

THIS PHOTOGRAPHIC
REPRINT EDITION IS PUBLISHED BY
DENNIS & CO., INC. (Publishers), Buffalo, N. Y., U. S. A.
BUTTERWORTH & CO. (Publishers) LTD., London, England

Reprinted by photolitho in the U.S.A.
by Cushing-Malloy, Inc., of Ann Arbor, Michigan

REPORTS

OF CASES RELATING TO

MARITIME LAW;

CONTAINING ALL THE

DECISIONS OF THE COURTS OF LAW AND EQUITY

IN

The United Kingdom.

---

EDITED BY

BUTLER ASPINALL, K.C.

---

VOL. IX., NEW SERIES.

From 1899 to 1904.

---

LONDON: HORACE COX, BREAM'S BUILDINGS, E.O.

1905.

REPORTS

MARITIME LAW;

DECISIONS OF THE COURTS OF LAW AND EQUITY

The British Kingdom

LONDON:

PRINTED BY HORACE COX, WINDSOR HOUSE, BREAM'S BUILDINGS, E.C.

01787

VOL. 17, NEW SERIES

1907

50/13 - K - 61

Case. 11/9 - K - 61

LONDON, HORACE COX, BREAM'S BUILDINGS, E.C.

INDEX

TO

NAMES OF THE CASES

REPORTED IN THIS VOLUME.

	PAGE		PAGE
Acanthus, The .....	276	Borthwick v. Elderslie Steamship Co...	513
Ajum, Goolam, Hossen, and Co. and others		Boulton and others v. Houlder Brothers ...	592
v. Union Marine Insurance Company ...	167	Brenda Steamship Company v. Green .....	55
Aktieselskabet Inglewood v. Millar's Karri		Bristol City, The .....	274
and Jarrah Forests Limited .....	411	British Marine Mutual Insurance Associa-
Algoma Central Railway v. The King .....	431	tion Limited v. Jenkins and others .....	26
Alma, The .....	375	Brunel, The .....	10
Anderson v. Rayners and others .....	385	Bucknall Brothers v. Tatem and Co. ....	127
Angel v. Merchants' Marine Insurance		Burger v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Assur-
Company Limited .....	406	ance Company Limited .....	85
Apollinaris Company Limited v. Nord-deutsche Insurance Company .....	526	C. Traae, for the owners of the Steamship Arbitration between C. Traae, for the owners		Nordraak , and Lennard and Sons of the Steamship Rickard Nordraak , and		Limited, Re an Arbitration between .....	553
Lennard and Sons Limited, Re an .....	553	Campania, The .....	151, 177
Arbitration between Goodbody and Co. and		Cardiff Steamship Company v. Jameson.....	367
Balfour, Williamson, and Co., Re an ...	69	Carisbrook Steamship Company v. London
Arbitration between Lockie and Craggs and		and Provincial Marine and General Insur-
Son, Re an .....	296	ance Company Limited .....	332
Arbitration between Margetts and Ocean		Cathay, The .....	35, 100
Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Re		Cawdor, The .....	19
an .....	217	Cayo Bonito, The .....	308, 445, 603
Arbitration between Newman and Dale		Ceylon Coaling Company v. Goodrich .....	606
Steamship Company and the British and		Challenge and Duc d'Aumale, The .....	497
South African Steamship Company, Re an	351	Cheapside, The .....	595
Arbitration between Tyrer and Co. and		Chittagong, The .....	252
Hessler and Co., Re an .....	186, 292	City of Lincoln, The .....	586
Argo, The .....	74	Civil Service Co-operative Society Limited
Arne, The .....	565	v. General Steam Navigation Company
Assunta, The .....	302	Limited .....	477
August Korff, The .....	428	Cordilleras, The .....	506
Auguste Legembre, The .....	279	Cornfoot v. Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation .....	418, 489
Baku Standard, The .....	197	Crimdon, The .....	104
Balmoral Steamship Co. v. Marten..139, 254,	321	Cunard Steamship Company Limited v.
Barque Quilpué Limited v. Brown .....	596	Marten .....	342, 452
Bernard Hall, The .....	300
Blackburn and another v. Liverpool, Brazil,		Dallington, The .....	377 and River Plate Steam Navigation Com-		Davidsson v. Hill and others .....	223
pany Limited .....	263	Deerhound, The .....	189
Board of Trade v. Sailing Ship Glen-		De Hart v. Compania Anonima de Seguros
park .....	413, 550	Aurora .....	345, 454

NAMES OF CASES.

	PAGE		PAGE
Devonian, The .....	158, 179	Lockie and Craggs and Son, Re an Arbitration between .....	296
Dobell and Co. v. Green and Co. ....	53	London Transport Company Limited v. Trechmann Brothers .....	518
Duc d'Aumale, The .....	359	Lyle Shipping Company v. Cardiff Corporation .....	23, 128
Duc d'Aumale, The, and The Challenge.	497, 502	MacIver and Co. Limited v. Tate Steamers Limited .....	362
Dunn and others v. Bucknall Brothers .....	336	Madeleine and André Theodore, The .....	508
Edgill (apps.) v. J. and G. Alward Limited (resps.) .....	341	Manar, The .....	420, 482
Elmville, The .....	606	Manchester Liners Limited v. British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company .....	266
Elswick Park, The .....	481	Margery, The .....	304
Emilie Galline, The .....	401	Margetts and Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Re an Arbitration between .....	217
Essarts v. Whinney .....	363	Marguerite Molinos, The .....	424
Farrell (app.) v. Sunderland Steamship Company Limited (resps.) .....	416	Marten and others v. Steamship-owners Underwriting Association .....	339
Forest Steamship Company v. Iberian Iron Ore Company .....	1	Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the City of Bristol v. Owners of the Steamship Glanmire .....	10
Forman and Co. Proprietary Limited v. Ship Liddesdale .....	45	Mediana, The .....	41
Forrest and Son Limited v. Aramayo .....	134	Mercedes de Larrinaga, The .....	571
Frankland, The .....	196	Mersey, The .....	273
Gannet, The .....	43	Milburn and Co. v. Jamaica Fruit Importing and Trading Company of London .....	122
Gedge and others v. Royal Exchange Assurance .....	57	Miller v. Borner and Co. ....	31
George Booker and Co. v. Pocklington Steamship Company Limited .....	22	Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company Limited .....	386
Germania, The .....	538	Minneapolis, The .....	270
Goodbody and Co. and Balfour, Williamson, and Co., Re an Arbitration between .....	69	Minnetonka, The .....	544
Grange and Co. v. Taylor .....	559	Modesta, Pineiro, and Co. v. Dupre and Co. ....	297
Greenock Steamship Company v. Maritime Insurance Company .....	364, 463	Montgomery and Co. v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Assurance Company Limited .....	141, 289
Hare, The .....	547	Mourne, The .....	155
Harland and Wolff Limited v. J. Burstall and Co. ....	184	Mystery, The .....	281
Harmonides, The .....	354	Newman and Dale Steamship Company Limited and the British and South American Steamship Company; Re an Arbitration between .....	351
Harrowing Steamship Company v. Toohy .....	91	Nickoll and Knight v. Ashton, Edridge, and Co. ....	94, 209
Hawthornbank, The .....	535	Normandy, The .....	568
Heather Bell, The .....	192, 206	Northern Trust Limited v. Manar Steamship Company .....	420
Herne Bay Steamboat Company v. Hutton .....	394, 472	Northern Trust Limited v. Strachan Brothers .....	482
Hogarth and Co. v. Walker .....	84	Oceanic, The .....	378
Holar, The .....	143	Oliver v. Nautilus Steamship Company Limited .....	436
Hulthen v. Stewart and Co. ....	285, 403	Ovingdean Grange, The .....	242, 295
Iredale and another v. China Traders Insurance Company .....	119	Owners of the City of Lincoln v. Smith .....	586
Isis Steamship Company v. Bahr, Behrend, and Ross .....	109	Owners of Steamship Kostroma v. Owners of Steamship Chittagong .....	252
John Holloway, The .....	36	P. and O. Steam Navigation Company v. The King .....	228
Jones Limited v. Green and Co. ....	600
Keslake (app.) v. Board of Trade (resps.) ..	491
König v. Brandt .....	199
Koning Willem I., The .....	425
Leitrim, The .....	317
Liddesdale, The .....	45

NAMES OF CASES.

	PAGE		PAGE
P. and O. Steam Navigation Company v. Kingston .....	433	Steamship Balmoral Company Limited v. Marten .....	139, 254, 321
Parsons v. New Zealand Shipping Company Limited .....	170, 33	Steel, Young, and Co. v. Grand Canary Coaling Company .....	584, 326
Pearl Moor, The .....	540	Stella, The .....	66
Philadelphian, The .....	38, 72	Sunlight, The .....	509
Poll v. Dambe .....	220	Sussex, The .....	578
Port Caledonia, The, and The Anna .....	479	Swift, The .....	244
Port Victor, The .....	163, 182	Swiftsure, The .....	65
Port Victoria, The .....	314	Tagart, Beaton, and Co. v. James Fisher and Sons; West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Company (third parties) .....	381
Price and another v. Maritime Insurance Company .....	213	Tagus, The .....	371
Price and Co. v. Union Lighterage Company Limited .....	398	Tergeste, The .....	356
Prince Llewellyn, The .....	505	Thalmann and others v. Texas Star Flour Mills .....	87
Prince of Wales Dry Dock Company (Swansea) Limited v. Fownes Forge and Engineering Company Limited .....	555	Torbryan, The .....	358, 450
Quilpué Limited, The Barque v. Brown .....	596	Tough (app.) v. Hopkins (resp.) .....	562
Rathbone Brothers and Co. v. MacIver, Sons, and Co. ....	467	Turnbull, Martin, and Co. v. Hull Underwriters' Association .....	93
Reed (app.) v. Goldsworthy (resp.) .....	529	Turner and another v. Haji Goolam Mahomed Azam .....	588
Repetto v. Millar's Karri and Jarrah Forests Limited .....	215	Turner, Brightman, and Co. v. Bannatyne and Sons .....	495
Rhein, The .....	278	Turret Court, The .....	162
Rodney, The .....	39	Tyrer and Co. and Hessler and Co., Re an Arbitration between .....	186, 292
Romance, The .....	149	Upperton and Wife v. Union Castle Mail Steamship Company Limited .....	475
Rondane, The .....	106	Uskmoor, The .....	316
Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company .....	347, 458	Veritas, The .....	237
Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation v. Sjöforsakrings Aktiebolaget Vega .....	233, 329	Wastwater Steamship Company Limited v. T. B. Neale and Co. ....	282
Ruabon Steamship Company v. London Assurance .....	2	Weir and Co. v. Girvin and Co. ....	7
Ruby, The .....	146	Weir and Co. v. Union Steamship Company .....	13, 111
Sanspareil, The .....	59, 78	Western Assurance Company of Toronto v. Poole .....	390
Santiago, The .....	147	Whitlieburn, The .....	154
Sarah Hudson and Henry Humphrey v. Owners of Barque Swiftsure .....	65	Williams and others v. Canton Insurance Office .....	247
Saxon Steamship Company v. Union Steamship Company .....	114	Wilson and others v. Salamandra Assurance Company of St. Petersburg .....	370
Scotia, The .....	485	Winkfield, The .....	259
Sea Insurance Company v. Carr .....	138	Young v. Steamship Scotia .....	485
Searle v. Lund .....	419, 557
Shillito v. Biggart and another .....	396
Sleigh v. Tyser .....	97
Snark, The .....	50

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

	PAGE
ABANDONMENT.
See Marine Insurance , No. 7.
ACCIDENT.
See Carriage of Goods , No. 30.
ACTION OF RESTRAINT.
1. Safe return—Named port—Forfeiture of bond. —Where, in an action of restraint, a bond was given for the safe return of the vessel to a named port and the vessel was not, at the conclusion of the voyage, brought back to the named port, the forfeiture of the bond (affirming the order of Barnes, J.) was ordered. (Ct. of App.) The Cawdor .....	19
2. Safe return—Recognisance. — Semble , a bond for safe return in an action of restraint is in the nature of a recognisance given to the court, and the court has jurisdiction, subject to the terms of the bond, to make such order as may adequately protect the interests of the plaintiffs. (Ct. of App.) The Cawdor .....	19
ADMIRALTY COURT ACT.
See Damage , Nos. 1, 2, 4.
ADVANCE FREIGHT.
See Carriage of Goods , No. 1— Charter-party , Nos. 1, 13.
ANCHOR.
See Collision , Nos. 4, 17, 21, 22, 42, 46— Damage , No. 1.
ANCHOR LIGHT.
See Collision , Nos. 17, 21, 22, 42, 46.
APPEAL.
See Practice , No. 2.
APPORTIONMENT.
See Salvage , No. 4.
ARREST.
See Collision , No. 18— Practice , Nos. 7, 12— Salvage , No. 5.
AUSTRALIAN CUSTOMS ACT.
See Customs Acts , No. 2.
AVERAGE ADJUSTERS.
See General Average , No. 6.
BAIL BOND.
See Action of Restraint .
BAILEE.
See Bailor and Bailee .

	PAGE
BAILOR AND BAILEE.
Collision—Bailee in possession—Liability of Bailee—Right to sue. —In an action against a wrongdoer for the loss of goods caused by his negligence, a bailee in possession can recover the value of the goods lost, although he would have had a good defence to an action by the bailor for damages for the loss of the goods bailed. Claridge v. South Staffordshire Tramway Company (66 L. T. Rep. 655; (1892) 1 Q. B. 422) overruled. (Ct. of App.) The Winkfield ...	259
See Collision , No. 1.
BALLAST.
See Charter-party , No. 5.
BANKRUPTCY ACT.
See Mortgagor and Mortgagee , No. 2
BILL OF EXCHANGE.
See Masters' Wages and Disbursements , No. 1.
BILL OF LADING.
See Carriage of Goods , Nos. 2, 3, 4, 7, 14 to 17, 21, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29— Sale of Cargo , No. 5.
BILLS OF LADING ACT.
See Carriage of Goods , Nos. 2, 3, 4.
BILL OF SALE.
See Sale of Ship .
BOARD OF TRADE SURVEYOR.
See Limitation of Liability , No. 2.
BOTH TO BLAME.
See Collision , Nos. 10, 20, 49.
BRISTOL WHARFAGE ACT, 1807.
See Compulsory Pilotage , No. 1.
CANCELLATION DATE.
See Charter-party , Nos. 4, 10.
CARRIAGE OF GOODS.
1. Advance freight—Fire—Excepted perils. —By a charter-party the charterers agreed to load a ship with a full and complete cargo for carriage from the Tyne to San Francisco. Freight was to be paid at a certain rate per ton on the quantity to be delivered to the consignees; and was to be paid two-thirds in cash three days after sailing, ship lost or not lost, the balance on unloading and right delivery of the cargo. Fire was a peril mutually excepted. Part of the cargo after being loaded was destroyed by fire before the ship sailed. The charterers subsequently loaded more cargo of sufficient amount, taking the amount destroyed into con-

- | PAGE   | PAGE |
|--|------|
| sideration, to fill up the carrying space of the vessel. Three days after sailing the owners claimed advance freight on two-thirds of a full cargo. Held (affirming the judgment of Lord Russell, C.J.) that the owners were not entitled to advance freight on the part of the cargo which had been destroyed by fire. (Ct. of App.) Weir and Co. v. Girvin and Co. ..... 7   |      |
| 2. Bills of Lading Act—Marks on cargo.—Per Collins and Romer, L.J.J., shipowners are not estopped by sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 from showing that cargo they tender to the consignee is identical with the cargo shipped merely because certain marks and numbers in the margin of the bill of lading do not correspond with the marks and numbers on the cargo, if such marks and numbers do not effect or denote the nature, quality, or commercial value of the goods. (Ct. of App. affirming Kennedy, J.) Parsons v. New Zealand Shipping Company Limited ..... 33, 170  |      |
| 3. Bills of Lading Act—Correct delivery.—Per A. L. Smith, M.R., a clause in a bill of lading that the ship is not to be responsible for correct delivery unless each package is correctly marked before shipment with a mark, number, and address, relieves shipowners from liability where certain numbers in the bill of lading do not correspond with the numbers put on the cargo by the shippers. (Ct. of App.) Parsons v. New Zealand Shipping Company ..... 170  |      |
| 4. Bills of Lading Act—Marks.—Sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 does not make the bill of lading conclusive as to the statement of marks upon the goods shipped where those marks do not affect or denote substance, quality, or commercial value. (Kennedy, J.) Parsons v. New Zealand Shipping Company Limited ... 33   |      |
| 5. Certificate of clearance—Foreign law—Loading.—Wheat was sold for shipment at Galveston, in the United States, by a specified vessel for Havre, "clearance" to be not later than the 31st May. A certificate of clearance was obtained on the 28th May. Part only of the cargo was then on board, the rest being alongside ready to be loaded. The loading was not completed until 2nd June, when the vessel sailed. By the statute of the United States the master must furnish a manifest of the cargo "on board, whereupon the collector shall grant a clearance." It was, however, customary to grant a clearance before the completion of loading, and such a clearance was valid and effective for all purposes, and entitled the vessel to sail immediately. Held (affirming the judgment of Bigham, J.), that the vessel had obtained a "clearance" within the meaning of the contract, when the certificate of clearance was granted. (Ct. of App.) Thalmann and others v. Texas Star Flour Mills ..... 87   |      |
| 6. Colliery guarantee—Working days—Demurrage—Strike.—Where by a charter-party which incorporated a "colliery guarantee" the charterers agreed to load a ship with coal "in twelve clear working days, Sundays and holidays excepted," it was held (reversing the judgment of the court below) that, in the absence of evidence of any special meaning attaching to the words "working days," they meant days on which the collieries usually worked, not days on which they actually worked, and that the shipowners were entitled to demurrage in respect of a delay in the loading caused by a strike at the collieries. (H. of L.) Saxon Steamship Company v. Union Steamship Company ..... 114  |      |
| 7. Custom—Bill of lading.—Where bills of lading provided that certain currants were "to be delivered from the ship's deck when the ship's responsibility shall cease . . . Simultaneously with the ship being ready to unload the said goods . . . the consignee is hereby bound to be ready to receive the goods from   |      |
| the ship's side, and in default thereof the master of the agent of the ship is authorised" to enter, land, and warehouse them at the expense of the consignee. It was held, that a custom, that in the discharge of dried fruit cargoes the charges for trucking from the shed and piling in the transit-shed are to be paid for by the ship, was good, as it did not contradict the bills of lading, but merely annexed an incident to them. (Q. B. Div.) Cardiff Steamship Company Limited v. Jameson ..... 367  |      |
| 8. Custom—Demurrage—Named dock.—Where by charter-party it was agreed that a steamer should proceed to a named port, and there deliver a cargo of timber "to be discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can deliver . . . according to the custom of the port," with an exception in respect of delay caused by a strike or lock-out, and the ship, having arrived at the port, and being ready to deliver the cargo, was delayed by the crowded state of the dock to which she was ordered, and there was evidence that she could not have been discharged more quickly, under the circumstances, elsewhere in the port, and that the consignees had used all reasonable means to procure the discharge, it was held (affirming the judgment of the court below) that they had performed their obligation under the charter-party, and were not liable for demurrage, as they were only bound to use all reasonable means to procure the discharge as were possible in the circumstances. (H. of L.) Hulthen v. Stewart and Co. ..... 285, 403 |      |
| 9. Custom—Lay days—Commencement of.—By a charter-party a ship was to proceed to B. or so near thereto as she could safely get, and there load as customary, always afloat, at such wharf, jetty, or anchorage as the charterers' agent might direct, a certain cargo. Owing to her draught the ship could not have loaded fully at the berth at the jetty, but according to the custom of the port she would be moved when partly loaded from the jetty to an anchorage to complete loading. Held, that the lay days did not begin to run until the ship was at the jetty or anchorage the charterers' agent directed, and that the fact that she could not fully load there made no difference and did not prevent the charterers requiring her to come to the jetty and claiming that the lay days did not commence until she was at the jetty. (Kennedy, J.) Aktieselskabet Inglewood v. Millar's Karri and Jarrah Forests Limited ..... 411   |      |
| 10. Custom—Port of discharge—Demurrage.—A charter-party, by which a steamer was to load a cargo of timber and therewith to proceed to the Surrey Commercial Docks, London, and deliver the same, contained a clause that the cargo was "to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterer's risk and expense, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding." Held, that by this clause the custom of the port of London as to the discharge of timber cargoes was excluded, and therefore it was the duty of the charterer to be ready to receive the cargo at the ship's rail. (Ct. of App.) Brenda Steamship Company Limited v. Green ..... 55   |      |
| 11. Custom—Reasonable dispatch—Demurrage.—Where a charterer undertakes to discharge a ship "with all reasonable despatch as customary," he is not liable for delay if he has reasonably done his best to procure the appliances customarily used at the port of discharge and used them with proper dispatch. (Ct. of App. affirming Bigham, J.) Lyle Shipping Company v. Cardiff Corporation ..... 23, 128   |      |
| 12. Demurrage—Fire—Excepted perils—Mutual exceptions.—A charter-party made between the owners of a ship and the charterers provided that a certain number of days should be allowed  |      |

for loading and unloading the cargo, after which demurrage was to be paid at a specified rate, and it also contained the usual exception clause, with, among others, the exception of fire. Held, on the authority of Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation (2 Com. Cas. 50), that the exceptions applied for the benefit of the charterers as well as for the benefit of the shipowners, and that the charterers were by the exception of fire excused from paying demurrage in respect of a necessary delay occasioned by a fire breaking out in the cargo while the cargo was being discharged. (Bigham, J.) Re an Arbitration between Newman and Dale Steamship Company and The British and South American Steamship Company ..... 351

13. Demurrage—Lay days—Commencement of—Arrived ship.—By a charter-party it was provided that a ship should proceed to Santander, excluding San Salvador old tip "to a loading place as ordered" and there take on board a cargo. Held, that the ship could not be taken as an arrived ship for the purpose of the commencement of the lay days until she had arrived at the loading place as ordered, and that arrival at Santander was not sufficient. (Kennedy, J.) Modesta, Pineiro, and Co. v. Dupre and Co. ..... 297

14. Excepted perils—Heat—Owners' negligence.—The plaintiffs were indorsees of bills of lading under which a cargo of maize, barley, linseed, oats, and wheat was shipped on the defendants' steamship. By the bills of lading it was provided in clause 2 that "the . . . owners shall not be responsible for loss, damage, or injury arising from sweating . . . or consequences arising therefrom . . . or heat"; and in clause 3 that "the . . . owners shall not be responsible for any loss or injury to the said goods occurring from any of the causes above mentioned, or from any loss or injury arising from the perils of the seas . . . whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned . . . be occasioned by any act or omission, negligence, default . . . of stevedores . . . or other persons in the service of the shipowners . . ." On the margin of the bills of lading under which the maize was shipped was stamped: "In no case is the steamship to be held liable for heating or any other damage occurring to the within mentioned goods." Part of the maize became heated on the voyage, and the other cargo was damaged through improper stowage. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover damages: Held, that the defendants were liable as the exemption of negligence in clause 3 did not refer to the matters in clause 2, and that the word "heat" referred to heat arising from some extraneous cause. Held, further, that if the owners desired to relieve themselves from liability for the negligence of their own servants there should have been express words to that effect, and that the clause in the margin did not apply in the case of negligence. (Adm. Div.) The Pearlmoor ..... 540

15. Excepted perils—Negligence of engineer—Perils of the sea.—A cargo of sugar was shipped under a bill of lading which contained an exception of "any loss or damage resulting from any peril of the seas, rivers, or navigation of whatever nature or kind soever (whether arising from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariner, engineers, or others of the crew, or otherwise, howsoever)." During the voyage the engineer, intending to fill a ballast tank with sea water to be used for the boilers in discharging the cargo, opened the sea-cock, and he then, instead of opening the valve of the ballast tank, by mistake opened the valve of a tank in which part of the sugar was stored, with the result that the sea water flowed into the tank where the sugar was, and the sugar was damaged. Held, that the damage was caused by a peril of the seas within the meaning of the exception in the bill of lading, and that the shipowners were protected by the exception and were not liable for the damage. (Walton, J.) Blackburn and another v. Liverpool, Brazil, and River Plate Steam Navigation Company ..... 263

16. Harter Act—Management of ship—Damage to cargo.—Goods were shipped under a bill of lading, which by incorporating the Harter Act exempted the shipowner from liability for "damage or loss resulting from fault or errors in navigation, or in the management of the ship." Owing to one of the crew negligently making a hole in a drainage pipe leading from the fore-castle through the No. 1 hold to the bilge, in order to clear the fore-castle of water which had been taken on board during heavy weather, and with which the fore-castle was flooded, water found its way to the cargo in the No. 1 hold, whereby that cargo was damaged. Held (reversing the decision of the County Court judge) that the act which caused the damage was done in the management of the ship, and that therefore the shipowner was exempt from liability. (Adm. Div.) The Rodney ..... 39

17. Harter Act—Refrigerating apparatus—"Management of vessel."—By sect. 3 of the Harter Act (U.S.A.) 1893, which was incorporated in certain bills of lading under which butter was shipped at New York for carriage to London, if the owner of any vessel transporting merchandise shall exercise due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy and properly manned and equipped, then the owner is not to be held responsible for damage or loss "resulting from faults or errors in navigation, or in the management of the said vessel." Owing to the negligence of the persons in charge of the refrigerating apparatus with which the ship was fitted, the butter was damaged. Held, that the phrase "faults or errors in . . . the management of the said vessel" meant in the management of the said vessel quod vessel; that the refrigerating apparatus not having been introduced into the vessel for the special purpose of the butter, but for the purpose of cooling the vessel and to be used for its provisions available for consumption during the voyage, management of the refrigerating apparatus was, in the particular circumstances, management of the vessel; and that, the damage to the butter having resulted from the negligence of the crew in working this part of the vessel, the shipowners were relieved from liability in respect of such damage by virtue of sect. 3 of the Harter Act. (Ct. of App. affirming Kennedy, J.) Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company ..... 347, 458

18. Lien—Detention of ship.—A shipowner who has a lien on the cargo for freight or demurrage, when he has the opportunity of unloading the cargo, cannot keep the cargo on the ship and then claim for the detention of the ship. (Kennedy, J.) Modesta, Pineiro, and Co. v. Dupre and Co. ..... 297

19. Lien—Sub-freights.—A lien on sub-freights given in a time charter-party to a shipowner as security for the payment to him of the hire of the vessel, gives the shipowner a right to stop sub-freights only before such sub-freights have been paid to the time charterer or his agent; but when once sub-freight has been paid as freight to the charterer or his agent, the shipowner's lien or right to stop the freight is gone, and he cannot follow such freight after it has been paid. (Ct. of App.) Tagart, Beaton, and Co. v. James Fisher and Sons, West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Company Limited, third parties ..... 381

20. Loss of market—Measure of damages—Carriage by sea.—There is no absolute rule of law

PAGE	PAGE
that damages for loss of market cannot be recovered for delay in the carriage of goods by sea. Whenever the circumstances admit of calculations as to the time of arrival and the probable fluctuations of the market being made with the same degree of reasonable certainty in the case of carriage by sea as in the case of carriage by land, the damages for delay are to be calculated upon the same principles in both cases. (Ct. of App.) Dunn and others v. Bucknall Brothers and others .....	336
21. "Merchant's risk"—Remoteness of damage—Over-carriage of cargo.—A bill of lading contained the following clause: "If in the opinion of the master discharge cannot be effected without undue detention, the steamer shall have liberty to over-carry the cargo to London at merchant's risk, and deliver there to consignees or their assigns." The ship was delayed at a port of call in the course of her voyage by the negligence of the shipowner's agents, with the result that, on her arrival at the port where the goods were to be discharged, the master found that the discharge could not be effected without undue detention, and he therefore over-carried the goods to London. In an action by the consignee to recover damages for the over-carriage of the goods: Held, affirming the decision of Kennedy, J. (88 L. T. Rep. 865; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 419), that the damage was not so remote from the negligence of the shipowner's agents as to disentitle the consignee from succeeding in the action. (Ct. of App.) Searle v. Lund .....	419, 557
22. Mersey Docks Act —Discharge of cargo—Porterage.—Expenses incurred at Liverpool in the discharge of dried fruit cargoes for trucking from the shed and piling in the transit shed are not included in the all-round charge made by the master porters under the Mersey Docks Acts and the bye-laws of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. (Q. B. Div.) Cardiff Steamship Company v. Jameson .....	367
23. Principal and agent —Bill of lading—Right to sue.—The owners of the W. chartered her to G. under a charter-party, which provided that the master should sign bills of lading as presented, and that the charterers' liability should cease on shipment of the cargo, and gave the shipowners a lien for freight, dead freight, and demurrage. G. rechartered the vessel to M. L. under a charter-party which contained provisions similar to the original charter-party. M. L., who had no notice of the original charter-party, shipped a cargo in pursuance of the second charter-party, and bills of lading were signed by the master as presented by which the cargo was to be delivered to the order or assigns of the shippers on payment of freight without recourse to shippers as per the second charter-party. Held, that the bills of lading were signed by the master as agent of the shipowners, and that in the circumstances the shipowners were entitled to sue the indorsees of the bills of lading for the freight due thereon and demurrage. (Adm. Div.) Wastwater Steamship Company Limited v. T. B. Neale and Co. .....	282
24. Restraint of princes —Enemy—Knowledge of shipper.—The carriage by a shipowner of goods destined for an alien enemy, without the knowledge and consent of the shipper of other goods on the same vessel, is a breach of duty by the shipowner towards the shipper of the other goods, and he is liable for delay in the delivery of those other goods occasioned by the seizure and detention of the ship by reason of the fact that the enemy's goods were on board, and he is not excused by an exception in the bill of lading of loss or damage occasioned by restraint of princes. (Ct. of App.) Dunn and others v. Bucknall Brothers and others .....	336
25. Seaworthiness —Coal—Commencement of voyage.—Where a charter-party for a voyage from the United Kingdom to the River Plate
and back provided that the charterers should provide and pay for all the coal, and the captain was to be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, and other arrangements, it was held, affirming the decision of Kennedy, J., that there was nothing in the charter-party to relieve the shipowners from their duty of seeing that the steamer was seaworthy as regards her supply of coals on board at the time of leaving the River Plate on her return voyage. (Ct. of App.) MacIver and Co. Limited v. Tate Steamers Limited .....	362
26. Seaworthiness —Damage to cargo—Perils of the sea—Fitness of ship.—Bills of lading provided that certain sheepskins should be delivered in good order and condition with several exceptions, amongst which were loss or damage resulting from the consequence of any injury to or defect in hull, tackle, or machinery, or their appurtenances, however such defect or injury might be caused, and notwithstanding that the same might have existed at or at any time before loading or sailing of the vessel, and whether the loss or injury arising therefrom was occasioned by the negligence of the owners, master, officers, or crew, and whether before or after or during the voyage, or for whose acts the shipowner would otherwise be liable, or by unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or at any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means had been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness. Some of the sheepskins were damaged by fresh water which escaped from a pipe which was broken when they were put on board. It was admitted that the vessel was not fit to receive cargo at the time when it was loaded, and that reasonable means had not been taken to provide against such unfitness. Held, that "unseaworthiness" in this bill of lading included unfitness to receive the cargo, and was not limited to the unfitness of the ship to meet the perils of the sea; and, the shipowners not having taken all reasonable means to provide against such unseaworthiness, they were liable for the damage. (Ct. of App. reversing Wills, J.) Rathbone Brothers and Co. v. MacIver, Sons, and Co. .....	467
27. Seaworthiness —Fitness to carry cargo—Perils of the sea.— Prima facie , the warranty of seaworthiness in a bill of lading includes fitness of the ship to carry the cargo as well as fitness to encounter the dangers of navigation. (Ct. of App.) Rathbone, Brothers, and Co. v. MacIver, Sons, and Co. .....	467
28. Seaworthiness —Meat cargo.—Frozen meat was shipped on a steamer under a bill of lading, which contained two clauses relating to exceptions. The first clause, printed in Roman type, provided: "Neither the ship nor her owners shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under this bill of lading, nor for any loss or damage thereto whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any cause whatsoever, whether existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not." The second clause, printed in small italics, provided: "The act of God . . . and loss or damage resulting therefrom or from any of the following causes or perils are excepted—viz. . . . or from any accidents to or defects, latent or otherwise, in hull . . . or otherwise (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded or the commencement of the voyage) . . . if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness." The vessel, being tainted with carbolic acid, was not in a fit condition to carry the meat when it was shipped, and the meat was thereby damaged during the voyage. If reasonable care had been taken to

- |  | PAGE     | PAGE |
|--|----------|------|
| cleanse the ship before the meat was shipped the damage would not have occurred. Held (reversing the judgment of Walton, J.), that, reading the two clauses together, the ship-owner was not exempted from liability for the damage caused by the unfit condition of the vessel. (Ct. of App.) Borthwick v. Elderslie Steamship Company .....   | 513      |      |
| 29. Short delivery—Bulk cargo—Bill of lading quantity. —Bills of lading for undivided portions of a bulk cargo of grain contained the following clause and note in margin: "If the parcel herein signed for constitutes part of a larger bulk shipped without separation into parcels, as per bills of lading, each bill of lading shall bear its due proportion of shortage or damage and (or) sweepings, if any." "Part of a parcel, shipped without separation. Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of shortage and damage, if any." By an error in apportioning damaged grain one consignee received a full consignment of sound grain. One of the other consignees, refusing to accept more than his proportionate share of damaged grain, received a consignment which was 108 quarters short. Held, in an action for short delivery, that the error was caused by the consignees' agents, and that the clause in the bills of lading cast no duty on the shipowner to apportion the good and unsound grain. (Bigham, J.) Grange and Co. v. Taylor .....  | 559      |      |
| 30. Stevedores—Negligence—Excepted perils. —Where goods were shipped under a charter-party, a clause of which protected the shipowners from liability for "the act of God . . . and all other accidents excepted, even though caused by negligence, fault, or error of judgment on the part of the pilot, captain, sailors, or other servants of the owners in the management or navigation of the vessel, or otherwise," it was held (affirming the judgment of Phillimore, J.), that the shipowners were not liable for damage done to the goods due to the negligence of the stevedores by the improper use of hooks and slings in the discharge of the cargo, as such loss was an "accident" within the meaning of the clause. (Ct. of App.) The Torbryan .....  | 358, 450 |      |
| 31. Strike—Loading—Stoppage. —By a charter-party it was agreed that a ship of the appellants should load a cargo of coal for the charterers "to be loaded in 140 running hours, commencing when written notice is given of steamer being completely discharged of inward cargo and ballast in all her holds, and ready to load." The charter-party also provided that in the event of a stoppage caused by a strike "continuing for a period of six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load, this charter shall become null and void, provided, however, that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the steamer previous to such stoppage." Due notice was given that the ship was ready to load, and, after the expiration of the time allowed for loading, a stoppage caused by a strike commenced, and continued for six days. No cargo had been shipped, and the charterers gave notice that the charter-party was cancelled. Held, that the charter-party contemplated a stoppage in existence at the beginning of the loading time, and that the charterers were not entitled to cancel the charter on the occurrence of a stoppage at a later period. Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed. (H. of L.) Steel, Young, and Co. v. Grand Canary Coaling Company .....   | 326, 584 |      |
| 22. Strike—Port of loading—Demurrage—Selection of colliery. —By a charter-party it was provided that the ship should proceed to Cardiff and there load "a cargo of steam coal as ordered by charterers," which the charterers bound themselves to ship "except in the event of strike of shippers' pitmen," the vessel to be loaded as customary, "but subject in all respects to the colliery guarantee in [ ] colliery working days as may be arranged." The charterers bought a cargo of steam coal from a colliery; subsequently a strike took place which extended to 85 per cent. of the collieries in South Wales including the said colliery. While the strike still continued the charterers obtained from the said colliery, and sent to the ship-owners the usual guarantee by which the colliery proprietors undertook to load the ship in twenty days after she should be ready to receive cargo, subject to the usual exception as to strikes. The shipowners objected to this guarantee because the colliery was on strike, and required the ship to be loaded from a colliery which was working. The ship then went to Cardiff and, owing to the continuance of the strike, was delayed for three months. The shipowners claimed damages for the delay from the charterers. Held (affirming the judgment of Bigham, J.), that the charterers were entitled to select the colliery which they did in fact select, although it was on strike, and that they were not liable for the delay of the ship. (Ct. of App.) Dobell and Co. v. Green and Co. ..... | 53       |      |
| 33. Working hours—Time of loading—Demurrage. —The appellant shipowners agreed by charter-party to provide the respondents with ships for the carriage of 50,000 tons of iron ore during a period of twelve months. The charter-party contained a clause as follows: "Charterers or their agents to be allowed 350 tons per working day of twenty-four hours, weather permitting (Sundays and holidays excepted), for loading and discharging . . . to count from 6 a.m. of the day following the day when steamer is reported, unless she be reported before noon. . . . Steamer to work at night if required, also on Sundays and holidays, such time not to count as lay days unless used." Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the charterers were entitled to twenty-four working hours in which to load or discharge each 350 tons, and such hours need not be continuous. (H. of L.) Forest Steamship Company v. Iberian Iron Ore Company .....   | 1        |      |
| See Marine Insurance, No. 1—Practice, No. 11.   |          |      |
| CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS.   |          |      |
| 1. Free pass—Conditions—Negligence—Loss of life and luggage. —A husband and wife were travelling on the defendants' steamship with a free pass. The steamship was wrecked by the negligence of her master and crew, and the husband was drowned, and both his and his wife's luggage was lost. Upon the free pass was printed a condition exonerating the defendants from "any injury, delay, loss, or damage, however caused." The defendants, who were a railway company, obtained a decree of limitation of liability, and paid the limit of their liability into court. The wife and children brought a claim under Lord Campbell's Act for the loss of their husband and father. The registrar dismissed the claims, holding that the condition upon the free pass precluded recovery. On appeal to the court: Held (affirming the registrar), that the condition covered negligence, and was applicable both to sea and land transit. Held, further, that a claim by the wife for the loss of her property, and, as his personal representative, for the loss of her husband's property, was likewise barred by the condition; and that, in the circumstances, no statute prevented the defendant railway company relieving themselves from liability for negligence. (Adm. Div.) The Stella .....   | 66       |      |
| 2. Free pass—Conditions—Negligence—Loss of Life and luggage. —Sect. 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1868, which provides that any conditions in through booking contracts exempt-  |          |      |

- |  | PAGE | PAGE    |
|--|------|---------|
| ing a railway company from liability for loss or damage shall not have effect unless they are published in a conspicuous manner in the company's office, has no application to a case where a passenger is travelling with a free pass. (Adm. Div.) The Stella .....  | 66   |         |
| 3. Luggage—Conditions on ticket—Seaworthiness. —A steamship company received passengers on board a vessel at an intermediate port on her homeward voyage. The ticket issued by the company contained a condition exempting them from liability for damage to passengers' luggage although the damage be caused by negligence or default of the company's servants, or by unseaworthiness or unfitness of the ship, provided that reasonable diligence had been used by the company to render the ship at starting seaworthy and fit for the voyage. In consequence of the crowded state of the vessel, the only available place for stowing the passengers' luggage was a lavatory, and their luggage was accordingly put in there and the lavatory locked. This lavatory was separated from an adjoining lavatory by a bulkhead which did not quite come down to the floor. A water-closet in the adjoining lavatory became stopped up and overflowed. The overflow, running underneath the bulkhead into the lavatory in which the passengers' luggage was stowed, damaged the luggage. In an action by the passengers against the company claiming damages for injury to the luggage, Bigham, J. at the trial found that the damage was not caused by negligence of the company's servants, but by unseaworthiness or unfitness of the ship, and that reasonable diligence had not been used by the company to render the ship at starting seaworthy and fit for the voyage, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs. On appeal: Held (affirming Bigham, J.), that the ship was not provided with a fit and proper place for the plaintiffs' luggage, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment. (Ct. of App.) Upperton and Wife v. Union Castle Mail Steamship Company Limited ..... | 475  |         |
| CAVEAT WARRANT.  |      |         |
| See Practice , No. 12.  |      |         |
| CHARTER-PARTY.   |      |         |
| 1. Advance freight—Estoppel—Payment of hire—Waiver. —By a charter-party a ship was let for nine months, the charterers to pay for the hire of the ship at an agreed rate, fortnightly in advance, and in default of such payment the owners to have the faculty of withdrawing the ship from the service of the charterers. After the charterers had had the use of the ship for two months they made default in making the fortnightly payment due on the 21st June. The ship was then on a voyage to S., where she arrived on the 25th, and while there the captain telegraphed to H. to order the cargo to be ready. After lying two days at S. the ship started on the 27th for H. On the 28th the owners gave notice to the charterers of their withdrawal of the ship by reason of the charterers' default in the payment due on the 21st. Held, reversing the judgment of the King's Bench Division (84 L. T. Rep. 653; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 186), that upon these facts there was no evidence of any waiver by the shipowners of their right to withdraw the vessel, nor of any conduct on their part estopping them from insisting on their right. (Ct. of App.) Re an Arbitration between Tyrer and Co. and Hessler and Co. .....  | 186, | 292     |
| 2. Cargo—Breach of charter-party. —Where by a charter-party made between the appellants and the respondents it was agreed that the respondents should "load a full and complete cargo of wet woodpulp" on board the appellants' ship, at an agreed rate of freight, the cargo to be loaded in mid-winter at a port where severe frosts were probable, and it was delivered frozen hard, in consequence of which the ship was only able to load a much smaller quantity than if it had been unfrozen and compressible, it was held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the charterers had not, under the circumstances, broken their contract to load a full and complete cargo. (H. of L.) Iais Steamship Company v. Bahr, Behrend, and Ross .....   |      | 109     |
| 3. Cargo—Capacity of ship. —By a charter-party the charterers were to load "a cargo of ore, say about 2800 tons." The carrying capacity of the ship was 2880 tons, and the charterers actually loaded 2840 tons, or forty tons more than the stipulated quantity of 2800 tons. Held, that the charterers were not bound to load 3 per cent. more than the 2800 tons provided the ship could carry so much, and that in loading 2840 tons they had performed their obligation under the charter-party to load "a cargo, say about 2800 tons." (Q. B. Div.) Miller v. Borner and Co. .....   |      | 31      |
| 4. "Colliery turn"—Cancelling date—Demurrage. —A sailing ship was chartered to load at N. a "cargo of coals as ordered by the charterers," and they afterwards directed that it should be loaded with coal from W. colliery. No time for loading was fixed. At the port of N. it was necessary to obtain a loading order from the colliery before a loading berth was allotted. The W. Colliery had a small output, and the coal was in great demand. These facts were known to the parties at the time of the contract. In consequence of the number of ships loading from W. Colliery the ship did not obtain a loading berth for a long time, and, in addition to being delayed at N., lost a charter-party elsewhere, as she did not arrive before the cancelling date. The owners brought an action to recover damages for the loss thus occasioned to them. Held, that the charterers were not bound to have a cargo of coal ready for loading immediately on the arrival of the ship; that the vessel obtained a loading order in due course in her colliery turn and there was no delay on the part of the charterers, and therefore the cargo was provided within a reasonable time; that the option to select the particular coal was an option for the benefit of the charterers, who were not bound, in exercising it, to consider the benefit or otherwise of the shipowners; and therefore, all parties being acquainted with the practice at the port and the charterers having acted reasonably, they were not liable for the delay. (Ct. of App.) Jones Limited v. Green and Co. .....  |      | 600     |
| 5. Demise—Ballast—Obligation of shipowner. —Where by a charter-party which did not amount to a demise or parting with the possession of the ship by the owners, a ship was, in consideration of a certain sum per month, placed at the disposal of the charterers to be employed in the conveyance of lawful merchandise and (or) passengers between certain ports, and it was stated that she was let for the sole use and benefit of the charterers from a specified date on which she was to be placed "with clear holds" at the disposal of the charterers, they having the "whole reach or burthen" of the vessel, proper and sufficient room being reserved to the owners for the officers, crew, tackle, furniture, stores, and provisions, it was held, in an action to determine at whose cost ballast was to be supplied, that the terms of the charter-party did not rebut the ordinary implication by which the obligation of supplying such ballast as may be necessary for the safe navigation of the ship rests with the owner. (H. of L.) Weir and Co. v. Union Steamship Company .....  |      | 13, 111 |
| 6. Demurrage—Consignee—Discharge. —A vessel was chartered to proceed to the S. dock, Mary-  |      |         |

- |  | PAGE | PAGE |
|--|------|------|
| port, and there unload her cargo. Owing to the fact that the consignee, who had bought the cargo from the charterers, had other vessels discharging in the dock at the time of her arrival, she was unable to get a berth and unload within the time agreed by the charter-party. Held, that the charterers were not responsible for the delay. (Adm. Div.) The Deerhound .....   | 189  |      |
| 7. Demurrage—Lay days—Commencement of. —If a ship is prevented from going to the unloading place which the charterer has a right to name by obstacles caused by the charterer or in consequence of the engagements of the charterer, the lay days commence to count as soon as the ship is ready to load and would but for such obstacles or engagements begin to load at such place. (Kennedy, J.) Aktieselskabet Ingledwood v. Millar's Karri and Jarrah Forests Limited .....   | 411  |      |
| 8. Discharge of cargo—Option to lighter—Demurrage. —Where goods were shipped under a bill of lading which provided: "The goods to be taken from the ship by the consignees (at their expense) immediately after arrival, and as fast as steamer can deliver or the same will be transhipped into lighters, or landed, or warehoused at the expense and risk of the proprietors of the such goods," and on arrival of the vessel the consignees were dilatory in taking delivery, and the master did not exercise his option of landing or lightening the goods. In an action by the charterers against the consignees for damages for detention of the vessel, it was held that the plaintiffs were not deprived of their remedy because the master had not exercised his option as to landing or lightening the goods, and were entitled to recover. (Adm. Div.) The Arne .....   | 565  |      |
| 9. Freight—Jettison—Bill of lading. —By a charter-party it was agreed that a ship was to load at Fiume a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, and therewith proceed to Boston and there deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading, on being paid freight at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton gross weight shipped, payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash; charterers' liability to cease when cargo was shipped and bills of lading signed, provided all the conditions called for in the charter had been fulfilled, but vessel to have a lien for freight, dead freight, and demurrage; the master to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight as presented, without prejudice or reference to the charter, any difference between the charter-party and the bills of lading freight to be settled at Fiume on clearance of vessel, if required by master. The charterers had previously agreed with an American company at Boston to ship by the vessel named in the charter-party, a cargo of sugar in bags from Fiume to Boston at 10s. per ton. On the vessel being loaded, the difference between the charter-party and the bills of lading freight—i.e., 6d. per ton—was paid, and bills of lading were signed. In the course of the voyage the vessel went aground and part of the cargo was jettisoned. On the arrival of the vessel the remainder of the cargo was delivered, and the consignees thereupon paid to the shipowners the bill of lading freight payable on the gross weight shipped. In an action by the charterers against the shipowners to recover so much of the freight paid by the consignees to the shipowners as represented the freight upon the cargo which was not delivered. Held (by Lord Alverstone, C.J. and Collins, M.R., Romer, L.J., dissenting), that the shipowners were not entitled to a lump sum freight, and that the charterers were entitled to recover the sum claimed. (Ct. of App.) London Transport Company Limited v. Trechman Brothers ... | 518  |      |
| 10. Injunction—Cancellation date—Agreed port—Practice. —By a charter-party the shipowner agreed that his vessel should proceed to a named port and there load a cargo for the charterer, and it was provided that, if the vessel should not be at that port ready to load by a specified date, the charterer should be at liberty to cancel the charter-party. The vessel was then at another port unloading, and was delayed in doing so for so long that it became impossible for her to arrive at the agreed port by the specified date. The charterer refused to extend the time for cancellation, or to promise to load the vessel if she proceeded to the agreed port, and said that if he did load, the rate of freight must be reduced, and he insisted on the vessel proceeding to the agreed port. The shipowner thereupon refused to send his vessel there. Held, that, in the circumstances, an injunction ought not to be granted to restrain the shipowner from using the vessel for any purposes other than those of the charter-party. (Ct. of App.) Bucknall Brothers v. Tatem and Co. .....  | 127  |      |
| 11. Lien—Freight—Bill of lading—Incorporation. —Notice of a charter-party given to a shipper has not the effect of incorporating into the bill of lading any terms inconsistent with it, which the captain was not bound to embody in it. Therefore a shipowner is not entitled to a lien for freight payable under a time charter on goods shipped by a person not a party to that charter, whose goods were carried in the ship under a sub-charter and bill of lading. (P. C.) Turner and another v. Haji Goolam Mahomed Azam .....   | 588  |      |
| 12. London Corn Trade Association—Discharge of cargo. —The London Corn Trade Association Contract, No. 22, provided as to the discharge of grain cargoes from vessels, "Sufficient days to be left for unloading," and, by clause 4, "Sufficient days (counting quarter days) shall be as follows: One running day for every 400 tons up to 2800 tons of grain, and for all quantities in excess 500 tons per day (as provisionally invoiced)," but in no case were less than five days to be allowed. Held, upon the construction of this clause, that for all vessels of whatever size the time to be allowed for discharging the cargo was one day for every 400 tons of cargo up to 2800 tons, and one day for every 500 tons above 2800 tons, subject in every case to the minimum of five days; and that consequently, in discharging a grain cargo of 3800 tons, one day was to be allowed for every 400 tons up to 2800 tons—that is, seven days—and one day for every 500 tons for the excess above 2800 tons—namely, 1000 tons—making in all nine days. (Walton, J., since affirmed on appeal.) Turner, Brightman, and Co. v. Banatyne and Sons Limited .....  | 495  |      |
| 13. Naval Review—Postponement—Advance freight. —The plaintiffs chartered the defendants' ship for three days to attend the Naval Review to be held in the following June or July on the occasion of the King's Coronation. The money to be paid for the hire of the ship was paid, in accordance with the terms of the charter-party, ten days before the day fixed for the review. A week later the review was postponed on account of the King's illness, and was not in fact held either in June or July. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover back the sum they had paid for the hire of the ship: Held (affirming the decision of Biggam, J.), that the defendants were entitled to retain the money. Blakeley v. Muller (88 L. T. Rep. 90) approved. (Ct. of App.) Civil Service Co-operative Society v. General Steam Navigation Company .....  | 477  |      |
| 14. Naval Review—Postponement—Repudiation of contract. —A ship was chartered to be at the defendant's disposal on the 28th June 1902 to take out a party "for the purposes of viewing the Naval Review and a for day's cruise round the fleet; also on Sunday, the 29th June, for a similar purpose. . . . Price 250 l. , pay-   |      |      |

- | PAGE  | PAGE  |
|---|---|
| able 50L. down, balance before ship leaves H. B." On the Naval Review being postponed, the defendant repudiated the contract on the ground that it ceased to be binding. Held, that the object with which the defendant hired the vessel, though stated in the contract, did not concern the shipowners; that the happening of the Naval Review was not the sole basis and foundation of the contract so as to discharge the parties from further performance of it in accordance with the doctrine of Taylor v. Caldwell (8 L. T. Rep. 356; 3 B. & S. 826); and therefore the defendant was liable to the plaintiffs for breach of contract. (Ct. of App. reversing Grantham, J.) Herne Bay Steamboat Company Limited v. Hutton ..... 394, 472   | vessel should be able to load within a reasonable time; and that the probability of delay was known to and contemplated by the shipowners when they entered into the charter-party. (Ct. of App.) Barque Quilpué Limited v. Brown ..... 596  |
| 15. Payment of hire—Cesser—Detention by ice—Breakdown. —By a charter-party it was provided by one clause that, in the event of loss of time from damage preventing the working of the vessel, the payment of hire should cease until she should again be in an efficient state to resume her service, and by another clause that "detention by ice should be for account of charterers unless caused by breakdown of steamer." During the voyage the vessel stranded; the necessary repairs were effected and she resumed her voyage: owing, however, to the delay thus caused she was unable to proceed to the destined port before it was closed by ice, and she was consequently detained at an intermediate port. Held (affirming the judgment of Ridley, J.), that there was a detention by ice "caused by breakdown of steamer," and that payment of hire ceased during that detention. (Ct. of App.) Re an Arbitration between C. Traae, for the owners of the Steamship Rikard Nordraak, and Lennard and Sons Limited ..... 553                         | 18. Salvage—Rights of charterers and ship-owners. —A charter-party made between the charterers and owners of a steamship provided that the shipowners should maintain the vessel in a thoroughly efficient state for and during the service; that if any damage prevented the working of the vessel for twenty-four hours, the hire should cease until the vessel was again in an efficient state; that the vessel was to be at liberty to tow and assist vessels in distress, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life and property; and clause 20 provided that "all derelicts and salvage shall be for charterers and owners' equal benefit." During a voyage under the charter-party the vessel rendered salvage services for which the owners were awarded a large sum in an action in the Admiralty Division. In consequence of performing these salvage services the owners of the vessel incurred certain expenses, including repairs, the cost of renewing a fractured tail end shaft of ropes and gear used in towage, of extra oil and coal, a port bill, and the loss of hire during the time the vessel was under repair. In an action by the charterers against the shipowners to recover under clause 20 half the salvage monev: Held, that the salvage which under clause 20 was to be for the "equal benefit" of the parties was not the amount awarded in the Admiralty Court, but the net pecuniary result of the salvage operations, and that, in arriving at the sum to be divided the shipowners were entitled to deduct from the salvage award the expenses and losses incurred by them (including the loss of hire) in earning the salvage, and that the balance was the sum to be equally divided. (Bigham, J.) George Booker and Co. v. Pocklington Steamship Company Limited ..... 22 |
| 16. Principal and agent—Freight—Right to sue. —By a charter-party, containing the usual exceptions, an agreed rate of freight was to be paid on unloading and right delivery of cargo to be provided by the charterers. The captain was to sign bills of lading at port of loading, and the charterers' liability was to cease on vessel being loaded. The charterers loaded the cargo, and the master signed bills of lading which described the cargo as shipped by the charterers in the ship "whereof L. Repetto is master," and provided that the cargo should be delivered to the shippers or their assigns at the port of discharge, they paying freight as per charter-party. In an action by the master against the charterers to recover the balance of freight due: Held, that the master signed the bills of lading, not as principal, but merely as agent for the shipowner, and therefore he was not entitled to sue for the freight. (Bigham, J.) Repetto v. Millar's Karri and Jarrah Forests Limited ..... 215                                 | 19. Seaworthiness—Exceptions—Negligence of owner. —Exceptions in a charter-party will not free a shipowner from liability for the consequences of personal negligence in loading the ship whereby she is rendered unseaworthy unless such exceptions are expressly applicable to the owner. (P. C.) Owners of the City of Lincoln v. Smith ..... 586See Carriage of Goods , Nos. 1, 6, 8, 9 to 13, 19, 23, 25, 30, 31, 32, 33— General Average , Nos. 4, 6, 7— Marine Insurance , Nos. 14, 17— Mortgagor and Mortgagee , No. 3— Solage , No. 9.  |
| 17. "Regular turn" — Practice of port—Coaling order. —A charter-party provided that a sailing vessel should load a cargo of coal at N. "in regular turn" from B. colliery or any of the collieries the freighters might name. No time for loading was fixed. At the port of N. it was necessary to obtain a loading order from the colliery before a berth was allotted. When the vessel arrived, a great many vessels were waiting to load from B. Colliery, and in consequence sixty-seven days elapsed before a coaling order could be given to the vessel. The charterers, who were the owners of B. Colliery, had sold a cargo of that coal to be shipped by this vessel. Held, that the words "regular turn" referred to the colliery turn as distinguished from the port turn both upon their proper construction and also having regard to the regulations and practice of the port. Held, also, that the charterers had not chartered an unreasonable number of vessels to arrive at the port about the same time so as to make it impossible that the | CLEARANCE, CERTIFICATE OF.See Carriage of Goods , No. 5.COLLIERY GUARANTEE.See Carriage of Goods , No. 6.COLLISION.1. Bailor and bailee—Postmaster-General—Right to sue—Practice. —A collision occurred between the steamships M. and W. in consequence of which the M. , which was carrying passengers and mails, sank, and the greater portion of the mails were lost. The W. limited her liability under the provisions of sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. At the reference before the registrar and merchants, the Postmaster-General claimed against the fund in court, as bailee for the senders of registered letters and parcels lost by the collision, the estimated value of the same, although he was under no liability to the owners of them. Held, reversing the decision of the President (Sir F. Jeune), that, as bailee in possession, he could recover damages for the loss of the goods irrespective of whether  | or not he was liable to the bailors. (Ct. of App.) The Winkfield .....	259

	PAGE	PAGE
2. Compulsory pilotage—Form of licence—River Avon. —A collision occurred in the river Avon between the steam-tug P. and the steamship B. C. , partly through the fault of the pilot in charge of the B. C. The master of the B. C. had been granted a certificate by the pilotage authority, which had been renewed from year to year, authorising him to pilot the steamship J. C. The B. C. was managed by the same firm, but did not, in fact, belong to the same owners as the J. C. , but no alteration had been made in the certificate on the transfer of the master to the B. C. , or on the renewal of the certificate. Held, that the certificate was bad, and the B. C. was, at the time of the collision, in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law. (Adm. Div.) The Bristol City .....	274
3. Compulsory pilotage—Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858. —By sect 127 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, "every pilot taking upon himself the charge of any vessel shall, if so required by the master thereof, pilot such vessel so far to the westward as the Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel." Since the date of the Act the buoy has been removed, and for the purposes of pilotage the Bar Lightship, which occupies a position outside of that occupied by the buoy, is treated as the westward limit. A collision occurred at a spot between the Bar Lightship and the place where the buoy used to be. The defendants pleaded that their vessel was at the time of the collision compulsorily in charge of a pilot. Held, that, the Fairway Buoy having been removed, the Bar Lightship occupied the same place relatively for the purposes of sect. 127 of the Act of 1858, that the collision occurred in pilotage waters, and that pilotage was therefore compulsory. (Adm. Div.) The Sussex .....	578
4. Compulsory pilotage—Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858—Port of Liverpool—Anchoring. —Sect. 128 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 requires that "the pilot in charge of any inward bound vessel shall cause the same (if need be) to be properly moored at the same in the river Mersey, and shall pilot the same into some one of the wet docks within the port of Liverpool." The fact that a vessel anchors for the purpose of waiting for the tide does not put an end to the compulsory services of the pilot. (Adm. Div.) The Mercedes de Larrinaga .....	571
5. Compulsory pilot—Neglect to stand by—Ship in fault. —The fact of a vessel after collision with another vessel not standing by and giving her name, as required by sect. 422 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, does not render her owners liable, if at the time of the collision she was compulsorily in charge of a pilot, whose negligence was the sole cause of the collision. (Adm. Div.) The Sussex .....	578
6. Compulsory pilotage—Port of Liverpool—Manchester Ship Canal. — Semble , pilotage is compulsory on vessels outward bound from the Manchester Ship Canal on leaving the canal at Eastham. (Adm. Div.) The Mercedes de Larrinaga .....	571
7. Compulsory Pilotage—Port of Liverpool—Manchester Ship Canal. —Pilotage is compulsory on a vessel inward bound from the sea through the port of Liverpool to Manchester until she enters the Ship Canal at Eastham. (Adm. Div.) The Mercedes de Larrinaga .....	571
8. Costs—Two defendants. —The owners of a steamship damaged by collision with a barge instituted an action in the City of London Court against the owners of the barge, and afterwards joined as defendants the dock company to whose improper orders the owners of the barge alleged the collision was due. The dock company alleged the collision was due to the negligence of the barge. Judgment was given against both defendants, but, on appeal by both, the judgment against the owners of the barge was set aside. The court, following The River Lagan (58 L. T. Rep. 773; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 281), ordered the dock company to pay the costs of the plaintiffs and of the successful defendants both in the court below and of the appeal. (Adm. Div.) The Mystery 281
9. Damage—Collision—Ship and pier. —Damage done by a ship to a pier is not "damage by collision" within the meaning of sect. 3, subsect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and hence a County Court has no Admiralty jurisdiction in respect of such damage. (Adm. Div.) The Normandy .....	568
10. Damages—Both to blame—Joint tortfeasors—Contribution. —Where two vessels have been found both to blame for a collision and each has been condemned in a moiety of the other vessel's damages, such damages include a sum of money which one of them has become liable to pay for damage done to a third vessel in consequence of the collision. In such cases the common law rule of no contribution between joint tortfeasors does not apply. (Adm. Div.) The Frankland .....	196
11. Damages—Contribution—Demurrage. —A collision occurred between two vessels in consequence of which one of them had to be put into dry dock in order to be repaired. The owners of the other vessel admitted liability for the collision and damages. While in dry dock her owners took the opportunity of fitting bilge keels, and the work was done simultaneously with the collision repairs, but without interfering with them or causing the vessel to be detained in the dock for any time beyond what was necessary for completing the repairs. Held, that the owners, being under no obligation to put their vessel into dry dock, were not liable for any portion of the expenses of so doing, and the owners of the wrongdoing vessel were liable for the whole of the demurrage while she was undergoing repairs. (Adm. Div.) The Acanthus .....	276
12. Damages—Contribution—Demurrage. —There is no legal obligation on a person to contribute towards an expenditure incurred by another merely because he has derived a benefit from it. (Adm. Div.) The Acanthus .....	276
13. Damages—Pecuniary loss—Right of action. —Whenever by a wrongful act a person is deprived of his property, a claim for damages may be sustained, and such damages are not necessarily merely nominal, though no actual pecuniary loss may be proved. (H. of L.) The Mediana .....	41
14. Damages—Pecuniary loss—Right of action. —The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board are charged by statute with the duty of lighting the approaches to the Mersey, and maintain four lightships in constant use, and two in reserve to take the places of the others when they need repair or in other emergencies. One of the lightships, the C. , was damaged by collision with the M. , a steamship belonging to the appellants. The collision was due to the negligence of those in charge of the M. The O. , one of the reserve lightships, took the place of the C. while she was repaired. The owners of the M. paid the cost of the repairs and all other out of pocket expenses, but the board made a claim for the loss of the use of the lightship C. while she was under repair, or for the hire of the substitute. It was admitted that the O. would not have been employed if she had not been acting as substitute for the C. Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover substantial damages for the loss of the C. (H. of L.) The Mediana .....	41

