all interests to this arrangement." Then Mr. Lowrey wrote on the 18th June to Messrs. Hopkins, Son, and Cookes: "The ship underwriters have approved our suggestion that the coals should be sold in London and that the loss of freight should be treated as a substituted expense." The keynote of this case is that the loss of freight should be treated as a substituted expense. Then comes the letter of the 18th June, setting out the figures of general average and freight, and there is the final letter from the Admiralty on the 20th June to Messrs. Runciman: "Your expression 'to pay the shipowners the sum of 1000l.' is understood as meaning that the sum of 1000l. will be apportioned on the basis stated in my letter of the 18th June, and a claim made by the owners upon the Admiralty for the portion thereof falling upon the cargo when the general average adjustment is completed." When this case first went before the registrar and merchants it was put in this way: That the shipowners and the Admiralty had agreed that the sum of 1000l. was to be paid for freight. To-day the claim is not for freight at all. It is not put as having anything to do with freight. That part of the case has been put on one side. It is put in this way: That the Admiralty have entered into an obligation, binding upon them, to pay to the owners of the ship 276l. odd, and that there was a good consideration for that binding contract between them for the abandonment of the voyage. When one comes to test the claim, to see what it really means, it comes to this, that if the voyage had not been abandoned and if the cargo had remained in barges, and if the Admiralty had become responsible to pay, as they would have become, for the hire of the barges, the amount would certainly have exceeded 276l. It may be that this is a sum of money which, in the circumstances of this case, the shipowners could recover from the Admiralty—I do not say it would be so or would not be so—but it does not follow that, because the Admiralty would be liable to the shipowners, therefore the Admiralty can put that liability over on to the backs of the owners of the Minnetonka, the wrongdoing ship. The only way in which the Admiralty can recover against the owners of the Minnetonka here is by showing a certain loss, or a sum of money lost; that is, a certain loss in consequence of a reasonable arrangement by the person having a claim minimising the claim which he has against the wrongdoer. But it must be a loss and a liability arising directly in consequence of the wrongdoing act of the Minnetonka. If it is not, then it is not recoverable. Is that the case here? I think not. The real facts as I find them to be and as I understand them to be, and as to them there is really no contradiction, are these: The voyage was abandoned. As between the shipowners, the Uskmoor, the cargo owners, and the Admiralty, a sum of money greater than 276l. was agreed to be paid. It is now said that that sum of money is a sum of money for which the Admiralty would have been liable in an event which has not in fact occurred, and that is a sum which directly represents a loss by the Admiralty occasioned by the wrongdoing of the Minnetonka. I think all these suggestions are not according to the real facts—that what really has happened is this, that the parties have put their heads together and come to some hypothetical figure not based upon fact, and not representing a direct loss or damage suffered by the Admiralty in consequence of the collision; and that therefore the Admiralty cannot make good this claim as against the owners of the Minnetonka. But there is something else which, though not absolutely conclusive, is very important to be considered, and that is that this 276l., if the Admiralty could make the owners of the Minnetonka pay it, would be payable to the Uskmoor, and the owners of the Uskmoor have already been paid all the loss they have sustained in consequence of the collision; and although it is possible to conceive a case where the owners of a ship may make a profit by the wrongdoing of the other party, in this case I think the owners of the Uskmoor would not be entitled to make such a profit, although, of course, the Admiralty could not make that answer if they had undertaken, for good consideration, to pay a sum of money to the Uskmoor. In conclusion, it seems to me that this case fails, because it has not been made out in law or in fact to be a loss sustained by the Admiralty directly in consequence of the wrongdoing act of the Minnetonka. Therefore my judgment must be against the appellants, and I confirm the report No. 1 of the registrar, and also report No. 2, with the result that those who have succeeded must have the costs of this appeal, and also of the second reference.

ADM.]

THE HARE.

Collision—Manchester Ship Canal—Fog—Application of Sea Rules—Duty to stop and reverse on hearing whistle of approaching vessel—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 16 and 30—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 418 (1).

Semble, the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea do not apply to the Manchester Ship Canal. Even assuming that they do apply, a vessel coming down the canal in a fog is not necessarily to blame under art. 16 of the regulations if she does not stop her engines on hearing the whistle of an approaching vessel forward of her beam; for the approaching vessel must be in the canal, and it may be assumed that she is being navigated on her right side, and her position is therefore, under the circumstances, sufficiently ascertained.

ACTION for damage by collision.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship South Coast, and the defendants the owners of the steamship Hare.

The collision occurred about 1.28 p.m. on the 6th Dec. 1903 in the Manchester Ship Canal near the Weaver Sluices. The weather was foggy, and there was no wind, the tide was slack, and both vessels were sounding their whistles.

The South Coast was a steamship of 421 tons gross register, and at the time was proceeding down the canal on a voyage from Manchester to Plymouth with a general cargo on board and manned by a crew of twelve hands all told.

The Hare was a steamship of 804 tons gross register, and at the time was proceeding up the canal on a voyage from Dublin to Manchester with a general cargo and passengers, and manned by a crew of twenty-four hands all told.

The facts of the case will be found sufficiently set out in the judgment.

The case is reported on the question of the application of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea to waters such as the Manchester Ship Canal, and on the application of art. 16 of the regulations to such waters.

By the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea it is provided :

These rules shall be followed by all vessels upon the high seas and in all waters connected therewith, navigable by sea-going vessels.

Art. 16. Every vessel shall, in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain storms, go at a moderate speed having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions. A steamvessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.

Art. 30. Nothing in these rules shall interfere with the operation of a special rule, duly made by local authority, relative to the navigation of any harbour, river, or inland waters.

By sect. 418 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) :

Her Majesty may on the joint recommendation of the Admiralty and the Board of Trade, by Order in Council, make regulations for the preventing of collisions at sea, and may thereby regulate the lights to be carried and exhibited, the fog signals to be carried and used, and the steering and sailing rules to be observed by ships, and those regulations (in this Act referred to as the collision regulations) shall have effect as if enacted in this Act.

At the trial of the action the master of the plaintiffs' vessel admitted that he had heard the whistle of the Hare before she came into view, but did not stop his engines.

It was contended by the defendants that on this account the plaintiffs' vessel must be found to blame as art. 16 of the Collision Regulations had not been complied with.

Aspinall, K.C. and Noad for the plaintiffs.—The Sea Rules do not apply to waters such as the Manchester Ship Canal. Sect. 418 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 applies only to collisions at sea. There is no by-law for the Manchester Ship Canal which requires a vessel to stop on hearing the whistle of another vessel forward of the beam. The canal by-laws are a complete code dealing with the duties of ships under all circumstances, and it is submitted that any such regulation was expressly omitted. The Carlotta (80 L. T. Rep. 664; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; (1899) P. 228) is in favour of this view. It is true that art. 30 provides that nothing in the Sea Rules shall interfere with the operation of a special rule duly made by a local authority. Assuming, however, that the Sea Rules applied, art. 16 has no application to the present case and the circumstances were special, and it would not have been a safe thing for the South Coast to have stopped. It is necessary that a vessel should keep her heading in the narrow waters of a canal, and there is no danger in her so doing, as a vessel must be coming in a fixed direction. It is not like the open sea, where one vessel may be crossing the course of the other. But, even assuming the rule does apply, in this case the position of the Hare had been duly ascertained.

Laing, K.C. and Bateson, for the defendants, contra.—The Sea Rules apply to the high seas and "all waters connected therewith navigable by sea-going vessels." If there is no local rule which ought reasonably and properly to prevent the application of the Sea Rules then the Sea Rules apply. For instance, in the case of a vessel in dock, she would be bound to carry the regulation lights when under way. The Manchester Ship Canal is a water connected with the high seas within the meaning of art. 30 of the regulations. The fact of a gate being shut at times during certain states of the tide does not prevent its being so, and it is submitted that although the Canal is shut off from the sea it is connected with it none the less. In this particular case the gate of the locks was open, so that in fact the canal at the time was actually connected with the high seas. In The Carlotta (ubi sup.) there was no rule as to navigation in question. There is as much a duty to stop in a canal on hearing a whistle forward of the beam as elsewhere. It is the duty of a vessel to stop and ascertain the true bearing of an approaching vessel in every case :

The Bernard Hall, 86 L. T. Rep. 658; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300

The Koning Willem I., 88 L. T. Rep. 807 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 425; (1903) P. 114.

The by-laws for the Manchester Ship Canal, even if they did provide for a case such as the present, could not be enforced as they had not received the consent of the Board of Trade as required by sect. 198 of the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885. They have not been "duly made" within the meaning of art. 30 of the regulations.

Aspinall, K.C. in reply.

BARNES, J.—This is a case of a collision which took place between the steamships South Coast and Hare, a little before two o'clock in the afternoon of the 6th Dec. in last year, in the Manchester Ship Canal, near the Weaver Sluices. The weather at the time was foggy, and the tide had nearly ceased to operate at all—it was slack—there being such tide, I mean, as seems to be allowed to run in during the time that the lock gates are open at Eastham. The South Coast is a screw steamer of 421 tons gross register, and was proceeding down the Ship Canal on a voyage from Manchester to Plymouth with general cargo. The Hare is a screw steamer of 804 tons gross register, and was proceeding up the Ship Canal, on a voyage from Dublin to Manchester with general cargo and passengers. These vessels were sounding their whistles for fog, and they met in collision at the place I have mentioned, the collision taking place practically stem on, the stem of the Hare striking the starboard bow of the South Coast about two feet from the stem. The question is which of these vessels was to blame for this collision. I do not intend to go through the cases presented on each side, as there is a certain looseness in the evidence and certain inconsistencies have been pointed out in the preliminary act and pleadings of the plaintiffs and their evidence, and certain criticisms have been made on the defendants' evidence. The result, however, is that one of the broad points to determine in the case is whether the collision happened, to use an ordinary expression, in the water of the plaintiffs or in the water of the defendants, each side maintaining that it took place on their own side of the canal, and, therefore, that the other ship was in the wrong. Other points in the case are as to the navigation of

[ADM.]

THE HARE.

these vessels with regard to stopping, helm action, and speed. With the assistance of the Elder Brethren I have come to a conclusion of fact in this case which enables me to decide it, but there are some points which have been disclosed in the course of the arguments that involve matters of some little difficulty; and if I felt it necessary to decide the case only upon some of these more difficult matters I should have thought it desirable, probably, to express what I have to say after more consideration. But the points that have been pressed, and which involve certain difficulties, are not, to my mind, essential features of the case, and I can without, I hope, tying my hand too tightly by the expression of any views about these more difficult matters, come to a conclusion about this case. Dealing first with one of the points presented on the part of the defendants against the plaintiffs, it is this: it is said that the plaintiffs' vessel did not stop her engines on hearing the whistle of the defendants' ship. The plaintiffs' master said: "I heard a whistle once before she came up before I saw her." Upon his evidence it would seem that he only stopped his engines when he saw what he described as a loom, and then thought it was a ship. The point made by the defendants is that the plaintiffs' vessel must be to blame because her engines were not stopped on hearing the whistle of the defendants' ship, before even she was seen. It is said that that makes the plaintiffs' vessel responsible because of art. 16 of the Sea Regulations. The answer made to that point is that that regulation does not apply, and that none of the Sea Regulations do apply to the Manchester Ship Canal. I am not at all satisfied that it is necessary for me to express a positive opinion about that point, but my present impression is that the Sea Regulations do not apply to the Manchester Ship Canal. These regulations are made in pursuance of sect. 418 of the Merchant Shipping Act, under which Her Majesty—that Act was passed in the reign of the late Queen, namely in 1894—may on the joint recommendation of the Admiralty and the Board of Trade, by Order in Council, make regulations for the prevention of collisions at sea. Now, the plaintiffs say that the regulations only apply for the purpose of preventing collisions at sea, and that this was not a collision which took place at sea. The defendants, however, say that it did take place at sea within the meaning of the section, and that the words "at sea" have been interpreted by those who drew the regulations as including something which included the present case, because the preliminary is as follows: "These rules shall be followed by all vessels upon the high seas and in all waters connected therewith, navigable by sea-going vessels." I do not myself read that preliminary article as intended to extend the word "sea" beyond its proper meaning. The preliminary rule says "high seas and in all waters connected therewith," and my view has already been expressed in the case of The Carlotta (ubi sup.). Of course, if the sea rules do not apply, there is an end of that point, and my view is that they do not apply to the Ship Canal. I cannot myself conceive how they could strictly be said to apply to a piece of navigable channel artificially constructed, terminating at Eastham in locks which only at times admit the sea, and which has locks at different places all the way up, from place to place, and where it is necessary to do what the pilot of the Rondane said. He said they were in every lock together down to Latchford. I should have thought it was tolerably clear that the upper part cannot be said to be connected with the sea, at any rate, and I do not see very well how the term could be applied to the lower part, even if it is, for a portion of the time, allowed to have an inflow of sea water, when the gates are open. Certainly it would be, I think, extremely inconvenient if the Sea Regulations were so held to apply. It would have this very curious result, that vessels navigating in the canal near a part of the sea, to which they cannot get, and vessels navigating in the sea, might be hearing whistles forward of their beam, and for which they would have to act, though by no possibility could they get at each other.

But Mr. Aspinall took a further point—namely, that even if the sea rules apply, then there is art. 30 of the regulations, which provides "that nothing in these rules shall interfere with the operation of a special rule, duly made by local authority, relative to the navigation of any harbour, river, or inland waters." He said there is a scheme in this case of rules made by the local authority which regulates the navigation of the Manchester Ship Canal, and he referred me to the published regulations of the Manchester Ship Canal—to arts. 6, 7, 15, and 16, and to the schedule of signals which are contained in those regulations. Then he said that those rules, or some of them, show what vessels have to do when they are meeting each other, and what they have to do to avoid danger of collision. But there seems some difficulty in treating those regulations as really made within the meaning of art. 30—as really duly made by the local authority—because Mr. Laing pointed out that under sect. 198 of the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885 the only power to make by-laws or regulations applicable to such a matter as I am considering is power to make regulations "for regulating the conduct of the owners, masters, and crews of vessels propelled by steam with respect to the rate of speed at which they may proceed within the canal, docks, or works, or any part or parts thereof, respectively, and for requiring such vessels to stop or slow their engines at such times and places as the company may require, and to keep the advertised times of sailing, and for regulating the taking on board, landing, or putting out of passengers"—which does not in terms cover all the matters that have to be considered with regard to signals, lights, and so forth on board ships; and, further, that in the latter part of the section there is a provision that such "by-laws, except so far as they relate solely to the company or their officers or servants, shall be subject to the provisions with respect to by-laws of the Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, except sect. 85 of that Act, but no such by-laws shall have any force or effect unless and until the same be confirmed by the Board of Trade." Sect. 85 of the Act of 1847, which is there referred to, provides that no by-laws shall come into operation until allowed in the manner prescribed and approved by one of the judges. Now, for one of the judges is substituted the Board of Trade, but I understand that the particular regulations which have been relied upon by Mr. Aspinall have not been confirmed by the Board of Trade. That is the statement made to me, as far as I understand it. So that the point which Mr. Aspinall took would not seem to be satisfactorily established. But the result of that would be that although the regulations may not, perhaps, be strictly termed enforceable, as being duly made, as I understand it, at present, yet still they show what the practice of navigation is; and so far as the actual seamanship and navigation of those two vessels is concerned both parties have argued the case before me as if it was their own duty to keep to their own side and to act with reasonable caution and stop and reverse and pass port side to port side. There is one other point I might mention, which seems to me important. That is, that even if art. 16 applies, yet the rule applies only where the position of the vessel which makes the fog signal is not ascertained, and I think in this case that even if that rule is treated as applicable, the position in the particular circumstances of the case was such that when the whistle of the other vessel was heard that vessel was in a position which was ascertained. It is perfectly obvious that she must be in the canal—they need not trouble themselves about vessels in the river—and therefore her ordinary position in the canal must be ascertained if both vessels keep to their right side. Her distance, too, must be reasonably ascertained because the Rondane was proceeding ahead of the plaintiffs' vessel and between her and the Hare. So both I and the Elder Brethren think that if art. 16 applies the circumstances were such that it was reasonable to say that the position of the Hare was sufficiently ascertained to comply with the rule. I also think it is worth while pointing out that the rules must be worked with a certain amount of reason. Mr. Aspinall relied upon the second part of art. 16, "so far as the circumstances of the case admit." It would be very awkward if every time a whistle was heard and there were a number of vessels going down and others were coming up, meeting each other, it was obligatory upon any vessel in a lock to stop. It would seriously hamper vessels astern; and although there is a rule in the schedule of signals providing a special signal to be made if a vessel is obliged to stop when another vessel is following her, the effect of stopping for every whistle heard would be to stop all the traffic, and there would be, it seems to me, a general standstill, which is not desirable. For these reasons, which, as I have said, I give without any lengthy consideration, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs' vessel cannot be held to blame simply because she did not stop her engines upon hearing the whistle of the Hare. [His Lordship then dealt with the facts, and found the Hare alone to blame for the collision.]

COURT OF APPEAL.

Friday, March 4, 1904.

(Before COLLINS, M.R., ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ.)

BOARD OF TRADE v. SAILING SHIP GLENPARK LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Seamen—"Distressed seaman"—Provisions for relief—Evidence of distress—Receipt of wages by seaman—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 190, 191, 193—Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44), s. 4.

The question whether a seaman who has been shipwrecked abroad is a "distressed seaman" within the meaning of sects. 190, 191, and 193 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 is a question of fact.

A "distressed seaman" does not of necessity cease to be a "distressed seaman" on his being paid the wages due to him, when such wages are enough to pay the expenses of his maintenance abroad and passage home.

Decision of Bigham, J. (88 L. T. Rep. 693; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; (1903) 2 K. B. 324) affirmed. Quære, whether the "sufficient evidence" of expenses incurred for his benefit which is provided for by sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, means "conclusive evidence."

APPEAL by the defendant company from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the Board of Trade against the owners of the sailing ship Glenpark to recover the sum of 99l. 18s. 11d., being the balance of moneys paid by the plaintiffs in respect of the maintenance and relief of certain seamen alleged to have been "distressed seamen" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

In May 1900 the Glenpark left Barry (Cardiff) on a voyage to Cape Town and (or) any ports or places within the limits of 75 degrees north and 60 degrees south latitude, the maximum time to be three years' trading in any rotation and to end in the United Kingdom or Continent of Europe between the Elbe and Brest inclusive at master's option.

On the 29th Jan. 1901 the Glenpark, in the course of her voyage, left Port Germein, in South Australia, on a voyage to Algoa Bay, her crew consisting of twenty-six hands all told—namely, master, two mates, cook, steward, carpenter, sailmaker, boatswain, five apprentices (one of whom acted as third mate), twelve A.B.s, and one ordinary seaman.

On the 1st Feb. 1901 the Glenpark struck on a sunken rock near Wedge Island, in Spencer Gulf, South Australia, and became a total wreck. The crew lost the whole of their effects except the clothes they were wearing, but were saved and taken in the ship's boats to Port Victoria, in South Australia, arriving there on the 2nd Feb. 1901. The log and the agreement with the crew were lost with the vessel.

Between the 2nd and the 4th Feb. 1901 the crew were subsisted at Port Victoria by the Governor of South Australia on behalf of the Crown, acting by the Marine Board of South Australia, at a cost (excluding that incurred in respect of the master) of 13*l.* 1*s.*

On the 4th Feb. 1901 the crew were provided with passages from Port Victoria to Port Adelaide by the same authority at a cost (excluding that incurred in respect of the master) of 20*l.* 16*s.* The crew on their arrival on the 4th Feb. at Port Adelaide were (except the master) subsisted there by the same authority at a cost of 26*l.* 5*s.*, and were also provided by the same authority with necessary clothing.

On the 6th Feb. 1901 the representatives of the owners of the Glenpark at Port Adelaide, in the presence of the superintendent of the Mercantile Marine Board of South Australia, paid each member of the crew the balance of wages due to him under the agreement with the crew up to the time the vessel was lost.

The majority of the crew obtained employment at Port Adelaide, but eight members thereof failed to obtain any employment and were provided with passages to the United Kingdom by the same authority at a cost of 63*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*

The total expenses incurred on behalf of the crew (excluding the master) by the said authority amounted to the sum of 236*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*

The Board of Trade, on behalf of the Crown, paid the sum of 236*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.* to the said authority as money due to them in respect of expenses incurred on account of distressed seamen within the meaning of sect. 193 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and the Board of Trade contended that they were entitled on behalf of the Crown to recover the whole of that sum from the defendants under the same section.

The defendants paid to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs accepted, both without prejudice, various sums amounting in all to 136*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* in respect of the expenses of members of the crew, fourteen in number, and with regard to the expenses of these members the defendants admitted liability; and no question of further payment in reference to such members now arose. As regards these fourteen members of the crew, the wages so paid to them were in every case less than the amount expended on their behalf as hereinbefore mentioned. The sum of 136*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* was in fact greater by 1*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* than the amount of the said expenses, but the difference was, for the purposes of this case, treated as immaterial. The balance of the total sum of 236*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*—viz., 99*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*—had never been paid to the plaintiffs by the defendants in whole or in part, and the plaintiffs now claimed that balance from the defendants in the present action. That balance represented the amount of expenses incurred on behalf of the eleven remaining members of the crew other than the fourteen members above-mentioned, the wages paid to whom were in every case greater than the expenses so incurred.

At the trial of the action Bigham, J. held that the eleven seamen in question were "distressed seamen" within sect. 193 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 notwithstanding the fact that the wages paid to them were in excess of the expenses of their maintenance abroad and passage home. The learned judge also held that under sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, the production of the account of expenses there mentioned and proof of payment were conclusive evidence of the right of the Board of Trade to recover such expenses.

The learned judge therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The case is reported 88 L. T. Rep. 693; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; (1903) 2 K. B. 324.

The defendants appealed.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) contains the following provisions under the heading, "Distressed Seamen":

Sect. 190. The Board of Trade may make regulations with respect to the relief, maintenance, and sending home of seamen and apprentices found in distress abroad, and may by those regulations (in this Act referred to as the distressed seamen regulations) make such conditions as they think fit with regard to that relief, maintenance, and sending home, and a seaman shall not have any right to be relieved, maintained, or sent home except in the cases and to the extent and on the conditions provided by those regulations.

Sect. 191 (1). The following authorities, that is to say, governors of British possessions, . . . may, in accordance with and in the conditions prescribed by the distressed seamen regulations provide for the maintenance, until a passage home can be procured, of the following seamen and apprentices (who are in this Act included in the term distressed seamen) namely, (a) seamen and apprentices to the sea service, whether subjects of Her Majesty or not, who by reason of having been discharged or left behind abroad or shipwrecked from any British ship, or any of Her Majesty's ships, are in distress in any place abroad; . . . (4) The authority shall be paid in respect of the expenses of the maintenance and conveyance of distressed seamen such sums as the Board of Trade may allow, and those sums shall, on the production of the bills of disbursements, with the proper vouchers, be paid as hereinafter provided.

Sect. 193, sub-sect. 1, as amended by sect. 4 of the Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44) provides that when expenses on account of a distressed seaman for maintenance, necessary clothing, and conveyance home are incurred by or on behalf of the Crown, these expenses shall be a charge upon the ship, whether British or foreign, to which such distressed seaman or apprentice belonged, and shall be a debt to the Crown from the master of the ship or from the owner of the ship for the time being.

Sub-sect. 2 provides:

The debt, in addition to any fines which may have been incurred, may be recovered by the Board of Trade on behalf of the Crown either by ordinary process of law, or in the court and manner in which wages may be recovered by seamen.

Sub-sect. 3 provides:

In any proceeding for such recovery, the production of the account (if any) of the expenses furnished in accordance with this Act, or the distressed seamen regulations, and proof of payment of the expenses by or on behalf of the Board of Trade, shall be sufficient evidence that the expenses were incurred or repaid under this Act by or on behalf of the Crown.

Danckwerts, K.C. and Maurice Hill for the defendants.—To justify the payment of money for the relief of a distressed seaman under this Act, it is not enough to show that the seaman was "discharged or left behind abroad or shipwrecked," it must also be shown that he was "in distress." "Distressed" means "in want"—i.e., in want of something necessary which he is unable to procure for himself, as was Æneas after his shipwreck: "Ipse ignotus egens Libyæ deserta peragro": (Æn. I 384). In the case of these eleven seamen they received wages which in each case were largely in excess of the expenditure which was actually necessary for their maintenance. With reference to sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, "sufficient evidence" does not there mean "conclusive evidence":

Barracough v. Greenough, 8 B. & S. 623; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 612.

"Sufficient" means prima facie sufficient:

R. v. Fordham, L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 501.

An enactment altering the law as to evidence, and creating statutory evidence whereby the rights of parties may be defeated, must be construed strictly:

Northard v. Pepper, 10 L. T. Rep. 782; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 52; 17 C. B. N. S. 39, at p. 50.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, K.C.) (the Solicitor-General (Sir E. Carson, K.C.) and Henry Sutton with him) for the Board of Trade.—There was some evidence before Bigham, J. that these seamen were in distress, and no evidence was offered in opposition. It would be monstrous to say that a seaman abroad is not in distress merely because his wages are enough to pay for a passage home, and to land him penniless in England. He may have a wife and family dependent on his earnings. [He was stopped.]

Maurice Hill replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Bigham, J., and the principal point raised is a very short one. The question is whether, under the particular circumstances of this case, certain persons were "distressed seamen" within the meaning of sect. 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Now the question arises in this way: These sailors were shipwrecked near Australia, and they succeeded in getting in the first instance to Port Victoria, from which place they found their way ultimately to Adelaide. In the wreck they lost all their kit, in fact everything except the clothes in which they stood, but when they got to Adelaide the wages due to them up to that date were paid them by the agents of the shipowners. Now, it is not disputed that up to the time that the wages were paid at Adelaide these men were "distressed seamen," but it is contended by the shipowners that from and after the time that the wages were paid these men ceased to be "distressed seamen," and were therefore not within the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, which entitle the British representative at the place where a "distressed seaman" may be to furnish him with the means for maintenance and to supply him with a passage home. Now the words under which the question arises are in sect. 191. [His Lordship read it.] It is said that these shipwrecked seamen do not come within the class of seamen there referred to because, having received their wages, they were not "in distress." It seems to me that the question whether they were, or were not, "in distress," notwithstanding the fact that they had received their wages, is a question of fact. It seems to me to be perfectly possible that a seaman who has lost everything except what he stands up in, and who has upon his shoulders the burden of a family, may very well be "in distress," although he has just been paid his wages. Wages paid to him in a foreign country afford him no provision for getting home again except at his own cost, and leave him, as I have said, with the burden of his family at home. On my reading of the section the fact that a man is shipwrecked is not conclusive evidence of his being "in distress." As was pointed out by my brother Romer in the course of the argument, a shipwrecked person may be a millionaire with plenty of money actually in his pocket so that he stands in no need of assistance from a banker or anyone else. You could not say that such a person was a "distressed seaman," and entitled under the Act to be maintained and provided with a passage home. Therefore the question whether a seaman who has been shipwrecked is "in distress" seems to me to be one of fact. That being so, what is the evidence in the present case? The evidence is that which I have stated, and then by sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, the production of the account of the expenses furnished in accordance with the Act or the distressed seamen regulations, and proof of payment of the expenses by or on behalf of the Board of Trade is "sufficient evidence" that the expenses were incurred or repaid under the Act by or on behalf of the Crown.

Bigham, J. seemed to think that "sufficient evidence" was equivalent to "conclusive evidence." Without giving any opinion on that point, it seems to me that the evidence is certainly sufficient, if it is not contradicted. In the present case I think that there was plenty of evidence—in the absence of anything more to the contrary than the fact that wages of a certain amount were paid—upon which the learned judge at the trial was justified in coming to the conclusion that these men were "distressed seamen" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. In fact, on the evidence that was before him, I should have arrived at the same conclusion myself. Therefore on the facts of the case it seems to me that there is no ground for interfering with the decision of Bigham, J. On the question whether the words "sufficient evidence" in sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, mean "conclusive evidence" it is unnecessary that I should give any decision, and I therefore desire to reserve my opinion.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Whether a shipwrecked sailor is or is not at a particular port a "distressed seaman" is a question of fact. He is not of necessity a "distressed seaman" because he has been shipwrecked. For example, as was pointed out by my Lord, a man who had been shipwrecked could not fairly be called a "distressed seaman" if he arrived with 500*l.* in his pocket at a place like Port Adelaide where every necessity can be obtained. On the other hand, I certainly am not prepared to hold that a shipwrecked sailor who has lost everything, coming to a place like Port Adelaide, ceases to be a "distressed seaman" because he is paid his wages, even if those wages turn out to have been sufficient to pay for the expenses of his maintenance there, and his shipment back to England. I do not think that a man could be said to be of necessity a distressed seaman because he may have been paid his expenses to England, landing him there without a penny or without enough to enable him to keep himself at all, even for the shortest possible time on his arriving in England, especially bearing in mind, as has been pointed out, that he may have a family in England dependent on him. It 's a question of fact. Now, in the present case we have what the statute calls "sufficient evidence" that these seamen were "distressed seamen" at the time in question. Against that sufficient evidence there is no contrary sufficient evidence to be placed. That being so, I come to the conclusion, on the question of fact, that these seamen were "distressed seamen." Like the Master of the Rolls, I express no opinion, because it is unnecessary that I should do so, upon the point whether "sufficient evidence" in sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, means "conclusive evidence."

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It was not disputed that if the wages paid to the seaman were less than the amount necessary to bring him back to England he would be a "distressed seaman." He would certainly be so, if he were in that position. If that be so, it seems to me that it is a question of fact to be determined by the court how far wages paid to a man under those circumstances were available for the purpose of bringing him home. As I pointed out, it makes a serious alteration in the terms of the contract between the shipowner and the seaman. Now, what is the evidence here? We have before us the account upon which the authorities in Australia acted, and that account, it is said, is evidence that they must have been satisfied as regards each of these men that they continued to be "distressed seamen." If the case were that a seaman, shipwrecked abroad, must arrive destitute in this country if his wages were to be chargeable with the expense of bringing him home, I should approve of the judgment of the official who said that a seaman does not cease to be a "distressed seaman" by reason of the fact that if his wages were paid at once he would be able to discharge his present obligations. As to the meaning of the expression "sufficient evidence" in sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, it is unnecessary to express any opinion whether or not the words mean "conclusive evidence," because there was undoubtedly, in the present case, evidence before the court upon which the court was entitled to act, as it remained unanswered on the part of the shipowners. For these reasons I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN C. TRAAE, FOR THE OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP RIKARD NORDRAAK, AND LENNARD AND SONS LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Hire — Suspension of hire — Detention by ice "caused by breakdown of steamer"—Vessel detained owing to repairs made necessary by stranding.

By a charter-party it was provided by one clause that, in the event of loss of time from damage preventing the working of the vessel, the payment of hire should cease until she should again be in an efficient state to resume her service, and by another clause that "detention by ice should be for account of charterers unless caused by breakdown of steamer."

During the voyage the vessel stranded; the necessary repairs were effected and she resumed her voyage; owing, however, to the delay thus caused she was unable to proceed to the destined port before it was closed by ice, and she was consequently detained at an intermediate port.

Held (affirming the judgment of Ridley, J.), that there was a detention by ice "caused by breakdown of steamer," and that payment of hire ceased during that detention.

APPEAL OF C. Traae from the judgment of Ridley, J. upon a special case stated by arbitrators.

The arbitrators appointed under a submission contained in a charter-party, dated the 1st Oct. 1902, stated a special case for the opinion of the court which, so far as is material, was as follows:

By the charter-party, dated the 1st Oct. 1902, it was agreed between C. Traae for the owners of the steamship Rikard Nordraak, hereinafter called "the owners," and J. M. Lennard and Sons Limited, hereinafter called "the charterers," that the owners should let and the charterers should hire the steamship for the term of about two calendar months from the day on which she was placed with a clear hold at the disposal of the charterers at Cardiff, Barry, Penarth, Newport, Swansea, or Port Talbot, as therein mentioned, to be employed on a voyage to Spain and Portugal, thence to the Baltic, and back to United Kingdom or the Continent, as charterers or their agents should direct, upon the following (among other) conditions:

Clause 1. That the owners should maintain the vessel in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for and during the service.

Clause 3. That the charterers should pay for the use and hire of the vessel at the rate of 370*l.* per calendar month, commencing on and from the day of her delivery to charterers as aforesaid, and at and after the same rate for any part of a month used to complete a voyage, hire to continue from the time specified for terminating the charter until her delivery to owners (unless lost) in the same good order and condition as when accepted (fair wear and tear only excepted) at a port in United Kingdom or on the Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

APP.] Re ARBIT., C. TRAAE, FOR OWNERS OF S.S. RIKARD NORDRAAK, & LENNARD & SONS. [APP.]

Clause 14. That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four running hours, the payment of hire should cease until she should be again in an efficient state to resume her service; but should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather or from any accident to the cargo, such detention or loss of time should be at the charterers' risk and expense.

Clause 16. The act of God, perils of sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates, and thieves, arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and people, collisions, stranding, and other accidents of navigation excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner.

Clause 26. Detention by ice to be for account of charterers unless caused by breakdown of steamer.

The steamship was duly placed at the disposal of the charterers under the charter-party, and proceeded under the charter-party to Pomaron, in Spain, where she loaded a cargo under the charter-party, for which bills of lading were signed for delivery of the said cargo at St. Petersburg.

The steamship sailed from Pomaron for St. Petersburg on the 19th Oct. 1902.

On the 28th Oct. 1902, while in the course of the voyage to St. Petersburg, the steamship grounded at or near Fairmunde, in the Baltic, and thereby received such damage as to render her unfit to continue the said voyage without repair. The captain accordingly put back to Copenhagen for repairs, where the vessel arrived on or about the 1st Nov. 1902, and the necessary repairs were completed on the 1st Dec. 1902. The cargo, or part of it, had been discharged for the purpose of the repairs. It was reloaded after the repairs were completed, and the vessel sailed from Copenhagen on the 1st Jan. 1903, and arrived at Revel, at the entrance of the Gulf of Finland, on the 6th Jan. She put into and stayed at Revel because she was unable to proceed further towards St. Petersburg by reason of ice. She is still at Revel, not frozen in, but awaiting the breaking up of the ice at St. Petersburg and the approaches thereto.

In these circumstances a dispute arose between the owners and the charterers under the charter-party as to the period for which, according to the true construction of the charter-party, the payment of hire should cease in consequence of the damage received by the steamship by grounding as aforesaid, and whether hire is payable by the charterers under the charter-party during the period of the detention of the ship at Revel.

The arbitrators found and awarded that no hire was payable by the charterers to the owners under the charter-party for the period from the 28th Oct. 1902 until the 20th Dec. 1902 inclusive, but that hire was payable by the charterers to the owners in respect of the period from the 20th Dec. 1902 until the 6th Jan. 1903 inclusive.

They found as a fact that the port of St. Petersburg became closed by ice on the 26th Nov. 1902, and not before, and that by reason of the ice it was practically impossible for the steamship, after completion of her repairs as aforesaid, to get nearer to St. Petersburg than the port of Revel, where she now lies. They further found as a fact that, if the steamship had not grounded on the 28th Oct. 1902 and received damage as aforesaid, she could easily have reached St. Petersburg and have discharged her cargo and have got away from that port before the 26th Nov., and before the port of St. Petersburg was closed by ice.