- |   | PAGE     | PAGE  |          |
|---|----------|---|----------|
| 15. Dock master—Statutory powers—Obedience to orders. —The owners of a vessel are not liable for a collision solely due to the improper orders of a dock foreman which those in charge of her are bound by statute to obey and to properly obey. (Adm. Div.) The Mystery .....  | 281      |   |          |
| 16. Mersey Navigation Rules—Statutory presumption of fault. —The Regulations for the Navigation of the River Mersey, made by Order in Council the 17th Sept. 1900, have the same statutory sanction as the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. (Ct. of App. affirming Adm. Div.) The Devonian .....   | 158, 179 |   |          |
| 17. Mersey Navigation Rules—Tug and tow—Lights—Statutory presumption of fault. —A steam-tug made fast to a vessel at anchor in the river Mersey, ready to assist her if required, is a steam vessel towing or attached for the purpose of towing or manœuvring her, and must at night exhibit the lights required by art. 4 (a) of the Mersey Rules. In such circumstances the tow is responsible for the lights of the tug and will be deemed in fault under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 419, if the tug exhibit other lights, and if the breach of the rule may have contributed to a collision between the tow and another vessel. (Ct. of App. affirming Adm. Div.) The Devonian 158,  | 179      |   |          |
| 18. Practice—Foreign judgment—Arrest. —Where the plaintiffs in a collision action instituted in England in order to prevent the arrest of their vessel in Belgium, gave security to answer any judgment that might be obtained against them in France, and the defendants, having obtained a judgment in France against the plaintiffs in default of appearance, took proceedings in Belgium to have the French judgment made executory there, and the plaintiffs appeared to the Belgian proceedings, and the Belgian courts, without inquiring into the merits, declared the French judgment executory in Belgium: Held, that the plaintiffs in the English action were not debarred from maintaining an action for damages in respect of the same collision. (Adm. Div.) The Challenge and Duc D'Aumale .....  | 497      |   |          |
| 19. Registrar and merchants—Value of ship—Market prices. —In assessing the value of a large passenger steamship running in a regular line, the test in a collision action is, not what she would fetch if sold in the market, but what was her value to the owners as a going concern at the time she was sunk. (Adm. Div.) The Harmonides .....  | 354      |   |          |
| 20. Registrar and Merchants—Damages—Remoteness—Both to blame. —A collision occurred between the steamships U. and M. , for which both vessels were found to blame. The U. had on board at the time a cargo of coals shipped by and the property of the Admiralty, and, in order to avoid expense of storage and reshipment, an agreement was come to by which the owners of the U. waived their right to carry the cargo to its destination, the coals were discharged and sold, and the Admiralty agreed to pay the owners a sum of money by way of substituted expense. The owners of the U. recovered against the owners of the M. , a moiety of their claim for repairs and detention. A claim was made by the Admiralty, as owners of the cargo on board the U. , against the owners of the M. for the sum agreed to be paid to the owners of the U. Held (affirming the report of the registrar), that they were not entitled to recover, as such a payment could not be said to be the natural result of the collision, and that, if the owners of the M. were liable, the sum recovered would be payable to the owners of the U. , who had already been paid a moiety of all the losses they had incurred by reason of the collision. (Adm. Div.) The Minnetonka ..... | 544      |   |          |
| 21. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Anchor light—Position of. —It is not a com-   |          | pliance with art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, which provides that a ship of 150ft. or upwards in length shall, when at anchor, carry a second anchor light "at or near the stern of the vessel," to exhibit a light at a distance of 120ft. from the stern. (H. of L.) The Gannet ..... | 43       |
| 22. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Anchor light—Position of. —A vessel at anchor, 313ft. in length, which is exhibiting her forward light in the fore shroud of the starboard fore rigging, 72ft. abaft the stem, is carrying it "in the forward part of the vessel," in compliance with art. 11 of the Collision Regulations. (Ct. of App. reversing Adm. Div.) The Philadelphia .....   |          |   | 38, 72   |
| 23. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Course and speed. —The steamship C. , whilst turning at night in the Bosphorus under a port helm, opened her green and masthead lights on the port bow of the steamship K. , which was coming up the Bosphorus in her proper water. About the same time the C. sounded two short blasts and starboarded her helm, to which the K. replied with one short blast and ported her helm. The vessels collided. Held, the C. was alone to blame. (P. C.) The Chittagong .....   |          |   | 252      |
| 24. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Fog—Moderate speed. —The mere fact of there being fog in the vicinity of a vessel, if not ahead, does not in all cases make it obligatory to navigate at a reduced speed. (Adm. Div.) The Bernard Hall .....   |          |   | 300      |
| 25. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Fog—Moderate speed. —The power of stopping in a short distance is one of the circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration in deciding whether a vessel is proceeding at a moderate speed or not. A passenger steamship fitted with twin screws and capable of being brought to a standstill in about 400ft., which was proceeding at six and one-third knots in a thick fog, was held not to be going at a moderate speed, although her engines were so constructed that she could not go slower without stopping them from time to time. (H. of L.) The Oceanic .....   |          |   | 378      |
| 26. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Fog—Speed—Twin screws. —A passenger steamship, fitted with twin screws, which was proceeding at the rate of nine and a half knots an hour in a dense fog, was held not to be going at a moderate speed, and to have committed a breach of art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, although it was proved that her engines were so constructed that she could not go slower without stopping from time to time. That article is imperative, and, therefore, although such consequences as loss of handiness and the risk of loss of position may result from proceeding at a lower rate of speed, which may be attained by occasionally stopping her engines, considerations of that nature do not justify a vessel in proceeding at more than a moderate speed. (Ct. of App. affirming Adm. Div.) The Campania .....  |          |   | 151, 177 |
| 27. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Fog—Moderate speed. —As a general rule, speed in a fog such that another vessel cannot be avoided after being seen is excessive. (Adm. Div.) The Campania .....  |          |   | 151      |
| 28. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Fog—Speed. —The steamship C. , while proceeding at the rate of about three knots an hour in a thick fog, heard the whistle of another steamship about four points on the port bow. The C. kept her course and speed, and the whistle of the other vessel was heard to be apparently broadening. Shortly afterwards the other steamship was seen close to and bearing five or six points on the port bow of the C. The engines of the C. were then at once stopped   |          |   |          |

- and reversed, but a collision occurred. Held, that the C. was in part to blame for the collision for having failed, in accordance with art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, when the whistle of the other steamship was first heard, to stop her engines and afterwards to navigate with caution until all danger of collision was over, and was not justified in continuing her speed under art. 21. (Adm. Div.) The Cathay ..... 35
29. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Fog—Speed—Whistles.—Art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea directing a ship to keep her course and speed is qualified by art. 16, and hence, where two steamships in a fog are crossing, each ought to stop her engines if she hears the whistle of the other forward of her beam. (Adm. Div.) The Cathay ..... 35
30. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Fog—Whistles.—Where a fog signal is heard forward of the beam, the position of which is not ascertained, there is a duty under art. 16 upon the vessel hearing it to stop and navigate with caution until danger is over, although she herself may not be in a fog. (Adm. Div.) The Bernard Hall ..... 300
31. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Fog—Whistles.—It is the duty of a steam vessel in a fog, under art. 16, on first hearing forward of her beam another vessel's fog signal, to stop her engines and to keep them stopped until by hearing further signals she ascertains the position of the other vessel. (Adm. Div.) The Roudane ..... 106
32. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Foreign ship—Presumption of fault.—Query, whether the statutory presumption of fault created by sect. 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 applies to a foreign vessel outside British territorial jurisdiction, where the Order in Council applying the Collisions Regulations to vessels of the country to which she belongs does not apply the provisions of Part 5 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. (Adm. Div.) The Konink Willem ..... 425
33. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—King's ships—Merchant trader.—The statutory sanction imposed by sect. 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 for a breach of the Collision Regulations has no application to a merchant trader which is crossing the course of one of Her Majesty's ships from starboard to port, because the obligations imposed by arts. 21 and 27 are only applicable to ships, both of which are bound to obey the regulations. (Ct. of App. affirming Adm. Div.) The Sanspareil 59, 78
34. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Lights.—Where the lights of a vessel are not exhibited in the position required by the collision regulations it is necessary for her to establish beyond all doubt that the light was in such a position that it ought to have been seen by the other vessel before the court will find the other vessel in fault for bad look-out. (H. of L.) The Gannet ..... 43
35. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Lights—Look-out—Statutory presumption of fault.—Where a steamer collided with a sailing ship which after sunset was showing no lights, the court held that, although there was some look-out on the steamer, nevertheless the absence of the lights could not in the circumstances have possibly caused or contributed to the collision; and that therefore the sailing ship was not to be deemed to be in fault under sect. 419, sub-sect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. (Ct. of App.) The Argo ..... 74
36. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Manchester Ship Canal—Fog.—Semble, the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea do not apply to the Manchester Ship Canal. Even assuming that they do apply, a vessel coming down the canal in a fog is not necessarily to blame under art. 16 of the regulations if she does not stop her engines on hearing the whistle of an approaching vessel forward of her beam; for the approaching vessel must be in the canal, and it may be assumed that she is being navigated on her right side, and her position is therefore, under the circumstances, sufficiently ascertained. (Adm. Div.) The Hare ..... 547
37. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Mersey Navigation Rules—Vessel leaving dock—Powers of dockmaster.—A steamship coming out of Prince's Dock into the river Mersey came into collision with another steamship coming down the east side of the river in tow of two tugs. Held, that art. 19 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea did not apply, and that there was no duty under the article on the down-coming vessel to keep out of the way of the vessel leaving the dock. Observations on the powers of a dockmaster in the Mersey. (Adm. Div.) The Sunlight ..... 509
38. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Narrow channel.—Art. 25 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at sea is not infringed by a vessel turning round in a narrow channel whereby some portion of her length must necessarily during the process fail to remain on that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on her starboard side. (Adm. Div.) The Whittleburn ..... 154
39. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Negligence—Statutory presumption of fault.—A vessel which neglects, in disregard of arts. 27 and 29 of the Collision Regulations, to depart from any of the Collision Regulations is not to be deemed in fault under sect. 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. (Ct. of App.) The Sanspareil ..... 78
40. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—"Not under command"—Course and speed.—A vessel exhibiting two red lights under art. 4 (A) of the Collision Regulations as a signal that she is "not under command" ought to keep her course when approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision. (Adm. Div.) The Hawthornbank ..... 535
41. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Sailing ships—"Not under command"—Course and speed.—A collision occurred between the brigantine B. and the barque H. The R. was at the time close-hauled on the starboard tack; the H. was sailing free, but, having been recently in collision with a steamship, was exhibiting "not under command" lights. The helm of the R. was put up in order to pass ahead of the H., while the helm of the H. was ported. Held, that the H. was to blame as she ought to have kept her course and let the R. get out of her way. (Adm. Div.) The Hawthornbank ..... 535
42. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Tug and tow—Anchor light.—Semble, a vessel, which is held by her anchor, in the course of being towed up to it by steam tugs, is not a vessel being towed within the meaning of art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, but is a vessel at anchor, and must exhibit only her anchor light. (Adm. Div.) The Romance ..... 149
43. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Tug and tow—Fog.—Where a tug and tow in a fog hear forward of their beams the fog signal of another vessel, the position of which is not ascertained, the tug ought, if it is practicable, to stop her engines. (Adm. Div. since affirmed by Ct. of App.) The Challenge and Duc d'Aumale ..... 49
44. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Tug and tow—Lights—Statutory presumption of fault.—Where a tug towing another vessel exhibited her two towing lights and side lights, and also carried a white steering light abaft the mainmast visible aft and forward of the beam,

the exhibition of such last-mentioned light was held in the circumstances not to be a breach of the regulations which could possibly have contributed to a collision with another steamship which was crossing the course of the tug and tow and had them on her starboard hand. (Adm. Div.) The Sanspareil .....	59
45. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Tug and tow—Fleet of warships. —Under ordinary circumstances a tug and tow are not justified in crossing ahead of a fleet of warships which has the tug and tow on the starboard hand, and the tug and tow ought not to keep their course and speed under art. 21 of the Collision Regulations. (Ct. of App. reversing Adm. Div.) The Sanspareil .....	59, 78
46. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Tug and tow—Lights. —Tugs towing a vessel at anchor up to her anchor are steam vessels towing another vessel within the meaning of art. 3 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and must carry their side lights and their towing lights. (Adm. Div.) The Romance .....	149
47. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Whistle signals. —The obligations under art. 28 of the Collision Regulations on a steamship in sight of another to indicate by signals on her whistle that she is taking any course authorised or required by the rules is imperative. The words "taking any course authorised" mean everything which by the rules of good seamanship it is necessary and proper should be done. (Adm. Div.) The Uskmoor .....	316
48. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Whistle—Change of course. —Art. 28 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is limited in its application, and only applies where a vessel is taking a course in order to give effect to the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea; hence where a vessel leaving dock under starboard helm sighted another vessel on her port bow and continued on her starboard helm, she was held not bound under art. 28 to give a two-blast signal. (Adm. Div.) The Mourne .....	155
49. Thames Navigation Rules—Both to blame—Contributory negligence. —The steamship F. , proceeding down the river Thames against the tide, committed a breach of bye-law 47 of the Thames Bye-laws in neglecting to wait at B. point until the steamship O. G. , which was coming up with the tide, and which, at the time, was turning in the river preparatory to entering the West India Dock, had passed clear. A collision occurred. Held, that although the O. G. was to blame for not keeping a proper look-out and for turning without proper care, the F. was also to blame for hindering the manoeuvres of the O. G. by not obeying the rule, and so contributing to the collision. (Ct. of App. affirming Adm. Div.) The Ovingdean Grange .....	242, 295
50. Thames Navigation Rules—Fairway—Bell. —The obligation on steamers and sailing vessels under the 38th Thames Bye-law, when in the fairway and not under way, to ring a bell, does not apply in clear weather. (Adm. Div.) The Rhein .....	278
51. Thames Navigation Rules—Vessel crossing river. —A steamship which is turning in the river Thames, on that side of mid-channel on which she is being navigated, having no way upon her and with her anchor down and holding, is not a steamship crossing, within the meaning of art. 48 of the Thames Rules, from one side of the river towards the other. (Adm. Div.) The John Holloway .....	36
See Bailor and Bailee—Damage , Nos. 1, 2— Lord Campbell's Act—Marine Insurance , Nos. 5, 20— Practice , No. 1— Wreck .

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

See Salvage, No. 5.

	"COMMERCIAL CAUSE."	PAGE
	See Practice , No. 2.
	COMPULSORY PILOTAGE.
1. Bristol Channel—Newport—Limits of districts. —By the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 it was provided in sect. 9 that all vessels navigating or passing up, down, or upon the Bristol Channel to the eastward of Lundy Island, except coasting vessels and Irish traders, should be piloted and navigated by pilots licensed by the Bristol Corporation. By the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 it was provided in sect. 4. that so much of the 9th section of the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 as related to vessels navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from either of the ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester should be repealed, and by the same Act pilotage boards and pilotage districts—which in some cases overlapped the port of Bristol—were created for the ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester, and power was given to these boards to license pilots for their districts. By the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 it was provided that, notwithstanding anything contained in the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807, a vessel navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel to or from the port of Bristol should be exempted from all obligation to be piloted by pilots licensed by the Bristol Corporation, except when within the limits of that port, which were therein defined. Held, that the Act of 1861 was not intended to deal with and did not deal with or include vessels going to or from the port of Bristol, although such vessels were bound from or to one of the ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, and that therefore in the case of a vessel which is not exempt from compulsory pilotage in the port of Bristol there is still the obligation under the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 to have a compulsory pilot licensed by the corporation of Bristol when the vessel, bound to the port of Bristol, gets within the limits of that port, although the vessel may be bound from Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, and may still be within one of those three pilotage districts which overlaps the port of Bristol. Consequently, when a vessel on her voyage puts into Newport, and then proceeds from Newport with a Newport pilot on board to the port of Bristol, as soon as the vessel gets within the limits of the port of Bristol the Newport pilot is bound to give up the charge of the vessel to a Bristol pilot demanding such charge, although the vessel is still within the Newport pilotage district, and within the district for which the Newport pilot is licensed. (K. B. Div.) Reed (app.) v. Goldsworthy (resp.) .....	529
2. Collision—Master with pilotage certificate. —A ship whose master holds a certificate under sect. 599 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 enabling him to pilot the ship in certain waters cannot avail himself of the plea of compulsory pilot in respect of a collision in those waters, although she was in charge of a duly qualified pilot. (Adm. Div.) The Bristol City .....	274
3. Exemptions—Constant trader. —The Order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854 extending the exemptions from compulsory pilotage contained in sect. 59 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, has not been repealed by any of the provisions of subsequent Merchant Shipping Acts, and applies to ships or vessels trading to ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic, whether carrying passengers or not. (Ct. of App.) The Cayo Bonito .....	445
4. Exemptions—Constant trader. —In order to entitle a vessel to the exemptions contained in the Order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854 it is not necessary that she should be a "constant" trader. It is not necessary, in order to constitute a "constant" trader, that a vessel

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

PAGE	PAGE
should be exclusively engaged in trading to ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic. (Ct. of App.) The Cayo Bonito .....	308, 445
5. Foreign law — Adviser — Belgian waters. — Although the employment of a pilot by a vessel in the Belgian waters of the river Scheldt is compulsory by Belgian law, such pilot is not entitled to supersede the master and take charge of the ship, as is the case in England, but according to Belgian law the master remains in charge, the pilot being merely his adviser. Hence, although the master may in fact allow such pilot to take charge of the vessel, the owners are not exempted from liability for damage done to another vessel by the negligence of the pilot. (Adm. Div.) The Dallington .....	377
6. Newcastle-upon-Tyne — Blyth — Sect. 6 of 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi. , which made pilotage compulsory on foreign vessels coming in or out of the port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, or any of the creeks or members thereof, applies to the port of Blyth, and is still unrepealed in respect of such vessels coming in or out of Blyth. (Adm. Div.) The Holar .....	143
See Collision , Nos. 2 to 7.
CONCEALMENT.
See Carriage of Goods , No. 24— Marine Insurance , No. 6.
CONDUCT OF ACTION.
See Practice , No. 4.
"CONSTANT TRADER."
See Compulsory Pilotage , Nos. 3, 4.
CONSTRUCTIVE TOTAL LOSS.
See Marine Insurance , Nos. 7, 8, 9.
CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.
See Collision , No. 49.
COSTS.
See Collision , No. 8— Measure of Damages—Practice , Nos. 3, 4, 12, 13, 14.
COUNTY COURTS ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.
See Collision , No. 9— Practice , No. 4.
CREW SPACE.
See Limitation of Liability , No. 1.
CROWN PROPERTY.
See Practice , No. 7— Salvage , No. 5.
CUSTOM.
See Carriage of Goods , Nos. 7 to 11— General Average , No. 6— Marine Insurance , No. 11.
CUSTOMS ACTS.
1. Foreign-built ship—Canada—Customs Tariff Act 1897. —A foreign-built ship brought to Canada comes under the head of "goods imported into Canada" within the meaning of the Customs Tariff Act 1897, and the imposition of a duty upon such ship under the Act before registration in Canada is not repugnant to the provisions of the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act 1894. (P. C.) Algoma Central Railway Company v. The King .....	431
2. Ships' stores—Australian Customs Act 1901. —By the Australian Customs Act 1901 (Act No. 6 of 1901) ships bringing into Australian ports dutiable articles carried as ships' stores are not liable to pay duty on such stores if they are sealed up by a revenue officer on arrival at the first port in Australia, and not used until after the departure of the ship from her last port of departure in Australia. A penalty is imposed for entering any port in Australia with such seal broken. Where the seal had been broken, and the stores used, by order of the master of a ship during a voyage between two ports in Australia, but on the high seas beyond the limit of Australian territorial jurisdiction. Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the master was liable to the penalty imposed by the Act. Such enactment is not ultra vires . (P. C.) P. and O. Steam Navigation Company v. Kingston .....	433
DAMAGE.
1. Damages—Anchor and chain—Action in rem. —A steamship slipped her anchor and put out to sea in order to avoid a collision with another steamship, which had negligently been allowed to drag her anchor and cause danger of collision. Held, in an action in rem , that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the value of the anchor and chain lost, and the coals and stores consumed in consequence of having to put to sea. (Adm. Div.) The Port Victoria ...	314
2. Maritime lien—Collision—Harbour works—Admiralty Court Act 1861. —There is a maritime lien under sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 for damage done by a ship to the works of a harbour authority, although they may be within the body of a county. (Adm. Div.) The Veritas .....	237
3. Maritime lien—Salvage—Priorities. —A lien for damage done by a ship takes precedence of a prior lien for salvage, and an award for salvage cannot be recovered against the res to the detriment of a claimant in respect of subsequent damage. (Adm. Div.) The Veritas .....	237
4. Oyster fishery—Action in rem—Admiralty Court Act 1861. —An action in rem will lie under sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 for damage done by a ship to an oyster fishery. (Adm. Div.) The Swift .....	244
5. Oyster fishery—Action in rem—Damages. —Where a vessel was no negligently navigated that in passing over an oyster bed, although due notice had been given of it, she took the ground and damaged the bed and oysters on it. Held, that the owners of the fishery were entitled in an action in rem to recover damages for the injury to the bed and the oysters. (Adm. Div.) The Swift .....	244
See Collision , No. 9.
DAMAGE TO CARGO.
See Carriage of Goods , Nos. 16, 17, 26, 27, 28, 30— Practice , No. 5.
DAMAGES.
See Collision , Nos. 10 to 14, 20— Damage , No. 1, 5— Mortgagor and Mortgagee , No. 3— Sale of Cargo , No. 2.
DECK CARGO.
See Marine Insurance , No. 11.
DEFAULT ACTION.
See Collision , No. 18— Mortgagor and Mortgagee , No. 7— Practice , No. 6.
DEMISE.
See Charter-party , No. 5.
DEMURRAGE.
See Carriage of Goods , Nos. 6, 8, 9, 10 to 13, 18, 23, 32, 33— Charter-party , Nos. 4, 6, 7, 8, 15, 17— Collision , Nos. 11, 12— Practice , No. 11.

	PAGE		PAGE
DESERTION.		of the ship as well as owner of the cargo does not prevent him from recovering under the policy from the underwriters on the cargo in respect of a general average loss, as a general average act does not depend on the consideration whether there can be any contribution or not as between the respective interests. The Brigella (69 L. T. Rep. 834; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; (1893) P. 189) disapproved. (Ct. of App.) Montgomery and Co. v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Assurance Company Limited 141,	289
See Seamen , Nos. 1, 2, 3.		2. Contribution—Identity of shipowner and cargo owner—Loss of mast. —A loss caused by the cutting away of the mast of a ship, which by the master's orders is cut away for the safety of the whole adventure, but which at the time it is cut away is not hopelessly lost and might possibly be saved, is a general average sacrifice for which underwriters of a policy on the cargo against perils of the seas are liable to contribute, and they are none the less liable because the assured are owners of both ship and cargo (Ct. of App.) Montgomery and Co. v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Assurance Company Limited ..... 141,	289
DISBURSEMENTS.		3. Freight—Fire—Contribution. —A cargo of coal, which was being carried on a voyage from C. to E., became heated during the voyage, and the master, for the safety of the ship, freight, and cargo, made for B. and put in there. The cargo was there unloaded, and was found to be in such a state that it could not safely be carried to E. The cargo was thereupon sold, and the voyage was abandoned, the freight being thereby lost. Held (affirming the judgment of Bigham, J.), that there was no general average sacrifice of the freight which could give a right to general average contribution. (Ct. of App.) Iredale and another v. China Traders Insurance Company ..... 119	119
See Master's Wages and Disbursements .		4. Freight—Liability to contribution—Chartered voyage. —A ship was chartered to proceed from England to a foreign port and there load a return cargo for freight payable on delivery of the home cargo. The ship whilst on the outward voyage in ballast met with a misfortune which necessitated a general average sacrifice. She afterwards completed her voyage, and brought home the cargo for which her owners received the chartered freight. Held (affirming the decision of Mathew, J.), that the chartered freight was liable to contribute to the general average sacrifice. Williams v. London Assurance Company (1 M. & S. 318) followed. (Ct. of App.) Carisbrook Steamship Company v. London and Provincial Marine and General Insurance Company Limited ..... 332	332
DISTRESS SIGNALS.		5. Negligence of crew—Right to contribution. —Where a charter-party or bill of lading under which goods are carried contains a clause excepting liability for negligence of the servants of the shipowner, the shipowner is entitled to contribution from the owner of the goods for general average expenses although they have been occasioned through the negligence of the master. The Carron Park (63 L. T. Rep. 356; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543; 15 P. Div. 203) approved. (Ct. of App.) Milburn and Co. v. Jamaica Fruit Importing and Trading Company ..... 122	122
See Salvage , No. 7.		6. Time charter freight—Adjusters—Practice of. —By the uniform practice of average adjusters a loss of time charter freight is never allowed in general average. Such practice is not in conflict with legal principles, and is right. (Adm. Div.) The Leitrim ..... 317	317
DISTRESSED SEAMEN.		7. Time charter freight—Fire—Detention of ship. —A fire occurred on board a vessel which was under time charter, and in order to extinguish it a sacrifice was incurred. Whilst the vessel was undergoing repairs the hire ceased under the terms of the charter-party. Held, that the shipowner was not entitled to any com-
See Seamen , Nos. 4, 5, 6.
DOCK CHARGES.
See Marine Insurance , No. 12.
DOCK COMPANY'S LIABILITIES.
See Collision , Nos. 8, 15.
DOCKMASTER.
See Collision , Nos. 15, 37.
ESTOPPEL.
See Charter-party , No. 1.
EVIDENCE.
See Marine Insurance , No. 23— Mortgagor and Mortgagee , No. 1— Salvage , No. 6— Seamen , No. 4.
EXCEPTED PERILS.
See Carriage of Goods , Nos. 1, 6, 12, 14, 15, 16, 17, 24, 26, 28, 30, 31, 32— Carriage of Passengers—Charter-party , No. 19— Marine Insurance , Nos. 13, 14.
FAIRWAY.
See Collision , No. 50.
FATAL ACCIDENTS ACTS 1846 and 1864.
See Lord Campbell's Act .
FIRE.
See Carriage of Goods , Nos. 1, 12— General Average , Nos. 3, 7.
FISHERIES ACT 1868.
See Damage , Nos. 4, 5.
FOG.
See Collision , Nos. 24 to 31, 36, 43.
FOREIGN JUDGMENT.
See Collision , No. 18.
FOREIGN LAW.
See Carriage of Goods , Nos. 5, 16, 17— Collision , No. 18— Compulsory Pilotage , No. 5— Marine Insurance , Nos. 13, 16, 17— Master's Wages and Disbursements , Nos. 2, 3— Practice , No. 9.
FOREIGN SHIP.
See Collision , No. 32— Customs Acts , No. 1— Lord Campbell's Act—Limitation of Liability , Nos. 1, 2— Master's Wages and Disbursements , Nos. 2, 3— Practice , No. 1— Seamen , No. 3.
FREIGHT.
See Carriage of Goods , Nos. 1, 19, 23— Charter-party , Nos. 1, 9, 11, 13, 16— General Average , Nos. 3, 4, 6, 7— Marine Insurance , Nos. 14, 15, 16, 27— Mortgagor and Mortgagee , Nos. 4, 5— Practice , No. 9.
GENERAL AVERAGE.
1. Contribution—Identity of shipowner and cargo owner. —The fact that the assured under a policy of marine insurance on cargo is owner pension in general average for the delay caused by the sacrifice. (Adm. Div.) The Leitrim ..... 317

PAGE
 See Collision, No. 20—Marine Insurance, Nos. 17, 30.

GOVERNMENT STORES.

See Salvage, No. 9.

HARTER ACT.

See Carriage of Goods, Nos. 16, 17.

HEAT.

See Carriage of Goods, No. 14—General Average, No. 3.

INCOME TAX.

Steamship company—Mode of assessment—Income Tax Act 1842.—The S. Steamship Company owned the steamship B. and fifty-nine sixty-fourths of the steamship G., the remaining five sixty-fourths being owned by other persons. Held, that the company was rightly assessed in respect of income tax by two assessments, one in respect of the steamship B. and the other in respect of the steamship G., as the latter was an adventure carried on by them jointly with other persons within the third rule, applying to both the first and second cases under sect. 100 of the Income Tax Act 1842 (Ridley, J.) Farrell (app.) v. Sunderland Steamship Company Limited (resps.) ..... 416

INJUNCTION.

See Charter-party, No. 10.

JETTISON.

See Charter-party, No. 9.

JOINT TORTFEASORS.

See Collision, No. 10.

JURISDICTION.

See Collision, No. 9—Lord Campbell's Act—Practice, Nos. 1, 11.

KING'S SHIP.

See Collision, Nos. 33, 45—Practice, No. 7.

LASCARS.

See Seamen, No. 7.

LAY DAYS.

See Carriage of Goods, Nos. 9, 13—Charter-party, No. 7.

LEX FORI.

See Master's Wages and Disbursements, Nos. 2, 3.

LIEN.

1. Possessory lien—Shipwright's bill.—Where a contract has been entered into to do certain repairs to a ship, the repairers have a possessory lien for the work they have done, although they have not completed all the repairs they contracted to do. (Adm. Div.) The Tergeste ... 356

2. Wages—Maritime lien—Food for crew.—An allowance of money made to the crew of a vessel in consideration of their finding their own provisions is part of their wages, and they have a maritime lien in respect of it. (Adm. Div.) The Tergeste ..... 356

3. Wages—Possessory lien—Shipwright's bill—Priorities.—The maritime lien of the crew for their wages takes priority of the possessory lien of shipwrights up to the time when the vessel is put into the hands of the shipwrights for repairs, and the fact of the master and crew being on board the vessel while repairs are being done does not oust the possessory lien of the shipwrights. (Adm. Div.) The Tergeste ..... 356

PAGE

See Carriage of Goods, Nos. 18, 19—Charter-party, No. 11—Damage, Nos. 2, 3—Sale of Cargo, No. 5.

LIFEBOAT.

See Salvage, Nos. 10, 12.

LIGHTS.

See Collision, Nos. 17, 21, 22, 34, 35, 40, 41, 42, 44, 46.

LIGHTSHIP.

See Collision, No. 13, 14.

LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

1. Danish ship—Crew space—Certificate of Registry.—The owners of a Danish ship are not entitled in limiting their liability to deduct crew space from the gross tonnage, although the tonnage regulations of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 have been adopted by Denmark, and according to the Danish certificate of registry the crew space is stated therein and it is proved that the dimensions of crew space have been cut up over the hatchway. To entitle a ship to such deduction it is necessary to prove that the certificate mentioned in the 3rd paragraph of the 6th schedule to the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 has been given by a surveyor of ships to the collector of customs, and such schedule only relates to British ships. (Adm. Div.) The Cathay ..... 100

2. French steamship—Double bottom—Board of Trade surveyor.—In an action for limitation of liability by owners of a French steamship, the French certificate of registry supported by affidavit giving the gross tonnage exclusive of double bottom, and the Order in Council of the 5th May 1873, extending the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) as to measurement to French vessels, were put in. A further affidavit was filed alleging that the double bottom for water ballast was not used for the purpose of carrying cargo, stores, or fuel. Held, that this was sufficient evidence, and that it was not necessary that the certificate of a Board of Trade surveyor under sect. 81 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 should be also adduced. (Adm. Div.) The Cordilleras ..... 506

3. Lord Campbell's Act—Life claims—Time for bringing in claims.—In an action of limitation of liability, notwithstanding the provisions of sect. 3 of Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 60), the Court of Admiralty may, if it sees fit, under sect. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), fix a time, less than that allowed by Lord Campbell's Act, within which claims for loss of life shall be made against the fund in court. (Adm. Div.) The Alma ..... 375

4. "Tons burden"—Gross tonnage—Register tonnage.—The words "ships not exceeding 15 tons burden" in sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 mean ships, the net register tonnage of which, ascertained according to the provisions of that Act, does not exceed 15 tons; hence an unregistered ship, the gross tonnage of which, ascertained according to the Act, exceeds 15 tons, but whose net registered tonnage, ascertained for the purpose of registration according thereto, is less than 15 tons, is exempt from registration, and her owners are entitled to limit their liability calculated upon a tonnage so ascertained. (Ct. of App.) The Brunel ..... 10

LONDON CORN TRADE ASSOCIATION.

See Charter-party, No. 12

LORD CAMPBELL'S ACT.

Collision—Foreign ship—Foreign seaman—Jurisdiction.—The provisions of the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846 and 1864 apply to a case where the person in respect of whose death damages are sought to be recovered in an English court against the owner of a British ship is an alien, and is at the time of the negligent act which caused his death on board a foreign ship on the high seas; and therefore a foreigner, the widow of a foreign seaman killed on the high seas while on board a foreign ship by a collision with a British ship caused by the negligent navigation of the British ship, can maintain an action in England under these Acts against the English shipowner for the negligence of his servants in causing the death. (K. B. Div.) Davidsson v. Hill and others ... 223

See Limitation of Liability, No. 3.

LOSS OF MARKET.

See Carriage of Goods, No. 20.

LUMP FREIGHT.

See Marine Insurance, No. 14.

MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL.

See Collision, Nos. 6, 7, 36—Sale of Cargo, No. 1.

MARINE INSURANCE.

1. Carriage of goods—Negligence—Loss of cargo.—Where goods were loaded on a barge under a contract of carriage by which the barge owners were not to be liable for "any loss or damage to goods which can be covered by insurance," and through the negligence of the barge owner's servants the barge was sunk and the oil lost, it was held that the clause did not relieve the carriers from the obligation of using reasonable care and skill, and that they were liable for the negligence of their servants. (Walton, J.) Price and Co. v. Union Lighterage Company ..... 398
2. Coal—Supply of—Commencement of voyage—Negligence of master.—Where a steamship commences a stage of her voyage with a deficiency of coal owing to the negligence of the master, any loss to the assured resulting from such deficiency is not covered by a clause in the policy that the insurance is "to cover loss through the negligence of master mariners, engineers, or pilots," and hence the shipowner cannot recover such loss, he having broken his warranty of seaworthiness. (Ct. of App.) Greenock Steamship Company v. Maritime Insurance Company Limited ..... 364, 463
3. Coal—Supply of—Premium.—A loss caused by a steamship commencing a stage of the voyage with a deficiency of coal is covered by a clause, "Held covered in case of any breach of warranty . . . at a premium to be hereafter arranged," but where the loss has occurred before the breach of warranty is discovered the premium to be arranged will be at least as great as the loss and so the insured can recover nothing under the clause. (Bigham J.) Greenock Steamship Company v. Maritime Insurance Company ..... 364
4. Coal—Unseaworthiness—Commencement of voyage.—A steamship on commencing a voyage is prima facie unseaworthy if she has not sufficient coal on board then to complete the voyage, but where the voyage is made in stages she is seaworthy if she has sufficient coal on board on commencing each stage to enable her to complete that stage. (Bigham, J.) Greenock Steamship Company v. Maritime Insurance Company Limited ..... 364
5. "Collision"—Meaning of.—By a policy of marine insurance on certain tugs, the assured was protected against damage to any of the insured tugs "owing to actual collision between any such tug and any vessel, bridge, wharf, mooring pier, or similar structure." One of the insured tugs struck against an anchor in the bed of a river and was damaged. The anchor was attached by some twenty or thirty fathoms of chain to the bows of a schooner, the after part of which was lying on the bank of the river. Held, that the anchor so attached to the schooner was a part of the schooner, and that collision with the anchor was a collision between the tug and a "vessel" within the meaning of the policy, and that the assured was therefore entitled to recover under the policy for the damage to the tug. (Q. B. Div.) Re an Arbitration between Margetts and Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation Limited... 217

Page

6. Concealment—Material facts—Lloyd's agents.—The knowledge of Lloyd's agents cannot be taken to be the knowledge of an individual member of Lloyd's, so as to necessarily make void a policy of marine insurance on the ground of concealment of facts, where such individual member has no actual knowledge in fact. (Bruce, J.) Wilson and others v. Salamandra Assurance Company of St. Petersburg ..... 370
7. Constructive total loss—Abandonment—Reinsurance—Salvage.—Where underwriters reinsured a ship against total and (or) constructive total loss with an undertaking "to pay as may be paid" on the original policy and the policy of reinsurance contained a suing and labouring clause, but excluded salvage charges, then, in the event of the ship experiencing a disaster during the insured voyage which would have justified the owners in giving notice to the original insurers of abandonment, the reinsurers will not be liable, either as for a constructive total loss or under the suing and labouring clause, for money paid by the original insurers in respect of the cost of bringing the ship to port and of repairs, though such money amounts to 100 per cent. on the insured value of the ship, if in fact the owners gave no notice of abandonment. (Bigham, J.) Western Assurance Company of Toronto v. Poole ..... 390
8. Constructive total loss—Cost of repairs—Value of wreck.—By a policy of marine insurance on a ship the ship was valued at 23,000*l.*, and it was provided that that sum should be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel was a constructive total loss. The ship afterwards ran ashore, but, being temporarily repaired, was brought back to England. The cost of repairs, if the ship had been reinstated, would have been 22,500*l.* Held, that she was not a constructive total loss and that in deciding whether or not there had been a constructive total loss, the value of the damaged vessel as she lay on the rocks ought not to be added to the cost of reinstating her. Dictum in Young v. Turing (2 M. & G. 593) disapproved. (Ct. of App.) Angel v. Merchants' Marine Insurance Company Limited ..... 406
9. Constructive total loss—Valued policy—Cost of Repairs—Institute Time Clauses.—A ship was insured against all risks in a valued policy of 16,000*l.* The policy contained the Institute Time Clauses, one of which is "The insured value shall be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel is a constructive total loss." The underwriter reinsured, but only against a total loss, and in the policy of reinsurance this clause was struck out. The ship was stranded, and the owners abandoned her as a constructive total loss, selling her for 6000*l.* to a buyer who raised and repaired her. On the evidence it appeared that, while she was an ordinary constructive total loss, yet she might have been repaired at less cost than her assured value. Held, that under these circumstances the underwriter was not entitled to recover on the policy of reinsurance as for a total loss. (Bigham, J.) Marten and others v.

	PAGE		PAGE
Steamship Owners Underwriting Association Limited .....	339	a lien over the whole cargo for the chartered freight. ( H. of L. Williams and others v. Canton Insurance Office ) .....	247
10. Contribution—Liability. —There is no principle of law which requires a person to contribute to an expenditure incurred by another merely because he has derived a benefit from it. ( H. of L. Ruabon Steamship Company v. London Assurance ) .....	2	15. Freight—Refrigerating machinery—Commercial impossibility. —A policy on freight of frozen meat contained the clause, "Chartered freights and freights are warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time." Before the vessel loaded the meat, a fire destroyed her refrigerating machinery, so that she could not carry frozen meat. It was necessary to bring the materials to repair the machinery from England to Australia, where the fire occurred, which would have involved great delay. Held, that, as this would have rendered the earning the freight commercially impossible, this was a loss "consequent on loss of time" within the words of the policy, and therefore the underwriters were liable for loss of freight. ( Mathew, J. Turnbull, Martin, and Co. v. Hull Underwriters' Association ) .....	93
11. Deck cargo—Inland voyage—Custom. —The rule which exempts underwriters from liability for the loss of deck cargo under an ordinary policy on goods for a voyage by sea where there is no well-known usage to carry such cargo on deck does not apply to inland voyages by canal or river contemplated by the policy, on which voyages it has been the usage and practice to carry cargo on deck; and consequently, if in such a case the goods stowed on deck be damaged or lost by perils insured against in the policy, the underwriters will be liable for the loss. ( Walton, J. Apollinaris Company Limited v. Nord Deutsche Insurance Company ) .....	526	16. Freight—Salvage of cargo—Italian law—Total loss. —The plaintiffs advanced money for ship's disbursements to the captain of an Italian ship, who gave them a note by which he promised to repay the amount advanced ten days after the arrival of the ship at the port of destination, and he thereby pledged the vessel and freight, and directed the consignees at the port of destination to pay the amount from the freight received. The plaintiffs then effected an insurance against perils of the sea of the advances so made, by a policy warranted free of all average. By perils of the sea the ship became a constructive total loss on the voyage, and so never arrived at the port of destination. But part of the cargo being saved, freight became payable on it by Italian law, and was in fact paid. In an action by the plaintiffs against the underwriters as for a total loss: Held (affirming the decision of Bigham, J. ), that, by reason of payment of part of the freight, there was no total loss, and the plaintiffs were therefore not entitled to recover upon the policy. ( Ct. of App. Price and another v. Maritime Insurance Company Limited ) .....	213
12. Dock dues—Apportionment of—Lloyd's Classification. —In the course of a voyage covered by a policy of marine insurance a ship sustained damage by a peril insured against, and had to go into a dry dock for repairs. While she was in dock the owners took advantage of the opportunity to have her surveyed for reclassification at Lloyd's, though the time for such survey was not yet due. The survey did not cause the ship to be detained in the dock for any time beyond what was necessary for completing the repairs. Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the underwriters were liable for the whole of the expenses of getting the ship into and out of dock and for the dock dues, and that there should be no apportionment between them and the owners. ( H. of L. Ruabon Steamship Company v. London Assurance ) .....	2	17. General Average—Belgian law—Charter-party. —By a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiff on his ship with the defendants, who were underwriters, it was provided: "General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up." The ship being chartered to third persons for carriage of timber, it was provided by the charter-party that the ship might carry a deck load of timber, and that "In case of average . . . jettison of deck cargo (and the freight thereon) for the common safety shall be allowable as general average." In the course of a voyage to Antwerp it became necessary for the common safety to jettison part of the deck cargo; and, upon the average statement being made up there, this was included in general average. Apart from any special provision in the charter-party, the jettison of deck cargo and the freight thereon would not by Belgian law be the subject of general average; but that law recognises any special provision as to what shall be the subject of general average. Held, that as the statement had in fact been made up at Antwerp, the proper place for making it up, and the charter-party imported no terms of a special and unusual character such as could not reasonably have been contemplated by the parties to the policy of insurance, the defendants were bound by the statement, and were therefore liable to indemnify the plaintiff against the contribution that had to be made up by the ship in general average relating to the loss on the jettison of the deck cargo. ( Ct. of App. De Hart v. Compania Anonima de Seguros Aurora ) .....	345, 454
13. Foreign law—Restraint of princes. —A municipal law of a country forbidding the importation of diseased cattle is a "restraint of princes or people" in a policy of marine insurance, but a warranty against "capture, seizure, or detention" relieves the underwriters from liability. ( Ct. of App. Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company ) .....	386
14. Freight—Bill of lading and charter-party—Perils of the sea. —A ship was chartered for a specified voyage for a lump freight, payable on delivery of the cargo. The charter-party provided that the master should sign bills of lading at any rate of freight which the charterers might require, but not under chartered rates, or difference to be settled in cash or signing bills of lading. There was also a clause providing for the cesser of the charterers' liability upon shipment of the cargo provided that the cargo was worth freight, dead freight, and demurrage on arrival at the port of discharge, the vessel to have a lien thereon for the recovery of all freight, dead freight, and demurrage. The owners insured the lump freight "chartered or as if chartered, as valued, on board or not on board." A full cargo was shipped, but, owing to the loss of part of it on the voyage by perils of the sea, the bill of lading freight at the port of discharge was not equal to the chartered freight, though the cargo itself was worth more than the chartered freight. The bills of lading preserved no general lien on the cargo. In an action against the underwriters on the policy to recover the difference between the bill of lading freight and the chartered freight. Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that they were not liable, as the loss of chartered freight had been caused not through perils of the sea, but by the plaintiffs so framing the bill of lading as not to give themselves

	PAGE	PAGE
18. Illegality—Pleading—Practice. —Where a policy is illegal by statute, the court will not enforce such policy, although the illegality has not been pleaded. (Kennedy, J.) Gedg<sup>e</sup> and others v. Royal Exchange Assurance .....	47	97
19. Mutual Insurance—Member—Principal and agent—Insurable interest. —The defendants who were the owners of a certain ship, authorised their agent to insure, and the agent did insure the ship by an ordinary Lloyd's policy in the plaintiff association, the object of which association was the mutual insurance "of ships which the members might be authorised to insure in their own names," and a "member" was defined to be "any person who, on behalf of himself or any other person, insures any ship in the association." By so entering the ship the agent became a "member," and was personally responsible to the association for the payment of the contributions and premiums due in respect of the insurance. In practice these contributions were collected from the members, that is, from those who entered ships in the club, and the members then got the money from their principals, and a committee were empowered to assess members rateably to provide a fund to meet losses. The policy, the memorandum and articles of association and the rules, which together formed the contract of insurance, contained no express provision either that the defendants should be liable for the contributions and premiums, or that they should be relieved from such liability. The defendants' agent became insolvent, and unable to pay the contributions and premiums, and the association brought an action to recover the same from the defendants as owners of the ship. Held, that as the defendants alone had an insurable interest as owners of the ship, and as it was for their benefit the insurance was effected, they, as well as their agent, were liable to pay the contributions and premiums unless they could show that their contract in unmistakable terms relieved them from such liability, which the contract in this case did not do. (Bigham, J.) British Marine Mutual Insurance Association Limited v. Jenkins and others .....	26	167
20. Removal of wreck—Collision—Liability of underwriters. —By a policy of marine insurance the underwriters agreed that, if the ship assured came into collision with any other ship and the assured in consequence thereof was bound to pay any sum "in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself, or to the goods or effects on board thereof, or for loss of freight then being earned by such other ship or vessel," they would pay to the assured a proportion of such sum. The ship assured ran into and sank another ship in the Tees. The owner of the wreck was compelled to pay to the harbour authorities the expenses of removing the wreck, and he recovered the amount from the owner of the ship assured. Held, that the sum paid by the assured in respect of the removal of the wreck of the other ship was not a sum paid by him "in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself," within the meaning of the policy. (Ct. of App. reversing Mathew, J.) Burger v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Assurance Company Limited .....	85	329
21. Seaworthiness—Cargo of cattle—Lloyd's surveyor. —In a policy on a cargo the implied warranty of seaworthiness is not excluded by a provision that "fittings and conditions of the cattle to be approved by Lloyd's agents' surveyor," and if in fact the ship is unseaworthy the underwriters are not liable. (Bigham, J.) Sleigh v. Tyser .....	97	342, 452
22. Seaworthiness—Cargo of cattle—Ventilation—Cattlemen. —Insufficient ventilation and an insufficient supply of cattlemen constitute a breach of the implied condition of seaworthi-ness of a cargo of cattle. (Bigham, J.) Sleigh v. Tyser .....
23. Seaworthiness—Total loss—Onus of proof. —Where a ship is lost shortly after leaving port without any known cause sufficient to account for the catastrophe, there is a presumption in favour of unseaworthiness, but such presumption may be rebutted by evidence as to the actual condition of the ship at the time of sailing. (P. C.) Ajum, Goolam, Hossen, and Co. v. Union Marine Insurance Company .....
24. Stamp Act—Time policy. —A ship was insured for twelve months by a policy which contained a clause providing that, should the vessel be at sea or abroad on the expiration of the policy, she should be held covered "until arrival at her port of final destination in the United Kingdom, or on the continent of Europe, at a pro rata daily premium to the within." After the expiration of the twelve months the ship was abroad, and was lost on her homeward voyage. Held, affirming the decision of Bigham, J., reported 85 L. T. Rep. 241; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1901) 2 K. B. 567, that the policy was a contract for a time exceeding twelve months, and was invalid under sect. 93, sub-sect. 3, of the Stamp Act 1891. (Ct. of App.) Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation v. Sjöforsakrings Aktiebolaget Vega .....
25. Stamp Act—Time policy. —An action upon a policy for twelve months containing the continuation clause "should the vessel be at sea or abroad on the expiration of this policy it is agreed to hold her covered until arrival at her port of final destination in the United Kingdom or on the Continent of Europe at a pro rata daily premium" in respect of damage sustained after the expiration of the twelve months cannot be maintained as the policy is one entire contract for a period exceeding twelve months, and therefore invalid by reason of sect. 93, sub-sect. 3 of the Stamp Act 1891. (Bigham, J.) Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation v. Sjöforsakrings Aktiebolaget Vega .....
26. Suing and labouring clause—Negligence—Contract of indemnity. —Shipowners who had entered into a contract of affreightment which contained no negligence clause exempting them from liability for loss arising through the negligence of their servants, effected with an underwriter a policy of insurance on their ship to cover their liability of any kind to the owners of the cargo up to a certain specified amount owing to the omission of the negligence clause in the contract. The policy was an ordinary printed form of Lloyd's policy, and contained a suing and labouring clause entitling the assured to sue and labour for the defence and recovery of the goods and ship. During the insured voyage the vessel stranded owing to the negligence of the shipowners' servants and part of the cargo was lost, and the shipowners became liable in respect thereof. The shipowners incurred expenses in saving the cargo which was saved and in trying to save the cargo which was lost, and in attempting to tow the vessel off the rocks; and they sought to recover these expenses from the underwriter, not as a direct loss under the policy, but under the suing and labouring clause in the policy as being suing and labouring expenses. Held, that the policy was not a policy on goods and that the suing and labouring clause in the policy had no application to the subject-matter of the insurance, and did not form any part of the insurance, and that therefore the shipowners could not recover under that clause the expenses so incurred by them. (Ct. of App. affirming Walton, J.) Cunard Steamship Company Limited v. Marten .....
27. Time policy—Breakdown of machinery—Freight. —Where shipowners effected a time

	PAGE
policy upon "chartered or hire money" to "cover loss of hire money" caused by ( inter alia ) want of repairs or breakdown of machinery, and under the provisions of a Government charter-party the Admiralty discharged the chartered vessel from their service in consequence of it being discovered that some of her propeller blades were cracked, it was held in an action on the policy that the "chartered or hire money" in the policy meant "hire money" in the nature of freight payable under a contract; that the loss of such hire to the shipowners was caused by the exercise of the option which the Admiralty had under the charter-party to discharge the vessel from their service, and not by the want of repair, breakdown of machinery, or other perils insured against under the policy, and that there was therefore no loss under the policy, for which the shipowners were entitled to recover. (Walton, J.) Manchester Liners Limited v. British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company Limited .....	266
28. Time policy.—Perils of the sea—Grain trade.—Where a ship employed in the grain trade carried separation cloths and damage mats, and such cloths and mats were lost by perils of the sea on a voyage during which they were not in use, it was held that a time policy upon the ship and her furniture covered such loss. (Ct. of App.) Hogarth and Co. v. Walker .....	84
29. Total loss—Ship—Wagering.—A policy of insurance agreeing to pay a total loss in the event of a ship not arriving at a port by a certain date is a policy "on a ship" within 19 Geo. 2, c. 37. (Kennedy, J.) Gedge and others v. Royal Exchange Assurance .....	57
30. Valued policy—Total loss—Proportions—Salvage.—Where a ship is insured for an agreed value by a valued policy of insurance, and a general average loss is sustained, or a salvage award is paid by the owners, based upon a value larger than the value in the policy, the underwriters are only liable for the proportion of the loss which the value in the policy bears to the true value, and not for the whole loss. (H. of L. affirming Ct. of App.) Balmoral Steamship Company v. Marten .....	139, 254, 321
31. Voyage policy—Duration of risk.—By a policy of insurance a vessel was insured for a voyage to a certain port until she had "moored at anchor in good safety," and "for thirty days in port after arrival however employed." Held (affirming the judgment of Bigham, J.), that the words "thirty days" in the policy meant thirty consecutive periods of twenty-four hours commencing from the precise time of the day at which the vessel arrived and was moored in safety. (Ct. of App.) Cornfoot v. Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation .....	418, 489
See General Average , Nos. 1, 2— Practice , No. 8— Sale of Cargo , No. 4.

MARITIME LIEN.

See Damage, Nos. 2, 3—Lien, Nos. 2, 3.

MASTER'S WAGES AND DISBURSEMENTS.

1. Bill of exchange—Dishonour—Notice of.—A ship arrived at Colombo in want of coal, and her master needed cash for disbursements. The coals were supplied and the money was advanced by the ship's brokers, and the master drew a bill on the managing owners of the ship for the amount of the coal bill and the advance. The bill, which contained the words "value received on 300 tons of coal and disbursements and place the same with or without advice to account of coals and necessary disbursements to my vessel for which I hold my vessel, owners, and freight responsible" was accepted, and was dishonoured on maturity. The plaintiffs (the holders of the bill) knew of the dishonour on the 18th April, and on the same day were told that the vessel was in the Tyne. Being uncertain of the whereabouts of the vessel, they made further inquiries, but, getting no further information, they sent notice of dishonour to the master as drawer of the bill on the 21st April. The notice reached the master on the 23rd April. Held, that the captain was personally liable on the bill, and that the form in which it was drawn did not give the holder a right only against the ship, her owners, and freight. Held, further, that though under ordinary circumstances the notice of dishonour which was given would have been too late, yet the delay was to be excused, as it was caused by circumstances beyond the plaintiffs' control, and not imputable to their default, misconduct, or negligence. (Adm. Div.) The Elmville; Ceylon Coaling Company Limited v. Goodrich .....

606

2. Priorities—Foreign ship—Lex fori. —Sect. 167 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) applies to all vessels, British and foreign, and gives the master of a foreign ship the same rights and remedies as the master of a British ship. The Milford (31 L. T. Rep. O. S. 42; Swa. 362) followed. (Adm. Div.) The Tagus .....	371
3. Priorities—Mortgage—Foreign ship—Lex fori. —In an action in rem by the master of a foreign ship for wages and disbursements the question of priorities as between himself and a mortgagee is one of remedy, and is therefore to be determined by the lex fori . (Adm. Div.) The Tagus .....	371

MATERIAL FACTS.

See Carriage of Goods, No. 24—Marine Insurance, No. 6.

MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Contract—Breach of—Liability for law costs.—The plaintiffs having undertaken the repairs of a steamship for the owners, employed the defendants, an engineering company, to construct a new crank shaft. The defendants agreed to do so, upon the terms of their not being responsible for failure of material or workmanship beyond the replacement of faulty work supplied by them. In an action by the plaintiffs against the shipowners to recover the price of the shaft which had been supplied by the defendants, the shipowners counter-claimed for damages for breach of contract in consequence of the shaft having broken down on a voyage. The plaintiffs, after communicating with the defendants, who thereupon repudiated all responsibility, defended the counter-claim. The shipowners succeeded on their counter-claim, the shaft being found to have been of faulty workmanship. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendants the cost of the shipowners' counter-claim, as damages resulting from the defendants' breach of contract: Held, that the terms on which the defendants had supplied the shaft did not relieve them from paying these costs; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the costs of the counter-claim except so far as they were increased by any issue other than the faultiness of the material or workmanship of the shaft. (Ct. of App.) Prince of Wales Dry Dock Company (Swansea) Limited v. Fownes Forge and Engineering Company Limited .....

555

See Carriage of Goods, No. 20—Damage, Nos. 1, 5—Sale of Cargo, No. 2.

MERSEY DOCK ACTS.

See Carriage of Goods, No. 22—Collision, Nos. 3, 4, 6, 7, 14, 37.

MERSEY NAVIGATION RULES.

See Collision, No. 16, 37.

MORTGAGOR AND MORTGAGEE.

1. Accounts—Evidence—Entries against interest.—In taking accounts between a mortgagor and a deceased mortgagee of a barge, an account book kept by the latter in his own handwriting containing entries of payments made to him by the mortgagor as well as disbursements made by him on account of the barge is admissible on behalf of the mortgagee's executors in evidence as containing entries against interest. (Adm. Div.) The Swiftsure ..... 65
2. Bankruptcy—Notice of—Receiving order.—Where a mortgage is granted on a ship after the mortgagor has committed an act of bankruptcy, in respect of which he is subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt, the mortgage is protected by sect. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act if the mortgagee had no notice of the act of bankruptcy at the date of the mortgage, notwithstanding the fact that the ship remains in the possession of the mortgagor up to the date of the receiving order. Lyon v. Weldon (1824, 2 Bing. 334) followed. (Adm. Div.) The Ruby ..... 146
3. Charterer—Taking possession—Damages—Liability of mortgagee.—Where the mortgagor of a vessel entered into a charter or agreement for the use of the vessel with a third party (the plaintiff) whereby the plaintiff was to have possession of the ship for about six weeks, and was to run her on specified voyages between places in the United Kingdom and was to finance the vessel, being granted the highest charge and lien on the vessel the mortgagor could grant to secure any sums he might so disburse: Held, that such a charter or agreement did not impair the value of the mortgagee's security, and that the latter was liable in damages to the plaintiff, the charterer, for taking possession of the vessel under his mortgage after default had been made by the mortgagor. (Ct. of App. affirming Adm. Div.) The Heather Bell ..... 192, 206
4. Freight—Assignee—Taking possession.—A mortgagee of a ship, on taking possession of the ship under the mortgage, does not become entitled as against an assignee of the freight to receive freight which is due and payable to the shipowner before the mortgagee takes possession, but which is unpaid at the time when the mortgagee so takes possession. (Walton, J.) Shillito v. Biggart and another ..... 396
5. Freight—Right of mortgagee.—E. was the mortgagee of certain shares in two ships. The profits were received by Messrs. B., A., and Co., who made periodical distributions, once a year in March, amongst the persons entitled. E. gave notice in November of the mortgage. Held (affirming the decision of Wright, J.), that E. was only entitled to the freight earned and received by Messrs. B., A., and Co. after the notice, and that before that date the mortgagor was entitled to it. (Ct. of App.) Essarts v. Whinney ..... 363
6. Possession—Wages—Liability of charterer.—Where a mortgagee wrongly took possession of the mortgaged ship as against the charterer, and paid wages then due to the crew from the charterer, it was held that, in the circumstances, the charterer was liable to the mortgagee for the wages so paid. (Ct. of App.) The Heather Bell ..... 192, 206
7. Practice—Necessaries—Foreign proceedings.—The plaintiffs, as mortgagees of the steamship M., on default being made, took possession of her, and chartered her for a voyage to a French port. On her arrival the defendants, who were British subjects, arrested the ship in respect of necessaries which they had supplied, and attached the freight, which was payable by certain French consignees. They also made executory in France a judgment obtained by default in the King's Bench Division against the mortgagors in England in respect of the same debt. The plaintiffs intervened in the proceedings instituted in France, and, for the purpose of assisting their case in the French courts, brought an action against the defendants claiming under Order XXV., r. 5, a judgment declaratory of the validity of the mortgage, and the rights of the mortgagees in possession to ship and freight. Held, that they were entitled to the judgment asked for, subject to certain modifications. (Adm. Div.) The Manar; Northern Trust Limited v. Strachan Brothers ..... 482

See Master's Wages and Disbursements, No. 3—Practice, No. 9.

MUTUAL INSURANCE.

See Marine Insurance, No. 19—Salvage, No. 11.

NARROW CHANNEL.

See Collision, No. 38.

NAVAL REVIEW.

See Charter-party, Nos. 13, 14.

NECESSARIES.

See Mortgagor and Mortgagee, No. 7—Practice, No. 9.

NEGLIGENCE.

See Carriage of Goods, Nos. 14, 15—Charter-party, No. 19—General Average, No. 5—Marine Insurance, Nos. 1, 2, 26—Salvage, Nos. 15, 16.

"NOT UNDER COMMAND."

See Collision, Nos. 40, 41.

OYSTERS.

See Damage, Nos. 4, 5.

PASSENGERS.

See Carriage of Passengers.

PASSENGERS' LUGGAGE.

See Carriage of Passengers.

PECUNIARY LOSS.

See Collision, Nos. 13, 14.

PERILS OF THE SEA.

See Carriage of Goods, Nos. 15, 16, 17, 26, 27—Marine Insurance, Nos. 14, 28.

PILOT.

See Collision, Nos. 2 to 7—Compulsory Pilotage—Salvage, No. 13.

PILOTAGE CERTIFICATE.

See Collision, No. 2—Compulsory Pilotage, No. 2.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

See Builder and Bailee—Collision, No. 1.

POSSESSORY LIEN.

See Lien, Nos. 1, 3.

PRACTICE.

1. Collision—Foreign ship—Tug and tow—"Proper parties"—Service out of jurisdiction.—A collision occurred outside territorial waters between a British steamship and a French barque, which at the time was in tow of a British tug. An action was commenced in

	PAGE	PAGE
personam by the owners of the steamship against the owners of the tug and the owners of the barque in tow of her. Held, that the owners of the French vessel were "proper parties" within the meaning of Order XI., r. 1 (g), and that leave was properly given to issue a concurrent writ and to serve notice of it out of the jurisdiction. (Adm. Div.) The Duc d'Amale .....	359
2. "Commercial cause"—Appeal.—If a judge directs a cause, which is not in fact a "commercial cause," to be entered in the commercial list, an appeal will lie to the Court of Appeal. (Ct. of App.) Sea Insurance Company v. Carr .....	138
3. Costs—Exercise of discretion—Appeal. —At the trial of the action without a jury Bigham, J. gave judgment for the defendants, but, because the defendants had refused to let him act as arbitrator to say what he considered ought to be done in the matter, he ordered that each of the parties should bear their own costs. Held (reversing the order of Bigham, J.), that there were no materials before him on which he had power to exercise any discretion with regard to depriving the defendants of their right to costs. (Ct. of App.) Civil Service Co-operative Society Limited v. General Steam Navigation Company .....	477
4. County Court action—High Court action—Consolidation—Costs—Conduct of action. —Where an Admiralty action is commenced in the County Court and a cross-action is brought in the High Court in respect of the same matter, and an order is made transferring the County Court action and consolidating the two actions, the original plaintiffs in the High Court action will have the conduct of the consolidated action, unless it appears that there was a clear priority of time in commencing the County Court action. Where proceedings are commenced practically simultaneously the High Court action will be treated as the principal cause. (Adm. Div.) The Mersey .....	273
5. Damage to cargo—Parties—Form of writ. —Order XLVIII., r. 1, allows any two or more persons claiming as co-partners to sue in the name of the respective firms, if any, of which such persons were co-partners at the time of the accruing of the cause of action. A plaintiff issued a writ in an action in rem for damage to cargo in the name of a firm of which he was the sole member, and indorsed it "the plaintiffs as owners of goods laden on board the steamship A." On a motion by the defendants to set aside the writ: Held, that as by the old Admiralty practice, which is not abrogated by the Judicature Acts, owners of a ship or cargo are entitled to sue as such, it would have been sufficient if the plaintiff had described himself as "owner" on the face of the writ, and that therefore this was a mere irregularity and might be cured by leave to amend under Order LXX., r. 1. Held, also, that as the defendants, by applying for security for costs after knowledge of the irregularity, had taken a fresh step in the action, they were precluded by Order LXX., r. 2, from taking advantage of the irregularity. (Adm. Div.) The Assunta ...	302
6. Default action—Specially indorsed writ—Judgment. —The practice of the Admiralty Division as to the procedure in default actions under Order XIII., r. 3, is the same as in other divisions. Where, therefore, the plaintiffs issued a specially indorsed writ in an action in personam in the Admiralty Division: Held, that they were entitled to enter final judgment on the expiration of the time allowed to the defendants to appear. (Adm. Div.) The Madeleine and André Théodose .....	508
7. King's ship—Action in rem—Jurisdiction. —An action in rem is a method of impleading the owners of a vessel, and if the owner is the King
the action cannot be maintained. (P. C.) Young v. Steamship Scotia .....		485
8. Marine Insurance—Overcharges—Right to discovery. —In an action by underwriters to recover the amount of overcharges which they had paid to the assured in respect of claims upon policies of marine insurance, which overcharges they alleged had been obtained by means of false and fraudulent accounts: Held (allowing the appeal), that the underwriters were entitled to have as full discovery from the assured as they would have been entitled to in an action brought against them upon the policies. (Ct. of App.) Bolton and others v. Houlder Brothers and Co. and others .....		592
9. Mortgage—Necessaries—Foreign proceedings—Stay of action. —On default being made under a mortgage the plaintiffs, as mortgagees of the steamship M. took possession of her and chartered her for a voyage to a French port. On arrival the first defendants, who were British subjects, arrested the ship in respect of necessaries which they had supplied and attached the freight, which was payable by certain French consignees. They also made executory in France a judgment obtained by default in the King's Bench Division against the mortgagors (a British company) in England in respect of the same debt. The mortgagees intervened in the proceedings instituted in France and, for the purpose of assisting their case in the French courts, commenced actions in England against the first defendants and against the mortgagors asking for certain declarations of right under Order XXV., r. 5. On a motion by both defendants asking that the actions against them should be dismissed or stayed as being frivolous and vexatious: Held, that as it had not been shown that the declarations asked for by the mortgagees in the action against the first defendants could not be of use to them in the French court to protect their interests as mortgagees, and that, as there was no sufficient evidence that the action was an improper interference with the proceedings in France, the action should be allowed to proceed. But that the proceedings against the mortgagors ought to be stayed as the mortgagors had not taken any step to dispute the validity of the mortgage held by the mortgagees, and the mortgagees had no right to force the mortgagors to try that issue in the present proceedings. (Adm. Div.) Northern Trust Limited v. Strachan Brothers; Northern Trust Limited v. Manar Steamship Company; The Manar .....		420
10. Public Health (London) Act 1891—Summary Jurisdiction—Nuisance. —If a court of summary jurisdiction makes a prohibition order under sect. 5 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, such order need not specify the works to be done by the person against whom the order is made if in the opinion of the court no works could be done to prevent a recurrence of the nuisance. (K. B. Div.) Tough (app.) v. Hopkins (resp.) .....		562
11. Salvage—Contract of carriage—Counter-claim—Action in rem—Jurisdiction. —An action in rem was brought by the owners, master, and crew of a foreign steamship to recover remuneration for salvage services rendered to an English steamship. The owners of the English steamship put in a defence to the action, and also counter-claimed against the owners of the foreign steamship to recover demurrage alleged to be due to them under charter-parties entered into between the owners of the foreign ship and themselves. The owners of the English steamship could not have brought an action against the foreign owner in this country for the demurrage. The judge of the Admiralty Court refused to strike out the counter-claim. On appeal by the foreign owners to the Court of Appeal: Held, that the defendants the English steamship owners had a right to bring the counter-claim, and that the judge of the Admiralty Court, as a judge of the High Court, had jurisdiction to try such a counter-claim, and that he had rightly exercised his discretion in refusing to strike out the counter-claim. (Ct. of App.) The Cheapside ..... 595

12. Salvage—Improper arrest—Caveat—Costs and damages.—Where plaintiffs in a salvage action insisted on arresting the defendants' ship after a caveat warrant had been entered by the defendants' solicitors, the court was of opinion that the plaintiffs had not shown "good and sufficient reason" within the meaning of Order XXIX., r. 18, for arresting, and ordered the defendants to pay the costs and damages of and incidental to the arrest. (Adm. Div.) The Crimdon ..... 104

13. Salvage—Successful appeal—Costs.—Where the amount of a salvage award is reduced there is no hard-and-fast rule as to the costs of the appeal. Where the defendants succeeded on appeal in getting the amount of the award considerably reduced: Held, that they were entitled to the costs of the appeal, the costs in the court below remaining as they were. (Adm. Div.) The Prince Llewellyn ..... 505

14. Shorthand notes—Costs.—The ordinary order of judgment with costs does not include the cost of a transcript of the shorthand-writer's notes. Such costs must be applied for at the hearing. Where an order has been made for judgment with costs, and that order has been drawn up, the court has no power to alter its decree by subsequently allowing special costs. (Adm. Div.) The Turret Court ..... 162

See Action of Restraint—Collision, Nos. 1, 8, 18—Marine Insurance, No. 18, 23—Mortgagor, Nos. 1, 2, 7.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

Contract—Repairs—Lump sum—Extra work.—The plaintiffs contracted with the defendant's master at a foreign port to effect certain repairs to the steamship L., for a lump sum. These repairs were strictly limited to those necessitated by the vessel having stranded. It was also agreed that the plaintiffs should state schedule prices for any work required to be done in addition to the contract repairs. The plaintiffs never executed the contract repairs, but they claimed the lump sum, alleging that they had done the equivalent thereof, or something better, and that they had the authority of the master for the variation. They also claimed for extra work at schedule prices. The master's authority to contract was to the plaintiffs' knowledge limited to repairs of the stranding damage. Held, that as the contract for the lump sum, being an entire one, had not been executed, and as the master had no authority to vary it, the plaintiffs could recover nothing under the contract. Held, further, that the fact that the shipowner had taken the ship as repaired did not amount to an acquiescence in the variation. (P. C.) Forman and Co. Proprietary Limited v. Ship Liddesdale ..... 45

See Carriage of Goods, No. 22—Charter-party, No. 16—Marine Insurance, Nos. 6, 19.

PRIORITIES.

See Damage, No. 3—Lien, No. 3—Masters' Wages and Disbursements, Nos. 2, 3.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT.

Tug's funnel—Chimney—Public health (London) Act 1891.—The funnel of a tug plying to and fro in the river Thames, within the jurisdiction of the port sanitary authority of London, is a "chimney" within sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891. (K. B. Div.) Tough (app.) v. Hopkins (resp.) ..... 562

See No. 10.

REGISTER TONNAGE.

See Limitation of Liability, Nos. 1, 2, 4.

REGISTERED LETTERS.

See Collision, No. 1.

REGISTRAR AND MERCHANTS.

See Collision, Nos. 19, 20.

REGULATIONS FOR PREVENTING COLLISIONS.

See Collisions, Nos. 16, 17, 21 to 48.

REGULATION OF RAILWAY ACT 1868.

See Carriage of Passengers, No. 2.

RE-INSURANCE.

See Marine Insurance, No. 7.

RESTRAINT.

See Action of Restraint.

RESTRAINT OF PRINCES.

See Carriage of Goods, No. 24—Marine Insurance, No. 13.

SAFE RETURN.

See Action of Restraint.

SALE OF CARGO.

1. Contract of carriage—"Safe port"—Manchester.—A contract for the sale of a cargo of wheat per Vanduaara provided that the vessel should discharge "at any safe port in the United Kingdom." The vessel was chartered by the sellers to discharge at "any safe port in the United Kingdom (Manchester excepted)," and the bill of lading was in the same terms. By the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885, and by the Customs regulations, the port of Manchester included the whole of the ship canal, but in the ordinary commercial meaning it included only Manchester and the waters adjacent thereto. In the wider meaning Manchester was, but in the more limited meaning was not, a safe port for the Vanduaara. Held, (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that Manchester, within the meaning of the charter-party and bill of lading, was not a safe port for the Vanduaara, and that therefore the addition of the words "Manchester excepted" in the bill of lading and charter-party was not a material alteration of the contract of sale so as to release the buyers from taking the documents. (Ct. of App.) Re an Arbitration between Goodbody and Co. and Balfour, Williamson and Co. ..... 69

2. Damages—Delay in delivery.—The plaintiffs agreed to construct and deliver, f.o.b. at the port of London, for the defendants a steam launch by a fixed date. The vessel on board of which the launch was to be delivered was to be found by the defendants. The launch was not in fact ready to be delivered until three months after the agreed date, but the defendants did not during that time notify to the plaintiffs that there was any vessel at the port of London on board of which they required the launch to be delivered. Held (affirming the judgment of Bucknill, J.), that, as the defendants were not ready and willing to perform their obligation to take delivery before the plaintiffs were ready and willing to deliver, the defendants were not entitled to deduct from the price the agreed damages for delay in delivery. (Ct. of App.) Forrest and Son v. Aramayo ..... 134

3. Dissolution of contract.—Impossibility of performance.—The defendants contracted to sell to the plaintiffs a cargo of cotton seed to be

- |   | PAGE    |  | PAGE |
|---|---------|--|------|
| shipped by the steamship Orlando at Alexandria in Jan. 1900, for carriage to the United Kingdom, and by a clause in the contract it was agreed that in case of prohibition of export, blockade, or hostilities, preventing shipment, the contract or any unfulfilled part thereof was to be cancelled. After the making of the contract, but before Jan. 1900, the steamship Orlando was stranded through the perils of the sea, and was so damaged thereby that it was impossible for her to arrive at Alexandria in Jan. 1900. Held, by Smith, M.R. and Romer, L.J., Vaughan Williams, L.J. dissenting (affirming the judgment of Mathew, J.), that the contract was subject to an implied condition that the parties should be excused if before breach performance became impossible by reason of the steamship Orlando ceasing to exist as a cargo-carrying ship without the defendants' default. (Ct. of App. affirming Mathew, J.) Nickoll and Knight v. Ashton, Edridge, and Co. ..... 94, 209  | 94, 209 | of sale it was held (affirming the decision of Buckley, J.), that there was no specific appropriation of the goods in favour of the plaintiffs; that the defendants were not compellable to accept the bills; and that nothing had been done to defeat the primary right of the defendants, in whose custody the goods were, to deal with them for their own purposes and irrespective of any rights of the plaintiffs. (Ct. of App.) König v. Brandt ..... 199   | 199  |
| SALE OF SHIP.  |         |  |      |
| Bill of sale—Separate transfers—Separate fees. —Where shares in a ship are transferred by different bills of sale to the same transferee, each bill of sale is a separate transfer of interest, and on the registration of such bills of sale by the transferee a separate fee, according to the scale, is payable on the tonnage represented by the shares transferred by each bill of sale, and not one fee on the total tonnage transferred. (Kennedy, J.) Harrowing Steamship Company Limited v. Toohy ..... 91   |         |  |      |
| SALVAGE.   |         |  |      |
| 4. Marine Insurance—Delivery to shipper—Shortage. —In a contract for the sale and delivery of unascertained goods c.i.f.—viz., 500 shiploads, the shipment of 470 loads is not a substantial or pro tanto execution of the contract. Where such goods are insured by the vendor in his own name at their invoice price, together with an addition for "profit," and are lost during the voyage, the purchaser is not entitled to recover from the vendor the sum paid to him by the underwriters under this "profit" insurance. (Bigham, J.) Harland and Wolff Limited v. J. Burstall and Co. ..... 184  | 184     | 1. Acceptance of service—Right to reward. —Where a salvor at the request of a co-salvor, but against the wish of the master of the salvaged vessel, renders salvage services in such circumstances that they ought to have been accepted, he is entitled to salvage remuneration. (Adm. Div.) The Auguste Legembre ..... 279   | 279  |
| 5. Specific appropriation—Passing of property—Claim for lien—Bills of lading. —The defendants carried on business in London, and their practice was to sell in their own names goods shipped to them by P. and Co., who carried on business abroad. P. and Co. used to specify in advising drafts against what particular shipments the same were drawn, so as to enable the defendants to tell whether the particular shipments consigned to them did in fact cover the then outstanding drafts, but not to affect their right to treat all shipping documents as cover for the whole account between them and P. and Co. P. and Co. used likewise to draw upon the plaintiffs, who also carried on business in London, against shipments of goods, bills which the plaintiffs accepted, P. and Co. afterwards forwarding to them, as security, before the bills reached maturity, bills drawn by P. and Co. on first-class firms (among them being the defendants), accompanied by the shipping documents of the goods shipped by them to such firms, and on such firms accepting the bills the plaintiffs would hand over to them the shipping documents which otherwise would have been retained. The defendants having received instructions from P. and Co. to sell certain goods at a specified price, entered into contracts for the sale thereof. Subsequently P. and Co. wrote to the defendants that they had drawn upon them against the goods, and the bills were specified. The bills were drawn to the order of the plaintiffs by P. and Co. upon the defendants for various sums, and were together intended to provide for part of the credit or advances made by the plaintiffs to P. and Co. Bills of lading for the goods, indorsed in favour of the defendants, were afterwards forwarded to them by P. and Co. The defendants took possession of the bills of lading, and applied them in satisfying, so far as they would go, the contracts into which they had entered; but, becoming doubtful as to the financial position of P. and Co.'s firm, they declined to accept the bills of exchange, and claimed to treat the proceeds of sale of the goods as available for payment of the general balance of account between themselves and P. and Co. On a motion to restrain the defendants from parting with the proceeds | 279     | 2. Acceptance of service—Right to reward. —A steamship having fouled her propeller and become disabled was towed into port by the steam lifeboat H. P. and two tugs, the V. and the D. ; and the lifeboat E. H. , which was required by the rules of the National Lifeboat Institution to accompany the H. P. , remained fast astern of the steamship during the towage, but otherwise rendered no service. The D. assisted in the towage at the request of the master of the V. , but against the wish of the master of the steamship. The employment of the D. was, in the circumstances, reasonable and prudent, but turned out to be unnecessary. Held, that the lifeboatmen in the E. H. and the tug D. were entitled to salvage remuneration as well as the other salvors. (Adm. Div.) The Auguste Legembre ..... 279                      | 279  |
|   |         | 3. Agreement—Compulsion and exorbitancy. —The ship P. C. while at anchor dragged down towards the ship A. In response to signals a tug came up, but her master refused to render assistance except for 100 l. The services of the tug were accepted by the P. C. , and the P. C. was towed to her former berth. In an action against the P. C. to enforce the agreement, and also claiming salvage against the owners of the A. , her cargo and freight: Held, that the agreement was made under compulsion, and must be set aside on the ground of its being inequitable and exorbitant. An award of 200 l. with County Court costs made. Held, also, that the action against the A. must be dismissed with costs, as she was in no real danger and no salvage service had been rendered to her. (Adm. Div.) The Port Caledonia and The Anna ..... 479 | 479  |
|   |         | 4. Apportionment—Passenger steamer. —A large steamer carrying passengers, cargo, horses, and cattle, fell in during bad weather with a dismantled barque in the Atlantic, and, after taking off her crew and cutting away the wreckage of her masts, towed her to the Azores. The owners of the barque in settlement of the salvage claim paid 8250 l. to the owners of the steamer. In an action for apportionment: Held, that the owners were entitled to 6175 l. and the master to 500 l. ; that as special awards and according to their rating those of the crew who had taken off the crew of the barque should receive 150 l. , those who had cut away   | 479  |

- |  | PAGE | PAGE     |
|--|------|----------|
| the wreckage 300l., the boat's crew employed during that service 25l., and the boat's crew engaged in passing ropes 75l.; and that the remaining sum of 1025l. was to be divided rateably amongst the whole crew, the non-navigating portion, consisting of the surgeon, purser, cooks, stewards, and stewardesses, to share as if rated at one-third of their actual rating, and the horsemen and foreman, who were in the employment of the owners and liable to be called upon to perform duties, at one-third of the rating of an A.B. (Adm. Div.) The Minneapolis .....  | 270  |          |
| 5. Colonial property—Right to arrest—Liability for salvage. —A vessel which is the property of a Colonial Government, although built to be used as a ferry boat for the purpose of carrying passengers and merchandise for hire between one part of a railway owned by the Government and another, enjoys the same immunity from arrest as other property of the Crown, and is not liable to an action for salvage. (P. C.) Young v. Steamship Scotia .....  | 485  |          |
| 6. Damage to salvaging property—Onus of proof. —Where a vessel suffers damage while rendering salvage services and there is no proof that those in charge of her have been guilty of any negligence or unskilful management, there is a presumption that such injury is caused by the necessities of the services, and, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the vessel salvaged is liable to compensate the salvaging vessel for such damage. (P. C.) The Baku Standard .....   | 197  |          |
| 7. Distress signals—Engagement of salvor. —Sect. 434 (2) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, which penalises the master of a vessel who unnecessarily uses or displays signals of distress, does not apply when such signals have been properly used. Where, therefore, signals of distress were properly displayed, and a vessel put off in response to them, and on her arrival her services were not required: Held, that she was not entitled to be compensated for the labour undertaken, or loss sustained in consequence of answering the signals. (Adm. Div.) The Elswick Park .....  | 481  |          |
| 8. Engaged services—Standing by—Right to reward. —The steamship A. K. with a cargo of oil in bulk became disabled in the North Atlantic. In response to signals the steamship A. came up, and it was agreed she should try to tow her to Fayal, but after standing by and towing her for two days she had to give up the attempt, having assisted her a few miles. Subsequently the A. took her in tow, and towed her 265 miles, when, owing to the hawser parting, she lost her during the night. The M. then came up and supplied her with some provisions, and agreed to tow her to F., but, owing to being short of fodder for her cargo of horses, left after having towed her about twelve miles. Eventually the S. fell in with her, and towed her into F. Harbour, accompanied by the B. P. , a vessel belonging to the same owners, which had come up shortly after the S. Held, that all the vessels were entitled to be rewarded. The A. on the authority of The Benlarig (60 L. T. Rep. 238; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; 14 P. Div. 3) for standing by at request, and for her attempts to tow; the A. and the M. on the principle laid down in The Atlas (Lush. 518) and The Camellia (50 L. T. Rep. 126; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 197; 9 P. Div. 27) for having meritoriously contributed to the ultimate success of the salvage operations; the S. for having towed her to a place of safety; and the B. P. for standing by. A sum total of 8550l. awarded. (Adm. Div.) The August Korff ..... | 428  |          |
| 9. Government stores—Charterers' liability. —Where Government stores are being carried at the risk of charterers and such stores are salvaged from a danger for which the charterers are responsible, the charterers are liable to pay sal-   |      |          |
| vage. There may be a personal liability to pay salvage apart from the liability of the res. (Ct. of App. affirming Adm. Div.) The Port Victor .....  |      | 163, 182 |
| 10. Lifeboat crew—Salvage to property. —To entitle a lifeboat's crew who have gone out to save life to salvage reward against the ship, cargo, and freight, they must establish that they have rendered salvage services to the property in peril. (Adm. Div.) The Marguerite Molinos .....  |      | 424      |
| 11. Mutual insurance clubs—Rights of master and crew. —Where salvage services were rendered by one vessel to another, and both vessels were insured in associations under the articles of which compensation for salvage services was to be mutually settled by the committees of the associations: Held, that the master and crew of the salvaging vessel were not bound by such settlement, as they were not parties, and could not be taken to have acquiesced in it. (Adm. Div.) The Margery .....   |      | 304      |
| 12. National Lifeboat Institution—Launchers. —Lifeboats belonging to the National Lifeboat Institution which ultimately rendered salvage services to property were launched with the assistance of certain men, members of a company of fishermen. These men brought an action against the owners of the property salvaged to recover salvage for the services rendered by them in assisting to launch the lifeboats. Held, that those who assisted to launch the lifeboats were entitled to maintain an action for salvage. (Adm. Div.) The Cayo Bonito .....   |      | 603      |
| 13. Pilot—Scope of duties. —Where a pilot in charge of a ship engaged in salvaging another performed services which could not reasonably be considered to come within the scope of his contract as pilot, he was held entitled to receive salvage from the owners of the salvaged vessel. (Adm. Div.) The Santiago .....   |      | 147      |
| 14. Towage contract—Implied obligations. —The steamship G. while coming out of dock with the tugs H. and S. G. in attendance fouled her propeller, and drove against the barque E. G. , which was lying moored to the dock wall with three tugs fast to her, waiting to go into dock, causing her to break her moorings, and drift down with the G. on to a sandbank. The G. was eventually towed clear by her tugs, and the E. G. was then towed off. In an action for salvage by the five tugs against the E. G. : Held, that the three tugs in attendance on the E. G. were, under the circumstances, entitled to salvage, but that there was not sufficient evidence, according to the principle laid down in The Vandyck (47 L. T. Rep. 694; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 17; 7 P. Div. 42), from which a constructive acceptance of the services of the tugs H. and S. G. could be inferred, and that they were not entitled to salvage as against the E. G. (Adm. Div.) The Emilie Galline ...   |      | 401      |
| 15. Tug and tow—Negligence of tugmaster—Salvage by crew. —Where a tug has caused damage to the tow through the negligence of the master of the tug, and the assistance of the tug has had to be taken by the tow in order to save her, the other members of the crew are not entitled to recover salvage. (Adm. Div.) The Duc d'Aumale .....   |      | 502      |
| 16. Tug and tow—Towage contract—Negligence of tug. —Conditions in a contract of towage relieving the tug from liability for loss or damage and making her master and crew the servants of the tow, have no application to a claim by the tug for salvage from the tow, and if the tug renders salvage services to the tow, such services being rendered necessary by a collision partly brought about by the negligence of the tugmaster, the tug owners cannot claim salvage. (Adm. Div.) The Duc d'Aumale .....  |      | 502      |
| 17. Useful information—Later services. —A person who has done no more than give information   |      |          |

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

	PAGE
which results in the saving of property in danger, may be entitled to salvage reward. (Adm. Div.) The Marguerite Molinos .....	424
18. Value of salvaged property—End of salvage services. —A steam trawler towed a disabled steamship into Aberdeen Bay, and signals were made for a pilot and a tug. A tug came up in response and offered to pilot and tow the vessel into harbour, but the offer was refused by her master, and the tug sent back for a pilot. In the meanwhile the hawser parted, and the vessel drifted ashore. Her value at the time the services of the tug were offered was 8500 l. The costs of refloating were 1150 l. , and of the repairs in consequence of the stranding 5600 l. In an action for salvage by the owners, master, and crew of the trawler: Held, on the facts, that they were entitled to a salvage award of 750 l. , and that, for the purposes of determining the award, the value of the salvaged property was to be taken at 8500 l. Held, further, that the steamship ought to have taken the services of the tug when offered. (Adm. Div.) The Germania .....	538
See Charter-party, Nos. 18—Damage, No. 3—Marine Insurance, Nos. 16, 30—Practice, Nos. 7, 11, 12, 13.

SEAMEN.

1. Desertion—Forfeiture of wages—Mercantile Marine Superintendent. —There is no power to make a deduction from a seaman's wages on the ground of forfeiture after desertion, even though the seaman consents, except by order of a court of competent jurisdiction, and if the Superintendent of Mercantile Marine before whom the seaman is being discharged refuses to be present on the ground that such deduction is illegally made, and the balance of wages is paid by the master to the seaman in the absence of the superintendent, the master commits a breach of sect. 131 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 for having paid the wages otherwise than "through or in the presence of the superintendent." (K. B. Div.) Keslake (app.) v. Board of Trade (resps.) .....	491
2. Desertion—Lawful command—Merchant Shipping Act 1894, sect. 376. —A seaman can be convicted under sect. 376 (1) (d) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 for disobeying a lawful command, even although such disobedience amounts to desertion or absence without leave within sect. 376 (1) (a) or (b). (Q. B. Div.) Edgill (app.) v. J. and G. Alward Limited (resps.) ...	541
3. Desertion—Penalties—Foreign ship. —Sect. 236 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 which imposes penalties on persons persuading sailors to desert does not apply to foreign ships. (K. B. Div.) Poll v. Dambe .....	220
4. Distressed seamen—Evidence—Board of Trade. — Quære whether the production of the account of expenses mentioned in sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 and proof of its payment are "conclusive evidence" of the right of the Board of Trade to recover such expenses. (Ct. of App.) Board of Trade v. Sailing Ship Glenpark .....	550
5. Distressed seamen—Maintenance—Merchant Shipping Act 1894, sects. 190, 191, 193. —The question whether a seaman who has been shipwrecked abroad is a "distressed seaman" within the meaning of sects. 190, 191, and 193 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 is a question of fact. (Ct. of App.) Board of Trade v. Sailing Ship Glenpark Limited .....	550
6. Distressed seaman—Maintenance—Wages. —A "distressed seaman" does not of necessity cease to be a "distressed seaman" on his being paid the wages due to him, merely because such wages are enough to pay the expenses of his maintenance abroad and passage home. (Ct. of App.) Board of Trade v. Sailing Ship Glenpark Limited .....	413, 550

7. Lascars—Merchant Seamen (Indian) Act, No. 13 of 1876. —The crew space required for Lascars, who are British subjects and natives of India, upon ships registered in the United Kingdom, and trading between England and Australia and England and India, is regulated by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and not by the Merchant Seamen (Indian) Act No. 13 of 1876. (Mathew, J.) P. and O. Steam Navigation Company v. The King .....	228
8. Medical expenses and maintenance—Liability of shipowner—Merchant Shipping Act 1894, sect. 207, sub-sect. 1. —Where a seaman is injured in the service of the ship, the owners of the ship are not liable under sect. 207, sub-sect. 1, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 to defray the expenses of providing the necessary surgical and medical advice and attendance and medicine after he has been brought back to port in the United Kingdom (Ct. of App.) Anderson v. Rayner and others .....	385

SEAWORTHINESS.

See Carriage of Goods, Nos. 25 to 28—Carriage of Passengers, No. 3—Charter-party, No. 19.

SHIP.

Contract to build—"Circumstances beyond builders' control."—A contract for building a ship provided that due allowance should be made for delays through certain causes "or other circumstances beyond the builders' control." It was within the contemplation of the parties that the ship should be commenced as soon as a suitable berth became vacant, and the first berth which became vacant was one in which another ship was being built, and delay was caused in the completion of this ship by the same kind of causes which were provided for in the contract relating to the ship in question. Held, that allowance was to be made for delay in building the ship in the contract owing to the delay in completing the former vessel. (Wright, J.) Re an Arbitration between Lockie and Craggs and Son .....

SHIPWRIGHTS' LIEN.

See Lien, Nos. 1, 3.

SHORTHAND NOTES.

See Practice, No. 14.

SPEED.

See Collision, Nos. 24 to 29.

STAMP ACT.

See Marine Insurance, Nos. 18, 24, 25.

STEVEDORE.

See Carriage of Goods, No. 30.

STRIKE.

See Carriage of Goods, Nos. 6, 31, 32.

SUB-FREIGHT.

See Carriage of Goods, No. 19.

SUING AND LABOURING CLAUSE.

See Marine Insurance, Nos. 7, 26.

THAMES COLLISION REGULATIONS.

See Collision, Nos. 49, 50, 51.

TIME CHARTER.

See Carriage of Goods, No. 19.

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

	PAGE	PAGE
TIME POLICY.
See Marine Insurance , Nos. 18, 24, 25, 27, 28.
TONNAGE.
See Limitation of Liability .
TORTFEASORS.
See Collision , No. 10.
TUG AND TOW.
See Collision , Nos. 17, 42 to 46— Practice , No. 1— Salvage , Nos. 14, 15, 16.
TWIN SCREWS.
See Collision , No. 26.
VALUE.
See Collision , No. 19.
VALUED POLICY.
See Marine Insurance , Nos. 8, 9, 30.
VOYAGE POLICY.
See Marine Insurance , Nos. 8, 9, 30.
WAGES.
See Lien , Nos. 2, 3— Master's Wages and Disbursements—Mortgagor and Mortgagee , No. 6— Seamen , Nos. 1, 6.
WARRANTY OF FITNESS.
See Carriage of Goods , Nos. 25 to 28— Carriage of Passengers , No. 3— Charter-party No. 19— Marine Insurance , Nos. 2, 3, 4, 21, 22, 23.
WHISTLE.
See Collision , Nos. 29 to 31, 47, 48.
WORKING DAYS.
See Carriage of Goods , Nos. 6, 33.
WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT.
Insurance Company—Payment by—Ship .—The plaintiff, a workman who had been injured through the negligence of one of the defendants' servants, signed a receipt for a payment by the agent of an insurance company with whom the plaintiff's employers had effected insurance "on account of compensation which may be or become due to me under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897." Subsequently the plaintiff informed the agent that he could only accept further payments "without prejudice." He then accepted a payment and signed a receipt as before. Ultimately he commenced an action against the defendants claiming damages for personal injuries. Held, that the plaintiff had not exercised the option given to him by sect. 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 so as to preclude him from suing the person legally liable. (Ct. of App.) Oliver v. Nautilus Steamship Company Limited 436 WRECK.
Collision—Submerged wreck—Independent contractor .—The defendants' barge S. was lying sunk and submerged in the fairway of the river Thames without any negligence on the part of the defendants. The defendants employed an under-waterman, one F. , a fit and proper person for the purpose, to raise and remove the wreck. No arrangement as to marking and lighting her was made between them. The physical possession and control were taken over by F. Owing to the negligence of F. in not properly marking and lighting the S. , the plaintiff's steamship, the V. , came into collision with her. On the plaintiff suing the defendants for the damage so caused to the V. , it was held by Barnes, J. that the defendants were liable. The defendants appealed. Held (affirming the judgment of Barnes, J.), that the defendants were liable, since they had not shown that they had abandoned the possession and control of the S. so as to rid themselves of liability for damage caused by her, and also because the work of raising the barge was an operation likely to cause injury to members of the public lawfully using the highway of the river Thames, unless proper precautions were taken. The defendants could not rid themselves of the duty of taking such precautions by employing an independent contractor. (Ct. of App.) The Snark ..... 50
See Marine Insurance , Nos. 8, 20.
WRIT.
See Practice , Nos. 1, 5, 6.

REPORTS

OF

All the Cases Argued and Determined by the Superior Courts

RELATING TO

MARITIME LAW.

H. OF L.] FOREST STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. IBERIAN IRON ORE COMPANY. [H. OF L.]

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, Nov. 30, 1899.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury), Lords MACNAGHTEN and ROBERTSON.)

FOREST STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. IBERIAN
IRON ORE COMPANY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party — Construction — “Working days of twenty-four hours” — Demurrage.

*The appellants shipowners agreed by charter-party to provide the respondents with ships for the carriage of iron ore during a period of twelve months. The charter-party contained a clause as follows: “Charterers or their agents to be allowed 350 tons per working day of twenty-four hours, weather permitting (Sundays and holidays excepted), for loading and discharging . . .
to count from 6 a.m. of the day following the day when steamer is reported, unless she be reported before noon. . . . Steamer to work at night if required, also on Sundays and holidays, such time not to count as lay days unless used.”*

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the charterers were entitled to twenty-four working hours in which to load or discharge each 350 tons.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Smith and Williams, L.J.J., Rigby, L.J. dissenting), reported in 79 L. T. Rep. 240;
8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 438, affirming a judgment of Bigham, J. in the Commercial Court.

The appellants were the owners of the Forest steamship. The respondents were the owners of certain iron mines at Pedrosa, in the province of Seville, Spain, and made shipments of ore from the port of Seville to the United Kingdom and elsewhere. The appellants on the 30th April 1898 brought an action against the respondents to recover from the respondents 106*l.* 4*s.* in respect of four days' demurrage of the Forest alleged to be due under a charter-party dated the 14th Dec.
1897, a bill of lading dated the 19th March 1898, and an agreement dated the 25th March 1898.
The charter, which was partly printed and partly in writing, was in form a single voyage charter, but, by a clause at the end, it was agreed between the appellants and respondents that the charter should remain in force for the conveyance of about 50,000 tons of iron ore by steamers belonging to the appellants or other approved substitutes, in about equal monthly quantities over the year 1898. The present action was one of several actions brought to recover demurrage under the same charter, the question as to the meaning of the particular clause being raised in all the actions. The material clauses of the charter-party were as follows:

The act of God, the Queen's enemies, insurrections, riots, fire, frost, floods, strikes, lock-outs, stoppage of trains, accidents to mines, rolling stock or machinery, or other unavoidable hindrances beyond the personal control of shippers, charterers, or consignees, all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, canals, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature and kind soever always excepted, in such cases lay days not to count and demurrage not to accrue unless previously on demurrage. Charterers or their agents to be allowed 350 tons per working day of twenty-four hours, weather permitting (Sundays and holidays excepted), for loading and discharging, same to be reversible and to be averaged voyage by voyage to avoid demurrage and to count from 6 a.m. of the day following the day when steamer is reported at the custom house unless she be reported before noon and in which case time to count from notice of readiness and in every respect ready to load or discharge respectively and in free pratique.
Steamer to work at night if required, also on Sundays and holidays, such time not to count as lay days unless used. Any days on demurrage over and above the said laying days at sixpence per net register ton per day.
The captain to telegraph charterers' agents at port of loading the steamer's departure from outward port of discharge, or in default twelve hours more time to be allowed.

By their statement of claim the appellants alleged that taking the time occupied in loading and discharging together, and making all proper allowances, the ship was three days ten hours on demurrage, and at 6*d.* per ton per day on 1062 tons (the registered tonnage) the total amount of the appellants' claim for demurrage was 106*l.* 4*s.*
The appellants, in calculating the lay days, proceeded on the basis that the respondents were to perform the loading and discharging at the rate of 350 tons per working day, such days to be made up of periods of twenty-four hours reckoned from the time specified in the charter-party to the corresponding time on the following day, such hours being consecutive hours, subject, however, to the length of a day being extended by the number of hours (if any) during which the loading or discharging should be prevented by bad weather. The respondents by their defence raised two contentions on the construction of the charter, viz.: (1) that by reason of the clause in the charter, "Time . . . to be averaged voyage by voyage," no demurrage was ascertainable or payable until the whole of the 50,000 tons had been carried; (2) that the respondents were allowed twenty-four working hours for loading or discharging each 350 tons, and that inasmuch as the working hours for each day (at the time in question) at the port of Seville were from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., they were entitled (the cargo consisting of 2080 tons) to 284 working hours, or twelve days of twenty-four hours each, excluding Sundays and holidays. By an order made by Mathew, J. it was ordered that the action should be transferred to the Commercial List for trial, and it was directed by the judge that the question of construction of the charter should be tried as a preliminary question of law. The action was set down for trial on this preliminary point before Bigham, J., who found that the respondents were entitled, under the charter-party, to twenty-four working hours for the loading or discharging of each 350 tons; that in the calculation of such working hours the respondents were not entitled to exclude meal times; that the meaning of "voyage by voyage" in the charter-party was that the time occupied in loading and discharging for the purpose of demurrage must be calculated at the end of each voyage, and not at the end of the charter-party, and this judgment was affirmed on appeal as above mentioned.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cohen, Q.C. and Montague Lush appeared for the appellants.

J. Walton, Q.C. and Rufus Isaacs, Q.C. for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury): My Lords: I cannot in this case aver that my mind has been free from doubt as to the construction to be placed on these words, because I think that the parties have endeavoured to do somewhat clumsily what they might have done in more precise language. But on looking at the substance of the matter it appears to me to be tolerably clear what they intended, although I admit that their language has not been as clear and definite as I could wish. I think that the learned judge below, and the majority of the judges in the Court of Appeal, were right in the view which they took of this matter. When once the idea is realised that there was to be a conventional and artificial day, manufactured out of a certain number of hours—and that there was such a day is common ground to both parties—what the parties meant by this elaborate calculation is intelligible. They were not content to use the ordinary language of the charter-party. They wanted to get rid of some particular decision. Or it may be that they thought that some difficulty would occur when they took the periods allowed for loading at the different ports of the world, and they wanted to put more precisely what was the bargain between them. They wanted to keep a precise record of the time occupied. Therefore they have adopted this phraseology. But whatever the meaning of the particular phrase may be, although subject to criticism, I think that they meant, in effect, that they were going to have a conventional day of twenty-four hours, and the twenty-four hours day might be made up of broken portions of time in several days added together to ascertain how many days had been used in loading and discharging. Mr. Cohen admitted that there was to be a debit and credit account in hours, but how that was to be arranged unless these broken periods were to be reckoned together I cannot make out. Mr. Cohen sought to confine the words to the exceptional cases of night work, Sundays, and holidays, but the interpretation of the court below is much more satisfactory. Surely the whole scheme of the parties in breaking up what is the day, in its ordinary commercial and astronomical sense, into periods of twenty-four hours is intended to mean that the day is to consist of twenty-four working hours. There is no such thing as an "ordinary working day of twenty-four hours." The thing is absurd. The phrase shows that the parties intended to put the periods together and to ascertain the number of days by dividing the total number of hours by twenty-four. That is the only intelligible meaning which I can place upon the words, and it is the meaning given to them in the courts below. I do not say that the matter is free from doubt, and I should be sorry to say that this instrument is a model of clearness, but I think that a right decision has been arrived at, and I therefore move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be affirmed, and the appeal be dismissed with costs in this House and in the courts below.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion, though I admit that the document is very awkwardly expressed. But, on the whole, I prefer the construction adopted by Bigham, J. The difficulty seems to have arisen from the fact that the parties have put twenty-four hours into their conventional working day—the same number of hours as in an ordinary day. If the working day had been fixed at twelve hours there would have been no difficulty at all.

LORD ROBERTSON concurred.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs here and below.

Solicitors for the appellants, Botterell and Roche, for Vaughan and Hornsby, Cardiff.

Solicitors for the respondents, Cattarns and De Vesian.

March 20, 23, Nov. 16, and Dec. 14, 1899.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury), Lords MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, DAVEY, BRAMPTON, and ROBERTSON.)

RUABON STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. LONDON ASSURANCE. (a)

Marine insurance—Ship docked for repair of sea damage—Survey while in dock for reclassification—Apportionment of dock charges and expenses.

There is no principle of law which requires a person to contribute to an expenditure incurred by another merely because he has derived a benefit from it.

H. OF L.]

RUABON STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. LONDON ASSURANCE.

[H. OF L.]

In the course of a voyage covered by a policy of marine insurance a ship sustained damage by a peril insured against, and had to go into a dry dock for repairs.

While she was in dock the owners took advantage of the opportunity to have her surveyed for reclassification at Lloyd's, though the time for such survey was not yet due. The survey did not cause the ship to be detained in the dock for any time beyond what was necessary for completing the repairs.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the underwriters were liable for the whole of the expenses of getting the ship into and out of dock and for the dock dues, and that there should be no apportionment between them and the owners.

Marine Insurance Company v. China Transpacific Steamship Company (55 L. T. Rep. 491; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 68; 11 App. Cas. 573) distinguished.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Chitty and Collins, L.J.J., Smith, L.J. dissenting), reported 78 L. T. Rep. 402; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 369; (1898) 1 Q. B. 722, who had affirmed a judgment of Mathew, J., reported 77 L. T. Rep. 402; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 346; (1897) 2 Q. B. 456, at the trial of the action before him without a jury, in the Commercial Court.

The appellants were owners of the steamship Ruabon, which they insured under various policies, including a policy effected with the respondents for 2000*l.*, against loss or damage by perils of the sea.

On the 30th Nov. 1895, while the policy was in force, the Ruabon, while on a voyage from Kustendji to England, was stranded and suffered damage, for which it was admitted that the underwriters were liable. She was accordingly taken to Cardiff and put into dry dock for the purpose of having the necessary average repairs effected. After the repairs were completed, an average statement was prepared, according to which the respondents were liable to the appellants in the sum of 82*l.* 5*s.* From this, however, the respondents claimed to deduct 2*l.* 5*s.* for the following reasons: While the ship was in dry dock, in the course of repairing the damage caused by the stranding, the appellants took the opportunity of calling in Lloyd's surveyor to look at the ship, and ascertain whether any repairs were necessary to enable her to pass her No. 1 Lloyd's classification. The surveyor certified that no classification repairs were necessary, and the ship accordingly passed her classification. The time at which it would be necessary for the ship to be surveyed had not at that date arrived, but by the rules of Lloyd's Register the time might be anticipated, and the owners were at liberty to call for a survey at the time when the ship was in the dry dock.

The appellants contended that they did not in fact take the ship into dry dock, and the dock expenses were not incurred for the purpose, or with the intention, of having the ship surveyed and classified, the appellants only having taken advantage of her being there to call in the surveyor to inspect her bottom and see whether classification repairs would be necessary, and that the time during which the dock was used for effecting the underwriters' repairs was not in any way increased and no additional expenses were incurred by reason thereof.

The respondents contended that as the ship in fact underwent her classification survey at the same time that the average repairs were effected the docking expenses ought to be divided between owners and underwriters. They accordingly deducted from the sum of 82*l.* 5*s.* (for which they were liable according to the average statement) the sum of 2*l.* 5*s.* as representing the proportion of that portion of the docking expenses which was attributed to the defendants by the average statement which the defendants contended ought to be borne by owners.

No evidence was called at the trial, the action being tried on admissions made by the parties.

The admissions were:—

1. That the vessel in fact passed her No. 1 Classification Survey at Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping as required by the rules when she was in dock, the opportunity of her being in dock being taken to see if reclassification repairs were necessary.

2. That docking was necessary for the vessel to pass such survey.

3. That items amounting to 55*l.* were proper charges for the work done.

But the first admission was made subject to the following qualification or limitation: "But not that she went into dock for that purpose, nor that any such repairs were done, nor that the time had arrived at which it was necessary for her to pass such survey."

A similar qualification was attached to the second and third admission.

Mathew, J. decided in favour of the underwriters, the defendants below and respondents in the present appeal, on the ground that the case was covered by the decision in the case of The Vancouver (Marine Insurance Company v. China Transpacific Steamship Company, 55 L. T. Rep. 491; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 68; 11 App. Cas. 573).

March 20 and 23.—The case came on for argument before the Lord Chancellor (Halsbury), Lords Watson, Macnaghten, and Morris.

Cohen, Q.C. and Montague Lush appeared for the appellants.

J. Walton, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Lord Watson died on the 14th Sept. 1899, and their Lordships requiring further argument, the case was reargued on the 16th Nov. before the Lord Chancellor (Halsbury), Lords Macnaghten, Morris, Davey, Brampton, and Robertson.

Cohen, Q.C. (Montague Lush with him), for the appellants, contended that it was held in the court below that the case was governed by The Vancouver case (ubi sup.), but in that case there were two sets of repairs—owner's repairs as well as underwriter's repairs—which distinguishes it. It was necessary to dock the ship to repair damages which had to be done then, but it was not necessary that she should then go into dock to be surveyed for classification. The survey did not affect or delay the repairs in any way. The underwriters are liable to indemnify the owners, and this liability covers these expenses. The argument on the other side must go to the extent of saying that, if any incidental advantage is gained by the ship being in dock, such as the opportunity for a survey, the expenses must be apportioned. The Vancouver case, so far from deciding that, decides the contrary. In that case it was said that if any portion of the dock charges for the time during which the owner's repairs were going on were borne by the underwriters it would go beyond their indemnity, but the House decided that they were to bear a part. The argument was that the whole expenses were not to be borne by the owner, and it was so decided, but the decision gave the owner a profit beyond his indemnity. The underwriters undertake to indemnify against all damage, and the owner need not account for an incidental profit.

J. Walton, Q.C. (J. A. Hamilton with him), argued that the case was covered by the decision in The Vancouver case. The only difference is that in that case the ship went into dock in the first instance for owner's repairs, whereas in this case it was for underwriter's repairs. On principle the cases are indistinguishable, only the positions are reversed. The underwriters are contending here for what the owners contended for there. The question is, What was the loss covered by the policy? The contract of insurance is an indemnity measured by the cost of repairs. The test is, for whose benefit was the expenditure made?

Cohen, Q.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Dec. 14.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of Halsbury).—My Lords: The sum sought to be recovered in this case is a very small one, but the principle discussed and decided is one of very far-reaching importance, and I am unable to concur in the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal. The agreed facts may be very shortly stated. The steamship Ruabon having been placed in dock for the purpose of repairs, for which the underwriters were liable, while she was in dock the owner took advantage of the opportunity to have the vessel surveyed. It is part of the agreed facts that the holding of the survey added not a farthing to the cost, or a moment to the period of time during which the execution of the repairs proceeded, and the question raised is whether the owner of the vessel is liable on any reason known to the law to bear part of the expense involved in the docking of the vessel and keeping her there while the repairs were being executed. I notice that in more than one of the judgments it is said that the owner of the vessel used the dock for his own purposes. I think that there is a fallacy in the employment of that word "used." He went on to his own vessel and held a survey, and I think that it is not true to say that the dock was used for his purposes at all. He took advantage of the opportunity which was afforded to him by another person (the insuring company) being under contract to do that themselves which gave him an opportunity of seeing the vessel, and for which, if he had been minded to make a survey, he would have had to pay himself. But unless the phrase

"using of the dock" is explained, it seems to me to be fallacious first to say that he used the dock and then to infer that as he used the dock he is called upon to pay for it. I propose to examine in detail the various cases, or rather the various classes of cases, where the right to contribution has been held to be part of our law. But it seems to me a very formidable proposition indeed to say that any court has a right to enforce what may seem to them to be just, apart from common law or statute. The courts, no doubt, will enforce the common law, and will apply it to new questions of fact which arise; but I cannot understand how it can be asserted that it is part of the common law that where one person gets some advantage from the act of another a right of contribution towards the expense from that act arises on behalf of the person who has done it. Many cases might be put where the generality of such a proposition would be plainly contrary to any received principle, and to my mind the question now in debate—admitted to be absolutely novel—would not be covered by any principle known to the law, except such a general proposition as I have indicated above. Now, I am unable to affirm that that is the condition of the common law.

The doctrine of "Average" has been repeatedly held to be a rule derived from the maritime law of Rhodes. In his judgment in Strang v. Scott (61 L. T. Rep. 597; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 419; 14 App. Cas. 601) Lord Watson said: "The rule of contribution in cases of jettison has its origin in the maritime law of Rhodes, of which the text as presented by Paulus (Dig. L. 14, tit. 2) is, 'Si levandæ navis gratiâ jactus mercium factus est, omnium contributione sarciatur, quod pro omnibus datum est.'" Bramwell, L.J., it is true, in Wright v. Marwood (45 L. T. Rep. 297; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 451; 7 Q. B. Div. 62), rested it upon an implied contract inter se to contribute by those interested. Brett, M.R., on the other hand, in Burton v. English (49 L. T. Rep. 768; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 12 Q. B. Div. 218), spoke of it as a right arising not from any contract at all, but from the old Rhodian laws, which had been incorporated into the law of England as the law of the ocean. It is not necessary to go minutely into the arguments arising from the difference of opinion as to the origin of the law. It is, at all events, a known principle enforceable by the courts, resting either upon positive enactment adopted into our law or from an implied contract between the parties. So Lord Coke in Sir William Harbert's case (3 Rep. 11, b) explains very clearly when dealing with "contribution." He says: "Note, reader, when it is said before and often in our books that if one purchaser be only extended for the whole debt, that he shall have contribution; it is not thereby intended that the others shall give or allow to him anything by way of contribution, but it ought to be intended that the party, who is only extended for the whole, may by audita querela or scire facias, as the case requires, defeat the execution, and thereby he shall be restored to all the mean profits, and compel the conusee to sue execution of the whole land; so in this manner everyone shall be contributory, hoc est, the land of every tenant shall be equally extended." Lord Redesdale in the case of Stirling v. Forrester (3 Blyth, 596), said that "the decision in Dering v. Lord Winchilsea (1 Cox, 318; 2 Bos. & Puller, 270) proceeded on a principle of law which must exist in all countries, that where several persons are debtors all shall be equal. The doctrine is illustrated in that case by the practice in questions of 'Average,' &c., where there is no express contract, but equity distributes the loss equally. On the prisage of wines, it is immaterial whose wines are taken; all must contribute equally, so it is where goods are thrown overboard for the safety of the ship, the owners of the goods saved by that act must contribute proportionally to the loss. The duty of contribution extends to all persons who are within the scope of the equitable obligation." I know of no case in which anything like the present claim has been advanced. There is no debt here for which both the parties in question are bound to some third person. It cannot be denied that the underwriters here were themselves bound to incur all the liability they did incur, and that the ship-owner was under no such liability. There is here no joint ownership which makes a liability upon all partaking of that ownership, and which liability each is under an obligation to some third person to fulfil. In another part of Lord Redesdale's observations in the case of Stirling v. Forrester, his Lordship makes clear what he means by his commentary on the case of Dering v. Lord Winchilsea. He says: "The principle established in the case of Dering v. Lord Winchilsea is universal, that the right and duty of contribution is founded in doctrines of equity, it does not depend upon contract. If several persons are indebted and one makes the payment the creditor is bound in conscience, if not by contract, to give to the party paying the debt, all his remedies against the other debtors. The cases of average in equity rest upon the same principle. It would be against equity for the creditors to exact or receive payment from one and to permit, or by his conduct to cause, the other debtors to be exempt from payment. He is bound, seldom by contract but always in conscience as far as he is able, to put the party paying the debt upon the same footing with those who are equally bound. That was the principle of the decision in Dering v. Lord Winchilsea and in that case there was no evidence of contract as in this. So in the case of land descending to coparceners, subject to a debt, if the creditor proceeds against one of the coparceners the others must contribute. If the creditor discharges one of the coparceners he cannot proceed for the whole debt against the others; at the most they are only bound to pay their proportions." In all the cases to which I have referred, and in all the observations made by the learned judges, the liability of each of the persons held to be bound to contribute is assumed to exist either by contract or by some obligation binding them all to equality of payment or sacrifice in respect of that common obligation. But this is the first time in which it has been sought to advance that principle where there is nothing in common between the two persons, except that one person has taken advantage of something that another person has done, there being no contract between them—there being no obligation by which each of them is bound; and the duty to contribute is alleged to arise only on some general principle of justice, that a man ought not to get an advantage unless he pays for it. So that if a man were to cut down a wood which obscured his neighbour's prospect and gave him a better view, he ought upon this principle to be compelled to contribute to cutting down the wood. Or if a man built a wall so as to shield his neighbour's house from undue wet or danger from violent tempests, he ought to be entitled to contribution because he has got an advantage from what his neighbour did. I can find no authority for any principle which includes this case.

H. OF L.]

RUABON STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. LONDON ASSURANCE.

[H. OF L.]

The heads of "Average," "Principal and Surety," "Joint Debtor," or "Ownership of Lands," all of which are liable in execution and only one of which has been made the subject of execution, are intelligible heads of the law, and are included within well-known and ascertained principles. This case seems to me to go entirely beyond those ascertained principles, and for it there would appear to be no authority. No statute has authorised it; no principle of the common law comprehends it; and I am therefore unable to concur with the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal. But it remains to consider whether the case is not covered by authority. That supposed authority is to be found in what has been called The Vancouver case—The Marine Insurance Company Limited v. The China Transpacific Company Limited (55 L. T. Rep. 491; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 68; 11 App. Cas. 573). I cannot think that that case establishes any such proposition as is insisted on here. In that case the sole question was whether a particular average loss sustained by the respondent exceeded 3 per cent. within the meaning of the warranty. It is necessary to observe somewhat minutely the facts of that case, in order to see whether there is anything in it which affects the question now in debate. The Vancouver, the vessel in question, was insured in a time policy which contained the warranty "free from average under 3 per cent." During a voyage covered by the policy she sustained certain damage not known at the time, but when some time after the owners, for their own purposes of cleaning and scraping her, put her into dock, the damage was observed then and there, and the underwriters were of course liable to make good the particular average loss for which under the policy they were liable. The question having arisen in this form, and the owners having paid the whole of the dock dues while the vessel was being scraped and cleaned, and while simultaneously the obligation of the underwriters was being fulfilled by the repair of the damage, it was argued that by the accidental circumstance of the owner having put his vessel into dock, and the underwriter having thereby escaped any liability to the dock owner for dock dues, the cost of repairs to him was brought under the agreed amount of 3 per cent. What the court had to determine was the liability under the policy in question, and with reference to that question which, be it observed, is to be measured by what the damage would cost to repair, the court held that the dock dues were part of the cost, and that under the circumstances, as the operations were simultaneously performed, the cost should be attributed (let the phrases be noted) in moieties to the operations of those two persons interested. Now the owner paid the dock dues, and if he had not done so the underwriter would undoubtedly have had to pay for dock dues and if he had, the amount paid would have been over 3 per cent. It came, in fact, to a calculation of the extent of the damage done, and that being measured by its cost of repair, it was held that the 3 per cent. was reached. What Lord Herschell meant is, I think, sufficiently explained by what he says in commenting on the case of Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (46 L. T. Rep. 863; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 9 Q. B. Div. 192), as to the mode in which the particular average loss was to be arrived at in that case. He says: "All the judges were, I think, agreed that where there is a partial loss in consequence of injury to a vessel by perils insured against, and the ship is actually repaired by the shipowner, he is entitled as a general rule to recover the sum properly expended in executing the necessary repairs, less the usual allowances." Now the facts found in that case which is relied on were that the vessel was put into dry dock on the 4th Jan. 1876. It was discovered on the afternoon of the same day that her stern post was broken. It was found by the special case that if the vessel had required nothing but scraping and cleaning, the purpose for which alone she was put there by her owners, she might have been finished and discharged by the evening of the 6th, whereas for the purposes of her repair, for which the underwriters were responsible, she required the whole time from the 4th to 11th Jan., when in fact she was discharged. How a mode of thus calculating the particular average loss so as to satisfy the contract between the two parties to it can justify such a proposition as is here insisted on, I am wholly unable either to understand or to agree to, and I think this judgment should be reversed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I concur. I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack that there is no principle of law which requires that a person should contribute to an outlay merely because he has derived a material benefit from it, nor is there, I think, any authority to be found for the application of such a proposition, unless it is to be found in The Vancouver case. The Vancouver case has been supposed to go some way in that direction in a question between shipowner and underwriter, where ship's repairs and underwriter's repairs are carried out simultaneously. But it must be borne in mind that the question for decision in that case was "whether a particular average loss sustained by the respondents exceeded 3 per cent. within the meaning of the warranty contained in a policy of assurance underwritten by the appellants," and that (as Lord Herschell was careful to point out) was the sole question for decision. It was not decided that the shipowner was liable for one half the cost of the use of the dock, including dock charges, but that the underwriter in respect of his obligation was liable at least for one half of the cost. That was enough in the particular case to give the victory to the shipowner, and in this House he could not have asked for more.

Lord MORRIS concurred.

Lord DAVEY.—My Lords: I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment of my noble and learned friend Lord Brampton. It expresses my opinion so much better than I could express it myself that I will not trouble your Lordships with any observations of my own.

Lord BRAMPTON.—My Lords: I entirely concur in the judgment which has been delivered by the Lord Chancellor. I take the general rule to be correctly stated by Lord Herschell in The Vancouver case, "that where there is a partial loss in consequence of injury to a vessel by perils insured against, and the ship is actually repaired by the shipowner, he is entitled to recover the sum properly expended in executing the necessary repairs, less the usual allowances, as the measure of his loss." I take it also as admitted that, but for the matter which I am about to mention, it would not be disputed that the respondents were liable under their policy to pay as an indemnity against the loss by perils of the sea which occurred, the full sum of 82l. 5s. claimed. This represents prima facie their responsibility. The respondents seek to reduce this amount by the sum of 2l. 5s. by reason of a survey of the ship which the plaintiffs, the owners, caused to be made by Lloyd's surveyor, during the period in which the vessel was under repair on the pontoon, which, for this purpose, I may call a dry dock. If they are right in making a reduction on this account, no question being raised as to the amount, the respondents are entitled to retain the judgment pronounced in their favour by the majority of the Court of Appeal. Since the decision of The Vancouver case (ubi sup.), by which, of course, we are bound, and which to me seems to be founded on good sense, it is not, in my opinion, open to question that where two operations are essentially necessary to be performed upon the hull of the ship in order to render her in a condition to justify a prudent owner in sending her again to sea, one of such operations being to effect repairs for the cost of which underwriters are responsible—the other to clean and scrape the ship necessitated by wear and tear, the cost of which must be borne by the owners themselves, neither of which operations could be performed unless the ship were drydocked, and both of which operations the owners and underwriters, or owners acting for themselves and also for the underwriters, deem it expedient should be performed at one and the same time, or that one should immediately follow the other without any substantial interval under one continuous drydocking, in such cases the cost of docking and all dock dues during the period in which the vessel is in dock must be shared in proportion, having regard to the period of joint or separate actual use of it. I do not, however, find anything in The Vancouver case which would justify such division of dock dues, unless in such cases as I have mentioned. The present is a very different case. The Ruabon was drydocked solely to enable the underwriters to effect the repairs for which they were liable and with no other object, and no other repair was, in fact, done or required to be done on the ship; the survey of Lloyd's surveyor was in no way necessary for any purpose connected with the work performed on the vessel, but was only made to entitle the owners to reclassification at Lloyd's, and need not have been made at that moment, nor at any particular time, so long as it was made within the time limited by Lloyd's rules, which had then nine months to run. It is quite true that if it had not then been made it would have been necessary if she were afterwards surveyed to have incurred the expense of again drydocking her at the owners' expense, and to that extent the owners might have benefited. I say might, because the owners might have sold the vessel in the meantime, or some other thing might have occurred to render such survey unnecessary. Assuming, however, that the expense of another drydocking was in this way saved, and that to that extent the owners were benefited, I think that circumstance immaterial, and it does not warrant a claim for contribution towards the dock dues imperatively incurred on the underwriters' account in the discharge of their obligations. I think that such contribution can only be insisted upon in those cases where work is done to the vessel itself by two or more persons, each separately and simultaneously engaged under different obligations in doing portions of it, drydocking being necessary for each. If the respondents' claim for contribution were allowed, I see no reason why such a claim might not be made against an owner who, while his ship was in dry dock sold her, subject to immediate inspection and survey by his purchaser. A variety of other cases similar in character might be suggested. I think that the owners, in causing the survey to be made in this case, were taking what Lord Herschell termed "an incidental advantage" from the fact that a damage arising from a risk within the policy had necessitated repairs at the expense of the underwriter; and he puts by way of illustration the case of a vessel in ordinary course requiring scraping and painting at intervals of five years, and before the time for such operation has arrived meeting with a disaster by perils of the sea and docked for repairs for which underwriters were responsible; and the shipowner taking the opportunity of scraping and painting his ship. In repudiating the notion that the entire time occupied in that operation should be borne by the shipowner, he adds, "if they were to be borne by him at all." This observation of that noble and learned Lord makes it clear to me that he did not contemplate his judgment covering such a case as this, where nothing was in fact done on the ship, and the survey did not in the smallest degree delay the completion or add one farthing to the expense of the repairs done for the underwriter. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

Lord ROBERTSON concurred.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed, with costs here and below.