In these circumstances it was contended before the arbitrators on behalf of the charterers that the detention of the ship at Revel was a detention by ice caused by breakdown of steamer, and that, according to the true construction of the charter-party, the hire ceased during the period of such detention. On the other hand, it was contended on behalf of the owners that the detention at Revel was not a detention by ice at all, or that in any case it was not a detention by ice caused by breakdown of the steamer, and that therefore the hire continued to run during the period of such detention.

If and so far as it was a question of fact, the arbitrators awarded and determined that the detention of the steamship at Revel was a detention caused by breakdown, and, subject to the opinion of the court on the question hereinafter submitted, they awarded and determined that the hire ceased under the charter-party during the period of such detention.

The question for the opinion of the court was :

Whether upon the facts stated and upon the true construction of the charter-party hire was and would be payable by the charterers to the owners under the charter during the detention of the ship at Revel awaiting the opening of the port of St. Petersburg.

If the court should answer this question in the negative, then the award as above stated was to stand.

If the court should answer the question in the affirmative, then the award as above stated was to be set aside, and in that case the arbitrators awarded and directed that the hire continued to run at the rate stipulated by the charter-party, notwithstanding the detention of the steamer at Revel.

The special case was argued before Ridley, J., and the learned judge held that the decision of the arbitrators was right, and gave judgment in favour of the charterers.

The shipowners appealed.

Sims Williams for the appellants.—The decision of the learned judge, holding that the award of the arbitrators must be upheld, was wrong. Under this charter-party the liability to pay hire would not cease in any case except upon the happening of one of the events specified in clause 14. The detention of the vessel at Revel was not caused by any one of those events. The vessel, as soon as she was repaired, was again in an efficient state, and the liability to pay hire would again arise. It had been decided that hire did not cease to be payable because, owing to accident, the vessel was delayed for repairs :

Miller Brother and Co. (64 L. T. Rep. 205; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; (1891) A. C. 48) this clause came up for consideration, and it was held that there was a suspension of hire only during the time that the vessel was actually inefficient for service. Even if this detention can be said to have been caused by the stranding of the vessel, "stranding" is one of the excepted perils specified in clause 16. Clause 26 does not provide that the payment of hire shall cease if there is a detention by ice caused by breakdown of steamer. It is an entirely separate and distinct clause, and a provision for the cesser of hire ought not to be read into it. If the charterers have any remedy under clause 26, it is a remedy in damages only. This detention by ice was not "caused by breakdown of steamer." The vessel after she was repaired was not broken down at all, and was able to proceed on the voyage. She was not detained by ice, for she was not frozen in at all. At Revel her cargo could have been discharged and forwarded by land to St. Petersburg.

Scrutton, K.C. and H. W. Loehnis, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—I think that this appeal must fail. It seems to me that clause 26 of the charterparty means what it plainly says: "Detention by ice to be for account of charterers unless caused by breakdown of steamer." The steamer was broken down, and by reason of that breakdown she was so long delayed that she was unable to proceed on the voyage as far as St. Petersburg by reason of that port being blocked by ice. Therefore there was a "detention by ice," which was not to be "for account of charterers," but was to be for account of the shipowners. Therefore the payment of hire was suspended during that detention. This appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Damages, measure of—Sale of goods—Disclaimer of responsibility for bad workmanship—Costs of action by sub-vendee against purchaser reasonably defended.

*The plaintiffs having undertaken the repairs of a steamship for the owners, employed the defendants, an engineering company, to construct a new crank shaft. The shipowners succeeded on their counter-claim, the shaft being found to have been of faulty workmanship.

In an action by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendants the costs of the shipowners' counter-claim, as damages resulting from the defendants' breach of contract:

Held, that the terms on which the defendants had supplied the shaft did not relieve them from paying these costs; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the costs of the counter-claim except so far as they were increased by any issue other than the faultiness of the material or workmanship of the shaft.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Kennedy, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover from the defendants the costs which had been incurred by the plaintiffs in defending a claim made against them by the owners of the steamship Alcester.

In Jan. 1902 the steamship Alcester, being out of repair and needing a new crank shaft, was intrusted by the owners to the present plaintiffs, the Prince of Wales Dry Dock Company (Swansea) Limited, to have the necessary work carried out.

The plaintiffs, not being manufacturers of crank shafts, ordered one of the defendant company.

The defendant company agreed to supply a double throw ordinary built crank shaft for the steamship Alcester for the sum of 150*l.*, and their letter which constituted their acceptance of the plaintiffs' order contained in a postscript the following clause:

NOTE.—We do everything in our power to insure good material and workmanship, together with quick dispatch, but disclaim all responsibility for failure of either, beyond the replacement of faulty work as supplied by us (if practically possible to do so).

The defendants then manufactured and supplied the plaintiffs with a crank shaft, and the plaintiffs put it into the ship.

The Alcester, on the completion of the repairs, started on a voyage, but, in consequence of the breaking of the crank shaft, had to put into Naples for temporary repairs, and on her return to England she had to be fitted with a new crank shaft.

The owners of the ship refused to pay the plaintiffs for the crank shaft which had broken down.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought an action for the price of the shaft.

The shipowners delivered a counter-claim alleging a breach of the plaintiffs' contract in supplying a faulty shaft, the amount of damages claimed being based not only on the value of the crank shaft, but also on the detention of the ship consequential on the failure of the crank shaft.

Upon the counter-claim being delivered, the plaintiffs at once communicated with the present defendants for their opinion as to the course which should be taken.

The defendants gave the plaintiffs the most complete assurance that there was nothing faulty in the material or workmanship of the shaft, and suggested that the reason of its breaking down was the bad design, for which they were not responsible.

Under these circumstances the plaintiffs defended the counter-claim raised by the shipowners.

At the trial of that action the judge found that there was no fault in the design, and that the cause of the breakdown of the shaft was faulty material and workmanship, and he gave judgment in favour of the shipowners for 356*l.* damages and costs.

Thereupon the plaintiffs commenced the present action to recover from the defendants the costs of the counter-claim on which the shipowners had obtained judgment.

At the trial of this action without a jury, Kennedy, J. gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Bailhache for the plaintiffs.—The costs of the counter-claim made by the shipowners which the plaintiffs have incurred are damages which might reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the present plaintiffs and defendants, at the time of the contract between them, as the probable result of a breach of the contract; and prima facie the plaintiffs are entitled, therefore, to succeed in this action:

Hammond v. Bussey, 20 Q. B. Div. 79.

The postscript to the defendants' letter accepting the plaintiffs' offer does not relieve the defendants from that common law liability to pay the damages now claimed. The effect of the postscript is merely to relieve the defendants, if they should supply a new crank shaft, from the natural and direct damages arising from a breach of contract to supply a good shaft. He referred to

Aguis v. Great Western Colliery Company, 80 L. T. Rep. 140; (1899) 1 Q. B. 413.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (Lewis Noad with him) for the defendants.—The defendants did not request the plaintiffs to defend the counter-claim. They repudiated all liability. They are protected by the postscript, which relieves them from the liability to pay these costs as being damages arising from their breach of contract to supply a properly made crank shaft. The object of the clause in the postscript is to relieve them from all damages in respect of a breach of the contract beyond the liability to replace faulty material or workmanship.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kennedy, J., and it certainly raises a point of some nicety. It is perfectly clear law, since the decision of Hammond v. Bussey (ubi sup.) in this court, that, unless there is some special bargain between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover these costs from the defendants, and the only point in this case is whether the terms of the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants were such as to exclude the liability of the defendants to pay the costs in question. That depends upon the terms of the postscript to the defendants' letter, by which they said that they did everything in their power to insure good material and workmanship, but disclaimed all responsibility for failure of either beyond the replacement of faulty work if practically possible to do so. Now, it seems to me that that clause is not introduced with any reference or relation whatsoever, either express or implied, to costs under any possible circumstances. What the clause is addressed to is the substitution for the general liability to pay general damages consequential upon the breakdown of the machinery, of an obligation to replace the shaft, but that obligation is just as much a binding obligation as was the obligation upon them, in the first instance, to furnish a good shaft. That obligation is certainly undertaken by them in their letter, but it is qualified by the postscript, with the result that an immunity is secured for them from what are called general damages—i.e., loss of time and so on—incidental to and following upon the delivery of a bad shaft. They have secured that immunity and have taken upon themselves the responsibility of replacing faulty or defective work by the substitution of another shaft. But when that liability has been substituted for the other, the clause has accomplished its purpose. It was essential to the determination of the question whether or not that liability existed that it should be ascertained whether the shaft supplied was defective in material or workmanship. That point has been ascertained in the action brought by the shipowners, at the expense of the plaintiffs in the present action, and, according to the law as laid down in Hammond v. Bussey (ubi sup.), they are clearly entitled to be reimbursed by the defendants, unless the defendants have contracted themselves out of that liability. In my judgment the defendants have not limited their liability in that way, and they stand unprotected from their common law liability. It is clear to me that the rule laid down in Hammond v. Bussey (ubi sup.) must be read, as is repeatedly stated in the judgment, with reference to the facts of that case. The court in that case held that the liability of the defendant to pay the plaintiff's costs was not a liability which attached under the first part of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Ex. 341), which refers to damages arising naturally from the breach of contract. The court held that the liability came under the second branch of the rule, that the damages were such as might reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties, when they made the contract, as the probable result of a breach of it. That, I think, justifies me in saying that this clause does not prima facie, and cannot be taken prima facie to, relieve the defendants from an obligation to pay these costs, which do not flow directly from the original breach of contract, but arise necessarily from the conduct of the parties after the breach. The conduct of the defendants after their breach of contract was such as to make it most reasonable on the part of the plaintiffs to defend the claim made against them by the shipowners. It would even have been unreasonable for them not to do so. They trusted to the assurances given them by the defendants that the shaft had been properly constructed, and, having therefore defended the claim and thereby incurred costs, it seems to me that the liability which they then incurred is altogether outside the conditions of the clause on which the defendants rely. I think that on the true construction of the contract the parties stand with their common law rights, upon the point now in dispute, quite unimpaired. On these grounds, though I recognise the difficulty of the case, I feel bound to differ from the conclusion arrived at by Kennedy, J., and in my judgment the appeal ought to be allowed.

SEARLE v. LUND.

[CT. OF APP.]

ROMER, L.J.—This case depends upon the construction of a postscript to a letter written by the defendants, and the postscript is so loosely framed that I am not surprised that it has given rise to a difference of judicial opinion. It has puzzled me a good deal, and I cannot say that my doubts are wholly removed, but, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the appeal ought to succeed. The meaning that I attach to the postscript in question is this: The defendants contracted that, in case of the failure of the shaft that they sold, by reason of faulty material or workmanship, they were to be liable at any rate to the extent of replacing the faulty work, but were not to be liable further by way of contract; that is to say, they were not to be liable for further loss beyond the cost of replacing the shaft for the faulty work. But then what flows from the fact of there being a contract of this limited kind? Suppose that the shipowners had brought an action against the present plaintiffs in respect of the failure of the shaft, but limiting their claim to damages to the value of a new shaft; and suppose that the plaintiffs informed the present defendants that the action had been brought against them, and then, upon the assurance of the defendants that there was nothing faulty in the workmanship of the shaft, had defended the action in the interests both of themselves and of the defendants. Then at the trial of that action it is found that the workmanship is faulty, and accordingly a new shaft has to be delivered. In such a case I should say that, within the meaning of the decision in Hammond v. Bussey (ubi sup.), the costs of the defence could be said to be damages which might reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties at the time when they made the limited contract that I have indicated, and for that reason I think that the costs in such a case as that could be recovered by the plaintiffs from the defendants. Now, apply that to the present case. Here was an action against the plaintiffs on the ground of faulty workmanship, and the relief included a claim for damages for the price of a new shaft; in other words, for delivery of a new shaft as part of the damages resulting to the ultimate purchasers of the shaft because of its faulty construction. It is true that the action also contained a claim for further damages, but, when the defence had to be put in, the then defendants (the present plaintiffs) had to consider that, as to a great part of the action, it obviously concerned the present defendants on what I have called their limited contract, and they accordingly consulted with the defendants. The defendants then claimed the protection of this clause, and said that the shaft was not faulty in material or workmanship. Thereupon the present plaintiffs defended the action brought against them, and under the circumstances I think that their defence was reasonable and proper so far as concerns their costs in defending that part of the action in which a claim was made for a new shaft. Those costs were reasonably incurred, and the plaintiffs are entitled to say, as against the present defendants, that these costs must be taken to have been in the contemplation of the parties as damages reasonably likely to flow from a breach by the defendants of their limited contract. Then the question arises, How are those costs to be ascertained? It appears to me that the right order to make is that the plaintiffs are entitled to the costs of the action except so far as those costs were increased by any issue other than the issue I have mentioned.

MATHEW, L.J. concurred.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C.—Will your Lordships make an order that the costs should be divided in the proportion which the plaintiffs' interests bear to the defendants' interests? The shipowners recovered 35*l.* from the present plaintiffs, and the present defendants are interested in that sum, as your Lordships hold, to the extent of only 15*l.*

COLLINS, M.R.—We think that the order suggested by my brother Romer is the right one, and the plaintiffs will have the costs of the shipowners' counter-claim, except so far as they were enhanced by other issues, if any.

SEARLE v. LUND.

[CT. OF APP.]

APPEAL by the defendant from the judgment of Kennedy, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought against the owner of the steamship Yarrowong to recover damages for the breach of a contract contained in a bill of lading.

The Yarrowong was one of a line of steamers, known as the Blue Anchor Line, regularly running between Australian ports, of which Melbourne was one, and London, and calling on the way at Durban and Cape Town.

In Sept. 1901 the plaintiff shipped on the Yarrowong at Melbourne forty-five cases of merchandise and 1750 bales of fodder, to be delivered at Cape Town.

The bills of lading contained an option for the consignees to require delivery at Durban, and also contained the following clause:

If in the opinion of the master discharge cannot be effected without undue detention, the steamer shall have liberty to over-carry the cargo to London at merchant's risk, and deliver there to consignees or their assigns.

On the 25th Oct. the Yarrowong arrived at Durban.

On the assumption that she would leave Durban and arrive at Cape Town in due course four days later, the plaintiff secured a berth for her at Cape Town for the day when she ought to arrive there.

The ship was, however, delayed at Durban.

This delay was caused to some extent by bad weather, and by a strike of the labourers there, but chiefly by a blunder on the part of the defendant's agents, who directed the plaintiff's cargo to be discharged. The mistake was discovered and the cargo was reshipped on the Yarrowong.

In consequence of this delay the ship arrived at Cape Town several days later than had been expected, and on her arrival there the berth that had been secured for her was occupied by another vessel.

The South African war was at that time being carried on, and the harbour at Cape Town was consequently in a very congested condition.

The master was honestly and reasonably of opinion that the cargo could not be discharged there without undue detention of the ship, and he decided to carry it on to London.

This he did, and the cargo had then to be brought back to Cape Town at considerable expense.

At the trial of the action before Kennedy, J. without a jury, the learned judge said it was the fact that there would have been no need for undue detention at Cape Town but for what happened at Durban, and that, but for the want of reasonable care on the part of the defendant's agents there, the vessel might have been discharged without undue delay at Cape Town. He held that the damage suffered by the plaintiff by the over-carriage of the cargo to London was not too remote from the negligence of the defendant's agents at Durban, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover in the action.

The case is reported 88 L. T. Rep. 863; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 419.

The defendant appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Loehnis for the defendant.

Scrutton, K.C. and Leck for the plaintiff.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kennedy, J., who gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff in an action against a ship-owner to recover damages for negligently over-carrying the plaintiff's cargo. The cargo in question was shipped on the defendant's steamship, which performed round voyages between Australia and London, calling at Durban and Cape Town on the way. It appears from the evidence that these voyages are accomplished with great regularity, and the times of the ship's arrival at the various ports can be calculated with considerable nicety. The cargo in question was shipped in Australia for delivery at Cape Town, with an option for the consignees to require delivery at Durban. The vessel arrived at Durban on the 25th Oct., which was the exact day that she was expected there. The plaintiff did not exercise his option to require delivery there, but, by a blunder on the part of someone for whom the defendant is responsible, the cargo was discharged at Durban. The mistake was then discovered, and the cargo was reshipped. Now, on the 25th Oct., when the vessel arrived at Durban, the plaintiff made arrangements on the footing of the vessel's departure for Cape Town on the following Tuesday, and he secured a berth at Cape Town for the following Saturday where his cargo might be discharged. At Durban the ship met with some difficulties both from the weather and from labour disputes, but Kennedy, J. at the trial, after making allowance for the delay thus caused, came to the conclusion that, if the ship had not been delayed also by the blunder which resulted in the cargo in question being discharged and then reshipped, the vessel might have left Durban on the Tuesday, and have arrived at Cape Town in time to make use of the berth which the plaintiff had secured. The learned judge found that this blunder in fact caused a delay of two or three days. There were other things which caused delay, but, if it had not been for the delay caused by this blunder, the vessel would have arrived at Cape Town in time to get the benefit of the berth that had been secured. That is the finding of the learned judge, and there was ample material before him upon which he might fairly come to that conclusion. When the vessel arrived at Cape Town the berth that had been secured was no longer available. The bills of lading contained a clause providing that if in the opinion of the master discharge could not be effected without undue detention, the steamer was to have liberty to over-carry the cargo to London at merchant's risk and deliver them to the consignees or their assigns. The master, in the exercise of what was found by Kennedy, J. to be a sound judgment, was of opinion that, having regard to the congestion of shipping in the harbour at Cape Town, the discharge of the cargo could not be effected without undue detention, and he decided to carry the cargo on to London. The cargo was accordingly carried to London, and then had to be brought back to Cape Town, and these proceedings very naturally involved the plaintiff in considerable expense. The action is brought to recover the damages caused by the over-carriage of the goods. The question is whether the chain of casualty between the negligence at Durban in discharging the plaintiff's cargo, which caused the vessel two or three days' delay, and

K.B. Div.]

GRANGE AND CO. v. TAYLOR.

[K.B. Div.]

the late arrival at Cape Town which resulted in the loss of the berth and the carrying on of the cargo to London has been sufficiently established. In my opinion it has, and none the less because the master in the exercise of his discretion elected to make use of the option of carrying the cargo on to London. There was no negligence or improper conduct on his part. I think that the damage all resulted from the negligence which occurred at Durban, and which caused the vessel to lose the berth that had been secured at Cape Town. The consequence is one that might reasonably be anticipated and regarded as following naturally on the act of negligence. That seems to me to be the legal and practical view of the matter. The ship made the voyages so regularly that the day of her arrival at Cape Town could be calculated with considerable exactness, and a berth was secured for her there in view of the voyage there from Durban being completed in the usual time. The vessel did not arrive at Cape Town as soon as she ought to have done in consequence of the blunder at Durban, and this blunder was made by someone for whom the defendant is responsible. The defendant now says that the damage is too remote, but from the correspondence it appears that he himself took the view which was afterwards taken by Kennedy, J. I think that the decision of Kennedy, J. was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—The circumstances of this case are somewhat complex, but I am not prepared to differ from Kennedy, J., who has held that the non-discharge of the plaintiff's goods at Cape Town was caused by the negligence of the defendant's agents at Durban. The damage of the plaintiff is not too remote. He is entitled to succeed in this action, and the appeal must fail.

CLAIM against shipowner for short delivery of a quantity of maize shipped under bills of lading on board the Palestrina and discharged at the Victoria Docks, and for breach of contract contained in the bills of lading and for conversion of the plaintiffs' goods.

The cargo of maize was in bulk, and bills of lading were given in respect of undivided portions.

The plaintiffs were indorsees of two of the bills of lading.

The bills of lading contained the following clause and impressed note in the margin:

If the parcel herein signed for constitutes part of larger bulk shipped without separation into parcels, as per bills of lading, each bill of lading shall bear its due proportion of shortage or damage and (or) sweepings, if any. Part of a parcel, shipped without separation. Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of shortage and damage, if any.

By an error in apportioning, one consignee received a complete consignment of sound grain and the plaintiffs, refusing to accept more than their proportion of damaged grain, brought an action for short delivery.

BIGHAM, J.—This is an action by indorsees of bills of lading against shipowner to recover damages for short delivery of a quantity (108 quarters) of maize. The defence is that the maize was delivered to the dock company, and that they were the agents of the plaintiffs to receive it. The defendants' ship, the Palestrina, took on board a large quantity of maize in bulk at Odessa to be carried to London. The shipper asked for and obtained from the defendants several bills of lading, each being for an undivided portion of the bulk. This was done to facilitate the sale of the maize. The bills of lading contained the following clause: “If the parcel herein signed for constitutes part of a larger bulk shipped without separation into parcels, as per bills of lading, each bill of lading shall bear its due proportion of shortage or damage and (or) sweepings, if any”; and in the margin there was an impressed note: "Part of a parcel, shipped without separation. Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of shortage and damage, if any." Two of these bills of lading came into the hands of the plaintiffs, who were buyers of the portion of the bulk thereby represented. The bills of lading for the remainder reached the hands of other buyers, among whom was a Mr. Paul. The vessel arrived in London and went to the I jetty of the Victoria Dock, when she began her discharge by means of an elevator which stands on that jetty. The maize was gathered under the open hatchways and then lifted in the elevator over the ship's side and shot into the barges of the bills of lading holders. Mr. Paul came first in time, and therefore first in turn, and received his full bill of lading quantity. Before the discharge to him was completed, but when it was too late to stop it, part of the remaining bulk was found to be heated. This heated grain was put on the quay, and was there apportioned among the different bill of lading holders, 108 quarters being the quantity which ought to have been taken by Mr. Paul as the quantity applicable to his bill of lading. He had, however, already received and taken away his full quantity in sound maize. The result was that at the end of the discharge the plaintiffs found that unless they took the 108 quarters they would be short by that quantity of their share of the bulk. They refused to take the 108 quarters, alleging that if they did so they would be saddled with more than their proper proportion of heated grain, and they then brought this action.

The question is whether the shipowners are liable. The answer depends on the nature of the obligations of the shipowner under the bill of lading contract and on the usage or practice ordinarily followed in the discharge of those obligations. The bill of lading, of course, obliges the shipowner to deliver goods corresponding with the description in the document, and it also obliges him to deliver such goods to the proper person to receive them. But the plaintiffs contend that, having regard to the words, "each bill of lading to bear its own proportion of damage," the obligation is not discharged by a mere delivery of the bill of lading quantity, but delivery must in such case be made up by the shipowner of the proper proportions of sound and damaged. It is said that the bill of lading is a contract between the holder and the shipowner and between no other persons, and that, as between those two parties, the words relied upon can have no other meaning than that contended for. I am of opinion that the words put no such burden on the shipowner. It would be very unreasonable if they did. The delivery is made to the barges of the receivers turn and turn about. At first nothing but sound grain may come out of the ship, and it will be impossible to say whether there will be any damaged grain or, if any, how much. Again, the character of the damage may vary very much; some part may be badly damaged and the other part only slightly. How is the shipowner to foresee this, and how, where, and when is he to sort the grain? Skilled men are required for such work; the crew cannot do it. Is the shipowner to find and employ such men? Then, where is the sorting to be done? It cannot be done in the ship. Is the shipowner to hire quay space for the work? And when is it to be done? Until the last parcel of the bulk is out the sorting is impossible. Must the shipowner hold back all delivery until that point in the discharge is reached? I agree with Mr. Hamilton that the mere difficulty or even impossibility of discharging a duty affords no excuse for a breach if in fact the duty has been undertaken; but when I am asked to say that the shipowner has undertaken the difficult duty here contended for I expect to find plain and unambiguous words imposing it. I do not find such words in this case. If the shipowner had given but one bill of lading for the whole parcel his duty would have been completely discharged by delivering the grain with the damaged and sound mixed just as it came to hand out of the ship. Was it intended that his compliance with shipper's request to give several bills of lading should throw upon him the burden of sorting the bulk and dividing the damaged grain in the manner suggested? I cannot think so. Then why are the words introduced, and what is their effect? This bill of lading is headed, "Chamber of Shipping, Black Sea—Berth Contract Bill of Lading, 1902"; and in the top left corner are the words, "As agreed with the London Corn Trade Association and the Chamber of Shipping, 12 March 1902." Thus the bill of lading appears to be in a form adopted by the members of the Corn Association in this country and shipowners who send their ships to the Black Sea. It is in common use in connection with a very large trade, and is doubtless well known to all people in that trade. Now the shipment of grain in bags and the stowing of it in the ship's hold in separate parcels are expensive operations which add to the cost of the grain when it arrives in this country without enhancing its value. It is therefore apparently often shipped in bulk, and bills of lading are given for undivided portions of the bulk. This is a great convenience to the merchant, for it enables him to sell the grain in small parcels. The form has been drawn with special reference to this practice, and the clause relied upon has been inserted in consequence of it. Then if the shipment is made under this practice (it is not necessarily so made) the impressed note is put in the margin of each bill of lading to draw attention to the fact: "Part of parcel, shipped without separation. Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of shortage and damage, if any." The London Corn Trade Association's form of sale contract, which was given in evidence before me, contains a corresponding provision: "Should any of the within-mentioned quantity form part of a larger quantity . . . in bulk, no separation . . . shall be deemed to be necessary. All damages and sweepings . . . shall be shared by the various parcels pro rata," showing that when the grain comes to be sold the sales are made on the footing on which the bills of lading are drawn. When the bill of lading is read by the light of these facts the meaning and object of the clause in question becomes quite plain. It is put there for the purpose of regulating the rights of the holders of the different bills of lading inter se, and is not intended to increase the shipowner's duty at all. But the plaintiffs insist that the contract in the bill of lading does not and is never intended to do more than express the agreement between the shipper and the shipowner; in other words, that it cannot regulate the rights of cargo-owners inter se; and they refer to Porteous v. Watney (ubi sup.) in support of this contention. No doubt the primary object of a bill of lading is to evidence the terms on which the shipper and shipowner have agreed for the carriage and delivery of goods, and Brett, L.J. at p. 542 of 3 Q. B. Div., is reported as saying: "The bill of lading claims to be a contract between the shipowner and the person taking the bill of lading. There is no relation whatever between the holders or takers of other bills of lading and any one holder of a bill of lading. They are not co-sureties. When, therefore, it is said we can look at all the bills of lading and then divide the days of demurrage or the lay days between them, we are looking at other bills of lading which cannot be given in evidence." These words must, however, be read with reference to the form of the bill of lading in that case. That form contained no reference whatever to the holders of other bills of lading. The action was by shipowner against bill of lading holder for demurrage. The bill of lading contained the words "on paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." This charter-party gave a lien on all cargo for demurrage at the port of discharge. The defendant had always been ready and willing to take his goods, but the holders of bills of lading for other cargo lying on top had made default in taking their cargo away so that the defendant's goods could not be discharged. It was held that by the terms of his bill of lading contract the defendant had rendered himself liable for payment of the demurrage, and that he could not escape by saying that the delay was due to the negligence of holders of other bills of lading. Indeed, so much did Brett, L.J. consider the different bills of lading holders strangers to each other that he held that if the man in actual default had paid the shipowner, the defendant could not have relied on the payment by way of defence, an opinion which involved the rather startling conclusion that if there had been goods below belonging to a score of different bills of lading holders, the full amount of the demurrage would have been recoverable from each of them. The Lord Justice at p. 543 uses these words: "I think that if the consignee of a portion of the cargo had a bill of lading in the same words, and had been called upon to pay and had paid the whole demurrage to the shipowner, the holder of another bill of lading, if sued, could not set that up as a defence. That defence would arise in respect of a wholly independent contract between the shipowner and the holder of the other bill of lading. He could not set it up as a defence, because he would have no right to prove that other and wholly independent contract. I accept the proposition that it would be no defence for the owner of the bill of lading to say that the shipowner had been paid the same sum by all other holders of bills of lading for cargo in the ship." But the authority is in truth of no application to the present case. The bill of lading before me appears on its face to be one of a group. The makers and takers of it know it to be one of a group. The same thing is no doubt true in the case of the bills of lading for the remainder of the bulk. The shipowner, not for his own benefit, but merely for the benefit of the various receivers, subscribes to the stipulation as to the division of damaged grain. All the receivers buy their bills of lading with notice, and, in my opinion, become bound towards each other by what the shipowner has done for them. Even if it should be true that the intention has not been legally effected, and that the bills of lading holders are not bound inter se, that affords no reason for saying that the words used in the attempt to accomplish the intention should be twisted to a purpose for which they were never used—namely, to impose a heavy obligation on the shipowner.

The view which I take of the meaning of the bill of lading contract is borne out by the practice followed in the discharge of grain cargoes at Victoria Docks and at the jetty in question. The practice is for the servants of the dock company to bring the cargo in the ship's hold under the open hatchways; for this service the shipowner pays the dock company 4d. a ton. The grain is then lifted by means of an elevator out of the hold and shot from the elevators into the barges of the consignees; for this service the consignees pay the dock company 1s. 9d. per ton. If any of the grain is found to be heated it is discharged on the quay and there sorted by the dock company's servants, the cost being covered by the dock company's charge against the consignees. In this way the dock company act as the agents of the ship to discharge the cargo and as the agents of the consignees to receive it; and the evidence, though in parts conflicting, satisfies me that as a matter of fact the receipt of the grain into the elevator is the receipt by the dock company, as agent for the consignee or bill of lading holder. If this be so, the shipowner has in this case not only discharged the bill of lading quantity, but the plaintiffs have also received it, with the result that the claim for short delivery fails. It was, however, contended on the plaintiffs' behalf that, whatever the general practice might be, the grain in this particular instance was not in fact received by them until it was placed in their barges or trucks. It appeared that upon this jetty there were two elevators belonging to different owners. The elevator which was used on this occasion belongs to a firm of Thompson and Co., who use it for the discharge of their own vessels. But sometimes no vessel of their own happens to be alongside, and the elevator is idle. On such occasions Thompson and Co. solicit other ship-owners to send their ships to the wharf, so that they may be discharged by their elevator, and they have an arrangement with the dock company by which in such circumstances they do all the work above described for the dock company for an inclusive charge of 1s. 11d. a ton. Thus the dock company get the work for which they charge 2s. 1d. (1s. 9d. and 4d.) done for 1s. 11d. This course was followed in the present case. Thompson and Co. were anxious to secure a discharge and delivery by their elevator because, I suppose, they could do the work for less than 1s. 11d. per ton, and so make a profit, and, as they feared that the job might fall into the hands of the owner of the rival elevator, they went to the defendants and induced the defendants to send the ship to the part of the jetty where their elevator stands. It was said by the plaintiffs that the defendants, by allowing the vessel to go under Thompson's elevator in these circumstances, made Thompson and Co. their agents, and that all the work, whether done on the ship or in the elevator or on the quay, was therefore done by the defendants. I do not, however, take this view of the matter. Neither the plaintiffs nor the defendants had anything to do with the arrangement between the dock company and Thompson, and when the time for paying for the work arrived, debit notes were sent in by the dock company to the ship and cargo-owners for the 4d. and 1s. 9d., just as though no such arrangement existed. I wish to add that the practice at these docks appears to have been substantially the same for the last thirty years, although, no doubt, elevators have only recently come into use. Dealing with the question in 1874, Brett, J., after stating the practice in relation to the delivery of bales of hides, says: "I am of opinion that the moment the shipowner has cleared the goods from the deck he ceases to be responsible in any way for them; and that, whatever remedy the plaintiffs may have against the dock company or anyone else, they cannot under the circumstances charge the shipowner with the loss of the bale": (see Petrocochino v. Bott, L. Rep. 9 C. P., at p. 361). It is perhaps necessary to mention one other matter. It appeared that when Thompson's men in working out the ship came across the heated grain, they notified the circumstance to the dock clerks, and after the apportionment the clerks, in the ordinary course of their duty, entered the 108 quarters in the dock books as belonging to Mr. Paul. The plaintiffs suggested that, even if there was no short delivery, this was a conversion. To this there are two answers. The first is that there was no conversion; the book entry interfered in no way with the plaintiffs' rights—the plaintiffs might have taken away the 108 quarters at any moment, and no one would have objected. The second answer is that, even if there was a conversion, it was not by the defendants; they, as I have already said, had finished with the goods when they delivered the grain into the elevator. The fact is that the plaintiffs did not want the 108 quarters. They preferred their action for short delivery. If they had taken the 108 quarters, as they might have done at any moment if they had wished, they would have been left with an action for breach of the duty to properly sort and apportion—an action which, if brought against the present defendants, would have failed, as this action fails, on the ground that the defendants had entered into no contract to do the work of sorting and apportioning. There must be judgment for the defendants with costs, and for the defendants on the counterclaim for freight.

TOUGH (app.) v. HOPKINS (resp.). (a)

Metropolis — Smoke from tug — Nuisance — "Chimney" — Prohibition order — Specifying works—Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 5 (4) (5), 23, 24.

The funnel of a tug plying to and fro in the river Thames, within the jurisdiction of the port sanitary authority of London, is a "chimney" within sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

If a court of summary jurisdiction makes a prohibition order under sect. 5 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, such order need not specify the works to be done by the person against whom the order is made if in the opinion of the court no works could be done to prevent a recurrence of the nuisance.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant under sect. 24 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 for that on the 24th Aug. 1903, on the Thames and within the port of London, upon a certain vessel—to wit, the steamship Richmond—the following nuisance existed—namely, a chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance—and that the appellant, being the owner of such vessel, had made default in complying with a notice served under such section.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted by the appellant:

He was then the owner of a steam-tug known as the Richmond.

On the 25th April 1903 a notice was served upon him at the instance of the port sanitary authority of London, a copy whereof is set out below.

On the 24th Aug. 1903 the steam-tug was towing six barges, and was proceeding from below the Custom House to Southwark Bridge and beyond, within the jurisdiction of the port sanitary authority, and while the tug was proceeding between the Custom House and Southwark Bridge there was being sent forth from the funnel thereof dense black smoke for the space of about five minutes in such quantity as to be a nuisance.

The steam-tug was then being navigated by a master, engineer, and crew employed by the appellant, who was not on board, and who had no personal knowledge of such emission of black smoke.

The steam-tug did not stop or lie up at any point of the voyage of the 24th Aug., but was then proceeding to Kingston-on-Thames, where she was in the habit of lying every night. The steam-tug was employed throughout the day in plying for hire as a tug between Woolwich and Kingston-on-Thames.

The engines and boilers on board the steam-tug were of modern construction and of the best known type of marine engines and boilers, and were constructed as to consume as far as possible all the smoke caused therein, having regard to the funnel being a short one, and adapted for passing under bridges at high-water level by hinging backwards nearly to deck level.

The appellant had given strict instructions to his servants to prevent, as far as possible, the production of black smoke on the steam-tug, and good Welsh steam coal procured by the appellant was burnt on board, and the furnaces of the tug had been freshly stoked with such coal at about opposite the Custom House on the 24th Aug., and from three to four minutes was not an unreasonable time to allow the fresh fuel to cease emitting black smoke on such a vessel.

TOUGH (app.) v. HOPKINS (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

The emission of smoke from the funnel of the tug could have been prevented by the fire being kept bright by frequent and careful stoking or by the use of steam coal.

Upon the above facts it was contended by the appellant: (1) that sect. 24 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 was inapplicable to a steam-tug such as the Richmond while plying to and fro on the river Thames as described above; (2) that the Richmond on the 24th Aug. was not a vessel lying within the district of the port sanitary authority within the meaning of art. 3 of an order of the Local Government Board, dated the 25th March 1892, and made under sect. 112 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891; (3) that if by reason of such order of the Local Government Board the sect. 24 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 was applicable to a vessel used as the steam-tug was being used on the 24th Aug. 1903, then the proceedings under such section should have been taken against the master of the vessel and not against the appellant; (4) that proceedings in respect of smoke from vessels plying on the river Thames could only be taken under the provisions of sect. 23 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended: (1) that the funnel of the steam-tug was a "chimney" within the meaning of that expression in sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891; (2) that the alleged nuisance arose owing to the appellant not having used anthracite coal in the furnaces of the tug and from the coal that was used having been carelessly and improperly stoked; (3) that the appellant was liable for the acts of his servants and was a person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arose; (4) that the magistrate had a discretion as to whether or not he specified on the prohibition order any works to be done by the appellant to prevent the recurrence of the nuisance, and that it was for him to determine whether or not it was desirable to do so.