Solicitors for the appellants, Botterell and Roche, for Vaughan and Roche, Cardiff.

Solicitors for the respondents, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, Nov. 14, 1899.

(Before SMITH, COLLINS, and WILLIAMS, L.JJ.)

WEIR AND CO. v. GIRVIN AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Advance freight—Destruction of goods by fire on board while loading—Charter-party—Construction.

By a charter-party the charterers agreed to load on the ship a full and complete cargo for carriage from the Tyne to San Francisco. Freight was to be paid at a certain rate per ton on the quantity to be delivered to the consignees; and was to be paid two-thirds in cash three days after sailing, ship lost or not lost, the balance on unloading and right delivery of the cargo. Fire was a peril mutually excepted. Part of the cargo after being loaded was destroyed by fire before the ship sailed. The charterers subsequently loaded more cargo of sufficient amount, taking the amount destroyed into consideration, to fill up the carrying space of the vessel. Three days after sailing the owners claimed advance freight on two-thirds of a full cargo. Held, affirming the judgment of Lord Russell, C.J., that the owners were not entitled to advance freight on the part of the cargo which had been destroyed by fire.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of Lord Russell, C.J. at the trial of the action without a jury, which is reported in 79 L. T. Rep. 596; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 470; (1899) 1 Q. B. 193.

The action was upon a charter-party, of which the material parts are as follows:—

London, 31st March 1898.—It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. A. Weir and Co., owners of the good ship or vessel called the Olivebank . . . and Messrs. Girvin, Roper, and Co., of London, as agents for Girvin and Eyre, of San Francisco, that the said ship . . . shall with all convenient speed . . . proceed to a loading berth . . . in the river Tyne . . . and there, always afloat, in the usual and customary manner load . . . a full and complete cargo of coke and lawful merchandise (excluding coals, subject to stipulations in margin, scrap iron, acids, gunpowder, and explosives) cargo being of such a nature as will load vessel to Lloyd's freeboard (subject to provisions of side clause) weight cargo to be supplied and shipped before the coke . . . which the said charterers bind themselves to ship, and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to San Francisco, California, and deliver the same in the usual and customary manner . . . the captain to sign bills of lading for the weight of cargo taken on board as presented without prejudice to the tenor of this charter, providing same equal the amount of chartered freight. . . . Charterers liability with respect to this charter to cease, except for freight as provided, on the vessel being loaded, the owner or captain to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all unpaid freight and demurrage . . . freight for the said cargo to be paid on final discharge at the rate of 16s. per ton of 2240lb. on the quantity to be delivered to the consignees, except on cargo shipped in Hull as hereinafter provided; the freight to be due and paid as follows:

two-thirds in cash, less 6 per cent. for all charges, three days after sailing from Tyne, ship lost or not lost, the balance on unloading and right delivery of the cargo to be paid in United States gold coin at the exchange of four dollars eighty cents. per pound sterling; the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraint of princes and rulers, fire . . . always mutually excepted. . . .

In the margin of the charter-party was written the following note :

Charterers undertake to ship and owners to load 1000 tons of dead weight cargo (of which 500 tons may be Cannel coal in charterers' option) in manner required by master in Hull on due notice being given, vessel being where cargo can be delivered in usual manner: freight on cargo shipped at Hull being paid at 14s. per ton: in event of charterers not loading vessel to her marks it is agreed that freight shall be paid on the basis of 4350 tons, which owners hereby guarantee to be vessel's capacity of cargo for this voyage less pro rata freight on any quantity of cargo short delivered in San Francisco.

While the ship was being loaded a fire broke out on board and destroyed 1478 tons of cargo.

The charterers subsequently loaded 2590 tons more cargo, an amount which, with the 1478 tons previously shipped, would have exhausted the carrying space of the vessel, but would not have loaded her down to her marks.

The ship then sailed for San Francisco.

Three days later the owners asked for payment of the advance freight due under the charter-party, and claimed to be entitled to two-thirds of the freight on 4350 tons.

The defendants contended that they were liable to pay only on 4350 tons less the 1478 tons destroyed by fire.

At the trial of the action Lord Russell, C.J. decided in favour of the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Carver, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to the advance freight which they claim, because the defendants were bound to pay two-thirds of the freight upon all goods shipped in advance three days after the sailing of the ship. If the goods are loaded and the vessel is able to sail, the right to the advance freight is complete, and it is immaterial what happens to the cargo if it is once shipped :

The Oriental Steamship Company Limited v. Tylor and another, 69 L. T. Rep. 577; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 377; (1893) 2 Q. B. 518.

Though freight is only payable upon safe delivery of the goods, yet "advance freight" is payable whether the goods are delivered or not. The placing of the cargo on board is the condition which has to be performed in order to make "advance freight" payable :

Kirchner v. Venus, 12 Moore P. C. 361;

Allison v. Bristol Marine Insurance Company, 34 L. T. Rep. 809; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 312; 1 App. Cas. 209.

That condition was performed as soon as this cargo was placed on board, and what happened afterwards is immaterial :

Aitken, Lilburn, and Co. v. Ernsthause and Co., 70 L. T. Rep. 822; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 462; (1894) 1 Q. B. 773.

The fact that fire was one of the perils excepted does not affect the payment of "advance freight," for fire would not prevent the payment of advance freight for cargo which had in fact been loaded.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Scrutton for the defendants.—The charter-party says that two-thirds of the freight is to be paid three days after the ship has sailed. That must refer to the freight mentioned in the preceding clause, which is payable at the rate of 16s. per ton on the cargo to be delivered to the consignees. That must be the cargo estimated to be delivered. Therefore, if, before the ship sails, it is known that some of the cargo cannot be delivered, such cargo ought not to be taken into the calculation. If a full cargo were put on board so that the ship is loaded down to her marks, 4350 tons would be the basis on which the two-thirds freight would be calculated, unless part of the cargo actually put on board is so dealt with by excepted perils that it cannot be delivered. The marginal clause provides an agreed measure of damages in case of a breach of contract if the ship is not loaded down to her marks. A payment of advance freight is a payment on account of freight. How, then, can there be a payment on account of a sum which can never become payable?

Smith, Hill, and Co. v. Pyman, Bell, and Co., 64 L. T. Rep. 436; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 7; (1891) 1 Q. B. 742.

Carver, Q.C. in reply.

SMITH, L.J.—The question in this case arises on the construction of a charter-party, and the dispute is between insurers on advance freight payable under the charter-party and insurers on freight. The charterers were bound to load a full and complete cargo, and they were also bound to load the vessel down to her marks. A clause in the contract provides that in case of a breach of that agreement a certain conventional figure is to be taken on which the charterer is to pay freight at the agreed rate per ton. That conventional figure is 4350 tons. Now, the question is as to the amount of advance freight which the charterers are to pay. The charterers were bound by the charter-party to load in the river Tyne a full and complete cargo of coke and lawful merchandise, excluding certain specified things, the cargo to be "of such a nature as will load vessel to Lloyd's freeboard (subject to provisions of side clause)," and the ship being so loaded was to proceed therewith to San Francisco and deliver the cargo there. Freight was agreed "to be paid on final discharge at the rate of 16s. per ton of 2240lb. on the quantity to be delivered to the consignees." If the charterers should not load a full and complete cargo of such a nature as to load the vessel to Lloyd's freeboard, then the side clause, which has reference to the vessel's capacity of cargo for the voyage, was to come into effect. Then the charter-party goes on to provide that freight "is to be due and paid as follows: Two-thirds in cash, less 6 per cent. for all charges, three days after sailing from Tyne, ship lost or not lost, and the balance on unloading and right delivery of the cargo." Now what happened was this: Some of the cargo was shipped, but before the time arrived for payment of the advanced freight, 1478 tons of it were destroyed by fire. The charter-party contains an exception of loss by fire, and it seems to me that the case of Aitken, Lilburn, and Co. v. Ernsthause and Co. (ubi sup.) is applicable. Since part of the cargo after being put on board was destroyed by an excepted peril, the charterers were not bound to ship further cargo in place of what was destroyed, although they were bound to load a full and complete cargo, neither can they be called upon to pay freight in respect of what was destroyed. In respect of that destroyed part of the cargo there was no further duty on the charterers to load the ship nor was there any duty on the shipowners to carry. The part of the ship that would have been taken up by the destroyed cargo was at the disposal of the shipowners to fill up as they might desire provided that the contemplated voyage was not thereby delayed. It is clear that the 1478 tons of destroyed cargo were out of the question altogether before the time came for paying the advance freight. Then comes the question on what was advance freight to be paid? Freight, as I have said, was to be paid at the rate of 16s. per ton "on the quantity to be delivered to the consignees." I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that, in consequence of the destruction by fire of the 1478 tons, the conventional sum of 4350 tons is to be taken as the basis on which the calculation is to be made. As no freight is payable on the 1478 tons, that number of tons must be deducted from the 4350 tons, leaving a balance of 2872 tons. That is the freight earning capacity of the ship for the voyage in question, and the two-thirds freight, which is payable in advance, must be calculated on that number of tons. That is the true meaning of the charter-party. I think that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was right, and that this appeal must consequently be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Though my mind has fluctuated a good deal, I confess, in the course of the argument, I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice is right. The difficulty arises from the fact that the sum to be paid as advance freight is an aliquot part of another sum, and the question is, what is that other sum? That depends on the terms of the charter-party. On the one side it has been contended that the amount of freight payable under the charter-party is finally ascertained as soon as the cargo is put on board, and that, therefore, the aliquot part of it, which is payable as advance freight, is determined when the cargo is put on board irrespective of what cargo may be eventually delivered. On the other side it is said that the charter-party declares that freight is only payable on the quantity of cargo finally delivered to the consignees. The mode of payment of the freight is, by the charter-party, to be "two-thirds in cash, less 6 per cent. for all charges, three days after sailing from Tyne, ship lost or not lost, and the balance on unloading and right delivery of the said cargo." On that part of the charter-party the criterion of what is to be paid for freight is so much per ton on the quantity delivered to the consignees. Then there is a side clause which comes into play in consequence of the fire which destroyed part of the cargo. The charterers did not put on board enough cargo to load the ship down to her marks, and therefore 4350 tons is to be taken as the full capacity of the vessel for cargo, and freight is to be paid on that basis. It was contended that freight was to be paid on the entire 4350 tons, and that the advance freight payable was, therefore, two-thirds of the freight on 4350 tons. But the words of the side clause do not support that contention, because, though it mentions 4350 tons as the agreed capacity of the vessel, it provides for a deduction of "pro rata freight on any quantity of cargo short delivered in San Francisco." So that the sum to be paid as freight is one which is to be ascertained either by knowledge or by speculation as to what amount of cargo may be delivered at San Francisco. For the plaintiffs it was argued that, in providing for the payment of two-thirds of the freight in advance, the parties must be supposed to have excluded from consideration everything that might happen at San Francisco, because they have inserted into the clause the expression "ship lost or not lost," showing thereby an intention that the obligation to pay advance freight should not depend on any speculation as to what might happen subsequently. The Lord Chief Justice held that that argument could not be sustained, and I agree with him. I think that the advance freight is payable on the amount of cargo to be delivered. The parties have agreed that in one event, the loss of the ship, it is payable on cargo which cannot be delivered, but the provision with regard to that one event does not cut down the rights of the parties in other events. Here certainty has been substituted for speculation, and a certain part of the cargo has been excluded from the possibility of earning freight. The delivery of that part of the cargo is not prevented by reason of the loss of the vessel, but by reason of fire, which the charterers are entitled to rely upon as relieving them from liability. That is the result of considering the obligations contained in the body of the charter-party. Then, taking the side clause, it seems to me to be worded still more favourably to the charterers, because in a certain case, in the event of a short delivery of cargo, a deduction is to be made of pro rata freight. Here it was known to both parties at the time for paying the advance freight, that in respect of a certain number of tons of cargo no freight would ever become payable. That is a fact which must be taken into consideration. Therefore, taking 4350 tons as a basis for our calculation, I think we must deduct the number of tons in respect of which both parties knew that no freight would be payable. I agree, therefore, with the decision of the Lord Chief Justice.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I think that the word "freight" is used in this charter-party in one sense only. There was a time in the history of our law, after the judgment in Kirchner v. Venus (ubi sup.) in 1859, when it was supposed that advance freight and freight were different things; that advance freight was not merely something paid on account of freight, but was a loan or money paid in consideration of goods being put on board the ship. Even Blackburn, J. entertained that view at the time when he gave his opinion to the House of Lords in Allison v. Bristol Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.). But it is clear from the judgments delivered in the House of Lords that that is not a correct view. "Freight" has the same meaning whether it is payable as advance freight or not. It may be agreed to be payable on the delivery of the goods to be carried, or it may be stipulated to be payable partly in advance. Still, each payment is a payment of freight. But of course it is plainly within the competence of the parties to a charter-party to make stipulations regulating the payment of each part of the entire freight, and they constantly agree that the payment of that which is payable in advance shall not be dependent on the delivery of the goods or the performance of the voyage. That is what has been done in the charter-party we are now considering. The stipulations regulating the payment of part of the freight do not alter the nature of the whole of it. What has happened in this case is that by reason of a fire, a peril within the mutual exception clause, part of the ship became vacant space, having no relation to the charter-party and not available for carrying goods under the charter-party. This seems to me to alter the total freight out of which parts are payable at different times, but it does not alter stipulations affecting the payment of those parts. The charter-party continues to apply in its entirety, and the side clause also, but in consequence of the fire the total amount of cargo in respect of which freight is payable has been altered. This seems to me to be the outcome of the decision in Aitken, Lilburn, and Co. v. Ernsthause and Co. (ubi sup.), but I wish to say that I should have arrived at the same conclusion even if that case had never been decided. The practical difference between advance freight and freight is a difference arising from the stipulations agreed upon as to payment of one part and another, but they still remain parts of one whole, and the alteration of the amount of the whole freight does not affect the stipulations as to the payment of the different parts.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hollams, Sons, Coward, and Hawksley.

Wednesday, Nov. 15, 1899.

(Before SMITH, COLLINS, and WILLIAMS, L.JJ.)

THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF THE CITY OF BRISTOL v. THE OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP GLANMIRE; THE BRUNEL. (a)

Collision—Limitation of liability—Meaning of "15 tons burden"—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 2, 3, 503.

The words "ships not exceeding 15 tons burden" in sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 mean ships, the net register tonnage of which, ascertained according to the provisions of that Act, does not exceed 15 tons; hence an unregistered ship, the gross tonnage of which, ascertained according to the Act, exceeds 15 tons, but whose net registered tonnage, ascertained for the purpose of registration according thereto, is less than 15 tons, is exempt from registration, and her owners are entitled to limit their liability calculated upon a tonnage so ascertained.

Judgment of Barnes, J. (79 L. T. Rep. 527; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 477) upheld.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Barnes, J. holding that the plaintiffs, the owners of the steam-tug Brunel, were entitled to limit their liability in respect of a collision which occurred in Oct. 1897 between the Brunel and the steam-tug Iris. In consequence of the collision, the defendants' vessel, the Glanmire, which was in tow of the Iris, sustained damage.

An action was instituted by the defendants against the plaintiffs for the damage so caused, and the plaintiffs subsequently admitted liability for the collision.

The plaintiffs then brought this action to limit their liability. The facts of the case were as follows: The gross tonnage of the Brunel, measured in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, was 35·99 tons, the allowance for propelling power space was 31·15 tons, and for crew space 6·73 tons, making the net register tonnage a minus quantity.

The defendants resisted the plaintiffs' claim to limit their liability upon the ground that the vessel was unregistered, although not exempt from the obligation to be registered.

The plaintiffs claimed that she was exempt from registration under the Act as being a vessel under 15 tons burden, and so was entitled to claim the protection of sect. 503.

It was admitted by the defendants that the Brunel was a vessel employed solely in navigation on the rivers or coasts of the United Kingdom: (see sect. 3, sub-sect. 1).

Sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, of the Act provides that every British ship shall, unless exempted from registry, be registered under the Act.

Sub-sect. 2 provides that if a ship required by the Act to be registered is not registered under the Act, she shall not be recognised as a British ship.

Sect. 3 provides that the following ships are exempted from registry under this Act:

Sub-sect. 1. Ships not exceeding 15 tons burden employed solely in navigation on the rivers or coasts of the United Kingdom, or on the rivers or coasts of some British possession within which the managing owners of the ships are resident.

By sect. 503, sub-sect. 1, the owners of a ship, British or foreign, are entitled to limit their liability to an amount not exceeding 8*l.* per ton, in circumstances which would include those of this case.

Barnes, J. held that the plaintiffs were entitled to limit their liability.

The defendants appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Aspinall, Q.C. for the defendants.—The Brunel is not entitled to the protection of sect. 503. She was not registered, and unless she was exempted under sect. 3 (1) she ought to have been registered by sect. 2 (1), and for her failure to be so registered she was not by sect. 2 (2) entitled to be recognised as a British ship. Sect. 72 declares that in such a case a vessel is not entitled to the protection and privileges afforded by the Act, and consequently the owners of the Brunel were not entitled to the protection of sect. 503. This depends upon whether she was a vessel not exceeding 15 tons burden: see sect. 3 (1). It is submitted that "tons burden" in that section means gross tonnage ascertained according to the provisions of the Act. From this certain deductions have to be made to ascertain the "net registered tonnage." Barnes, J. held that "tons burden" means "net registered tonnage." The Andalusian (39 L. T. Rep. 204; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 23; 3 P. Div. 182) throws some light on the meaning of a

APP.] MAYOR, &amp;C., OF BRISTOL v. OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP GLANMIRE; THE BRUNEL. [APP.]

“recognised British ship.” Sect. 77 (3) and sect. 78 show that “tonnage” means “gross tonnage,” because that section says that the “tonnage” of every ship to be registered shall be ascertained, &c.; and then proceeds to deal with the deductions to be allowed therefrom for the purpose of ascertaining the registered tonnage. “Tonnage” all through the Act means prima facie gross tonnage: see sect. 78. In this case one and three-quarter times the propelling power space has been deducted, which leaves the net register tonnage a minus quantity. [COLLINS, L.J.—You might have a ship the size of the Great Eastern brought below 15 tons register by means of deductions.] See sched. 2 of the Act, rr. (1), (2), and (3). These rules are referred to for the purpose of showing that the “tonnage” has first to be ascertained, and then the deductions are to be made to find out the “net registered tonnage.” So in the form of bill of sale under sched. 1, “gross tonnage” is used. [SMITH, L.J. referred to sect. 77 (2).] That sub-section only applies to vessels with cargo on board, and which do not require to be measured for the purpose of registration, but for, e.g., light dues. What is the meaning of “burden” in sect. 3? “Register” is only a conventional thing. “Gross” and “net” tonnage have both to be registered. It would seem an odd result if “burden” means also a conventional thing, which may result in a minus quantity. [COLLINS, L.J.—It would be no indication of the size of a ship.] See sect. 92. There might be two vessels of (say) 400 tons each; one an ordinary tramp steamer, the other a fast passenger boat with large engine-room space such as runs between London Bridge and Margate, carrying hundreds of passengers; the former would have to carry a mate and the latter not. See sect. 622 (2), which presents the same absurdity with regard to pilotage. “Burden” must be something fixed proportionately to the actual size of a ship. Sects. 113 and 119 seem at first sight against the appellants; but really they have nothing to do with one another, and deal with totally different subjects. [SMITH, L.J.—The meaning of the words “registered tonnage” in sect. 113 seems synonymous with that of “tons burden” in sect. 119.] The terms “burden,” “tonnage,” “gross tonnage,” and “registered tonnage,” are all found in the Act. Surely, each must have a different meaning? [WILLIAMS, L.J.—It seems as if the two expressions sometimes mean the same thing, and sometimes different things; and that one must have regard to the part of the Act and the context. Here, since the words in question are in that part of the Act headed “Registry,” does not the word “burden” mean “register tonnage”?] The natural meaning of the word “burden” is carrying capacity. The exception is only meant to apply to unimportant and small craft. The history of legislation concerning merchant shipping, which was so much discussed in the court below, has nothing to do with the question.

Robson, Q.C. and Batten for the respondents.

—The argument in the court below was that burden meant carrying capacity: that point is given up and the appellants now say that “tons burden” means “gross tonnage.” In the Act of George III. (13 Geo. 3, c. 74) tonnage means “true” tonnage; that is, the carrying capacity of the ship;

because the Act is entitled “An Act for the better ascertaining the tonnage and burden, &c.” In this case the part of the Act in question has to do with the registration; therefore “burden” means “registered tonnage.” Why should there be two different ways of measuring a ship; one for ascertaining her burden, and a totally different one for determining whether or not she is to be registered? It is submitted that wherever the Act intends “gross tonnage” to be the basis for assessing liabilities it says so in plain terms; see sects. 503 and 78. The word “burden” is sometimes synonymous with registered tonnage: see sects. 113 and 119. Or rather “registered tonnage” only means “true tonnage”; that is, the tonnage which is to be registered: it may be “gross” or “net” in some parts of the Act. In schedule 2 tonnage means “net tonnage.” [WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 22; 13 Geo. 4, c. 60; 26 Geo. 4, c. 60; and 59 Geo. 4, c. 5.] Tonnage, simpliciter, never means gross tonnage; it means tonnage ascertained in some way prescribed by the Act, which is to be determined by the context. There is no instance in the whole Act where “gross tonnage” is meant to be ascertained and acted on unless the word “gross” appears: in every other case “tonnage” means “net” tonnage.

Walton, Q.C. in reply.

SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from my brother Barnes. The question raised in this case is, When must a vessel be registered? This steam-tug Brunel was not registered, and she, by her negligence, ran into a ship which brought an action against her owners, and the steam-tug was condemned in the damages. Upon this the owners of the tug took proceedings for the purpose of getting a limitation of liability under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and the point taken against the steam-tug was that she ought to have been registered, and, inasmuch as she was not registered—to put it shortly without reading sect. 1—her owners could not call in aid the provisions of the limitation sect. 503. Barnes, J. has held otherwise, since he has held that the tug in question did not exceed 15 tons burden within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Now, the question here is, What is the meaning in this section of the words “not exceeding 15 tons burden?” Does it mean not exceeding the gross tonnage of 15 tons burden, or does it mean not exceeding the registered tonnage of 15 tons burden? Because it is conceded that if the meaning of this section is “not exceeding 15 tons registered tonnage,” this tug did not exceed that, and was, therefore, exempt from registry. Upon an ordinary computation to find out what is to be the registered tonnage of this ship (after first of all calculating what is to be taken into account, and then by calculating what is to be deducted from that amount, namely, propelling power space, and so on), her gross tonnage was 35.99 tons. There was to be deducted from that 31 tons odd as allowance for propelling power, and 6 tons odd for crew space, and the allowances coming to more than the plus quantities which had to be added together for the purpose of ascertaining the gross tonnage, the registered tonnage was really nil. Barnes, J. has held the proper construction of this section is that ships not exceeding 15 tons burden means not exceeding 15 tons registered tonnage. Now, in the court below it was argued by learned counsel—I am told, by the late Mr. Aspinall—that the meaning of tons burden in this section was really “the carrying capacity of the ship,” and that argument was dealt with by Barnes, J. in a most careful and exhaustive judgment, in which he went as far as was necessary into the history of how the word “burden” came into play. Williams, L.J. has also gone into that question, with which I shall not deal further. That argument is abandoned to-day by Mr. Walton. Mr. Walton sees that after the judgment of the learned judge he cannot maintain the point argued for in the court below. He now contends that although it does not mean “carrying capacity,” it does mean “gross tonnage.” That is really his argument, although he does not like it being stated in that way, because, he says, it is the gross tonnage before the authorised deductions are made therefrom. Now, what foundation has he for saying that “tons burden” means gross tonnage? He was challenged by Mr. Robson to give some reason, and what he does is to give the only reason which he could possibly give. He says that tonnage in the 2nd schedule to this Act means the sum of all the dimensions of a vessel, without the deductions to be allowed in the case of a steamship. I cannot read the rule in that way, because it is reading, in my judgment, half the rule. Tonnage, in those rules, in my opinion, means gross tonnage less deductions—that is, registered tonnage. I wish also to point out that the words “tons burden” which we have to construe are in the group of sections in Part I of this Act, which has relation to the registration of ships, and, as I have said before, I say again, it seems to me to throw no light upon the words in one group of sections to call attention to words which are to be found in another part of the Act which has reference to something entirely different to the words in the first part of the Act. This first part, with which we have to deal to-day, has reference to the question of the registration or non-registration of ships. The words which were relied upon by Mr. Walton, namely, the words “tons burden,” are found also in the next group of sections, which relate to seamen, and may well bear another interpretation when those sections have to be discussed than they do in the group of sections which are now under consideration. It seems to me that in these sections dealing with the registration or non-registration of ships, the words “tons burden” mean what they do undoubtedly mean when you come to the question of registering ships, namely, net tonnage, which is the gross tonnage after allowing the deductions. For these reasons I am of opinion that my brother Barnes is right, and that as the Brunel did not exceed 15 tons registered tonnage the appeal must be dismissed.

APP.] MAYOR, &C., OF BRISTOL v. OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP GLANMIRE; THE BRUNEL. [APP.

COLLINS, L.J.—I confess I have felt some doubt in this case, which has not been wholly removed by the arguments of Mr. Robson, but I think, on the whole, that the judgment of my brother Barnes and that of my Lord here is the safer conclusion to adopt. When one looks, as one always likes to do, at the history of this matter, one seeks to find what was the principle upon which the Legislature excluded certain ships from the benefit or the burden, it may be, of registration. In the first instance, it provided that certain British ships alone should be entitled to registration, and it then proceeded to give a certain class of ships the benefit of being British ships without registration. That class was the class of ships not exceeding 15 tons burden, employed solely in navigation on the rivers and coasts of the United Kingdom; and, looking at that from a common-sense standpoint, it does seem to me as if “size” was what the Legislature meant to be material in deciding the question whether it would insist upon a vessel getting registered before claiming the benefits of being a British ship within that legislation. At the time that that legislation was initiated, of course, steam was not known, and the carrying capacity of a ship was practically the same thing as its size. It was necessary to have a uniform method of arriving at the carrying capacity, but up to the introduction of steam that corresponded more or less accurately with the size of the ship. The result of that was that certain small vessels, which were not supposed to be capable of crossing the seas, were excluded from registry. Then the Legislature, having had some difficulty before as to the best method of ascertaining the capacity, found itself face to face with a new difficulty, by reason of the introduction of steam, and it had to substitute a new standard to ascertain the carrying capacity, which was the thing which was important to be ascertained for many purposes. It introduced a new standard of carrying capacity, which in the 5 & 6 Will. 4 for the first time involved the exclusion of engine-room space and so on. Now we stand in this position, that the exception remained the same, but a different standard of measuring capacity was introduced. Now, the argument of Mr. Walton does not seem to me to be open to the criticism which was addressed to it by Mr. Robson. It seems to me that it would be perfectly possible to still make size—but size scientifically ascertained—the standard of calculation. It seems to me, that the principle of determining whether a vessel comes within the legislation or not, need not necessarily be the same as in ascertaining what is her registered tonnage. But there is this anomaly also, which appears to me to be involved in the position resulting from the judgment of Barnes, J., and that is that if size was the ground upon which the vessels were excluded, you have, under the method which Barnes, J. has applied, this possible anomaly—that ships which are very large in actual fact, and which certainly could not have been contemplated at the time the exemption was introduced as coming within it, may, and very often do, come within the exemption. But, on the whole, I think it is, perhaps, wiser to hold that one standard, and one standard only, is to be applied, when you are seeking to ascertain the tonnage of the ship, and that is the standard laid down by the Legislature, and which results in the registered tonnage. It is perfectly true that, in the process of ascertaining that, the gross tonnage is first ascertained, but it seems to me that that is obtained and stated, not by the mandate of the Legislature, as being the result which has to be ascertained, but merely as arising from this, that the Legislature thought it right that the process by which the result was obtained should be stated so that, I suppose, it could be checked. That which has to be ascertained, and which the Legislature makes the object of the calculation, is the registered tonnage,

[CT. OF APP.]

WEIR v. UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

[CT. OF APP.]

and not one of the steps in ascertaining the registered tonnage. Therefore I think there is real difficulty once you are driven away from the point taken in the court below, namely, that what is really meant is carrying tons as differing from the registered tonnage. I think, when once you are driven from the contention that it was the actual possible amount that the ship could carry, there is something anomalous in stopping short in the middle of the calculation which the Legislature has enacted, and accepting one of the steps towards the goal, instead of the goal itself—namely, the gross tonnage, which is only a step towards ascertaining the registered tonnage, instead of the registered tonnage itself, which is the object of that. I think, therefore, that on the whole it is safer to adopt the decision of Barnes, J. I add this, that it seems to me Mr. Walton is perfectly well founded in saying that in some parts of this Act before us the word “tonnage” is capable of meaning, and necessarily must mean, gross, as distinguished from net, tonnage. I also think that in some parts of the Act burden means gross as distinguished from net, but that does not carry him far enough. We have to say, from the context and from the best view we can form of what the object of the Legislature was in making this standard of inclusion or exclusion, what interpretation is to be put upon it by ourselves. It is capable of either, and I think that on the whole the safer is that which has been adopted by Barnes, J.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree, and the reasons which have been given by other members of the court seem to me so ample and satisfactory, that I only propose to say a word or two. As I understand Mr. Walton’s argument, it is not based in any degree upon the use of the word “burden” in the 3rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894. His argument would have been equally applicable to all the words of sub-sect. 3, which runs: “Ships not exceeding 15 tons,” &c. I do not wish to seem to be critical, but I cannot help thinking that the case has taken longer than it need have done, because during a great part of the argument I was under the impression that Mr. Walton was largely relying upon the employment of the word “burden.” Having got rid of that, let us see how the matter stands. The question is, what is the meaning of the words “ships not exceeding 15 tons will be exempted from registry.” Can anyone doubt that prima facie you are to use the same standard in arriving at the 15 tons which is to exempt from registry, as you will have to use when you ascertain the tonnage of a vessel which has to be registered? It is said here that you ought not to do it, and the reason which is suggested for applying what I cannot help calling an unnatural interpretation to these words, is this: if you apply a natural interpretation you will, having regard to the various purposes of this Act of Parliament in reference to the parts of the Act where “tonnage” is used, arrive at a result which is not likely the Legislature could have contemplated. I say, in answer to that, in the first place, that I have only to deal with the construction of these words in this particular part of the Merchant Shipping Act, which deals with registration. With regard to the words that appear in this part of the Act, the word “burden” does become of importance, not as the basis of an argument, but as enabling us historically to arrive at really what was the purpose of this section. One cannot really doubt, if one looks at it, that the whole of this section, which has appeared in various shapes since, is derived from 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 22. That was an Act passed for the purpose of preventing frauds and regulating abuses in the plantation trade. There is a provision that only British ships should have the benefit of the trade between this country and our plantations, which in those days included the whole of what are now the United States of America, and the Act provides for registration. In doing so it describes the kind of ship which may be registered—broadly, ships built at ports in England and certain places in the plantations—and then says that the registration shall be upon the oath of the master as to the tons burden. That shows the origin and reason of the registration. Presently, when you come to 26 Geo. 3, c. 60, it was desired to amend this Act, and to include some of those ships which had been excluded before, and it is in the 3rd section of the Act of 26 Geo. 3 that one first finds this limitation of 15 tons. I cannot doubt myself that when the 15 tons limitation was first introduced it was intended that that 15 tons—which was the 15 tons, be it observed which was introduced, among other reasons, at all events, as a limitation of the class which should be entitled to the privilege of being registered for the purpose of navigating between this country and the plantations—I cannot doubt that that 15 tons was to be measured by the standard that was introduced into that statute. It is true that is not the standard with allowances which is now used. That standard with allowances was first introduced into the Act of 13 Geo. 3, amended by 26 Geo. 3, which was amended by 59 Geo. 3. The Act of Will. 3 introduced the necessity for registration of the use of the word “burden,” but excluded the smaller ships altogether. The amended statutes included the smaller ships which are above 15 tons, and provides a measure for that 15 tons, which was a measure of the interior capacity of the ship, without any deduction at all. Then comes the later statute, which was necessitated by the introduction of steam navigation in boats. That was the statute which introduced substantially the mode of measurement which still exists in the last Merchant Shipping Act. Under the circumstances, for myself I have no doubt whatever that the 15 tons mentioned in the 3rd section of the present Merchant Shipping Act is 15 tons registered net tonnage, and not 15 tons gross tonnage.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Robins, Hay, Waters, and Hay, agents for D. Travers Burges, Bristol.

Solicitors for the defendants, T. Cooper and Co.

Nov. 7 and 22, 1899.

(Before SMITH, COLLINS and WILLIAMS, L.JJ.)

WEIR v. UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY. (a)
APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN’S BENCH DIVISION.
Charter-party—Duty to supply ballast.

By a charter-party it was agreed that a vessel with officers and crew should be placed at the disposal of the charterers or their assigns for the conveyance of merchandise and (or) passengers between certain ports, the vessel being let for the sole use of the charterers, with liberty to sub-let, for three voyages commencing not later than a certain day when she was to be placed with clear holds at the charterers' disposal at New York, they having the whole reach or burden of the vessel, sufficient room being reserved to the owners for the officers, crew, and tackle, &c., of the ship. The vessel was not to be required to load more than she could reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, stores, &c. The captain was to be under the orders of the charterers as regards employment, agency, and other arrangements, and in case of dissatisfaction of the charterers the owners agreed to make any necessary change in the appointment of the captain or crew. The freight payable by the charterers was a fixed monthly amount, and was payable until the charterers delivered up the vessel to the owners. The owners were to have a lien on the cargo and freight for arrears of hire, and the charterers were to have a lien on the ship for the freight payable in advance.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The charterers sent the ship upon one of the voyages contemplated by the charter-party without any cargo. It consequently became necessary for the proper navigation of the ship to take on board some ballast in addition to her usual water ballast. In an action to decide at whose cost this extra ballast was to be supplied:

Held, that there was nothing in the charter-party which relieved the shipowners from the ordinary obligation of shipowners to supply the necessary ballast for the proper navigation of the ship.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of Bigham, J. on a preliminary point of law arising in the action.

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Elleric, to recover from the charterers balance of freight due under the charter-party.

The defendants counter-claimed in respect of the time lost during the execution of repairs to the vessel's propeller, and for the cost of ballast supplied to the vessel by the defendants under protest.

The charter-party so far as is material to the present case was as follows:

London, 10th June 1897.—It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. Andrew Weir and Co., owners of the good steamship or vessel called the Elleric, of the measurement of 3583 tons gross and 2322 tons net or thereabouts, now at Greenock, and the Union Steamship Company Limited of London, charterers of the said steamship.

1. That the said vessel or steamer being tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted for the service and to be maintained by the owners with sufficient complement of officers, seamen, engineers, firemen, and stewards, shall be placed at the disposal of the said charterers or their assigns to be employed by them in the conveyance of lawful merchandise (including live stock) and (or) passengers as follows: between all good and safe ports and places in the United Kingdom and (or) United States and (or) ports of South and East Africa.

2. The said vessel is let for the sole use of the said charterers and for their benefit, and with liberty to sub-let (subject to owners' approval of trade) for two or three round voyages at charterers' option, commencing not later than the 15th July next, by which day she is to be placed with clear holds at the disposal of the charterers at the port of New York, they having the whole reach or burthen of the vessel, including passengers' accommodation (if any), proper and sufficient room being reserved to the owners for the officers, crew, tackle, apparel, furniture, provisions, and stores; and the vessel is not to be required to load more than she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, provisions, stores, and fuel. The owners guarantee that vessel has just been in dry dock and painted, and undertake to maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state during the currency of her charter.

3. The captain shall use all and every reasonable despatch in prosecuting the voyage or voyages, sails are to be set whenever practicable and of advantage to the charterers, and the crew are to render all customary assistance in loading and discharging, which, however, is to be carried out by and at the risk and expense of the charterers.

4. The captain (although appointed by the owners) shall be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, and other arrangements and the charterers hereby agree to indemnify the owners against all consequences or liabilities that may arise from the captain signing bills of lading or in otherwise complying with such orders and directions.

5. If the charterers shall have reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the captain, officers, or engineers, the owners shall on receiving particulars of the complaint investigate the same, and if necessary make a change in the appointments.

7. The coals for the steam engines shall be supplied by and at the cost of the charterers, who shall also bear all port and dock charges, pilotage, light dues, agency commissions, delivery, labourage, and all other duties, charges, and expenses, the owners providing and paying for all ship's stores, insurance, crew's wages and victualling.

8. The freight for the hire of the said vessel shall be paid as follows, at and after the rate of 1050*l.* per month, but should the vessel be kept on hire over twelve months, all extra time to be paid for at the rate of 1150*l.*, and to be paid monthly in cash in advance in London, and continue payable . . . until the vessel is again returned by the charterers to the owners at New York to be delivered in like good condition as when chartered, fair wear and tear excepted.

10. The owners to have a lien upon the cargo and freight for arrears of hire, including the monthly freight in advance, but the charterers to have a lien upon the ship for such last-mentioned freight.

13. In default of payment of hire when due, owners to be at liberty immediately to resume possession of the vessel and to claim damages.

16. Charterers have the option of cancelling this charter-party if the vessel is not placed at their disposal as and at the time stipulated above.

The Elleric made three voyages under this charter-party each time without cargo.

On the first voyage there was no ballast in the ship beyond the ordinary water ballast, and in consequence of this damage was caused to her propeller which had to be repaired at New York.

In consequence of this the captain refused to sail on the second and third voyages unless the defendants supplied the necessary extra ballast, and the defendants thereupon under protest provided the necessary amount of sand ballast.

By an order made by Kennedy, J. in chambers it was directed that the following question should be tried as a preliminary point of law: Whose duty was it under the charter-party to provide any ballast beyond water ballast that might be necessary for the safe sailing of the Elleric on the chartered voyage and at whose expense?

[CT. OF APP.]

WEIR v. UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

[CT. OF APP.]

Bigham, J. held that it was the duty of the shipowners under the charter-party to supply the ballast, and he gave judgment accordingly.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Carver, Q.C. and D. C. Leck for the appellants.—The defendants were under the obligation to pay the expense of providing the ballast in question by reason of the provisions of this charter-party. Under the charter-party the obligation of the shipowners was to provide and place at the disposal of the charterers a ship with clear holds, that is, free from ballast in the holds, and to maintain her, that is, to keep her in repair. If the shipowners were obliged to provide ballast in the holds, they could not fulfill their obligation to provide a ship with clear holds. It would be the duty of the charterers, who were entitled to have clear holds at their disposal, to so load the ship that she would be seaworthy or, if not so loaded, to provide and pay for the necessary ballast. This ship was provided with the necessary tanks and equipment for water ballast, and that was a part of the equipment of the ship which would have to be worked by the ship. That is quite a different thing from sand or similar ballast which would necessarily take up part of the cargo space. The proper construction of this charter-party is that the shipowners were to provide a ship with water ballast and were to manage and work that ballast as part of the equipment of the ship, but that, if by reason of the manner in which the charterers used the ship further ballast became necessary for the purpose of safely navigating the ship, then the charterers should pay the expense of such further ballast. There is a difference between a charter of this kind and an ordinary voyage charter. This was not a mere contract of carriage but was a demise of the ship.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and T. E. Scrutton for the respondents.—As to the general law, it is well settled that the charterer of a ship is not bound to provide ballast, but that it is the duty of the shipowner to provide the necessary ballast, unless there is something special in the charter-party to alter the general rule:

Southampton Steam Colliery Company v. Clarke, 19 L. T. Rep. 651; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 197;
L. Rep. 6 Ex. 53.

The obligation under a charter-party such as this is precisely the same as under a charter-party for a single voyage. There is nothing special in this charter-party to alter the ordinary liability. Under this charter-party the charterers can put any cargo they choose on board, or a part cargo only, or no cargo, or passengers only; there is no obligation upon the charterers to load any particular kind of cargo, or any cargo at all. The obligation of the shipowners is to provide a vessel for that purpose, and, if necessary for that purpose, to provide ballast; they must put the ship into the condition to perform the voyage when loaded or not loaded, according to the choice of the charterers. The shipowners have a right to put ballast into the holds, if it is necessary, as part of the equipment, tackle, and furniture of the vessel. There is no authority upon the point, but there can be no distinction in principle between a voyage charter and a time charter.

[WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Irving v. Clegg (1 Bing. N. C. 53.)]

Carver, Q.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 22.—SMITH, L.J. read the following judgment:—The question in this case is whether a shipowner or a charterer is the person to supply ballast for the shipowner's ship, and this point depends upon the terms of a charter-party dated the 10th June 1897, made between the owners of the steamship Elleric (Messrs. Weir and Co.) of the one part and the charterers (The Union Steamship Company Limited) of the other, which charter I will particularly refer to in a moment. On the voyage out from New York to the Cape, which was one of the voyages contemplated by the charter, the steamship was loaded up with such a cargo as to render the water ballast in tanks, with which the ship was provided, sufficient, but on the voyage back from the Cape to New York, also a voyage contemplated by the charter the ship came without cargo in her, so that ballast in addition to the water ballast had to be taken on board. This ballast consisted of sand, which was placed in the holds of the ship, and it is as to the cost and expense attending this sand ballast that the question arises, the shipowners asserting that the charterers are liable thereto. My brother Bigham has held the contrary, and that this liability falls upon the shipowners, and they appeal. Before I go to the charter-party I must point out that, under an ordinary charter of a ship, the shipowner is bound to provide the necessary ballast for his ship, the reason being that, as he is responsible for the navigation of the ship by his captain, he is responsible for the ballast necessary to enable his ship to perform the contemplated voyage. Mr. Carver well points out, in his work on Carriage by Sea, sect. 262, that not only is it the duty of the shipowner, but it is his privilege, to ballast his ship, for he is entitled to carry merchandise as ballast, bearing freight, provided it occupies no larger space than the ordinary ballast would do, and leaves to the charterer the full space of the vessel proper to be filled with his cargo. The question, therefore, comes to this, does the charter-party in this case, to use my brother Bigham's phrase, relieve the shipowner of his ordinary duty? Now, what is this charter-party? It is a charter-party by which the shipowner agrees that his vessel, being tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted for the service, and to be maintained by owners with sufficient complement of officers, seamen, engineers, firemen, and stewards, shall be placed at the disposal of the charterers to be employed by them in the conveyance of lawful merchandise and passengers between ports and places in the United Kingdom, and (or) the United States, and (or) South and East Africa, for two or three round voyages at charterers' option, commencing not later than the 15th July 1897, when she is to be placed with clear holds at the disposal of the charterers at the port of New York; and it is agreed by the charter-party that the vessel is not to be required to load more than she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, provisions, stores, and fuel; and the freight to be paid by the charterers is the sum of 1050*l.* per month, but, should the vessel be kept on hire over twelve months, all extra time is to be paid for at the rate of 1150*l.*

monthly in cash in advance in London. By the charter-party the captain is to be appointed by the shipowners, though he is to be under the directions of the charterers, and it is agreed that the captain shall use all reasonable despatch in prosecuting the voyage and that the crew shall render all customary assistance, and that, if the charterers have reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the captain, officers, or engineers, the owners are, after inquiry, to, if necessary, make a change in the appointments. I cannot doubt that, under this charter-party, the ship was to be navigated by the servants of the shipowners; that the captain was the shipowners' captain and not the captain of the charterers, and the crew were the crew of the shipowners and not of the charterers, and that the whole control and management of the ship, as regards navigation, was left in the hands of the owners, who remained in possession of the ship by their servants, although the charterers might direct where the ship was to go and with what she was to be laden and were to pay the various named disbursements. When a question arises as to whether a charter-party constitutes a demise of a ship or not, the ordinary test is, whose servants are those who are to navigate the ship. If the shipowners' servants, then they act as carriers of the cargo for the charterers, whereas, if they are the servants of the charterers, the shipowners generally cease to be carriers and the contract is one of hiring. In the former case there is no demise of the ship, in the latter there may be. In my opinion, in the present case there is no demise of the ship, and the prima facie rule as to the owner supplying ballast applies. Before going to other clauses of the charter, upon which the shipowners rely, I will point out that the charterers are under no obligation to load on board the ship a full cargo or any particular cargo. They might load just what they liked, two-thirds or a half or one-third of a cargo or no cargo at all; they might put on board passengers only. The sole obligation of the charterers as to loading was not to overload the ship. They might underload her as much as they liked. They contracted to pay the 1050*l.* freight per month, irrespective of whether they loaded cargo or passengers or not, and in my opinion they had the right of sending the ship upon the contemplated voyages loaded or not as they thought fit. They might send the ship out from New York to the Cape empty or with only passengers on board, and the owners had no cause of complaint if they did so. Now, suppose the charterers, being, as they would be, well within their rights under this charter, determined to send the ship out, say, with only passengers on board on the first half of the first round voyage from New York to the Cape, which necessitated for the safety of the navigation of the ship sand ballast in addition to the water ballast in the tanks, whose duty was it to put the sand as well as water ballast on board at New York? The shipowners have to admit that they, by their captain, had to put the water ballast on board, and why, I ask, are they not also bound to put the sand ballast on board, if such was necessary for the stability and due navigation of the ship. Unless there are clauses in the charter showing that the shipowners are exempt from the obligation (the charter not constituting a demise of the ship), the shipowners are clearly liable thereto.

Similar circumstances existing at the Cape as to the return voyage to New York, I am of opinion that the duty of the shipowner by his captain is to do the same as regards sand and water ballast at the Cape as at New York, and there is nothing in the charter-party, so far as I have cited it, to show that the owners are relieved from this ordinary liability.

But it is said, on behalf of the charterers, that this is not so, for the charter-party in some of its clauses shows that the owners are relieved from this obligation. Firstly, it is said, because by the charter-party the shipowners are to tender their ship at New York to the charterers with clear holds, and that if ballast other than water ballast was to be used by the shipowners this could not be done, for ballast other than water ballast would have to be put in the holds, and, as they had to tender the ship with clear holds, the shipowners were not to put ballast other than water ballast on board. In other words, that this clause shows that the charterers were bound to put such cargo on board as would cause the ship to stand up with water ballast alone, or, if not, that the charterers were to put in other ballast themselves to make her stand up. The answer to this argument is that the charterers are only to have clear holds to stow what the ship can reasonably stow over and above her tackle, provisions, stores, and fuel. If a light cargo is put on board, which the charterers are clearly entitled to put on, so as to necessitate ballast in addition to water ballast, it is obvious that that ballast must be put on by someone, and where in this clause is there anything to say that this must be put in by the charterer and not by the shipowner? The truth is, if the charterer puts on board the cargo he is entitled to under the charter, and it is so light that the ship will not stand up without further ballast, as it is the duty of the shipowner by his captain to properly navigate the ship, so he must by his captain put on board the necessary ballast. It was next said that clause 3 exempted the shipowners from putting in the sand ballast. I do not agree. This clause relates to loading and discharging cargo; it has nothing to do with ballast. Clause 4, which relates to indemnity, in my opinion is wholly foreign to the question of ballast, and it should be pointed out that this clause does not, as it appears to me, extend to the improper navigation of the ship. The word "labourage" in clause 7, which is relied upon by the shipowners, in my opinion has no reference to ballast. In my judgment, if a shipowner is to be relieved from the obligation of ballasting his ship, the charter-party not constituting a demise of the ship, there must be in the charter-party a clause to that effect, and I can find nothing like such a clause in the charter-party in this case. For these reasons, I think my brother Bigham was quite right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case does not appear to me to raise any question of principle, but to depend upon the special terms of the bargain made between the parties. As is admitted on all hands, the law is perfectly clear that in ordinary charter-parties the obligation of finding the necessary ballast for the ship rests upon the shipowners; but it was contended by Mr. Carver that a different

CT. OF APP.]

WEIR v. UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

[CT. OF APP.

rule applies to the case of time charters. Now, it seems to me that the presumption as to the shipowners being under this obligation is exactly the same in the case of a time charter as it is in the case of an ordinary voyage charter, unless the time charter is in point of fact not a contract of carriage but a contract of hire—that is to say, a contract by which there is a complete demise of the ship so that the duty and obligation of managing the ship is taken from the owner and the captain and is placed in the hirer or charterer. For the reasons which have been given in the judgment that has just been delivered, I am clearly of opinion that in the charter-party now before us there is nothing like a complete demise of the ship so as to convert the contract from a contract of carriage into a contract of hire. I think that the master of the ship was the agent of the owners in all matters relating to the navigation of the ship, and as such had the usual rights and responsibilities. Therefore we start upon the investigation of this charter-party with the presumption that the obligation as to ballast rests where it does in ordinary charter-parties—namely, on the owners. Of course, that does not decide the question, because there may be clauses in the charter-party which shift the burden from the owners on to the charterers, and it was contended by Mr. Carver that there are such clauses. But I think that, when the various clauses of the charter-party are examined, it is abundantly clear not only that the presumption is not rebutted, but that there are clauses which, as I read them, contemplate and provide for the obligation resting on the owners. Now, there is one clause in particular on which Mr. Walton relied, and which, I think, supports his contention. It is this: "The vessel is not to be required to load more than she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, provisions, stores, and fuel." Mr. Walton put as an instance the loading of a cargo too light to weigh the ship down to the necessary depth, and he contended that in such a case the owners must have the right to insist upon room being found for such ballast as would be necessary to weigh the ship to the proper depth. I think that contention right. The owners must put the ballast into the ship in order to carry out their right and obligation to navigate the vessel properly, and it may be that they would be entitled to carry the ballast for reward to themselves, as in the case of Towse v. Henderson (4 Ex. 890). But then comes clause 2—the clause which Mr. Carver most relied upon, and which, he says, completely removes the presumption which arises in the case of ordinary charter-parties. The clause runs thus: "By which day she (the ship) is to be placed with clear holds at the disposal of the charterers at the port of New York, they having the whole reach or burthen of the vessel, including passenger accommodation (if any), proper and sufficient room being reserved to the owners for the officers, crew, tackle, apparel, furniture, provisions, and stores." That is said to amount to an absolute contract to place the whole reach and burthen of the vessel at the disposal of the charterers, and therefore to negative the right of the owners to fill up any part of that space with ballast. I do not think that that contention can be sustained in view of the meaning that has been put in other cases upon provisions which are precisely similar in meaning to what we have to deal with in this charter-party, though they are not, I agree, worded identically the same. Towse v. Henderson (ubi sup.) was an action by a shipowner against the charterers for not providing a full cargo of tea. The contract was that the defendants should load a full and complete cargo, and the owner was therefore bound to offer the ship in a condition to receive a full and complete cargo. The owner had put on the ship a large quantity of antimony as ballast, and the charterers refused to load on two grounds—one, that the owner had not given them the full amount of space which they were entitled to, the other ground being one that it is immaterial for me to mention now. The court disposed of the first point on the motion for a rule nisi to set aside the verdict, but it is referred to again in the judgment of the court which was delivered by Parke, B. He there said: "The court have already disposed of another objection, namely, that the plaintiff had no right to ship a part of the cargo as ballast, for that the defendants were entitled to the full capacity of the ship, exclusive of all other merchandise, for the purpose of storing tea." The court there accepted the contention that the defendants were entitled to the "full capacity of the ship," which, in my opinion, is the same thing as the "whole reach or burthen of the vessel," the expression used in the charter-party in the case now before the court. Parke, B. continued thus: "The court has said that the owner may take on board merchandise as ballast, provided it occupies no larger space than the ballast would have done, leaving to the charterers the full space of the vessel proper to be filled with tea." In the present case I think that all that is stipulated for is the full space of the vessel proper to be filled with cargo—that is to say, allowing space for the ballast, which is a necessary factor in the proper navigation of the ship. I agree, therefore, with the judgment that has been already delivered, and for the reasons there given.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is a case on the construction of a charter-party, and the question raised is whether or not the shipowners, according to its true construction, were bound to supply ballast for the ship; that is, ballast beyond the water ballast in the ballast tanks. The case is one of some difficulty, and there is much to be said on both sides. I am not sure that if left to myself I should have arrived at the same conclusion as the other members of the court, but I am not disposed to differ from them and from Bigham, J. upon a question of doubtful construction of a private document. The other members of the court think that the shipowners are the persons bound to supply the ballast. Now I propose in the first instance to say a word or two on the question whether according to the true construction of this charter-party there was a demise of the ship by the shipowners to the charterers; that is, whether the shipowners parted with the possession of the ship altogether to the charterers. The cases run very fine upon this question. No case is more important than the decision of the House of Lords in 1832, Golvin v. Newberry (1 Cl. & Fin. 283), and there is a passage in the judgment of Lord Tenterden there which contains a very concise statement of the two possible views of a charter-party. That passage runs thus: "Two propositions of law are clear as applicable to a case like this: the first is, that in the common case of goods shipped on board a vessel belonging to a person of which the shipment is acknowledged by a bill of lading signed by the master, if the goods are not delivered, the shipper has a right to maintain an action against the owner of the ship; the other, which is equally clear, is this, that if the person in whom the absolute property of the ship is vested charters that ship to another for a particular voyage, although the absolute owner provides the master, crew, provisions, and everything else, and is to receive from the charterer of the ship a certain sum of money for the use and hire of the ship, an action can be brought only against the person to whom the absolute owner has chartered the ship and who is considered the owner pro tempore during the voyage for which the ship is chartered." It is plain from that passage that Lord Tenterden did not consider the fact that the absolute owner was to provide the master, crew, provisions, tackle, and the rest of it, was conclusive against there being a demise of the ship or a parting with possession of the ship; and, in another case, Trinity House v. Clark (4 M. & S. 288) when dealing with this subject the illustration was taken by Lord Ellenborough, C.J. of the letting of a waggon and horses in which the person letting the waggon and horses insists upon providing the waggoner, who shall have the charge of the waggon and horses, and again in that case it was held that the appointment of the master and crew is not conclusive on that question. Now as I am not going to differ from my brethren upon the question whether there was a demise of the ship, or a parting with possession of the ship in this case, I do not think that I should be justified in reading at length the various clauses in this charter-party which go to show that there was an intention to part with possession of the ship by the shipowners to the charterers, but I may say generally that if the bill of lading clauses are looked at there is a great deal to show that it was intended that the charterers should be the carriers of whatever cargo was put on board, and it is a remarkable fact that in this charter-party there is a power given to the charterers to sub-let the ship itself; and, in addition to that, when one comes to deal with the lien clauses, one finds that there is a lien on the ship given to the charterers and that there is no lien whatsoever on the ship given to the shipowners. The charter-party concludes with a provision that, at the conclusion of the time of the charter, the charterers are to restore possession of the ship to the shipowners. All that goes a long way to show that there is a very arguable point, to say the least of it, that there was a demise of the ship and a parting with possession of the ship according to the true construction of this charter-party. But I have looked, I think, at all the cases, and it seems to me plain that since the decision in Colvin v. Newberry (ubi sup.) in 1832, the tide of the cases, if I may so call it, has set very much against construing any charter-party as amounting to a demise of the ship by the shipowner to the charterer.

Having said that, I will now proceed to deal with the other question in this case. Now although the proper conclusion may be that there was no demise of the ship and that the shipowners did not part with possession of her and were not the carriers, it may yet be that, as in Omoa and Cleland Coal and Iron Company v. Huntley (37 L. T. Rep. 184; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; 2 C. P. Div. 464), the master and crew were the servants of the shipowners and not of the charterers for the purpose of navigating the ship, but it does not seem to me that this, i.e., the fact that the shipowners remain in control of the navigation, is conclusive that the shipowners are bound, on the construction of the charter-party, to provide the ballast beyond the water-tank ballast at their own expense. This will depend, in my judgment, on what effect is to be given to the clause in the charter-party, which requires the shipowners to place the ship at New York at the disposal of the charterers with clear holds, they having the whole reach or burthen of the vessel, including passenger accommodation (if any), proper and sufficient room being reserved to the owners for the officers, crew, tackle, apparel, furniture, provisions, and stores. If, according to the true construction of this provision, the shipowners would not have been entitled at New York, if they chose so to do, to place the ship at the disposal of the charterers with sand or a sufficiently heavy cargo to be carried for the benefit of the shipowners—and I will say upon this point that the case of Towse v. Henderson (ubi sup.) shows that the obligation on the shipowners to put ballast on board the ship is co-extensive with their privilege to furnish that ballast in the shape of cargo to be carried for their own benefit—it is difficult to come to the conclusion that the shipowners were bound at New York or elsewhere to provide ballast at their own expense. But I have read the judgment of Smith, L.J., and I understand that he and Collins, L.J. have come to the conclusion that this provision does not relieve the shipowners from the obligation to provide ballast which primâ facie undoubtedly rests on those who have the control of the navigation; and, as I have already said, I am not disposed to differ from the rest of the court as to the conclusion to be drawn from the balance of considerations arising on the construction of a charter-party so involved as this, but I have thought it my duty to call attention to these matters in order to show that I have not overlooked the considerations. One word more about the distinction between water ballast and sand ballast and I have done. There is this great distinction, to my mind, between the two: the obligation to supply the water ballast is really an obligation to supply that which, according to the construction of the ship, may be necessary. There is no real difference between putting water into a water tank which is built as part of the ship for the purpose of trimming it in the course of navigation, and putting a mast into a place which is provided for its reception; and, to my mind, although the water does operate as ballast, it is deceptive to treat the obligation to fill the water tanks with water as being something analogous to or on the same basis as the putting of sand or of cargo into the hold by the master for the purpose of the trimming of the ship.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lowless and Co.
Solicitors for the defendants, Bircham and Co.

CT. OF APP.]

THE CAWDOR (No. 2).

[CT. OF APP.]

Thursday, Jan. 11, 1900.

(Before SMITH, RIGBY, and COLLINS, L.JJ.)

THE CAWDOR (No. 2). (a)

Action of restraint—Part owners—Bail bond for safe return to named port—Forfeiture of bond—Discretion of court—Practice.

Where, in an action of restraint, a bond was given for the safe return of the vessel to a named port and the vessel was not, at the conclusion of the voyage, brought back to the named port, the forfeiture of the bond (affirming the order of Barnes, J.) was ordered.

Semble, a bond for safe return in an action of restraint is in the nature of a recognisance given to the court, and the court has jurisdiction, subject to the terms of the bond, to make such order as may adequately protect the interests of the plaintiffs.

THIS was an appeal from an order of Barnes, J., dated the 1st Nov. 1899 (reported 81 L. T. Rep. 391; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 607), upon a motion by the plaintiff in an action of restraint that the bail bond ordered to be given in that action by the defendants be forfeited.

The facts of the case were as follows:

The plaintiff William Edward Arnold Graham was owner of eleven sixty-fourth shares in the sailing vessel Cawdor, and the defendants were the owners of the balance of the shares in the vessel and were also her managing owners.

On the 2nd Aug. 1898 the plaintiff gave the defendants notice that he declined to participate in the further trading of the ship, and that he would, if necessary, apply for bail for her safe return.

On the 19th Aug. 1898 the plaintiff instituted an action of restraint against the owners of the Cawdor other than himself.

The indorsement on the writ was as follows:

The plaintiff, as owner of eleven sixty-fourth shares of the sailing ship or vessel Cawdor, of the port of Liverpool, being dissatisfied with the management of the said ship by his co-owners, claims that his co-owners shall give bail in the sum of 2750*l.*, the value of liabilities, for the safe return of the said ship to the port to which she belongs, namely, the port of Liverpool.