The magistrate's attention was called to the case of Weeks v. King (15 Cox C. C. 733; 49 J. P. 704).

The magistrate found as a fact that the funnel of the steam-tug was a chimney within the meaning of sect. 24 of the statute and that black smoke had been sent forth from it in such quantities as to be a nuisance at the place and time and on the day mentioned in the information. He also found as a fact that no works that could be ordered would cure the alleged nuisance, but that it was a question of stoking with proper fuel, and that if a bright fire were kept up by frequent and careful stoking the nuisance could be prevented. He was of opinion that the information had been properly laid under sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 and that the appellant was a person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arose, and he overruled the contentions of the appellant and convicted him of the nuisance alleged in the information and made an order upon him prohibiting the recurrence of the nuisance.

The appellant, after the magistrate had convicted him as above-mentioned, required him on making the prohibition order against him under sect. 5, sub-sects. 4 and 5, of the Public Health

(London) Act 1891, to specify therein the works to be executed by him for the purpose of preventing the recurrence of the nuisance, but the magistrate refused to specify any works in the order, because it was not, in his opinion, desirable to do so, because there was no question of works here involved, but only a question of careful and skilful stoking with proper fuel.

The notice referred to above was as follows:

Take notice that under the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 the port sanitary authority of the port of London, being satisfied of the existence of a nuisance on the above-mentioned vessel, arising from a chimney—to wit, the funnel of the boiler furnace on the said vessel (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance—do hereby require you, within forty-eight hours from the service of this notice, to abate the same, and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose, and to do what is necessary for preventing the recurrence of the said nuisance. If you make default in complying with the requisitions of this notice within the time above specified a summons will be issued requiring your attendance before a petty sessional court to answer a complaint which will be made for the purpose of enforcing the abatement of the said nuisance or prohibiting the recurrence thereof, or both, and for recovering the costs and penalties that may be incurred thereby.—Dated 25th April 1903.—JAMES BELL, Town Clerk.

By sect. 5 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76):

(1) If either—(a) the person on whom a notice to abate a nuisance has been served as aforesaid makes default in complying with any of the requisitions thereof within the time specified, or (b) the nuisance, although abated since the service of the notice is, in the opinion of the sanitary authority, likely to recur on the same premises, the sanitary authority shall make a complaint, and the petty sessional court hearing the complaint may make on such person a summary order (in this Act referred to as a nuisance order). (2) A nuisance order may be an abatement order, a prohibition order, or a closing order, or a combination of such orders. (3) An abatement order may require a person to comply with all or any of the requisitions of the notice or otherwise to abate the nuisance within a time specified in the order. (4) A prohibition order may prohibit the recurrence of a nuisance. (5) An abatement order or prohibition order shall, if the person on whom the order is made so requires, or the court considers it desirable, specify the works to be executed by such person for the purpose of abating or preventing the recurrence of the nuisance.

And by sect. 23:

(3) Every steam engine and furnace used in the working of any steam vessel on the river Thames either above London Bridge or plying to and fro between London Bridge and any place on the river Thames westward of the Nore light, shall be constructed so as to consume or burn the smoke arising from such engine and furnace; and if any such steam engine or furnace is not so constructed, or being so constructed is wilfully or negligently used so that the smoke arising therefrom is not effectually consumed or burnt, the owner or master of such vessel shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 5*l.*, and on a second conviction to a fine of 10*l.*, and on every subsequent conviction to a fine of double the amount of the fine imposed on the last preceding conviction.

And by sect. 24:

(a) Any fireplace or furnace which does not, as far as practicable, consume the smoke arising from the combustible used therein and which is used for working engines by steam, or in any mill, factory, dye-house, brewery, bake-house, or gaswork, or in any manufacturing or trade process whatsoever; and (b) any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance shall be nuisances liable to be dealt with summarily under this Act, and the provisions of the Act relating to those nuisances shall apply accordingly: Provided that the court hearing a complaint against a person in respect of a nuisance arising from a fireplace or furnace which does not consume the smoke arising from the combustible used in such fireplace or furnace shall hold that no nuisance is created and dismiss the complaint, if satisfied that such fireplace or furnace is constructed in such manner as to consume, as far as practicable, having regard to the nature of the manufacture or trade, all smoke arising therefrom, and that such fireplace or furnace has been carefully attended to by the person having the charge thereof.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Bigham for the appellant.—Sect. 24 does not refer to the funnel of a steamboat on the Thames but merely applies to a chimney in the ordinary sense of the word. A case like the present comes under sect. 23 (3). Further, the order made did not specify the works to be done in order to prevent a recurrence of the nuisance which it should have under sect. 5 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891. The mere fact that the powers and duties under sect. 24 of the Act of 1891 are assigned to the port sanitary authority cannot make that section applicable to the funnel of a steam vessel on the Thames.

Dankwerts, K.C. and R. Cunningham Glen for the respondent.—The order assigning to the port sanitary authority the powers of an ordinary sanitary authority under the Act of 1891 provides that any vessel lying within the port sanitary authority shall be liable to their jurisdiction as if it were a house. Sect. 24 deals with a nuisance arising from smoke and sect. 23 deals with the construction of the furnace. They therefore deal with different matters, and sect. 24 applies to a nuisance arising from the smoke of a vessel. With regard to the order made in this case, if no actual works are necessary they need not be specified.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Notwithstanding the very ingenious argument of Mr. Hamilton and the observations which Mr. Bigham has made, I think that this decision was right. I quite agree with them that the order of the Local Government Board of the 25th March 1892 has not increased the responsibility of persons who own tugs in respect of nuisances from tugs or ships. It merely provided that the port sanitary authority was to take such proceedings as could be taken under the Act in respect of “ships, vessels, boats, waters, or persons within their jurisdiction,” and it includes sect. 24 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891. Whatever the opinion of the draftsman may have been, the mere inclusion in that order would not increase the responsibility if we were of opinion that sect. 24 could not apply to the chimney or funnel of a steam-tug plying on the Thames. The point has admitted of argument, and I think there is some ground for thinking at the first blush that the reading of sect. 24 would indicate that it was intended to apply to chimneys on land in the ordinary sense of the word, but when we look at the object of the legislation, and certain expressions in sect. 24 itself, I think any such construction would be too narrow. It is, as far as this part of the section is concerned, essentially what may be called a black smoke section—that is to say, it is a section which provides that “any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance” shall be a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily. Sect. 23, the previous section, has undoubtedly dealt specifically with the steam engines and furnaces used in the working of steam vessels which were being worked in the district where this vessel was being worked. It provides that they “shall be constructed so as to consume or burn the smoke arising from such engine and furnace; and if such steam engine or furnace is not so constructed, or being so constructed is wilfully or negligently used so that the smoke arising therefrom is not effectually consumed or burnt, the owner or master of such vessel shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 5*l.*, and on a second conviction to a fine of 10*l.*,” and then it goes on: “Provided that in this section the words ‘consume or burn the smoke’ shall not be held in all cases to mean ‘consume or burn all the smoke,’ and the court hearing an information against a person may remit the fine if of opinion that such person has so constructed his furnace as to consume or burn as far as possible all the smoke arising from such furnace, and has carefully attended to the same, and consumed or burned as far as possible the smoke arising from such furnace.” Those words show that there are special provisions with regard to the construction of furnaces and engines upon the steamers and the negligent use of them, but it is to be observed, and I think the argument of Mr. Glen is of importance, that there is a corresponding provision with regard to furnaces upon land, because sub-sect. 1 of sect. 23 also provides that the furnaces employed in the working of engines by steam and a number of other furnaces, all of which must be on land, “shall be constructed so as to consume or burn the smoke arising from such furnace,” and there is a corresponding sub-section with regard to their negligent user. Therefore we have with regard to both furnaces on land and furnaces on ships the sort of provision which goes a certain distance for the proper construction of the engines and furnaces and for the non-negligent user. Then we come to sect. 24, which is unquestionably a nuisance section. I think it is not without importance that it immediately follows sect. 23, and is under the same heading, “Smoke consumption.” If the words to which I am about to refer can be fairly applied to a chimney on board a steamship, there is no reason why this should not apply. The first provision of sect. 24 says: “Any fireplace or furnace which does not so far as practicable consume the smoke” shall be a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily. Then comes the important clause: “Any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such a quantity as to be a nuisance” shall be a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily. I think that, quite apart from negligence, is meant to deal with the case, which has not been covered by the previous section, of a chimney other than that of a dwelling-house sending forth black smoke. We have had our attention directed to the other legislation of a similar character with regard to railway engines and with regard to traction engines, and there does not appear to be any black smoke nuisance section in any of them. Therefore one would rather assume that this legislation is something which may be said to be additional protection, unless the words "any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house)" are sufficient to show that a steamship would not be included. I think both the purview of this section and the object of the legislation would point to black smoke being emitted within the port from the chimney or funnel of a steamer as constituting an offence. It is quite obvious there may be cases in which the black smoke would come from a chimney which would not ordinarily be called a funnel. I do not think any argument can be based upon the fact that the word "chimney" is used because the word "funnel" is a technical and almost secondary meaning for that kind of chimney. I cannot see any reason why emission of black smoke from steamers constantly plying on the Thames should not be as much prevented as the emitting of black smoke from chimneys on land. I therefore come to the conclusion that sect. 23 does not contain, as Mr. Bigham pressed us that it did, the whole code with regard to nuisances coming from steamships or smoke coming from steamboats. The language of sect. 24 is not enough to enable us to hold that it does not include the chimney of a steamship. Therefore I think this conviction was right. Upon the second point which Mr. Hamilton mentioned, I ought perhaps just to say we held the other day in Central London Railway Company v. Hammersmith Borough Council (90 L. T. 537), and I think we were right in saying so, that the order was not bad, because it did not specify works to be done, though the defendant asked for the specification of them if there were no works that could be done. I do not think that objection prevail. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed.

THE ARNE.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. To my mind the only point which certainly is not wholly free from difficulty is the question as to whether sect. 24 (b), "Any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance," includes the funnel of a tug-boat or steamer. Usually, no doubt, "chimney" is a phrase applicable to that through which smoke passes from a fire of some sort in a building. It is not the term which is technically the proper term to describe those passages or flues, or whatever you like to call them, on a steamboat, which convey the smoke from the furnace of the steamer to the upper air, but I see nothing to prevent "chimney" being used in what one may call its natural sense—namely, that of a passage by which smoke from a fire is carried away upwards. Otherwise you would have no "black smoke section," as my Lord has described it shortly, with regard to the description of thing which may send out smoke in quite as great quantities with quite as great mischief if it is enough to create a nuisance, as what may be more usually described by the word "chimney"—namely, the smoke passage from the roof of a building. There is no definite clause relating to the word "chimney" in this Act, as far as I know, and certainly one would expect it to have been referred to if there was one after the care that Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Bigham have shown in arguing this case. We have not heard that chimney is anywhere defined, and if it is not defined it seems to me naturally enough intended to cover here that which it may cover in a popular though not in a technical sense. I need not add anything on the other point to that which my Lord has said.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I think "chimney" in this section is used simply as the thing from which smoke does issue into the open air. It might quite well be found that the cases of funnels of steam vessels or of funnels of locomotive engines or other movable smoke-producing apparatus might be so dealt with elsewhere in the Act as to lead one to come to the conclusion that they were not intended to be included in these general words in sect. 24 (b), but in fact the operation of sect. 24 is only to apply the particular summary procedure in reference to certain cases of smoke nuisances, cases coming under (a) and coming under (b). The other sections deal with the construction and use of apparatus producing smoke, and do not deal, as sect. 24 does, with the consequences or results of it, which in certain cases may be dealt with under the summary procedure in reference to nuisances. The result seems to me to be that sect. 24 and sect. 23 are dealing not with different subject-matters but with different consequences of the subject-matter, and there is no reason, therefore, because steam vessels are specially dealt with under sect. 23 to say they cannot come under sect. 24. I see no reason for cutting down what seems to me the primary meaning of the word "chimney" in sect. 24. Appeal dismissed.

THE ARNE. (a)

Bill of lading—Discharge of cargo—Goods to be taken "as fast as steamer can deliver"—Deficiency of railway waggons—Option of ship-owner to discharge in other ways not exercised.

Goods were shipped under a bill of lading which provided: "The goods to be taken from the ship by the consignees (at their expense) immediately after arrival, and as fast as steamer can deliver or the same will be transhipped into lighters, or landed, or warehoused at the expense and risk of the proprietors of such goods." On arrival of the vessel the consignees neither took delivery nor did the master exercise his option of landing or lightering the goods.

In an action by the charterers against the consignees for damages for detention of the vessel: Held, that the plaintiffs were not deprived of their remedy because the master had not exercised his option as to landing or lightering the goods, and were entitled to recover.

Held, further, that the plaintiffs having made out a prima facie case of delay in taking delivery by the defendants, the onus was upon the defendants to show that the delay arose from no default on their part, and was due to the want of appliances in the port, and that they had failed to do so.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a judgment of the judge of the Swansea County Court in favour of the defendants.

The plaintiffs were Gebruder van Uden, of Rotterdam, the time charterers, and J. Roebe, the master of the steamer Arne, and claimed 51*l.* 5*s.* damages for detention of the steamship.

The defendants were W. Gilbertson and Co. Limited, the indorsees of bills of lading and consignees of the cargo.

The cargo was shipped in two parcels. The first parcel consisted of about 1078 tons of pig iron and 28 tons of old rails, and the second of about 910 tons of pig iron. It was shipped on board the Arne at Antwerp for Swansea by the same shipper in each case.

By the bills of lading, which were dated the 6th April and the 28th April 1903 respectively, it was stipulated:

The goods to be taken from the ship by the consignees (at their expense) immediately after arrival and as fast as steamer can deliver, or the same will be transhipped into lighters, or landed, or warehoused at the expense and risk of the proprietors of such goods. All goods consigned to "order" will be delivered upon the quay, or into lighters, or warehoused at the option of the agents of the steamer, such delivery to be for account and risk of owners of the goods.

The discharge took place out of the ship direct into railway trucks.

According to the admission of facts the respondents commenced to take delivery of the first consignment of cargo at 9 a.m. on Tuesday the 14th April, but did not complete taking delivery until 12.30 p.m. on Saturday, the 18th April, making altogether 99½ hours. The respondents commenced taking delivery of the second consignment of cargo at 7.45 a.m. on Monday, the 4th May, and completed taking delivery at 10 p.m. on Thursday, the 7th May, making 86½ hours in all.

The appellants contended that a reasonable time for taking delivery of the first consignment of cargo expired at noon on Thursday, the 16th April, and of the second consignment at noon on Wednesday, the 6th May. The appellants claimed two days at 15*l.* per day making 30*l.* as damages for the first voyage, and one day ten hours for the second voyage, making 21*l.* 5*s.*—51*l.* 5*s.* in all. On the hearing of the appeal these damages were reduced to 41*l.*

The appellants alleged that their vessel was capable of delivering about 500 tons a day, and that the cause of the delay was that the defendants failed to see that a sufficient number of railway waggons were provided.

The respondents alleged that a reasonable amount to discharge per day based on averages in the case of previous steamers would be from 250 to 300 tons.

The learned County Court judge gave judgment for the defendants. His judgment was as follows:

I consider that the defendants are entitled to judgment on the construction of the clause in the bill of lading.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Meager for the appellants.—It is submitted the respondents did not take delivery within a reasonable time. The clause enabling the shipowners to land the goods is discretionary; it does not bind them to do so. It is inserted for their own protection, and their omission to do so is no answer to a claim for detention. As Lindley, L.J. put it in Hick v. Rodocanachi (65 L. T. Rep. at p. 303; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 100; (1891) 2 Q. B. at p. 632): "These clauses are obviously inserted in the interest and for the benefit of the shipowner, and they give him an additional remedy for the recovery of what is due to him, and not a remedy in substitution for any which he would have apart from these clauses. The master is under no obligation to land the goods and assert his lien instead of allowing the consignee to land them, and leaving him to be sued for the payments he ought to make. The master is empowered to do this, but he is under no obligation to exercise the power. He is the person to decide whether he will exercise it or not." The ship could have delivered 500 tons of cargo a day, and the consignees ought to have provided sufficient trucks. He also referred to the case of Modesto Pineiro and Co. v. Dupré, 86 L. T. Rep. 560; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 297.

Balloch, for the respondents, contra.—If there was no unreasonable delay the shipowner has no cause of complaint, and if he had one he could by exercising the power given him by the bill of lading compel the consignees to take delivery as there provided. The ordinary course of delivery is into railway trucks, and the evidence goes to show that under this method only 200 to 300 tons of cargo could be received per day. The supply of trucks is dependant on the railway company, over whom the respondents have no efficient control. The words "as fast as steamer can deliver" only mean as fast as the facilities of the port where delivery is taken will allow of:

Wyllie v. Harrison, 13 Sess. Ca. (4th), 92.

In that case the vessel had been chartered to carry iron ore "to Glasgow General Terminus or Queen's Dock, in charterer's option," and then "deliver as customary." It was also provided by the charter-party, "cargo to be discharged as fast as steamer can deliver after being berthed." At the general terminus the customary mode of discharge was into trucks, and the only trucks permitted were those of the Caledonian and North British Railway Companies. The Court of Session held the charterers were not responsible for the delay caused by want of trucks. As the Lord Justice-Clerk (Lord Moncreiff) said: "The place of delivery may be a port which is subject to regulations which are not within the powers of the charterer, and which must be complied with before delivery can be given at all. Where these regulations, which are incorporated into the charter-party, provide that goods shall not be laid down on the quay, but put into trucks, I think the whole obligation of delivery is subject to the possible contingency of trucks being available." This decision was approved by the Court of Appeal in Good v. Isaacs (67 L. T. Rep. 450; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212; (1892) 2 Q. B. 555). There a vessel with a cargo of fruit went into a fruit berth, but the cranes which had to be used for the discharge were under the control of Government officials, who refused to allow them to be used at once. It was held that the charterers were not liable for the delay. See also

Hulthen v. Stewart, 88 L. T. Rep. 702; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; (1903) A. C. 389.

In The Jaederen (68 L. T. Rep. 266; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 260; (1892) P. 351) the vessel was "to be discharged as fast as she can deliver." The custom of the port was then imported into the contract, and the defendants succeeded because the plaintiffs failed to make out any breach of the contract to discharge as fast as the ship could deliver. In Lyle Shipping Company v. Cardiff Corporation (83 L. T. Rep. 329; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 128; (1902) 2 Q. B. 638) it was held that as the charterers had done their best to obtain sufficient waggons for the railway company they were not liable. Smith, L.J. expressed the opinion (83 L. T. Rep., at p. 333; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 133; (1900) 2 Q. B., at p. 643) that it did not matter whether the words "as customary" were in the contract or not, "for if not they would be implied." He also referred to

Meager in reply. — It is a question of fact whether delivery was taken within a reasonable time or not under the circumstances:

Metcalf v. Thompson, 18 Times L. Rep. 706.

The PRESIDENT.—I thought at first that we had not the materials before us for deciding the whole of the case; but, on considering the matter carefully, it seems to me that we are in a position to deal with it as it stands. I have no doubt that the learned judge's decision was based on the view that on the true construction of the bill of lading the shipowners had their remedy, and their sole remedy, in the power to land the goods on the quay or in lighters if they were not taken away by the consignees. In addition to the words "I consider that the defendants are entitled to judgment on the construction of the clause in the bill of lading," the learned judge says that counsel for the plaintiffs contends that that condition was optional, showing that what he based his decision on was, not that there was no right of action in the case, but that the sole remedy for a breach of the condition as to taking delivery was in the terms provided by the bill of lading. I am unable to agree with the learned judge that that view is correct. It seems to me clear that the words in the bill of lading do not take away the ordinary right of bringing an action if the terms of the bill of lading are departed from. It seems to me that it would be unreasonable to say that the landing of these goods was the sole remedy. Supposing the sole cause of the non-delivery was that the trucks were not ready, it would be hard to throw upon the master the responsibility of saying that the delay was so great that he could not allow it to continue; and, on the other hand, if the trucks could not be supplied by the railway company, I am by no means sure that the hardship would not be on the consignees of the goods. It would be far more reasonable to say that the ordinary remedy of the shipowner remained the same, but that he had an alternative option which he could have exercised. In this case he does not seem to have exercised it, and I do not think the learned judge was right in holding that that debarred him from bringing an action to enforce his ordinary rights under the bill of lading.

Then comes the question whether or not we are able under the circumstances to enter judgment for the plaintiffs. I think we are, because what is said now is that judgment ought not to be entered for the plaintiffs because there is some defence which the defendants either have set up or might have set up. I do not know that they might not possibly have raised in the court below a defence other than that which they have raised; but in the court below they did raise the defence as to the non-supply of trucks by the railway company, and clearly also raised a further defence—namely, that they were justified in taking the average quantity of goods discharged per day of similar cargoes as a test of their own obligations under the bill of lading—and I think it is too late for them now to come forward and say that a totally different defence might have been raised. It appears to me clear that no such defence ought to be successful. The plaintiffs showed, without contradiction, what the capacity of their steamer was, and then it was shown further that the delay arose from the dearth of waggons. That, I think, made out a prima facie case in favour of the plaintiffs. It may well be that the obligation of the consignee was to take delivery as fast as the steamer could deliver, having regard to the mode of delivery and the state of the appliances with which delivery could be taken; but then if their answer was that they had done all they could, and that the delay arose from no default on their part, and that they did everything on their part, then they ought to have shown that. It was upon them to do so. But the moment the plaintiffs showed that but for the want of waggons they could have delivered at a certain rate, then, if the defendants could have shown that by no fault of theirs, but by the fault of other people, such as the want of railway trucks, the delay was caused, it would have been a different matter; but they did not attempt to show that. I do not agree that the question of average quantity was material here, though, in taking into consideration what the steamer could do, you have to consider the actual state of things—the appliances of the port, and the mode of delivery; still, that does not relieve the defendants from their liability to show that they have done all they could, and that it was not their fault. A prima facie case is made out against them, and there is no answer either set up, or which, to my mind, can be set up, to meet the case of the plaintiffs. In these circumstances I am prepared to give judgment for the plaintiffs. The figures work out at 41l. as the amount, on the plaintiffs' evidence, which they are entitled to recover. I think, therefore, the proper course will be to reverse the judgment of the court below, and give judgment for the plaintiffs.

BARNES, J.—I agree with the learned President as to the construction of the bill of lading, and also, on the facts, I think with him that the plaintiffs made a prima facie case of non-acceptance or non-taking of delivery from the ship by the consignees, immediately after arrival, as fast as steamer can deliver, whether the words "as customary" are implied or omitted. They made a prima facie case that they were ready to deliver, and to deliver easily at a rate which they say could have been exceeded. No answer is made to that by the defendants upon the facts. No explanation is given, and there is nothing to show that they could not have discharged the ship as fast as customary, assuming those words to be inserted in the bill of lading. All that they have done is to attempt to set up a case of delivery of average quantities of similar cargoes. The contracts respecting which are not dealt with in the evidence before us, and there is an attempt to make out a case of a fair and reasonable amount. They do not seem to have answered the prima facie case made out by the plaintiffs, and, therefore, I agree that there should be judgment for the plaintiffs.

THE NORMANDY. (a)

Damage to pier by ship—Action by owner of pier—County Court jurisdiction—Writ of prohibition—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, sub-s. 3.

By sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 it is provided that County Courts having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction as to any claim for "damage by collision."

The plaintiff was the owner of a pier, and brought an action in the County Court against the defendants for damage done by their vessel to his pier. The defendants moved for a writ of prohibition.

Held, that there was no jurisdiction under sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, for the County Court judge to determine the action, and that a writ of prohibition must therefore go.

MOTION on behalf of the owners of the steamship Normandy for a writ of prohibition to the judge of the County Court of Barnstaple to restrain proceedings.

The plaintiff, Reginald Joseph Weld, who, being a person of unsound mind, sued by his committees, was the owner of a pier at Ilfracombe, and the action was brought to recover 200*l.* for damage alleged to have been done by the defendants' steamship to the pier. The action was brought under sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, which gives to any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction power to hear and determine causes as to any claim for "damage by collision."

The defendants contended that the words "damage by collision" referred only to collisions between ships, and that, although the amending Act of 1869 extended the Admiralty jurisdiction of County Courts to damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, yet it did not give the court power to deal with claims for damage to a fixed object such as a pier.

Sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) is as follows:

Any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes): (3) As to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision—Any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

Sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) is as follows:

The third section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, shall extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

The defendants now moved the court for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the learned County Court judge from hearing and determining the action.

Dawson Miller, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—Sect 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, under which the action is brought, gives a County Court jurisdiction to hear and determine causes as to any claim for "damage by collision." Collision must be a collision between ships. That is the ordinarily understood meaning of the word in the Admiralty Court:

Robson v. Owner of the Kate, 59 L. T. Rep. 557
6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 330; 21 Q. B. Div. 13;
Everard v. Kendall, 22 L. T. Rep. 408; 3 Mar.
Law Cas. O. S. 391; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428.

It is true that sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1869 extended the jurisdiction to damage to ships, "whether by collision or otherwise," but that would not include damage by a ship to a structure such as a pier.

Herbert Chitty and H. Stuart Moore, for the plaintiffs, contra.—The language used in Robson v. Owner of the Kate (ubi sup.) is only a dictum. The damage done there was to a pile-driving machine on a wharf on the bank, and the ground of the decision was that damage which had been done on land outside the ebb and flow of the tide could not have fallen within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, and therefore did not come within sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868. The intention of the Legislature was to give the County Courts the same jurisdiction as the High Court had:

The Zeta, 21 C. C. C. Rep. 70; 68 L. T. Rep. 40; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 369; (1893) A. C. 468.

The High Court clearly has jurisdiction to try the action under sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. That was decided in

The Uhla, 19 L. T. Rep. 89; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S.
148; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 29n.

The word "collision" has been used with regard to other objects than a ship—e.g., in the case of damage done by a ship to a barge (The Malvina, 6 L. T. Rep. 369; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 341; Lush. 493); by a ship to a ship (see The Uhla, ubi Law Cas. 71; (1895) 2 Q. B. 279) it was held that a vessel which was driven on to a sloping bank formed of loose boulders to protect a break-water was lost by collision and not by stranding, and therefore the loss came within the words of an insurance policy, "loss or damage through collision with . . . piers or stages or similar structures." Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 9.—The judgment of the court was delivered by

BARNES, J.—This is a motion for a writ of prohibition to the judge of the County Court of Barnstaple to restrain proceedings in a suit by the committees of the estate of the plaintiff, the owner of a pier at Ilfracombe, in the county of Devon, against the defendants, the owners of the steamship Normandy of Liverpool. According to an affidavit filed in the case, the summons was issued by the plaintiff in rem, claiming 200*l.* against the steamship in respect of damage alleged to have been caused by the vessel to the pier, no part of which is afloat. The action was brought under sub-sect. 3 of sect. 3 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, which is as follows: [His Lordship then read the section.] It was contended by counsel for the applicants, the defendants in the suit, that the suit was not a cause as to a "claim for damage by collision," within the meaning of the sub-section, and that the question raised was covered by authority. On the other hand, counsel for the respondent argued that the words in the sub-section, "damage by collision," include a claim such as that made by the plaintiff, and that the authorities cited on behalf of the defendants were distinguishable from the present case, and inconsistent with the judgments in the House of Lords in the case of The Zeta (ubi sup.). The simple question is whether the words "damage by collision" include damage done to a pier by a ship striking against it. The principal cases relied on by the applicants were Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.) and Robson v. Owner of the Kate (ubi sup.). In the former case it was held that the Admiralty jurisdiction of the County Court in cases of collision was not more extensive than that of the High Court of Admiralty, and, as the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction in the case of a collision on the Thames between two barges propelled by oars only, the County Court had no such Admiralty jurisdiction. In the course of his judgment Montague Smith, J. said (22 L. T. Rep., at p. 409; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S., at p. 392; L. Rep. 5 C. P., at p. 432): "What is the meaning of 'damage by collision'? We have nothing to guide us as to what damage by collision is within the Act, except the general scope and object of the Act. In common understanding, and as understood in the Court of Admiralty, damage by collision is damage sustained by a ship from another ship coming in contact with it." The late Master of the Rolls, then Brett, J., said the Act of 1868 "gives the County Court power to try in a particular way questions of salvage, claims for towage, necessities supplied to ships, and wages, and claims for damage to cargo or damage by collision. Damage by what collisions? Looking at sects. 7 and 22 of the Act of 1868, it seems to me that it means a collision between two vessels—such vessels as were formerly dealt with in the Admiralty Court." These dicta are favourable to the defendants' contention in this case; but the case is not conclusive in their favour, because the basis of the decision appears to have been that it was not the intention of the Legislature to give the County Courts Admiralty jurisdiction over Admiralty causes other than those over which the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction, and that the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction in respect of such a collision as that in question in the case. It did not decide what jurisdiction the County Courts have within their limit of amount in cases of damage done by a ship in which the Admiralty Court has jurisdiction. In Robson v. Owner of the Kate (ubi sup.) it was held that damage occasioned to an object on the bank of a river by contact with the sailing gear of a vessel afloat in the river was not "damage by collision" within sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, so that a County Court had no Admiralty jurisdiction in respect of such damage. Wills, J. in the course of his judgment said (59 L. T. Rep., at p. 558; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 330; 21 Q. B. Div., at p. 14): "It is not necessary to define the word 'collision.' The words 'damage by collision,' used, as here, in an Act the object of which is to confer an Admiralty jurisdiction, cannot be construed as including damage which has taken place on land, outside the ebb and flow of the tide, and which would certainly not have fallen within the original jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in respect to collision"; and Grantnam, J. said: "In Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.), which was a proceeding by way of prohibition under this Act, Montague Smith, J. is reported to have said"—he then quotes the passage I have already referred to, and adds: "This explanation seems to me well founded, and I think the preceding words 'damage to cargo,' which obviously refer to damage to cargo while on board a ship, tend to show that the intention of the Legislature was to confine the newly conferred jurisdiction to cases of collision between ships." The reason given by the latter judge for his decision is applicable to the present case; but the basis of the judgment of Wills, J. is that the damage was on land, outside the ebb and flow of the tide, whereas, if there be any distinction in the case before us, the damage is to a structure which stands in the sea. The case mainly relied on by counsel for the plaintiff was

The Zeta (ubi sup.), in which it was held that the jurisdiction given by sect. 3 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and extended by sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, included a claim for damage to a ship by collision with an object which was not a ship—e.g., a pier-head. That case turned on sect. 4 of the amending Act of 1869. The argument for the appellants, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, which succeeded in the House of Lords, was that sect. 4 of the Act of 1869 had clear words which gave the County Courts jurisdiction in “all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise,” and that the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction over such cases. The respondents do not appear to have disputed that the case fell within the language used in sect. 4, but argued that it was not intended to confer jurisdiction beyond that possessed by the Court of Admiralty, and that the action was not within that jurisdiction. The judgments were to the effect that the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction over claims of the character of that in question in the case, and that the claim fell within the words of sect. 4. Reference was also made by counsel for the plaintiff to expressions in some judgments in which the word “collision” has been used in a general way in relation to the impact of a ship against another object, and to some other cases which have only an indirect bearing on the present case; but in my opinion little assistance is to be derived from these references. I may here observe that the true meaning of collision is not a mere striking against, but a striking together; and to me it seems more correct to speak of a vessel stranding, or running, or striking upon or against rocks or the shore, than colliding therewith; and the same, to my mind, is true when the contact is by a vessel with some structure erected on the rocks or shore, and I notice that the use of the word “collision” in sects. 418 and 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 appears to refer only to collisions between ships.

If this matter were clear of all that has been said in other cases, the question would appear to me to be a simple matter of construction, and having regard to the object of the Act of 1868, and its general scope, and the ordinarily understood meaning of the words “damage by collision” in the Admiralty Court, where the term “causes of damage” is the general expression for damage cases, I should come to the conclusion that the word “collision” referred to collision between ships. This opinion is in accordance with the case of Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.) and Robson v. Owner of the Kate (ubi sup.), and there is nothing of substance to conflict with this view unless the argument based on the case of The Zeta (ubi sup.) does so. That argument comes to this, that the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction in 1868 in causes of damage received by or done by a ship which included a case of the present kind, and that the Act of 1868 gave similar jurisdiction to the County Courts within a limited amount; but in my opinion that argument seeks to establish too much. It has been decided in several cases that the County Court Acts of 1868 and 1869, while conferring Admiralty jurisdiction upon County Courts up to certain limited amounts, conferred no greater jurisdiction, except with regard to charter-parties, than was possessed by the Admiralty Court: (see The Dowse, 22 L. T. Rep. 627; 3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 424; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 135; Allen v. Garbutt, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 520n.; 6 Q. B. Div. 165; and Reg. v. Judge of the City of London Court, ubi sup.). The arguments and judgments in these and other cases show that the question has in such cases not really been whether the particular claim came within the ordinary meaning of the words of the County Court Acts, but whether the claim was one in respect of which the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction, and, if not, it was considered that it could not have been intended to confer Admiralty jurisdiction in such a case in the County Courts, as these Acts were to confer Admiralty jurisdiction, though sect. 2 of the Act of 1869 in certain matters gave a somewhat wider jurisdiction: (see The Alina, ubi sup.). I am not aware whether the words “damage to cargo,” in sub-sect. 3 of the Act of 1868, have yet been considered: (see The Victoria, 56 L. T. Rep. 499; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 120; 12 P. Div. 105). So also in The Zeta (ubi sup.) the real question was not whether the claim fell within the ordinary meaning of the words of sect. 4 of the Act of 1869, or as to the meaning of the word “collision,” but whether the words of sect. 4 should have a restricted interpretation on the ground, as was contended, that the case was not within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. It was held, however, in the House of Lords, overruling the Court of Appeal, that the case was within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, and thus any difficulty in the construction of the Act of 1869 was removed. In the present case the difficulty does not arise upon any question as to the jurisdiction of the High Court. It is clear from the terms of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and the decisions thereon, that the High Court has Admiralty jurisdiction in respect of this claim as being damage done by a ship (see The Uhla, ubi sup.; and The Excelsior, ubi sup.); but the question is whether the wording of the Act of 1868 is sufficient to give similar jurisdiction to the County Court within the limited amount in such a case. Now, it is quite clear that the Acts of 1868 and 1869 do not give Admiralty jurisdiction within the limited amounts in all cases in which the Admiralty Court has jurisdiction. For instance, no jurisdiction is given in causes of possession, co-ownership cases, mortgage or bottomry, and it cannot therefore be inferred that the County Courts were intended to have Admiralty jurisdiction in all Admiralty causes up to limited amounts. On the contrary, care is taken to specify exactly what causes may be brought in the County Court. Whatever the old Admiralty jurisdiction was at the time when the Act of 1868 was passed, the Acts of 1840 and 1861 had enacted that the High Court of Admiralty should have jurisdiction over all claims for “damage received by any ship or sea-going vessel,” and “over any claim for damage done to any ship,” and nothing would have been easier than to have used similar words in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act of 1868, whereas the words adopted in that Act are “damage by collision.” We have only, therefore, to consider what is included in these words. All cases of damage done by a ship cannot, in my opinion, be so included. It has been held, for instance, that injury to a diver who was caught by the paddle-wheel of a steamer (The Sylph, 17 L. T. Rep. 519; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 37; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 24), approved in The Beta (20 L. T. Rep. 988; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 447), which, however, was dissented from in the case of Smith v. Brown (24 L. T. Rep. 808; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 729); damage done to a cable in freeing it from a vessel's anchor by which it had been fouled (The Clara Killam, 23 L. T. Rep. 27; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 463; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 161); and damage to a vessel through grounding to avoid another vessel owing to negligence in the navigation of the other vessel (The Industrie, 24 L. T. Rep. 446; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 17; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 303) could be sued for in the Admiralty Court; but clearly these cases could not properly be called cases of damage by collision. Other illustrations may be put analogous to the last case, though probably they are rather cases of damage received by a ship than of damage done by a ship. Possibly the plaintiffs' argument need not be put so high as to include in damage by collision all cases of damage done by a ship, but only cases of damage done by one ship to another, or by a ship to some other object by striking against it; but even then the word "collision" in the ordinary meaning, and as ordinarily used and understood in the Admiralty Court, would not be properly applicable to the latter case. Cases of striking something which is not engaged in navigation are very rare, and it is not unreasonable to assume that, in using the word "collision," the framers of the Act intended to deal with the class of case which forms the ordinary subject of a collision suit. It was urged that it would be strange if, as held in The Zeta (ubi sup.), the owner of a pier or dock could be sued in the County Court for damage caused to a ship by the negligence of the servants of such owner, and yet that such owner could not in the County Court sue for damage to the structure by negligence on the part of the ship's people; but the answer appears to be that the amending Act of 1869 covers the one case but not the other. The collocation of the words "damage by collision" and "damage to cargo" in the sub-section, to my mind, also intends to show that the sub-section was only dealing with ships, though what is included in "damage to cargo" is not a subject for present consideration. For these reasons I am of opinion that the writ of prohibition must go, and that the applicants are entitled to their costs of this motion against the respondents.

Pilotage is compulsory on a vessel inward bound from the sea through the port of Liverpool to Manchester until she enters the Ship Canal at Eastham.

Sect. 128 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 requires that "the pilot in charge of any inward bound vessel shall cause the same (if need be) to be properly moored at anchor in the river Mersey, and shall pilot the same into some one of the wet docks within the port of Liverpool."

The fact that a vessel anchors for the purpose of waiting for the tide does not put an end to the compulsory services of the pilot.

Semble, pilotage is also compulsory on vessels going out from Eastham through the port of Liverpool to the sea.

ACTION for damage by collision brought by the owners of the Swedish steamship Bifrost against the owners of the steamship Mercedes de Larrinaga.

The Bifrost was a steamship of 2122 tons gross register, and at the time of the collision was on a voyage from Skutskar to Manchester with a general cargo on board, and manned by a crew of twenty-five hands all told. The Mercedes de Larrinaga was a steamship of 4154 tons gross register, and was on a voyage from Galverston to Manchester with a cargo of cotton, and manned by a crew of thirty-four hands all told. While on her way up the Mersey she stopped and anchored in order to wait for the tide before entering the Eastham Docks.

The collision occurred in the Eastham Channel, river Mersey, near the No. 4 buoy. Both vessels at the time were in charge of pilots.

Barnes, J. came to the conclusion on the facts that the collision was caused by the negligent navigation of the Mercedes de Larrinaga, and held that the fault was that of the pilot alone.

The defendants alleged that the pilot was compulsorily in charge at the time, and that they were not therefore liable for the collision.

The material sections of the various Acts of Parliament dealing with the question are as follows:

By sect. 3 of 8 Anne, c. 8—an Act for making a convenient dock or basin at Liverpool for the security of all ships trading to and from the said port of Liverpool—the limits of the port are defined as:

The limits and extent whereof are as far as a certain place in Hoyle-Lake called the Redstones, and from thence all over the river Mersey to Warrington and Frodsham Bridges.

Sect. 118. The board shall have the whole and sole regulation and management of pilots and of pilot boats, and of the pilotage annuity fund, and one of the committees to be appointed by them under or by virtue of the powers vested in them by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1857, and of this Act, shall consist of not less than twelve persons, who shall be called the pilotage committee.

Sect. 121. The board may examine any person, being of the age of eighteen years and upwards, who shall have served as an apprentice in any of the Liverpool pilot boats for not less than three years . . . and every such apprentice or other person who upon any such examination shall be found to be qualified to act as a pilot, and shall be approved of by the board, shall receive a licence in writing, signed by the secretary of the board, certifying that he is duly qualified to act as a pilot for the port of Liverpool.

Sect. 123 provides for a penalty on persons acting as pilots without a licence.

Sect. 124 provides that pilots misbehaving themselves are to have their licences recalled.

Sect. 125. If any pilot, after being personally required, or after a proper signal shall be made by the master of any inward bound vessel, shall refuse to take the charge of such vessel . . . or shall without reasonable cause refuse to afford any extraordinary assistance required by the master of any vessel in distress from the boat of such pilot or the crew thereof, such pilot shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty of not exceeding ten pounds, and may, at the discretion of the board, be deprived of his licence.

Sect. 127. Every pilot taking upon himself the charge of any vessel shall, if so required by the master thereof, pilot such vessel, if sailing out of the port of Liverpool, through the Queen's Channel, so far to the westward as the buoy commonly called or known by the name of the Formby North-west Buoy, or Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel; and, if sailing through the Rock Channel, pilot the same so far to the westward as the north-west buoy of Hoyle; and any pilot who shall in any case refuse to pilot such vessel to such distances as aforesaid shall forfeit his right to receive any sum of money for piloting such vessel, and may also at the discretion of the board be deprived of his licence.

Sect. 128. The pilot in charge of any inward bound vessel shall cause the same (if need be) to be properly moored at anchor in the river Mersey, and shall pilot the same into some one of the wet docks within the port of Liverpool, whether belonging to the board or not, without making any additional charge for so doing, unless his attendance shall be required on board such vessel while at anchor in the river Mersey, and before going into dock, in which case he shall be entitled to receive five shillings per day for such attendance.

Sect. 130. In case the master of an inward bound vessel, other than a coasting vessel in ballast or under the burthen of one hundred tons, shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, such pilot having offered his services for that purpose, such master shall pay to such pilot, or if more than one then to the first of such pilots who shall have offered his services, the full pilotage rates which would have been payable to him if he had actually piloted such vessel into the port of Liverpool.

Sect. 133. The board may from time to time determine, vary, and alter and fix rates of pilotage to be paid to pilots for piloting vessels, such rates to be according to the draught of water of such vessels, and to be within the limits following—that is to say, . . .

Sect. 138. If the master of any vessel shall require the attendance of a pilot on board any vessel during her riding at anchor, or being at Hoylake, or in the river Mersey, the pilot so employed shall be paid for every day or portion of a day he shall so attend the sum of five shillings and no more; provided that the pilot who shall have the charge of any vessel shall be paid for every day of his attendance whilst in the river; but no such charge shall be made for the day on which such vessel, being outward bound, shall leave the river Mersey to commence her voyage, or being inward bound shall enter the river Mersey.

Mersey Docks (Pilotage, &c.) Act 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 172).

Sect. 3. Where a vessel outward bound from the port of Liverpool calls at any stage in the river Mersey to the northward of an imaginary straight line drawn from the Dingle Point on the Lancashire shore of the Mersey to the New Ferry Slip on the Cheshire shore or anchors or moors in the river to the northward of such line . . . the duties of the pilot shall extend to and include the taking her to and from and attending her at every such stage or mooring.

Sect. 4. The duties of a pilot in charge of any vessel inward bound shall extend to and include the taking her to and from and attending her to any stage, anchorage, or mooring in the river Mersey to the northward of the imaginary line hereinbefore mentioned to which she may go for the purpose of discharging any passengers, crew, animals, or cargo, or while waiting for tide or weather, or otherwise for any purpose incidental to the voyage before entering any wet dock, and the obligation of the master to employ a pilot when inward bound shall extend to and include an obligation to employ a pilot to perform the duties above mentioned.

Sect. 5. When a vessel is neither inward bound nor outward bound the master shall be obliged to employ a pilot (a) For her navigation or movement. Provided, further, that this section shall not apply to any vessel when passing to or from any place lying to the northward of the said imaginary line from or to (i.) Garston Weston Point or Ellemere Port; (ii.) any of the Manchester Ship Canal Company's docks at Runcorn; (iii.) any dock, quay, or wharf lying to the southward of the said imaginary line and being within the jurisdiction of the Upper Mersey Commissioners.

Schedule.—Pilotage rates.—(2) In the case of vessels referred to in the section of this Act of which the marginal note is "Pilots to be employed when moving vessel in the river," for each time a vessel is navigated or moved in the river Mersey northward of the imaginary line hereinbefore mentioned, a sum not exceeding . . . 2l.

Upper Mersey Navigation Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 104):

Sect. 4. This Act shall apply to that part of the river Mersey lying between an imaginary straight line drawn across that river from the Eastham Ferry Slip to a point on the north-east bank of that river distant twenty chains measured along that bank in a south-easterly direction from the lighthouse at Garston, and another imaginary straight line drawn across the river at a place called Bank Quay in Warrington in the county of Lancaster, and which part of the river Mersey is in this Act referred to as the Upper Mersey.

Sect. 51. Saving always and reserving to the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board . . . all their several and respective rights and interests, in as full and ample a manner as they or any of them could or might have held or enjoyed the same if this Act had not been passed, except so far as by this Act is declared.

Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 188):

Sect. 3. From and after the completion and opening for traffic of the canal by this Act authorised the said canal and so much of the navigable waters of the rivers Mersey and Irwell as lie between Hunt's Bank in the township and parish of Manchester and the limit of the port of Liverpool at Warrington, and all channels, canals, cuts, docks, and works of the company within those limits shall be and are hereby constituted the harbour and port of Manchester, and the company shall be the harbour authority of that harbour and port.

Sect. 211. Nothing in this Act shall take away, alter, or prejudicially affect any power, jurisdiction, or authority of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60):

Sect. 605 (1). The master and owner of any ship passing through any pilotage district in the United Kingdom on a voyage between two places both situate out of that district shall be exempted from any obligation to employ a pilot in that district, or to pay pilotage rates when not employing a pilot within that district. (2) The exemption under this section shall not apply to ships loading or discharging at any place situate within the district or at any place situate above the district on the same river or its tributaries.

Sect. 633. An owner or master of a ship shall not be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship within any district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law.

The following is the "Notice to Pilots" issued by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board:

Piloting of vessels inward bound.—The pilots are hereby reminded that it is the duty of the pilot in charge of any inward bound vessel to pilot her into some one of the wet docks within the port, whether belonging to the board or not, without making any additional fee for so doing. Note.—Wet docks within the port include (inter alia) the docks at Garston and the locks to the Ship Canal at Eastham. If, before pilotage is completed, a master wishes to supersede the pilot, the pilot must warn the master that he and any unqualified person he may intend to employ will be committing a pilotage offence, and the pilot must also distinctly offer to complete his pilotage services. If the master still persists, the pilot must then take such course as he may deem best, and report the circumstances at the first possible opportunity.—By order, (Signed) MILES K. BURTON, General Manager and Secretary, Dock Office, Liverpool, July 22, 1902.

Evidence was called from which it appeared that the river Irwell, which enters the canal at Woden-street Bridge, is absorbed into the river Mersey at Mersey Weir. The Manchester Docks are on a portion of the canal which has availed itself of the bed of the Irwell, and the docks are entirely supplied by water from that river.

Aspinall, K.C. and Noad for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted that the port of Manchester, as it is connected with the port of Liverpool by a canal, is not situated "on the same river or its tributaries" within the meaning of sect. 605 (2) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. If so, pilotage is not compulsory. The case is not covered by the provisions of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, because that Act only deals with vessels inward bound to or outward bound from the port of Liverpool. The terminus must be the port of Liverpool, and beyond that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board have no power to impose terms. The terms "outward bound" and "inward bound" only apply to vessels doing business with the port of Liverpool. The intention of the Act of 1858 was to deal with the class of larger vessel which did not, and could not at the time the Act was passed, go beyond Liverpool. The sections form a complete code based on the requirements of the port of Liverpool, and it is submitted none of the provisions apply to vessels going to Manchester. As soon as the Mercedes de Larrinaga came to anchor the duties of the pilot were at an end:

The Servia and Carinthia, 78 L. T. Rep. 54; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 353; (1898) P. 36.

The Mercedes de Larrinaga anchored when she was to the northward of the imaginary line laid down in sect. 3 of the Mersey Docks (Pilotage, &c.) Act 1899. She was not proceeding to a wet dock, for she was out of the region of wet docks. The Eastham Locks cannot be said to be in any sense a wet dock. Wet docks must mean docks of such a nature that they can be used for loading and discharging cargo in or repairing ships. The Legislature has expressly granted exemptions to vessels passing through pilotage districts. See sect. 605 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 and sect. 5 of the Mersey Docks (Pilotage, &c.) Act 1899. The whole scheme of the latter Act deals with vessels to the northward of the imaginary line laid down in sect. 3. The pilot can refuse to take the vessel on any further, or if he does take her on he is entitled to demand further payment. The case is not within the principles laid down in The Charlton (73 L. T. Rep. 49; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29). In that case and the earlier case of General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (20 L. T. Rep. 581; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 237; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238) it was held that the owners were not responsible for the fault of the pilot because at the time of the collision it was not established that the relationship of master and servant existed at the time of the collision between the owners and the pilot. Unless an Act of Parliament says so in clear language the courts are always slow to say that there is an obligation to take a pilot.

Pickford, K.C. and Dawson Miller, for the defendants, contra.—According to the plaintiffs' contention if a ship bound to Manchester arrives off the bar at a time when she may get through to the Eastham Locks without having to stop and anchor for the tide then she may be under compulsory pilotage, but if she does stop and anchor, pilotage is not compulsory after she has come to anchor. Sect. 128 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 is not a complete code of the duties of the pilot. All that it provides is the additional obligation that the pilot shall move and take a vessel into a wet dock. The works at Eastham are a wet dock within the meaning of the Act. See the notice to pilots issued by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. As an inward bound vessel the Mercedes de Larrinaga was bound to take a pilot, and she was no less an inward bound vessel because she was bound through the port. Mere temporary anchorage does not put an end to the terms of service on which the pilot is employed:

The Rigborgs Minde, 40 L. T. Rep. 232; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 123; 8 P. Div. 132.

If the plaintiffs' contention is right, the words "inward bound" must be limited to a vessel bound to a wet dock in the port of Liverpool. They also referred to

The Maria, 16 L. T. Rep. 717; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 358;

The Annapolis, 4 L. T. Rep. 417; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 69; Lush. 295;

The London Gazette, Jan. 2, 1894, setting out the Treasury warrant of Nov. 21, 1893, defining the limits of the port of Manchester.

Aspinall, K.C. in reply.—The works at Eastham were expressly taken out of the limits of the port of Liverpool by sect. 3 of the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885, and therefore the locks cannot be said to be a wet dock within the limits of the port of Liverpool.

THE MERCEDES DE LARRINAGA.

[ADM.]

March 16.—BARNES, J.—This case is one which one may say bristles with points, and in giving my judgment I have to deal with it in the way it stands and after such argument as I have had. I feel, however, that there may be some points which may have escaped my attention, and possibly the attention of counsel, too. My opinion of the case has been come to upon the argument which I have had, and I now proceed to deliver it. The collision in this case took place between the Bifrost and the Mercedes de Larrinaga on Monday, the 21st Dec. last, in the Eastham Channel of the river Mersey, near a buoy which is marked No. 4 on the chart. I think it is the last buoy in coming in towards Eastham before the Eastham Ferry is reached. Of course, the place where this collision took place is material. Both the vessels were proceeding to the Eastham Locks on the way to Manchester, and both of them were in charge of duly licensed Liverpool pilots. The conclusion of fact to which I came on hearing the case, with the assistance of the Elder Brethren, was that so far as the navigation was concerned the Mercedes de Larrinaga was alone to blame for the collision, and that the fault was the fault only of her pilot, and as the defendants, the owners of the Mercedes de Larrinaga, had pleaded a plea of compulsory pilotage, the point was then raised as to whether, the fault having been the fault of the pilot alone, he was compulsorily in charge of the ship so as to exclude the owners from responsibility. Therefore the question now to be determined is whether the pilot of the Mercedes de Larrinaga was compulsorily in charge of the ship. The main point that was made on behalf of the plaintiffs was that a vessel inward bound from the sea to Manchester, viâ the Ship Canal, is not subject to compulsory pilotage in the port of Liverpool. That is a point of very considerable importance, because it appears to me that it affects the whole question of pilotage of ships, other than coasting vessels in ballast or under 100 tons burden, inward bound from the sea to Manchester, viâ the Ship Canal, and that, although not directly, yet indirectly, it practically touches upon the question of pilotage of vessels outward bound from Manchester, viâ the Ship Canal, to sea. The place which I have mentioned as being the place of the collision is in the port of Liverpool. I noticed—this was one of the reasons for further discussion—on looking at the plan of the Manchester Ship Canal and river Mersey, that there is a line to distinguish the limits of the powers of the Upper Navigation Commissioners, and drawn across the river from Eastham Ferry to a point above Garston. But that does not affect this case at all, because I have been informed by counsel that practically those powers deal with the buoying and so forth of part of the Mersey which is in the port of Liverpool. Then, again, there is another line drawn across the same map from a point on the Lancashire side called Dungeon Point to a point on the opposite side called Ince Ferry—one side being in the port of Liverpool and the other in the port of Manchester, and that, I understand, is only a line drawn for Customs purposes, and does not affect the question in this case at all.

The point that has to be considered turns principally, if not entirely, on the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act of 1858. Now, one of the early Acts relating to the port of Liverpool is the statute of 8 Anne, c. 8, and the port is there defined in sect. 3. [His Lordship then read the section.] I need not concern myself with Frodsham, because, if I understand rightly, that is on the Weaver. So that the port includes the whole of the river Mersey from the sea, according to this definition, up to Warrington. One of the contentions that was made in this case was in connection with the suggestion that Eastham Locks at the end of the canal might be treated as in the port of Liverpool, and as a wet dock in the port of Liverpool. But, since the matter was first discussed, it was yesterday pointed out that the Manchester Ship Canal Act of 1885 has made a difference about this, because sect. 3 of that Act is as follows: [His Lordship then read the section.] I do not know what that latter proviso really preserves. It is suggested by Mr. Pickford that, notwithstanding the provision that the canal is in the port of Manchester, it still remains in the port of Liverpool for certain purposes, because of the proviso that “nothing in this Act shall be deemed to affect any of the rights or privileges of the port or harbour of Liverpool,” &c. It seems to me difficult to construe exactly what this was intended to do, but I can hardly regard that which is part of the port of Manchester as still being within the port of Liverpool. There is another section which was referred to in the Manchester Ship Canal Act of 1885—namely, the 211th section. I do not myself at present see that that section really affects the present question. Now, the sections of the Mersey Dock Act of 1858 which bear directly upon the present question come under part 6 of the Act, which is headed, “With respect to pilots and pilot boats”; and the sections which deal with inward bound vessels were considered by me in the case of The Servia and Carinthia (ubi sup.). Some of those sections cover the cases both of inward and outward bound vessels, and some only relate to outward bound vessels. Considering for the moment that I am dealing with an inward bound vessel, the sections that are material are the 121st, which gives power to the board to licence persons to act as pilots for the port of Liverpool, the 123rd, which imposes a penalty upon any person who shall pilot any vessel into or out of the port of Liverpool without a licence, and the 124th section, which imposes penalties upon any pilot who shall refuse to take charge of any inward bound vessel upon a proper signal being made for a pilot, and of any outward bound vessel upon the request of the master thereof. Those sections apply to both inward and outward bound ships, but the 125th section applies only to inward bound ships. That section imposes a penalty upon any pilot refusing to conduct an inward bound vessel. I think that clearly refers to a vessel bound from sea into the port of Liverpool, having regard to the terms of the 123rd section. The 128th section is as follows—and this gives rise to one of the arguments addressed to me—“The pilot in charge of any inward bound vessel shall cause the same (if need be) to be properly moored at anchor in the river Mersey and shall pilot the same into some one of the wet docks within the port of Liverpool, whether belonging to the board or not, without making any additional charge for so doing, unless his attendance shall be required on board such vessel while at anchor in the river

Mersey and before going into dock, in which case he shall be entitled to receive 5s. per day for such attendance." Sect. 130 provides that in case the master of any inward bound vessel other than a coasting vessel in ballast, or under the burden of 100 tons, shall refuse to take on board or employ a pilot, such pilot having offered his services for the purpose, such master shall pay the full pilotage as if the vessel had been piloted into the port of Liverpool. That, again, clearly applies to inward bound ships coming in from the sea, and coming into the port of Liverpool. Sect. 133 gives power to the board to fix rates for pilotage as stated in it. There are rates for piloting distances from Great Orme's Head to the port of Liverpool, at not less than 5s and not more than 8s. per foot, according to the draught of water, and from any greater distance into the port of Liverpool at not less than 6s., nor more than 9s. per foot. Those are the sections which I think deal with the inward bound ships, and it has been held that under those sections vessels, other than the small coasting vessels which are referred to, are obliged to employ pilots coming into the port of Liverpool; and, as I have already said, the principal question in the case is whether the present case comes within those sections. I think it is desirable to refer to the sections which apply to outward bound vessels, because they throw light upon the "inward bound" sections. The 1st section which deals more particularly with the outward bound vessels in addition to those I have already referred to, which seem to cover and deal also with the case of inward bound vessels, is the 127th, which specifies the distance to which vessels are to be piloted when they are sailing out of the port of Liverpool. It makes no mention of where the pilot is to take charge. I have had already to refer to the 126th section. It does not matter very much in this case. The next section which deals with outward bound vessels is the 133rd, which gives, again, power to the board to fix rates for pilotage, and gives the rates for piloting a vessel out of the port of Liverpool. The 139th section also deals with the case of outward bound ships, and in that the provision is that in case the master of any vessel being outward bound and not being a coasting vessel in ballast, or under the burden of 100 tons, for which provision is otherwise made, shall proceed to sea and shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, he shall pay the full pilotage rates. Those seem to be the material sections which deal with both inward and outward bound vessels, and I think it is to be observed that generally the wording of the sections does not confine them to vessels which are bound to or from Liverpool. I am now referring to those sections in a general sense, but I think if all the sections are examined that general sense, which is one which pervades them, is that those sections deal with vessels which are either coming out of or going into the port of Liverpool, without saying what is to become of those vessels after they have come into the port of Liverpool, or where they are to start from in the port of Liverpool. There seems no doubt that the general effect of those sections is that every vessel, with the exception of the small vessels which are dealt with otherwise, coming into the port of Liverpool is bound to take a pilot; and so also it seems to me that every vessel outward bound which goes out of the port of Liverpool is bound to take a pilot for that purpose, although that is not a point which has to be determined in this case. The view which I take of the broad point put forward by the plaintiffs is that the pilotage is not to be confined to vessels which simply come out of some dock or anchorage through the port of Liverpool, or are bound into some dock or anchorage in the port of Liverpool; because it seems to me to make no difference with regard to these sections whether the vessel, after having come into the port of Liverpool, passes into some other jurisdiction which is not to be treated as being in the port of Liverpool. I cannot help thinking that that is the correct view to take of these sections, although, of course, it is obvious that one is applying these sections to a state of things which did not exist at the time when the Act of 1858 came into force. Whatever the view which may be entertained about compulsory pilotage, and I am quite aware that many people object altogether to the law of compulsory pilotage as administered in England, I am not here to express an opinion upon such a question. It is urged that it would be better to allow ships to be navigated by their masters and officers, and that although it might be desirable to compel them to employ a pilot and have him on board for the purpose of advice, yet it is not a satisfactory state of things that he should take charge, and they should be compelled to leave him in charge. Whichever view is the correct view to take as to what is advantageous, the law is that the pilotage is compulsory; and again, whichever view you take about it, whether it is to be compulsory in the sense that he is in charge, or only in the sense that he is put on board as adviser, the general consideration for having a pilot on board at all applies with equal force for the purpose of navigation, whether the ship is coming simply into a dock, or anchorage in any port of the river Mersey which is in the port of Liverpool, or whether she is going through the same waters and afterwards going on to Manchester. The difficulties of navigation are precisely the same, and the advantage of having someone on board who knows the locality is precisely the same in each case. So my conclusion with regard to this first point, this main point, is that the Mercedes de Larrinaga, was compelled to take a pilot into the port of Liverpool.

The next contention which the plaintiffs put forward was based on sect. 605 of the Merchant Shipping Act. They contended that this vessel was passing through a pilotage district between two places outside that district—namely, the sea on the one hand and the port of Manchester on the other. I am not quite sure whether that section strictly applies where the employment is not compulsory in the district in the sense in which the matter was discussed yesterday; because in some cases one finds that the pilotage is made compulsory for a district, and in others, like this Mersey case, one finds it is made compulsory on ships doing certain things—namely, moving in or out. But if the first part of the section does apply then the question would be whether the exemption under the section does or does not apply to this ship, because she was discharging at a place situate above the district on the same river or its tributaries. Now, one has with regard to this question to look at the facts, and I have had evidence which shows this state of things—first of all that the Irwell is a tributary of the Mersey. The Irwell pours its waters into the Manchester Ship Canal Docks at Manchester, and the waters then run down to a place where the Mersey joins the canal, and I understand that the canal really runs along the old bed of the Irwell till it joins the Mersey. Then the waters of the Mersey and the Irwell run on together until they come in the canal to a place called Rixton Junction, where they pour out into the Mersey as it still exists, and the only water which goes on down the canal from that point is the water which is used for lockage purposes. This matter was dealt with by the engineer of the Ship Canal, who was called as a witness by the plaintiffs. The effect of that is to leave the Manchester Docks as situate on a tributary of the river Mersey, and the result is that this vessel was going to discharge at a place above the port of Liverpool on a tributary of the river Mersey, and so it seems to me that the exemption which is referred to in the 605th section cannot be brought into force. In fact, Mr. Aspinall, who argued the case for the plaintiffs, although he contended that the 605th section applied, was candid enough to admit that he did not think there was any argument of weight which would support that contention.

The third point is a minor point, but one of very considerable difficulty, and is this: If a vessel bound in from sea into the port of Liverpool is bound to take a pilot into the port, yet in a case like the present, where the ship anchored before she got to Eastham, the compulsory service then comes to an end. Of course this argument assumes that there was compulsion to begin with, as I have already held. In this case the vessel anchored off Laird's yard, which is, if I remember rightly, just a little above the Woodside Ferry, and she did so to await a suitable tide, in order to go on to Eastham. I think, speaking from recollection of the evidence, that the plaintiffs' vessel did something of a similar character. Both vessels had to anchor for a similar object, and the collision happened afterwards when they were going up to the entrance to the Eastham Locks. The point made about this is made under the 128th section of the Act of 1858, and is that the compulsory services ceased so soon as the vessel came to an anchor, because it is said that that section only requires a pilot to moor a ship at anchor in the Mersey and to pilot her into one of the wet docks of the port of Liverpool, whether belonging to the board or not, without making any additional charge for doing so. The argument was that as soon as she was brought to anchor in the river Mersey the compulsory pilotage finished, because she was not going on to a wet dock in the port of Liverpool, and therefore the pilot had nothing more to do. The way in which that argument was met by the defendants at first was this: That the ship was bound to a dock in the port of Liverpool, because the Eastham Locks might be treated as being a wet dock within the port of Liverpool. But that now seems rather to be got rid of by the section of the Manchester Ship Canal Act, which seems to make the end of the canal within the port of Manchester. I think if this case were to turn simply upon the construction of sect. 128 it would be very difficult to say that this was a wet dock within the port of Liverpool, within the meaning of that section, although the term wet dock might not unreasonably in such circumstances be held, according to the definition in the dictionaries and so forth, to include a place which admitted ships and then excluded the tide if required. But the argument for the plaintiffs was further supported by reference to the case of The Servia and Carinthia (ubi sup.), to which I have already referred, and it was contended that the decision in that case had the effect of showing that compulsory services must in such a case as this come to an end at any rate when the vessel anchored. I remember that case very well, and I have also read the judgment in it, and it does not, in my opinion, really determine the case in the way the plaintiffs contend, because the question there was as to additional remuneration in circumstances which are stated shortly in the headnote to that case. The headnote is as follows: "The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, as the pilotage authority for the port of Liverpool, has under sect. 221 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 power to fix, in addition to the ordinary compulsory pilotage rates, a reasonable charge by way of 'extra' remuneration for a pilot licensed by the board taking an outward bound vessel from a dock alongside a landing stage to complete her loading, as in the case of embarking passengers, their baggage, and the mails. The board has also power to fix an additional charge as extra remuneration (besides the charge per day for attendance whilst a vessel is necessarily lying in the river in the course of her navigation inward or outward) in the case of an inward bound vessel taken by a pilot to a landing stage to land passengers, baggage, and mails, before discharging the rest of her cargo, including the case of vessels disembarking cattle and sheep at certain landing stages in pursuance of the orders made under the provisions of the Diseases of Animals Act 1894. Seemle, that in the case of an outward bound vessel compulsory pilotage will not commence until the vessel proceeds from the stage to sea, and that, in the case of an inward bound vessel, the employment of the pilot by compulsion of law will cease or be suspended as soon as the vessel deviates to the stage from the route which she would otherwise follow to the dock." The real point that was raised in that case was simply a question as to extra remuneration of pilots, and it arose in the case of inward bound ships, in consequence of the vessels bringing cattle to Liverpool going first of all into the river, then to a stage where the cattle was landed, and then into one of the docks, and, with regard to outward bound vessels coming out of dock first and then proceeding to one of the stages—I think the Prince's Landing Stage—for the purpose of taking up passengers, cargo, and mails, and then proceeding to sea. It was contended that these were onerous and difficult duties for the pilots and they were entitled to extra remuneration, and that in such circumstances they were doing something which was not contemplated as part of the pilot's duties without extra remuneration. It does not appear to me when that case is examined very carefully, that it really affects in any material degree the question which I have to decide now. Going back to the 128th section, I think it is necessary to construe it in connection with the other sections, and one must face this sort of point. First of all, with regard to a vessel which comes in from the sea and is going straight up to the Eastham Locks, she is an inward bound vessel, bound in from the sea to the port of Liverpool. She does not come to an anchor at all, and it seems to me she is bound to take a pilot coming in. Then the question must be raised, if so, where does his duty as compulsory pilot cease? I put that point to Mr. Aspinall, and I do not think, with the greatest deference to his argument, that it was answered in any way satisfactorily, because all I could get from him in substance was that compulsory pilotage ought to cease when the vessel had passed the position in which she would be going into any wet dock in the port of Liverpool. But that, it seems to me, is not a satisfactory answer, and leaves such a serious difficulty open as to the determination of the services. It certainly does not cover the case of a vessel which is bound up to Garston. The answer to that probably is that such a vessel is within the 128th section because she is going to a wet dock which, although not belonging to the board, is within the words, "Whether belonging to the board or not." But it seems to me that, with regard to a vessel going straight up to Eastham, the only sensible conclusion is that the pilot taking charge at sea must take her on to Eastham, where her navigation in the port of Liverpool is to cease. I cannot come to any other reasonable conclusion upon the matter. I myself am not able to see how it can reasonably be argued in practice or dealt with under the sections in any other way than that. The ship is being taken to a spot in the river Mersey which is at the end of her necessary navigation in the port of Liverpool; and this construction does not seem to me to put any undue strain upon the sections which have been considered in this case. Then that gets rid of anything, such as was suggested in the course of the case, as to whether the compulsion is to exist in case a vessel goes to Eastham direct, or is to exist up to the time that she anchors, because assuming that there was compulsion to begin with the plaintiffs would contend, as I understand, that if the vessel is going up to an anchorage the compulsion would last till she anchored, but if she was going to Eastham direct there would not be any compulsion at all, and how is anybody to know that when the pilot comes on board outside the bar. It is impossible to be certain in all cases whether a vessel would have to anchor or go straight on. A thick fog, for instance, might prevent her going straight on. Then, again, with regard to the argument about anchorage, it is said that if the vessel comes to an anchor she has finished her navigation so far as the river is concerned, and that therefore the pilotage ceases to be compulsory. That may be true enough if the anchorage is the final point of destination, so far as navigation at that time is concerned, but I do not see how it can be treated as coming to an end if the anchorage is only anchorage in the itinerary towards the destination which it is necessary to get to in the ordinary course of navigation. Because if that were to be held, the moment a vessel dropped her anchor in the Mersey, even though she did so compulsorily, and yet was going to a second anchorage as her final destination, according to Mr. Aspinall's argument that first anchorage would put an end to the compulsory services. This vessel came to an anchor for navigation reasons until the tide permitted her to proceed, and it seems to me that such temporary anchoring is only in the itinerary towards the destination in the river to which she is entitled to have a pilot to take her. I have already referred to the point made with regard to this question of the wet dock, and that difficulty I do not think I need say anything more about, because the Ship Canal Act appears to have altered the position with regard to that point. It may be possible to hold that for pilotage purposes the end of the canal is still to be treated as within the port of Liverpool, and for such purposes is a wet dock, but I do not feel that it is necessary to base my decision upon it, and I feel great difficulty because of the Manchester Ship Canal Act of 1885. There is this matter to be observed with regard to outward bound vessels, that no point of departure is mentioned in any of the sections which deal with the employment of pilots on outward bound ships. It seems to me, having regard to their generality, that any vessel proceeding to sea out of the port of Liverpool would have to take a pilot, and there is no such difficulty, as suggested with regard to inward bound vessels in consequence of the terms of sect. 128, in applying compulsory pilotage to vessels proceeding to sea from Eastham. They would have to take a pilot on leaving Eastham, and it would be strange if one had to construe the Act in such a way that inward bound vessels would not have to employ a pilot right up to Eastham. There are other points which possibly require, and possibly may have at some future time, some further consideration, but at present it does not seem to me that any of the points which have been somewhat slightly touched upon affect the view which has been taken upon the general sections. There is, for instance, the 114th section of the Act of 1858, which deals with who is liable to pay pilotage. If that section had in any way restricted the recovery of pilotage as against persons who were in the port of Liverpool or against ships in the port of Liverpool, one might have felt that pilotage ought only to be applied to such ships as the rates could be recovered against and such persons as were connected with those ships in the port of Liverpool. But the section is quite general, and, although there may be difficulties about enforcing it against persons or ships not in the port of Liverpool, I cannot see myself that it affords sufficient answer to the argument which contends for the pilotage being compulsory in the way I have thought that it is.