Bail was in this action ordered to be given by the court in the sum of 1718*l.* 15*s.*, and a bail bond for that amount was on the 1st Sept. 1898 entered into by Messrs. Wallace and Sproule, of Liverpool, in the following form:

Whereas an action of restraint has been commenced in the High Court of Justice on behalf of William Edward Arnold Graham against the owners of the sailing ship or vessel Cawdor other than William Edward Arnold Graham. Now, therefore, we the undersigned John Blackwood Wallace, of 28, Tower-buildings West, in the city of Liverpool, general broker, and William Bouch Sproule, of 26, Old Hall-street, Liverpool, ship-owner, hereby jointly and severally submit ourselves to the jurisdiction of the said court, and consent that if the said sailing ship or vessel Cawdor shall not safely return to the port of Liverpool, and the defendants, the owners of the said sailing ship or vessel Cawdor other than William Edward Arnold Graham shall not in such case pay to the plaintiff or to his solicitor the sum of 1718*l.* 15*s.*, execution may issue forth against us, our heirs, executors, and administrators, goods or chattels, for a sum not exceeding the said sum of 1718*l.* 15*s.*

The Cawdor sailed on her voyage, and in Aug. 1899 returned to the port of Dundee, whence she sailed on the 4th Oct. on a voyage to New York, to load for Sydney or Melbourne. She never returned to any port in England or Wales.

In Sept. 1898 the plaintiff, while the vessel was at Dundee, withdrew his notice of the 2nd Aug. 1898, and expressed his desire to participate in the voyage then in contemplation. This, however, the defendants, at that time, declined to permit.

The plaintiff then served the defendants with the following notice of motion:

Take notice that the court will be moved on Monday, the 30th day of October, 1899, at 11.30 a.m. in the forenoon, or so soon thereafter as counsel may be heard by of counsel for the plaintiff, that the bond given in this action for the safe return of the Cawdor to the port of Liverpool may be pronounced to be forfeited, and that the amount thereof may be ordered to be paid into court if the said vessel do not return within one month to the port of Liverpool; or, in the alternative, for a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to participate in the future working of the said vessel on delivery up of the said bond to the defendants to be cancelled.

The motion came on before Barnes, J. on the 31st Oct. 1899, when it was adjourned in order that the parties might come to terms of settlement.

The defendants then offered to allow the plaintiff to participate in the future working of the ship upon his agreeing to bear his proportion of the expenses incurred in view of that voyage.

This offer was declined by the plaintiff, who insisted on his legal rights under the bond.

The matter was again heard by Barnes, J. on the 1st Nov. 1899, when the following order was made:

Upon hearing counsel on both sides the judge ordered that the bail bond given by the defendants for the safe return of the ship Cawdor to the port of Liverpool be forfeited, and the sum of 1718*l.* 15*s.*, the amount of such bond, be paid into court within ten days. The judge further ordered that the sureties bound by the said bond to have leave to appear and show cause why the aforesaid amount should not be paid into court, and that a copy of this order be forthwith served upon the said sureties, and he condemned the said defendants in the costs of this motion.

The defendants appealed.

Carver, Q.C. (with him Aspinall, Q.C.) for the appellants.—The bond did not become forfeited because the defendants did not bring the Cawdor to Liverpool at the end of the voyage upon which she was engaged when it was given. [RIGBY, L.J.—Do you contend that managing owners can go on rechartering a vessel for ever without forfeiting the bond?] In this case the managing owners were not withholding from the plaintiff the use of his eleven sixty-fourth shares, for they were willing to allow him to come in again upon his paying his share of the expenses of the proposed voyage. It was only on his being told he must contribute to that expense that he insisted on forfeiture. [SMITH, L.J.—It appears to me that he is entitled to it.] It is submitted not: the learned judge below treated this bond as if it were a contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, that the defendants would bring the vessel back to Liverpool or pay the plaintiff the value of his shares. But a bond in an action of restraint is not a contract, but is security given to the court for the safe return of the ship, in the nature of a recognisance :

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lambert v. Aertree, 1 Ld. Raymond, 223.

The decision of the learned judge is without precedent, no similar order has ever been pronounced on a bond of this nature. And, further, this bond was not given by the defendants, but by two other parties who were not before the court, whereas, the order of the learned judge is that the bail bond given "by the defendants" be forfeited. [RIGBY, L.J.—It seems to be in the nature of a bond given by independent persons for the good conduct of a receiver.] But a receiver is put under a personal liability, whereas the majority owners of a ship are under no personal liability for the safety of the ship. At any rate, it is submitted the bond is not a contract of the absolute kind supposed by the learned judge. To ascertain the real nature of this bond one must consider the principles which the Admiralty Court follows in these co-ownership matters. They are two: (1) That the majority owners shall work the vessel; (2) that the minority owners shall have security. See Abbott's Merchant Shipping, 13th edit., p. 85, where Lord Tenterden says: "The law of this country appears to possess an important advantage over all the ordinances that have been cited; because while it authorises the majority in value to employ the ship 'upon any probable design,' it takes care to secure the interest of the dissentient minority from being lost in the employment of which they disapprove. And for this purpose it has been the practice of the Court of Admiralty from very remote times to take a stipulation from those who desire to send the ship on a voyage in a sum equal to the value of the shares of those who disapprove of the adventure, either to bring back and restore to them the ship or to pay to them the value of their shares." The point is that the bond is not a contract with the minority owners that their shares shall be bought if the ship does not come back, but is only a weapon in the hands of the court to safeguard the interests of the minority owners. [COLLINS, L.J.—Do you say that in no case has the whole penalty been enforced, but that only damages have been recovered where the vessel has returned, but in a damaged state?] I think if the vessel returned damaged, the majority owners would have to make good to the minority owners their actual loss. I admit that the court has a discretion, and that if the majority owners were to keep the ship away for an unreasonable time and refused to allow the holders of a bond to share in the adventures, the bond might be forfeited, but here Barnes, J. has not exercised any discretion. In The Margaret (2 Hagg, 275) the court declined to hold a bond forfeited which was given for the safe return of a vessel to a particular port of this kingdom. [RIGBY, L.J.—But there the majority owners, through no fault of theirs, could not bring the vessel back to the particular port.] On the question whether or not the bond continues in force in spite of the vessel not having been brought back, see

The Regalia, 51 L. T. Rep. 904; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 338;

The Vivienne, 57 L. T. Rep. 316; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 178; 12 P. Div. 185.

Laing, Q.C. (with him Balloch).—The order of the learned judge is only to bring the money into court. The plaintiff could take no other steps than those he has taken, since the defendants have never brought the vessel back within the jurisdiction; therefore the plaintiff could only proceed on the original bond. It is clear that there has been a breach of the condition of the bond. The Margaret (ubi sup.) shows that the court has jurisdiction, though it did not exercise it in that case, to order the forfeiture of the bond even though the ship is in safety. In The Regalia (ubi sup.) the form of bond was different, and the point of that case was that a second bond was unnecessary. The Robert Dickinson (52 L. T. Rep. 55; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 341; 10 P. Div. 15) shows that the bond is given for the safe return of the vessel to a named port.

Carver, Q.C. in reply.

SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order made by Barnes, J. dated the 1st Nov. 1899. It is an appeal brought by the gentlemen who are affected by this order. The learned judge ordered that the bail bond given by the defendants for the safe return of the ship Cawdor be forfeited, and that the sum of 171*l.* 15*s.*, being the amount of such bond, be paid into court. He then further ordered that the sureties bound by the bond were to have leave to appear and show cause against the order. The plaintiff in this case was the owner of eleven sixty-fourths, and the defendants are practically the owners of the residue. In Aug. 1898 the plaintiff was dissatisfied with the way in which the vessel was being worked by the majority owners, and upon the 19th Aug. 1898 he commenced an action to restrain. Upon his writ the plaintiff, as owner of eleven sixty-fourth shares of the sailing ship or vessel Cawdor of the port of Liverpool, being dissatisfied, claimed that the co-owners should give bail in the value of his shares for the safe return of the said ship to the port to which she belonged—namely, the port of Liverpool. At this period the ship was at Hartlepool, and the proposed voyage was a voyage to Calcutta. The plaintiff having brought this action to restrain, upon the 1st Sept. 1898 this bond was given which is the subject-matter of the present proceedings. It is dated, as I have said, the 1st Sept. 1898, and is a bond given in the action of Graham v. The Owners of the Sailing Ship Cawdor, and it is a bond for the safe return of that ship to the port of Liverpool. I think—speaking for myself—that what Mr. Carver said about the nature of this bond has foundation in fact. It is a class of security given by sureties to the court, to be enforced by the court, when the court thinks right to enforce it, against the sureties. Then the question arises, first of all, as to whether it is a bond with regard to which the sureties can in no case be called upon by the court to pay into court that which they have undertaken to pay, unless the ship is lost, and, therefore, does not return to the port of Liverpool; or is it a bond which the Admiralty Division has jurisdiction to enforce, if it considers the circumstances of the case are such that enforcement of that bond is right as between the parties? The bond is in this form—"Now, therefore, we, the undersigned . . . hereby jointly and severally submit ourselves to the jurisdiction of the court, and consent that if

[CT. OF APP.]

THE CAWDOR (No. 2).

[CT. OF APP.]

the sailing ship Cawdor shall not safely return to the port of Liverpool"—I stop there for a moment to observe that it is impossible to read that as "If the sailing ship Cawdor is lost, and therefore shall not return to the port of Liverpool"—it is in general terms—"and the defendants shall not in such case pay to the plaintiff the sum of 171*l.* 15*s.*, execution may issue against us, the two sureties." What was that bond given for? It was given for the safe return of this vessel to the port of Liverpool, and the enforcement of it, it appears to me, was left to the judge of the court when he thinks reasonable to do so. Now, what happened? The ship returned to Dundee, and not to the port of Liverpool, and she there, as we are told by Mr. Laing, unknown to the plaintiff, was loaded with a cargo—at that port, over which the Admiralty Court of this country has no jurisdiction—and sent off on a voyage to New York, and thence to Australia. She set sail upon that voyage on the 4th Oct. 1899, the plaintiff not being aware that she was at Dundee. He had been trying, apparently, to get a share, notwithstanding the bail bond, in the future voyage, and the majority owners said, "No! you shall not have a share"; and the result is that having got this bail bond, which is very cold comfort if it is not to be enforced, he has to stand out without a penny of interest, whilst the majority owners go sending the vessel to all parts of the globe. Graham, being in that position, invokes the assistance of the Admiralty Court. He takes up the only position which he could take up. He asks that the vessel shall be returned to the port of Liverpool within a month or the bail forfeited, or for a declaration that he is entitled to participate in the future working of the said vessel on delivery up of the bond. In the order which has been drawn up in this matter, the alternative has been left out. What is the position? As a matter of law, in my judgment, Barnes, J. had jurisdiction to make this order. None of the three or four authorities which have been cited show that he has not. Indeed, one of them—The Margaret (ubi sup.)—rather seems to say that he had. What was the order which was made? He made an order that the sum which the sureties have bound themselves to pay if the ship does not come back to Liverpool shall be paid into court. Was it right to make that order? The majority owners say "No! he should not have made that order, but let this ship go on a voyage"—as far as I can see, all over the face of the globe—and not come back to the port of Liverpool till the majority owners agree to let her do so. I asked Mr. Carver several times during the argument, "How long do you say? What limit do you put?" He said, "You need not put any limit at all." With all respect I think that some limit ought to be put. To keep this man out of his money for one or three, or fourteen or fifteen years is not, I think, a thing which the court ought to do. For these reasons I am of opinion that the order made by Barnes, J. is quite right, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—This is the class of case which arises from the fact of there being co-owners—owners in common of a ship. If they cannot agree they must disagree, and the majority may take the ship to themselves and use her, and neither the Court of Admiralty nor any other court has any right to restrain them from using the ship. It is very hard upon the minority owners that they should get nothing at all out of the ship. If they choose to bring an action to restrain, the limit of what they can get is that two sureties shall be procured by the majority owners, who shall give, not directly to the minority owners, but to the Court of Admiralty, a bond which will at any rate secure to the minority owners some rights. What are the rights? The thing is perfectly clear. The majority owners do not undertake to bring the ship back—they do not undertake anything, as I read it, but they only say, "If we do not bring the ship back, and if whilst we keep the ship we do not pay the assessed value of the shares, 171*l.* 15*s.*, why, then, the sureties, who are willing to come under that obligation, undertake and bind themselves to pay the 171*l.* 15*s.* That is perfectly simple, and I do not see why the court should not have what I think they plainly were intended to have—the jurisdiction to make use of that bond in such a way as justice may require. Now, in this case the ship, at the end of the current voyage, came back to Dundee, which is out of the jurisdiction of the English Admiralty Court. It is probably for business considerations quite right of the owners to bring her there. They had no intention of bringing her to Liverpool, and were under no obligation to do so, and they probably never thought of such a thing as bringing the ship to Liverpool. But then they might go on for twenty years taking her wherever they please, and is it to be supposed that this device of the Court of Admiralty for keeping some hold over majority owners is so feeble that it can only be applied to the case where the ship has gone to the bottom of the sea and is lost altogether, and to no other case? I looked with great curiosity at the case cited of The Margaret (ubi sup.), and I found no such statement contained there at all, and, in fact, I find that there is cited by the learned judge who is delivering judgment a decision in another case, upon which I should rather suppose the motion in this very case was founded. In this case it is ordered that if the defendants do not bring the vessel back to Liverpool within a month, then the money shall be paid into court. I cannot say what may be done in a further stage of the case, but I cannot see that there is anything wrong in what the learned judge has ordered—namely, that the money shall be paid into court, unless the sureties can show reason to the contrary. That being so, I must decline to overrule the order of the learned judge.

COLLINS, L.J. concurred.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Chas. E. Harvey.
Solicitors for the defendants, Pritchard and Sons.

Q.B. Div.] GEORGE BOOKER AND Co. v. POCKLINGTON STEAMSHIP CO. LIM. [Q.B. Div.]

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Oct. 31, Nov. 1 and 6, 1899.

(Before BIGHAM, J.)

GEORGE BOOKER AND Co. v. POCKLINGTON STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

Charter-party—Construction—Clause in charter-party that "all salvage shall be for owners and charterers' equal benefit"—Salvage services—Deductions from salvage before division.

A charter-party made between the charterers and owners of a steamship provided that the ship-owners should maintain the vessel in a thoroughly efficient state for and during the service; that if any damage prevented the working of the vessel for twenty-four hours, the hire should cease until the vessel was again in an efficient state; that the vessel was to be at liberty to tow and assist vessels in distress, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life and property; and clause 20 provided that "all derelicts and salvage shall be for charterers and owners' equal benefit." During a voyage under the charter-party the vessel rendered salvage services for which the owners were awarded a large sum in an action in the Admiralty Division. In consequence of performing these salvage services the owners of the vessel incurred certain expenses, including repairs, the cost of renewing a fractured tail end shaft, of ropes and gear used in towage, of extra oil and coal, a port bill, and the loss of hire during the time the vessel was under repair. In an action by the charterers against the ship-owners to recover under clause 20 half the salvage money:

Held, that the salvage which under clause 20 was to be for the "equal benefit" of the parties was not the amount awarded in the Admiralty Court, but the net pecuniary result of the salvage operations, and that, in arriving at the sum to be divided the shipowners were entitled to deduct from the salvage award the expenses and losses incurred by them (including the loss of hire) in earning the salvage, and that the balance was the sum to be equally divided.

COMMERCIAL action tried before Bigham, J.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs as charterers against the owners of a ship to recover under the charter-party the plaintiffs' share of a sum of money awarded to the defendants for salvage services rendered by the ship.

The agreed statement of facts was as follows:—

1. The defendants are the owners of the steamship Pocklington. The plaintiffs at the time material to the questions in this action were the charterers of the steamship.

2. By a charter-party, dated the 9th Aug. 1898 and made between the plaintiffs and defendants, the plaintiffs chartered the Pocklington for three round voyages between the United Kingdom, the West Indies, and (or) Bermuda at the rate of 525*l.* per calendar month. The following, amongst others, were clauses in the charter-party:

(2) That the owners shall provide and pay for all the provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, donkey engineers, firemen, and crew . . . and maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for and during the service.

(6) That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown, repairs, or stoppage of machinery, or causes appertaining to the duties of the owners, or damage preventing the working or sailing of the vessel at any time for more than twenty-four hours, the hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service, and if in consequence of such deficiency, breakdown, repairs, stoppage, or other causes the vessel puts into any port or ports other than those to which she is bound, port charges, pilotages, &c., at those ports shall be borne by the owners; but should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather, such detention or loss of time shall be at the charterers' expense. In the event during this charter of a cessation of hire under this clause or clause 7, all coal consumed during the period of such cessation shall be for owners' account.

(13) The steamer has liberty to call at any ports in any order, to sail without pilots, and to tow and assist vessels in distress, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property.

(14) The act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates, assailing thieves, arrest and restraint of princes, rulers, and people, collisions, strandings, and other accidents of navigation mutually excepted, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of pilots, masters, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners; but this clause is not to be construed as in any way affecting or cancelling the provision for cessation of hire as provided for in this charter-party.

(20) All derelicts and salvage shall be for owners and charterers' equal benefit. Penalty for non-performance of this contract, estimated amount of damages.

3. The plaintiffs' claim is to a moiety of some salvage earned by the Pocklington during the charter-party and to a return of hire.

4. On the 3rd Jan. 1899, during the second voyage under the charter-party, the Pocklington fell in with the disabled steamer Dart, and rendered salvage services to her by towing her into Queenstown Harbour.

5. On the 9th Jan. 1899 the owners of the steamship Pocklington (the defendants in this action) and others commenced an action in the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice to recover salvage from the owners of the steamship Dart, her cargo and freight.

6. At the conclusion of her voyage in Jan. 1899, the Pocklington was docked and repairs were being executed upon her from the 11th Jan. until the 24th Jan.

7. By their statement of claim in the above action the owners of the Pocklington alleged in paragraph II as follows:

The Pocklington towed the Dart 313 miles and stood by at request for a very long time, and lost four days. Her hull, engines, and towing gear were strained and damaged and part of her cargo lost, and losses and expenses have been incurred.

Particulars of the claim of such losses and expenses were delivered on the 23rd Jan. 1899 in the said action, and consisted of the cost of (1) repairing damage done to vessel; (2) renewing fractured tail end shaft; (3) ropes and gear used in towage; (4) extra oil and coal; (5) port bill at Queenstown; and (6) detention during repairs.

8. On the 29th Jan. 1899 the action for salvage came on for hearing before Phillimore, J., who by his judgment awarded to the owners of the steamship Pocklington the sum of 2750*l.*, as well as the costs of such action.

Q.B. Div.] LYLE SHIPPING CO. v. CORPORATION OF CARDIFF & CHURCHILL & SIM. [Q.B. Div.]

9. The defendants contend that before dividing the award there should be deducted therefrom (1) the amount of the repairs attributable to the salvage services; (2) the cost of renewing the fractured tail end shaft; (3) the cost of ropes and gear used in towage; (4) the cost of extra oil and coal consumed; (5) the port bill at Queenstown; (6) the hire for the period during which the Pocklington was under repair; and (7) the balance of costs incurred in the salvage action over and above the taxed costs recovered from defendants, and that the balance is divisible between the present plaintiffs and defendants.

10. The plaintiffs contend that the amount to be divided should be the amount of the award, namely, 2750*l.*, less the extra costs in the salvage action as above, and that half of the balance is due from the defendants. The plaintiffs further contend that, if the defendants are entitled to deduct the amounts set out in paragraph 9 hereof, the plaintiffs are also entitled to have deducted from the award and paid to them in full the loss of time during the services, and the cost of extra coal consumed. This contention the defendants admit.

11. The plaintiffs further contend that the defendants are not entitled to deduct the hire during the time the Pocklington was under repair, inasmuch as the same does not represent hire earned under the terms of the charter-party.

The opinion of the court is desired upon the above contentions.

Carver, Q.C. and Bateson for the plaintiffs.

Aspinall, Q.C. and A. Lennard for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 6.—BIGHAM, J. read the following judgment:—If clause 20 of the charter-party stood alone, there could, I take it, be no doubt as to its meaning. "Equal benefit" cannot be accorded to shipowner and charterer without taking into account what each has contributed towards securing the benefit. Salvage in this clause does not mean the amount recovered in the suit in the Admiralty Court. It means the net pecuniary result of the salvage operations. Therefore it follows that from the sum awarded by the Admiralty Court all the losses mentioned in paragraph 9 of the case must be deducted by the shipowner, and the balance only divided. Such a division will satisfy the requirements of clause 20. But it is said that clause 20 must be read by the light of the other clauses of the charter-party, and particularly of clauses 2 and 6. I agree that the document is to be read as a whole, and that, if it appears that some clauses are intended to qualify the interpretation of others, effect must be given to such intention. I do not, however, think that any clause in the charter-party is intended to affect or alter what I conceive to be the clear meaning of clause 20. Clause 2 provides that the shipowner is to maintain the vessel in a thoroughly efficient state for and during the service; and clause 6 provides that if any damage prevents the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four hours, the hire shall cease. The charterers say that the interpretation which I put on clause 20 relieves the shipowners of the burdens which these two clauses impose upon them, and does it at the charterers' expense, inasmuch as it has the effect of reducing the amount of salvage to be divided. I do not, however, agree with this contention. It is the salvage operations which have caused the damage and the loss of hire, and the Admiralty Court, though not awarding to the ship a specific sum in respect thereof, has taken both heads of loss into consideration in fixing the amount payable by the salvaged vessel. In other words, if there had been no loss of hire and no damage to the vessel, the award would have been proportionately less, and the charterers would have got what they get now, neither more nor less.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Field, Roscoe, and Co., for Batesons, Warr, and Wimshurst, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Downing, Bolam, and Co., for Bolam and Co., Sunderland.

Tuesday, Dec. 5, 1899.

(Before BIGHAM, J.)

LYLE SHIPPING COMPANY LIMITED v. CORPORATION OF CARDIFF AND CHURCHILL AND SIM, Third parties. (a)

Charter-party—Construction of—Demurrage—Discharge of cargo "with all despatch as customary"—Contract by charterers with railway company for supply of trucks for discharge—Insufficient supply of trucks by company—Liability of charterers.

A charter-party provided that "the ship is to be discharged with all despatch as customary."

The custom and practice of the port of discharge was to discharge the cargo into railway trucks, and to procure such trucks from one railway company.

For the discharge of the cargo the consignees, in accordance with the custom, had contracted with a railway company for the supply of trucks to receive the cargo.

A delay in the discharge of the ship was caused by the railway company not providing a sufficient supply of railway trucks alongside to receive the cargo; but the consignees had not been guilty of any personal neglect, and had done their best to get the customary appliances for the discharge of the ship, and had used such appliances, when obtained, with proper despatch.

In an action by the shipowners against the consignees for demurrage or damages for the detention of the vessel:

Held, that the consignees, having done their best to get the customary appliances for the discharge of the ship, and having used the same with proper despatch, had discharged the ship "with all despatch as customary," and were therefore not liable for the delay of the vessel caused by the insufficient supply of trucks.

COMMERCIAL ACTION tried before Bigham, J.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, as owners of the ship Cape Wrath, against the defendants as indorsees (to whom the property in the goods passed) of a bill of lading for the cargo of the ship, dated the 6th June 1899, and the plaintiffs claimed to recover demurrage or damages for detention of the ship at Cardiff, her port of discharge.

Q.B. Div.] LYLE SHIPPING CO. v. CORPORATION OF CARDIFF & CHURCHILL & SIM. [Q.B. Div.]

The bill of lading incorporated the terms and conditions of a charter-party, dated the 14th Dec. 1898, which provided (inter alia) that "the ship is to be discharged with all despatch as customary, weather permitting."

The defendants (the Corporation of Cardiff) had bought a quantity of jarrah wood from Messrs. Churchill and Sim (brought in by the defendants as third parties), of which the cargo now in question was a part, and by the contract of sale the vendors contracted to indemnify the defendants against all claims and demands in respect of demurrage; and the defendants claimed under this indemnity to be indemnified by the third parties against any sums which the plaintiffs might recover in the action.

The ship was loaded with a cargo of the jarrah wood at Freemantle, and sailed for Cardiff, her port of discharge.

She arrived and was berthed at Cardiff on the 2nd Oct., and the discharge began on the following day, the 3rd Oct.

The discharge was not completed until the 23rd Nov., and occupied forty-five working days. The plaintiffs alleged that if the defendants had taken delivery "with all despatch," as provided by the charter-party, the Cape Wrath would have completed the discharge on the 27th Oct., and they claimed damages for each day's detention of the ship since the 27th Oct. at the charter-party rate of 24l. 19s. 6d. per day.

For the discharge of the cargo at Cardiff the defendants had contracted with the Great Western Railway Company for the supply of trucks to receive the cargo, and the usual practice of the port of Cardiff was to discharge the cargo into railway wagons, and to procure such wagons from one railway company.

The delay in the discharge was caused by there being an insufficient supply of railway trucks alongside the vessel to receive the cargo, and this insufficiency of trucks was owing to a pressure of work on the railway at the time.

The learned judge found as a fact that the defendants were not personally guilty of any neglect in taking the discharge, and that they had done their best to get the appliances which were at the time available at the port, and which were customarily used for the purpose of discharging vessels, and that when they had obtained these appliances, they had used them with proper despatch.

The question now was whether the defendants, who had contracted with the railway company for the supply of the railway trucks, were liable to the plaintiffs for the delay caused under the above circumstances by the insufficient supply of trucks by the railway company.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Leck for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are liable for the detention of the vessel at Cardiff beyond the time when the cargo might have been discharged if all despatch had been used according to the terms of the charter-party. The defendants were bound to discharge the cargo with all despatch, and if they had done so the cargo would have been discharged in a much shorter time. The fact that there was an insufficient supply of railway trucks alongside to receive the cargo does not relieve the defendants from their obligation, and the fact that they could not get a larger number of wagons at that particular time does not relieve them from liability. That was a misfortune for which the loss ought to fall on them, and not on the plaintiffs. It is not sufficient for the defendants to have done their best to get a sufficient supply of wagons; they ought to have provided a sufficient supply, and for not having done so they are liable:

Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company, 40 L. T. Rep. 413; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 118; 4 Ex. Div. 165;

Kruuse v. Drynan and Co., 18 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 1110.

R. Isaacs, Q.C. and Bailhache for the defendants.—The case of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.) is distinguishable, as in that case the words "as customary" were not in the charter-party. Here the cargo was to be discharged with all despatch "as customary," that is, as customary at the port of discharge. At the port of discharge the custom was for the cargo to be discharged into railway trucks brought alongside the ship, and it was the custom and practice for the charterers to contract with one railway company for the supply of these trucks. The defendants in this case contracted with the railway company for the supply of the railway trucks for the discharge, and in doing so they were following the custom of the port. Owing to pressure of work on the railway sufficient trucks were not supplied; but for that insufficient supply the defendants are not responsible. They were not guilty of any personal negligence in the matter; they have taken all precautions to obtain the appliances that are customarily used at this port for the discharge of vessels, and when they obtained these appliances they used them with all the despatch possible. They have therefore effected the discharge of the cargo "with all despatch as customary" within the meaning of the charter-party, and, that being so, the cases clearly show that they are not liable for the detention:

Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 40 L. T. Rep. 601; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302, 129; 4 Ex. Div. 155, affirmed in H. L. 42 L. T. Rep. 845; 5 App. Cas. 599;

Wyllie v. Harrison and Co., 13 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 92;

Castlegate Steamship Company Limited v. Dempsey and Co., 66 L. T. Rep. 742; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 186; (1892) 1 Q. B. 854;

Good and Co. v. Isaacs, 67 L. T. Rep. 450; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212; (1892) 2 Q. B. 555.

Carver, Q.C., Scrutton, and Mackinnon for third parties.

BIGHAM, J.—This action is brought by the shipowners against the defendants, who are the indorsees of a bill of lading for the cargo of the ship, in which bill of lading are incorporated the terms of the charter-party, so that the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs for the performance of the conditions of the charter-party. The action is brought to recover demurrage or damages for detention at the port of discharge, and the terms of the charter-party are that the cargo is to be discharged with all despatch as customary. That is all that need be said about the contract. The defendants are charged with a breach of the contract by which they were bound to discharge the vessel with all despatch, as customary. [His Lordship stated the facts, and proceeded:] It is alleged that the number of days taken to discharge the cargo was in excess of the time permitted by the charter-party, and that is the question in the case. I am satisfied that the defendants were not personally guilty of any neglect at all in taking discharge of the cargo. They did their best to get the appliances which were available at the port at the time, and which were customarily used for the purpose of discharging vessels, and having done their best to get those appliances, in my opinion they made the best possible use of them, and therefore no blame of any kind can be imputed to them. I have carefully considered the evidence, and particularly the letters and documents which have been read, and I see plainly that when that vessel arrived at Cardiff there was a great stress of work, and difficulties had to be contended with in taking discharge of this cargo, which was of an exceptional character. But I repeat that the defendants, in my opinion, did their best to deal with those difficulties, and took delivery of this cargo as quickly as it was practically possible for them to do. It is, however, said on behalf of the plaintiffs that the ship should have been discharged in a much shorter time if the defendants had furnished the vessel with a larger number of wagons, and the fact that they were not able to get a larger number of wagons is a misfortune of which the defendants and not the plaintiffs must bear the loss.

Q.B. DIV.] LYLE SHIPPING CO. v. CORPORATION OF CARDIFF & CHURCHILL & SIM. [Q.B. DIV.]

In order to see if that is so, it is necessary to consider the meaning of the contract: "To be discharged with all despatch as customary"; and to assist me in ascertaining what these very few words mean, a number of authorities have been referred to. The first in order of date is Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.). In that case the contract in the charter-party was that the charterers should deliver into lighters, and there was nothing at all about the custom of the port, but the simple contract was that the charterers were to deliver into lighters. The discharge of the ship was delayed by reason of insufficiency of lighters, and the charterers, in the action against them for damages for that delay or for demurrage, alleged that they had done their best to get the only lighters which were available at the port, and if they had not succeeded in getting more than were sufficient for the necessities of the case, they were not to be blamed for it. As I understand the decision in that case, it was this: It was in accordance with the ordinary common law rule that if a person will undertake to do a thing in a particular way, he must do it or answer for the consequences. That seems to be the effect of that case; but when the case is explained in later decisions it seems to me that the real effect of it is this: That all that the charterer is required to do is to do his best, and that in that case he did not do his best, and therefore he was held responsible. I do not think that is the meaning of the judgment of the learned judges in that case. Lord Herschell in the case of Hick v. Raymond and Reid (68 L. T. Rep. 175; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1893) A. C. 22), in dealing with that case, says this: "The learned judge who tried the case, in summing up, told the jury that they were to take into consideration the circumstance that the port was full of vessels; but he did not directly tell them not to consider the deficiency of lighters caused by the large number of ships, so far as that state of things had been produced by the defendants themselves; nor did he tell them that the defendants were bound to provide the means of unloading within a reasonable time; nor that they were bound to allot the lighters proportionately among the vessels or to use the lighters for them in the order in which they arrived. The jury found in favour of the defendants, and the appeal was against the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division making absolute a rule for a new trial. It will thus be seen that the circumstances which prevented the vessel being discharged within the ordinary time were not beyond the control of the defendants. It was not shown that they could not by reasonable precautions or exertions have procured the necessary lighters elsewhere or earlier, and so have avoided the delay which took place"; and then he says: "Under these circumstances I think the decision was perfectly right, and a new trial properly granted." I do not think that the judgment in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.) proceeded upon those grounds at all, but Lord Herschell evidently thought, when he was delivering his judgment in Hick v. Raymond and Reid (ubi sup.), that that judgment in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.) can only be justified on those grounds. His view, in my opinion, was that there were circumstances in that case to show, and which did show, that the defendants had not taken proper care to obtain the appliances which were required for discharging the ship, and did not, when they had obtained those appliances, take proper care to use them in a business-like way, and upon those grounds he thought that the decision of the Court of Appeal directing a new trial was a right decision. The next case in order of date is Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.), which is a different case in this sense, that the wording of the charter-party introduces the expression "as customary." In Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) itself and in other cases, judges have entertained a doubt as to whether the introduction of those words in a charter-party really makes any difference. For my part, I should have thought that the introduction of the words did make a difference, and did make all the difference; but I cannot help seeing that Lord Herschell and many other judges have read the case of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.), as being a case in which there would not have been any difference at all even if the words "as customary" had been introduced. That is to say, that in those charter-parties where the undertaking is to deliver with due despatch the introduction of the words "as customary" adds nothing to or takes nothing from the obligation of the charterer. For my own part I think that the introduction of those words is of importance. What does "as customary" mean? I think it means that attention must be given to the rules of the port which affect the discharge of vessels—rules which affect the place where the vessel is to go, and rules which affect the times during which a vessel may work. I think the words, moreover, mean that the practice as to the kind of appliances to be used in the discharge must be taken into account, and that the practice as to the source from which those appliances are to be obtained, must be taken into account.

Applying those considerations to this case, I observe that the rule of the port of Cardiff in this particular case was that the goods should be delivered into wagons, and in no other way. The practice was to deliver into wagons, and the course of business was for the consignees to obtain those wagons from specific railway companies. That was, I find in this case, the custom of the port. So, in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.), the custom was to discharge into lighters—lighters belonging to one company. The custom was for those lighters to be warped across the bar by means of one rope. Those were the appliances, and the words in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) being in effect the same as the words in the present case, the House of Lords were of opinion that the charterers had performed their duty—their part of their contract under the charter-party—when they had taken diligent and proper steps to obtain the services of the appliances which were customarily used, and had utilised those appliances, when obtained, with proper and business-like despatch. I can see no difference in principle between Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) and this case. There is also a Scotch case, Wyllie v. Harrison and Co. (ubi sup.), which was decided in 1885. That case appears to be nearly on all fours with the case now before me. In that case the cargo—a cargo of iron—was to be discharged as fast as the steamer could deliver after being berthed as customary. The custom of the port there was to deliver by steam cranes into wagons brought alongside, and a further custom was that no pig-iron should be put upon the quay. Only two railway companies were in the habit of supplying the wagons upon the lines which had access to the quay. One of these companies failed to supply sufficient trucks or wagons, and thereby delay was caused. It was held by the court that for such delay the charterers were not liable, and I read some passages in that judgment to show the grounds on which it proceeded. The Lord Justice-Clerk (Lord Moncreiff) said: "Under this charter-party the cargo was to be delivered as customary—that is, subject to the custom of the port. Now, from the nature of the cargo and the place of delivery the goods could not be delivered except into trucks. Under the general rules regulating maritime carriage the charterer is responsible for the goods to be conveyed until loading is complete. After loading is complete, and until the vessel arrives at its destination, the owners are responsible. When the vessel has arrived the duty of taking delivery is on the charterer, but when delivery is to be taken at the port subject to regulations not in the power either of charterer or owners there may occur difficulties, and there may be entailed delay for which neither party is responsible to the other. They both contracted subject to the regulations of the port of discharge." In my opinion every word of that applies to the particular circumstances of this case. He then goes on to say: "Now, one of the rules of the port of discharge selected, Glasgow General Terminus, was that no cargo should be laid down on the quay, but that all cargo should be delivered into trucks. That being so, and there being no trucks available, or not sufficient trucks available, I think a delay occurred for which neither party was responsible to the other." It is to be observed that the Lord

Justice-Clerk there relies upon the words in the charter-party "as customary." When I look at Lord Young's judgment, I cannot help seeing that his decision would have been the same if the words "as customary" had not been there, for he says the charter-party happens to add "as customary," but the addition is a superfluity, for unless the contrary is expressed "as customary" is implied. That is to say, he takes the view which apparently many of the English judges have taken, that these words "as customary" are to be implied, and ought to have been implied, in the case of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.). He says further: "Delivery into trucks furnished by the railway companies and brought to the ship side was by the custom of the place the recognised method of delivery. The trucks, we must take it, were only those of two railway companies, and all that the charterers could do was, as the sheriff says, to give notice that trucks were wanted, and then, if necessary, hurry and stir up the railway companies to provide them. This the sheriff and I think they did—that is, they have committed no breach of their duty to take delivery as fast as it could be taken at that place." Having regard to these authorities, it seems to me that the whole obligation in this case upon the charterer is to do his best to procure the appliances that are customarily used at this port for the purpose of discharging such vessels. The appliances customarily used, in my opinion, were the wagons of certain specified railway companies, and no others. I find as a fact that they did use their best exertions to get the services of those appliances; but their contractual obligation goes further, however, than the mere obligation to obtain the appliances. It goes this far, that having obtained them, they must use them with proper despatch, and I find as a fact in this case that they did use them with proper despatch; and I think, under these circumstances on this part of the case, my judgment must be for the defendants. I ought to add that in my opinion the view I take of this case is amply supported by the observation of Lord Selborne in the case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland, to be found at 42 L. T. Rep. 848; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 304; and 5 App. Cas. 610, which was referred to during the course of the arguments.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lowless and Co.
Solicitors for the defendants, Riddell, Vaizey, and Smith, for J. L. Wheatley, Cardiff.
Solicitors for third parties, Burn and Berridge.

Dec. 1 and 11, 1899.

(Before BIGHAM, J.)

BRITISH MARINE MUTUAL INSURANCE ASSOCIATION LIMITED v. JENKINS AND OTHERS. (a)
Marine insurance—Mutual insurance association—Insurance of ship by agent of shipowner—Agent as member liable to contributions—Failure of agent to pay—Liability of shipowner, not being member, to pay contributions and premiums.

The defendants, who were the owners of a certain

Q.B. Div.] BRITISH MARINE MUTUAL INSURANCE ASSOC. v. JENKINS &amp; OTHERS. [Q.B. Div.]

ship, authorised their agent to insure, and the agent did insure the ship by an ordinary Lloyd's policy in the plaintiff association, the object of which association was the mutual insurance "of ships which the members might be authorised to insure in their own names," and a "member" was defined to be "any person who, on behalf of himself or any other person, insures any ship in the association." By so entering the ship the agent became a "member," and was personally responsible to the association for the payment of the contributions and premiums due in respect of the insurance. In practice these contributions were collected from the members, that is, from those who entered ships in the club, and the members then got the money from their principals, and a committee were empowered to assess members rateably to provide a fund to meet losses. The policy, the memorandum and articles of association and the rules, which together formed the contract of insurance, contained no express provision either that the defendants should be liable for the contributions and premiums, or that they should be relieved from such liability. The defendants' agent became insolvent, and unable to pay the contributions and premiums, and the association brought an action to recover the same from the defendants as owners of the ship.

Held, that as the defendants alone had an insurable interest as owners of the ship, and as it was for their benefit the insurance was effected, they, as well as their agent were liable to pay the contributions and premiums unless they could show that their contract in unmistakable terms relieved them from such liability, which the contract in this case did not do.

ACTION tried before Bigham, J. in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs, the British Marine Mutual Insurance Association, sued the defendants, who were the owners of the ship Vigil, to recover from them, as such owners, the amount of the contributions or premiums payable in respect of an insurance of their ship in the plaintiffs' club.

The defence set up by the defendants was that by the agreement sued on the plaintiffs had contracted to look only to the defendants' agent, one William Grove, for payment, and not to the defendants themselves.

The plaintiffs were a marine mutual insurance association, and clause 4 of the memorandum of association declared that one of the objects of the association was the mutual insurance "of ships which the members may be authorised to insure in their own names"; and clause 4 of the articles of association defined a member to be "any person who, on behalf of himself or any other person, insures any ship in the association."

The defendants wished to insure their ship, the Vigil, in the plaintiffs' club, and they authorised one William Grove, who was managing the ship on their behalf, to enter the ship in the club.

Grove accordingly entered the ship in the plaintiffs' club, and by so doing he made himself a member of the club within the meaning of the memorandum and articles of the club as being a person who was authorised to insure the ship in his own name.

Grove, by reason of his becoming a member of the club, became personally liable to pay the contributions or premiums, which, under the articles of association and the rules, might be levied by the club in respect of the insurance.

Grove became insolvent, and was unable to pay the contributions, and the plaintiffs' association thereupon brought the present action against the defendants as owners of the ship to recover the contributions or premiums due in respect of the insurance.

The question now was whether the plaintiffs were, under the circumstances of the case, entitled to look for payment to the defendants, as being the persons for whose benefit the insurance was effected.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment, and the clauses in the policy of insurance, the memorandum and articles of association of the club, and the rules annexed to the policy, are, so far as is now material, set out in the judgment.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (James Fox with him) for the plaintiffs.—Although Grove was no doubt liable for these contributions and premiums, that does not exclude the defendants' liability, and the defendants were also liable. They were the persons to whom the ship belonged and who therefore had the insurable interest. They alone could insure the ship, and it was their interest which was insured. They, as the assured, and the plaintiffs, as the insurers, were the parties to the contract of insurance, and Grove merely acted as the agent of the defendants in effecting the insurance; and although by doing so he, by the rules of the association, made himself a member of it and became responsible as such for these contributions, still the fact of his liability did not prevent the defendants also being liable. The effect really was that the plaintiffs had the security of two parties for these contributions, namely, Grove and the defendants. If there were any losses incurred for which under the policy the plaintiffs would have been liable, the plaintiffs would have been bound to pay those losses to the defendants, and the defendants, as owners of the ship, could have sued to recover them. The consideration for the payment of these losses to the defendants was the liability of the defendants to pay the contributions and premiums, and if the defendants were not liable to make these payments to the plaintiffs, then there would have been no consideration from the defendants for the plaintiffs undertaking the risk. The case of United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association Limited v. Nevill or Nevill's case (19 Q. B. Div. 110; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226n.) will be relied on by the defendants. That case is distinguishable, as there the policy by its special wording was held to exclude the liability of the shipowners, whereas in the present case the policy is an ordinary Lloyd's policy and cannot be construed to exclude the defendants' liability. In the cases of Great Britain 100 A 1 Steamship Insurance Association v. Wyllie (Wyllie's case) (60 L. T. Rep. 916; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 398; 22 Q. B. Div. 710) and Ocean Iron Steamship Insurance Association Limited v. Leslie (Leslie's case) (57 L. T. Rep. 722; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226; 22 Q. B. Div. 722n.), where the documents were similar to those in the present case, the defendants, the shipowners, were held to be liable to the contributions. In Montgomerie v. United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association Limited (64 L. T. Rep. 323; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 19; (1891) 1 Q. B. 370), the form of contract was the same as in Nevill's case (ubi sup.), and it was held that the action was not maintainable, as the terms of the policy expressly excluded liability on the part of the defendants to any person other than the person described as "a member." There is therefore nothing either in that case or in Nevill's case (ubi sup.), to prevent the plaintiffs from recovering these contributions from the defendants.

F. Laing, Q.C. (Balloch with him) for some of the defendants.—Grove was the person who was liable to the plaintiffs. He was the "member" of the plaintiffs' association, and to him, and to him alone, the plaintiffs were to look for the payment of these contributions. The defendants found Grove, who was willing to enter into this contract, and who in effect promised and undertook to pay the contributions and the premiums, and that was the consideration given by them for the insurance. The fact that Grove was liable to the plaintiffs negatives any liability on the part of the defendants. With regard to the authorities, Nevill's case (ubi sup.) is a clear authority in favour of the defendants. That case shows that it is the "member"—in this case Grove—who is liable, and not the shipowners. The contract in the present case is substantially the same as in Nevill's case (ubi sup.), and, according to that case, the only person who can be held liable is the member—that is, Grove. In Wyllie's case (ubi sup.) there was an express contract on the part of the assured—the shipowners—to pay, and there it was held that the shipowners were liable to pay, but it was based very clearly upon the fact that, as Bowen, L.J. there says, "there was an express contract by the 'assured' to pay the contributions." So Lord Escher, M.R. there says: "It shows that the defendants are liable on this policy by reason of their express contract." The liability is there based on an express contract. Here there was no such express contract making the defendants liable, and the only person liable is the "member." That was the view taken by the plaintiffs until the insolvency of Grove.

J. A. Hamilton for other defendants.—There is in this policy an express liability upon members which excludes any right to look to co-owners who are not members of the association for calls. There cannot be any right to look to co-owners for calls unless there is an express contract giving power to do so. Here, as in Nevill's case (ubi sup.), the liability is imposed upon members only, and consequently here, as in that case, the defendants ought not to be held liable. Then Wyllie's case (ubi sup.) shows that express words are necessary to make the defendants liable; and all the three Lords Justices in that case said they relied on the express words of the contract as showing that the defendants had expressly contracted to pay the contributions. There is no such express contract here, and on that ground Wyllie's case (ubi sup.) is distinguishable.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 11.—BIGHAM, J. read the following judgment.—This is an action brought against the defendants who are the owners of a ship called the Vigil to recover the amount of the contributions and premiums payable in respect of an insurance of their ship in the plaintiffs' club. The defence is that by the agreement sued on the plaintiffs have contracted with the defendants to look only to the defendants' agent for payment and not to the defendants themselves. The question is whether that defence is made out. The facts are quite simple. The defendants wishing to effect an insurance with the plaintiffs, authorised one Grove, who was managing the ship on their behalf, to enter the Vigil in the club. Grove accordingly entered the ship and so made himself a member of the club within the meaning of the memorandum and articles of association, and by reason of his membership he became personally liable to pay the contributions or premiums which under the articles of association and the rules might be levied by the committee of the club. Grove became insolvent and was unable to pay, whereupon the plaintiffs brought the action against the defendants as being the persons on whose behalf and for whose benefit the insurance had been effected. It is necessary to remember that no one other than the defendants could have effected the insurance. They might do it by themselves, or they might do it through an agent acting for them. But they in whom the interest existed could alone effect the insurance; a contract entered into by any one else who did not possess the interest, would be a wager policy and therefore void. Thus when Grove entered the ship in the plaintiffs' club he effected a contract of insurance, the parties to which were the association on the one hand and the defendants whose interests were being insured on the other. He might, at the same time, and in my opinion in this case he did, make himself personally responsible for the payment of the contributions; but the contract of insurance was and could only be between the parties I have named. If any losses occurred within the meaning of the contract of insurance, they would have to be made good to the defendants, who alone were entitled to be indemnified, and they would have to be made good by the plaintiffs. What then was the consideration for the plaintiffs' promise to make good such losses? It must of course be a consideration moving from the defendants. Then what consideration? In the ordinary course of things one would expect the consideration to be the payment by the defendants of the contributions, or in other words, of the price to be paid to the plaintiffs for taking the risk. Apart from any stipulation or practice embodied in the contract to the contrary, the person who gets the benefit under a contract is the person who pays for it. But it is said in this case on behalf of the defendants that the consideration consisted of their finding someone else (namely, Grove) to promise to pay, and that the plaintiffs accepted the procurement of this bare promise—not its performance—as the consideration and so contracted themselves out of their prima facie right to look to the defendants. Such a consideration appears to me to be very improbable, but it is legally possible, and it is therefore necessary to examine the documents to see whether it is to be found in them. The contract of insurance is required by law to be contained in a written policy. In this case the policy is made up of three documents which are (1) the policy itself; (2) the memorandum and articles of the plaintiff

Q.B. Div.] BRITISH MARINE MUTUAL INSURANCE ASSOC. v. JENKINS &amp; OTHERS. [Q.B. Div.]

association; and (3) the rules annexed to the policy. The first of those three, which for convenience I shall call the policy, begins in the ordinary old-fashioned Lloyd's form: "Know all men that William Grove as well in his or their own name or names as for and in the name and names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain in part or in all doth make assurance and cause himself or themselves, and them and every other of them to be insured, &c." Now, beyond all doubt the persons here referred to are the persons interested in the vessel, that is to say, the defendants, for by law they can be no others; they are the assured. Then comes the valuation clause: "The said ship for so much as concerns the assured (the defendants) by agreement between the assured and assurers in this policy shall be valued at l." This valuation not only fixes the amount to be paid in case of loss, but it also affords one of the data for calculating the amount of contributions or premiums payable in respect of the insurance. There is then the usual description of the perils which the plaintiffs are to bear, followed by the Lloyd's form of the sue and labour clause: "It shall be lawful for the assured" (the defendants) "to sue and labour in and about the recovery of the said ship . . . to the charges of which the assurers promise to contribute." Then the policy finishes with these words, "and so the association is contented and does hereby promise and bind itself to the assured" (the defendants) "for the due performance of the premises subject to the articles and annexed rules of the association which it is mutually agreed shall form part of and be of the same force and effect as if inserted in the body of this policy." These concluding words contain a clear promise by the plaintiffs to make good to the defendants any losses that may occur under the policy, and they give the defendants a right of action in case of breach. The policy, however, contains nothing to indicate what premiums are to be paid, or by whom, or when they are to be paid; in fact, there is no reference to the consideration for the promise. It becomes necessary, therefore, in order to find out what the consideration is and by whom it is to be paid, to refer to the incorporated documents. I take the memorandum and articles of association first. Clause 4 of the memorandum declares that one of the objects of the association is the mutual insurance of ships which the members may be authorised to "insure in their own names." Whose ships? Obviously the ships of those persons who authorise the insurance. And how are they to be "mutually" insured? One would naturally suppose by the owners who give the authority contributing among themselves to make good any losses that may happen. Thus the memorandum would seem to point to a liability on the part of each shipowner to contribute his share towards the losses; in other words, to pay the contributions or premiums levied in respect of his ship. The defendants, however, contend otherwise, and say that the ships are to be mutually insured by means of contributions or premiums to be paid by the agents who enter their ships in the club and by no one else; in other words, by the "members" of the club. Now, clause 4 of the articles of association defines a "member" to be any person who, on behalf of himself or any other person, insures any ship in the association; and clauses 44 and 46 empower a committee of the association to assess the members rateably, so as to provide a fund which shall be sufficient to meet losses. Clause 41 stipulates that the association shall not be liable to make good losses except to the extent of the funds which it may be able to recover from the members or persons liable to the same. The defendants contend that the words "or persons liable for the same" in this rule mean the legal representatives of the members, as, for instance, their trustees in bankruptcy. There is some authority for this contention to be found in the judgment of Fry, L.J. in Nevill's case (ubi sup.), to which I shall have to refer hereafter. But, for my own part, I see no reason why these words should not bear their plain meaning, and be taken as including the owners of the ships insured in the club, who would naturally be the persons liable.

It is argued that inasmuch as these clauses fix the members with liability (as I think they do), they especially relieve the shipowners from liability. I do not think they do anything of the kind. It by no means follows that because the plaintiffs stipulate for and secure the responsibility of one class of persons (the members) therefore they release from liability the persons for whose sole benefit the association is giving its undertaking. The association has, in my opinion, a double remedy, one against the member whom they have permitted to enter a ship on the terms that he should be personally responsible for the contributions, and another against the shipowners on whose behalf and for whose benefit the insurance has been effected. It remains then to examine the rules annexed to the policy to see whether they make any difference. Rule 1 declares that "these rules are subject to the memorandum and articles of association" and rule 2 that "members shall mutually insure each other against risks." In the latter rule the word "members" must mean the persons who own the insured interest, for, as I have said before, no other persons can lawfully be insured in respect of it. Rules 7 to 10 inclusive deal with the subject of premiums. Rule 7 provides that ships shall be divided into classes according to their age and assessed upon their entered value at certain rates. Rule 8 provides that when ships are employed in southern trades, they shall have a return of 50 per cent. of the premium. Rule 9 is as follows: "The managers are hereby empowered to levy contributions of one-fourth part of the annual premium as above, which shall be paid in cash on the 1st April, July, Oct., and Jan. in each year, such premiums of insurance to form a fund for the payment of claims and expenses." Rule 10 provides that the "premiums on policies" shall be kept as a separate fund and in the event of the claims under the said policies exceeding such fund, an additional percentage shall be levied as per rule 7 in such manner and at such time as the committee may determine; in the event of the separate fund being more than sufficient to meet claims, the surplus is to be divided rateably among the members. These rules supply some of the deficiencies of the policy, for they settle what premiums are to be paid and when they are to be paid; but they are silent as to who is to pay; "ships" are to be assessed for premiums, and "ships" are to be entitled to the return of 50 per cent.

Does this silence indicate any intention that the persons for whose benefit and on whose behalf the insurances are effected shall not be liable? I think not. No doubt in practice the contributions or premiums are collected from "the members"—that is to say, from the persons who as agents enter the ships in the club—and they in turn get the money from their principals, but this practice does not affect the liability; that remains where by law it ought to be—namely, on the shipowner. There is, however, another rule which requires notice. It is rule 15, which provides, amongst other things, that "a member shall be uninsured in respect of any interest entered if he becomes bankrupt or insolvent unless before a claim accrues an approved undertaking registered by the managers has been given to pay all contributions due or to become due." It is said that this rule shows that the "member" is alone liable, and that no undertaking would be necessary if the owners were also liable. I do not, however, agree. As I have already said, the association has two remedies, one against the members, the other against the shipowner, and this rule is merely intended to provide a substitute for the member in the event of the latter being unable to pay; it does not in any way affect the shipowner's liability. Finally, it is to be observed that rule 17 in terms refers to the liability of the owner for premiums. It says, "in case of loss the owner shall be liable only for the amount of the twelve months' estimated annual premium on the policy under which the loss occurs." The owner here in my opinion means the shipowner, and the rule is intended to cut down, in the events mentioned, a recognised liability on him for the payment of the contributions or premiums.

The conclusion at which I arrive upon an examination of the documents, and apart from authority, is that the defendants are liable. I am told, however, that the question is covered by the judgments in Nevill's case (ubi sup.). In that case the action was brought (as here) to recover contributions from the shipowners—their agent, one Tully, who had entered the ship in the plaintiffs' club, having failed to pay; and it was held that, upon the true construction of the documents, consisting, as here, of the policy, the articles, and the rules, the plaintiffs had contracted with the defendants to look only to the agent. The articles and the rules in that case were practically identical with those which I have just been considering. But when the two policies are compared it will be seen that they differ materially. In Nevill's case (ubi sup.) the policy, instead of being in the ordinary Lloyd's form, was in a very special form, which began by reciting that Tully had become a member of the association and that, having entered the steamer for insurance he had become entitled to a policy; it then witnessed that, in consideration of the premises and of the observance by the said insured (that is, by Tully) of the rules, the association did agree with the said insured that the members of the association should, subject to a proviso hereinafter contained, be liable to make good all losses, &c. The proviso was to the effect that the policy was granted on the condition that the association should be liable only to the extent of so much of the goods as the said association might be able to recover from the members and their heirs, executors, and administrators liable for the same. That policy appears to me to be quite different in its meaning, as it certainly is in its wording, from the policy in the present case. In the policy before me the name of Grove only appears at the beginning in the way in which the name of any insurance broker would appear in an ordinary Lloyd's policy. Whereas in the policy in Nevill's case (ubi sup.) Tully is the person who is expressly named as the person who is to observe the rules, one of which requires the payment of the premiums. In a more recent case, Wyllie's case (ubi sup.), Bowen, L.J., examining the policy in Nevill's case (ubi sup.), says: "The policy treated Tully, the managing owner of the ship, as alone contracting with the association. It did not purport to be made on behalf of anyone else. The association had contracted themselves out of the power of saying that anyone but Tully was liable to them." The policy now before me does not treat Grove as alone contracting with the association; and it does purport to be made on behalf of others. In my opinion the judgments in Nevill's case proceeded on the special wording of the policy, and afford no authority for saying that the defendants in this case are not liable. There are two other authorities to be noticed, which, so far as they are applicable at all, go to support the plaintiffs' view. They are Leslie's case (ubi sup.) and Wyllie's case (ubi sup.) to which I have already referred. Both of them were actions to recover contributions from shipowners in cases where the agents who had entered the ships had made default in payment. The first of the two cases was tried by Mathew, J. at the Newcastle Assizes in 1887, and in his judgment will be found a short but very clear history of mutual insurance. He examines Nevill's case (ubi sup.), and points out that the shipowners were parties to the contract by which Tully bound himself to pay, and that they took the benefit of the contract upon the footing that they were not to be looked to, and that their agent was, for the payment of the premiums; and he recalls the fact that this course is in a manner followed at Lloyd's, because a Lloyd's policy always recites (contrary to the fact) the payment of the premium of the assured, and then by the practice the underwriters look to the broker exclusively for the payment of the same. The recital and the practice together have the effect of shifting the liability from the shipowner to the broker. But he points out that in the policy before him there is no recital of the payment of the premiums, so that there is no discharge of the liability of the shipowner, and no contract that he shall be free in consideration of someone else taking the responsibility. No doubt in Leslie's case (ubi sup.) the policy contained an express provision that the shipowners (they are called the assured) shall pay the contributions—a provision which, in the opinion of the learned judge, cleared away all question as to the shipowners' liability. He adds, however, that they are liable not merely on that ground, but also on the ground that they are the persons to whom the policy is issued and who are to have the benefit of it. In Wyllie's case (ubi sup.) there was also a special clause in the policy by which the assured were made liable for the contributions. It was attempted to be said in that case, as in Leslie's case (ubi sup.), that the word "assured" meant the entering member, and no one else; but the Court of Appeal held otherwise, and affirmed the judgment against the defendants. Neither of the cases is very much in point, because of the presence in the policies of the express clause fixing the "assured" with liability—a clause which is not in fact in the policy in the case before me. But, looking at all three cases—Nevill's case (ubi sup.), Leslie's case (ubi sup.), and Wyllie's case (ubi sup.)—I come to the conclusion that, in order to get rid of their primâ facie responsibility to pay the price of the benefit which they receive under their policy, the defendants must show that their contract relieves them in unmistakable terms from their responsibility. The documents forming the policy in this case when taken together do not, in my opinion, show anything of the kind. There must therefore be judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

Q.B. Div.]

MILLER v. BORNER AND Co.

[Q.B. Div.]

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, W. and W. Stocken.

Solicitors for the defendants, Spencer, Chapman, and Co., for Moy Evans, and Thomas, Swansea; Richard White, for Hartland, Isaac, and Watkins, and for H. Wilson Paton, Swansea.

Friday, Feb. 16, 1900.

(Before CHANNELL and BUCKNILL, JJ.)

MILLER v. BORNER AND Co. (a)

Charter-party—Construction of—Contract to load "a cargo, say about 2800 tons"—Obligation of charterer to load 3 per cent. more than 2800 tons.

By a charter-party made between shipowners and charterers, the charterers were to load "a cargo of ore, say about 2800 tons." The carrying capacity of the ship was 2880 tons, and the charterers actually loaded 2840 tons, or forty tons more than the stipulated quantity of 2800 tons:

Held, that the charterers were not bound to load 3 per cent. more than the 2800 tons provided the ship could carry so much, and that in loading 2840 tons they had performed their obligation under the charter-party to load "a cargo, say about 2800 tons."

Morris v. Levison (34 L. T. Rep. 576; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 171; 1 C. P. Div. 155) distinguished.

APPEAL from the Mayor's Court in an action tried before the Common Serjeant with a jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, Messrs. Miller and Richards, the owners of the steamship Marie, against the defendants, as charterers of the ship, to recover a sum alleged to be due for dead freight on 40 tons of cargo said to be short shipped.

By the contract of charter-party of the 20th Dec. 1898 made between the plaintiffs, the ship-owners, and the defendants, the charterers, it was provided that:

The ship . . . shall, after the delivery of her present cargo, proceed with all convenient speed in ballast to Elba, and there load in the customary manner as soon as and where ordered by the shipper or his agent . . . a cargo of ore, say about 2800 tons, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded shall forthwith proceed to Glasgow, and there deliver the same as customary . . . where and as directed by consignee.

Freight to be paid at and after the rate of eight shillings and sixpence per ton.

The defendants in point of fact loaded 2840 tons.

The jury found as a fact that the ship could hold 2880 tons, and that that was her carrying capacity. The plaintiffs said that the words of the charter-party being "a cargo, say about 2800 tons," the defendants were, under those words, bound to load 3 per cent. more than the 2800 tons, if that did not exceed the carrying capacity of the vessel, and as 3 per cent. on the 2800 tons would be 84 tons, the defendants would have been bound to load 2884 tons if the vessel could have carried that quantity, and that as the carrying capacity was 2880 tons, the defendants were bound to load 2880 tons.

The amount actually loaded was 2840 tons, and the plaintiffs brought the present action for the dead freight on the 40 tons alleged by them to be short loaded.

The judge at the trial held that the case came within Morris v. Levison (34 L. T. Rep. 576; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 171; 1 C. P. Div. 155), and that, on the authority of that case, the defendants were bound, in order to satisfy their contract to "load a cargo, say about 2800 tons," to load 3 per cent. in excess of the 2800 tons, provided the ship was capable of holding that amount; and as the ship was capable of holding 2880 tons, he gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the freight on forty tons short shipped.

The defendants appealed.