There is one other matter to consider, and that is the effect of the statute of 1899. That Act was passed in order to meet the difficulty which was pointed out in the case of The Servia and Carinthia (ubi sup.). It recites that "whereas by the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 the masters of vessels inward bound for and outward bound from the port of Liverpool are, subject to the exemptions by the said Act granted, required to employ pilots." Then it deals with the difficulties raised in the case of The Servia and Carinthia (ubi sup.), and it proceeds to legislate so as to get rid of those difficulties and free the matter from the doubt which that case raised. Counsel for the plaintiffs relied upon this recital as showing that the Act of 1858 was only dealing with vessels inward bound to and outward bound from the port of Liverpool. But if one compares that recital with the terms of the Act of 1858 it cannot be said, I think, that the recital is strictly correct, because one does not find in the Act of 1858 the words "inward bound for and outward bound from" the port of Liverpool, but it deals with vessels "bound into and out of" the port of Liverpool. That does not seem to admit so readily, as if that recital were correct, a consideration that the Legislature was only dealing with vessels which had Liverpool for their termination a quo and ad quem. I do not think that Act has any real bearing upon the present case. Of course it may be that under sect. 5 it may deal with vessels passing from Manchester to Liverpool, or simply from Liverpool to Manchester. I am not concerned to consider that point at all. Counsel for the plaintiffs suggested, broadly speaking, that there was great difficulty in working out this matter if it was held that pilotage was compulsory. I myself see no difficulty whatever. It is a simple matter. Every vessel, if I am right, bound in from the sea, except small vessels exempted, to the port of Manchester and going into the canal at Eastham is to take a pilot; and so, though I have not to decide that, has, apparently, every vessel going out from Eastham to the sea. There is no difficulty whatever in the application of the Act. If I am right, the result is that although the fault in this case was the fault only of the pilot of the Mercedes de Larrinaga, the defendants' plea of compulsory pilotage, it appears to me, is established. The plaintiffs' claim will, therefore, be dismissed without costs, and the defendants' counter-claim dismissed with costs.

Collision—Failure to stand by and give name—Compulsory pilotage—Limits of port of Liverpool—8 Anne, c. viii.—Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.)—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 422, 586, 603, 633.

The fact of a vessel after collision with another vessel not standing by and giving her name, as required by sect. 422 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, does not render her owners liable, if at the time she was compulsorily in charge of a pilot, whose negligence was the sole cause of the collision.

The Queen (20 L. T. Rep. 855; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 242; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 354) followed.

By sect. 127 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, "every pilot taking upon himself the charge of any vessel shall, if so required by the master thereof, pilot such vessel so far to the westward as the . . . Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel."

Since the date of the Act the buoy has been removed, and for the purposes of pilotage the Bar Lightship, which occupies a position outside of that occupied by the buoy, is treated as the westward limit.

A collision occurred between the Bar Lightship and the place where the buoy used to be.

The defendants pleaded that their vessel was at the time of the collision compulsorily in charge of a pilot.

Held, that, the Fairway Buoy having been removed, the Bar Lightship occupied the same place relatively for the purposes of sect. 127 of the Act of 1858, that the collision occurred in pilotage waters, and that pilotage was therefore compulsory.

ACTION for damage by collision brought by the owners of the steamship Gladestry against the owners of the steamship Sussex.

The collision occurred about 12.45 a.m. on the 20th Dec. 1903, about one mile S.  $\frac{1}{2}$  E. of the Mersey Bar Lightship.

The Gladestry was a steamship of 2360 tons gross register, and at the time was on a voyage from Savannah to Manchester with a cargo of cotton and phosphate rock, and manned by a crew of twenty-four hands all told.

At the time of the collision she had a Liverpool pilot on board, and was at anchor, heading about S.S.E., and exhibiting the regulation anchor lights.

The Sussex was a steamship of 5474 tons gross register, and was on a voyage from Liverpool to London with a general cargo, and manned by a crew of fifty-nine hands all told. She was at the time of the collision in charge of a duly licensed Liverpool pilot.

The defendants admitted that the collision was caused by the negligent navigation of the Sussex, but alleged that it was occasioned solely by the fault of the pilot in charge, and that the collision took place within a district in which pilotage is compulsory by law.

Barnes, J. came to the conclusion on the facts that the collision was solely caused by the negligence of the pilot in charge of the Sussex.

It appeared from the evidence of the pilot of the Gladestry that the Fairway Buoy, which marked the entrance to the Queen's Channel in 1858, had been about three-quarters of a mile nearer in than the position of the present Bar Lightship.

A lightship was first placed near the bar in 1873, and the lightship and Fairway Buoy co-existed until 1875, when the latter was removed and nothing put in its place.

In 1884 the Bar Lightship was moved to its present position.

It was also alleged by the plaintiffs that those in charge of the Sussex after the collision failed, without reasonable cause, to stand by and give the name of their vessel, and to comply with the provisions of sect. 422 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

Sect. 422 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) is as follows:

(1) In every case of collision between two vessels, it shall be the duty of the master or person in charge of each vessel, if and so far as he can do so without danger to his own vessel, crew, and passengers (if any), (a) to render to the other vessel, her master, crew, and passengers (if any), such assistance as may be practicable, and may be necessary to save them from any danger caused by the collision, and to stay by the other vessel until he has ascertained that she has no need of further assistance; and also (b) to give to the master or person in charge of the other vessel the name of his own vessel and of the port to which she belongs, and also the names of the ports from which she comes and to which she is bound. (2) If the master or person in charge of a vessel fails to comply with this section, and no reasonable cause for such failure is shown, the collision shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to have been caused by his wrongful act, neglect, or default.

The plaintiffs contended that at the time of the collision the Sussex was not compulsorily in charge of her pilot on the ground that she was outside the district in which pilotage is compulsory.

By sect. 3 of 8 Anne, c. viii.—an Act for making a convenient dock or basin at Liverpoole for the security of all ships trading to and from the said port of Liverpoole—the limits of the ports are defined as:

The limits and extent whereof are as far as a certain place in Hoyle-Lake called the Redstones, and from thence all over the river Mersey to Warrington and Frodsham Bridges.

The material sections of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 92) are as follows:

Sect. 121. The board may examine any person, being of the age of eighteen years and upwards, who shall have served as an apprentice in any of the Liverpool pilot boats for not less than three years . . . and every such apprentice or other person who upon any such examination shall be found to be qualified to act as a pilot, and shall be approved of by the board, shall receive a licence in writing, signed by the secretary of the board, certifying that he is duly qualified to act as a pilot for the port of Liverpool. . . .

Sect. 123 provides for a penalty on persons acting as pilots without a licence.

Sect. 124 provides that pilots misbehaving themselves are to have their licences recalled.

Sect. 127. Every pilot taking upon himself the charge of any vessel shall, if so required by the master thereof, pilot such vessel, if sailing out of the port of Liverpool, through the Queen's Channel, so far to the westward as the buoy commonly called or known by the name of the Formby North-West Buoy, or Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel; and, if sailing through the Rock Channel, pilot the same so far to the westward as the North-West Buoy of Hoyle; and any pilot who shall in any such case refuse to pilot such vessel to such distance as aforesaid shall forfeit his right to receive any sum of money for piloting such vessel, and may also, at the discretion of the board, be deprived of his licence.

Sect. 133. The board may from time to time determine, vary and alter and fix rates of pilotage to be paid to pilots for piloting vessels, such rates to be according to the draught of water of such vessels, and to be within the limit: that is to say, (a) as to British vessels: For piloting a vessel from the distance of the Great Orme's Head or the coast of Wales to the port of Liverpool, not less than five shillings nor more than eight shillings per foot; for piloting a vessel any greater distance to the port of Liverpool, not less than six shillings nor more than nine shillings per foot: for piloting a vessel out of the port of Liverpool, not less than three shillings and not more than four shillings per foot; for piloting a coasting vessel, including therein vessels trading with Ireland, the islands of Faro or Ferro, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, and Man, either into or out of the port of Liverpool, one half only of the above rates respectively.

Sect. 139. In case the master of any vessel, being outward bound, and not being a coasting vessel in ballast, or under the burthen of 100 tons, for which provision is otherwise made, shall proceed to sea, and shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, he shall pay to the pilot who shall first offer himself to pilot the same the full pilotage rate that would have been payable for such vessel if such pilot had actually piloted the same into or out, as the case may be, of the said port of Liverpool, together with all expenses incurred in recovering the same.

By sects. 586, 603, and 633 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) it is provided as follows:

Sect. 586 (1). A pilot shall be deemed a qualified pilot for the purposes of this Act if duly licensed by any pilotage authority to conduct ships to which he does not belong. (2) Every qualified pilot, on his appointment, shall receive a licence containing his name and usual place of abode, a description of his person, and a specification of the limits within which he is qualified to act. (4) Every qualified pilot acting beyond the limits for which he is qualified by his licence shall be considered an unqualified pilot.

Sect. 603 (1). Subject to any alteration to be made by the Board of Trade or by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the powers hereinbefore contained, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts where it was compulsory immediately before the commencement of this Act, but all exemptions from compulsory pilotage shall continue to be in force. (2) If within a district where pilotage is compulsory the master of an unexempted ship after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of the ship, or has made a signal for the purpose, pilots his ship himself without holding the necessary certificate, he shall be liable for each offence to a fine of double the amount of the pilotage dues that could be demanded for the conduct of the ship.

Sect. 633. An owner or master of a ship shall not be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship within any district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law.

The pilotage certificate which had been given to the pilot of the Sussex was as follows:

Pilot of the first class.—Pilot boat No. 3.—Licence No. 104.—The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Pilotage Department.—To all whom it may concern, be it known that George F. Parkinson, aged sixty-five years, being 5ft. 5in. in stature, having a fair complexion, and whose place of abode is 20, Sandown-road, Seaforth, having in pursuance of the provisions of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 been duly examined and found to be qualified to conduct any vessel into or out of Liverpool, Holyhead, Beaumaris, Chester, Fleetwood, Pile of Foudre, and the Isle of Man, is by this certificate duly licensed to act as a pilot of the first class for the port of Liverpool, from the date thereof until the 1st day of June 1904, provided that he shall comply with the provisions of the said Act, and of all other Acts binding upon him in relation to pilotage, and with every order or by-law made by the said board, and shall conduct himself with propriety and prudence.—Given by the said board.—MILES K. Act 1894. It may be that, if it is shown that the collision was solely the fault of the pilot, then there is proof to the contrary within the meaning of the section:

The Queen, 20 L. T. Rep. 855; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 242; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 354.

[BARNES, J.—I think that, assuming the pilot was compulsorily in charge at the time of the collision, there is proof to the contrary that the collision was caused by the negligence of the master.] The Sussex at the time was not compulsorily in charge of the pilot. She was going out through the Queen's Channel, and the collision happened outside the place where the Fairway Buoy used to be—that is to say, outside the limits fixed by sect. 127 of the Act of 1858. It is true that the rate charged by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board is to the Bar Lightship, but the board have no power to extend the limits fixed by the Act. If the Dock Board see fit to remove the landmarks, it may make it more difficult to tell when the vessel is outside the district in which pilotage is compulsory, but that does not alter the liabilities of the parties. The fact of the pilot remaining on board after the spot where the buoy used to be is immaterial. The cases of General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (20 L. T. Rep. 581; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 237; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238) and The Charlton (73 L. T. Rep. 49; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29) are not in point. In those cases the collision took place in a district in which the pilot was licensed to act, and he was paid a rate fixed for the whole district. In the present case he was licensed to take vessels into and out of the port of Liverpool. Under sect. 133 the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board only have statutory power to levy rates for the pilotage of vessels into and out of the port of Liverpool. It may be said that if you take a pilot you pay him for piloting your vessel to the Bar Lightship, and therefore he is never your servant, but that would apply equally to a provision for piloting vessels to Holyhead, or any other place outside the port of Liverpool. It is to be noticed that the terms of the licence are for the port of Liverpool only.

Aspinall, K.C. and Noad, for the defendants, contra.—The real test is whether the owner has a choice and is allowed to say whether or not he will take a pilot, or whether he is obliged to take one, whether he will or not. As Lord Esher, M.R. says in The Charlton (73 L. T. Rep., at p. 51; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 30): "When therefore he took this pilot on board, he must have taken him in the ordinary way by giving notice at the pilotage station at Bristol that his ship was going out from Bristol, and would require a pilot. He does not select a pilot; he is not allowed to; he is obliged to take the pilot whom he does not select, and that, in itself, makes that pilot compulsory." It will be seen from the licence that the pilot had knowledge of various ports. What the authorities were dealing with was the requirements of their own port. It was necessary that the pilot should have knowledge of the neighbouring ports. There is here an obligation to take a pilot into and out of the port of Liverpool, and Parliament has seen fit to give the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board powers to license pilots to act far outside their own port. In 1858 the conditions were such that it was well known where the Fairway Buoy was. They have since altered, and the Harbour Board have adapted their regulations to the change of circumstances. The Bar Lightship has taken the place of the Old Fairway Buoy. It is submitted that there is nothing in the Act that prevents the Harbour Board from varying the limits of the pilotage district. The ship cannot be deemed to be in fault under sect. 422 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, because if the pilot was compulsorily in charge there is "proof to the contrary."

Pickford, K.C. in reply.—The argument of the defendants comes to this: If the shipowner treats the pilot as compulsorily in charge because he has been compelled to take him originally, then he is not liable for his negligence. There is no authority, no principle of law to support such a proposition. It does not matter whether you mean to make a man your servant or not; you must show that you were obliged to employ him and put him in charge; and, unless you are compelled to do so, you are liable. If the pilot's licence does not extend beyond the place mentioned in sect. 127 of the Act of 1858, then he becomes an unqualified pilot as soon as that place has been reached. See

Sect. 586, sub-sect. 4 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

There is nothing in sect. 133 which gives the Dock Board the power contended for. This is clearly shown by the words, "such rates to be according to the draught of water of such vessels, and to be within the limits following, &c."

BARNES, J.—This is a case of collision which took place on the 20th Dec. last, at a little before one o'clock in the morning, between the steamship Gladestry and the steamship Sussex, about one mile S.  $\frac{1}{2}$  E. of the Mersey Bar Lightship. The Gladestry is a screw steamer belonging to the port of West Hartlepool, of 2360 tons gross register, and, whilst on a voyage from Savannah to Manchester with a cargo of cotton and phosphate rock, had anchored at the spot where the collision took place. I understand she had a Liverpool pilot on board, but nothing turns on the question of what was done on board her. Her regulation lights were burning—that is to say, the regulation lights for a vessel over 150ft. in length, at anchor, according to the rules which govern the river Mersey. Whilst in that position, at anchor, she was run into by the Sussex. The stem of the Sussex struck the port side of the Gladestry forward of the fore rigging. The Gladestry at the time was heading about S.S.E., and the tide was about ebb, running about a knot. The defendants' vessel, the Sussex, is a screw steamer of 5474 tons gross register, and was bound out from Liverpool to London. She was—I am using the term in the neutral sense at present—in charge of a duly licensed Liverpool pilot, who had, I presume, been obtained in the usual way; because the master of the defendants' ship, in answer to this question: "Had they (the brokers in Liverpool) notified the pilotage authorities that you would require a pilot?" said "I instructed them to" and "A pilot came on board."

The question in this case is whether the owners of the defendant vessel are responsible for the damage which was thus occasioned to the plaintiffs' ship. The defendants' ship, according to the captain's evidence, suffered no damage at all. The charges that are made by the plaintiffs in the statement of claim impute negligent navigation to those on the Sussex, and they also impute a breach of the 422nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. The defendants in their defence say as follows: "The defendants admit that the plaintiffs have suffered damage by a collision between their steamship Gladestry and the steamship Sussex, belonging to the defendants, and that such collision was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Sussex. They deny that such negligent navigation was by themselves or their servants or by any person for whose acts they are responsible at law." Then they plead in the second paragraph the usual plea of compulsory pilotage and allege that the damage was occasioned by the fault or incapacity of the pilot in charge of the Sussex. They say that the pilot, "though the lights of the Gladestry were reported to him when the Sussex was more than a mile distant from the Gladestry, so navigated the Sussex that she ran into the Gladestry, which was lying at anchor." That is the state of the pleadings. The plaintiffs' vessel being at anchor, with proper lights showing—there is no dispute as to that—and the defendants' vessel having navigated into her in weather that was quite clear enough for the moving vessel to keep clear of the one at anchor without the slightest difficulty, it is quite obvious that the defendants' vessel is to blame for this collision, and that the defendants would be liable for this collision unless they are exempted by reason of the vessel being in charge of a compulsory pilot at the time. I think it will appear when I come to deal with the case of The Queen (ubi sup.) before Sir Robert Phillimore that that question of compulsion, or non-compulsion, determines both questions in the case—namely, the responsibility for the navigation of the Sussex and the point raised under the 422nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

The first point to determine is one which I have already given my view about—namely, whether the pilot was alone to blame. There is not, to my mind, the slightest doubt about that. [His Lordship then dealt with the evidence as to this, and as to whether there had been a breach of the provisions of sect. 422 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.] The pilot, who was called here, was not asked any question about this part of the case at all, and so I have nothing but the evidence about it to which I have already referred. Now, I do not think, after considering the evidence, that the master of the defendants' ship intentionally wished to run away or keep his name dark. It would not have been the slightest use trying that, because there was a pilot on board, who had been taken on board in the usual way, and it must have been known all about afterwards. But what is the explanation which he gives himself. He said he was excited and worried. But the question is whether a master in charge of a large vessel like this is entitled to be excited and worried, and not stand by simply for that reason. In my judgment, there was in fact a failure to stand by and give the name, under sect. 422, and the question that then comes to be considered is whether a reasonable cause for such failure has been shown. Both I and the Elder Brethren, who are much better judges about this than myself, think that no reasonable cause has been shown for this failure. If we were to allow cause to be shown on such facts as these, every shipmaster would be able to show cause. In my judgment there has been no reasonable cause shown for failure to comply with some part of sect. 422, at all events.

That brings me to the law applicable to the case. The position is this: There was, from what I have shown, in my opinion negligence on the part of the pilot alone which caused the collision. There was failure to comply with sect. 422, and there has not been sufficient cause shown for that failure. But as the pilot was in charge in fact, then, if he were compulsorily in charge the negligence of the pilot alone would not render the owners responsible for the navigation of the vessel, and the failure to comply with sect. 422 would, in my judgment, according to Sir Robert Phillimore's decision in the case of The Queen (ubi sup.), not make the collision one deemed to have been caused by the master or any other servant of the shipowners. Sub-sec. 2, it will be remembered, says that if the master or person in charge of a vessel fails to comply with this section, and no reasonable cause for such failure is shown, the collision shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to have been caused by his wrongful act or default. Now, Sir Robert Phillimore, in dealing with the corresponding section of the older Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 33), in which the words are "person in charge," said (20 L. T. Rep., at p. 855; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S., at p. 242; L. Rep. 2 A. & E., at p. 355): "It has been argued on behalf of the Lord John Russell"—one of the ships in that case—"that the Queen is not entitled to claim this exemption upon two grounds. First, upon the construction of sect. 33 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. And this upon two grounds. First, it is said that the 'person in charge' intended by that section must, having reference to the context, be deemed to be the master, and with this part of the argument I agree. Secondly, it is contended that whereas the master has been guilty, as in this instance, of a violation of his duty in offering no assistance to the other vessel which came into collision, he is, by the words of the statute, to be deemed alone to blame for the collision, and that it follows by necessary implication that the pilot-exemption, so to speak, is taken away. With this portion of the argument I am quite unable to agree. There is no doubt, on the assumption, of course, that the pilot is alone to blame for the collision, that his liability and the exemption of the master attached when that fact took place; and if it was intended by the statute to say that the subsequent misconduct of the master would remove the exemption and fix the liability of the collision upon the master, the language, in order to produce this result, ought to have been much clearer and plainer than I now read it to be." Even assuming that the failure was to be treated as that of the master—I am not concerned for the moment in considering whether it is or is not because the effect of the decision that the pilot is solely responsible is that proof to the contrary has been shown, and it clears the master and other servants of the shipowners. Because the wording of the subsection is: "The collision shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to be caused by his wrongful act or default." The master and other servants of the shipowner are not responsible, and the collision cannot be deemed to have been caused by their wrongful act or default. Now that, I think, both counsel have agreed, leaves the question to be determined, which governs both points, Was the pilot in this case compulsory or not? The pilot was, in fact, navigating, and the question is reduced to this: Was he compulsorily in charge? Or, perhaps, having regard to the defendants' argument, I might say, Was he in charge in such circumstances that the owners are not liable for his acts? That covers the various points taken by Mr. Aspinall in connection with the various cases cited. This question turns upon a certain curious state of facts, and also upon the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act of 1858, some of the sections of which were recently considered in this court. Now, that Act makes pilotage compulsory for outward bound ships. I need not go into the question here of inward bound ships. We have had that discussed already. The sections which apply to this subject are sects. 121, 123, 124, in particular sect. 127, and sects. 133 and 139. The general effect of those sections—I am only summarising them—is that, so far as outward bound ships are concerned, the pilotage is compulsory, and a pilot must be employed to pilot the vessel out of the port of Liverpool. The port of Liverpool is defined by the old statute of 8 Anne, c. 8, in these words: [His Lordship then read the section.] The vessel is under pilotage out of that port. Now, the collision in this case, I think there can be no doubt, took place outside the port of Liverpool. The spot which I have already stated as being the place of the collision is to the westward, considerably, of the place called the Redstones. The particular section under which the present difficulty arises is the 127th section, which provides that every pilot taking upon himself the charge of any vessel shall, if so required by the master thereof, pilot the said vessel, if sailing out of the port of Liverpool, through the Queen's Channel, as far as the buoy commonly called or known as the Formby N.W. Buoy, or Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel, &c., and that every pilot who shall in any such case refuse to pilot such vessel shall forfeit his right to receive the pilotage rates and at the discretion of the board be deprived of his licence. At the time that the Act of 1858 was passed it appears to be the fact that there was a buoy called the Fairway Buoy, and it seems to have been placed on the charts by the name of the Bell Beacon, at the outside end of the Queen's Channel, which appears to be that part of the Crosby Channel to the westward, the Formby Channel going more to the N. or N.W. That Bell Beacon is shown on the oldest chart that has been furnished to me, corrected up to May 1870, and it is shown as a little outside the five fathom line. It is shown well clear of the bar, as it then existed, and it has been agreed in the course of the argument that that is about, or I may take it that is about, the position of the Bell Beacon or Fairway Buoy in 1858. I do not suppose it is precisely the same, because changes of a slight character may have been made from time to time; but at any rate it is sufficiently near for the purposes of the present case. Now, that position has been transferred by the Elder Brethren, for me, on to the latest chart I have been furnished with—namely, one published on the 21st Dec. 1903; and it will be found that that position puts the old site of the Fairway Buoy a little to the eastward of what is marked on the present chart as QB 2 gas light fixed and black buoy on the northern side of the channel, and a little to the S. and W. of Q 3, and almost on top of a very shallow sounding on the banks. The state of things at the present time is that that buoy has been removed and has been removed for some considerable time, as I understand, and in recent years the bar has extended itself further and further out to sea, as far as one can judge from these charts; and in still more recent years the channel has been dredged somewhat to the westward of the old site of the Fairway Buoy, and is now marked on the chart as "dredged cut"; and there are four gas buoys marking that dredged cut, and they are marked as Q 2 and Q 1 on the northern side and B 1 and B 2 on the southern side. Those buoys are all inside the five fathom line. Now, the place of the collision, which has also been marked for me on the chart, is shown on the chart which I am referring to as about half to three-quarters of an inch below the centre of the word Bidstone, just between the two figures 5 and 5½. There is now, and has been for a long time—I think it has been said since 1884—the Bar Lightship, which is shown on the 1903 chart to the westward a little of the five fathom line and the northern exit of the Queen's Channel. So that if you run on past these gas buoys Q 2 and Q 1 and completely cross the bar, and then pass over the five fathom line, in a very short distance you come upon the Bar Lightship. So that the place of the collision is outside the old position of the Fairway Buoy and inside the position of the Bar Lightship.

THE SUSSEX.

The point is now made that under sect. 127 of the Act the pilot's duties ceased, and compulsory pilotage ceased, as soon as the vessel passed the position in which the old Fairway Buoy was when the Act of 1858 was passed. There is one point, before dealing with that main point in the case, which I will dispose of shortly. Mr. Aspinall contended that sect. 133 gave the Dock Board power to extend the limits to which ships had to be taken. That section states that the board may from time to time vary and fix the rates to be paid for pilotage, and his contention was that as the board had done something—namely, treated the Bar Lightship as the place to which the pilots had to go—they had extended the distance to which ships have to be taken, by virtue of the 133rd section. I do not myself regard that section as having any such effect as contended for by Mr. Aspinall. Pilotage is compulsory on vessels outward bound, as I have already said, except in the case of certain small vessels, and I regard this section as a section which only deals with the rates which, within certain limits, the board may fix. I do not think that section has any application to the present case. Now, so far as the Dock Board is concerned, what has been done with regard to this matter appears to be that they have taken away the old beacon, they have placed the Bar Lightship in the position which I have described, they have placed the gas buoys which I have referred to, they have deepened the channel, and they have fixed pilotage rates. The sheet before me gives the compulsory pilotage rates outward: Liverpool to Bar Lightship, or Horse Channel Fairway Buoy. So far as the present case is concerned the rate is Liverpool to Bar Lightship. The evidence shows that the pilot in this case was taken to pilot the ship to the Bar Lightship. The master said in his evidence that the pilot wanted to be engaged to take the ship to Point Lynas, but that he had replied that he wanted him to take the ship to the Bar Lightship—that he had another man. Some pilotage cards were put in—one dealing with pilotage to the bar and the other with pilotage from the Bar Light-vessel—and it seems clear that the Bar Lightship is at present treated as the place where vessels are to be taken to. The matter, therefore, as far as the facts are concerned, I have dealt with, and the question comes to be, What is to be the law applicable to the case? At present I do not regard this case as on all fours with the two cases which Mr. Aspinall relied upon. The first of those two cases is that of General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.). Shortly stated, it is the case of a ship coming up the Channel to London and taking a pilot on board at Dungeness. Before reaching Gravesend, whilst the vessel was still under the control of the pilot, she came into collision with another ship through the pilot's negligence. The defendants' ship belonged to the port of London, and there was a question as to where the port of London extended. But the substance of the case was this, that she was in a district in which she was bound to take a pilot to Gravesend, when she took him on board, and to pay him to Gravesend; that when she got to a certain distance she was within the exemption of vessels navigating within their own port; and that, as soon as she passed across a certain imaginary line, she was not, in the strict sense, under compulsory pilotage. But it was held that, there having been an obligation to take a pilot on board to begin with, and to pay him up to the end, and he remaining in charge as pilot, the shipowner was not responsible for the collision which took place. It is shortly put by Byles, J., who delivered the judgment of the court, as follows: "If the master of the defendants' ship wanted to go to Gravesend, or beyond, he could not take a pilot for a shorter distance. It was compulsory on him to take a pilot for that distance at least. The pilot could insist on being paid all the way to Gravesend, and could insist on being carried to Gravesend. There had been in effect a contract between the captain and the pilot that the pilot should go to Gravesend, should be paid to Gravesend, and should act as pilot to Gravesend." Then he says: "Suppose a storm, a fog, or other emergency to have arisen, endangering the life not only of the crew, but of the pilot himself, surely the pilot could have insisted not only on being carried to Gravesend, but on piloting the vessel thither according to his contract. It is plain that during the first portion of the transit between the Downs and Gravesend the relation of master and servant did not exist between the owner of the defendants' vessel and the pilot; and we cannot see any indication of a fresh contract as to the latter portion of that transit." The other case is that of The Charlton (ubi sup.). I summarise the facts as they strike me. The defendants' pilot was employed to take the ship out of Bristol, and I think she was going to Cardiff. The pilotage was compulsory in the port of Bristol, which did not extend as far as the place of the collision. But the Bristol Channel District extended to further than the place of collision, and the pilot had a licence which covered the port of Bristol and the Bristol Channel District. So the collision took place in a district in which the man was licensed to act; he had been originally taken on board under compulsion; he was paid, as I understand, a rate fixed for the whole district; and practically that case appears to me to be on all fours with the case of the General Steam Navigation Company. I do not think it is put in quite the same way in the judgment, though there are some passages which would seem to do so. But even if it is not so put, there is a distinction between that case and the point raised in the present case. Because the Master of the Rolls (Lord Esher), in the course of his judgment (73 L. T. Rep., at p. 51; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 30), said: "Then, looking at this statute, and the order of 1891, when the vessel had passed out of the port of Bristol, when she had gone through the port and was outside the port, I have no doubt myself that he was no longer a compulsory pilot. Therefore, when the accident happened, he no longer was a compulsory pilot. But when he was taken on board this ship and put in charge he was a compulsory pilot, and, although he had passed out of the limits where he was a compulsory pilot, he still was in charge as pilot, and in charge without any alteration of the relations between himself and the master of the ship. He was still the pilot. He was in charge of the ship, for they had not gone to such a place that he was no longer a licensed pilot. He was in the district where he was a licensed pilot, and although he had gone beyond the port where he was a compulsory pilot, it is under such circumstances that the master could not properly be called upon to determine whether the compulsion had ceased or not. Then the necessities of the case require that you should not make him a servant of the owners when they had no real opportunity of determining whether he was or was not their servant. They were compelled to take him without his being their servant, and they had no real opportunity of seeing that that relationship which had been put upon them had ceased." Apart from the question of payment, there is this, that the pilot was still a pilot acting within a district for which he was licensed, and the court held in the circumstances that the case came within the section of the Merchant Shipping Act which exonerates the shipowner. There is a considerable distinction, I think, at the outset, between that case and this particular case, because the pilot here was duly licensed to act as a pilot of the first class for the port of Liverpool. Now, if one reads those words in their restricted meaning, that would be only in the port of Liverpool. But, having regard to the Act of 1858, it does not seem to me possible to read those words in such a restricted meaning, because the pilot has to take the ship out of the port of Liverpool to a point outside it; and on coming in, for instance, the master of a ship is bound to employ a pilot from the pilot stations fixed by by-laws, and

I think, if I remember rightly, one of those is right out at Great Orme's Head, and another is Point Lynas. So, to take a vessel in or out, the pilot must act partly outside the port. Therefore his licence means to do those duties which are necessary for the purpose of navigating a vessel into and out of the port of Liverpool. But that is all. Then, going out, the pilot has to take the ship to a certain distance, and there his duties cease, and he does not become a pilot licensed for a district at that point at all. He is licensed to a point in a certain place, and this Act is not like those Acts which refer to Bristol and London, where I think it will be found that persons navigating the districts must be qualified. So those cases do not seem to me to be precisely in point in the present case.

That still leaves a very important question to be determined—namely, whether this pilot was still acting compulsorily in charge of the ship because of the state of things which exist at the present day. I do not think it necessary to decide this case upon the point which the plaintiffs raised. The reason I have come to my conclusion is this: I do not think that the strict construction which the defendants endeavoured to put upon the 127th section of this Act can be maintained. If it is construed strictly, the limit to which a pilot has to go is the Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel—in other words, a spot where the Fairway Buoy rested in the year 1858. To my mind that construction would be unreasonable, and not within the fair contemplation of those who must have framed this section, and not within that which is necessary for the purpose of working out the subject with which we are dealing and the employment of pilots. My reasons are these: Construed strictly—and if you once construe it strictly you must do it entirely strictly—the Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel would be that which was then there. Of course that cannot be. The buoy has been removed. But if construed strictly it must mean the identical spot when the Act received the Royal Assent. That cannot be so, because we are dealing with a port which has a well-known estuary where there are banks of sand, which, I suppose, from time immemorial have been existing and shifting in a great variety of ways, and probably, from the nature of the locality, extending and silting up the port and rendering necessary what has been done—namely, the dredging of a deep cut out to the bar. It seems clear to my mind that the bar has gradually extended itself. Take the case that must be presented on a strict construction, and assume that a Fairway Buoy is left to mark the Queen's Channel. That Fairway Buoy means a buoy which shows you are well out of the channel and clear of danger. If the bar extends from time to time, and I am still dealing only with the Fairway Buoy, that must inevitably be moved by those who have charge of the entrance of the port, to suit the state of the channel. What, then, is the legitimate conclusion to draw? I think it is that, although that buoy has been moved, something has taken its place—namely, the Bar Lightship—which, although not a buoy in the strict sense, is the substitute, to my mind, for the buoy. It is remarkable to find, and I hope I have made it clear in stating its position, that it is placed, having regard to the state of the bar, in almost the same position as the Fairway

Buoy occupied with regard to the channel which it was intended to guard. That is the explanation, I have not the least doubt, why the lightship is now treated as being the boundary to which the pilots have to go, why the rates are stated in the pilot sheet to be Liverpool to the Bar Lightship, and why the contract is made in such a form as to be a contract to take the ship out to the Bar Lightship. I think, myself, that is the reasonable interpretation to place upon this Act, having regard to the necessary shifting of the place and the nature of the exigencies which have to be dealt with; and it is shown by those conversant with the locality that that is the manner in which the matter is acted upon. To my mind the evidence of the pilot really tends to establish that position. The result therefore, to my mind, is that in this case the pilot was still compulsorily in charge at the time when the collision took place, and that answers the whole of the questions raised in this case. I have given the best consideration I can to the case, and I hope I have made clear the points which I think material and upon which this case is to be decided. The result must be, in my judgment, that the defendants succeed in this case.

Lords MACNAGHTEN and LINDLEY.)

STEEL, YOUNG, AND Co. v. GRAND CANARY
COALING COMPANY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party — Construction — Time for loading — Stoppage by strike — "Stoppage for six days from time of vessel being ready to coal" — Right to cancel charter.

By a charter-party it was agreed that a ship of the appellants should load a cargo of coal for the charterers "to be loaded in 140 running hours, commencing when written notice is given of steamer being completely discharged of inward cargo and ballast in all her holds, and ready to load." The charter-party also provided that in the event of a stoppage caused by a strike "continuing for a period of six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load, this charter shall become null and void, provided, however, that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the steamer previous to such stoppage." Due notice was given that the ship was ready to load, and, after the expiration of the time allowed for loading, a stoppage caused by a strike commenced, and continued for six days. No cargo had been shipped, and the charterers gave notice that the charter-party was cancelled. Held, that the charter-party contemplated a stoppage in existence at the beginning of the loading time, and that the charterers were not entitled to cancel the charter on the occurrence of a stoppage at a later period.

STEEL, YOUNG, &amp; Co. v. GRAND CANARY COALING COMPANY.

[H. OF L.]

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.J.J.), reported 87 L. T. Rep. 321; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 326; 7 Com. Cas. 213, who had reversed a judgment of Phillimore, J., reported 6 Com. Cas. 240, in favour of the appellants, the plaintiffs below.

The action was brought by the appellants, as owners of the steamship Nith, against the respondents for breach of a charter-party. The facts of the case and the material clauses of the charter-party appear from the headnote above, and from the judgments of their Lordships.

The ship was ready to load on the 8th Aug. 1900, and due notice was given to the respondents. The loading time expired on the 15th Aug., but no cargo had been loaded.

On the 20th Aug. a colliery strike caused a stoppage of the coal intended for the ship, and this stoppage continued for more than six days.

On the 28th Aug. the respondents gave notice that the charter was cancelled.

The ship could not obtain another charter till the 3rd Sept., and then at a lower rate of freight. The plaintiffs claimed damages for the delay from the 8th Aug. to the 3rd Sept. and also for the difference in freight. The defendants paid into court a sum for demurrage at the rate fixed by the charter-party from the 8th Aug. to the 26th Aug.

Carver, K.C. and L. Noad appeared for the appellants.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Montague Lush, K.C. for the respondents.

Carver, K.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 17.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case the whole question seems to turn upon a very narrow point—namely, the true construction of the charter-party. I have tried to see whether the language literally construed according to the ordinary plain meaning of words and sentences is susceptible of any other meaning than that which the plaintiffs attribute to it. I am unable to come to the conclusion that it is. Although I am not insensible to some of the inconvenience which may result from a literal interpretation of the words, I cannot say that any alternative interpretation that I can suggest is fit for your Lordship's adoption. No other construction can be placed upon the words than that contended for by the plaintiffs; to my mind they are not susceptible of any other meaning. The parties have placed their own interpretation upon them, and it appears to me impossible to contend under those circumstances that there is any other construction to be given to the charter-party than that for which the plaintiffs contend. If that is the true view of the charter-party, the facts raise no question which can be debated, when once you give that interpretation to the charter-party. I can give no other construction to it than the literal meaning which the words convey, and, therefore, I move that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed.