Laing, Q.C. and Balloch for the defendants.—The learned judge was wrong in law in entering judgment for the plaintiffs; and upon the facts judgment ought to have been entered for the defendants. The defendants loaded 2840 tons, that is, forty tons more than the 2800 tons stipulated for; but the learned judge thought that, on the authority of Morris v. Levison (34 L. T. Rep. 576; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 171; 1 C. P. Div. 155), the defendants, in order to fulfil their obligation under the charter-party, were bound to load 3 per cent. (that is, eighty-four tons) more than the 2800 tons, provided the ship could carry so much, and, as the ship could carry eighty tons more than the 2800 tons, he held that the defendants ought to have loaded that amount, which would be forty tons more than she actually carried. The judge was wrong in holding that Morris v. Levison (ubi sup.) applied. There the words of the charter-party were "to load a full and complete cargo of iron ore, not exceeding what she could reasonably stow, &c., say about 1100 tons." The cargo actually loaded was 1080 tons, and the ship could carry 1210 tons, and the court (Brett, Archibald, and Lindley, JJ.) held that the charterer was not bound to load the ship up to her actual capacity, but that 3 per cent. was a fair amount of excess over 1100 tons to allow in estimating what was a "full and complete cargo of about 1100 tons," and that consequently the cargo actually provided fell short of the charterer's obligation by fifty-three tons. There the contract was to load "a full and complete cargo"; whereas here the words are merely to load a "cargo," and the judgments in that case proceeded upon the meaning of the words "full and complete" cargo, which completely distinguishes that case from the present. The words in the present case were inserted to meet the decision in that case, and as the words here are to "load a cargo, say, about 2800 tons," the charterers' obligation is fulfilled if they load—as they have loaded—a cargo which comes within 3 per cent. more or less than the stipulated amount of 2800 tons. [BUCKNILL, J. referred to the case of Carnegie v. Conner (61 L. T. Rep. 691; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 447; 24 Q. B. Div. 45).]

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bateson for the plaintiffs.—The court must give effect to all the words of the charter-party, and according to the charter-party the charterers were to load "a cargo," and a cargo is what the ship can carry. There is no distinction between the words "cargo" and "full and complete cargo"; so that there is really no distinction between this case and the case of Morris v. Levison (ubi sup.), and the judge was right in so holding. Under the words "to load a cargo, say, about 2800 tons," it is not enough for the charterers to load "about 2800 tons." They must load a "cargo," and, according to Morris v. Levison (ubi sup.), they must load 3 per cent. more than the 2800 tons. [BUCKNILL, J.—Suppose that the ship could in fact carry 4000 tons, what would these words mean in that case?] According to Morris v. Levison (ubi sup.), the charterers would then have been bound to load 2884 tons, being 3 per cent. more than the 2800 tons. 2800 tons is merely put in as the limit, and therefore 3 per cent. more than that is the cargo.

Laing, Q.C. in reply.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. I think we can reduce the amount of the judgment by the amount of the dead freight, so that, on the whole, the case need not go down for a new trial, as to which I was for some time in doubt. The contract here was to ship "a cargo of ore, say about 2800 tons." The question of the meaning of the word "about," that is, as to how much margin is to be allowed on the one side or the other, would be a question for the jury. It was so dealt with by the court in Morris v. Levison (ubi sup.), because that case was reserved to them upon the terms that they might draw inferences of fact, and what Brett, J. there said was, that he had only the understanding of business people to guide him in such matters—namely, that 3 per cent. was treated as the margin in business matters, that is to say, that anything less than 3 per cent. one way or the other, could be treated as "about," but that more than 3 per cent. could not. That would ordinarily be for the jury, but nobody in this case desired that particular issue to be left to the jury. The real point here is, does the contract in this case differ from the contract in Morris v. Levison (ubi sup.). The decision in that case proceeded entirely on the fact that there the contract was to ship "a full and complete cargo," and that it was necessary in some way or another to give effect so far as possible to all the words of the contract, and to put a construction upon the subsequent words "of say about 1100 tons," that would, as far as possible, be consistent with the meaning put upon the words "full and complete cargo." The carrying capacity of the vessel in that case was larger than anything that could be considered to be about the quantity specified. The actual capacity of the ship was 1210 tons, and the question was about shipping "a full and complete cargo of iron ore, say about 1100 tons." The judgment of the Court proceeds entirely on the words "full and complete," and that was pointed out in the subsequent case of Carnegie v. Conner (ubi sup.), to which my brother Bucknill has referred, and in which he was counsel. That case of Carnegie v. Conner (ubi sup.), was the converse of the present case, but there it was pointed out that Morris v. Levison (ubi sup.) proceeded on the fact that you started with a contract to ship "a full and complete cargo." Here the words are "ship a cargo, say about 2800 tons," and what is a cargo for a particular ship would, I think, be a question of fact. A very small quantity of goods in comparison to the carrying capacity of the vessel would not be called a cargo. It must to some extent approach her carrying capacity before it could be called a cargo, and the question, therefore, what number of tons would make a cargo would be a question for the jury; but it must be a practical question before it is necessary to leave it to the jury. Here, if the quantity shipped, which was in fact 2840 tons, could be considered a cargo for this particular vessel, then undoubtedly it was a cargo of "about 2800 tons," and therefore the charterers had fulfilled their obligation by shipping 2840 tons. The only possible question, therefore, to be left to the jury was not whether that was a full and complete cargo, but whether it could be called a cargo for the particular vessel; and, having regard to the fact that it is admitted to be very nearly a full and complete cargo, I do not think there was any real question left to go to the jury whether it was not a cargo for a vessel of that kind. If there had been a very large deficiency between the amount shipped and the carrying capacity of the vessel, that would have raised the question whether what was shipped could be considered a cargo. Here I do not think there was any question that could be left to the jury on that point on which they could possibly find but in one way. I think, therefore, the proper thing to do is to reduce the judgment by the amount of the dead freight and let it stand as a judgment for 7l.

BUCKNILL, J.—I quite agree, and I have only a few words to add. I quite understand the importance of this point to those concerned in this matter and in this particular trade. In charter-parties we find very often the cargo treated in different ways. We find it described sometimes simply as "a cargo," sometimes as "a full and complete cargo"; and sometimes, as in Morris v. Levison (ubi sup.), as "a full and complete cargo, say about so many tons." Those are three ways of describing the cargo. In Morris v. Levison (ubi sup.) it was said that where it is described as "a full and complete cargo, say about so many tons," then there may be a question for the jury as to what "about" means. "About is 3 per cent.," said Lord Esher in that case. The words "a full and complete cargo" absolutely cannot raise a difficulty, because that is what the ship can carry; but "a cargo of about so many tons"—as in the present case—is a very clear description of what the parties intend shall be the contract. Here the contract is that there shall be a cargo of "about 2800 tons." Now, has the ship done that? In point of fact, she has done it. I think, therefore, as soon as it is found that the charterers had performed their part of the contract by putting that quantity on board there is nothing left for the jury to find, and no question for us to determine.

Q.B. Div.]

PARSONS v. NEW ZEALAND SHIPPING COMPANY LIMITED.

[Q.B. Div.]

Appeal allowed. Judgment for defendants. Leave to appeal refused.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Holman, Birdwood, and Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Ince, Colt, and Ince.

Feb. 19, 20, and 26, 1900.

(Before KENNEDY, J.)

PARSONS v. NEW ZEALAND SHIPPING COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

Bill of lading—Incorrect description of goods in—Short delivery—Right of shipowner signing bill of lading to show error in description of goods—Bills of Lading Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), s. 3.

Sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 does not make the bill of lading conclusive as to the statement of marks upon the goods shipped where those marks do not affect or denote substance, quality, or commercial value.

The plaintiff, who was the consignee of a quantity of lambs' carcasses from New Zealand and the holder of two bills of lading relating thereto, claimed for short delivery against the defendants, who, as agents of the shipowners, had signed the bills of lading, which described the goods as "marked and numbered as in the margin." In one bill of lading the marginal description was "Sun Brand, 488 X., 226 carcasses," and in the other "Sun Brand, 622 X., 608 carcasses."

On the ship's arrival in London some carcasses of each description were found to be wanting, but there were other carcasses on board which were marked "Sun Brand, 388 X." and "Sun Brand, 522 X." respectively, and which were not claimed by any other importer and were not included in any other bill of lading.

The defendants tendered to the plaintiff these carcasses as part of his consignment, but the plaintiff refused to accept them, and contended that the defendants, having signed the bills of lading, were prevented by sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 from proving an error in the marginal description as to the numerical marking, and that the bills of lading were conclusive evidence of the shipment of the quantities designated in the margins with the marginal markings "622" and "488." The commercial value of the meat would be unaffected whether it were marked "488" instead of "388," or "622" instead of "522."

Held, that the defendants were not prevented by sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 from showing that the carcasses tendered to the plaintiff were by the shipper's error incorrectly described in the margins of the bills of lading, and that they formed part of the plaintiff's consignment.

ACTION tried by Kennedy, J. in the Commercial Court.

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VOL. IX., N. S.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, as consignee in London of a quantity of lambs' carcasses shipped from New Zealand, against the defendants, who were the agents of the shipowners and who had signed the bills of lading, and it was brought in respect of an alleged short delivery of carcasses by the defendants.

The facts and the arguments are fully set out in the written judgment of the learned judge.

The plaintiff relied upon sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), which provides:

Every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other person signing the same, notwithstanding that such goods, or some part thereof, may not have been so shipped, unless such holder of the bill of lading shall have had actual notice at the time of receiving the same that the goods had not been in fact laden on board; provided that the master or other person so signing may exonerate himself in respect of such misrepresentation by showing that it was caused without any default on his part, and wholly by the fraud of the shipper, or of the holder, or some person under whom the holder claims.

Danckwerts, Q.C. and Loehnis for the plaintiff.

Carver, Q.C. and Leck for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 26.—KENNEDY, J. read the following judgment:—This is an action brought by the plaintiff, the consignee in London of a quantity of lambs' carcasses from Timaru, New Zealand, against the defendants, who were the agents in New Zealand for the owners of the steamship Fifeshire, in which the goods were carried, and who signed the bills of lading. The claim is for damages for short delivery of 154 carcasses. Each of the bills of lading, two in number, relating to the claim in this action describes the goods included in it as "marked and numbered as in the margin," the body of the bill of lading in the one case giving a total of 1166 carcasses, and the marginal description containing (inter alia) "Sun Brand, 488 X., 226 carcasses." The body of the bill of lading in the other case gives a total of 1076 carcasses, and the marginal description contains (inter alia) "Sun Brand, 622 X., 608 carcasses." On the ship's arrival in London fifty-three carcasses of the former description, so far as regards the figure 488, and 101 carcasses of the latter, so far as regards the figure 622, were found to be wanting. But there were on board twenty-one carcasses marked "Sun Brand, 388 X.," and 102 carcasses marked "Sun Brand, 522 X.," which were not required by any other importer, and to which no bills of lading, given in respect of the cargo laden on the Fifeshire, related, except, as the defendants contend, the two bills of lading already mentioned of which the plaintiff was the holder. If these carcasses were treated as carcasses included in these two bills of lading, although incorrectly described in the marginal description, as being marked "488" instead of "388" in the one case, and "622" instead of "522" in the other, there was still a deficiency in the number ready for delivery of thirty-one carcasses. The plaintiff in this action claims damages for the non-delivery of 154 carcasses. The defendants admit the claim in regard to the deficiency of thirty-one carcasses, and in respect of that they paid into court, after service of the writ of summons, a sum of 29*l.*, which exceeds the net invoice cost at the rate of 3*s.* 8*d.* per stone of 8*lb.* By the terms of the bill of lading the shipowner's liability in case of loss, or detention, or injury to goods for which they may be responsible is to be calculated on, and in no case to exceed, the net invoice cost. I hold that the defendants are entitled to the benefit of this clause, and therefore in regard to the plaintiff's claim as regards thirty-one carcasses, the plaintiff's claim is satisfied by the payment into court. In regard to the larger subject of the claim—123 carcasses—the main issue is this. The defendants say: "The twenty-one 'Sun Brand, 388 X.,' and the 102 'Sun Brand, 522 X.,' really formed part of the plaintiff's consignment, and were erroneously described in the margins of the two bills of lading, in the one as '488' instead of '388,' and in the other as '622' instead of '522.' We carried these carcasses as part of the goods included in the two bills of lading; we tendered the plaintiff these as part of his consignment; we therefore performed our contract, and his refusal to accept them as part of his goods was unjustifiable." The plaintiff, on the other hand, does not admit the fact that these carcasses did form part of his consignment in the sense of being shipped, and intended to be included in the totals set forth in the bills of lading; and further he says, as a matter of law, that the defendants, having by their manager, W. Bennett, signed the bills of lading, are concluded by sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111) and cannot be allowed to prove an error in the marginal statement of the bills of lading as to the numerical marking of 123 of the carcasses (twenty-one in the one case and 102 in the other). He contends that these bills of lading, so signed, are not only conclusive evidence against the defendants of the total number of carcasses therein respectively stated to be shipped and of the carcasses being of the quality "Sun Brand, X.," and of the grade of weight designated in the margin in the case of one bill of lading by the final letter "8" and in the other by the final letter "2," but also conclusive evidence of the shipment of quantities designated in the margins of these bills of lading with the marginal markings "622" and "488."

Upon the evidence and statements before me, I find the facts, so far as they appear to me to be material, to be these: The Sun Brand is a registered brand of the shippers, the Christchurch Meat Company Limited, under whose form of bill of lading, signed by the defendants' manager, the meat in question was shipped. That brand and the "X." denote quality; of the three-figure numbering, whether 488, 388, 622, or 522, the final figure is important because it denotes what may be called the classification of weight as—e.g., 35-40*lb.*, or as the case may be. The duplicature of this figure, 88, 22, and so on is a peculiarity of these shippers to indicate both that the meat comes from their factories, as the killing and freezing places appear to be called, and that the meat is their own property, and has not been frozen and shipped by them as agents for other persons. The first figure, as the 6 in 622, or the 4 in 488, simply records the date of killing and freezing, and so for the purposes of his own accounts it has its use or importance for the shipper, just as the duplication of the 2 or the 8 has; but neither the first figure nor the duplication of the following figure has, as I understand the evidence, any distinctive value as regards the market for the meat. In other words, and to sum up, given the "Sun Brand" and "X." and the first figure, the meat is as a commercial article absolutely unaffected in character or value whether it is marked "522" or "622," "488" or "388." Secondly, I find as a fact that in practice, and according to the course of business in shipment, the only tally at Timaru made on behalf of the ship is a tally of the number of carcasses. The work proceeds rapidly day and night, and no attempt is made to check the shipper's marks or numbers upon the individual carcasses. The carcasses are brought in insulated vans from the freezing store, some distance away, to the mole or breakwater where the ship lies, and thence are shot at once down a shoot through the ship's side into the refrigerating chamber of the ship. Thirdly, I find as a fact in regard to the carriage and discharge that there were no other shipments on board the Pifeshire of "Sun Brand, X." with duplicated 2 or duplicated 8 under any bills of lading other than those of which Parsons became the holder; nor were there any claims by any other consignees for the twenty-one "388" or the 102 "522," which the defendants sought to deliver to the plaintiff as part of his consignment. So far as I can discover in the documents, though I do not, on my note, find any oral statement in evidence to that effect, no "Sun Brand" at all were shipped under any bills of lading except to the plaintiff. In the result I have come to the conclusion upon the question of fact that the defendants have discharged the burden of proof which undoubtedly lay upon them, and that the true inference from the evidence is that the twenty-one "Sun Brand, 388 X.," and the 102 "Sun Brand, 522 X.," which the defendants asked the plaintiff to take as part of his consignment, did respectively form part of the quantities set forth in the two bills of lading, and were by the shipper's error incorrectly included in the respective marginal specifications under "488" and "622."

Upon the point of law I have come to the conclusion that the defendants are not prevented by sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 from showing and relying upon these facts in order to establish that twenty-one fewer carcasses "Sun Brand, 488 X." and 102 fewer carcasses "Sun Brand, 622 X." were shipped than are stated in the margins of the bills of lading, and that these were shipped as part of the total quantities stated in these bills of lading respectively, twenty-one "Sun Brand, 388 X." and 102 "Sun Brand, 522 X." I so hold upon the ground that in my view the section referred to does not operate to make the bill of lading conclusive as to the statement of marks upon the goods shipped where those marks do not affect or denote substance, quality, or commercial value. To interpret this statutory enactment, as Mr. Danckwerts for the plaintiff has invited me to interpret it, so as to prevent the party sued as the party responsible for carriage of goods under a bill of lading and I will assume signing the bill of lading, from showing not that he has carried fewer goods than the bill of lading specifies, or goods different in substance or quality or value

Q.B. Div.]

THE CATHAY.

[ADM.]

from those which are specified in the bill of lading, but that the bill of lading has been incorrectly filled up in regard to the statement of the mark put upon parcels of goods by the shipper for the purposes of identification or record, would be, as it appears to me, to strain the meaning of the section. It was not unfairly urged, I think, by Mr. Carver, for the defendants, that if the statute operates in such a case as this the shipper who signed a bill of lading would be conclusively bound by a clerical error in description of an immaterial mark in a bill of lading. No authority, as it appears to me, has been cited which really supports such an interpretation as that for which the plaintiff contends. Bradley v. Dunipace (5 L. T. Rep. 356; 31 L. J. 210, Ex.; 32 L. J. 22, Ex.) is, I think, distinguishable. The weight there, as the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber delivered by Wightman, J. points out, was of some importance in the contract. The plaintiff's counsel suggested in this case an importance of the mark in regard to insurance; but it appears to me that a difficulty in matters outside the contract of the shipment of the nature and value of the goods themselves is not a matter which ought to affect the question of the applicability of the statute to such a case as the present. Taking this view of the case, it is unnecessary for me to consider the three other points which Mr. Carver also relied on. First, that the defendants, on the face of the bills of lading, signed as agents only for the shipowners—as, in fact, they were—and therefore could not be successfully sued; secondly, that in regard to the Bills of Lading Act 1855, s. 3, by the operation of the clause of these bills of lading, “the ship will not be responsible for correct delivery unless each package is distinctly, correctly, and permanently marked by the merchant before shipment with a mark or number and address,” the effect of that section, if otherwise such as the plaintiff contended for, would be destroyed (see Jessel v. Bath, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 267); and, thirdly, that, as the value and nature of the carcasses offered to the plaintiff by the defendants were the same as those of such carcasses as should have been delivered to him under the marks stated in the bills of lading, the plaintiff, as he was tendered an equivalent, could claim no damages. I will only say, so far as regards the last point, that it seems to me now, as I said during the argument, untenable. A carrier who fails to deliver cannot avoid the consignee's claim for damages by offering something which is not the thing to which the consignee is entitled, because it would be equivalent in value. The first point is not, I think, open to the defendants, because they have accepted in this action the position of the shipowners as carriers of the goods. There is more, I think, to be said for the second point, but I prefer to rest my judgment upon the ground which I have stated.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Charles Butcher.

Solicitors for the defendants, W. A. Crump and Son.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY
DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Tuesday, Oct. 31, 1899.

(Before BARNES, J. and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE CATHAY. (a)

Collision—Fog—Duty to keep course and speed—Whistle—Regulations for preventing collisions at sea, arts. 16 and 21.

The steamship C., while proceeding at the rate of about three knots an hour in a thick fog, heard the whistle of another steamship about four points on the port bow. The C. kept her course and speed, and the whistle of the other vessel was heard to be apparently broadening. Shortly afterwards the other steamship was seen close to and bearing five or six points on the port bow of the C. The engines of the C. were then at once stopped and reversed, but a collision occurred.

Held, that the C. was in part to blame for the collision for having failed, in accordance with art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, when the whistle of the other steamship was first heard, to stop her engines and afterwards to navigate with caution until all danger of collision was over, and was not justified in continuing her speed under art. 21. Although art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea directing a ship to keep her course and speed is a general rule, it is qualified by art. 16, and hence, where two steamships in a fog are crossing, each ought to stop her engines if she hears the whistle of the other forward of her beam.

THIS action arose out of a collision which occurred at about 8 a.m. on the 4th Sept. 1899 off Cape St. Vincent between the plaintiffs' steamship Clan Macgregor and the defendants' steamship Cathay. Both vessels were found to blame, but the navigation of the Cathay is alone dealt with in this report.

The following was the defendants' case as alleged in the 2nd and 3rd paragraphs of the defence:

Paragraph 2. About 7.30 a.m. on the 4th Sept. 1899 the Cathay . . . was in the neighbourhood of Cape St. Vincent, in the course of a voyage from Antwerp to Vladivostock . . . There was a thick fog with no wind, and the Cathay, with her engines working dead slow, was making barely three knots an hour through the water on a S. seven degrees E. (true) course. Her steam whistle was being regularly sounded for fog, in accordance with the regulations, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her.

Paragraph 3. In these circumstances the whistle of a steamship, which afterwards proved to be the Clan Macgregor, was heard at a great distance and bearing about four points on the port bow. The whistle of the Cathay continued to be sounded, in accordance with the regulations, and the whistle of the Clan Macgregor was heard several times at a great distance on about the same bearing and then was heard to draw broader and broader on the port side of the Cathay. The Clan Macgregor was apparently going clear, but she suddenly came into view at a distance of about 200ft. and bearing five-six points on the port bow. The engines of the Cathay were at once reversed full-speed astern, and her whistle was sounded three short blasts, but the Clan Macgregor, which was proceeding at considerable speed, came on

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C. and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE JOHN HOLLOWAY.

[ADM.]

under a starboard helm and with her starboard side struck the stern of the Cathay and then, crossing her bows, disappeared in the fog.

The defendants gave evidence in support of the above allegations.

Scrutton (with him Lawson Walton, Q.C.), for the plaintiffs, contended that the Cathay must be held to blame for noncompliance with art. 16 of the Rules and Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, in failing to stop on hearing the first whistle.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (with him Aspinall, Q.C. and Stokes), for the defendants, argued that the Cathay was a crossing steamship on the starboard bow of another steamship, and was bound under art. 21 to keep her course and speed; and further, that the position of the other steamship was ascertained, and that there was therefore no duty upon the Cathay to stop her engines, and then to navigate with care and caution under art. 16.

Arts. 16 and 21 of the Rules and Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea are as follows:

Art. 16. Every vessel shall, in a fog, mist, or falling snow, or heavy rain storms, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions.

A steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog signal of a vessel, the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.

Art. 21. Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way the other shall keep her course and speed.

NOTE.—When, in consequence of thick weather or other causes, such vessel finds herself so close that collision cannot be avoided by the action of the giving way vessel alone, she shall also take such action as will best aid to avert collision (see arts. 27 and 29).

BARNES, J. (after dealing with the case of the Clan Macgregor, which vessel he found partly to blame, continued:—) Then turning to the other side of the case, the short story of it is, as told by the captain, that having set his ship on this course of S. seven degrees E. true, he heard the plaintiffs' whistle faintly but distinctly nearly four points on the port side, afar off, and sounded his in reply, and continued to whistle after that time; and he says he heard her whistle blown until the collision. In the beginning he says the whistle kept on the same bearing for some minutes—about ten minutes—and that after that it began to broaden on his port side and broadened more and more. When the whistle began to broaden he thought the vessel would go clear under his stern, and he says he heard it so broaden for nearly twenty minutes, and the last time he heard the whistle from the Clan Macgregor it was nearly abeam. When he saw her she was nearly two points before his beam, and, he told me, about half a ship's length off. It is quite clear to my mind that he misjudged the sound of the whistle entirely, because it is obvious that on the courses which the vessels were making the whistle could not broaden in the way he said it did, and the most probable thing, it seems to me, is that the whistle remained on the same bearing all the way through. In that state of things it is suggested that the master of the Cathay was right in keeping his course and speed up to the time when he saw the vessel and reversed for her. I cannot accept that view of the case at all. As I have already said it seems to me that although art. 21 is a general rule, it is qualified by art. 16 in cases where the latter article applies; and this is one of those cases, because this vessel undoubtedly heard, forward of her beam, the fog signal of the Clan Macgregor. It is said by Mr. Walton that those on board the Cathay could and did ascertain the position of the whistle which was heard. I do not agree with that contention, nor do the Elder Brethren. It is clear that the captain did not, and could not, properly ascertain the position of the vessel, and was not in the least justified in assuming she would pass under his stern. To my mind, on hearing that vessel he should have stopped his engines and navigated with caution until the danger was over. If he had done so there would have been no collision. No doubt her speed was kept up until the last moment, and then she crashed into the Clan Macgregor and sank her. I think it would be extremely dangerous to hold that in a dense fog when vessels can be seen only at a very short distance, the vessel, which from an ultimate knowledge of the respective courses, is shown to be the one which in clear weather should keep her course and speed is to be held to be justified in keeping her course and speed when there is such a fog that the vessels cannot see each other at all, and cannot be certain of each other's position. I hold, without any doubt, that a ship in the position of the Cathay ought to have stopped her engines and taken off her speed in order to comply properly with art. 16. Both vessels must, therefore, be held to blame for this collision.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Hollams, Sons Coward, and Hawksley.

Solicitors for the defendants, Stokes and Stokes.

Wednesday, Dec. 6, 1899.

(Before BUCKNILL, J. assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE JOHN HOLLOWAY. (a)

Collision—River Thames—Crossing ship—Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, arts. 48, 53.

A steamship which is turning in the river Thames, on that side of mid-channel on which she is being navigated, having no way upon her and with her anchor down and holding, is not a steamship crossing, within the meaning of art. 48 of the Thames Rules, from one side of the river towards the other, although at some time during the process of turning some portion of her hull may be to the north of mid-channel.

The River Derwent (64 L. T. Rep. 509; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 37) distinguished.

THIS action arose out of a collision which occurred in the river Thames on the 23rd June 1899 between the plaintiffs' steamship Dalmatia and the barge Hambro', which was in tow of the defendants' tug John Holloway.

The plaintiff's case was that the Dalmatia, a steamship of 1268 tons net register, was, in the course of a voyage to London, in the river Thames off the entrance to the Surrey Commercial Dock.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE JOHN HOLLOWAY.

[ADM.]

The weather was clear, and the tide was about an hour and a half before high water, running about one and a half knots an hour.

The Dalmatia was swinging round with a view to entering the dock, having a tug on her starboard bow. Her starboard anchor was down and holding, and her engines were stopped. She had come up on the south side and was swung nearly athwart the river with her head to the northward. A good look out was being kept on board of her, and her whistle had been blown four short blasts to intimate that she was turning round.

In these circumstances those on board of her particularly noticed the tug John Holloway, which had previously been seen at a considerable distance coming up the river towing four barges, of which the Hambro' was the first barge in the starboard rank. The John Holloway was two or three ships' lengths off on the starboard quarter of the Dalmatia. The John Holloway came on at considerable speed, and herself passed just clear of the Dalmatia, but the Hambro' with her starboard side struck her rudder and propeller, doing the damage proceeded from.

The defendants' case was that the tug John Holloway, with three loaded barges and one light barge in tow, was proceeding up the Lower Pool of the river Thames. The barge Hambro' was in the first rank on the starboard side. The weather was fine and clear, and the tide third quarter flood of the force of about two and a half knots an hour. The John Holloway was heading straight up the reach making about three knots over the ground, and a good look out was being kept on board of her. In these circumstances the Dalmatia, which had overtaken and passed the John Holloway, suddenly sounded four blasts and commenced to round in the river when some distance above the John Holloway. The helm of the latter was starboarded to pass to the southward of the roads, and was shortly afterwards ported to clear craft at the tier, and she then, with her tows, headed straight up the river to pass between the stern of the Dalmatia and a vessel at anchor. When, however, close to the steamer, and in a position to pass with her tows all clear, that vessel suddenly came astern with her engines, and, though hailed to go ahead, she struck the barge Hambro' with her rudder upon the starboard side forward of midships, causing the damage for which the defendants counter-claimed.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs with (inter alia) failing to keep out of the way of the John Holloway and her tows.

By the Rules and Regulations for the Navigation of the River Thames 1898 :

Art. 48. Steam vessels and steam launches crossing from one side of the river towards the other side shall keep out of the way of vessels navigating up and down the river.

Art. 53. Where by the above bye-laws one of two vessels is to keep out of the way the other shall keep her course and speed.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Dr. Stubbs for the plaintiffs.

Laing, Q.C. and Batten for the defendants.

The following case was cited :

The River Derwent, 64 L. T. Rep. 509 ; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 37.

BUCKNILL, J.—This case raises a point which has not been raised exactly before. The point is whether a vessel turning in the Thames on the same side on which she is being navigated, so far as that is possible having regard to her length, is a ship crossing from one side of the river towards the other, within the meaning of art. 48 of the Thames Rules. That rule and art. 53 must be read together. [His Lordship read the two articles.] The evidence has been very conflicting. The story told by the witnesses for the plaintiffs is that the Dalmatia had been navigating up the Thames on the south side of the river, and when a little below the entrance to the Surrey Commercial Dock her helm was put to port in order to turn her round and take her into the Surrey Commercial Dock on the south side of the river. That when she had answered about ten points under the port helm, which means that she would then be about two points more than right athwart the river, she was dead in the water, her anchor having been let go, partly to check her way on account of a barge which was at anchor close ahead of her, and partly perhaps to help her to swing. That the anchor, as I find was the fact, had hold of the ground, and was not what is called dredging. When in this position, and with, as is said by the plaintiffs' witnesses, a water space between the stern of the Dalmatia and the Russian barque astern of her, too narrow for the defendants' tug and her tow to pass through, the tug is said to have attempted the impossible, and to have caused this collision between the barge Hambro' and the rudder of the Dalmatia. The case set up by the defendants is, stated shortly : that the Dalmatia, having blown a four-blast signal, had got about athwart the river, and that just as the tug and her tow were passing between her stern and the Russian barque the Dalmatia came astern and so caused the collision, there being plenty of room for the tug and tow to pass safely if the Dalmatia had not come astern. It is admitted that nothing was done by the Dalmatia to keep out of the way of the tug and tow, but the charge made against the tug is that she might have avoided the collision by reasonable care and caution ; but it is not proved to my satisfaction that any steps could have been taken on board the tug except easing her way, and so allowing the Dalmatia to swing more up and down, and thus increasing the waterway between herself and the Russian barque. On the question of fact whether the Dalmatia did move astern at the critical and dangerous time, I am satisfied, after hearing the witnesses on both sides, that she did not, and I find as a fact that she was making no movement through the water at the time of the collision, but that her stern was swinging slowly round, so that, had not the collision happened when it did, she would have safely turned round head on tide, when her anchor would have been lifted, and she would have proceeded into dock.

On the question whether the Dalmatia was a crossing vessel or not within the meaning of the 48th bye-law, the case of The River Derwent (ubi sup.) was cited by counsel for plaintiffs and defendants alike. The facts of that case are not the same as those in this. The Allendale was in the act of crossing the Thames from the south to the north side in order to moor on the north side, and whilst she was still performing that manœuvre the collision happened, and she was held to be a crossing ship. The Lord Chancellor points out in his judgment, " that it was undoubtedly a fact that the Allendale did cross from one side of the river to the other." He also said that when a vessel has left the south shore and is going toward the north shore she is in the act of crossing. In this case the Dalmatia did not leave the south side of the river although by reason of her great length, when she was athwart, some part of the hull was on the north side of mid-stream. She never crossed the river in fact, and it was never intended that she should do so. The manœuvre was simply the manœuvre of turning round in the river on the south side of mid-channel so far as possible. It is true that she was not proceeding up the river, nor down it, but that she was being turned round in it, and this affords the only difficulty that I feel on the construction of this by-law. The question is, whether it applies to all such steam vessels as are not proceeding up and down river, but are either crossing from one side to the other, or are turning round as this vessel was. If such a construction is to be given to it, it applies to the smallest as well as to the largest vessels. I cannot construe the rule to mean more than it seems to me to state, and I think I should be doing so if I held that it applies to every vessel which is being turned round in the river, although I do not say that a vessel so turning might not at some time in the process of turning be crossing towards the other side. It would depend upon the facts of each case, but, in my opinion, it would be very hard upon steamships if such vessels when athwart the tide, in the act of turning round for the purpose of getting into dock, were held in all cases when in such positions to be bound to keep out of the way of vessels navigating up and down the river. Such vessels, in obeying the rule, would necessarily have sometimes to place themselves in positions of extreme difficulty and danger. On the facts of the case I find that the Dalmatia was not in motion through the water, but was slowly swinging to her anchor in the act of turning round, and was not a vessel crossing the river within the meaning of the rule. [His Lordship then dealt with the other points of the case, and concluded by finding the John Holloway alone to blame].

ADM.]

THE PHILADELPHIAN.

[ADM.]

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Stokes and Stokes.

Solicitors for the defendants, W. Hurd and Sons.

Dec. 15, 16, and 18, 1899.

(Before BUCKNILL, J. and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE PHILADELPHIAN. (a)

Collision—"Vessel of 150ft. or upwards in length"—Anchor light—Meaning of "in the forward part of the vessel"—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, art. 11.

A vessel 313ft. in length which carries her forward anchor light in the fore-rigging 60ft. or 70ft. abaft her stem is not carrying that light "in the forward part of the vessel," and is therefore not complying with art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897.

THIS action arose out of a collision between the plaintiffs' steamship Ella Sayer and the defendants' steamship Philadelphian which occurred in the St. Lawrence river on the 10th Aug. 1899.

The collision occurred about 11 p.m. The Ella Sayer was at anchor heading up stream. The Philadelphian was proceeding down the river from above the Ella Sayer. The defendants charged the plaintiffs with failing to carry and exhibit the anchor lights prescribed by art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea or with carrying and exhibiting the forward anchor light in a position not authorised by the Regulations. The learned judge found as a fact that the forward light of the Ella Sayer was being carried on the forward shroud of the starboard fore-rigging at a distance of 60ft. or 70ft. abaft the stem, and that that light as well as the after anchor light were burning brightly. By art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897:

A vessel under 150ft. in length, when at anchor, shall carry forward where it can best be seen, but at a height not exceeding 20ft. above the hull, a white light in a lantern so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light visible all round the horizon at a distance of at least one mile.

A vessel 150ft. or upwards in length, when at anchor, shall carry in the forward part of the vessel, at a height of not less than 20ft. and not exceeding 40ft. above the hull, one such light, and at or near the stern of the vessel, and at such a height that it shall not be less than 15ft. lower than the forward light, another such light.

Laing, Q.C., Miller, and Roche, for the plaintiffs, argued that the forward light of the Ella Sayer was being carried in the forward part of the vessel, and referred to art. 2 of the Regulations.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Glyn, for the defendants, contra, cited

The Gannet, P. (1899) 230.

The case was heard on the 15th and 16th Dec. when judgment was reserved.

Dec. 18.—BUCKNILL, J. delivered judgment, when, after stating the facts and holding the Philadelphian to blame on various grounds, he proceeded as follows:—The Ella Sayer is not to blame unless there has been a breach by her of art. 11. Now, as I have said, the forward light was in the starboard fore-rigging, abaft the stem, and the after light was on the flagstaff. Now, what is art. 11? [His Lordship read the article.] So that the Legislature has decided that a vessel under a certain length need carry only one light, but that a vessel of 150ft. or upwards shall carry two lights. The forward light is to be "in the forward part of the vessel." What does that mean? It may mean one of three things. It may mean a light fixed forward of the middle length of the ship, because directly you get forward of the middle length of the ship you are in the forward part of the vessel. It may mean that you are to put it as far forward as possible—right forward, though the article does not say that; or it may mean that it may be put in any spot between just forward of mid-length and the stem. I think, speaking on advice as to what may be reasonably called the forward part of the ship, that it may be put on one of the forward stays. If it is hung at the proper height on the forestay it would necessarily be something abaft the stem. It might be put on the foretopmast stay, one end of which is attached to the jibboom, and the other

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

ADM.]

THE RODNEY.

[ADM.]

end to the foretopmast. But it must be abaft the stem. Now, in a case in the Court of Appeal, the case of The R. L. Alston (reported only in the Shipping Gazette), I came across a passage which appeared to give considerable light here. The language of the Master of the Rolls was to the effect that where you find a rule or an article which is capable of two constructions, as I find this art. 11 is, you ought to put upon the language that which you believe in the particular case is the reasonable construction. It is quite clear this article is capable of more than one construction. "In the forward part" may mean two or three different places, and I have to construe it in this case, and, if it is necessary, to decide the point. I hold, then, that to put a light in a vessel 313ft. in length 60ft. or 70ft. abaft the stem is not to place it "in the forward part of the vessel," and, if it was important in this case, I should find that it was not in compliance with the article. The object of the rule probably was that, when you get a vessel exceeding 150ft. in length at anchor, those navigating the river should have good information as to her length; that when she was swinging in the river the vessels approaching her from astern or ahead should have an opportunity of knowing the length of the ship. How could that be given if the forward light were 60ft. or 70ft. from the stem? But whilst I am putting this construction upon the rule in this particular case, it will not affect the judgment of the court with regard to the responsibility of the Ella Sayer, because, although I find that the light was not placed in accordance with art. 11, I find also that that could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision. I say that for the reason that the defendants' witnesses never saw the light at all. They swear that there was no light, and therefore they never saw it at all; and, as it is not suggested that the light was hung unskilfully or improperly in the shrouds, it was therefore throwing an unbroken light all round the horizon, and it is clear to my mind that such breach of the article could not possibly have contributed to the collision. In this case, therefore, my judgment is that the Philadelphian is alone to blame. I may add that those who sit by my side have suggested to me that it is a very puzzling rule for seamen to understand, and that the language—and I agree with them—is so ambiguous and so misleading to any ordinary person that, I think, speaking for myself, it might very properly be changed; for how is a master to know where to put a light if he is told to put it in the forward part of the ship?

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche.

Solicitors for the defendants, T. Cooper and Co., agents for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

Tuesday, Feb. 6, 1900.

(Before the PRESIDENT and BARNES, J.)

THE RODNEY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COUNTY COURT OF NORTHUMBERLAND, HOLDEN AT NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

Carriage of goods—Bill of lading—Exemption of shipowner from liability—Fault or error in the navigation or management of the ship—"Management"—Act of Congress, 13th Feb. 1893 (the Harter Act).

Goods were shipped under a bill of lading, which by incorporating the Harter Act exempted the shipowner from liability for "damage or loss resulting from fault or errors in navigation, or in the management of the ship" Owing to one of the crew negligently making a hole in a drainage pipe leading from the forecandle through the No. 1 hold to the bilge, in order to clear the forecandle of water which had been taken on board during heavy weather, and with which the forecandle was flooded, water found its way to the cargo in the No. 1 hold, whereby that cargo was damaged. Held (reversing the decision of the County Court judge) that the act which caused the damage was done in the management of the ship, and that therefore the shipowner was exempt from liability.

The Glenochil (73 L. T. Rep. 416; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 218; (1896) P. 10) followed.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the County Court judge at Newcastle, given on the 12th Dec. 1899.

The action turned upon the construction of a bill of lading, in which was incorporated the Act of Congress of the United States of America, 1893, commonly known as the Harter Act.

The circumstances under which the question arose were as follows: The plaintiffs, the American Export Coal Company, were the owners of the steamship Rodney. The defendant Thomas Richardson, a corn and flour factor, of Newcastle, shipped on board the Rodney, in good order and condition, under bills of lading dated the 14th and 17th Jan. 1899, certain quantities of wheat and maize. The Rodney was then at Baltimore.

On the 17th Jan. the Rodney left Baltimore for Newcastle, where she arrived on the 10th Feb. During her voyage she experienced very heavy weather, and her decks were frequently flooded. Upon arrival at Newcastle certain damage was found to have been sustained by the defendant's cargo, partly by water having found its way into the holds and partly from other causes. The defendant paid the plaintiffs the freight due for the carriage of the wheat and maize, less a sum of 40l. 18s. 9d., to recover which the plaintiffs brought this action.

Four heads of damage were in fact alleged, but this report deals with the damage by wetting to the cargo in No. 1 hold. The other matters did not give rise to any point of interest.

The following facts were established in evidence. The Rodney was a well decked ship, with the entrance to the forecandle flush with the main deck. The vessel was fitted with a 2in. lead pipe leading from the forecandle through the No. 1 hold, to carry the drainage from the fore-

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q. C., and SUTTON TIMMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE RODNEY.

[ADM.]

castle into the bilge. A syphon trap was placed immediately under the sink of the 2in. pipe, and the sink itself, in order to prevent solid matter getting into the pipe, was protected by a grating. During the voyage this pipe became choked, with the result that the water with which the fore-castle was flooded during the bad weather could not get away, and the boatswain therefore in order to free the fore-castle of water endeavoured to clear the pipe with a poker and hammer. While attempting to effect this purpose the boatswain drove a hole through the syphon trap, thus allowing the water from the fore-castle to run down into the No. 1 hold, and it was in this manner that the cargo in hold No. 1 got damaged. The amount claimed in this respect was 18l. 2s. 1d.

The material paragraph of the bills of lading under which the cargo was shipped was as follows:

Not accountable for the unseaworthiness of the vessel at the commencement of the voyage (provided all reasonable means have been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness). It is also mutually agreed that this shipment is subject to all the terms and provisions of and all the exemptions from liability contained in the Act of Congress of the United States approved on the 13th day of February 1893 relating to navigation.

By sect. 3 of the aforesaid Act of Congress (the Harter Act):

If the owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property to or from any port in the United States of America shall exercise due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, neither the vessel, her owner or owners, agent or charterers, shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of the said vessel.

The County Court judge gave judgment for the defendants on their counter-claim, holding that the act of the boatswain which caused the damage was not an act done in the "management" of the vessel.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Kiiburn for the appellants.—The County Court judge was wrong. The act of the boatswain was an act done in the management of the vessel. The Glenochil (ubi sup.) decides the question in favour of the appellants. It was there held that "management" is a wider term than "navigation," and covers any act which is necessarily done in the handling of a ship, though in the particular case the handling is not properly done. He also referred to

The Ferro, 68 L. T. Rep. 418; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 308; (1893) P. 38;

Dobell v. Steamship Rossmore Company, 73 L. T. Rep. 74; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 33; (1895) 2 Q. B. 408;

Carmichael v. Liverpool Sailing Ship, &c., Association, 56 L. T. Rep. 83; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 184; 12 Q. B. Div. 242;

Good v. London Mutual Association, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 563

The Sylvia, 16th Feb. Reporter, 230.

[He was stopped by the Court.]

Scrutton for the respondents.—The County Court judge was right. The word management is capable of more than one meaning, and when stipulations of this kind in a bill of lading are vague or ambiguous, the rule is to construe them against the shipowner as being the party to put them forward:

Norman v. Binnington, 63 L. T. Rep. 108; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 528; 25 Q. B. Div. 475.

Here the conduct of the boatswain had nothing to do with the management of the ship as a ship. He was merely doing something to a part of the ship with an appliance belonging to the ship.

The PRESIDENT.—I think that this case is covered by the decision in the case of The Glenochil (ubi sup.). It goes a little way beyond that case, but the principles there laid down appear to me to apply. It goes a little beyond because undoubtedly in The Glenochil the act done was one which it was necessary to do for the direct purpose of the management of the ship. In that case the act consisted in water being run into the ballast tank for the purpose of stiffening the ship, and in so doing the engineer let water into the cargo. That was, as we thought in The Glenochil, an act which was part, at any rate, of the management of the ship. This case is a little different, but, to my mind, a very little. The vessel in this case experienced bad weather and the fore-castle got flooded, and thereupon the boatswain, in order to clear the fore-castle of water—principally no doubt because it formed his own quarters—proceeded to endeavour, as he thought, to clear a pipe, which if it had been clear would have carried off the water. But he did this negligently, for he made a hole in the pipe instead of clearing it of any obstacle. Was that an act done in the management of the ship? I think it was. The object was to clear the fore-castle of water; that is to say, to render the fore-castle habitable for the crew, in order to render the ship proper for the purpose for which it was designed. It appears to me to fall within the view taken in the case of The Glenochil. To put the matter in a very small compass, I think the court below has somewhat unduly limited the meaning of the word "management." The learned judge says: "The cases, I think, show that the words must be confined to the performance (though improper) or non-performance of such acts as are done or ought to be done for the safety of the vessel and for her maintenance in a seaworthy condition." I think that is too narrow a view. The acts need not be done merely for the safety of the vessel, nor for her maintenance in a seaworthy condition. If the meaning of the word be extended, as I think it should, to keeping the vessel in her proper condition, the act in this case, to my mind, falls within the definition, and the principle of The Glenochil covers this case.

BARNES, J.—I have practically nothing to add to what the President has said. It seems to me that the court below has unnecessarily confined the meaning of "management of the ship" in the way the president has pointed out. Practically there is very little difference, if any, between the case of The Glenochil and this case, except that in the case of The Glenochil there are to be found some expressions referring to the act as being done for the safety of the ship. Those expressions were not intended to limit the meaning of the words "management of the ship." It seems to me that they extend to the proper handling of the ship as affecting the safety of the cargo, and I agree with the president that the appeal should be allowed.

H. OF L.] OWNERS OF THE MEDIANA v. OWNERS OF THE COMET; THE MEDIANA. [H. OF L.]

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Holman, Birdwood, and Co.

Solicitors for the defendant, King, Wigg, and Co., agents for H. J. Richardson, Newcastle.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Feb. 12 and 13, 1900.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury), Lords MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, SHAND, JAMES OF HEREFORD, and BRAMPTON.)

OWNERS OF THE MEDIANA v. OWNERS OF THE COMET; THE MEDIANA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Injury to lightship—Hire of substitute—Damages.

Whenever by a wrongful act another person is deprived of his property, a claim for damages may be sustained, and such damages are not merely nominal, though no actual pecuniary loss may be proved.

The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board are charged by statute with the duty of lighting the approaches to the Mersey, and maintain four lightships in constant use, and two in reserve to take the places of the others when they need repair or in other emergencies. One of the lightships, the C., was damaged by collision with the M., a steamship belonging to the appellants. The collision was owing to the negligence of those in charge of the M. The O., one of the reserve lightships, took the place of the C. while her damages were repaired. The owners of the M. paid the cost of the repairs and all other out of pocket expenses, but the board made a claim for the loss of the use of the lightship C. while she was under repair, or for the hire of the substitute. It was admitted that the O. would not have been employed if she had not been acting as substitute for the C.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that they were entitled to recover substantial damages for the loss of the use of the C.

The Greta Holme (77 L. T. Rep. 231; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 317; (1897) A. C. 596) followed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Smith and Collins, L.J.J.), who had reversed a judgment of Phillimore, J. sitting in the Admiralty Division.

The case is reported in 80 L. T. Rep. 173; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 493; (1899) P. 127.

The action was brought by the respondents to recover damages in respect of a collision which occurred on the 23rd April 1898 between the appellants' steamship Mediana and the respondents' lightship Comet, which was then employed upon the Crosby station, off the river Mersey.

The respondents, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, the owners of the Comet and the Orion hereinafter mentioned, were a public body charged by Act of Parliament with the duty of lighting the approaches to the river Mersey, and kept six lightships, four of which were always in use on four stations, a fifth was kept to replace the lightships at such times as they were being overhauled, and the sixth was kept in the river Mersey in readiness to take the place of any lightship which might be damaged by collision or other accident. During the preceding twenty-five years there had been twenty-three cases of damage by collision with lightships, in eleven of which it was necessary to replace the lightship by the one kept in readiness in the river Mersey, and during the same period there had been four cases in which it was necessary to withdraw one of the lightships in consequence of damage not occasioned by collision. The expense of maintaining the sixth lightship, including interest on capital invested in her, was stated by the marine surveyor to the respondents to amount to about 1000*l.* a year. The Orion, the sixth lightship, took the place of the Comet after she had been damaged by collision, and it was admitted that during the seventy-four days on which she took the place of the Comet she was not required for any other purpose.

The appellants admitted their liability, subject to a reference to the district registrar assisted by merchants.

On the 3rd Dec. 1898 the appellants agreed with the respondents as to all the items of their claim except No. 8, loss of the use of the lightship Comet, or hire of the services of the lightship Orion on the station from the 23rd April 1898 to the 6th July 1898, seventy-four days at 4*l.* 4*s.*, 31*0l.* 16*s.* The appellants agreed that the amount claimed in respect of this item was correct, if such claim was recoverable.

The admitted items of claim covered all the actual out of pocket expenses to which the respondents were put by reason of the substitution of the Orion for the Comet, and the only question in dispute was whether the respondents were entitled to be paid for the loss of the use of the Comet during the seventy-four days during which she was under repair, or were entitled to hire of the Orion which took her place. It was contended on behalf of the appellants that inasmuch as the work of the Comet was performed by the Orion, another of the respondents' lightships, which would not have been otherwise employed, the respondents sustained no loss or damage in respect of their not being able to use the Comet, and that they were not entitled to any hire for the use of the Orion as they expended no extra money and sustained no loss or damage through not having the use of her owing to the collision, and that it was immaterial whether she was merely laid up at anchor in the river Mersey, as it was stated she generally was, or placed on an anchorage as a lightship, and, further, that if the claim was admitted, the respondents would actually, through the happening of the collision, obtain a profit which they would not otherwise have received, and that they could not legally do so.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that they were entitled to compensation for the loss of the use of the Comet whether or not they could in fact show any actual loss or expense, and, further, that, inasmuch as they had spent moneys in anticipation in providing a spare lightship to replace others damaged by collision, they were entitled to remuneration for the use of the Orion when she was replacing the Comet.

The reference was heard before the district registrar on the 8th Dec. 1898, and by his report, dated the 12th Dec. 1898, he allowed the item No. 8.

<sup>a</sup> Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

H. OF L.] OWNERS OF THE MEDIANA v. OWNERS OF THE COMET; THE MEDIANA. [H. OF L.]

The appellants carried in notice of objection to the registrar's report, and Phillimore, J. allowed the objection, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal as above mentioned.

J. Walton, Q.C. and Horridge appeared for the appellants, and contended that the case of The Greta Holme (77 L. T. Rep. 231; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 317; (1897) A. C. 596), upon which the court below relied, was distinguishable. The respondents were put to no additional expense by having to use the Orion, and therefore they are not entitled to any compensation. They cannot be allowed to make a profit out of it. The case of The City of Peking (63 L. T. Rep. 722; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 572; 15 App. Cas. 438), before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, is exactly in point. They also cited

The Clarence, 3 Wm. Rob. 283;

The Munster (1899) P. 129, n;

The Emerald, 80 L. T. Rep. 178, n; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 498, n.; (1899) P. 130, n.

Carver, Q.C., B. Aspinall, Q.C., and Maurice Hill, who appeared for the respondents, were only called upon to distinguish the case of The City of Peking (ubi sup.).

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: This case, I think, is really governed by the principles laid down by this House in The Greta Holme (ubi sup.), in which it was pointed out that the respondents were deprived by the negligence of the appellants of the use of their dredger, and were entitled to the damages awarded. Lord Watson pointed out in that case that the result of the withdrawal of the dredger from its ordinary work was the accumulation of a considerable amount of silt which in itself was an injury sounding in damages. That decision has a much wider application than has been assigned to it by the appellants' counsel, and Lord Herschell in terms stated the proposition, and I may say that I myself intended to lay it down, that where by a man's wrongful act something belonging to another was injured or taken away, a claim for damages may be sustained, and that the damages in such a case are not merely nominal. Damages are not necessarily nominal because they are small in amount. The term "nominal damages" is a technical one which negatives any real damage, and means nothing more than that a legal right has been infringed in respect to which a man is entitled to judgment. But the term "nominal damages" does not mean small damages. The whole region of inquiry into damages is one of extreme difficulty, and you cannot lay down any fixed principle to a jury as to the amount of compensation which ought to be given. Take the most familiar and ordinary case. How is anyone to measure pain and suffering caused by an accident in terms of moneys counted? By a manly mind pain and suffering, when passed, are soon forgotten, but the law recognises that as a topic upon which damages may be given. In this particular case the broad proposition is that the respondents were deprived of their vessel. I purposely do not use the words the use of their vessel. For the wrongdoer has no right to inquire what or whether any use would have been made of the vessel of which the respondents were deprived. Suppose, for example, someone went into my house and took away a chair and retained it for some months, could anyone say that I as owner am entitled to no reparation on the ground that I have other chairs or that I was not in the habit of sitting upon that particular chair? The jury's task is often a difficult one in cases of that character, and an arbitrator or jury often has to take an artificial hypothesis; such as in the case to which I have referred what it would cost to hire such a chair. The broad principle applicable to this appeal is quite independent of the particular use which the respondents would make of the Comet. It is wholly different from a case of special damage, where you have to ascertain the specific loss of profit or other advantage which would otherwise have accrued. Where special damage is alleged you must show precisely the nature and extent of the injury sustained, and the person liable must have an opportunity of inquiring into the details before the case comes into court. In the case, however, of general damage no such principle applies, and the jury have only to give a proper equivalent for the unlawful withdrawal of the particular subject-matter. That broad principle comprehends this and many other cases, and the jury may assess damages which are not nominal damages though the amount may be trifling. It appears to me, therefore, that what the learned Lords in The Greta Holme intended to point out—and Lord Herschell gives expression to it in plain terms—was that the unlawful keeping back what belongs to another person is a ground for real and not nominal damages. I put aside the question of trespass, involving high-handed procedure or insolent behaviour, and other cases which have been held to entitle to aggravated and punitive damages. The principle of assessing damages must be the same in all forms of the unlawful detention of another man's property. That seems to me so plain that I have been puzzled to learn that in the Admiralty Court the loss of the use of this vessel has been treated as something for which no money damage can be allowed. I am glad that such a principle has not been affirmed in your Lordships' House, as it seems to me inconsistent and unreasonable.

The only difficulty I have had is in connection with the decision in the Privy Council in The City of Peking (ubi sup.). But I have, I think, discovered a clue to the real grounds of the judgment in that case. It is to be observed, in the first place, that there is a difficulty in understanding the decision of the Judicial Committee without the report of those persons who had to assess the damage. Their report, so far as quoted, is not a model of clearness. The principle of the decision in The City of Peking appears to be that you could not be paid for the detention of the damaged vessel when allowance was already made for the use of the substituted one, because you would be paid twice over. If that is the real principle of the decision it is not inconsistent with but is on the same lines as the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the present case. Whether the question was raised as to the absolute use of the vessel I am not able to say. Therefore, to my mind, that case affords no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the judgment ought to be affirmed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

H. OF L.] OWNERS OF THE GANNET v. OWNERS OF THE ALGOA; THE GANNET. [H. OF L.]

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I concur. I took part in the hearing of The City of Peking, but I cannot pretend to remember very accurately whether this question was or was not directly raised. My impression, however, distinctly is that the present question was not involved in that case. In that case the parties admitted that the substituted service was provided at the expense of the wrongdoers, and that there had been no loss of profit whatever. They claimed an extravagant sum for demurrage on the authority of The Black Prince (Lush, 568), but their Lordships had no hesitation in rejecting that claim, because that would have been paying them twice over. I observe that The City of Peking was not cited in the Court of Appeal.

Lord MORRIS.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I think that this case entirely comes within the principle in The Greta Holme, which overruled the principles of previous cases as regards the mode of assessing damages.

Lord SHAND.—My Lords: I entirely concur with the motion of the Lord Chancellor. It was established that the Orion was kept expressly for the purpose of meeting such a contingency as happened. It appears that no fewer than eleven cases have occurred during the last twenty-five years in which a substitute has been called for to replace lightships damaged by collision on the Mersey. If the Mersey Commissioners had hired a ship for the purpose of doing the duty for which this sixth vessel was kept, there could be no answer to the claim for the cost of hire. It seems to me, therefore, if there be no answer in that case neither can there be any to this.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—My Lords: I entirely concur. I think that there is a distinction between the case at the bar and the one determined by the Privy Council arising from the fact that in this case there has been expense incurred in providing the very remedy supplied in order to get rid of the effect of the act of the wrongdoer, while in The City of Peking there was no expense incurred in order to remedy the injury.

Lord BRAMPTON.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I desire to say one word with regard to the Orion, which was the substituted vessel built and maintained at great expense so that the respondents might have the means ready to obviate the inconvenience or danger which might arise from such a misfortune as befell the Comet. As between themselves and the wrongdoer, they were under no obligation whatever to use the Orion. They might have hired a vessel, in which case the liability for the hire would have been clear. Why should the appellants claim a right to have the services of the Orion gratuitously? They might as well claim the services of the skilled workmen employed by the respondents who happened at the moment to be idle. That cannot be the law. In my opinion the services of the Orion in this case ought to be paid for in the shape of damages.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, T. Cooper and Co., for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondents, Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., for A. T. Squarey, Liverpool.

April 1 and 3, 1900.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury), Lords MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, DAVEY, BRAMPTON, and ROBERTSON, with Nautical Assessors.)

OWNERS OF THE GANNET v. OWNERS OF THE ALGOA; THE GANNET. (a)

Collision—Second anchor light—“At or near the stern”—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, art. 11.

It is not a compliance with art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, which provides that a ship of 150ft. or upwards in length shall, when at anchor, carry a second anchor light “at or near the stern of the vessel,” to exhibit a light at a distance of 120ft. from the stern. Where the lights of a vessel are not exhibited in the position required by the collision regulations it is necessary for her to establish beyond all doubt that the light was in such a position that it ought to have been seen by the other vessel before the court will find the other vessel in fault for bad look-out.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Smith, Williams, and Romer, L.J.J.), reported in (1899) P. 230, who had varied a decision of Bucknill, J. sitting in Admiralty.

On the 19th Nov. 1898, at about 4 a.m., the screw steamship Algoa of 7575 tons gross register was at anchor in the river Elbe off Brunshausen. The wind was south-easterly and fresh, and the weather was gloomy. The tide was the first of the flood. The Algoa, which was 455ft. long, was swinging to her anchor very slowly, owing to the sluggish tide and the direction of the wind. She was heading across the channel to the northward, with her starboard side up the river, and her stern about 200 yards from the south shore. She had at the time a globe anchor light hanging in the forestay forward, 38ft. from the deck, and a second light aft, hanging on the inside of the foreshroud of the port main rigging, 20ft. from the deck and 120ft. from the stern.

Under these circumstances the Gannet, a steamship of 1246 tons gross register, coming down the river on a voyage from Hamburg to London, ran into her and struck her on the starboard side, about 20ft. forward of the mainmast, doing considerable damage.

The owners of the Algoa brought an action against the owners of the Gannet for the damage caused by the collision.

Those in charge of the Gannet stated that they saw the forward light of the Algoa at the distance of about a mile slightly on the starboard bow, and assumed that the Algoa was riding head to tide, and only observed the second light and the actual position of the Algoa, across the river, when it was too late to avoid the collision though all possible efforts were made to do so.

They contended that the Algoa had infringed art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, which is as follows:

A vessel of 150ft. or upwards in length when at anchor shall carry in the forward part of the vessel, at a height not less than 20ft. and not exceeding 40ft. above the hull, one white light . . . and at or near the stern of the vessel, and at such a height that it shall not be less than 15ft. lower than the forward light, another such light. . . .

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They argued that a light 120ft. from the stern was not "at or near the stern" in compliance with the regulation.

For the Algoa it was contended that the position of the light could not have contributed to the collision, as the ship was struck between the lights; and, further, that the second light ought to have been seen sooner, and the Gannet was guilty of contributory negligence in not keeping a good look-out.

The case was tried before Bucknill, J. sitting in Admiralty, with nautical assessors, in April 1899, and the learned judge found the Algoa alone to blame, and gave judgment for the defendants, the owners of the Gannet.

The plaintiffs appealed, and in May 1899 the Court of Appeal, with nautical assessors, found both vessels to blame.

The owners of the Gannet appealed to the House of Lords, and the owners of the Algoa entered a cross-appeal.

J. Walton, Q.C., Laing, Q.C., and Batten appeared for the original appellants, the owners of the Gannet.

Cohen, Q.C., Aspinall, Q.C., and Bateson, for the owners of the Algoa, admitted that they could not argue the cross-appeal, and that the only question was whether the Gannet was in fault.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: [After going through the facts as set out shortly above, his Lordship continued as follows:] I think that the parties have shown good sense in not contesting what was incapable of being contested, and therefore not arguing the cross-appeal, which, of course, will be dismissed. The question between the two vessels is, I think, narrowed to a comparatively small one, whether or not the light which by the regulations ought to be exhibited by the Algoa, which was at anchor, was in such a position that it could be seen by vessels approaching from above. That question is a pure question of fact, and in view of the difference of opinion which prevailed in the courts below, and indeed in your Lordships' House, as to the advice given by the nautical assessors, I think it right to say that it does not appear to me to be a matter of nautical skill at all, nor, indeed, has it anything to do with any particular technical skill. It is a question of the balance of testimony with reference to certain known principles under which all questions of fact are weighed and considered in courts of law. Although I myself should place considerable reliance on the judgment of the nautical assessors with reference to any mere technical manœuvre for the purpose of avoiding some pending accident by some nautical arrangement, I confess that in dealing with a mere question of fact to be determined by the weight and balance of evidence I do not surrender my own judgment to that of the gentlemen who are good enough to assist the courts with their nautical skill. I am fortified in that view by the fact that the learned judge who tried the case appears to have surrendered his own view to that of the nautical assessors. The judges in the Court of Appeal appear to have done the same thing, although the nautical assessors in the two courts were entirely in conflict with reference to that question. I thought it right to propound this question to the nautical assessors who assisted your Lordships. "What is the view of the assessors as to the possibility or probability of the second light on the Algoa being seen by those on board the Gannet," to which the reply was, "We think that the light ought to have been seen." That seemed to be somewhat ambiguous, so I repeated the question and received the same answer. Paying all respect to the gentlemen who assisted your Lordships, I think that the tendency of their opinions rather suggested that the light was in such a position that but for the negligence of the look-out it would and ought to have been seen by those on board the Gannet. I have great respect for that opinion, but I cannot surrender my judgment to it. I am the less disposed to do it from what I see in the judgment of Romer, L.J., that he took the same view as I do, but he attributed his view to the nautical assessors. In the conflict of the assessors, it is clearly the duty of a judge to form his own opinion. As the question is narrowed to that which I propounded to the nautical assessors, it appeared to me that the balance of testimony was greatly in favour of the Gannet. I therefore move that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed, and the original judgment of Bucknill, J. restored. You have not to rely on the unaided testimony of those on board the Gannet. According to the statement of the chief mate of the Lisette, which was following the Gannet in the Elbe, he never saw the second light until he was obliged to starboard his helm suddenly, and in doing so ran aground. The Algoa was lying athwart the channel. In such circumstances vessels at anchor on a dark night should have thought it essential to take good care that the lights, which were the only guidance, should be in their proper position. It cannot be denied that the Algoa was in default in that respect. The light was either 100ft. or 120ft. forward of the stern, and therefore was not in compliance with the rule. That has been fairly and properly admitted by those in charge of the interests of the Algoa. There is not the smallest evidence of any absence of care on the part of those on board the Gannet. There is a concurrence of testimony on both the Gannet and the Lisette that the crew did not see the second light. Counsel boldly, when they say they saw the first light but did not see the second, ask your Lordships to disbelieve that they saw the first light at all. That is the logical mode of dealing with the difficulty, but are you prepared to accept that? It seems to me a very bold statement to ask us to disbelieve these people. It is a canon which anyone familiar with courts of law will admit that because evidence differs it is not necessary to imagine that witnesses are perjuring themselves. Those on board the Algoa could not know if the light could be seen on the Gannet. Those on board the Gannet and the Lisette, which is more important, say that they saw the one light and not the other. When you put together bits of testimony of that sort, and couple it with the fact that undoubtedly the light was in an unusual position, it appears to me that there is an overwhelming body of testimony in favour of the view of the Gannet. Although that is the view which I entertain, that is an under-statement of the case, because it lays upon those who are at fault to make out beyond all doubt that the light was in such a position that it must have been seen. Looking at all the facts in combination, it appears to me beyond all doubt that they have not satisfied the burden upon them, and therefore they must fail. The question of a judge having seen the witnesses and having had an opportunity of judging whether they spoke the truth or not is generally a very important one. I am not certain that either side can rely upon that position, because I am bound to admit that the judge who tried the case indicates a tendency not to act upon the testimony of the witnesses, but he did so act, and gave judgment for the Gannet. That he should have yielded in that respect to the views of the nautical assessors is not absolutely satisfactory to me, as it shows that he had not a very strong conviction either way. Therefore I am not overwhelmed by the fact that the judge saw and heard the witnesses. In the result I think that the reasonable conclusion is that the vessel athwart the stream having her lights in an unusual and admittedly improper position was the vessel to blame. But it is enough to say that it was the duty of the Algoa to make out the proposition, which I think that they have failed to make out. I therefore move that the judgment be reversed, and the respondents pay to the appellants the costs both here and below.

PRIV. CO.] FORMAN AND CO. PROPRIETARY LIMITED v. SHIP LIDDESDALE. [PRIV. CO.]

Lords MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, DAVEY, BRAMPTON, and ROBERTSON concurred.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed.

Judgment of Bucknill, J. restored. Respondents to pay to the appellants the costs in this House and in the courts below.

Solicitor for the appellants, William Batham.

Solicitors for the respondents, Pritchard and Sons, for Batesons, Warr, and Wimshurst, Liverpool.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Dec. 14, 15, 16, 20, 1899, and Feb. 17, 1900.

(Present: The Right Hons. Lords HOBHOUSE, DAVEY, and ROBERTSON, and Sir RICHARD COUCH.)

FORMAN AND CO. PROPRIETARY LIMITED v. SHIP LIDDESDALE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF VICTORIA.

Shipwright—Contract for repairs—Lump sum—Variation—Authority of master and agent—Acquiescence—Necessaries.

The plaintiffs contracted with the defendant's master at a foreign port to effect certain repairs to the steamship L., for a lump sum. These repairs were strictly limited to those necessitated by the vessel having stranded. It was also agreed that the plaintiffs should state schedule prices for any work required to be done in addition to the contract repairs. The plaintiffs never executed the contract repairs, but they claimed the lump sum, alleging that they had done the equivalent thereof, or something better, and that they had the authority of the master for the variation. They also claimed for extra work at schedule prices. The master's authority to contract was to the plaintiffs' knowledge limited to repairs of the stranding damage.

Held, that as the contract for the lump sum, being an entire one, had not been executed, and as the master had no authority to vary it, the plaintiffs could recover nothing under the contract.

Held, further, that the fact that the shipowner had taken the ship as repaired did not amount to an acquiescence in the variation.

Appleby v. Myers (16 L. T. Rep. 669; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651) followed.

This was an appeal from part of a decree of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Victoria, dated the 5th May 1898, whereby it was pronounced that the sum of 1700l. 18s. 5d. only was due to the appellants for necessary materials, work, and repairs other than those supplied and executed under a contract, dated the 10th Dec. 1896, the terms of which, so far as is material, are set out in their Lordships' judgment; and that nothing was due in respect of such materials, work, and repairs as were supplied and executed under and in pursuance of such contract.

The appellants having executed, under the circumstances stated in the judgment, certain repairs to the steamship Liddesdale, began this action on the 8th Feb. 1897 by writ of summons, claiming 15,567l. 8s. 9d. for necessaries supplied and repairs done to the Liddesdale, or a sum exceeding by 9571l. 18s. 9d. the lump sum of 5995l. 10s. mentioned in the contract of the 10th Dec. 1896. By paragraph 4 of the petition the appellants alleged:

The said materials were so supplied and the said work and repairs executed partly under and in pursuance of a written contract, consisting of a tender in writing by the plaintiffs, dated the 8th Dec. 1896, to do certain portion of the works and supply certain portion of the said materials, in accordance with certain written specifications and conditions referred to in such tender (which tender was accepted in writing by the master upon the 10th Dec. 1896), partly in accordance with certain schedule rates referred to in the documents hereinbefore mentioned, and partly in pursuance of orders given by the master during the progress of the contract works to do certain other works not mentioned in the contract.

The amounts claimed under each head of the appellants' claim were as follows:

	£	s.	d.
I. Contract for repairs .....	5,995	10	0
II. Work not included in contract, but claimed under schedule rates .....	6,847	12	6
III. Other repairs .....	2,724	6	3
Total claim .....	£15,567	8	9

The answer of the respondent (the owner of the ship) was as follows: (1) As regards the lump sum contract, that the appellants had not performed their contract. (2) As regards the schedule rate repairs and (3) the other repairs, that they were not necessaries, and that they were not ordered by anyone having authority on behalf of the owner.

The respondent further pleaded that, so far as the plaintiffs' claim related to extras, there were no written orders or prices agreed as required by the conditions of the written contract which the parties had entered into.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

PRIV. CO.] FORMAN AND CO. PROPRIETARY LIMITED v. SHIP LIDDESDALE. [PRIV. CO.]

By their reply the appellants alleged that all deviations, alterations, and extras were acquiesced in and ratified and approved by the respondent, which averment was denied by the respondent in his rejoinder.

The Chief Justice on the evidence accepted the respondent's contention, and, being further of opinion that there had been no holding out by the respondent of any person as having authority to order the deviations from the specifications above mentioned nor any ratification or acquiescence in the deviations by the respondent, he held that the appellants were not entitled to recover the contract price or any part of it. He also disallowed certain items, one on the ground that the work done was a deviation from the specification which had not been authorised in writing pursuant to clause 8 of the contract. He disallowed other works claimed for on the ground that they were not necessities within the implied authority of the master to order, and that clauses 8, 23, and 24 of the specification, so far as they purported to enable the respondent's agent to incur expenditure beyond 6000*l.* or for repairs not caused by the stranding, were unauthorised although a regular order in writing was given for them. Claims for extras outside the scope of the specification were also disallowed.

Carver, Q.C. and Mansfield, for the appellants, contended that the contract of the 10th Dec. 1896 was binding on the respondent as having been made by a duly authorised agent. The master of the ship had express authority to enter into that contract and bind thereby the owner of the ship; if not actual, he had apparent authority, and, further, the respondent acquiesced in and ratified the contract. With regard to the master's general authority to order necessities, and as to what are necessities, see

Webster v. Secamp, 4 B. & A. 352;
The Riga, 26 L. T. Rep. 202; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 246; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 516.

Mondel v. Steel (8 M. & W. 858) is an authority that when a contract is for a lump sum, proof of a breach of contract was only ground for deducting from the agreed price the difference between the value of the ship as she was at the time of delivery from what she would have been if the contract had been duly performed. See also

Tharsis Sulphur Company v. McElroy, 3 App. Cas. 1040.

The departures from the specifications by the appellants were sanctioned by the master and surveyors who inspected the work on the respondent's behalf as it went on, and no objection to the manner in which the work was being done was taken by them. By the terms of the contract the sanction of the surveyors to alterations in detail was not necessarily to be given in writing. Even if the appellants were not entitled to the contract price, they were entitled to payment for the value of the work done of which the respondent had accepted the benefit, having taken over the ship and sold her with her value enhanced by her having been repaired by the appellants. As to the authority which it should be implied in the agent from the conduct of the parties and the nature of the business, see

De Bussche v. Alt, 38 L. T. Rep. 370; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 584; 8 Ch. Div. 286, 310.

And as to the powers of the master of a ship, see

The Kurnak, 18 L. T. Rep. 661; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 289, 300;
The Albert Crosby, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 37.

Counsel also referred to

Appleby v. Myers, 16 L. T. Rep. 669; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651;
Munro v. Butt, 8 E. & B. 738;
Sumpter v. Hedges, 78 L. T. Rep. 378; (1898) 1 Q. B. 673;
Bartlett v. Stanchfield (1889) 148 Mass. Rep. 394;
Burn v. Miller, 4 Taunt. 745; 14 R. R. 655.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and English Harrison, Q.C. (with them Leck), for the respondent, contended that the evidence showed that the appellants did not perform the written contract so as to become entitled to the price stipulated. As to the lump sum, it was shown that in many important respects the appellants had failed to carry out the work which was necessary to entitle them to payment. For instance, they failed to renew twenty steel shell plates, and merely straightened the old bent plates and put them back, and in other details the appellant had failed to put in work in accordance with the specification. The evidence also proved that no one had authority to order or allow these alterations or deviations from the contract, and no order in writing as stipulated by the specification was ever obtained in respect of them. It was also proved that the repairs to the girder plates were so done as to substantially alter the original design of the ship contrary to the provisions of the contract, and that there had been no acquiescence, acceptance, or approval by the respondent of any of the alterations or deviations from the terms of the contract. The other repairs under the schedule rates were not necessities, nor were they repairs due to stranding damage, which alone was compulsory or desired by the respondent, and neither the master nor any other person had authority to order such repairs to be done. Having regard to the terms of the appeal, no question arises now as to any repairs done except as to those done under the written contract, and as to these the court below was right in holding that nothing was due, for neither the materials nor the work was supplied in pursuance of the contract. They cited

Monro v. Butt (ubi sup.);
Thomas v. Lewis, 39 L. T. Rep. 669; 4 Ex. Div. 18
Sumpter v. Hedges (ubi sup.);
Sinclair v. Bowles, 9 B. & C. 92;
Arthur v. Barton, 6 M. & W. 138;
Gunn v. Roberts, 30 L. T. Rep. 424; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 250; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 331.

Carver, Q.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 17.—Judgment was delivered by LORD HOBHOUSE.—This suit is in form a proceeding in the Vice-Admiralty Court to make the ship Liddesdale answerable for the cost of repairs executed upon her. In substance it does not differ from other litigations between one who has done work on a chattel, and the owner of the chattel who denies his liability to pay for it. The plaintiffs, now appellants, are a joint stock company, who carry on the business of building and repairing ships at Melbourne. The Liddesdale, the nominal defendant and respondent, is a

PRIV. CO.] FORMAN AND CO. PROPRIETARY LIMITED v. SHIP LIDDESDALE. [PRIV. CO.]

British steamer built of steel. The real defendant, her owner, is Mr. Robert Mackill, surviving partner of a firm of merchants carrying on business in Glasgow. Her master was Captain Alexander Clark. In the month of Oct. 1896 the ship ran aground off the coast of West Australia, but she was got off, and continued her voyage to several West Australian ports. Having then discharged her cargo, she made for Sydney to get a fresh one, but on the way put into the harbour of Melbourne, which she reached on the 25th Nov. When there she was examined by the Marine Board of Victoria, who detained her and required that the damage done to the structure of the vessel by her stranding should be repaired before she could be allowed to depart. That led to a correspondence between Captain Clark and the defendant, out of which arises the material question in the suit—viz., what authority was vested in the ship's master. The messages which passed are set out consecutively and in the most convenient form in the judgment of the learned judge below. They have been read frequently during the argument, and need not be quoted at length now. The defendant was very anxious that nothing should be done to the ship beyond what would enable her to come safely home with a cargo, such as replacement of broken plates and so forth, and he forbade Clark to make contracts before being authorised to do so. Clark, on the other hand, informed him that Lloyd's agent and the Marine Board held that more permanent repairs were necessary for safety. Upon this the defendant sent a message, dated the 6th Dec.: "Arrange as best you can permanent; must do nothing whatever beyond repairing stranding damage." In the meantime Clark had got specifications of the work necessary to repair the stranding damage, and had advertised for tenders. The plaintiffs' tender was the lowest. An interview took place on the 8th Dec. between Mr. Forster, the managing director of the plaintiffs, and Captain Clark and Mr. Brodie, who represented the firm of Sanderson and Co. That firm acted as the defendant's agents in the matter of the Liddesdale, and in their office all the negotiations took place. There is no discrepancy in the accounts of this interview. Some discussion took place as to a schedule of prices for possible additional work; and when that had been settled Clark and Brodie informed Forster that they could not accept the plaintiffs' tender without authority from home, but that they would recommend it. Brodie and Clark cabled at once to the defendant: "Lowest reliable tender 6000*l.* Twenty days. Repairs commence acceptance tender." On the 10th the defendant replied: "Contract with Lloyd's agent's approval. Twenty days, payment must be accepted by contractor, in banker's guaranteed drafts, ninety days' sight, on Clydesdale Bank, London." The parties met again at Sanderson's office after receipt of the message of the 10th. All agree that Mr. Warne, the secretary of the plaintiffs' company, objected to the mode of payment stipulated for by the defendant, saying that the payment ought to be in cash, but that his objection was overcome and the contract then signed. Clark adds that when Warne's objection was made he answered it by saying: "That is all the authority I have." By the terms of the contract the plaintiffs undertake to effect repairs as per specifications for the sum of 5995*l.* 10*s.* in twenty working days. The repairs specified are strictly confined to the damage by stranding. By clause 14 it is said that "this contract to repair and renew shall mean that the vessel shall be restored in every respect to her original condition prior to the accident." There are two clauses relating to repairs not specified, which have been the subject of a great deal of discussion both in the court below and at this bar. They run as follows:—Clause 8: "The contractor shall not make any alteration or deviation from the specification agreed upon, nor shall he be entitled to make any charge or claim for extras or for anything whatever beyond the lump sum agreed upon, unless he obtain the written sanction of the captain or his agents at the time of making such additions or alterations, which shall be at a price agreed upon." Clause 23: "The contractor to state schedule prices as follows for any work that may be required to be done in addition to what is attributable to damage—that is to say, for any repairs due to deterioration in water ballast under boilers." The claim made by the plaintiffs is divisible into three portions. First, they claim the lump sum mentioned in the contract. Secondly, they claim for the extra work at the schedule rates stated by them under clause 23 of the contract. And, thirdly, they claim for extra work not specified in the contract at all, but done in pursuance of orders given by Clark during the progress of the work, and said to be authorised either by his inherent authority or by virtue of clause 23 in the contract. The whole sum claimed is 15,567*l.* and a fraction. As regards the first portion of the claim, the defendants say that the lump sum was never earned because the stipulated work was not done; and, indeed, the plaintiffs do not assert that it was. What they allege on this point is that the equivalent of the stipulated work, or something better, was done, and that they had authority for the variation. As regards the second portion, the defendant insists that Clark did not order the work, and that, if he had done so, he had no authority to do it. As regards the third portion, there has been a separate dispute on each item with respect to its necessity for the liberation or for the safety of the ship, and with respect to Clark's orders for it, whether given in fact and whether binding on the defendants in law. The learned judge below disallowed the whole of the two first portions of the claim. Of the third portion, after detailed examination, he allowed items amounting to about 1700*l.* and disallowed the rest. The defendant put in counter-claims for penalties on account of demurrage and for damages, but all were disallowed. The third portion of the plaintiffs' claim, which was the subject of a great deal of argument during the opening of this appeal, may be disposed of at once. The defendant meets it by the preliminary objection that it is not the subject of appeal; and in this their Lordships agree with him. The decree is as follows: "The judge having heard counsel for the plaintiffs and the defendant respectively pronounced the sum of one thousand seven hundred pounds eighteen shillings and fivepence (1700*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.*) to be due to the plaintiffs in respect of that part of its claim which claimed for necessary materials, work, and repairs other than those supplied and executed under or in pursuance of the written contract and conditions and specifications mentioned in paragraph 4 of the petition together with the costs of the action up to the nineteenth day of May 1897 and pronounced that nothing was due in respect of such materials, work, and repairs supplied and executed under and in pursuance of such written contract and conditions and specifications and he condemned the defendant and its bail in the said sum and in such costs as aforesaid." This decree bears date the 5th May 1898. On the 30th May the plaintiffs gave the notice which is the foundation of this appeal: "Take notice that Forman and Co. Proprietary Limited plaintiff appeals from so much of the decree of the judge of said court made the fifth day of May 1898 as pronounced that nothing was due in respect of materials, work, and repairs supplied and executed under and in pursuance of the written contract and conditions and specifications mentioned in paragraph 4 of the petition and as deprived the plaintiff of costs. Dated the thirtieth day of May 1898." It is quite clear that the appellants were then satisfied with the decree except as regards the contract with its conditions and specifications, and the claims arising thereunder; that they did not intend to appeal as to that which lay outside the contract, and that the defendant has been right in avoiding discussion of this part of the controversy, both in his lodged case and at the Bar. As regards the work done, no doubt exists but that it was good work and that it added value (how much it is impossible to say) to the ship, which after release from arrest was sold for upwards of 18,000*l.* Indeed, the defendant tendered the sum of 4786*l.* 10*s.* on the 19th May 1897, and on the plaintiffs' refusal paid that sum into court. As the litigation proceeded, however, and the defendant learned more of the details of the case, he was led to dispute more of the plaintiffs' claims, with the result above mentioned. This will be the convenient place to state their Lordships' view of the authority possessed by Captain Clark, because both on the first portion of the claim, and on the second portion, the question of the validity of an order is continually mixed up with the question of fact whether or no it was given, and because for every failure to comply with the contract and for every excess of work beyond the specified repairs the plaintiffs seek to shelter themselves under the authority of Clark either directly given, or given through Mr. Watson, who was Lloyd's agent. It is true that instructions conveyed by cable in abbreviated language or by artificial and cryptic symbols are open to doubts and disputes. In this case the learned judge has pointed out that the message of the 10th Dec. 1896 is susceptible of various meanings. But connecting it with the whole series the meaning is reasonably clear. It means that Clark is to contract on the footing mentioned in his last message of the 8th, provided that the tender is approved by Lloyd's agents; and with the addition, that the payment is to be made by draft. And it is made clear by the defendant's message of the 5th that the tender, though it may provide for repairs of a permanent character, is not to provide for the repair of any damage except the damage by stranding. Clark then was limited, in respect of price to 6000*l.*, in respect of the nature of repairs to stranding damage, in respect of time to twenty days, and in respect of judgment on details to things approved by Lloyd's agent. Within these limits it seems to their Lordships that Clark was free to contract, and that where he was free to contract he might vary the contract as might be found expedient in the progress of the work. But he could not transcend the limits imposed upon him by his principal. As regards the most important of these limits it is clear that the defendant had an eye not only to expense which he says is excessive in Melbourne, but to the liability of the underwriters, and attached great importance both to the approval of Lloyd's agent, and to the complete separation of stranding damage, for which the underwriters would be liable, from other damage for which they would not be liable. The plaintiffs contend that they are not bound by all that passed between the defendant and his agents in Melbourne, that they knew nothing of such matters except the message of the 10th Dec., which apparently gave Clark a free hand to make any contract whatever subject only to the approval of Lloyd's agent, and to the conditions respecting time and the mode of payment. The answer is that Clark had refused to make a contract except such as his principal might authorise; that the plaintiffs knew that Clark and his principal were in correspondence by cable; they knew that the message of the 10th was in answer to Clark's advice of their tender sent on the 8th; if they did not really know the extent of Clark's authority it was their business to learn it; and thus whatever restrictions existed between Clark and his principal were equally binding as between his principal and the plaintiffs. Now, that the plaintiffs have not done the work specified by the contract is undisputed. The learned judge mentions four matters in which they have failed. Two of them are apparently trivial, and such as would not by themselves have any greater effect than to give the defendants a cross-claim if damaged by the variation. The other two are much more important. Under clause 15 the plaintiffs were bound to renew twenty of the injured steel shell plates, and to straighten thirty-seven others, or, if they would not bear straightening, to renew them at a stated price. This work of renewal the plaintiffs never did, and never could have done, at least within the twenty days, and never intended to do. Forster says: "Such plates could not be obtained in this country; the only means of getting them would be from England. . . . It certainly looked a bit awkward for us if we had to carry out our contract as to renewing plates as they were not to be got here. If the surveyor stuck out and refused us time to straighten out old plates and put them on instead of renewing, it would have been very awkward for us. . . . We calculated we would not have to carry out our contract fully. I see in estimate, we charge twenty plates to be renewed; we thought we could get out of that, and so kept price pretty low." The plaintiffs had not any kind of authority for this variation. The two persons from whom they claim to have received authority for some other unspecified work were—first, Captain Clark; and, secondly, Mr. Watson, Lloyd's agent. Forster says: "In January I went with Watson, explained how the plates were coming in. Clark was staying at Malvern. I said: 'I think all the plates will work in and straighten well.' He said: 'That is first rate.' . . . After contract signed I had no conversation with Watson, as to replacing the straightened plates, instead of new ones. I later on told Clark I was putting them on. This was all that occurred between me and any of them as to this." Under clause 16 a number of girders or plate frames, more or less damaged and buckled, were to be straightened where practicable, and to be renewed where the buckles could not be satisfactorily taken out. The evidence is somewhat confused in parts, but it clearly shows the following things: that all these girders could have been straightened; that some were not touched by the plaintiffs at all, being, as Forster says, still straight; that some were straightened, but in the process it was found that the material was deteriorated; that Watson thought it expedient though not necessary to substitute new material; that iron was substituted for steel; and that the deterioration was not due to stranding damage. From the evidence of Lang, one of the plaintiffs' foremen, it would seem that Clark either ordered this renewal to be done or agreed that it should be done. It is also made clear that the substitution of iron for steel not only added to the weight and to the expense, but altered the structure of the vessel; to her advantage as the plaintiffs contend, but, as the defendant says, causing a rigidity in her framework which is a source of danger to her. That is a matter on which opinions vary, but there is no dispute that the alteration is not consistent with the plaintiffs' obligation to restore the vessel to her original condition prior to the accident. The plaintiffs excuse their failure to do this by alleging the order of Clark. But, assuming in their favour that such an order was given, the question of Clark's authority comes in.

It is argued for the plaintiffs that clause 8 of the contract contemplates his giving such an order as this, and that, though he gave no written order as that clause requires, he could vary the contract in that respect as in others, and by his conduct did so vary it. It appears to their Lordships that the object of clause 8 was to prevent the contractors from making claims on account of extra work unless they had a written order for it. It was quite reasonable to contemplate that in the course of repairing further stranding damage might be disclosed, or that variations of detail might be expedient. Under clause 8 the plaintiffs could do no work of this kind, or at least could not charge for it, unless they got Clark's written order. The clause was evidently intended as a check on the contractors, and to prevent disputes about what the parties must have contemplated would be small matters. But it was not calculated or intended to enlarge Clark's authority, nor even, if so expressed, could it have that effect as against his principals. It is now used to justify claims against the defendant for a class of repairs which he had expressly prohibited. Authorised repair of stranding damage has passed into forbidden repair of deterioration, which has the effect apparently (for the two classes of claim are so mixed up that it is difficult to keep them apart) of doubling the stipulated charge. In fact, so far as this line of argument is applied to the lump sum it tends to show how completely the contract was broken, and how impossible it is for the plaintiffs to maintain that they have given the article for which the defendant bargained and promised to pay the lump sum. In the case of Appleby v. Myers (ubi sup.) Lord Blackburn mentions two conditions under which a contractor for a lump sum who has not performed the stipulated work can recover something under his contract. He can do so if he has been prevented by the defendant from performing his work, or if a new contract has been made that he shall be paid for the work he has actually done. Their Lordships are clearly in agreement with the learned judge below that there is no evidence to support either of these conditions, and it is not necessary to travel into further detail upon this point. Beyond the stipulated price, the plaintiffs claim the sum of 675*l.* for new girder plates, angle irons, and tank top repairs. There is great difficulty in understanding how far the claim for this work is identical with the claim for work done to earn the stipulated price under the contract as varied in the way for which the plaintiffs contend. The learned judge below appears to have found the same difficulty, for he says that, having considered the girder plates and angles as authorised alterations of the specified contract, he has to consider them again as extras. On his view of the case and on that taken by their Lordships, it is not necessary to work out this problem, nor is it necessary to examine minutely into the questions what authority can be imputed by law to Clark, or what particular items are covered by his orders, or what was the necessity for each item. All this has been done by the learned judge with great care, and with results adverse to the plaintiffs. In the judgment of their Lordships Clark had no implied authority beyond the limits which they have before stated—namely, to adjust details falling within the limits of that contract which he had express authority to make. He was not only not authorised, he was expressly forbidden, to effect repairs of any damage except that caused by stranding. In point of fact he did send a message on the 4th Jan. as follows: "Under engines, boilers, tank top damage excessive, condemned; estimate total expenses will be 11,000*l.* propeller blades, engines, boilers." The answer came next day: "Original contract must not be exceeded. If tank top damaged cut off filling pipe closing tank, Lloyd's will allow it. Are you following out instructions telegram 5th Dec.? Repair nothing beyond stranding damage." That is all in accordance with the defendant's previous instructions. Clark seems not to have given any order as to the tank tops. If and so far as he gave orders for repairs wanted on account of deterioration alone he acted contrary to instructions, and his orders cannot be of any avail to the plaintiffs, who knew that he was acting under express instructions, and must be held bound by them. On this part of the case the plaintiffs rely also on clause 23 of the contract. They say that it gave them a right to believe that if Clark and Watson approved of work done in addition to what is attributable to damage (which must mean damage by stranding), it would be properly chargeable against the ship at schedule rates. Their Lordships do not so read the clause. It binds the contractor to certain prices for additional work if required, but the requisition must still be made by due authority, and that was, as regards deterioration, the authority of the defendant only. If the clause means what the plaintiffs contend for, then Clark had no right to insert such a clause. He could not give himself indirectly an authority to order repairs for which he had been forbidden to contract directly. Then the plaintiffs rely on the fact that the defendant took the ship and sold it; this being, as they contend, an acquiescence by the defendant, and a ratification of all that the plaintiffs had done. The mere fact that the defendant took the ship, which was his own property, and made the best he could of it, cannot give the plaintiffs any additional right. It is not like the case of an acceptance of goods which were not previously the property of the acceptor. But the plaintiffs connect the possession and sale of the ship with communications which, as they say, showed that the defendant had knowledge of the true state of the case. The messages passing on the 4th and 5th Jan. have just been cited for another purpose. On the 6th Clark cabled as follows: "Contract provides renewals schedule prices. Girders, plates, under boilers more badly damaged than first anticipated; much deteriorated. Could not have remained in their present condition. Surveyors order renewal. Will make what repairs are absolutely necessary only through stranding." On the 28th the defendant wrote, being then under the impression that the cost of repairs was 11,000*l.*, which he treats as falling upon the underwriters. That, however, would not be the case with the cost of repairing deterioration. Up to that time nothing had been said to warn the defendant that he would be charged for repair of deterioration, and Mr. Mackill says that he had no suspicion of it. After he had written his letter of the 28th Jan. he received a message bearing same date from Clark, which informed him that the expense would be 16,000*l.*, and some particulars were added which showed that it was for other than stranding damage. Upon that the defendant took legal advice, and resolved to dispute the claim. Ever since that time the parties have been hostile.

There is nothing in these communications to show acquiescence and ratification. When the defendant wrote under the impression that 11,000*l.* would be charged he believed that it was all for stranding damage. He never in any way accepted the charge of 16,000*l.* It was only in the course of the action that he learned that the plaintiffs had failed to perform their contract. The plaintiffs have not been led by the defendant's conduct to do anything prejudicial to themselves, and their Lordships cannot see in what respect the defendant has precluded himself from disputing his legal liability. There is one item of the plaintiffs' claim which the learned judge, though he has disallowed it, has treated as standing on a peculiar footing. It is a small item for a single plate valued at 80*l.* It is one of the repairs provided for by clause 15, and it was done efficiently, but not according to contract. It seems to their Lordships that the plaintiffs cannot on the most favourable view of the evidence claim more than that the plate should be taken as having been repaired according to contract. But then the price is covered by the lump sum. There is no doubt that many repairs were executed according to contract, but the cost cannot be recovered because the contract is an entire one, and in its entirety has never been performed. There is no reason why this particular plate should be differently treated. The result is that their Lordships concur with the learned judge below in his conclusions, and for the most part on the same grounds as are taken by him. It seems hard that the plaintiffs should not be paid for work which they have done, but such is the effect of contracting to work for a lump sum and failing to do the work. It would be hard upon the defendant if he was made to pay for work which he did his best to prevent. And it must be said that the plaintiffs have done a great deal to bring the hardship upon themselves by careless irregular proceedings in relying on verbal orders, or on the mere presence and knowledge of Watson and Clark, as if they were equivalent to orders coming from the owner, whom the plaintiffs knew to be directing the business. Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to dismiss this appeal, and the appellants must pay the costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Wadson and Malleson.

Solicitors for the respondent, Lowless and Co.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Friday, Jan. 26, 1900

(Before SMITH, RIGBY, and COLLINS, L.JJ.)

THE SNARK. (a)

Admiralty — Damage — Collision with sunken wreck — Wreck improperly marked — Public nuisance — Independent contractor — Transfer of possession and control — Liability of owners.

The defendants' barge S. was lying sunk and submerged in the fairway of the river Thames without any negligence on the part of the defendants. The defendants employed an under-waterman, one F., a fit and proper person for the purpose, to raise and remove the wreck. No arrangement as to marking and lighting her was made between them. The physical possession and control were taken over by F. Owing to the negligence of F. in not properly marking and lighting the S., the plaintiff's steamship, the V., came into collision with her. On the plaintiff suing the defendants for the damage so caused to the V., it was held by Barnes J. that the defendants were liable.

The defendants appealed.

Held (affirming the judgment of Barnes, J.), that the defendants were liable, since they had not shown that they had abandoned the possession and control of the S. so as to rid themselves of liability for damage caused by her, and also because the work of raising the barge was an operation likely to cause injury to members of the public lawfully using the highway of the river Thames, unless proper precautions were taken. The defendants could not rid themselves of the duty of taking such precautions by employing an independent contractor.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CT. OF APP.]

THE SNARK.

[CT. OF APP.]

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Barnes, J. (reported 80 L. T. Rep. 25; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 483; (1899) P. 74) holding the defendants liable.

The action, which was in personam, arose out of a collision between the German steamship Vesta, belonging to the plaintiff, and the submerged wreck of the dumb barge Snark, which belonged to the defendants. The collision occurred in Limehouse Reach of the river Thames where the Snark was lying sunk. The Snark had previously been sunk in another collision without any negligence on the part of the defendants. The question whether the Vesta or those responsible for the proper lighting and marking of the Snark were to blame for the collision between those two vessels had been previously tried before Barnes, J. and Trinity Masters where it had been found that the collision was due to the Snark being improperly lighted and marked.

The defendants had employed an under-waterman named Forrest to raise and remove the Snark, and Forrest had taken over the physical control and possession of her. No arrangement was made between the defendants and Forrest as to the lighting and marking of the Snark, but the defendants contended that their liability in respect of her was at an end when they had given up the possession and control to Forrest, an independent contractor.

The question was argued on the 13th Dec. 1898, and on the 26th Jan. 1899 Barnes, J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Defendants appealed.

Laing, Q.C. and Batten for the appellants.—The learned judge has held that this case is governed by the principle of the cases of Hardaker v. Idle District Council (74 L. T. Rep. 69; (1896) 1 Q. B. 335) and Penny v. Wimbleton Urban District Council (80 L. T. Rep. 615; (1899) 1 Q. B. 72). Those cases turn on the principle that there was a duty on the defendants of such nature that they could not rid themselves of it. In this case the defendants rid themselves of their duty by employing an independent contractor, and transferring the possession and control of the barge to him:

White v. Crisp, 10 Exch. 312.

[COLLINS, L.J.—If that be so how does it assist the appellants? The corpus delicti is still in their possession, for Forrest's possession is their possession; and, further, the lights were misleading.] But it is submitted that the appellants had transferred the physical possession and control. If the appellants had abandoned they would not have been liable:

Brown v. Mallett, 5 C. B. 599;

Reg. v. Watts, 2 Asp. 675.

And the Thames Conservancy would have had to take charge of the wreck: (Thames Conservancy Act 1894, 57 & 58 Vict. c. clxxxvii., s. 77). Again, if the appellants had given notice of the position of the barge to the Thames Conservancy they would not have been liable:

The Douglas, 46 L. T. Rep. 488; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 15; 7 P. Div. 15;

The Utopia, 70 L. T. Rep. 47; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 408; (1893) A. C. 492.

[SMITH, L.J.—You must show that you could and did transfer the possession and control of the barge.] There was no danger to the public in raising the barge unless the work was done unskillfully. It is a well-known practice to let out barges with a man by the day or week; if such a barge during the period of its letting were left unlighted in the Thames the owner would not be liable; why, therefore, should the appellants here be liable. [COLLINS, L.J.—The distinction is between employment and letting.] The distinction drawn by Barnes, J. between the cases of a floating and sunken barge is fallacious, for the liability must be the same in both cases. If, in this case, the other facts being the same, the barge had been afloat, it could not be contended that the appellants would be liable, for they were not in physical control. And further, the accident was caused, not by the barge, but by the light being improperly placed in relation to the barge, and the appellants never employed Forrest to light the barge at all. There was no duty on the appellants to light it, and no indictment would have laid for not removing it:

Reg. v. Watts (ubi sup.).

Counsel also referred to

Holliday v. The National Telephone Company, 79

L. T. Rep. 593; (1899) 1 Q. B. 221;

Pickard v. Smith, 10 C. B. N. S. 470;

Milligan v. Wedge, 12 A. & E. 737;

Hughes v. Percival, 49 L. T. Rep. 189; 8 App. Cas. 443

Bever on Negligence, vol. 1, p. 493.

Carver, Q.C. and Stubbs, for the respondents, were not called on.

SMITH, L.J.—This is an action brought by the plaintiff, who is the owner of the steamship Vesta, to recover damages against the owners of a barge called the Snark, which was sunk in the river Thames on the 1st Aug. 1897. What happened was this: The owners of the Snark wanted to get their barge up again; they never intended to abandon possession or control of their barge in any shape or way. They got into communication with a man who, I believe, is undoubtedly efficient—a man called an under-waterman, that is, a man who goes down under water to get up sunken vessels, and they entered into a contract with him to get up this barge. The evidence, as stated by Barnes, J. in his judgment, which is under appeal, is this: The officials of the Thames Conservancy were told by Forrest of the sunken barge, and for a short time before the man Forrest brought the Rhoda (that is, I understand, a barge lent by the owners of the Snark), a boat belonging to the Thames Conservancy, with a flag on it, was made fast to the Snark. For this service the defendants paid the Thames Conservancy, and that matter was ended long before this accident happened. Then Forrest brought the Rhoda and took charge of the sunken barge, and Forrest and his men alone remained. Forrest was paid for the job which he was executing for the defendants the sum of 25l. It has been found in the Admiralty Court by Barnes, J. that Forrest was guilty of negligence in this, and that he did not light the sunken barge in a proper manner. The lights had drifted away from where they ought to have been. They did not notify to the steamers coming up or going down the Thames where the sunken barge in fact was, and the result was that the plaintiff's steamer, the Vesta, coming up the Thames, was of opinion, from the position in which the lights were, that it was all right to go where she went, and ran into the sunken barge and sustained damage. Thereupon an action was brought in the Admiralty Court, in these said circumstances, and the first question which had to be decided by the learned judge of that court was whether or not this barge had been properly lighted by Forrest, the man I have mentioned. He found that it was not, and he found that by reason of its not being properly lighted the plaintiff's steamship got the damage complained of. Another question arose—namely, were the defendants liable for this? Now, it is said and argued stoutly and vigorously, on behalf of the defendants, that they are not liable. One ground taken before the learned judge in the Admiralty Court was that the defendants were not liable because they delegated the job—and, in doing that, the process of lighting this sunken barge till she was got up—to the man Forrest, who comes within the term, well known in this court, of “independent contractor,” and therefore they were not liable for the negligence of Forrest.

The Thames is undoubtedly a highway. This man was put to work, and was engaged, in my judgment, in doing work which was likely to cause injury to persons lawfully passing and repassing along that highway, unless precautions were taken. Thereupon it is said, although that is so, still he was not the servant of the defendants, but he was this “independent contractor.” Now, we have had of late years, since I have been in this court, a great deal to do with this question of independent contractor. At one time, in conjunction with Sir Nathaniel Lindley, the present Master of the Rolls, my brother Rigby and myself wrote a judgment upon this question of independent contractor, and we stated what in our judgment was the law relating thereto. That was the case of Hardaker v. Idle District Council (ubi sup.). It has been referred to by Barnes, J. in this case, and I am not going to refer to it any more at this moment. I see nothing to repent of in what any one of us said in that case. There have been other cases since then which I am not going to refer to, because my brother Bruce, in a judgment in Penny v. Wimbledon Urban District Council and another (ubi sup.), dealt with the whole question. That case came before this court on appeal in the next year, and I then said, and I say it again, that I absolutely agree with the manner in which my brother Bruce put the law applicable to this question of independent contractor, when the defendant is sued for a wrong act. I will just read the passage from Bruce, J.'s judgment, because I cannot put the matter more tersely or more clearly. It is: “When a person employs a contractor to do work in a place where the public are in the habit of passing, which work will, unless precautions are taken, cause danger to the public, an obligation is thrown upon the person who orders the work to be done to see that the necessary precautions are taken, and if necessary precautions are not taken, he cannot escape liability by seeking to throw the blame on the contractor. Pickard v. Smith (ubi sup.) is an authority for the proposition that no sound distinction in this respect can be drawn between the case of a public highway and a road which may be, and to the knowledge of the wrongdoer probably will in fact be, used by persons lawfully entitled so to do.” I subscribe to every word of that. That being, in my judgment, the law applicable to this question of Forrest being an independent contractor, that point falls practically within the decision in that case of Penny v. Wimbledon Urban District Council, and the reasons of that decision. Therefore, this point does not avail the defendants in the present case. It is said that is all very well in matters arising on land, but it does not apply to matters arising on water, or matters arising, as in this case, with regard to a sunken barge in the river Thames. I will say for myself that I think the learned counsel for the appellants have made out this distinction, that in the case of a barge navigating as here, up the river Thames, which goes to the bottom, it is in the power of the bargeowner, if he is so minded, to throw up the barge—abandon it or transfer it, and have nothing more to do with it. But then it would seem to me also within the terms of the Thames Conservancy Act, which is a private Act, and the result would be that the public authority would have to come in and take up the barge, so as to prevent its being an obstruction to the navigation of the river Thames. It also seems to me to be within the case cited in the judgment of the Privy Council, delivered by Sir Francis Jeune (The Utopia, ubi sup.). It is there laid down: “That although it is in the power of the owner of the barge”—as I say—“to throw up and abandon his sunken barge, and have nothing more to do with it, until he has done that he is under the ordinary liability of every other man” Sir F. Jeune says: “The result of these authorities may be thus expressed: The owner of a ship, sunk, whether by his default or not (wilful misconduct probably giving rise to different considerations), has not, if he abandon the possession and control of her, any responsibility either to remove her or to protect other vessels from coming into collision with her. It is equally true that so long as and so far as possession, management, and control of the wreck be not abandoned or properly transferred, there remains on the owner an obligation in regard to the protection of other vessels from receiving injury from her.” That then is the law. Very well; be it so. Now, where do you find a tittle of evidence, and what is more, proof, that the owners of this barge abandoned or properly transferred possession, management, and control of the wreck within the meaning of that judgment? Of course, they did not. What they did was to put on Forrest to get this barge up, not for the purpose of abandoning control of her, but for the exactly opposite purpose of getting her above water again. This case seems to me to fall within the decision of the Privy Council. I have dealt with the independent contractor point, and for these reasons I am of opinion that the excellent judgment of my brother Barnes should be affirmed.

RIGBY and COLLINS, L.J.J. concurred.

Solicitors for the appellants, J. A. and H. E. Farnfield.

Solicitors for the respondent, Stokes and Stokes.

CT. OF APP.]

DOBELL AND CO. v. GREEN AND CO.

[CT. OF APP.]

Thursday, Feb. 15, 1900.

(Before SMITH, COLLINS, and ROMER, L.JJ.)

DOBELL AND CO. v. GREEN AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Ship to load cargo of coal “as ordered by charterers” — Charterers to ship “except in event of strike of pitmen” — Order to load from colliery on strike—Detention of ship — Liability of charterers.

By a charter-party it was provided that the ship should proceed to Cardiff and there load “a cargo of steam coal as ordered by charterers,” which the charterers bound themselves to ship “except in the event of strike of shippers’ pitmen,” the vessel to be loaded as customary, “but subject in all respects to the colliery guarantee in [ ] colliery working days as may be arranged.”

The charterers bought a cargo of steam coal from a colliery; subsequently a strike took place which extended to 85 per cent. of the collieries in South Wales including the said colliery. While the strike still continued the charterers obtained from the said colliery, and sent to the shipowners the usual guarantee by which the colliery proprietors undertook to load the ship in twenty days after she should be ready to receive cargo, subject to the usual exception as to strikes. The shipowners objected to this guarantee because the colliery was on strike, and required the ship to be loaded from a colliery which was working. The ship then went to Cardiff and, owing to the continuance of the strike, was delayed for three months.

The shipowners claimed damages for the delay from the charterers.

Held (affirming the judgment of Bigham, J.), that the charterers were entitled to select the colliery which they did in fact select, although it was on strike, and that they were not liable for the delay of the ship.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action as a commercial cause, without a jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, who were the owners of the Curzon, to recover from the defendants damages for alleged breach of a charter-party.

By a charter-party made on the 14th Jan. 1898 the defendants chartered the plaintiffs’ vessel, the Curzon, to carry a cargo of South Wales coal from Cardiff to Iquique. The vessel was at the time homeward bound to Liverpool, and was not expected to arrive there before April or May.

The charter-party provided that, after discharging her inward cargo at Liverpool, the vessel should sail to Cardiff and should “proceed to such loading berth as the freighters may name, and there load a cargo of steam coal as ordered by charterers, which they bind themselves to ship (except in the event of strike of shippers’ pitmen)”; the vessel to be loaded as customary, but subject in all respects to “the colliery guarantee in [ ] working days as may be arranged; any claim for demurrage in loading to be settled with colliery direct.”

On the 3rd Feb. 1898 the defendants bought two cargoes of Hood’s Merthyr colliery coal, one of which they intended for the Curzon and the other for some other vessel.

On the 6th April 1898 the South Wales coal strike began, and Hood’s Merthyr colliery was stopped by the strike.

On the 26th April 1898, while the strike was still going on, the defendants procured from Hood’s Merthyr colliery the usual colliery guarantee, whereby the colliery proprietors undertook to load the Curzon in twenty days after she should be ready to receive cargo, subject to the usual exception as to strikes.

The defendants sent this guarantee to the agents of the plaintiffs in the ordinary course. The plaintiffs’ agents returned the guarantee with a letter, saying: “We decline to accept it, having regard to the fact that Messrs Hood’s Merthyr colliery is on strike. As there are numerous other collieries which are not on strike and from which coal can be obtained, the owners require to be loaded by a colliery which is now working.”

The defendants replied that the coal had been bought from Hood’s Merthyr collieries some time before the strike began, and that the plaintiffs could have had the colliery guarantee at the time if they had so desired.

On the 14th May 1898 the plaintiffs sent the Curzon from Liverpool to Cardiff, where she arrived on the 16th May. She was ready to load on the 17th May, from which day, but for the strike, the twenty days mentioned in the colliery guarantee would have begun to run.

At this time there was good reason to expect that the strike would speedily come to an end, and that it would end in time to enable the loading to be completed within the twenty days.

The strike did not, however, end until the 1st Sept. 1898, and the loading of the Curzon was not completed until the 27th Sept. There was not any delay in loading after the end of the strike, of which the plaintiffs complained.

During the whole time of the continuance of the strike about 15 per cent. of the South Wales collieries were at work, and South Wales coal was obtainable, although at a very high price.

The plaintiffs claimed damages, based upon the loss of the use of their ship for three months.

The action was tried before Bigham, J. as a commercial cause, without a jury, and the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the defendants (80 L. T. Rep. 19; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 473).

The plaintiffs appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Horridge for the appellants.—The charterers were liable to pay damages for the delay of the vessel owing to their breach of the charter-party. The provision in the charter-party, that the ship should load a cargo of coal “as ordered by charterers,” gave the charterers the option of selecting the colliery from which the ship should be loaded, but the charterers were bound to exercise that option in a reasonable way. The selection of the colliery must be a reasonable selection at the time when it is made, that is, when the selection is notified to the shipowner. It was not a reasonable selection to choose a colliery which was on strike. In Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morel Brothers and Company (65 L. T. Rep. 659;

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 106; (1891) 2 Q. B. 647) Bowen, L.J. said, with reference to the option of charterers to select a port, berth, or dock: "The option is to select a port or berth or dock, that is, one which is reasonably fit for the purpose of delivery. It will not do, for instance, to choose a dock the entrance to which is blocked." There must be some limitation upon the option of the charterers; by the charter-party any claim for demurrage must be settled with the colliery direct, and it could not be reasonable or proper for the charterers to select an insolvent colliery. The charterers could not be entitled to select a colliery which was closed owing to flooding or a great accident. The charterers must be bound to select a colliery which is working at the time when the selection is notified to the shipowners. A cargo could, in this case, have been obtained from some other colliery and, in the reasonable exercise of their option, the charterers ought to have selected a colliery which was not on strike. They cited also

Bulman and Dickson v. Fenwick and Co., 69 L. T. Rep. 651; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 388; (1894) 1 Q. B. 179;

Shamrock Steamship Company v. Storey, 81 L. T. Rep. 413; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 590;

Saxon Steamship Company v. Union Steamship Company, 81 L. T. Rep. 246; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 449, 574.

Carver, Q.C. and T. E. Scrutton for the respondents. The judgment of Bigham, J. was right. The charterers bonâ fide exercised their option in the way in which they were entitled to exercise it. The contention of the appellants could only be right if the colliery, by reason of the strike, ceased to be a colliery within the meaning of the charter-party, and that cannot be so. The existence of a strike could not in any way affect the exercise of their option by the charterers; the duration of a strike is quite uncertain, and it might come to an end at any time. In this case the strike might have come to an end before the ship reached Cardiff. If the contention of the appellants were right, the charterers could not select a colliery at which there was a strike, even if that strike lasted for the shortest possible time. That would be a most unreasonable construction of the charter-party. Here the charterers made their contract with the colliery before there was any strike, and it would not be reasonable to hold that they could not select that colliery because a strike happened to take place before the colliery was named to the shipowners.

Horridge replied.

SMITH, L.J.—I think that this appeal ought to be dismissed, and I entirely agree with the judgment of Bigham, J. This action is brought upon a charter-party by the shipowners against the charterers to recover damages for the detention of the ship. By the charter-party it was provided that the ship should load a cargo of steam coal "as ordered by charterers," which the charterers bound themselves to ship "except in the event of strike of shippers' pitmen." That is to say, it was provided that, in the case of the happening of a strike, any loss thereby occasioned to the shipowners was to fall upon them. On the 3rd Feb. 1898 the charterers contracted for the supply of a cargo of steam coal from Hood's Merthyr colliery. On the 6th April 1898 a colliery strike began, which extended to about 85 per cent. of the South Wales collieries, including Hood's Merthyr colliery. Subsequently in April, and before the ship arrived at Cardiff, the charterers gave notice to the shipowners that they intended to load the ship with steam coal from Hood's Merthyr colliery. The strike was still continuing at that time, but Bigham, J. has found as a fact that there was then "good reason to expect that the strike would speedily end; in fact, that it would end in time to enable the loading to be completed within the stipulated time." Why, then, was the order to load a cargo of steam coal from Hood's Merthyr colliery, notified in April to the shipowners, not a good order under the terms of the charter-party? It was contended by the appellants that the charterers were not entitled to give this order, because there was at that time a strike at Hood's Merthyr colliery, which was common to 85 per cent. of the South Wales collieries, but that the charterers were bound to give an order to load a cargo from one of the few collieries at which there was no strike. Where can there be found, in the terms of the charter-party, anything to the effect that an order must be given by the charterers to load coal from a colliery not on strike? As I have already pointed out, it is expressly provided by the charter-party that any loss which may arise from a strike shall fall upon the shipowners. I cannot find anything in the charter-party which imports any such limitation of the right of the charterers to select the colliery from which the coal is to be shipped as that for which the shipowners are contending. It was argued that this case was governed by a passage in the judgment of Bowen, L.J. in Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morel Brothers and Co. (65 L. T. Rep. 659; (1891) 2 Q. B. 647), where he says, with reference to the option of a charterer to choose a berth at which the ship is to discharge: "The option is to choose a port or berth, or dock—that is, one which is reasonably fit for the purpose of delivery." Upon that it is contended that we ought to hold that the order for the ship to load coal from Hood's Merthyr colliery was not a reasonable exercise of the charterers' option in this case. I can see nothing in this case to lead me to the conclusion that the order which the charterers gave was not a reasonable exercise of the option given to them by the charter-party. I am of opinion, therefore, that the judgment of Bigham, J. was right and that this appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the judgment of Bigham, J. was perfectly right. It seems to me that by the terms of the charter-party, as between these two parties of business men, the risk of any difficulty which might arise from a strike was deliberately placed upon the shipowners, and that, that being so, the very case contemplated by the exception in the charter-party as to strikes has arisen. By the terms of the charter-party the shipowners were under an obligation to load their ship with a cargo of steam coal from a colliery which the charterers had the right to select, and the charterers took upon themselves the obligation to ship such a cargo "except in the event of strike of shippers' pitmen." What right, then, have the shipowners to complain because it was notified to them, under the charter-party, that the ship must

CT. OF APP.]

BRENDA STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v. GREEN.

[CT. OF APP.]

load from a particular colliery at which there is a strike at the time of the notification? It appears to me that the existence of the strike at that time is nihil ad rem. The shipowners must send their ship to the place at which they have undertaken to load, and at which the charterers have undertaken to ship a cargo; it is not until the ship has arrived at that place, and the question arises as to the obligation of the charterers to ship the cargo, that the existence of a strike becomes material. The charterers are entitled to say that the shipowners must do that which they have contracted to do, and must place their ship in position at the place which they, the charterers, have indicated, and that then, and not until then, the question will arise whether they, the charterers, are relieved from the obligation which they have undertaken by reason of the existence of a strike. In my opinion it would be unreasonable, having regard to the uncertain duration of strikes, to impose upon the charterers an obligation to name a colliery where there is not at the time any strike, for, although there might be a strike existing at the colliery which is named, that strike might be at an end at the time when the obligation of the charterers to ship the cargo attached. I think that, upon the true construction of the charter-party, there is no such fetter imposed upon the option given to the charterers as is suggested by the appellants. I agree, therefore, that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that the charterers were, for the purposes of this charter-party, bound to select what I will call a reasonable colliery, and I will assume, although I do not decide the question, that the time for ascertaining whether the colliery which is selected is such a colliery is the time at which the selection is notified to the shipowners. Assuming that, however, I come to the conclusion, having regard to the terms of this charter-party, and especially to those with reference to strikes, that the colliery in question was not an unreasonable colliery for the charterers to select at the time when they notified the selection to the shipowners merely because there was at that time a strike in existence which, so far as could be judged, might have come to an end at any moment. The selection of that colliery, then, not being an unreasonable selection, the shipowners were by the terms of the charter-party bound to accept the colliery guarantee of that colliery. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Walker, Son, and Field, for Weightman, Pedder, and Weightman. Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondents, Parker, Garrett, and Holman.

Thursday, Feb. 22, 1900.

(Before SMITH, COLLINS, and ROMER, L.JJ.)

BRENDA STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v. GREEN. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Discharge of cargo — "To be taken from alongside the steamer at charterer's risk and expense, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding"—Duties of owners and charterers.

A charter-party, by which a steamer was to load a cargo of timber and therewith to proceed to the Surrey Commercial Docks, London, and deliver the same, contained a clause that the cargo was "to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterer's risk and expense, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding."

Held, that by this clause the custom of the port of London as to the discharge of timber cargoes was excluded, and therefore it was the duty of the charterer to be ready to receive the cargo at the ship's rail.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Brenda against the charterer to recover the money paid by them under protest for discharging a timber cargo at the Surrey Commercial Docks from the ship's rail into barges and on to quay.

By the charter-party it was provided that the Brenda should proceed to ports in the Baltic and there load a timber cargo, and, being so loaded, should therewith proceed to the Surrey Commercial Docks, London, and deliver the same, always afloat.

The charter-party contained the following printed clause :

The cargo shall be supplied as fast as required by the steamer and be received at port of discharge as fast as steamer can deliver during the ordinary working hours of the port. . . . The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterer's risk and expense, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding.

The charterer refused to accept delivery of the timber at the ship's rail, and the shipowners, having paid under protest the expenses of discharging the cargo into barges and on to quay, now sought to recover the sum they had thus expended.

For the purposes of the action the plaintiffs admitted that, in the absence of any provision in the charter-party negating it, there is a custom in the port of London with regard to timber ships which enlarges the ordinary meaning of "alongside" and "delivery" by requiring the shipowner to do work outside his ship in placing the timber into barges or on to quay, but that such custom does not require him to stow the timber in the barge or to stack it on the quay.

At the trial of the action the following judgment was delivered :—

MATHEW, J.—I have no doubt as to the meaning of the clause in question in this charter-party, having regard to the controversy which has existed between shipowners and charterers on this subject. There have been several decisions as to the meaning of the words "cargo to be taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense," and the interpretation placed upon those words by Lord Esher, M.R., apart from the point as to the custom, is that in which they are commonly understood, and that interpretation is, of course, binding upon me, and I entirely agree with it. In the case of Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. (76 L. T. Rep. 537; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 244; (1897) 2 Q. B. 83) Lord Esher, M.R. used these words: "If the written terms of the charter-party stood alone, it has been held, and I think rightly held, that, upon the true construction of a charter-party in those terms, the delivery of the cargo from the ship into barges or on to a quay is a joint operation; that is to say, neither party is bound to do it alone. It is to be a joint act, and therefore if one party is not there to perform his part in it, that prevents the other party from performing his part. Therefore, upon the written terms of the charter-party standing alone, the captain of the ship would not be bound to begin to deliver the cargo into the barges unless the charterers had men there to assist in the joint operation; and if they were not ready and willing to take part in it, the captain being ready and willing to do so, he would be prevented by the default of the charterers from discharging the ship, and demurrage would be payable for the consequent delay." That being the proper interpretation to be placed upon the charter-party, apart from any evidence as to custom, there have been three or four cases in succession, the result of which, after a long struggle in which the evidence as to custom was in many respects doubtful, has been that the charterers succeeded in establishing that there was an obligation on the shipowner to do more than he would be required to do if the charter-party was in the form referred to by Lord Esher. These cases show that the charterers were adhering with great pertinacity to their view of their rights with regard to the discharge of timber cargoes; and, on the other hand, the cases show that the shipowners were determined if possible to restore the old construction of the charter-party, and to get rid of the custom which had been established by the charterers. I am clearly of opinion that the shipowners have succeeded in doing so by the form which they have adopted in this case. It is said that this charter-party is one which is intended to be used all over the world, but I have no doubt that the framers of it had the custom of the port of London in their minds. They were dealing with a timber cargo, and, with the object of getting rid of the effect of the custom, they have adopted phraseology which appears to me not to admit of a shadow of a doubt. The language of this clause is as clear and plain as it possibly can be, and I am unable to accept the interpretation which, it was contended for the defendants, ought to be placed on the clause. The custom is now by the terms of this charter-party finally excluded, and I hope that this will be the last litigation on this subject. I give judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From this judgment the defendant appealed.

English Harrison, Q.C. and Leck for the defendant.—Delivery of the cargo includes putting it over the ship's side into the barges or on to the quay. "From alongside" in this clause in the charter-party deals only with taking the cargo away; the clause refers to what is to be done to the cargo when it has been put into the barge in accordance with the custom of the port. The clause does not entirely exclude the custom of the port. The expression "any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding" refers, not to the whole clause preceding it, but only to the words "at charterer's risk and expense." There is a difference between customs as to "delivery" and as to taking "from alongside":

Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co., 76 L. T. Rep. 537; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 244; (1897) 2 Q. B. 83.

[SMITH, L.J. referred to The Nifa (69 L. T. Rep. 56; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 324; (1892) P. 411).]

Scrutton, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

SMITH, L.J.—I think that the judgment of Mathew, J. was right. The question is one as to the construction of a charter-party, and the parties have inserted the clause under discussion in order to exclude the custom of the port where the cargo is to be delivered. Apart from any custom a shipowner would have to deliver the timber by putting it over the ship's rail, and it is the duty of the consignee to be there with his men to receive the timber from the rail. As Lord Esher, M.R. said in Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. (ubi sup.), the delivery of the cargo from the ship into barges or on to a quay is a joint operation by the shipowner and the consignees. Now, the parties to this charter-party have agreed as follows: "The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterer's risk and expense, any custom of the port notwithstanding." That is to say, the words of the charter-party are to be read in their ordinary sense, excluding any custom of the port. That exclusion of custom applies to the whole clause, and is not to be limited to apply only to the words "charterer's risk and expense." That being so, the duty of the charterer here was, as I have said, to take the cargo when the shipowners put it over the ship's rail. He did not do so, and must therefore refund to the shipowners the expenses incurred by them in taking the cargo from the ship's rail to the barges and on to the quay. The appeal must be dismissed. In Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. (ubi sup.) the question in dispute had reference to the custom of the port. In the present case the custom of the port, whatever it may be, has been excluded from consideration.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It must be conceded that, apart from any custom of a port, the words "brought to and taken from alongside" mean brought to and taken from the ship's rail, and that meaning can only be altered by the custom of any particular port. In this charter-party the custom of the port has been excluded from consideration, and therefore the duties of the shipowners and the charterer under these words of the charter-party remain unaffected.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. I think that the argument that has been addressed to us on behalf of the defendants is too fine. The meaning of the clause in the charter-party that has been under discussion is that, in considering the relative obligations of the shipowners and the charterer as regards the loading and discharging of the cargo, the custom of the port is not to be taken into consideration.

Q.B. Div.]

GEDGE AND OTHERS v. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

[Q.B. Div.]