VOL. IX., N. S.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: The question in this case depends on the true construction of one clause in a charter-party, under which a screw steamer called the Nith was engaged to carry a cargo of coal from Newport in Monmouthshire to Santa Cruz or Las Palmas. The charter makes provision for the avoidance of the contract in the event of a stoppage occasioned by a strike or any cause beyond the control of the charterers continuing for six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load, subject, however, to this proviso—that no cargo had been shipped on board. The point to be decided is whether the stoppage to be effective for the purpose of avoiding the contract must be in existence at the beginning of the loading time or whether it may commence at any time within a reasonable limit after notice given of the vessel being ready to load. The former construction was adopted by Phillimore, J.

The Court of Appeal has taken the other view. The clause in question, so far as material, is in the following words: "3. The cargo to be loaded in 140 running hours . . . commencing when written notice is given of steamer being completely discharged of inward cargo and ballast in all her holds and ready to load. . . . Any time lost through riots, strikes, lock-outs . . . or by reason of . . . any cause beyond the control of the charterers not to be computed as part of the loading time unless any cargo be actually loaded during such time." I pause for a moment to point out that here the charter itself contemplates the possibility of cargo being loaded during a stoppage—a thing which might very well occur, even though it were intended that the cargo should consist of nothing but coal. The clause proceeds as follows: "In the event of any stoppage or stoppages arising from any of these causes continuing for six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load, this charter shall become null and void, provided, however, that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the steamer previous to such stoppage or stoppages." Of course, if a charter were to be annulled after cargo had been shipped on board difficulties must arise, and it would be by no means easy to provide for the rights of the parties. It is, therefore, only reasonable and, indeed, necessary, that any provision annulling a charter should not apply when once cargo is shipped. It can make no difference whether cargo actually on board has been shipped before the commencement of the stoppage or during the stoppage. The expression "such stoppage" must mean a stoppage continued for the full period of six running days. These considerations seem to make it plain that the words "previous to such stoppage or stoppages" mean previous to the completion, not previous to the commencement, of the period which may give occasion for the avoidance of the charter. It cannot, I think, be disputed that if the language of clause 3 is to be taken in its natural and ordinary signification a stoppage to be effective must be one reckoned from the commencement of the loading time. On any other view the words "from the time of the vessel being ready to load" would be wholly idle and superfluous. So much out of place would they be that I cannot imagine any draftsman, however careless, inserting them or allowing them if inserted to remain uncanceled. The argument on the other side is that the literal construction is to be rejected and a less accurate meaning given to the word "from," because the proviso at the end of the clause shows as it is contended, that the parties must have contemplated that there would occur between the commencement of the loading time and the six days' stoppage an interval of time during which cargo might or might not be put on board. It seems to me, however, that there is not much force in this argument, if you bear in mind that the parties contemplated the possibility of cargo being put on board during a stoppage. And the force of the argument is, I think, altogether destroyed when you find that by a note in the margin of the charter, which seems to be part of the printed form—for it also occurs in the substituted charter of the 3rd Sept.—the charterers are at liberty to put on board twenty tons of general cargo. The loading of general cargo would not necessarily, or even probably, be prevented by a strike, lock-out, or accident which might interfere with loading coal. It appears to me, therefore, that, even without resorting to a suggestion which is rejected by the Court of Appeal as a vain imagination of counsel, ingenious, but wholly unfounded, there is nothing to justify a departure from the natural and ordinary meaning of the language employed to define the commencement of a stoppage which may operate to put an end to the contract. The result is not unreasonable. There are two provisions relating to stoppages occasioned by a cause beyond the control of the charterers—a general provision and a special provision. In all cases of stoppages, partial or otherwise, the charterer may exclude from the loading time the time during which no loading takes place. In the special case of the charterer being met by a stoppage in existence at the commencement of the loading time, which is just as likely to happen as the occurrence of a stoppage afterwards during the loading time, the contract may be annulled. Looking at the matter from a charterer's point of view, that, I think, is all that can be required. From a shipowner's point of view the other construction would seem, occasionally at any rate, to offer a premium on dilatory tactics. As regards the measure of damages, it seems to me that Phillimore, J. was right. There was, in my opinion, a repudiation of the contract on the one side and an acceptance of that repudiation on the other. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal should be allowed with the usual consequences.

Lord LINDLEY.—My Lords: The expression "loading time," which occurs in this charter, means the 140 running hours within which the ship is to be loaded; and these 140 hours begin to run after written notice that the ship is ready to load. Any time lost in loading through strikes, &c., is not to be computed as part of the loading time, unless some cargo is actually loaded during such time. So far the charter-party seems clear enough. Then if any strike, &c., continues for six days "from the time of the vessel being ready to load" the charter is to become null and void, unless any cargo shall have been shipped prior to the stoppage. The expression "six days from the time of the vessel being ready to load" points to the earliest time when she is ready, and not to any time after she is ready. I quite see the inconveniences which may arise in other cases from adhering closely to the words of the clause on which the controversy between the parties turns. But I see no absurdity or injustice in construing the clause in its most obvious and natural sense in this particular case. The case is peculiar and unusual. The ship was ready to load and her time for loading had expired before there was any strike, and the strike had lasted six days before the charterer began to load, and he then insisted that the charter had become null and void. That is the case with which your Lordships have to deal. This case does fall within the clause if construed according to its most obvious meaning. I leave other cases to be dealt with when they arise. The appellants have the advantage of being able to rely on the words as they stand, and I see no sufficient reason for extending them. As regards the damages, the correspondence shows a refusal by the charterer to load on the 28th Aug., persisted in from that time onwards, and I see no reason for holding that the damages have been improperly assessed. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal should be allowed, with costs here and below, and the judgment of Phillimore, J. should be restored.

OWNERS OF THE CITY OF LINCOLN v. SMITH.

[PRIV. CO.]

Feb. 3.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—This is an appeal in the name of the master and owners of the steamship City of Lincoln from an order of the Appeal Court in Natal. The order appealed from upholds a verdict and, subject to a variation in the assessment of damages, affirms a judgment obtained in the Durban Circuit Court by the respondent Charles George Smith. The action was brought to enforce a claim for damages for non-delivery of cargo by the City of Lincoln in breach of a charter-party dated the 1st Dec. 1899, and expressed to be made in Buenos Ayres between W. Samson and Co., "on behalf of the owners," and "T. S. Boadle and Co., charterers." The City of Lincoln belonged to W. Samson himself, and this appeal is brought on his behalf. The respondent was represented by T. S. Boadle and Co. The charter provided that the vessel, being tight, staunch and strong, and everyway fitted for the intended voyage, should with all convenient speed, being discharged, proceed as ordered by the charterers or their agents to the undermentioned places, and receive from them, in the port of Rosario, a quantity of hay in export bales; thereafter, in La Plata, a quantity of live stock on deck, which cargo the charterers bound themselves to ship not exceeding what the vessel could reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded should therewith proceed to Port Natal, South Africa, and deliver the cargo on being paid a lump-sum freight of 6500*l.* The owners were to appoint the stevedore. The charterers were to have the full reach and burthen of the steamer with the exception of space for 1200 tons of coals for ship's use which were to be carried in steamer's holds and bunkers. The charter and bills of lading contained a series of exceptions and provisions in favour of the owner. Average, if any, was to be payable according to the York-Antwerp Rules of 1890, which negative any claim in respect of cargo carried on deck. In pursuance of this charter-party the City of Lincoln commenced loading on the 7th Dec. 1899, at Rosario. There she took on board some 20,000 bales of hay. She then proceeded down the river and entered La Plata on the 16th, where she took in more hay and fodder and received her cargo of live stock—270 bullocks, 100 horses, and 400 sheep. She started on her voyage on the 21st Dec. 1899, leaving Ensenada on the afternoon of that day. She arrived at Port Natal on the 15th Jan. 1900 short of her cargo of hay by 578 bales, and without a single one of the bullocks, horses, and sheep shipped by the respondent. The respondent's case was that the City of Lincoln, though in herself and as a ship tight, staunch and strong, and fitted for the voyage, was not properly ballasted, and was therefore unseaworthy when notice was given that she was prepared to receive her cargo and when she started on her voyage; that this unseaworthiness was attributable to negligence or want of reasonable care on the part of the owner himself, and was the direct cause of the loss complained of. On the other hand, the owner maintained that the vessel was properly ballasted, and perfectly seaworthy at starting, and, moreover, he contended that, even assuming that she was unseaworthy, he was protected from liability by the exceptions and provisions of the charter-party.

The action came on to be tried in April 1901 before Beaumont, J. and a special jury. The trial lasted several days. There was a good deal of evidence on both sides, oral and documentary, including the depositions of witnesses taken on commission, the captain's diary, the rough log, and the chief officer's log-book. The learned judge seems to have been under a misapprehension as to the position of the charterer. He appears to have thought that the vessel was "handed over" to the charterer on the date of the charter-party, the 1st Dec., and that from that date she was under his orders, and that the charterer "arranged to his own liking as to the loading of the vessel." He was prepared to hold, as a matter of law, that in any event the owner was excused by the exceptions in the charter-party. But although that was his opinion he summed up the case to the jury in a manner to which no objection can be taken, and he proposed to the jury a series of questions in framing which he invited the assistance of the learned counsel on both sides. The material questions put to the jury, with the answers given by them, are as follows: (1) Q. Was the steamship City of Lincoln as a ship tight, staunch and strong, and every way fitted for the intended voyage at the time she was chartered before she was loaded?—A. Yes. (2) Q. Was she seaworthy after loading and before leaving dock at Ensenada?—A. No. (3) Q. If not, in what respects did she become unseaworthy and from what cause?—A. She was unseaworthy being top heavy, having insufficient dead weight in her bottom to counteract the weight above the water line. (4) Q. Was the shipowner in any way responsible for such causes, if any, by want of reasonable care on his part?—A. Owner is responsible, as he should have seen that more dead weight was put in the bottom of the steamer. (7) Q. What were the causes of the loss of cargo?—A. The vessel being in an unseaworthy condition as per answer No. 2 was not able to stand the ordinary rough weather experienced. (8) Q. Were such causes due to unseaworthiness at starting or to perils of the sea?—A. To unseaworthiness at starting. On these findings the learned judge gave judgment for the charterer, observing that but for the condition in the charter to which perhaps (he said) he attached too much weight, there could be no doubt the verdict of the jury would be perfectly right. The opinion of the Supreme Court on Appeal was delivered by Broome, J. in a written judgment which has their Lordships' entire approval. The conclusion at which the court arrived was that, on the questions of fact, there was ample evidence to support the findings of the jury, and that there was nothing in the charter-party to relieve the owner from consequences resulting from want of reasonable care on his part. In the argument before their Lordships very little was said about the exceptions in the charter-party. Indeed that point was hardly open then. It had been practically concluded by what occurred in Westall's case, Anglo-Argentine Live Stock and Produce Agency Limited v. Westall, unreported. There a ship was chartered to carry cattle from La Plata to England. The charter was identical in its terms with the charter of the City of Lincoln. The ship was overburdened and rolled so heavily that the cattle were lost. Mathew, J. held the owner liable. He thought the owner had been personally negligent, and that there was nothing in the charter to excuse him from the consequences of personal negligence. On appeal, both in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords, it was held that the owner was protected, not because personal negligence was covered and excused by the conditions of the contract, but because there was no case of personal negligence at all. It appeared that at the time when the charter was made and at the time when the vessel was being loaded the owner was in this country. He had left the management of the vessel in the hands of duly qualified and competent persons. Against the consequences of negligence on the part of servants and agents the conditions of the charter-party were a protection. In the present case no one but the owner had anything to do with the loading of the vessel. The charterer had no right to interfere. It was not his province to load or to stow the vessel. His business was to provide a cargo in accordance with the conditions of the charter-party. To do the owner justice, he did not attempt to excuse himself by throwing the blame on the stevedore or the captain or anybody else. He did not for a moment dispute his responsibility in regard to loading or ballasting. His case was that the ship was properly loaded and ballasted. She was loaded (he said) and ballasted "as proposed." Indeed he went so far as to declare that he would have no hesitation, in the event of a similar cargo being offered, to load the City of Lincoln in the same way and ballast her in the same manner. The findings of the jury on the questions of fact were impeached in a very able argument on behalf of the appellant, but their Lordships see no reason to differ from the conclusion at which the Supreme Court arrived. Their Lordships have not to decide whether the jury were right or wrong in their view of the facts. They have merely to determine whether there was evidence on which reasonable men properly instructed by the judge could have come to the conclusion at which the jury arrived. It seems to their Lordships that there cannot be any doubt upon that point. [His Lordship discussed the evidence, and concluded as follows:] Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed. The appellants will pay the costs of the appeal.

TURNER AND ANOTHER v. HAJI GOOLAM MAHOMED AZAM. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF JUDICATURE AT BOMBAY.

Charter-party—Sub-charter—Lien for freight—Bill of lading—Notice of charter-party.

Notice of a charter-party given to a shipper has not the effect of incorporating into the bill of lading any terms inconsistent with it, which the captain was not bound to embody in it.

Therefore a shipowner is not entitled to a lien for freight payable under a time charter on goods shipped by a person not a party to that charter, whose goods were carried in the ship under a sub-charter and bill of lading.

APPEAL from a decree of Jenkins, C.J. and Tyebji, J., sitting as a Court of Appeal, allowing the appeal of the present respondent against a decree of Russell, J. in favour of the present appellants in a suit in which the respondent was plaintiff and the appellants were defendants.

The appellant Glanville was the registered managing owner of the steamship Bombay, and the appellant Turner was master. The Bombay was by a charter-party dated the 20th Aug. 1898 (hereinafter called the time charter) let for six months to Messrs. Issabhoy, Thaver, and Co., and was by an agreement of the 26th Aug. 1898, which was subsequently embodied in a charter-party (hereinafter called the sub-charter), sublet by Messrs. Issabhoy, Thaver, and Co. to the respondent for a round voyage. By the time charter a lien was given to the owners of the Bombay upon all cargoes for freight or charter money due under the charter. The respondent had notice of the time charter and its terms.

During the currency of the time charter, on the 2nd Feb. 1899, the Bombay, in prosecution of the round voyage for which she was sub-chartered to the respondent, arrived at Bombay having on board two consignments of sugar, one of 13,431 bags and the other of 17,076 bags, which had been shipped by the respondent at Mauritius, and in respect of which the respondent was himself the holder of the bills of lading. There was then due to the owners of the Bombay a month's hire amounting to 18,000 rupees, equivalent to 1197*l.*, and for this freight or charter money the appellant Turner, on the instructions of his owners, exercised a lien on the sugar.

The respondent thereupon instituted this suit by plaint dated the 8th Feb. 1899 against the appellant Turner and one Chabildas Lulloobhoy as one of the owners of the Bombay. The claim of the respondent was that the defendants to the suit might be ordered to deliver to him the sugar or to pay him five lacs of rupees, its value, and costs of suit, and such further or other relief as the nature of the case might require. The respondent alleged that the detention of the sugar was wrongful, that the bills of lading admitted that the freight was paid in Port Louis, and that he was entitled to receive delivery of the sugar without payment of any freight.

By judge's order dated the 16th Feb. 1899 the respondent, upon depositing 18,000 rupees in court, was appointed receiver to sell the sugar, and to deal with the proceeds. The sum was deposited, and the respondent accordingly obtained possession of the sugar. By a further judge's order dated the 9th March 1899 the name of the appellant Glanville was substituted by amendment for that of Chabildas Lulloobhoy as a defendant to the suit.

The appellant Turner by his written statement contended that he was lawfully entitled to exercise the lien given by the time charter for the hire of the steamer against the goods claimed by the plaintiff, and was also lawfully entitled to exercise a lien upon the goods for freight for all the goods mentioned in the bills of lading specified in the list annexed to the written statement. He also alleged that the respondent was aware of the terms of the time charter which conferred the lien, and further that he, the appellant Turner, was induced to sign the bills of lading without receiving any freight by a misrepresentation of the respondent's agents.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

PRIV. CO.] TURNER AND ANOTHER v. HAJI GOOLAM MAHOMED AZAM. [PRIV. CO.]

The appellant Glanville by his written statement contended that all the cargo shipped by the plaintiff upon the vessel was the subject of the lien given to the owners by the time charter, and that the captain of the vessel rightly exercised the lien upon the cargo for the amount of 18,000 rupees, and further that the captain had no authority to sign the bills of lading in the plaint mentioned without providing that the freight payable in respect of the goods shipped thereunder should be paid to the captain or the agents of the owner, and further that the signature of the captain to the bills of lading was obtained at Mauritius by misrepresentation on the part of the agents of the respondent, and that without prejudice to any of the foregoing defences the respondent was bound to pay reasonable freight for the goods shipped under the bills of lading, and that the captain was justified in exercising a lien upon the goods of the respondent, and that the lien exercised by the captain was good at least for the amount of such freight which this appellant estimated at the sum of 11,798.67 rupees.

The most material provisions of the time charter were as follows:

Clause 4. That the charterers should pay for the use and hire of the vessel at the rate of 7s. 6d. per gross register ton per calendar month. This amounted to 1197l., or 18,000 rupees, per month.

Clause 8. That payment was to be made in cash monthly in advance to owners' agents in Bombay, and that in default of such payment the owners or their agent should have the faculty of withdrawing the steamer from the service of the charterers.

Clause 14. That the captain (although appointed by the owners) should be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other arrangements. Bills of lading were to be signed at any rate of freight the charterers or their agents might direct without prejudice to this charter.

Clause 21. That charterers were to have the option of subletting the steamer.

Clause 22. That the owners should have a lien upon all cargoes for freight or charter money due under this charter.

On the 25th Aug. 1898 the time charterer gave to the respondent a firm offer of the vessel on charter for a round voyage from Rangoon or Saigon to Réunion, thence to Mauritius, and back to Bombay; and this was accepted by the respondent on the 26th Aug. 1898, and a sub-charter was drawn up which embodied the agreement thus arrived at. This was dated the 13th Oct. 1898. The freight under the sub-charter was to be calculated upon the amount of cargo carried by the vessel from Saigon to Réunion. The sub-charter contained the following provisions:

Clause 15. The captain, if necessary, to sign bills of lading at any freight without prejudice to this charter-party.

Clause 24. Time charterers to have a lien on the cargo for freight and demurrage (if any).

The respondent arranged with the time charterers that he should himself make payment of the monthly hire payable under the time charter to James Mackintosh and Co., the agents of the owners of the vessel in Bombay. In pursuance of this arrangement the monthly hire was paid by the respondent to Mackintosh and Co. on the 22nd Oct., the 21st Nov., and the 21st Dec. 1898. On the last-mentioned date the sum paid by the respondent was 8205 rupees instead of 18,000 rupees by reason of a detention of the vessel at Singapore for repairs. This deduction was claimed by the respondent, and was allowed by the owners' agents pursuant to a clause (17) in the time charter providing for the ceasing of payment of hire if loss of time resulted from damage to the vessel and similar causes.

On the 19th Jan. 1899 another month's hire became due. The vessel was then at Mauritius loading sugar for Bombay, the final stage of her voyage under the sub-charter. The respondent had by letters of the 26th Nov. 1898 informed his agents at Réunion and Mauritius that he (the respondent) was making the monthly payments of 18,000 rupees each month, and on the 18th Jan. 1899 he telegraphed to the agents at Mauritius: "Take steamer's freight Mauritius." The bags of sugar in question in this suit were shipped for and on account of the respondent, and on the requirement of his agent the master signed a bill of lading for 13,431 bags dated the 20th Jan. 1899, making them deliverable to the respondent or to assigns "paying freight for the said goods at the rate of six annas of seventy-five kilograms gross French weight shipped paid in Port Louis"; and also a bill of lading for 17,076 bags dated the 21st Jan. 1899 in like terms except that the freight was stated to be "payable in Port Louis." The master was induced to sign the bills of lading in this form on the faith of representations of the respondent's agents at Réunion and Mauritius that the respondent was paying the hire of the vessel under the time charter in Bombay. The instalment of hire due on the 19th Jan. 1899 had not, however, in fact been paid, and it never was paid. Also no part of the freight reserved in the two bills of lading was ever paid. The vessel sailed from Mauritius on the 22nd Jan. 1899, and arrived at Bombay on the 2nd Feb. 1899, when the lien was exercised and this suit instituted.

The suit came on for hearing before Russell, J. on the 22nd Feb. 1900. The evidence consisted to a large extent of documents and correspondence. Oral evidence was also adduced before the learned judge, and before the hearing of the suit the master and chief engineer of the Bombay were examined before the judge himself, and evidence was also taken on commission at Réunion and Mauritius.

On the 10th March 1900 the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the appellants, and after further consideration on the 22nd March 1900 pronounced a decree declaring that the appellants were entitled to a lien for the sum of 15,411.12.8 rupees, and were entitled to be paid the costs of the suit by the respondent, and that the moneys in court should be applied towards satisfaction of this sum and costs. The learned judge held that the respondent was at all material times aware of the time charter and its terms, and that his goods were not exempt from the lien conferred by that charter; also that the bills of lading were signed by the master in the form employed without authority of the owners, and that the signature of the master was obtained by misrepresentation and was affixed by mistake, and that the bills of lading had no validity as against the appellants. The learned judge further found that under any circumstances the respondent was not entitled to demand his cargo or to maintain the suit without tendering the amount due under the terms of the sub-charter, and that no tender was made by the respondent.

TURNER AND ANOTHER v. HAJI GOOLAM MAHOMED AZAM.

[PRIV. CO.]

On the 4th April 1900 the respondent, feeling himself aggrieved by the said decree, filed a memorandum of appeal against the same.

On the 11th April 1901 the appeal came on for argument before a Court of Appeal consisting of Jenkins, C.J. and Tyejji, J., who on the 19th April 1901 gave judgment allowing the appeal, and varying the decree passed by Russell, J. by declaring that there was a lien against the respondent only for the balance of the sub-charter freight, which amount was to be determined thereafter, and that if on such inquiry it was found that the balance due was less than 6000 rupees then the respondent was to be entitled to damages to an amount to be ascertained. Further consideration and costs were reserved with liberty to apply.

The Court of Appeal accepted the view of Russell, J., or assumed for the purpose of their judgment that the plaintiff had knowledge of the time charter and its terms. But the court was of opinion that this fact was in the circumstances immaterial, and that the shipowner having by the time charter authorised the subletting of the vessel, their lien was limited to the freight for which the time charterer had a lien—that is to say, for the freight due under the sub-charter. The court was also of opinion that there had not been misrepresentation inducing the signing of the bills of lading, but in the view of the court these bills of lading were mere acknowledgments of the receipt of the goods, and the rights of the parties were fixed by the sub-charter. The court found that the respondent was ready and willing to pay 6000 rupees to the appellants in respect of the amount due under the sub-charter, and that if the amount so due was less than 6000 rupees the respondent was entitled to damages.

Carver, K.C. and A. Adair Roche for the appellants.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Lauriston Batten for the respondent.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

June 22.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Lord LINDLEY.—The question raised by this appeal is whether the appellants, who are ship-owners, are entitled to a lien for freight payable under a time charter on the goods of the respondent, who was no party to that charter, but whose goods were carried in the appellants' ship under a sub-charter and bill of lading. The judge of first instance decided this question in favour of the appellants. His decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal in Bombay, and the present appeal is from the decision of that court. The undisputed facts are as follows: The appellant Glanville was the registered owner of the steamship Bombay, and the appellant Turner was her captain. By a charter dated the 20th Aug. 1898, and entered into by the agents of the owners and some Bombay merchants named Issabhoj, Thaver, and Co., the owners agreed to let and the charterers agreed to hire the ship for six calendar months. She was placed at their disposal with a full complement of officers and men at Bombay for employment in the Indian Ocean and other Eastern waters as the charterers or their agents should direct, on certain conditions of which the following are important: (2) The owners were to pay the captain and crew. (4) The charterers were to pay freight monthly in advance at the rate of 7s. 6d. per ton, which came to 18,000 rupees. (8) In default of such payment the owners were entitled to withdraw the steamer from the service of the charterers without prejudice to any claim the owners might otherwise have against them. (14) The captain, although appointed by the owners, was to be under the orders and directions of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other arrangements. Bills of lading were to be signed at any rate of freight the charterers or their agents might direct without prejudice to that charter, and the captain was to attend daily, if required, at their offices to do so. The charterers were to indemnify the owners from all consequences or liabilities that might arise from the captain doing so except for short delivery. (21) The charterers were to have the option of subletting the steamer. (22) The owners were to have a lien upon all cargoes for freight or charter money due under the charter, and the charterers were to have a lien on the ship for all moneys paid in advance and not earned. The 14th, 21st, and 22nd conditions are those which have given rise to the controversy between the parties; but, before considering them, it will be convenient to state what was done, and, for the purpose of avoiding confusion, the charterers under this charter will be referred to as the "time charterers" in order to distinguish them from the respondent, who is their sub-charterer. Shortly after the time charter was made the ship was sub-chartered to the respondent for a round voyage from Saigon to Réunion and back from Mauritius to Bombay. She was to take rice from Saigon to Réunion, and sugar from Mauritius to Bombay. Freight was to be payable for the whole voyage at the rate 1.8 rupees per bag of 168lb., calculated only on the cargo shipped from Saigon to Réunion. There was to be no freight payable by the sub-charterer to the time charterer for any other cargo. On account of the freight thus estimated, 37,500 rupees were to be paid at Bombay before the steamer sailed from Saigon, 25,000 rupees at Réunion or Mauritius, and the balance was to be paid at Bombay after delivery of the cargo there. It will be observed that neither of these documents took the ship out of the legal possession of the owners so as to deprive them of the power of detaining goods on board, and of enforcing any lien to which they might be entitled. The captain retained possession for the owners, and was in a position to enforce the lien expressly conferred by the time charter if it was properly enforceable against the goods in question. The steamer completed this voyage, and on the 2nd Feb. 1899 she arrived at Bombay, having on board a quantity of sugar put on board by the sub-charterer at Mauritius, for which he had received bills of lading from the captain. The freight payable by these bills of lading was at the rate of six annas per seventy-five kilograms, and this freight was prepaid by the sub-charterer in Mauritius, so that when the ship arrived in Bombay nothing remained to be paid by the sub-charterer to the owners in respect of the bill of lading freight. It appears, however, that something was due from the sub-charterer to the time charterers for money payable under the sub-charter. There was also due to the owners a month's freight—i.e., 18,000 rupees (1197l.)—from the time charterers under the time charter, and the owners claimed a lien for this amount on the sub-charterer's sugar. Hence the dispute between the parties. The sub-charterer brought an action to recover his sugar or its value, and damages for its detention, and the shipowners defended the action relying on their lien. So far there is no dispute about the facts. The shipowners, however, also defended the action upon the ground of misrepresentation alleged to have been made by the sub-charterer to the captain before the sugar was shipped, on the faith of which he is said to have signed the bills of lading. This alleged misrepresentation was denied, and a considerable amount of evidence upon it was adduced. The judge of first instance thought the defence proved. But the Court of Appeal took a different view. The evidence has again been laid before their Lordships, and they have carefully considered it. It appears that the sub-charterer had paid to the agents of the shipowners some of the freight payable in advance under the time charter, and there was undoubtedly some misunderstanding on the part of the captain as to similar payments being made in future. But their Lordships are not satisfied that the sub-charterer made any false statement to the owners' agents or to the captain, nor any representation or promise which could confer on the owners any lien on the sub-charterer's goods other than such as the documents above referred to entitle them to assert. Their Lordships, however, agree with both courts in India in their conclusion that the sub-charterer knew, in a general way, of the time charter, and that the freight payable under it by the time charterers was 18,000 rupees, payable monthly in advance.

TURNER AND ANOTHER v. HAJI GOOLAM MAHOMED AZAM.

Bearing these conclusions in mind, their Lordships will consider the legal position of the parties. The first question which is raised is the effect of the bills of lading. Apart from them there was no contract between the shipowners and the sub-charterer. But he shipped his sugar on board the steamer on the terms of those bills of lading, and the captain was authorised by the time charter to sign them. Whether he signed them for the shipowners or for the sub-charterer he had express authority from the shipowners to sign them. Under these circumstances the shipowners appear to their Lordships to have contracted with the sub-charterer that his sugar should be carried to Bombay in that ship on the terms of the bills of lading. This distinguishes the present case from Colvin v. Newberry (1 Cl. & Fin. 283), where the bill of lading given by the captain of a chartered ship was held to bind the charterer only, although the shipowners retained possession of the ship by the captain. Nor is the present case governed by Small v. Moates (9 Bing. 574) and other cases of that class, where the holder of the bill of lading had no better title than the charterer who was himself the captain of the ship and the original shipper of the goods. It further appears to their Lordships that the bills of lading in this case are not mere receipts for goods given to a charterer already bound to the shipowner by a charter-party entered into between them from which the captain had no authority to depart. Unless, therefore, the fact that the sub-charterer had notice of the time charter makes a difference, the bills of lading entitled him to have his goods delivered to him on payment of the bills of lading freight. This was decided in Fry v. Chartered Mercantile Bank of India (14 L. T. Rep. 709; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 346; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 689), which was followed in Gardner v. Trechmann (53 L. T. Rep. 518; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 558; 15 Q. B. Div. 154). In both of these cases the bill of lading expressly referred to the charter-party, but not in such a way as to incorporate either the obligation to pay the charter freight or the lien for it. These cases, and others like them, show that notice by a shipper of a charter-party has not the effect of incorporating into the bill of lading any terms which are inconsistent with it, and which the captain was not bound to embody in the bill of lading. If the charter-party shows that the captain exceeded his authority in signing the bill of lading, and the shipper knew this, he cannot enforce the terms of the bill of lading uncontrolled by the charter-party. If the shipper knew that there was a charter-party, and had an opportunity of reading it, and did not trouble himself about it, he might be treated as knowing its contents. In the present case the time charterer had authority to let other persons have the use of the ship for six months for any voyage in the waters mentioned in the time charter. The captain was not only empowered to sign but was bound to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight which the charterers or their agents might direct, but without prejudice to that charter. These words introduce a difficulty. It is said that they limit the authority of the captain to sign bills of lading which do not preserve to the owners the power to withdraw the ship under condition 8 of the time charter and their lien on all goods under condition 22. This construction is a possible construction, but it has long ago been rejected both by commercial men and by judicial decision. There can be no doubt that the sub-charterer must, for this purpose, be regarded as an agent of the charterer. The words "without prejudice to this charter" mean that the rights of the shipowners against the time charterers, and vice versa, are to be preserved. That this is the true meaning and legal effect of the words "without prejudice to this charter" has often been the subject of controversy and of judicial decision, and has long been treated as settled by authority. In Hansen v. Harrold Brothers (70 L. T. Rep. 475; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 464; (1894) 1 Q. B. 612), Lord Esher, M.R. said that its meaning was "that it is a term of the contract between the charterers and the shipowners that, notwithstanding any engagements made by the bills of lading, that contract shall remain unaltered." It means no more. Condition 8 in the time charter, empowering the owners to withdraw the ship, cannot mean that, after the captain has shipped goods for Bombay and given bills of lading for them to persons other than the time charterers, the owners can refuse to allow the ship to go to Bombay and deliver the goods there as agreed by the bills of lading. So as regards condition 22 giving a lien upon all cargoes for freight or charter money due under that charter. This is a stipulation binding on the time charterer, and gives the shipowner a more extensive lien than he would have for freight payable in advance. But this clause does not override or limit the power of the captain to issue bills of lading at different rates of freight, or entitle the shipowners to a lien on the goods of persons who have come under no contract with them conferring a lien for the freight payable under the time charter. A right to seize one person's goods for another person's debt must be clearly and distinctly conferred before a court of justice can be expected to recognise it. If their Lordships had taken a different view of the legal effect of the bills of lading there might have been more difficulty in the case, for there is great force in Mr. Carver's argument that, if the bills of lading were mere receipts for goods put on board, the sub-charterer could have had no greater rights than those which the time charterers had themselves. It is not, however, necessary to solve the difficulties which would have arisen if there had been no bills of lading. For the reasons above stated, their Lordships are of opinion that the claim of the shipowners cannot be supported, and that the order appealed from ought to be affirmed. Their Lordships observe that the Court of Appeal gave the shipowners the benefit of any lien which the time charterers had on the goods of the sub-charterer. This seems right, and the sub-charterer's counsel did not contend that it was not. Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise His Majesty to dismiss the appeal, and the appellants must pay the costs.

BOUTLON AND OTHERS v. HOULDER BROTHERS
AND Co. AND OTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

*Practice—Discovery—Production of documents—
Marine insurance—Underwriters' right to discovery and production—Action by underwriters against assured to recover over-payments.*

In an action by underwriters to recover the amount of overcharges which they had paid to the assured in respect of claims upon policies of marine insurance, which overcharges they alleged had been obtained by means of false and fraudulent accounts:

Held (allowing the appeal), that the underwriters were entitled to have as full discovery from the assured as they would have been entitled to in an action brought against them upon the policies.

APPEAL of the plaintiffs from the order of Bucknill, J. made at chambers.

This action was brought by a number of underwriters against the defendants to recover the amount of alleged overcharges made in claims under policies of marine insurance underwritten by the plaintiffs; and also to recover damages for conspiracy to defraud the plaintiffs.

The defendants were Houlder Brothers and Co., Houlder Brothers and Co. Limited, C. F. Hartridge, C. K. Etheridge, W. C. Beard, James Littlefield and Co., A. G. Inrig, Inrig and Chester, the Globe Electrical Company, and the Queen's Dock Electric Works Limited.

The plaintiffs had underwritten a large number of policies upon steamers, the insurances being effected by Houlder Brothers and Co. in their own names.

Houlder Brothers and Co. were the managing owners of the steamers, and made many claims under the policies of insurance and had received payment from the underwriters.

The plaintiffs alleged that some of these claims were fraudulent; that the defendants, other than Houlder Brothers and Co., had made out excessive claims for repairs, and that Houlder Brothers and Co. had supported those claims by means of false accounts for the purpose of defrauding the underwriters. The plaintiffs alleged that they had in consequence paid amounts much larger than the repairs had really cost, and they claimed repayment of the overcharges.

Some of the steamers in respect of which claims were made were owned by single-ship companies. These companies went into voluntary liquidation for the purpose of amalgamation into one company—the Houlder Line Limited.

The Houlder Line Limited were not made parties to this action.

Houlder Brothers and Co., while denying liability, paid a large sum of money into court, which they alleged to be sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim.

An order was made, on the application of the plaintiffs, that the defendants should give particulars of the payment into court.

Particulars were given, but they did not sufficiently show in respect of which policies and underwriters the payment into court was made.

An affidavit of documents was made on behalf of the defendants, on the 11th Jan. 1904, in which it was sworn that the defendants Houlder Brothers and Co. and Houlder Brothers and Co. Limited had formerly in their possession as managers of certain single-ship companies certain specified policies of insurance; that all the said policies had in April 1903, pursuant to an order of Buckley, J., been deposited in court and subsequently handed over to the liquidator of the said companies; that the said policies were in the exclusive possession and custody and control of the said liquidator as such; and that the defendants were not able to produce the said policies; and that the defendants, who formerly constituted the firm of Houlder Brothers and Co., had in their possession solely as directors of the Houlder Line Limited, and not otherwise, certain specified policies which were the property of and in the possession, custody, and control of that company.

On the 18th Jan. 1904 the master made an order that the defendants Houlder Brothers and Co., Houlder Brothers and Co. Limited, and C. F. Hartridge should within six weeks from the 2nd Dec. 1903 file their affidavit of discovery; and that the defendants should produce the several policies for inspection by the plaintiffs and their solicitors within one week on usual notice, subject to any order of Buckley, J. as to any documents in the custody of the court or of the liquidator.

The defendants Houlder Brothers and Co. Houlder Brothers and Co. Limited, and C. F. Hartridge appealed, and Bucknill, J., at chambers, made an order that the order of the master should be varied "by limiting the discovery to the policies in the possession or control of the defendants as such, excluding those which are in the possession of the liquidator and Houlder Line Limited."

The plaintiffs appealed, with leave.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., Sims Williams, and T. Mathew for the appellants.—In this action the plaintiffs are entitled to the fullest possible discovery—that is, they are entitled to the same order for discovery as they would be entitled to in an action brought against them as underwriters upon the policies of insurance. The right of underwriters to the largest measure of discovery is well settled by a series of cases extending over a long period:

Janson v. Solarte, 2 Y. & C. 127; 47 R. R. 374;

Rayner v. Ritson, 6 B. & S. 888;

China Traders Insurance Company v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 78 L. T. Rep. 783; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 409; (1898) 2 Q. B. 187;

China Transpacific Steamship Company v. Commercial Union Assurance Company, 45 L. T. Rep. 647; 8 Q. B. Div. 142;

West of England Bank v. Canton Insurance Company, 2 Ex. Div. 472;

London and Provincial Insurance Company v. Chambers, 5 Com. Cas. 241.

The reason of the rule is that the underwriters are necessarily in ignorance as to all matters connected with the ship, whereas the shipowner knows or has the means of knowledge, and the underwriters are entitled to rely on the good faith of the assured. Underwriters, therefore, are entitled to discovery not only of all documents in the possession of the assured, but also of all documents of which the assured can get possession by any reasonable means. The same principle must apply to the present action, in which the underwriters are seeking to recover overcharges which, relying on the good faith of the assured, they have paid without inquiry, and their position is the same as if they were resisting a claim upon the policies:

Boulton v. Houlder Brothers and Co., 9 Com. Cas. 75.

Inspection of the indorsements upon the policies will enable the plaintiffs to ascertain whether the sum which the defendants have paid into court is sufficient to repay all the overcharges which they have paid.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., Bremner, and G. Hay Morgan for the respondents.—The order made by the learned judge was right. The rule applicable to actions upon policies against underwriters is not applicable to a case of this kind. This is not an action upon a policy of marine insurance. It is an action in which the plaintiffs allege fraud and conspiracy, and the plaintiffs are not entitled to this discovery. The rule applicable to actions upon policies of marine insurance has never been applied in any other kind of action; that practice is strictly confined to the particular class of actions:

Henderson v. Underwriting and Agency Association, 64 L. T. Rep. 774; (1891) 1 Q. B. 557;

Thomson v. Weems, 9 App. Cas. 671;

Cory v. Patton, 26 L. T. Rep. 161; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 225; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 304;

Twizell v. Allen, 5 M. & W. 337.

The defendants have no power to produce the documents in the possession of the liquidator or of Houlder Line Limited; and they cannot be ordered to produce those which are in their possession only as agents for others:

Williams v. Ingram, 16 Times L. Rep. 451.

Sims Williams in reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the order of Bucknill, J. on a claim for discovery by the plaintiffs. There is this peculiarity about the case, that the plaintiffs in this case are underwriters, and they are seeking to recover from the defendants sums which they say they have overpaid to the defendants, who were the assured of these underwriters. It is the fact and it is common ground now that the defendants, being the assured of these underwriters, did demand and receive from the underwriters sums in respect of damage to ships insured by them in excess of the sums really due from these underwriters. Now, the case is complicated in this way. The persons who received these sums and claimed them under policies effected by them with the underwriters were themselves agents for certain companies, and were also partly acting for themselves, and if in those proceedings on those policies the underwriters had resisted the claims or had thought it desirable to investigate the claims against them, there is no doubt whatever, and it has not been disputed in this case, that those underwriters would then have been entitled to the fullest possible discovery which is now asked for in this case. That is common ground, and that discovery would, according to a long series of cases, have imposed the obligation on the part of the person suing the underwriters to produce, or, failing their ability to produce, to give reasons thoroughly satisfactory to the court on oath explaining their inability to do so, those documents which were not in their own custody, or which were in their custody merely as agents for other persons. They would have had to account for the inability to produce them or they would have to satisfy the court that they had taken the utmost possible means in their power to enable them to give to the underwriters all information with respect to them and appertaining to them. That would have been the obligation had these underwriters for any reason sought to sift and investigate the liability asserted by the assured in suing upon the policies. The underwriters, dealing with the assured not only as honourable men but as men whose servants and agents were not likely to make mistakes in their own favour, did not demand the discovery which they were entitled to, and they paid without further investigation claims which were made against them, and it turns out now that those claims were largely, or at all events to a considerable extent, in excess of the sums which were due. In that state of things the underwriters who have so paid became aware of the fact that they had been called upon to pay, and had paid, large sums which really represented losses that had not occurred—that is to say, that they had been called upon to pay sums which were largely in excess of the damages that had been sustained by the assured. Under those circumstances they have brought an action to recover that excess, and in form have alleged a fraudulent conspiracy to exact from the underwriters sums in excess of those which were really due. Being now the plaintiffs in an action, they demand the same discovery, and no other, that they would have had from the same persons had they been the defendants sued by those persons, and the only reason they did not get it before is because, to use a neutral term, owing to the misstatements of the assured they were ready to forego their unquestioned right of getting this discovery from the assured in the first instance. They say now that they are not to be placed in a worse position as to their right to discovery because they forewent their right to demand it when the claim was made by the assured; that it was through the conduct of the assured that they have been obliged now to put themselves into the position of plaintiffs to get back from the assured that which never ought to have been paid them, and which was paid them on their misrepresentations.

Then it was contended for the defendants that the court ought not to give in an action for conspiracy a right of discovery which is only given in an action of marine insurance, and ought not to extend that inspection to the plaintiffs. I say that we ought to do so, because in substance this really is an action on a policy of marine insurance. It is, as I have pointed out, entirely brought about by the defendants that the position of the parties has been changed and shifted from plaintiff to defendant. It seems to me that where that change has taken place and is to be imputed only to the misstatements made by the assured to the underwriters, the underwriters, in a proceeding to repair that fault, ought not to be in a worse position than that in which they would have been if but for the misrepresentation of the plaintiffs they had been allowed to sift and had sifted the case according to their rights. Therefore it seems to me that I am not really extending the principle which lies at the bottom of these matters at all. I am treating the case as one bringing into suit the rights as between assessor and assured. It does not matter, it seems to me, for that purpose which of the parties is plaintiff or defendant. The relation between underwriter and assured is such that this discovery is the due of the underwriter against the assured. The reasons for it have been repeatedly given by various judges, and we have had the authorities cited to us going back for a long time. Mr. Hamilton sought to insist that it was merely some special provision owing to the fact that at one stage in the cases an order for consolidation was required and that certain terms were introduced upon the giving of that order. Now, it may be perfectly true that that was the occasion which gave the courts the opportunity of enforcing this particular obligation upon persons suing underwriters, but it was not the ground of that intervention at all. It was the opportunity of putting into practice a principle derived from the fact of a special relation between assured and underwriter. Originally in the courts of equity to which the underwriter formerly had to go for discovery, and subsequently as a matter of course in the courts of common law, there has been adopted and recognised this large discovery incident to the contract of insurance. That being so, it seems to me there is no dangerous extension whatever in applying in this case, which is a litigation between assured and underwriter, the principle of this discovery, which is the right of the underwriter when he is sued by the assured. Now, the reason why this larger discovery is sought in this case is that many of the documents, the policies of insurance in particular, are said to be in the custody of the defendants only as agents for other persons, although they are themselves interested, and some of them are in the custody of the liquidator of some of the companies. I am clearly of opinion, for the reasons I have given, that the plaintiffs here are entitled to this discovery. The particular form which it ought to take is a matter of some nicety, and therefore we shall leave the form of the order to be drawn up between the parties and settled by one of us if necessary; but it certainly ought to embrace a statement on oath by the defendants as to what steps they have taken to put themselves in a position to produce these documents to the plaintiffs, or, failing to produce them, to give them such information as to them as they can obtain by all reasonable exertions on their part. It appears clear to my mind that the plaintiffs here are entitled to the same measure of discovery that they would have been entitled to if they had been defendants in an action brought by the assured against the underwriter. That relief I think they are entitled to, and therefore I think that this appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I have felt considerable doubts in this case, and I cannot say that those doubts are wholly removed; but my brethren are clearly of opinion that the whole practice with regard to policies of marine insurance referred to in the authorities, as, for example, in the case of West of England District Bank v. The Canton Insurance Company (ubi sup.), can be and ought to be applied in this case as against the defendants. That being so, I shall not differ from them. My doubt arises owing to the fact that in this case the defendants appear to have effected the policies on behalf of certain limited companies who are not parties to the action, and that this action is one for damages for a fraud alleged to have been committed by the defendants. I am, however, very pleased to think that, on the merits of this case, apart from technical objections, there is no good reason, so far as appears why these policies should not be produced by those who have the actual custody of them; and I think, moreover, that if the defendants do their best there is every reason to hope that they can in fact get them produced, and certainly the production of these documents is most important to the plaintiffs in this action.

THE CHEAPSIDE.

[CT. OF APP.]

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As at present advised I think that there should be an order for the production of these documents, and also that the defendants must show by affidavit what exertions they have made to produce documents which they are unable to produce, and state what they know as to the contents of such documents and the indorsements thereon. This case is an important one, as it appears to be necessary to reiterate a well-established rule upon the subject. It is an essential term of a contract of insurance that the underwriters shall be fairly treated, not only with reference to the inception of the risk, but also in carrying out the contract. That has very often been laid down and has been constantly acted upon. Effect is given to that rule by the practice as to discovery of ship's papers, under which the assured suing upon a policy is made to give such very drastic discovery. It is suggested that the case is quite different when the underwriter sues the assured, but it seems to me that the contract being the same the underwriter is entitled to the same information. The defendants then contend that, as they are being sued for improper conduct and conspiracy, they ought not to be ordered to give this discovery. Then they say that, in respect of the companies in liquidation, they were only managers and cannot now do anything without the consent of the liquidator. That must be explained. Unless there is some very good reason to the contrary, the liquidator ought to permit the policies to be produced. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed.

THE CHEAPSIDE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Practice—Jurisdiction—Action in rem—Salvage—Foreign plaintiffs—Counter-claim in personam—Demurrage—Order XIX., r. 27.

An action in rem was brought by the owners, master, and crew of a foreign steamship to recover remuneration for salvage services rendered to an English steamship. The owners of the English steamship put in a defence to the action, and also counter-claimed against the owners of the foreign steamship to recover demurrage alleged to be due to them under charter-parties entered into between the owners of the foreign ship and themselves. The owners of the English steamship could not have brought an action against the foreign owner in this country for the demurrage. The owners of the foreign steamship took out a summons to have the counter-claim struck out. The registrar of the Admiralty Court struck out the counter-claim on the ground that it tended to delay and interfere with the proper trial of the action. On appeal to the judge of the Admiralty Court the decision of the registrar was reversed. On appeal by the foreign owners to the Court of Appeal:

Held, that the defendants the English steamship owners had a right to bring the counter-claim, and that the judge of the Admiralty Court, as a judge of the High Court, had jurisdiction to try such a counter-claim, and that he had rightly exercised his discretion in refusing to strike out the counter-claim.

Griendtveen v. Hamlyn (8 Times L. Rep. 231) followed.

MOTION on appeal from a decision of Barnes, J. reversing a decision of the Admiralty registrar.

The plaintiffs were the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Oscar Dickson, and they sought to recover salvage for services rendered to the English steamship Cheapside and her freight in the river Petschora, in Northern Russia, in Sept. 1903. It appeared that the owners of the Oscar Dickson, the Nordryska Company, had chartered the Cheapside to proceed to Petschora, and there load a cargo of timber owned by the Nordryska Company, and the alleged salvage services had been rendered by the Oscar Dickson, which the Nordryska Company provided to pilot the Cheapside up and down the Petschora river. The writ in the salvage suit was issued on the 21st Nov. 1903, and the statement of claim was delivered on the 3rd Feb. 1904. On the 7th March a defence and counter-claim was delivered by the owners of the Cheapside by which they denied that any salvage was due to the plaintiffs, and alleged by way of counter-claim that the sum of 170*l.* was due to them from the Nordryska Company for demurrage under two charter parties dated the 24th July 1903 and the 23rd Feb. 1903, by which they had chartered the Cheapside to the Nordryska Company. On the 13th May 1904 the plaintiffs delivered a reply and a defence to the counter-claim, denying that any demurrage was due. On the 15th June the plaintiffs applied to the registrar of the Admiralty Court by summons asking that the counter-claim should be struck out on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to try it. The registrar struck it out under Order XIX., r. 27, on the ground that the counter-claim tended to delay and interfere with the fair trial of the action. The defendants appealed to the judge, and on the 27th June Gorell Barnes, J., following the decision in Griendtveen v. Hamlyn (ubi sup.), allowed the appeal and ordered the counter-claim to stand. Against this order the plaintiffs appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Dawson Miller for the plaintiffs.—The claim is a claim in rem for salvage. The Admiralty Court, as such, has no jurisdiction to try a claim for demurrage, and such a claim cannot be made by way of counter-claim. It has been decided that defendants in personam cannot be added in an action in rem:

The Bowesfield, 51 L. T. Rep. 128; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 265;

The Vera Cruz, 51 L. T. Rep. 24, 104; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 386.

The counter-claimants are not named, and are unknown, for, the action being in rem, it is brought against "the owners of the Cheapside," and the plaintiffs are entitled to know who is counter-claiming. The court will not allow an action in rem and an action in personam to be tried together:

(a) Reported by LIONEL F. C. DARBY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

The Germanic, 73 L. T. Rep. 730; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 116.

Further, the counter-claim must delay the hearing of the action, and therefore it should be struck out.

D. Stephens for the defendants and plaintiffs on the counter-claim.—The Admiralty Court has jurisdiction to try the counter-claim under subsect. 3 of sect. 24 of the Judicature Act 1873. Since the passing of the Judicature Act the judge of the Admiralty Court has been a judge of the High Court of Justice, and as such has jurisdiction to try all causes which may be brought in that division, as well as all causes which might have been brought under the former Admiralty jurisdiction. That being so, it is a question of discretion, and the learned judge has exercised his discretion rightly in deciding to try both claim and counter-claim. It is admitted that an action could not have been brought on the facts which support the counter-claim against the Nordryska Company, but here the plaintiffs have sought the jurisdiction, and so the difficulty of service does not arise, and on the authority of Griendtveen v. Hamlyn (ubi sup.) the counter-claim is in order. [He was stopped by the Court.]

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Barnes, J., who has refused to strike out a counter-claim which he was asked to strike out. The action is brought in rem for salvage, and the owners of the salving vessel, which happened to be a pilot boat, are out of the jurisdiction. The defendants set up not only a defence but a counter-claim against the owners of the pilot boat for delay on their part as charterers of the defendants' vessel. That counter-claim undoubtedly is an action in personam, and not an action in rem, and accordingly the contention of the plaintiffs is that this is an attempt to join by way of counter-claim an action in personam with an action in rem, and they say that the Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction to entertain any such counter-claim in personam. This point has, however, been raised before, and it has been decided that the judge of the Court of Admiralty does not cease to be a judge of the High Court because he is a judge in the Court of Admiralty, and that although as judge of the Court of Admiralty he has no jurisdiction to try an action for demurrage, as judge of the High Court he has, and whether or not he can blend those two jurisdictions is a matter for his discretion, subject to review by this court. The judge of the Court of Admiralty has endeavoured in this case to do justice by availing himself of the fact that he has a double jurisdiction, and by not dividing the two jurisdictions he is able to do justice in this way. The defendants would not be in a position to bring this counter-claim in a separate action for the simple reason that the plaintiffs are out of the jurisdiction. There would be great difficulty in serving them under our procedure. The defendants, therefore, desire to avail themselves of the fact that the plaintiffs have sought this jurisdiction, and for the reasons that were expressed in very forcible and clear language by Lord Coleridge in the case of Griendtveen v. Hamlyn (ubi sup.) it is perfectly clear that that is a proper course for the defendants to take, and one which this court would sanction. Accordingly the learned judge, founding his judgment on that case, thought that, having the jurisdiction, as was decided in another case, The Germanic (ubi sup.), in his court, he would be abundantly justified in exercising it in this case. In this case there is no such difficulty as was felt in the case of the Germanic. The difficulty in that case was that if the court assumed in one action to try two causes of action, one brought in rem and one brought in personam, different legal standards would be applicable in those two causes of action, because questions of negligence and contributory negligence would arise, and therefore it would be necessary to apply the common law standard to one part of the case where questions of contributory negligence arose, and the Admiralty standard to another part of the case where contributory negligence did not arise. There would also be the complication of having a jury to try one part of the case and the judge to try another part. This case is entirely free from all those questions. To begin with, the question of contributory negligence does not arise, and the law to be applied, whether by the judge of the Admiralty Court or the High Court, is the same. Secondly, in regard to a jury trying one cause of action and a judge the other, that difficulty also does not exist, because the defendants, who seek to try what I may call a common law action, in which a jury may be forced on them, may themselves ask for a jury in substitution for the Admiralty Court Assessors, and if the judge thought the two cases could be better tried by a jury and the plaintiffs were to insist on the counter-claim against them being tried by a jury, the judge could, if he thought fit, have both causes of action tried by a jury. In my opinion the learned judge has properly exercised his discretion, and the matter was within his jurisdiction.

BARQUE QUILPUÉ LIMITED v. BROWN. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Detention at port—Loading—"Regular turn"—Custom of port—Delay caused by number of vessels chartered—Option.

A charter-party provided that a sailing vessel was to load a cargo of coal at N. "in regular turn" from B. Colliery or any of the collieries the freighters might name. No time for loading was fixed.

At the port of N. it was necessary to obtain a loading order from the colliery before a loading berth was allotted.

[CT. OF APP.]

BARQUE QUILPUÉ LIMITED v. BROWN.

[CT. OF APP.]

When the vessel arrived, a great many vessels were waiting to load from B. Colliery, and in consequence sixty-seven days elapsed before a coaling order could be given to the vessel.

The charterers, who were the owners of B. Colliery, had sold a cargo of that coal to be shipped by this vessel.

Held, that the words "regular turn" referred to the colliery turn as distinguished from the port turn both upon their proper construction and also having regard to the regulations and practice of the port.

Held, also, that the defendants had not chartered an unreasonable number of vessels to arrive at the port about the same time so as to make it impossible that the vessel should be able to load within a reasonable time; and that the probability of delay was known to and contemplated by the shipowners when they entered into the charter-party.

Held, therefore, that the charterers had not acted unreasonably, and were not liable for the detention of the vessel.

Decision of Kennedy, J. affirmed.

APPEAL of the plaintiffs from the judgment of Kennedy, J. delivered the 2nd Dec. 1902.

The plaintiffs commenced the action to recover damages for detention of the sailing ship Quilpué at Newcastle, New South Wales, under a charter-party dated the 6th Feb. 1900, made between the plaintiffs, as shipowners, and the defendants, as freighters.

The charter-party, so far as material, provided that the ship should with all convenient speed proceed to Newcastle, "and there in the usual and customary manner load in regular turn from Brown's Duckenfield Colliery, or any of the collieries the said freighters may name, a full and complete cargo, which the said freighters bind themselves to ship."

The defendants were the owners of Brown's Duckenfield Colliery, and chartered vessels to load with their coal.

On the 6th April 1900 they sold a cargo of their coal to be shipped by the Quilpué to certain persons in Valparaiso.

At the port of Newcastle coals are shipped in large quantities from about twenty collieries, none of which can produce a greater daily output than 1100 tons, the coals from the Wallsend and the Duckenfield Collieries being in greater demand than from the others.

The collieries are all some distance from the port, and the coals are conveyed by railway to the loading place, which is called the Dyke, where the vessels are loaded by means of cranes, which are quite sufficient to load more than the output of the collieries, but there is no place at the Dyke for the storage of coals.

The loading is under the control of Railway Commissioners, and No. 2 of the port regulations provides: "Vessels requiring berths at cranes for the purpose of loading or unloading cargoes shall obtain same in the order of their arrival in port, provided . . . the necessary loading orders have been lodged."

The regulations also provide that the cargo must be shipped continuously, and that not less than a certain number of tons a day must be loaded under penalty of fines, and that steamers shall have preference.

Evidence as to the working of these regulations was taken on commission, and on this evidence Kennedy, J. found a well-established practice with reference to sailing vessels that the loading was "a loading in turn of their arrival inter se, subject to their being on what I may call colliery turn with the colliery from which they are chartered to receive their coal."

Under the regulations it is necessary in order to obtain a berth to lodge a coaling order from the colliery, but the colliery can only give an order in turn of the ships booked to it. Therefore a ship booked to the collieries whose coal is in greater demand was under greater risk of delay than a ship booked to one of the others. This practice was the necessary result of the nature of the colliery output, together with the absence of any facility for storage at the Dyke, and the necessity of sending the coal by the railway.

The Quilpué arrived at Newcastle on the 3rd Aug. 1900 (her cancelling date being the 31st Aug. 1900), and there were then over twenty ships waiting to load from Brown's Duckenfield Colliery. She was not berthed for loading until the 6th Oct. 1900, and the loading was finished on the 9th of that month.

As the result of the practice at Newcastle, twenty-seven vessels booked to other collieries which arrived after her were loaded before her, and eleven which arrived before her were loaded after her.

Kennedy, J. held that the defendants were not liable for the delay, as the words in the charter-party, "in regular turn from Brown's Duckenfield Colliery," referred to colliery turn; but that, if they referred to port turn, their effect was the same, having regard to the practice at the port, as the Quilpué was loaded in her turn on the books of the colliery. He also held that the defendants had not caused the delay by chartering an unreasonable or excessive number of vessels to load from their colliery and so caused a block of vessels, as it had been proved that in 1900 the number of vessels loaded from the Duckenfield Colliery was less than that for the three previous years, and that it was impossible in the case of sailing vessels to know their precise dates of arrival, especially having regard to the long cancelling dates provided for in their charter-parties.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Carver, K.C. and Leck for the appellants.—The question is what is the meaning of "regular turn" at Newcastle. Primâ facie it means port turn:

Lawson v. Burness, 1 H. & C. 396;

Stephens v. Macleod, 19 Sess. Cas. (4th series), 38.

At Newcastle, under the regulations of the port, a ship will get a loading berth in order of arrival if the cargo is ready, and the charterer is bound to have the coal ready. Vessels which arrived after the Quilpué were loaded before her. This colliery being the property of the charterers, it was not a reasonable performance of the contract to make arrangements which resulted in so many vessels arriving to be loaded at the same time. It is no defence to this claim that there was an unusual demand on the colliery:

Stephens v. Harris, 57 L. T. Rep. 618; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 192;

Kay v. Field, 47 L. T. Rep. 423; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 588; 10 Q. B. Div. 241;
Gardiner v. Macfarlane, 20 Sess. Cas. (4th series), 414;
Ogmore Steamship Company v. Borner, 6 Com. Cas., 104, 110;
Aktieselskabet Inglewood v. Millar's Karri and Jarrah Forests Limited, 8 Com. Cas. 196, 201;

Ashcroft v. Crow Orchard Colliery Company, 31 L. T. Rep. 266; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 397; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 540.

The charterers had an option as to the coal with which the vessel might be loaded, and did not exercise it reasonably:

Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morel Brothers and Co., 65 L. T. Rep. 659; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 106; (1891) 2 Q. B. 447;
Dobell v. Green, 82 L. T. Rep. 314; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 473; (1900) 1 Q. B. 526.

Scrutton, K.C. and Balloch, for the respondents, were not called on to argue as to the meaning of "regular turn."—With reference to the other points. It is impossible to know in the case of sailing ships when they will arrive. The charterers acted reasonably and chartered the other vessels in the ordinary course of business, and are not liable for the delay which took place:

Harrowing v. Dupré, 7 Com. Cas. 157;
Watson v. Borner, 5 Com. Cas. 377.

The Quilpué was only detained a reasonable time having regard to the number of ships which were waiting to be loaded from the Duckenfield Colliery. The purchaser of the coal refused to take any but the Duckenfield coal. The option to load with other coal was for the charterers' benefit, and they were not bound to consider the shipowners' convenience:

Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morel Brothers and Co. (ubi sup.);
Bulman v. Fenwick, 69 L. T. Rep. 651; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 388; (1894) 1 Q. B. 179;

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an action for detention of the sailing ship Quilpué at Newcastle, New South Wales, where she was detained for the purpose of loading for sixty-seven days. The plaintiffs allow a period of thirty days, and they claim damages for detention for the balance of thirty-seven days. Two questions, broadly, arise in this case. The first arises upon the construction of the charter-party, which provided that the ship should with all convenient speed proceed to Newcastle, "and there in the usual and customary manner load in regular turn from Brown's Duckenfield Colliery, or any of the collieries the said freighters may name, a full and complete cargo of coals which the said freighters bind themselves to ship." Mr. Carver addressed to us an argument in which he contended that "regular turn" there meant "in the order of the arrival of the ships." I do not agree with him. I do not think that is the meaning of the words here. He cited cases to us which do show prima facie, and unless there is something to lead to a different conclusion, that these words "in regular turn" mean "in regular port turn"; but none of these cases show that "in regular turn" cannot mean in regular colliery turn as distinguished from regular port turn. In my judgment, in this case, the words "in regular turn from Brown's Duckenfield Colliery or any of the collieries the said freighters may name" do refer to colliery turn as distinguished from port turn. Indeed, not only does that seem to me to be, from a grammatical point of view, the meaning of these words, but when the condition of these collieries which are referred to in this charter-party are considered and also the regulations of this particular port, which were perfectly well known to all the parties to the charter-party, both the plaintiffs and the defendants, it is hardly possible, in the first place, to avoid the conclusion that the parties to this charter-party must all of them have contemplated that the ship would be loaded in accordance with colliery turn. The second rule of the port regulations provides: "Vessels requiring berths at cranes for the purpose of loading or unloading cargoes shall obtain the same in the order of their arrival in port, provided they are considered suitable by the berthing master and the necessary loading orders have been lodged, and their loading in such order will not in any way interfere with the loading of vessels then under and in turn before them except as hereinafter referred to." When that rule is considered, bearing in mind the fact, as found by Kennedy, J. and really obviously known to everybody concerned in this business, that no one of the collieries could load more than 1100 tons a day, because 1100 tons a day was the maximum output of each one of these collieries, one cannot help coming to the conclusion that the practice at this port must necessarily have been a practice governed and controlled by the colliery output. Under those circumstances I have not the least doubt but that Kennedy, J. was perfectly right in the construction which he put upon these words in this charter-party, and in the conclusion which he has arrived at as to what must guide one in determining what "regular turn" means here.

The second point in the case is, that in this contract, and in every other contract, there is an implied contract by each party to it that he will not do anything on his part to prevent the other party to the contract either performing the contract or to delay the other party in performing the contract. I agree. I think it may be generally said that there is an implied contract to that effect imported by the law into every contract, just in the same way as you import into every contract that the various things to be done by the one party and the other are to be done, if no time is specified, within a reasonable time. You may call that, in each of these cases, an implied contract. Perhaps it is, but I only wish to safeguard myself against supposing that the law easily implies any special affirmative contract. I think it is very rare indeed that the law either does or ought to imply such a contract. I agree that the particular contract which the plaintiffs rely upon is implied really in every contract so far as I know. It is said that, there being that contract, the defendants here made breach of it, and did prevent, or unduly delay, the plaintiffs in the performance of the contract. The way in which it is put is twofold. First, it is said that if the defendants were under an obligation to load a cargo from this particular colliery and none other—that is, the Duckenfield Colliery—they really prevented the plaintiffs from loading it, because they entered into contracts with such a large number of ships to take coal from that colliery at or about the same time that the coal ought to have been loaded into the plaintiffs' ship as to make it impossible that the vessel should be able to load within a reasonable time; and it is said it does not matter whether that was done after the contract was entered into or before the contract was entered into; because a man not only contracts that he will not do anything to render the performance of the contract impossible or to delay it unreasonably, but he also warrants that at the time of the entering into the contract he has not already done acts rendering the performance of the contract impossible, or which would unduly delay the performance of it. I will assume that that is the proper way of stating the implied contract, although I am not at all sure that it is not too wide; but, assuming that, I ask myself, Did these people do anything of the sort? It seems to me that one ought, in a case of this sort, to take into consideration facts which are in the knowledge of all the parties. In the case of Carlton Steamship Company v. Castle Mail Packets Company (ubi sup.) Rigby, L.J. concurred with the majority of the court in the decision of the Court of Appeal. He says: "I do not think that a delay which arises from a contingency the probability of which must have been perfectly well known to and contemplated by the shipowners when they entered into the charter-party can be considered unreasonable." In this particular case it is perfectly plain that at the time when the shipowners entered into the charter-party under which they were to load in regular turn, meaning thereby regular colliery turn, they must have known not only that the charterers would have prior engagements which would delay the colliery turn of this particular ship, but they must have known also that a delay of the ship for loading for a number of days—certainly between forty and fifty days—was not an impossible or even an unusual thing in loading at this port of Newcastle in New South Wales from these collieries which exclusively supply this port. They must have contemplated that there very likely would be such a delay. Under those circumstances I agree with Kennedy, J. that there is nothing unreasonable here in the charterers making such a number of engagements for ships to go and load at this port of Newcastle, even taking the Duckenfield Colliery alone, as resulted in twenty ships being in waiting for cargoes; ships which had priority over this particular ship, the Quilpué, when it arrived. With regard to the additional suggestion that although this might be so, if the only coal which could be loaded was coal from the Duckenfield Colliery, that is not the case here, as the charterers had the option of loading from either of the collieries; and, having that option to select the coal, that option must be reasonably exercised. I think the reasonableness, if that is material, must be reasonableness at the time of the selection of the coal being notified to the ship, which probably was at Newcastle, and not at the time of the sale of the coal, which took place in April, four months before. Taking all this, and assuming in favour of the plaintiffs that the absolute option which in words is given to the charterers to select which coal they choose is an option which has to be exercised reasonably by them, as is stated by Romer, L.J. in his judgment in Dobell v. Green (ubi sup.), I see nothing to show me in the evidence that this option was unreasonably exercised. It is quite true that as things turned out, as possibly the charterers might have ascertained if they had made a full investigation, the loading might have been done somewhat more quickly if it had been from some other colliery, but, assuming all that, there is nothing to show me that this selection of the Duckenfield coal was unreasonably exercised. I do not think one must leave out of consideration, and it is not unreasonable to suppose, that the considerations which are to affect the charterer in his selection, even at the port of Newcastle, are to be quite irrespective of the contracts that have been previously entered into by the charterer. It would not be good for business if the charterer was put in such a position that he would not be able to deal with or sell his cargo until the arrival of the ship at Newcastle. Under those circumstances I think that the judgment of Kennedy, J. was quite right and ought to be affirmed.

BARQUE QUILPUÉ LIMITED v. BROWN.

[CT. OF APP.]

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. On the question of the construction of this charter-party, I agree that the provision in it as to the loading being in "regular turn from" the colliery means loading according to the regular turn of the colliery as found by Kennedy, J. With regard to the other points raised by the appellants, those points depend upon this: Can we find that the defendants hindered the plaintiffs in the performance of the charter-party or prevented them from carrying it out by selecting this particular colliery at the time it was selected by them; or by reason of the overcrowding at the port, and the consequent delay of the ship caused by their having chartered so many ships? In other words, Were the defendants guilty of such unreasonable conduct in the matter as would render them liable for such delay in loading as undoubtedly occurred? As to this, the learned judge in the court below came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had not established on the facts any such case as was necessary for them to establish as against these defendants; and, after hearing the evidence, I am not satisfied that the learned judge in the court below came to a wrong decision of fact upon the point. That being so, I think that point also fails, and the appeal, as a whole, consequently fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I find it impossible to differ from the conclusions which have been arrived at by Kennedy, J. I do not think I can usefully add anything. I think the appeal must be dismissed.

JONES LIMITED v. GREEN AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Obligation of charterer to have cargo ready—No time fixed for loading—Cargo from specific source—Option of charterer—Knowledge of parties at time of contract.

A sailing ship was chartered to load at N. a "cargo of coals as ordered by the charterers," and they afterwards directed that it should be loaded with coal from W. Colliery. No time for loading was fixed. At the port of N. it was necessary to obtain a loading order from the colliery before a loading berth was allotted. The W. Colliery had a small output, and the coal was in great demand. These facts were known to the parties at the time of the contract. In consequence of the number of ships loading from W. Colliery the ship did not obtain a loading berth for a long time, and, in addition to being delayed at N., lost a charter-party elsewhere, as she did not arrive before the cancelling date.

The owners brought an action to recover damages for the loss thus occasioned to them.

Held, that the charterers were not bound to have a cargo of coal ready for loading immediately on the arrival of the ship; that the vessel obtained a loading order in due course in her colliery turn and there was then no delay on the part of the charterers, and therefore the cargo was provided within a reasonable time; that the option to select the particular coal was an option for the benefit of the charterers, who were not bound, in exercising it, to consider the benefit or otherwise of the shipowners; and therefore, all parties being acquainted with the practice at the port and the charterers having acted reasonably, they were not liable for the delay.

Little v. Stevenson (74 L. T. Rep. 529; (1896) A. C. 108) considered.

APPEAL of the plaintiffs from the judgment of Kennedy, J. delivered on the 2nd Dec. 1902.

In this action the plaintiffs claimed damages for the detention, at Newcastle, New South Wales, of the sailing ship Snowdon, which was chartered by the defendants by a charter-party dated the 14th Feb. 1900, which provided that

The ship shall with all possible dispatch proceed to such loading berth as freighters may name at Newcastle, New South Wales, and after being in a loading berth as ordered, wholly unballasted and ready to load, shall there load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of coals, as ordered by charterers, which they bind themselves to ship.

The coal was to be conveyed to the west coast of America.

On the 25th May 1900 the defendants informed the plaintiffs that the ship was to be loaded with Wallsend coal.

The Snowdon did not arrive at Newcastle until the 1st Sept. 1900. There was a great demand for Wallsend coal, and she did not obtain a loading berth until the 15th Dec. 1900. The defendants had sold a cargo of Wallsend coal to be shipped by the Snowdon, and the buyers refused to accept coal from any other colliery.

The custom and circumstances under which coal is loaded at the port of Newcastle are reported in Barque Quilpué Limited v. Brown (ante, p. 596); but in this case the form of the charter-party was different, and the charterers were not the owners of the colliery.

The vessel had also been chartered to convey a cargo of nitrate from the west coast of America, but in consequence of the delay at Newcastle she arrived so long after the expected date that the charter-party was cancelled. The plaintiffs therefore also claimed damages for the loss thus occasioned to them.

Kennedy, J. held that the contract was to load the Snowdon in her regular turn at the Wallsend Colliery, and this had been done. He also held, on the evidence and the correspondence, that the plaintiffs knew what the custom was as to loading at the port; and that the defendants had not acted unreasonably either in selecting Wallsend coal or refusing to substitute another coal, as they had sold a cargo of Wallsend coal and could not induce the buyers to take the coal from either of the other Newcastle collieries.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Carver, K.C. and Leck for the appellants.—The charterers had no right to postpone the loading for any length of time. They chose the coal with which the vessel was to be loaded, and were bound to have it ready. They must take the risk of not being ready with that coal. The knowledge of the plaintiffs that the ship must take its turn does not excuse the defendants. The selection of the Wallsend Colliery as the one from which the coal was to come was not a reasonable selection, and when the Snowdon arrived thirty other ships were waiting:

Carver, K.C. in reply.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the charter-party contains no mention of “regular turn,” and runs thus: “The ship shall with all possible dispatch proceed to such loading berth as freighters may name at Newcastle, New South Wales, and after being in a loading berth as ordered, wholly unballasted and ready to load shall there load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of” (then there is a blank in which the charterers had the right to insert the name of the Newcastle coals they wished to have, and they did insert “Wallsend coals”) “as ordered by charterers, which they bind themselves to ship.” Then follow the exceptions, but they are immaterial, because neither side relies on them. The case for the plaintiffs, who are the appellants, is that those words constitute an absolute undertaking on the part of the charterers that they would have the cargo of coals ready to put on board as soon as the loading berth was obtained according to the custom of the port, and it is said that a loading berth might have been obtained at a very much earlier date than in fact it was, if the charterers had not failed to perform their duty, and that their failure to perform their duty was the cause of the ship being so long in getting a berth. Now, if the appellants could show that the reason of the berth not being given was that the charterers failed in their duty, no doubt they would be entitled to succeed. But, according to my judgment, they have not done so. The case seems to be covered by the judgment of Lord Herschell in Little v. Stevenson (ubi sup.), which decided that it was not the duty of the charterer to have his cargo ready to load on the mere chance of getting a berth. Lord Herschell took the view that if in the ordinary course it might be expected that a berth would be available if the cargo was ready, and the charterer took upon himself the obligation of having a cargo ready, the loss of the berth would be due to a failure in duty by the charterer. For the appellants Mr. Carver relied, among other cases, on Grant v. Coverdale (ubi sup.). In delivering judgment in that case Lord Selborne draws a distinction between loading and that which is preliminary to loading having the cargo there ready to load, and he pointed out that where there are exceptions in the charter-party which relate to the loading, nothing in those exceptions would relieve the charterers or merchants from the obligation to have the cargo there ready to load. The decision in that case is shortly put by the Earl of Selborne, L.C. thus: “With that observation I proceed to notice that it is not denied, and cannot be denied, that, unless those words of exception according to their proper construction take this case which has happened out of the demurrage clause, the mere fact of frost or any other thing having impeded the performance of that which the charterer and not the shipowner was bound to perform will not absolve him from the consequences of keeping the ship too long. That was decided under circumstances very similar in many respects in the case of Kearon v. Pearson (ubi sup.), and decided expressly on the ground, as was pointed out, I think, by all the learned judges, certainly by my noble and learned friend here present (Lord Bramwell), by Wilde, B., and by Pollock, C.B., that there was no contract as to the particular place from which the cargo was to come, no contract as to the particular manner in which it was to be supplied, or how it was to be brought to the place of loading, and that therefore it could not be supposed that the parties were contracting about any such thing.” But the present case is entirely different from the case referred to by Lord Selborne, for it is a case in which the source from which the coal was to come was expressly defined. When that is so, I think it is impossible to lay down an absolute rule that the charterer undertakes an unqualified obligation to have the cargo ready whenever it may be reasonably expected that there may be a berth for the ship if the cargo is ready. It may be so sometimes, but it is impossible to say that it must be so. Now, in the present case, what is the contract so far as the source of coal is concerned, and what is the knowledge of the parties to the contract? I take it that one cannot exclude the knowledge of the parties in the consideration of this matter, because, after all, what we have to consider here is, what was a reasonable time either for the provision of the cargo or for the commencement of the loading, and, when you are considering what is a reasonable time, it seems to me obvious that you must take into consideration those circumstances, which were known to both parties to the contract at the date of the contract, and were taken into consideration by both the parties as affording the basis and foundation of the contract. In the first place, the source of the coal is defined by this contract; first, the coal is to be loaded at Newcastle, New South Wales; secondly, the charterer is to have the right to name the particular colliery from which the coal is to come; thirdly, it was within the knowledge of all the parties that the port of Newcastle, New South Wales, serves a limited number of collieries which are adjacent to that port, and serves no other collieries whatsoever. The whole of the coal which is loaded at Newcastle, New South Wales, is the coal which is the product of these collieries. It was known also to both the parties to the contract that the output of these collieries was a very limited output, not exceeding 1100 tons a day; and also that if sailing ships went to this port of Newcastle, New South Wales, the loading would have to take place according to the regulations of the port there, and that a ship could only get a loading berth if what is called a “loading order” had been obtained from the colliery—that is to say, if the circumstances were such that according to the colliery turn that vessel was entitled to have such loading order. It was also known to both of the parties here that sailing ships undoubtedly were detained a very long time before they could in ordinary course get their loading order from the colliery. This very ship, the Snowdon, in the year previous to the year of this charter-party, had to wait for eighty-three days in order to get a loading order according to the colliery turn. As the result of all that, I have come to the conclusion that all the parties to this contract assumed as the basis of the transaction that there would and must be more or less delay, according to the loading turn at the colliery. I have only one more word to say about this. It is true that the correspondence took place between the parties after February, which was the date of the charter-party, still, when it is considered, I cannot help seeing from that correspondence that the charterers and shipowners, both of them, were contracting in view of this state of things; and really as time went on and it came to the knowledge of the parties that there was likely to be a long "stem," as it is called in the correspondence, both parties assume that this long "stem" is a burden which both will have to bear, and that neither party takes upon himself the risk of the long "stem"; and, eventually, when it is certain that the waiting will be for a long time, the shipowners write to the charterers to ask the charterers to try, as a matter of grace, if they can get the purchasers of the cargo, who had purchased Wallsend, to change it to some other coal, and, although the charterers did their best, they were unable to effect this. It seems to me that all these things which I have referred to clearly bring this case within the authority of Harris v. Dreesman (ubi sup.), which is most admirably summarised by Mr. Carver in his book on Carriage by Sea, and the particular passage to which I desire to call attention is this. After dealing with what I may call the general duties of the shipowner and the charterer in the earlier section, he says (sect. 254): "On the other hand, the charterer cannot be assumed to have the cargo ready if it is expressly to be provided from a particular place and the charter has been made in view of circumstances by which, as the parties know, the procuring of a cargo from that place may be delayed. And if in such a case no arrangement is made as to the time in which the loading is to be done, the charterer will be allowed a reasonable time for getting the cargo, having regard to the known sources of delay." It seems to me that the present case exactly falls within this passage. It was a case of a cargo to be provided from a particular place. The charter was made in view of certain circumstances by which, as the parties knew, the procuring of a cargo from that place might be delayed. There is no arrangement in this case as to the time in which the loading is to be done, and under these circumstances, in my judgment, this charterer was entitled to a reasonable time for getting the cargo, having regard to the known sources of delay which I have already specified, with reference to these collieries adjacent to this port. Under these circumstances, what has the learned judge found? He has found as a fact—because really this is fact and not law—that there was nothing done unreasonably, and nothing left undone which the charterer reasonably ought to have done in this case. The only suggestion that is made as to anything the charterer could have done is that he could have substituted another coal. To my mind, he did all that he could be reasonably expected to do when he did his best to get the person who became the purchaser under a contract he made to agree to accept another and a different coal than the Wallsend coal. I will assume here another coal could have been got, but it seems to me on the authorities cited before us, which I really do not think I am bound to go into at length, that this option which the charterers had here to select the particular coal was an option which they had to exercise for their own benefit, and they had a right to determine what that coal was, not when the ship arrived in New South Wales, but at any period they chose which they found commercially convenient after the date of the charter-party. The observations which are made by Lord Wensleydale—Parke, B. as he was then—in Harris v. Dreesman (ubi sup.) are extremely pertinent, and, after all, they are to my mind summarised with perfect accuracy in the passage I have read from Mr. Carver's book. Under these circumstances I think that the judgment of Kennedy, J. in this case must be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first point taken on behalf of the appellants is that the charterers were bound to have their cargo of coal ready for loading immediately on the arrival of the ship at Newcastle; and, that being so, the charterers are liable for the delay in loading which in fact occurred. But when the charter-party here is looked at, it is clear that, when according to the option given to the charterers they selected the Wallsend as the colliery from which the coal should be loaded, the charter-party became one dealing with a cargo coming from that special colliery at the special port of Newcastle; and I may incidentally point out that it was a charter-party where no special time was fixed by agreement as to the loading and no special provision made as to it. Now, on the facts it is clear that both parties knew all the relevant facts connected with the practice of berthing ships at Newcastle in order to load coal from the collieries there; and I have no hesitation in saying that, in my opinion, it would not be carrying out the true intention of the parties and the true meaning of this charter-party if we did not hold, as I think it ought to be held, that the parties contracted with reference to that common knowledge. What the practice is as to berthing ships at the port of Newcastle has already been fully dealt with by this court in Barque Quilpué Limited v. Brown (ante, p. 596). Both parties knew of it; and clearly this contract of charter-party must be dealt with having regard to the common knowledge of what was the practice at Newcastle. I agree with what Vaughan Williams, L.J. has said as to the statement of the law contained in the passage of the well-known book by Mr. Carver, which he has read. I think the principle there laid down is a true principle, and is borne out by Harris v. Dreesman (ubi sup.), and also by the decision of the House of Lords in Little v. Stevenson (ubi sup.). Applying that principle to the present case, I think, subject to the question whether the charterers acted unreasonably in selecting this particular Wallsend Colliery, the shipowners cannot complain of the delay that arose in the loading berth being obtained. That delay arose by reason of the practice of the port known to both, and, as I have said, considered by both with reference to this contract and owing to circumstances which were unavoidable as far as concerns the charterers. After the loading berth was obtained there was admittedly no delay on the part of the charterers, and under those circumstances it appears to me impossible for us to say the charterers had not got the cargo ready in a reasonable and proper time according to the true contract between the parties. I do not think the two Scotch cases which have been cited—viz., Lilly v. Stevenson (ubi sup.) and Gardiner v. Macfarlane (ubi sup.)—are authorities bearing upon the present case. In Ardan Steamship Company v. Weir and Co. (ubi sup.) no common knowledge of the practice of the port was alleged or proved; and the case of Harris v. Dreesman (ubi sup.) and the principle there referred to does not seem even to have been mentioned. The other Scotch case, Gardiner v. Macfarlane, as will be seen when the exact questions there decided are carefully considered, really has no bearing upon the question before us. That being so, the only other question in this case is whether in selecting the Wallsend Colliery the charterers acted unreasonably. All I need say is that that allegation is not proved to my satisfaction. In considering questions of this kind, the principle laid down by Bowen, L.J. in Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morel Brothers and Co. (ubi sup.) ought always to be borne in mind. In that case, when dealing with the question as to whether the option given to a charterer has been properly exercised in reference to such cases as this, he said: "The option is given for the benefit of the person who has to exercise it. He is bound to exercise it in a reasonable time, but is not bound, in exercising it, to consider the benefit or otherwise of the other party." Applying that principle here, it is clear to me that the learned judge in the court below came to the right conclusion, that the charterers did not act unreasonably.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It was not disputed that under this charter-party the charterers were bound to have a full and complete cargo of coals in readiness whenever the ship was in a loading berth. That duty has been fulfilled. No question arises as to that, but what is contended is that the defendants are liable in respect of the delay which occurred before the ship got into the loading berth. As to that, it seems to me that the obligations of the charterers are such as stated by Lord Herschell with reference to another, though very similar, charter-party, in the case of Little v. Stevenson (ubi sup.). He says: "Undoubtedly that would impose by implication upon the charterer the duty of doing any act that was necessary on his part, according to the custom of the port, to enable her to get a berth. He could not defend himself from a complaint of the shipowner that his vessel had been delayed by saying that she was not in a berth when she was not there because the charterer himself had failed in some duty to do some act on his part to enable her to get there." And then, later on, he adds: "I do not for a moment deny that he is bound to do whatever is reasonable on his part with the view of getting the ship berthed at the earliest period that is reasonably possible." The question which it seems to me we have to decide is whether the defendants, the charterers, omitted to do anything that was reasonable on their part with a view of getting the ship berthed at the earliest period that was reasonably possible. It seems to me, regard being had to the facts proved in this case, and in particular to the circumstances which were known to all the parties to the charter-party when it was entered into, that to their knowledge the obtaining of a cargo at Newcastle might be delayed. I cannot think that the defendants failed in doing anything that was reasonably possible for the purpose which I have mentioned. With regard to the case of Ardan Steamship Company v. Weir and Co. (ubi sup.), it appears to me that, although the charter-party seems to have been in almost identical terms with the present, the facts which were established in that case were different. First of all the learned judge found that there was an absolute failure in the duty of the charterer to provide a cargo at the proper time; and, secondly, there was no evidence of such a state of knowledge as is proved in the present case, which, upon the authority of Harris v. Dreesman (ubi sup.), ought to be taken into consideration. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

A vessel being in distress off the coast, lifeboats were launched with a view to save either life or property. Under the regulations of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, which owned the lifeboats, in the event of life only being saved the crews of the lifeboats are remunerated by the Lifeboat Institution, and in the event of property being saved the crews of the lifeboats are remunerated by the award which may be made for salvaging the property.

The lifeboats which ultimately rendered salvage services to property and not to life were launched with the assistance of certain men, members of a company of fishermen. These men brought an action against the owners of the property saved to recover salvage for the services rendered by them in assisting to launch the lifeboats.

Held, that those who assisted to launch the lifeboats were entitled to maintain an action for salvage.

In this action two salvage suits were consolidated and tried together.

The plaintiffs in the first suit were the coxswains and crews of the lifeboats Robert and Mary Ellis and Uppang, which were owned by the Royal National Lifeboat Institution.

The Robert and Mary Ellis was stationed at Whitby, was manned by a crew of thirteen hands all told, and was of the value of 800*l.*

THE CAYO BONITO.

[ADM.]

The Uppang was stationed at Uppang, which is a little to the north of Whitby, was manned by a crew of fourteen hands all told, and was of the value of 800*l*.

The plaintiffs in the second suit were ninety-nine men, members of a company of fishermen and boatmen at Whitby, who man and launch the lifeboats Robert and Mary Ellis and Uppang. On a summons to man the boats, the members of the company who first assemble form the crew of the lifeboats, and the requisite number of the remainder assist in launching them.

The Cayo Bonito was a screw steamship of 3427 tons gross and 2213 tons net register, was fitted with engines of 1800 horse power effective, and was manned by a crew of thirty-one hands all told. At the time the services were rendered to her she was on a voyage from South Shields to Galveston in water ballast, with about 250 tons of slag ballast on deck, and fifty tons of slag ballast in her holds. The value of the Cayo Bonito was 34,000*l*.

About 9 p.m. on the 21st Jan. 1904 the Cayo Bonito while in charge of a North Sea pilot got ashore to the northward of Whitby on the Uppang Rocks.

About 9.30 p.m. word was brought to the coxswain of the Robert and Mary Ellis that the Cayo Bonito was ashore. The crew of the Robert and Mary Ellis were at once mustered, and with the help of forty-one of the plaintiffs in the second suit the lifeboat was launched. The tide at the time was about four hours ebb, the wind was from the N.W. by N. and a strong sea was running.

The Robert and Mary Ellis reached the Cayo Bonito shortly after 10 p.m., and, in answer to a hail from the master of the Cayo Bonito, the coxswain of the lifeboat boarded her and found that the ballast tanks had been run out and some of the slag ballast had been jettisoned.

The master of the Cayo Bonito then asked the coxswain of the Robert and Mary Ellis to do what he could to float the vessel. The coxswain thereupon got an anchor slung on to the bows of the lifeboat, and this was taken away to the N.E. and lowered with 120 fathoms of wire hawser attached to it.

Meanwhile the Uppang had been manned and launched by some forty of the plaintiffs in the second suit, and this was only accomplished after some difficulty, the lifeboat having to be re-earriaged on one occasion.

The launch was, however, ultimately successfully accomplished, and the Uppang finally reached the Cayo Bonito and took an anchor and 125 fathoms of manilla on board. The Robert and Mary Ellis then towed the Uppang away to the N.E. by N. and the anchor was then dropped.

The jettison of the ballast proceeded, and at 2.30 a.m. on the 22nd Jan. when the tide made, the coxswain of the Robert and Mary Ellis told those on the Cayo Bonito to heave on their anchors, and after about an hour's heaving the engines of the Cayo Bonito were worked full speed astern, and the Cayo Bonito gradually came off, and about 4.30 a.m. was anchored in a place of safety.

The defendants admitted that salvage services were rendered by the crews of the lifeboats, and that they were engaged to lay out anchors, but they alleged that the warp attached to the anchor laid out by the Uppang parted almost at once, and that the anchors were of little use. They further alleged that the work done consisted in laying out the anchors only, and that it could have been done equally well by the crew of the Cayo Bonito, and paid into court the sum of 250*l*. which they alleged was sufficient to satisfy all claims of the crews of the lifeboats.

As to the claim of the men who assisted in the launching, the defendants denied that any salvage services were rendered by the launchers, and further alleged that if they had assisted in the launching the launch had taken place for the purpose of saving life, and that under the rules of the Lifeboat Institution, the lifeboats could not be used for the purpose of salving property until they reached the Cayo Bonito. They also alleged that the launchers were employed and entitled to be paid, either by the Lifeboat Institution or by the crews of the lifeboats.

The general regulations of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution which deal with the launching of the lifeboats owned by the institution are as follows:

18. The lifeboat is never to be launched for any purpose other than for saving life without the direct sanction of the honorary secretary or of some other authority connected with the local committee, and on no account to be used for other purposes, to the injury of private interests.

Art. 20 prescribed the payments to be made to each of the crew for going afloat in the lifeboat to save life at different times and seasons, and provided that a similar variation in pay should be allowed to the helpers as the launchers were called in the regulations.

24. When a lifeboat has been launched for the purpose of saving life, and it is found on arriving at the vessel in danger that the master or other responsible person in charge wishes to engage the services of the lifeboat's crew to endeavour to save the vessel, the lifeboat's crew are at liberty to accept an engagement with such master or other responsible person in charge for this purpose and to make use of the lifeboat under the following conditions: (a) That all reasonable care be taken of the lifeboat and its gear. (b) That it be clearly understood that the position of the lifeboat's crew towards the institution is changed from a lifeboat crew endeavouring to save life, and entitled to be paid for such endeavours by the institution, to a party of salvors who have borrowed the lifeboat for property salvage purposes, for the remuneration of which services they are to look to the person in charge of the vessel who has engaged them. Should the boat be damaged while rendering such services the cost of repair to be met by the salvors. (c) Should the attempts of the lifeboat crew to save the vessel be successful, but the amount of salvage money paid them be less than the amount the crew, helpers, &c., would have been entitled to for an endeavour to save life, the difference will be made good by the institution. Should, however, they be unsuccessful in salving the vessel they will be paid by the institution as though they had launched for the purpose of saving life.

Evidence was also given that when the crew of the lifeboat was paid by the institution for going afloat for the purpose of saving life each of the launchers was also paid by the institution a sum equal to one-fifth of the sum paid to each of the crew.

Laing, K.C. and L. Batten for the plaintiffs the crews of the lifeboats.

THE CAYO BONITO.

[ADM.]

A. Adair Roche for the plaintiffs in the second suit, the launchers.—The first defence is that the launchers were employed and entitled to be paid by the institution. That is not the fact, for when the lifeboats are engaged to save property the position of the launchers as well as of the crews of the lifeboats is changed under rule 24 (b) of the general regulations, and they have to look to a salvage award for their remuneration. The second defence is that the lifeboat crews undertook to remunerate the launchers, but they did not do so, though if they received the whole sum awarded as salvage, they would pay over something to those who assisted to launch the boats. Those who assist in launching are salvors because without their assistance the salvage services could never have been rendered, and in such cases not only those actually employed but those who stay behind are entitled to salvage:

The Enchantress, 2 L. T. Rep. 574; Lush 93;

The Cadiz and The Boyne, 35 L. T. Rep. 602;
3 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 332.

The position of those who launch is analogous to that of the lifeboat men who were treated as part of the crew of a tug:

The Auguste Legembre, 86 L. T. Rep. 358; 9 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 279; (1902) P. 123.

Aspinall, K.C. and R. H. Balloch for the defendants.—As no leave had been given under rule 18 of the general regulations, these lifeboats must have been launched to save life and not property. The subsequent engagement of the lifeboat by the master of the Cayo Bonito to save property cannot convert the launching of the lifeboats into a salvage service rendered to property. Those who launch the boat cannot render their services de bene esse. They are not acting on the salvage principle of no cure no pay, because even if property was not salvaged they would be paid something by the institution.

A. Adair Roche, in reply.—The reference to helpers in rule 24 (c) of the general regulations of the National Lifeboat Institution shows that the engagement of the lifeboat to save the vessel entitles the launchers to salvage. Under rule 24 (b) if the lifeboat had been damaged in rendering the services to the property saved the launchers as well as the crew would have been liable for the cost of repairing it.

BARNES, J.—In this case Thomas Langlands and twenty-seven others, who formed the crews of the lifeboats Robert and Mary Ellis and the Uppang, and Thomas Day Cass and ninety-eight others, who assisted in launching the two lifeboats, claim against the owners of the Cayo Bonito for salvage services, which it is said were rendered to that vessel on the night of the 21st Jan. and the morning of the 22nd Jan. 1904. The Cayo Bonito is a steamship of 3427 tons gross register, with engines working up to 1800 horse power effective, and was on a voyage from South Shields to Galveston in water ballast with some further ballast on deck and in her hold, manned by a crew of thirty-two hands all told. An accident of a somewhat extraordinary character appears to have happened in the course of the voyage coming down the coast when nearly off Whitby, because the captain says that the ship was put ashore owing to the fact that the North Sea pilot, who was in charge of her at the time, had ported for several vessels, thus getting rather near the coast, and finally mistook the Whitby lights for the lights of fishermen. The first the captain appears to have known of it was when the ship was on the ground. At that time he seems to have been told by the pilot that the ship was on the sand—she was in fact on the rocks, and that is clear from the extent of the damage which the vessel's bottom received. The accident happened about 9.45 p.m. on the 21st Jan., and the Robert and Mary Ellis reached the ship about two hours afterwards. The other boat—the Uppang—reached the vessel somewhat later. The vessel appears to have gone aground on the last of the ebb, she was hard and fast on the rocks, and the steps taken to get her off appear to have been that the lifeboat first on the spot had an anchor put on board her, and laid it out to the north-east, and then the other lifeboat, assisted by the first, laid out a second anchor. Afterwards, when the tide made sufficiently, with the working of her own engines, and the heaving on the anchors the vessel came off. The ropes attached to the second anchor parted almost immediately when hove on; but as the Court is not asked to apportion between the two lifeboats, it does not matter whether one rendered assistance as long as the other did. The captain of the Cayo Bonito says he could himself have put out anchors with the assistance of his crew, and that the vessel could have got off without assistance by working her own engines. The plaintiffs contention is that they were asked and engaged to put out the anchors although the vessel had been some time aground, and that they were doing that which relieved those on the ship from making any effort to put out anchors even if they could have done it, and that the heaving on the anchor was of substantial benefit in assisting this vessel off, and that in any event it kept the vessel from swinging and getting into a worse position. I think it is exceedingly difficult to be sure of the precise benefit which the services rendered by the lifeboats conferred on the ship; but it is clear from the facts that they were engaged and did the work, and were offered remuneration for it at the time, and that, as there has been a tender of 250l. to the members of the lifeboat crews, even the defendants think there was a certain benefit conferred upon the steamer by the services of the lifeboats. I have discussed the matter with the Elder Brethren, and they think that the anchors and warps were of slight benefit to the vessel and also that the lifeboats being there, standing by engaged to assist would also be of benefit to the crew of the Cayo Bonito. That being so it is really for the court to consider what, apart from any question of tender, would have been the award made in such circumstances as these to the lifeboat men for the services which they actually performed.

The other point in the case is that of the claims I have mentioned, the claims made by Thomas Day Cass on behalf of himself and others who launched the lifeboats. They seek to obtain salvage remuneration as having been the instruments by which the salvage services were enabled to be performed. The defendants contend that they are not in fact salvage services at all, because they say, having regard to the rules of the Lifeboat Institution, that, if those rules are considered, the first launching of the lifeboat is for the purpose of saving life, and if, when the lifeboat gets to the vessel in distress, it is found that she is not required for the purpose of saving life but for the purpose of saving property the services then become changed to salvage services to property, and only those who are actually engaged in performing the services are entitled to salvage remuneration. I am by no means sure, it is very material, in the circumstances, to consider that point, because as I have already shown, if the salvors in the lifeboats are entitled to salvage remuneration, it seems to be suggested, even on the defendants' contention, that they must pay the launchers something for assisting them to earn the money which they get as salvage. Therefore it is obvious that the court, if that is the right position, in making an award to those in the lifeboats would simply have to add so much to the award as would enable the crews of the lifeboats to pay the launchers sufficient to remunerate them properly. If the other view is the correct one—namely, that the launchers, having taken part in launching the lifeboats for the purpose originally of saving life, afterwards, having regard to the rules of the institution, when the boats are engaged to save property have enabled the crews of the lifeboats to render services to property—then taking the launchers and the crews together, the judgment would simply be a divided judgment—namely, so much to the crews of the lifeboats and so much to the launchers. My own inclination is that the true view to take is that under these rules those who launch the boats must contemplate that one of two things may happen, that there may be only life salvage or there may be a change later on into a salvage of property, and when they assist in the launching they take their chance which of those things may result. I think it is clear from sub-sect. (c) of rule 24 that that idea is in contemplation in these rules. It certainly is in accordance with the commonsense view of the matter. I think, therefore, that, strictly speaking, the men who assist in launching the lifeboat have a right to claim salvage. That being so, whether you treat the remuneration of the launchers as coming directly through the lifeboat crews or not, one has to consider what the proper remuneration for them to receive would be. I think it is clear that those who assisted in the launch have endeavoured to put their case too high because the weather records show that the weather could not have been of any very real severity, and that nothing like a sea could have been produced. I have considered these matters with the Elder Brethren with considerable care, and my opinion is that the tender is not quite adequate, and that, having regard to the benefit which I think to some extent was received by the ship, a proper award to make in this case is the sum of 400*l.* to the crews of the lifeboats and 100*l.* to those engaged in launching them.

THE ELMVILLE; CEYLON COALING COMPANY LIMITED v. GOODRICH. (a)

Necessaries—Disbursements—Liability of master—Bill of exchange—Notice of dishonour—Reasonable time—Special circumstances excusing delay in notice—Bills of Exchange Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 49, 50.

A ship arrived at Colombo in want of coal, and her master needed cash for disbursements. The coals were supplied and the money was advanced by the ship's brokers, and the master drew a bill on the managing owners of the ship for the amount of the coal bill and the advance. The bill, which contained the words ". . . value received on 300 tons of coal and disbursements and place the same with or without advice to account of coals and necessary disbursements to my vessel . . . for which I hold my vessel, owners, and freight responsible" was accepted, and was dishonoured on maturity.

The plaintiffs (the holders of the bill) knew of the dishonour on the 18th April, and on the same day were told that the vessel was in the Tyne. Being uncertain of the whereabouts of the vessel, they made further inquiries, but, getting no further information, they sent notice of dishonour to the master as drawer of the bill on the 21st April. The notice reached the master on the 23rd April.

Held, that the captain was personally liable on the bill, for the form in which it was drawn did not give the holder a right only against the ship, her owners, and freight.

Held, further, that though under ordinary circumstances the notice of dishonour which was given would have been too late, yet the delay was to be excused, as it was caused by circumstances beyond the plaintiffs' control, and not imputable to their default, misconduct, or negligence.

ACTION by the Ceylon Coaling Company against the master of the steamship Elmville, the drawer of a bill of exchange to recover 303*l.* 19*s.* due under the bill.

The Elmville was owned by the Agenoria Steamship Company Limited; F. Childs and Co., Cardiff, being the managing owners.

In Feb. 1904 while on a voyage from Melbourne to Hull, the Elmville put into Colombo for coal, and while there her master needed cash for disbursements.

On the 8th Dec. 1903 F. Childs and Co. had entered into a contract with Mann, George, and Co., of London, as agents for the sellers, that the latter should supply all bunker coal which F. Childs and Co. might require at certain ports for steamships managed by them. Colombo was one of the ports.

In pursuance of this agreement Aitken Spence and Co., of Colombo, supplied the Elmville with bunker coal to the value of 270*l.* and 33*l.* 19*s.* was also advanced by them to the master to meet some disbursements.

In respect of these two sums the master, W. Goodrich, drew a bill of exchange for 303*l.* 19*s.*, dated the 23rd Feb. 1904, on the Agenoria Steamship Company Limited, F. Childs and Co., managers, Cardiff, payable in London at thirty days sight, to the order of Aitken Spence and Co. The bill contained the following words:

In London the sum of 303*l.* 19*s.* only value received on 300 tons coal and disbursements, and place the same with or without advice to account of coals and necessary disbursements to my vessel to enable her to complete this voyage from Melbourne to Hull, for which I hold my vessel, owners, and freight responsible.

On the 25th Feb. Aitken Spence and Co. indorsed the bill to the Ceylon Coaling Company.

On the 15th March the bill was accepted by F. Childs, as director and manager of the Ageronia Steamship Company payable at the London, City, and Midland Bank, London.

The bill became due on the 16th April, and was presented for payment. It was not met and was duly protested.

On the 18th April, about midday, the plaintiffs heard that the bill had been dishonoured. The bill stated that the vessel was on a voyage from Melbourne to Hull, and the plaintiffs then had to inquire where the drawer of the bill, the master, was.

The secretary of the Ceylon Coaling Company inquired of Mann, George, and Co., on the 18th April as to the whereabouts of the Elmville. Telegrams passed between Mann, George, and Co.'s house in London and their house in Cardiff, and finally a telegram reached London on the 18th April stating that the Elmville was in the Tyne in the hands of mortgagees, that the owners were endeavouring to make arrangements and advising that the account should be held for a few days. Letters confirming the telegrams also passed, and the information as to the whereabouts of the Elmville reached the secretary of the plaintiff company on the 19th April. As the bill stated that the vessel was on a voyage to Hull the secretary was not satisfied that the information he had received as to the whereabouts of the vessel was correct; so he made some further inquiry of Mann, George, and Co., and searched the Newcastle papers to see if the ship was in that port, but was unable from them to find that she was in the Tyne.

Having failed to learn anything definite as to the whereabouts of the vessel, on the 21st April the secretary of the plaintiff company posted a registered letter containing notice of dishonour, and addressed the letter: "The Master of the Elmville, Newcastle-upon-Tyne," and that letter was delivered by the post-office on board the Elmville on the 23rd April.

A firm of solicitors acting for the plaintiff company also gave the master notice that the bill had not been met on the same day.

The master not having met the bill, the writ in the action was issued on the 25th April.

Dunlop for the plaintiff company.—The master is liable on the bill, the object of the bill given in payment being the same in this case as in the case of The Ripon City (77 L. T. Rep. 98; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 304; (1897) P. 226). The circumstances of the case excuse the delay in giving the notice of dishonour, for the whereabouts of the vessel had to be discovered before it could be given, and, while the bill stated that Hull was the destination of the vessel, the vessel had gone to the Tyne.

Balloch for the master, the drawer of the bill.—The facts show that there has been undue delay in giving the notice of dishonour, and the master is therefore discharged. The holders might have sent the registered letter on the 18th April, for they got no further information between that date and the 21st April, the date on which it was ultimately sent; or they might have caused some inquiry to have been made by their agents or some ship broker in Newcastle. Further, the form of the bill itself shows that the master is not liable. The form of the bill given by the master in the case of The Ripon City (ubi sup.) was not given in the report; in this case the form is peculiar, and shows that the coal was supplied upon the credit of the ship alone. The master is not liable under the bill, for it imposes an obligation on the ship and her owners and freight alone.

BARNES, J., after stating the facts which led up to the giving of the bill, proceeded:—I do not require to repeat what I said in The Ripon City (ubi sup.), but I think in that case I went through the ordinary course of business and pointed out how a draft given by the master in such circumstances was part of the consideration for the supply of the coal, because it enabled the suppliers to use the master's name for the purpose of enforcing his lien against the ship. [The learned judge then stated the facts showing what efforts had been made to find the ship and give notice of dishonour, and proceeded:] The plaintiff company is now suing the master on the bill, and the master has already brought an action in this court against the ship in which he seeks to recover his wages and disbursements, and amongst other things he seeks to recover the amount of this bill if he is liable upon it. That suit has been before the court, and a decree for his wages and disbursements has been made, and the matter has been referred to the registrar to ascertain what those wages and disbursements amount to; and if this bill is one for which he is liable, no doubt it will fall within what is due from the defendant ship-owners or rather their ship, for the suit by the master is a suit in rem, to the present defendant in this case. He is really defending this action, because if he is made liable he will have a right to recover against the ship, but if he is not liable and did not defend this case it might be said in his suit against the ship, you ought to have fought the claim made against you, and you cannot now recover against the ship.

The first point made is that the master did not have due notice of dishonour of the bill. I do not think there is any dispute about the law. The law is contained in sects. 49 and 50 of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882. In the absence of special circumstances there is no doubt that the notice of dishonour would be too late. Sub-sect. 12 of sect. 49 and sub-sect. 1 of sect. 50 have been read, and I think the substance of the matter is this, that the notice of dishonour would be too late unless the circumstances of the case are such that there has been no delay, beyond what is reasonable in the circumstances, in giving notice of dishonour to the master. That depends upon the set of circumstances which I have referred to—namely, that the plaintiff company holding the bill did not know what the real address of the master was and had to find it out, and they never did find it out properly. They took their chance on the 21st April of the letter which was sent to "The Master of the Elmville, Newcastle-upon-Tyne," reaching the defendant, in the expectation that it might possibly do so. I think it is quite clear they had to act with promptness and within a reasonable time, and they had to make due inquiries, and as soon as they reasonably could give notice. It is simply a question of fact, and I think, having regard to the times I have mentioned and to the circumstances of the case, that the plaintiff company acted with due diligence in making inquiries and sending their notice, and I think it was, in the circumstances, sent within a time entitling them to sue the master upon the bill. The other point is rather more a point of law. If this bill were in the ordinary form counsel for the defendant does not dispute that it would be a bill upon which the master could be sued. The matter has been considered in the case of The Ripon City (ubi sup.) very fully, and there is no doubt that a master ordering coal and having to give his draft, under a contract for them, makes himself personally liable. That would be so on a bill where there is no qualification, but it is said that this bill is qualified so as not to make the master liable at all. The words relied on are as follows: "In London the sum of 303*l.* 19*s.* only value received on 300 tons coal and disbursements, and place the same with or without advice to account of coals and necessary disbursements to my vessel to enable her to complete this voyage from Melbourne to Hull, for which I hold my vessel, owners, and freight responsible." In some way counsel for the defendant suggests that those are words which release the master from personal liability and impose the obligation upon the ship, her owners, and freight only, and that that is what the owners of the coal looked to when they supplied it. I fail to see there is any such limitation upon the bill, and it seems to me that the words leave the master just as liable as if the words were not there. It is a mere statement of what has happened and the position of the master, and represents, I think truly, that he is personally liable, but that he will look himself to the vessel, his owners, and freight. I think, therefore, that the plaintiff company is entitled to judgment against the master, the defendant, for the sum of 303*l.* 19*s.* with interest from the date of dishonour until judgment.