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche.
Solicitors for the defendant, Lowless and Co.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Wednesday, April 11, 1900.

(Before KENNEDY, J.)

GEDGE AND OTHERS v. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE. (a)

Marine insurance—Policy on a ship—Gaming or wagering transaction—"p.p.i." clause—Illegality not pleaded—Refusal to enforce claim—19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 1.

A policy of insurance agreeing to pay a total loss in the event of a ship not arriving at a port by a certain date is a policy "on a ship" within 19 Geo. 2, c. 37.

Where a policy is illegal by statute, the court will not enforce such policy, although the illegality has not been pleaded.

Ex turpi causa non oritur actio.

COMMERCIAL cause tried before Kennedy, J. without a jury.

All the material facts appear in the written judgment.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the plaintiffs.

J. Walton, Q.C. and Scrutton for the defendants.

KENNEDY, J.—This action is brought by the plaintiffs, who are insurance brokers suing really on behalf and for the benefit of a Mr. Rouse and certain other gentlemen associated with him, against the defendants on an alleged policy of marine insurance, dated the 14th Nov. 1898, upon the British steamship Radnorshire, belonging to the Shire Line. The policy, as pleaded by the plaintiffs, is a policy for 400*l.* on the said steamship at and from London to Yokohama, to pay a total loss in the event of the vessel's not arriving at Yokohama on or before midnight on the 31st Dec. 1898. It is pleaded by the plaintiffs that the vessel did not arrive at Yokohama on or before midnight the 31st Dec. 1898, and the amount insured is claimed by the plaintiffs. In fact, as appeared when the document was produced by the plaintiffs in evidence, the alleged policy is what is known as a "p.p.i." or honour policy, one of its terms being that, in the event of loss, "it is hereby agreed that this policy shall be deemed as full and sufficient proof of interest." The defendants, in the points of defence, do not plead the invalidity of the alleged policy, under the provisions of 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 1. Their pleaded defences, in addition to a refusal to admit the correctness of the statement of the plaintiffs as to the terms of the alleged policy, are (1) concealment of material facts; (2) that the persons on whose behalf the plaintiffs effected the alleged policy had no insurable interest in the subject-matter insured.

The alleged policy was, in truth, so far as regards the purpose of Mr. Rouse and certain other gentlemen for whom it was effected, a mere wager or wagering speculation. It appears that some time before the 14th Nov. 1898 the Government of Japan had made an ordinance whereby goods imported into Japan after the 31st Dec. 1898 should be liable to a higher duty than had previously been levied. This was known to Mr. Rouse, who was employed in the London office of a Japanese insurance company called the Nippon, and he had a conversation with a Mr. Pound (who was an insurance clerk in the plaintiffs' office) upon the subject of insurances being, in consequence of the ordinance, effected in regard to the arrival in Japan of vessels carrying goods to that country. It occurred to Mr. Rouse that there was an opportunity of having what he called "a spec." He asked Mr. Pound if he thought he would be able to do a "spec." for him. Pound said he thought he might be able. They then parted. Mr. Rouse returned to his office and read in Lloyd's Shipping Gazette that the Radnorshire was the vessel of the line of steamships running between London and Japan under the management of Messrs. Jenkins and Co. which had last sailed for Japan; and that she was reported to have passed the Downs on the 30th Oct. Believing that a vessel of that type might be expected to take roughly about two months on the voyage, he saw from her reported position that, to use his own words, her arrival before the 1st Jan. 1899 was obviously a close thing, and what he wanted for a "spec." He mentioned his project to certain other gentlemen in the Nippon office, and they agreed to share with him in the speculation. In the result, through Mr. Pound, acting as their agent to procure an insurance, Mr. Rouse and his fellow speculators carried out their project by obtaining from the defendants the policy in question, the slip for which was initialled by Mr. Toulmin on behalf of the defendant company. Had Mr. Toulmin known the real nature of the transaction—namely, that it was a mere bet or speculation without any interest on the part of those for whom in reality the insurance was effected—he would have declined the risk altogether. It is at the same time only just to Mr. Rouse and his friends to add that they appear to have desired throughout the transaction to act in a candid and straightforward manner. It was not through any fault of theirs that the purely speculative nature of the transaction was not disclosed to Mr. Toulmin.

It appears to me that, when upon the trial of an action the plaintiff's case, as happens here, discloses that the transaction which is the basis of the plaintiff's claim is illegal, the court cannot properly ignore the illegality and give effect to the claim. Here the insertion of the "p.p.i." clause taints the whole of the plaintiffs' case. The 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 1, expressly forbids the making of an assurance upon a British ship without further proof of interest than the policy, and goes on to declare that every such assurance shall be null and void to all intents and purposes. It has been suggested by the plaintiffs that the present policy is not a policy "on a ship" within the meaning of this section. I am clearly of opinion that it is. An assurance whereby the assured is entitled to be indemnified against loss in respect of the non-arrival of the ship at a certain port by a certain date may, I think, be correctly described as an insurance on the ship. If authority is wanted I think that it appears in the case—very similar indeed in its circumstances—of Kent v. Bird, decided on the same statute in 1777 (Cowp. 585). There the defendant undertook that a vessel should save her passage to China that season, and, in the action brought upon the document of insurance, judgment was given for the defendant on the ground that the transaction was the making of a gaming or wagering policy on a ship within the meaning of the statute. Attempts to narrow the section when it speaks of an assurance on “goods, merchandises, or effects,” similar to the attempt of the defendants in this case in regard to an assurance “on ship,” were unsuccessfully made in Smith v. Reynolds (1 H. & N. 221; 25 L. J. Ex. 337), De Mattos v. North (18 L. T. Rep. 797; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 185), and Berridge v. Man On Insurance Company (56 L. T. Rep. 375; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 104; 18 Q. B. Div. 346). These cases show that assurances on profits, commission, and advances are covered by the section, when it speaks of assurances on “goods, merchandises, or effects.” This policy, then, being an illegal instrument—an assurance which, in the language of Grove, J. in Allkins v. Jupe (36 L. T. Rep. 851; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 449; 2 C. P. Div. at p. 389), is contrary to the direction of the statute, and so unlawful in all its incidents that the law will not countenance any part of it—I cannot give judgment upon it in favour of the plaintiffs. Then counsel argued that the illegality was not pleaded by the defendants. In my opinion that makes no difference—Ex turpi causa non oritur actio. This old and well-known legal maxim is founded on good sense, and expresses a clear and well-recognised legal principle which is not confined to indictable offences. No court ought to enforce an illegal contract, or allow itself to be made an instrument of enforcing obligations alleged to arise out of a contract or transaction which is illegal, if the illegality is duly brought to the notice of the court, and if the person invoking the aid of the court is himself implicated in the illegality. It matters not whether the defendant has pleaded the illegality or whether he has not. If the evidence adduced by the plaintiff proves the illegality the court ought not to assist him. Per Lindley, L.J., Scott v. Brown (1892) 2 Q. B. at p. 728). “If,” said Lord Mansfield in his judgment in Holman v. Johnson (Cowp. 343) (to which Lindley, L.J. refers as an authority immediately after the passage which I have just quoted), “from the plaintiff’s own stating or otherwise, the cause of action appears to arise ex turpi causa, or the transgression of a positive law of this country, then the court says he has no right to be assisted. It is upon this ground the court goes, not for the sake of the defendant, but because they will not lend their aid for such a plaintiff.” Order XIX., r. 16, upon which Mr. Hamilton for the plaintiffs laid much stress, does not touch (as the judgment of Lindley, L.J. which I have quoted clearly indicates) a case like the present in which the illegality of the transaction appears upon the face of the plaintiffs’ case. The purpose of that rule, as it appears to me, is to prevent the injustice which might arise from a litigant, without notice to his opponent, adducing evidence to show that a transaction which apparently is perfectly legal is really illegal—as, for example, that an apparently good deed was really fraudulent under 13 Eliz., c. 5; or the similar injustice which might arise if a litigant, who would otherwise have been prepared with evidence to surmount them, was suddenly called upon at the trial for the first time to meet objections to the pursuit of a legal remedy based upon the Statute of Limitations or the Statute of Frauds, or was called upon to deal with issues of which he had no notice. The rule does not affect a case like the present.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There is, I think, only one other point in the argument of the plaintiffs’ counsel upon this part of the case which I have to notice. It was urged that the defendants themselves were wishful that the policy should not be held void on account of its having been made in terms prohibited by the statute. Certainly the defendants’ counsel did so state their attitude. But I hold that my judgment ought not to be affected by this consideration. I was referred to the course taken by Bigham, J. in the recent case of Buchanan v. Faber (4 Com. Cas. 223). In that case the policy sued on contained the “p.p.i.” clause. In a note to the report it is stated that my brother Bigham, after consultation with Mathew, J., intimated that he would, with the consent of the parties, hear the case as if the policy did not contain the “p.p.i.” clause. I need not say that I should be very slow not to adopt a course which they had approved, and if I ever felt impelled by my own conviction to take a different view from them I should have very great misgiving as to the correctness of my own view. But what I am invited to do here is something quite different from that which was asked by the parties and permitted by my brother Bigham in that case. That was, in effect, to treat the vitiating clause as deleted. What I am invited to do is to treat the policy as valid with the vitiating clause retained as part of it. If that were done here which the court did in Buchanan v. Faber—viz., if I dealt with this policy as if it contained no “p.p.i.” clause—the plaintiffs, so far from being helped, would obviously be involved in a fatal difficulty. They, admittedly, never had any insurable interest; the absence of such an interest has been pleaded by the defendants; and the only possible reply to this defence lies in the presence in the policy of the “p.p.i.” clause. If that is treated as gone, the plaintiffs’ case goes with it. Deciding this case, as I do, upon the grounds which I have stated, I feel, nevertheless, in view of the care bestowed upon it by the learned counsel on both sides, that I ought not to let pass unnoticed another aspect of the case which was presented for my consideration. The defendants argue that, even if the policy can be treated as not invalidated by the “p.p.i.” clause, they have a good defence to the action, because it was obtained by the concealment of a material fact—a fact, that is to say, “which if communicated would affect the judgment of a rational underwriter in considering whether he would enter into the contract at all, or enter into it at one rate of premium or another”: (see per Brett, L.J., Rivar v. Gerussi, 44 L. T. Rep. 79; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 377; 6 Q. B. Div. at p. 229). The fact referred to is the purely speculative character

Q.B. Div.]

THE SANSPAREIL.

[ADM.]

of the transaction. That it was not expressly communicated by Mr. Pound to Mr. Toulmin is indisputable; but the plaintiffs say to the defendants, "You are not entitled to rely on this non-disclosure; you knew perfectly well that we were negotiating for a policy with a 'p.p.i.' clause, and you contracted to give us such a policy. Mr. Pound was justified in assuming that Mr. Toulmin knew all he had to tell, and in the circumstances you must be taken to have waived being informed of the purely speculative nature of the risk": (see Carter v. Boehm, 3 Burr. 1907). It appears to me that there is much to be said for this view, but upon the whole, if it was open to me to treat the policy as a valid policy and I had to decide the case upon this point, I should feel myself, upon the evidence given before me, obliged on this point also to decide in favour of the defendants' contention. On the materiality of the fact of this being purely a speculative or wagering venture on the part of Mr. Rouse and his friends Mr. Toulmin is clear and emphatic. He would not have entertained the risk if he had known of it. As I understand his evidence, "policy proof of interest" in the ordinary understanding of underwriters means at least the possible existence of a business interest—an interest which may be hard to prove or may not admit of legal proof as an insurable interest, but still some business interest. The facts in the case of Buchanan v. Faber, to which I have had occasion to refer, afford an illustration, I think, of a class of risk of this latter sort. In fact the clause is sometimes stipulated for in policies which are intended to cover substantial interests such as disbursements and advances. It is not understood, if I follow Mr. Toulmin's evidence correctly, to cover a mere wager. The only case, according to Mr. Toulmin, in which he has accepted a purely speculative or wagering risk—and that he has done only on rare occasions—is in the particular case of "overdue" vessels, and then only at specially agreed rates of premium. The defendants' evidence is substantially confirmed, I think, by the conduct and by the evidence of Mr. Rouse. Mr. Rouse is himself a clerk in an insurance office, and he expressly enjoined Mr. Pound to state in negotiating for the insurance the speculative nature of the transaction. The idea was, he says, that they could not be too careful. He says, no doubt, elsewhere in his cross-examination that he did not see the materiality of a "spec." or real interest, but he goes on to admit that the underwriters would probably quote a higher rate of premium in the case of a "spec." Mr. Pound's excuse for not obeying Mr. Rouse's instructions on this point as given to him by Mr. Rouse was that he had not got the chance of making the disclosure. It was quite an insufficient excuse, as I understood what took place between Mr. Pound and Mr. Toulmin; but I believe that Mr. Pound did not at all mean to do anything improper or unfair. I think he possibly drew an unwarranted inference from Mr. Toulmin's words and manner that Mr. Toulmin either knew or was willing to waive inquiry about the circumstances of the insurance. Upon the whole, as I have already said, upon the evidence before me, if I had to decide on this issue I should feel obliged to decide it in favour of the defendants. It is not, however, necessary for me to do so, and I give judgment for the defendants on the grounds which I have previously stated. Under the circumstances of the case, including those to which I need not refer, except for this purpose—namely, that, as appears by Mr. Toulmin's letter of the 14th Nov. 1898, the defendants repudiated the policy for reasons which the facts do not warrant, and which implied an unjust imputation upon the plaintiffs' representative—I give judgment for the defendants without costs.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Thos. Cooper and Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hollams, Sons, Coward, and Hawkesley.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Thursday, March 1, 1900.

(Before BARNES, J. and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE SANSPAREIL. (a)

Collision—Tug and tow and a ship of war—Duty of single vessels to avoid crossing course of large fleet—Improper light on tug—Exemption of Her Majesty's ships from Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Order in Council of June 1899, applying collision regulations to Her Majesty's ships—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, arts. 3, 19, 21, 27, 29—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 419, 741.

The statutory sanction imposed by sect. 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 for a breach of the Collision Regulations has no application to a merchant trader which is crossing the course of one of Her Majesty's ships from starboard to port, because the obligations imposed by arts. 21 and 27 are only applicable to ships, both of which are bound to obey the regulations.

Under ordinary circumstances a tug and tow are entitled to cross ahead of a fleet of warships which has the tug and tow on the starboard hand, and the tug and tow ought to keep their course and speed, and are not bound to wait till the fleet has gone by. (b)

Where a tug towing another vessel exhibited her two towing lights and side lights, and also carried a white steering light abaft the mainmast visible aft and forward of the beam, the exhibition of such last-mentioned light was held in the circumstances not to be a breach of the regulations which could possibly have contributed to a collision with another steamship which was crossing the course of the tug and tow and had them on her starboard hand.

THIS was an action in personam which arose out of a collision between the plaintiff's sailing vessel the East Lothian and H.M.S. Sanspareil, of which the defendant was the navigating lieutenant, and in charge at the time of the collision.

The plaintiff's case was that about 10.30 p.m. on the 7th Aug. 1899 the full-rigged iron ship East Lothian of 1389 tons register, manned by a

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALI, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b) The Court of Appeal has since reversed this view of the duty of a tug and tow (post, p. 78).—ED.

ADM.]

THE SANSPAREIL.

[ADM.]

crew of nineteen hands all told and carrying two passengers, was in the entrance to the English Channel. The Wolf Rock bore about N. by W. distant about thirteen miles.

The East Lothian, which was on a passage from Nantes to Cardiff in ballast in tow of the screw tug Sir W. T. Lewis, was on a course N. 9 deg. E. magnetic, and, with three lower topsails, main upper topsail, two jibs, and fore-topmast staysail set to assist the tug, was making about six knots an hour.

The weather was fine, dark, and clear, with a moderate breeze from the S.E., and the tide was low water slack.

The East Lothian carried the regulation side lights and a stern light, and the Sir W. T. Lewis carried two vertical white lights in front of the foremast, the regulation side lights, and a white light abaft the mainmast for the East Lothian to steer by. This light showed forward of the beam.

The lights were burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board both vessels.

In these circumstances those on board the East Lothian saw, amongst a number of lights bearing between four and five points on the port bow and several miles distant, a masthead light which proved to be the masthead light of H.M.S. Sanspareil, which was the leading ship of one of the columns of the B Division of the Channel Fleet returning from the naval manœuvres. As she came nearer her green light as well as the green light of other vessels of the fleet was seen. The Sir W. T. Lewis and the East Lothian kept their course and speed, and as the Sanspareil, which was in charge of the defendant as officer of the watch, approached the East Lothian she opened her red light, but instead of keeping clear of the East Lothian, as she could and ought to have done, the Sanspareil came on at great speed showing both her side lights, and with her stem and ram struck the port side of the East Lothian near the break of the poop, causing her such damage that she sank in a very few minutes and with her crew's effects was totally lost.

The plaintiff charged the defendant with not keeping a good look out, with failing to keep out of the way of the East Lothian, and with failing to take proper or sufficient measures in due time to do so, with failing to slacken the speed of the Sanspareil or to stop and reverse her engines in due time or at all before the collision, and with breaking arts. 19, 22, 23, 27, and 29 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The defendant's case was that the Sanspareil was on the day in question proceeding up Channel on a course S. 72 deg. E. at a speed of ten knots, the Lizard lights bearing W. by S.  $\frac{1}{2}$  S. distant about sixteen miles. There was a light southerly breeze, and the weather was very dark, but fine and clear. The Sanspareil was one of a large fleet of thirty ships of war proceeding up Channel in columns of divisions in line. The Sanspareil was leading the second division, with a line of cruisers on her starboard hand. On her port hand was a line of battleships headed by the flagship, and a further line of cruisers on the port side of the flagship. The Sanspareil had all the lights prescribed by the Queen's Regulations burning, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her.

In these circumstances the defendant saw at the distance of about two miles and about four points on the starboard bow a masthead light, a port side light, and also further aft another bright white light, which afterwards proved to be the masthead, port, and steering lights of the tug Sir W. T. Lewis.

The defendant believed the after white light to be an auxiliary white light of a steamship exhibited in accordance with art. 2 (e) of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The defendant, bearing in mind the danger occasioned to ships of a fleet if the leading ship of a division of a large fleet unnecessarily alters her course, watched the lights before mentioned, but, finding their compass bearing did not alter, ported the helm of the Sanspareil so as to bring the lights before mentioned on her port bow, and then steadied her helm; and immediately afterwards, in order to keep clear of the line of cruisers on the starboard side of the Sanspareil, and in order to throw out the line of which the Sanspareil was the leading ship as little as possible, put the helm of the Sanspareil hard-a-starboard. Immediately the helm was hard-a-starboard the defendant saw on the starboard bow of the Sanspareil the red light of a vessel, which proved to be that of the East Lothian, which, it eventually appeared, was being towed by the Sir W. T. Lewis with a very long scope of hawser. Finding the red light drew ahead of the Sanspareil and a collision appearing inevitable, the defendant put the engines of the Sanspareil full speed astern, but immediately afterwards the stem of the Sanspareil struck the port side of the East Lothian.

The defendant charged the East Lothian and her tug with improperly neglecting to carry the regulation lights or with carrying them in an improper manner, with being towed with too long a scope of hawser, with improperly attempting while being towed to proceed across and through a large fleet of ships of war steaming in company, and with failing to observe arts. 3, 27, and 29 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The masters of the Sir W. T. Lewis and the East Lothian gave evidence to the effect that when the lights of the fleet were first observed they were taken to be the lights of a fishing fleet, but that later they were made out to be the lights of a fleet of war vessels when some four to five miles off, at which distance they bore about five points on the port bow of the Sir W. T. Lewis.

The defendant deposed that he never made out the two towing lights on the foremast of the Sir W. T. Lewis, and that they were never reported to him. He alleged he saw one bright light first, and then another bright light aft of the one first seen, and that he took the after white light to be the auxiliary light authorised by art. 2 (e) of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

By the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897 :

Art. 2.—(e) A steam vessel when under way may carry an additional white light similar in construction to the light mentioned in subdivision (a) (a bright white light so constructed as to show an unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of twenty points of the compass). These two lights shall be so placed in line with the keel that one shall be at least 15ft. higher than the other, and in such a position with reference to each other that the lower light shall be forward of the upper one. The vertical distance between these lights shall be less than the horizontal distance.

ADM.]

THE SANSPAREIL.

[ADM.]

Art. 3. A steam vessel when towing another vessel shall, in addition to her side lights, carry two bright white lights in a vertical line one over the other, not less than 6ft. apart, and, when towing more than one vessel, shall carry an additional bright light 6ft. above or below such lights, if the length of the tow, measuring from the stern of the towing vessel to the stern of the last vessel being towed, exceeds 600ft. Each of these lights shall be of the same construction and character, and shall be carried in the same position as the white light mentioned in art. 2 (a) (ubi sup.), except the additional light, which may be carried at a height of not less than 14ft. above the hull.

Such steam vessel may carry a small white light abaft the funnel or aftermast for the vessel towed to steer by, but such light shall not be visible forward of the beam.

Art. 19. When two steam vessels are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the vessel which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other vessel.

Art. 21. Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way the other shall keep her course and speed.

Art. 23. Every steam vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, on approaching her, if necessary, slacken her speed or stop or reverse.

Art. 27. In obeying and construing these rules, due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and collision, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

Art. 29. Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any vessel, or the owner, or master or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case.

By sect. 419 (4) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894:

Where in a case of collision it is proved to the court before whom the case is tried that any of the collision regulations have been infringed, the ship by which the regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary.

By sect. 741:

This Act shall not, except where specially provided, apply to ships belonging to Her Majesty.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. E. Webster, Q.C.) and Aceland for the defendant.—The plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence at common law in attempting to pass through a great fleet of warships; it must have been obvious to those in charge of the navigation of the tug and her tow that for a tug with a large vessel in tow and with a large scope of hawser to attempt such a thing must bring about great risk of collision. The tug and tow should have kept away or have stopped until the fleet had passed; either of which manœuvres they could have easily adopted. [BARNES, J.—But if your point is that the plaintiff was guilty of common law negligence only, that will not assist you, since it is admitted the defendant could have avoided the tug and tow.] Secondly, it is submitted that the plaintiff was guilty of failure to discharge his statutory obligations under the regulations, arts. 27 and 29. The circumstances were such as to be special circumstances within the meaning of art. 27, and it was consequently the duty of the plaintiff to depart from art. 21. The plaintiff, in holding his course and speed, neglected precautions required by the special circumstances of the case: (art. 29). If so, he must be deemed to be in fault. Thirdly, the plaintiff committed a breach of art. 3 of the regulations in carrying the after white light so that it was visible forward of the beam. A vessel is prohibited from carrying a white light aft which is visible before the beam; the defendant was misled by this light because he was led to suppose that the vessel showing it was a vessel not engaged in towing. They cited

The Hope, 2 W. Rob. 8;

The La Plata, Swabey, 220;

The Annot Lyle, 55 L. T. Rep. 576; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 50; 11 P. Div. 114.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Scrutton for the plaintiff.—Firstly, as to the after white light on the Sir W. T. Lewis. It is submitted that such a light could not possibly have misled the defendant into supposing that the tug was not a vessel towing another vessel; because any steamship, towing or not, may carry a second white light aft of the masthead light prescribed by art. 2 (a). Therefore there was nothing in the fact that this tug was showing an after white light to make the defendant think she was or was not a vessel engaged in towing. The intention for which this second light was carried is immaterial if its exhibition does not infringe the regulations. Secondly, was there a duty on this tug and the East Lothian to keep out of the way of the fleet? The duty, if it exists, is outside the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea; there is nothing in those articles to impose any such duty. Under what circumstances does this alleged duty arise? What must be the size of the fleet? A similar obligation was unsuccessfully contended for in The Warrior (27 L. T. Rep. 101; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 400; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 553) and many other cases. Such a duty is outside and inconsistent with the regulations. But if the plaintiff was wrong to keep on across the course of the fleet, it is submitted that he cannot be held to blame. Such negligence would not be a breach of a statutory rule, and therefore the case of The Monte Rosa (68 L. T. Rep. 299; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 326; (1893) P. 23) is in point, since the defendant could have avoided the consequences of the plaintiff's negligence by the exercise of reasonable skill. See also

The Margaret, 52 L. T. Rep. 361; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 204; 9 App. Cas. 873;

Marsden on Collisions, 3rd edit., p. 21.

It is not a breach of a statutory duty on the part of the plaintiff in not keeping clear of this fleet. The articles relied upon are arts. 27 and 29. Art. 29 gives a seaman some discretion in cases of emergency. Art. 27 does not apply, because at the time it is said the plaintiff should have acted there was no "danger of navigation or collision." [BARNES, J.—Suppose I find "due regard" was not had?] It is immaterial, because the due regard is to be in "obeying and construing" the regulations, and to avoid "immediate danger." There was no immediate danger here at first, and it is admitted that as soon as there was danger arts. 19 and 21 applied. Art. 21 does not apply to a case of collision between a Queen's ship and a merchant trader.

ADM.]

THE SANSPAREIL.

[ADM.]

The Attorney-General in reply.—The last part of art. 3 is conclusive against the plaintiff; that provision amounts to an absolute prohibition to a vessel towing from carrying any light abaft the beam which is visible before the beam. Art. 27 does apply. There was immediate danger—namely, the risk in which the vessels would be involved if the plaintiff did not depart from the regulation which ordered him to keep his course and speed. The Monte Rosa (ubi sup.) is not in point; there the party suing was held to be unable to rely on the defendant's breach of duty; here the defendant is setting up the plea of contributory negligence.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 1.—BARNES, J.—This action arises out of a collision which took place on the 7th Aug. 1899 between the plaintiff's vessel the East Lothian and H.M. battleship Sanspareil, some miles to the south of the Wolf Rock, whereby the East Lothian was sunk. The East Lothian was proceeding in tow of the tug Sir W. T. Lewis on a voyage from Nantes to Cardiff in ballast. The tug and tow were on a course of N. 9 deg. E., and were proceeding at a speed of about six knots an hour. The wind was about S.E., and the vessel had some sail set. The tug was exhibiting the usual lights for a tug having a vessel in tow—that is to say, two bright lights in a vertical line, one over the other, at a distance of 6ft. apart, the regulation side lights, and a white light abaft the mainmast for the sailing vessel to steer by. The last light, according to the regulations, ought not to have been visible forward of the beam, but in fact did show to some extent forward of the beam. The East Lothian had the regulation side lights and a stern light. The Sanspareil was one of a large fleet of thirty ships of war proceeding up Channel. She and the other vessels were proceeding on the same course, S 72 deg. E., at a speed of about ten knots an hour, in the following formation: The ships were in four lines. The distance between each line was about eight cables, and the distance from the stern of one vessel to the bow of the vessel behind her was about two cables. The outer lines were formed by cruisers, and the inner by battleships. The Sanspareil was the leading ship of the more southerly line of battleships. She had all the lights prescribed by the Queen's regulations burning. Those on board the East Lothian and the Sir W. T. Lewis made out the lights of the fleet at a distance of about six miles, and broad on the port beam. At first the lights were taken to be those of a cluster of fishing boats, but as the tug and tow drew nearer the lights were observed to be the electric lights of the fleet. The tug and tow kept their course and speed, and crossed ahead of the southernmost line of cruisers. As they drew nearer to the Sanspareil the helm of that vessel was ported to pass under the stern of the tug, but the defendant, who was navigating the Sanspareil, being under the impression that the tug was a steamer proceeding alone, ordered the helm of the Sanspareil to be starboarded as soon as the Sanspareil was in a position to pass clear of the tug, and this was done. Shortly afterwards the defendant observed the red light of the East Lothian, and the engines of the Sanspareil were put full speed astern, but she ran into the East Lothian and sank her. This action was afterwards brought by the owner of the East Lothian against the defendant, Lieutenant Potter, to recover for the damages sustained by the former. At the hearing of the case the Attorney-General, who appeared for the defendant, raised no technical defences, but treated the case as one tried in the ordinary way between the owners of two vessels. He conceded that the helm of the Sanspareil had been improperly starboarded in the circumstances. This in fact means that the Sanspareil could have passed under the stern of the East Lothian. The Attorney-General, however, contended that the plaintiff's vessel must also be held to blame on two grounds. The first was that the tug infringed the regulations by exhibiting a light to guide the vessel astern which showed forward of the beam instead of only abaft the beam. The second was that the tug and tow infringed the regulations by standing on across the path of the fleet. With regard to the first point, the rule as to the exhibition of lights to a vessel in tow is contained in the second clause of art. 3 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, made in the year 1897, by virtue of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894. This clause is as follows: "Such steam vessel"—it is a tug—"may carry a small white light abaft the funnel or aftermast for the vessel towed to steer by, but such light shall not be visible forward of the beam." There is no doubt that there was an infringement of this rule by the tug, and that this would affect the tow as much as the tug. The Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 419 (4), provides: [His Lordship read the sub-section.] But it has been held that if the infringement of a rule could by no possibility have contributed to a collision, the infringement will not be a ground for holding the vessel infringing the rule to blame. See The Fanny M. Carvill (32 L. T. Rep. 646; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 565; 13 App. Cas. 455 (n); and The Duke of Buccleuch (65 L. T. Rep. 422; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas 68; (1891) App. Cas. 310). It was urged by the plaintiff's counsel that the infringement in this case could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision in question. This was disputed by the Attorney-General. The facts bearing upon this point disclosed by the evidence appear to be these. The two towing lights forward, the white light aft, and the red side lights on the tug, and the red side light on the East Lothian could be seen from the Sanspareil from her position forward of the beam of the tug. The defendant stated that he only noticed one white light forward, one white light aft, and the red light on the tug, and that he took the white light aft to be the second light which a steamer of a certain size may carry under art. 2 (e); and that, therefore, the tug was considered to be a steamer proceeding alone. I cannot understand these statements, because if one light forward was noticed the other one forward ought to have been noticed too, and the small white light aft was an inferior light to the light which is referred to in art. 2 (e). The latter should show at least five miles. I understand that he did not see the red light of the East Lothian nor hear any report of the lights before the order to starboard was given. There was no evidence as to what reports, if any, were made, and, owing to the course which the case has taken, it is not necessary for the court to determine on what person on board the Sanspareil the blame rests. Upon these facts the question for consideration is peculiarly one for the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, who have heard this case as assessors with me, to form an opinion upon. They advise me that in their opinion the fact that the white light aft on the tug was visible before the beam of the tug could by no possibility have contributed to the collision; whether the white light aft on the tug was visible from before her beam or not, the other lights on the tug and tow should have shown unmistakably that they were on a tug and her tow. Even if the red light of the tow were not noticed at first the two towing lights forward on the tug were plainly visible, and would indicate that she had a vessel in tow, whether the white light aft could or could not be seen. Moreover, there is nothing unusual in a tug showing to another vessel, in certain positions, her two white lights forward, her side light, and her white light aft, for the first three are to show as far as two points abaft the beam, and the last may show from aft to abeam, and thus over two points of the circle on each side the lights overlap. Further, the small white light aft is, as I have already noticed, a different light from the light mentioned in art. 2 (e), and the defendant says that he concluded it was a steamer proceeding alone by only noticing one white light forward and one aft, besides the red light, and I have already commented on this. It is to be further observed that if he only noticed one light forward and no light had been visible aft, the reason which he gave for concluding that the tug was a steamer proceeding alone shows that in that case he would have concluded that the tug was a steamer proceeding alone and acted as he did, so that the fact that the white light aft was to some extent visible before the beam of the tug really made no difference whatever in the case.

ADM.]

THE SANSPAREIL.

[ADM.]

The second point raises a question of very considerable importance. It was contended by the Attorney-General that the tug and tow ought not to have continued their course and speed across the course of the fleet, but should either have waited till the fleet had passed across their bows or starboarded their helms and gone under the stern of the fleet, and that in continuing their course and speed they were guilty in the circumstances of an infringement of the said regulations. The particular rules referred to were arts. 19, 21, 27, and 29. They are as follows: [His Lordship read the articles.] The substance of the argument was that although if the Sanspareil had been navigating alone, having the tug and tow crossing her course from starboard to port, she should keep out of the way of the tug and tow, and they should keep their course and speed unless and until they might be compelled to take action as contemplated by the note to art. 21, yet that while the Sanspareil was one of a fleet crossing the course of the tug and tow in the formation I have described, art. 27 applied and art. 21 ought to have been departed from by the tug and tow, because, owing to the difficulties which the vessels composing the fleet would have in the circumstances in navigating for a tug and tow coming in amongst them and crossing their course, and in avoiding collision with one another in doing so, due regard was not had by those in charge of the tug and tow to the dangers of navigation and collision, and the special circumstances which, it was contended, rendered a departure from the rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. It was also contended that art. 29 applied for practically the same reason, but as this rule does not impose obligations and merely provides that nothing in the rules shall exonerate any vessel or the owners or master or crew thereof from the consequences of any neglect to observe certain proper precautions, this contention was not really pressed. The objections to the argument also were that the articles in question do not apply so as to render the plaintiff's vessel subject to the statutory consequences imposed by sect. 419 (4) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and that the tug and tow were not guilty of contributory negligence, and that there was no infringement of art. 27 by the tug and tow in the circumstances; that is to say, that they were right in keeping their course and speed, and that there was nothing in the circumstances which rendered it improper or negligent for them to do so. First, with regard to the law applicable to the case. The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, of which the articles above referred to form part, were made by Order in Council in 1897, by virtue of sect. 418 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, which provides that regulations so made shall have effect as if enacted in that Act, and also applies them, together with the provisions of the Act relating thereto, or otherwise relating to collisions, to all foreign ships within British jurisdiction, and they and the said provisions of the Act may, by sect. 424, be applied by Order in Council to the ships of any country when beyond the limits of British jurisdiction, if the Government of such country is willing that they should be so applied. But sect. 741 of the Act enacts that the Act shall not, except where specially provided, apply to ships belonging to Her Majesty, and there is no special provision in the Act providing that the regulations made under it for preventing collisions at sea are to apply to such ships. There are, however, precisely similar regulations made in June 1899 for Her Majesty's ships by Order in Council, and these are in the Queen's Regulations and Admiralty Instructions. These are not made by virtue of the Act of 1894, but they are word for word the same as those made under the Act, and there are, as I understand, only in addition certain special regulations for Her Majesty's ships, with regard to certain special lights and signals to be used by them only. Art. 13 contemplates such regulations being made. The result is that as the Regulations (except the special regulations just referred to) for Preventing Collisions at Sea are similar for Her Majesty's ships and for other vessels for all practical purposes, the navigation of all vessels upon the high seas and in all waters connected therewith navigable by sea-going vessels must be conducted as if the same regulations applied to them. This is the only reasonable way of treating the matter. In my opinion, however, the fact that the regulations made with respect to Her Majesty's ships are not made under and by virtue of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, may in cases of collision between such a ship and a vessel to which the regulations of 1897 apply, affect in some respects the statutory liability imposed on the latter vessel by sect. 419 (4) of the Act. This observation does not apply to most of the regulations which have

ADM.]

THE SANSPAREIL.

[ADM.]

to be obeyed. For instance, an infringement by the tug in this case of the rule in regard to lights would, as I have already pointed out, be visited by the statutory penalty unless it could by no possibility have contributed to the collision. Such a breach is not affected by the observance or non-observance by the other vessel of the regulations applicable to her. But I find a difficulty in applying a statutory penalty in cases of collision between a merchant vessel and one of Her Majesty's ships, where the infringement by the former which is complained of is an infringement of the 27th combined with the 21st rule. This arises from the language of the rules, and may be pointed out by dealing with the present case. In navigating for each other in the circumstances of this case, and acting on similar regulations, the Sanspareil, if she were a single ship, would have to keep out of the way (art. 19), and the East Lothian and her tug to keep their course and speed (art. 21), subject to the effect to be given to the note to art. 21 and to art. 27, and it follows from what I have remarked above that it would be neglect of good seamanship and navigation to do otherwise, and if such neglect caused or contributed to the collision, the vessel infringing the regulation would clearly be held to blame. If, however, a breach of art. 27 combined with art. 21 by the East Lothian and her tug did not in fact contribute to the collision, though by possibility it might have done so, then to fix the East Lothian with blame it is necessary to rely on the statutory penalty imposed by sect. 419 (4) of the Act of 1894, and to consider strictly whether any of the collision regulations referred to in that section have been infringed by her or her tug. In my opinion, the collision regulations referred to in that section are only those made by virtue of the Act which, according to sect. 418, are to have effect as if enacted in the Act, and, as already noticed, the Act does not apply to Her Majesty's ships. The Sanspareil, in fulfilling a duty to keep out of the way, would, strictly speaking, be acting under art. 19 of the Queen's Regulations, and not under the corresponding article of the regulations made under the Act of 1894, and, strictly speaking, the duty of the East Lothian and her tug to keep their course and speed according to art. 21 of the latter regulations was only where "by one of these rules" the other vessel has to keep out of the way. "One of these rules" must, as a matter of construction, mean one of the regulations made under the Act of 1894, and art. 27 thereof only strictly applies to the obeying and construing of the same rules. It appears to me necessarily to follow that the statutory provisions of sect. 419 (4) could not apply in the present case even if the East Lothian and her tug did not act in accordance with art. 27.

There was a further point taken by the plaintiff with regard to the meaning of art. 27 of the regulations of 1897. It is this, that that article does not impose an obligation which can be infringed, but is to be considered solely as in exoneration of the strict duties imposed by the other articles. I am not able to agree with this view entirely. It seems to me that there is an express obligation in obeying and construing the rules to use due regard to the circumstances mentioned in the article, and at the same time it is difficult to conceive a case in which there could be a finding of want of such due regard unless it in fact contributed to a collision. So that I fail to see how there can be an infringement of art. 27 unless there has been default under it which contributes to a collision. For these reasons I am of opinion that, in order to establish liability on the part of the plaintiff for the collision in this case, it is necessary to show that there has been default on the part of the East Lothian or her tug under arts. 21 and 27, which in fact contributed to the collision. Even if the tug and tow were wrong in the circumstances in proceeding on at full speed on the course they were on at first, it is clear that the Sanspareil could by the exercise of reasonable care have avoided the collision without any difficulty, and, according to well-known principles which are stated in a convenient form in Mr. Marsden's book on the Law of Collisions at Sea, p. 25, the plaintiff can recover in this case. I might leave the case there, but I think it desirable to express the view which the court has arrived at with regard to the important question as to whether the tug and tow were right or wrong as a matter of navigation, having regard to the terms of art. 27, in proceeding on as they did in the circumstances. The argument of the Attorney-General upon this point was supported by a reference to the following notice to shipowners and masters which has been issued by the Board of Trade for some time, though the masters of the tug and tow stated that they were not aware of it. It is as follows: "Notice to shipowners and masters of single ships approaching squadrons.—The Board of Trade desire to call the attention of shipowners and masters to the danger to all concerned which is caused by single vessels approaching a squadron of warships so closely as to cause danger of collision by attempting to pass ahead of or to break the line of such squadron. The Board of Trade find it necessary to warn mariners that it would be in the interests of safety for single ships to keep out of the way and avoid passing through the squadron." The Attorney-General did not rely upon this notice as having any binding effect like the regulations have, but as supporting his contention that for a single ship to stand on in amongst a squadron was for her to run into such danger that she should be held guilty of an infringement of art. 27 by so doing. There may possibly be a case in which if a vessel were to keep her course and speed through a squadron of war vessels which ought prima facie to keep out of her way, it would be impossible or impracticable for them to manœuvre so as to keep out of her way without some or one of them colliding with her, or with some other vessel or vessels of the squadron; and in such cases the single vessel may be required to take action to avoid the danger either by acting according to the note to art. 21, or in accordance with the provisions of art. 27. But there is at present no regulation dealing in express terms with the case of a single ship approaching a squadron of war vessels. The general regulation for all crossing steam vessels is that the vessel which has the other on her starboard hand must keep out of the way of the other, and the other must keep her course and speed, unless the circumstances referred to in the note to art. 21 or in art. 27 require her to act differently. It is therefore necessary to consider the particular circumstances of the case. I have therefore taken the opinion of the Elder Brethren upon this point, having regard to the facts of the case which I have set forth at the commencement of this judgment. Their opinion is that the position and movements of the fleet did not constitute such a danger to navigation or collision, or such circumstances as to render it necessary for the tug and tow to wait till the fleet had passed, or to starboard and go under the stern of the fleet; in other words, they do not consider that the tug and tow acted improperly in this case in proceeding as they did, and that the Sanspareil and the other vessels of the fleet could without difficulty or danger, though possibly not without some inconvenience, have avoided them. All the vessels except the Sanspareil in fact did so, and the Sanspareil would have done so without any difficulty if her helm had not been starboarded until she was in a position to pass under the stern of the East Lothian. For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

ADM.] S. HUDSON &amp; H. HUMPHREY v. OWNERS OF BARGE SWIFTSURE; THE SWIFTSURE. [ADM.]

Solicitors for the plaintiff, T. Cooper and Co.

Solicitor for the defendant, The Treasury Solicitor.

Monday, March 12, 1900.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President.)

SARAH HUDSON (widow) AND HENRY HUMPHREY
v. OWNERS OF THE BARGE SWIFTSURE;
THE SWIFTSURE. (a)

Objection to registrar's report — Account book entries of receipts and disbursements — Admissibility in evidence.

In taking accounts between a mortgagor and a deceased mortgagee of a barge, an account book kept by the latter in his own handwriting containing entries of payments made to him by the mortgagor as well as disbursements made by him on account of the barge is admissible on behalf of the mortgagee's executors in evidence as containing entries against interest.

Taylor v. Witham (3 Ch. Div. 605) followed.

THIS was a motion by way of objection to the registrar's report, dated the 24th Feb. 1900.

The question arose as follows:

The plaintiffs were the executors of John Hudson, deceased, and brought the action to recover the sum of 200l. with interest at the rate of 6 per cent., due under a mortgage granted to the deceased of the barge Swiftsure, of which the defendants were the registered owners.

The defendants alleged in their defence that the whole of the sums due under the mortgage had been repaid to the deceased, and had been accepted by him in full satisfaction of any claims he had upon the defendants, whether under the mortgage or otherwise.

The defendant's also counter-claimed an account of the sums paid by them to the deceased, and a reconveyance of the barge to them by the plaintiffs.

By the third paragraph of their reply the plaintiffs pleaded that at the time the Swiftsure was mortgaged to the deceased it was agreed between him and the mortgagors that, in consideration of the deceased paying for all the repairs, disbursements, and outgoings in connection with the said barge, the deceased should receive 5 per cent. of her gross earnings. In pursuance of this agreement the deceased and his executors from time to time expended large sums on and in connection with the said barge, and in respect of his share of the earnings received from time to time certain sums. It was also alleged that any sums paid by the defendants to the deceased were in respect of the earnings of the barge, and not otherwise.

The matter was referred to the registrar of the Admiralty Court for him to report upon. At the hearing before the registrar it was sought on behalf of the plaintiffs to adduce in evidence the account book of the deceased John Hudson. In this book, which was in the handwriting of the deceased, were entries showing that various sums had from time to time been received by the deceased from the defendants on account of the barge. Other entries showed that the deceased had made disbursements on account of repairs to and the upkeep of the barge.

The learned registrar declined to admit this book in evidence.

The plaintiffs appealed against his refusal.

Kilburn, for the plaintiffs, contended that the account book was admissible in evidence as containing entries against interest. He cited in support of his contention the cases of Wilkinson v. Sterne (9 Mod. Rep. 427) and Taylor v. Witham (3 Ch. Div. 605), and distinguished the present case from that of Doe v. Bevis (18 L. J. 128, C. P.) upon the ground that in the latter case there were practically two accounts unconnected with each other.

Nelson, contra, submitted that the account book could not be received in evidence, either as a book kept in the ordinary course of business or as containing entries against interest. He relied upon Doe v. Bevis (ubi sup.), and pointed out that that case had not been cited to the learned judge who decided Taylor v. Witham (ubi sup.).

The PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is as to the admissibility of evidence which the learned registrar thought right to reject. It is a claim by the executors of a man named Hudson on account of a mortgage on a barge, and the defence is that various sums have been paid by the defendant, making altogether a greater amount than the mortgage debt, and therefore the mortgage is discharged. I do not think it necessary to go further into the question as to whether the mortgage debt has been paid than to say that it was sought to be proved by the plaintiffs that although these sums, or certain sums, of money had been received by Hudson, these sums were received or applied by him—and properly so applied—in payment, not of the mortgage, but of certain expenses which he was under in connection with the barge. The whole of that turns upon the entries in his books, and the first question is whether the books ought to be admitted. Then, of course, comes the subsequent question as to what, if admitted in evidence, they prove, and one has to look at them for the purpose of seeing exactly what they prove. Are these books evidence? They are kept in the handwriting of Hudson. That seems to have been clearly

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE STELLA (No. 2).

[ADM.]

proved, and I think myself, although I do not desire to base my decision entirely upon the point, that they were kept in the ordinary course of business. There is no suggestion that they are "cooked," or fraudulent, and therefore it seems to me, prima facie at any rate, that they may be said to have been kept in the ordinary course of business, and kept at the time; that is to say, kept from day to day. But the question is whether they are admissible in evidence. Of course, if they cannot be put in as books kept in the course of business, they are only admissible because the entries are against Mr. Hudson's interests. Now, what are the interests? I think it would take time to make out what the books show, but at a glance one can see that they are books which show accounts with regard to the Swiftsure, and the receipt of money from time to time. Therefore every one of those items is clearly against interest.

Various cases have been cited to me, and I do not think they are opposed to the general principle that entries in a book which are against interest are admissible. I think the cases go further, because they show that if there are other items in the book closely connected and related to receipts which are against interest, then we may look not only at the entries which are against interest, but at the accounts of which they form an integral and essential part. The decision, reported in the Modern Reports, of Lord Hardwicke appears to me to go all that way. I think Lord Hardwicke must in that case have regarded the book as kept in the ordinary course of business. If so, the report is not so much to show that the book was admissible, but to show for what purpose it was admissible. The decision in Doe v. Bevis (ubi sup.) appears to me only to show that the items which were sought to be proved were not so necessarily connected with the items admissible that the whole were admissible. The items which were rejected were not in any sense against interest or connected with such items. Taylor v. Witham (ubi sup.) appears to me to be very strong to show that the items of this book are all admissible. The Master of the Rolls, who was not sitting in the Court of Appeal but in a court of first instance, held that the whole of the entries in that case were admissible. It is not very easy to follow exactly the line of reasoning, but the decision is quite clear—namely, that the whole of the entries were hanging together; and that as the items against interest were clearly admissible, the entries which were connected with them were admissible also. Looking at this book, it appears to me that it is clearly against interest, because it says in fact this: "I have paid on behalf of the owner of the barge a large number of items, making up a considerable sum of money, for repairs to the barge, and I admit that as against that I have received a considerable number of payments." The whole entry is clearly an entry against interest, because it is an admission that he has been paid certain sums on account of payments which he has made—to that extent it is against interest. Clearly the receipt of money is against interest, because it admits payment of a sum which otherwise would be due to him. It seems to me also that I can see clearly from the book itself that the items are so closely connected together that the whole of the book is admissible. In the circumstances what ought to be done? I do not say what the effect of the book carefully looked into is, but you have a statement, more or less complete, by Bartlett, that he paid various sums of money to Hudson, and that he allocated them to the payment of the mortgage debt. I cannot quite gather that from the evidence of the shorthand writer's notes, and inasmuch as the sums were not paid direct, there may be some doubt whether there was really any allocation by Bartlett. On the whole, I think the best course is for the matter to go back to the registrar, with an intimation that these books should be received in evidence, and the proper deductions drawn from them. What the effect will be appears to be a matter for his consideration.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Indermaur and Brown, agents for George Robinson, Strood.

Solicitors for the defendants, Farlow and Jackson.

March 19 and 28, 1900.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE STELLA (No. 2.) (a)

Objection to registrar's report—Wreck—Limitation of liability—Free pass—Loss of life—Loss of property—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 50B—Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), s. 7—Railway Clauses Act 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 92), s. 31—Regulation of Railways Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119), ss. 14, 16—Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25).

A husband and wife were travelling on the defendants' steamship with a free pass. The steamship was wrecked by the negligence of her master and crew, and the husband was drowned, and both his and his wife's luggage was lost. Upon the free pass was printed a condition exonerating the defendants from "any injury, delay, loss, or damage, however caused." The defendants obtained a decree of limitation of liability, and paid the limit of their liability into court.

The wife and children brought a claim under Lord Campbell's Act for the loss of their husband and father. The registrar dismissed the claims, holding that the condition upon the free pass precluded recovery.

On appeal to the court:

Held (affirming the registrar), that the condition covered negligence, and was applicable both to sea and land transit.

Held, further, that a claim by the wife for the loss of her property, and, as his personal representative, for the loss of her husband's property, was likewise barred by the condition; and that, in the circumstances, no statute prevented the defendant railway company relieving themselves from liability for negligence.

Sec. 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1868, which provides that any conditions in through booking contracts exempting a railway company from liability for loss or damage shall not have effect unless they are published in a conspicuous manner in the company's office, has no application to a case where a passenger is travelling with a free pass.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE STELLA (No. 2).

[ADM.]

THIS was a motion by way of appeal from a decision of the registrar of the Admiralty Court.

The action arose out of the loss of the steamship Stella, the property of the London and South-Western Railway Company, which on the 30th March 1899 ran aground on the Black Rock, near the Casquets, in the Channel Islands, when she and many lives were lost.

Among the passengers on board the Stella were a Mr. and Mrs. Le Mare.

Mr. Le Mare was an official in the employ of the London and North-Western Railway Company, and as such had obtained a free pass from the London and South-Western Railway Company for himself and his wife for the journey from London to Jersey.

Mr. Le Mare was drowned, and, though Mrs. Le Mare was saved, both her own and her husband's luggage was lost.

On the 24th July 1899 Bucknill, J. made a decree limiting the liability of the owners of the Stella to a sum equal to 15*l.* per ton of her tonnage ascertained according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Such sum, amounting to 15,404*l.* 8*s.*, was paid by the defendants into court.

Among the claims put forward against this fund were claims by Mrs. Le Mare and her four children, under Lord Campbell's Act, for the loss they had sustained by the death of their husband and father.

Mrs. Le Mare also claimed for the loss of her luggage, and, as his personal representative, for the loss of her husband's luggage.

On the face of the free pass under which Mr. and Mrs. Le Mare were travelling were the words "for conditions, see back"; and on the back there appeared the following:

This free pass is granted on the following conditions:—Condition 2. That it shall be taken as evidence of an agreement that the company are relieved from all responsibility for any injury, delay, loss, or damage, however caused, that may be sustained by the person or persons using this pass.

The registrar held that Mrs. Le Mare and her children were debarred from claiming under Lord Campbell's Act by the wording of the above condition.

The claimants appealed from this decision, and by consent the question of Mrs. Le Mare's right to recover in respect of the loss of her own and her husband's luggage was also dealt with at the hearing of the motion.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1894:

Sect. 503.—(1) The owners of a ship British or foreign shall not, where all or any of the following occurrences take place without their actual fault or privity (that is to say): (a) Where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person being carried in the ship; (b) where any damage or loss is caused to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board the ship; be liable in damages beyond the following amounts (that is to say): (i) In respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together with loss of or damage to vessels, goods, merchandise, or other things, an aggregate amount not exceeding fifteen pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage; and (ii) in respect of loss of, or damage to, vessels, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury or not, an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage.

By the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), s. 7 (so far as is material):

Every such company as aforesaid shall be liable for the loss of or for injury done to . . . any articles, goods, or things, in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of such company or its servants, notwithstanding any notice, condition, or declaration made and given by such company contrary thereto, or in anywise limiting such liability; every such notice, condition, or declaration being hereby declared to be null and void: Provided always that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the said companies from making such conditions with respect to the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of any of the said . . . articles, goods, or things as shall be adjudged by the court or judge before whom any question relating thereto shall be tried to be just and reasonable.

By the Railway Clauses Act 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 12), s. 31:

The provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854, so far as the same are applicable, shall extend to steam vessels, and to the traffic carried on thereby.

By the Regulation of Railways Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119), s. 14:

Where a company by through booking contracts to carry any . . . luggage or goods from place to place partly by railway and partly by sea . . . a condition exempting the company from liability from any loss or damage which may arise during the carriage of such . . . luggage or goods by sea from . . . accidents of . . . navigation of whatever nature and kind soever, shall, if published in a conspicuous manner in the office where such through booking is effected and if printed in a legible manner upon the receipt or freight note which the company gives for such . . . luggage or goods, be valid as part of the contract between the consignor of such . . . luggage or goods in the same manner as if the company had signed and delivered to the consignor a bill of lading containing such condition.

Tindal Atkinson for the appellants.—As regards the claim under Lord Campbell's Act, the conditions of the free pass were not binding on Mr. Le Mare with respect to the sea portion of the journey. The exemption does not cover negligence. As regards the claim for the lost luggage, the conditions of the free pass cannot be allowed to exonerate the company from liability in respect of goods carried by them, having regard to the provisions of sect. 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854, as extended by sect. 16 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1868, and to the provisions of sect. 31 of the Railway Clauses Act 1863. Sect. 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1868 also applies to this contract, which was one of through booking. Under the last-mentioned section it is necessary, in order to exempt the company from liability, that the conditions of the contract should be published in a conspicuous manner in the office where the through booking was effected, and be printed in a legible manner on the receipt or freight note given by the company for the goods. These requirements were not complied with. He referred to the following cases:

Henderson v. Stevenson, 32 L. T. Rep. 709; 2 H. L. Scotch, 470;

Watkins v. Rymill, 48 L. T. Rep. 426; 10 Q. B. Div. 178;

Zunz v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 20 L. T. Rep. 873; 4 Q. B. Div. 539;

[ADM.]

THE STELLA (No. 2).

[ADM.]

Harris v. Great Western Railway Company, 34 L. T. Rep. 647; 1 Q. B. Div. 515;
Cutler v. North London Railway Company, 56 L. T. Rep. 639; 14 Q. B. Div. 64;
Great Western Railway Company v. Bunch, 58 L. T. Rep. 128; 13 App. Cas. 31;
Marshall v. York and Newcastle Railway Company, 11 C. B. 655;
Great Northern Railway Company v. Shepherd, 8 Ex. 30.

Acland for the London and South-Western Railway Company contra.—The conditions of the free pass are binding as to the claim under Lord Campbell's Act. Here there was no contract of carriage. This pass was merely a licence to Mr. Le Mare to be upon the company's premises and conveyances on certain conditions. The conditions are equally binding with regard to the claims for lost luggage. The extension of the Carriers Act to steamboats by sect. 16 of the Regulation of Railways Act is repealed by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1888. He referred to Bergheim v. Great Eastern Railway Company, 38 L. T. Rep. 160; 3 C. P. Div. 221.

Tindal Atkinson, in reply, cited

Gallin v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 32 L. T. Rep. 550; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 212.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 28.—BARNES, J.—This was a motion that the decision of the registrar, deciding that Mrs. Le Mare and her children had not any claim against a certain fund in court in this case, should be reversed, and that the claimants should be allowed to come forward and prove their claim in this limitation suit. The husband of the lady and the father of the children was a passenger by the vessel, the Stella, which was lost some time ago under circumstances which appear in this case, and he was unfortunately drowned in the accident, together with other persons. A number of claims have been made in this limitation suit, and amongst them are claims put forward by the widow and children, under Lord Campbell's Act, relating to the loss of this gentleman. The registrar disallowed the claim on behalf of the widow and children, on the ground that the deceased gentleman was travelling under conditions which really amount to this, that he was travelling at his own risk. Two grounds are put forward in support of the claim, so far as it was made by the widow and children. The first was that the plaintiffs, the persons limiting their liability, were responsible for negligence—the loss having occurred, as I understand, through negligence—because the ticket or pass with which he was travelling was not binding, so far as the conditions exempting the plaintiffs from negligence were concerned, upon the traveller at all; and, secondly, that even if they were binding, that they were not binding or applicable so far as related to the sea transit. I think it was conceded that the widow and children could only claim for loss, under Lord Campbell's Act, where the passenger himself, if alive, could claim for injury done to himself. I think there is no dispute about that. But the two points taken have to be considered. With regard to the first one, it appears that the gentleman in question was travelling with a free pass. The document which was given to him is headed "free pass," and the terms on which it was granted appear on the back of it. It was granted from London to Jersey, and at the foot of it there is, in print, "for conditions, see back." On the back the conditions are set out. It says: [His Lordship read the condition.] Now, Mr. Le Mare was chief officer and secretary of the Stores Department of the London and North-Western Railway Company, and according to the affidavit of the claimant he had obtained a free pass, similar accommodation being given by the London and North-Western Railway Company to the employés of other railway companies. That is how he and his wife came to have free passes on the journey which they had undertaken.

The argument on this first point for the applicants was that the conditions really did not form part of any agreement entered into between the company and the traveller. On the other hand it was said that this was a mere licence to the passenger to travel on the conditions which are set out on the back of the pass. I do not think it really makes very much difference in the case, whether it is termed a licence, pass, or a contract to carry upon the terms mentioned, because, in my view, if the terms which are on the back are terms which the passenger agreed to, then those terms, if applicable, do exclude such a loss as that which happened in this case. Now, it seems to me that it really is a free pass granted on certain conditions, whether it is termed a mere licence or a contract to carry upon those conditions, and although a number of cases were cited, connected with this class of subject, all those cases were very fully considered in the judgment which was delivered in the case of Watkins v. Rymill (ubi sup.), and it seems to me quite clear that this pass bears upon the face of it a stipulation that it is issued upon certain conditions which are to be found on the back of it, and especially as it was given to a gentleman who was fully cognisant of such matters as free passes over different railways, that the terms upon which he was carried were the terms which are found on that free pass and which are set out on the back. My conclusion of fact with regard to the first point is that this gentleman was carried upon the terms which are mentioned on that free pass. The second point is that those terms are only applicable to land transit, and were not applicable to the loss which happened in consequence of the boat on which this gentleman was being lost. The point made was that all the conditions are only conditions which apply to transit on railways. I am not able to take that view, because it seems to me that although it is possible to read some of those conditions in that way, yet the second condition, which is quite general in its terms, is applicable to the whole of the transit from London to Jersey, which was the transit mentioned on the face of the ticket, and also that the whole transit is upon the conditions upon the back so far as they are applicable. Therefore, it appears to me that these terms apply all through, so far as they can apply, and the second condition is clearly one which exonerates the company from liability for the accident in this case. That would be sufficient to dispose of the appeal, which was only against the decision dealing with the claim by the widow and children.

But a further point has been taken by Mr. Atkinson on behalf of the widow, Mrs. Le Mare—namely, that she, as the administratrix of her husband and also in respect of her own rights, had a claim for loss of luggage belonging to her husband and herself. Although that was not really part of the matter disposed of by the registrar, it was discussed and considered by counsel on both sides and therefore I have to dispose of it. Now it appears to me that, for the reasons which I have already given in relation to the claim under Lord Campbell's Act, the ticket or pass is equally binding so far as it relates to any claim for loss of or injury to the luggage which either of them had put under the charge of the company. That would therefore dispose of the case so far as the luggage is concerned, unless there is some statute preventing the application of these conditions to the contract to carry the luggage. The precise particulars of the luggage I do not think were very fully gone into. It was stated that there was luggage in the ordinary mode of transit, sent off with the passengers, and there was a bag containing jewellery which, when on board, the lady placed in the charge of the stewardess. I do not think there is any difference between the claim so far as it relates to the luggage delivered in the ordinary way at starting and so far as it relates to the bag, because both were, I think, in the custody of the company for carriage; but, as I have said, it seems to me that the ticket or pass is binding with regard to the loss in respect of those articles, unless the operations of the conditions is controlled by the effect of some statute. The point made with regard to that was that either under the Carriers Act 1854 or under the Railways Regulation Act 1868 the contract was controlled and could not affect this liability because of the provisions of either one or other of those Acts. I have felt some difficulty in disposing of this part of the case, because I do not think counsel were quite prepared to discuss these Acts with any great nicety, especially as the point was freshly made by Mr. Atkinson. But Mr. Acland has been good enough to send me the Acts relating to the London and South-Western Railway Company which bear upon this case. Now, first of all it was said that the Carriers Act of 1854 controlled the contract. That point was based upon the 7th section of the Act, the terms of which I need not go into. If that section applied there would be, of course, liability upon the company in this case. But that Act only applies to land carriage. Then it was said that it was extended to steamers belonging to railway companies by subsequent legislation, and there is no doubt that it was extended by the 31st section of the Railway Clauses Act 1863 to steam vessels and the traffic carried thereby. But that Act was what is termed a Clauses Act, and the 30th section shows that it applies to railways whose special Acts are passed after that time, and which incorporated the part of the Act which deals with this subject. I think sect. 31 is applicable to steam vessels referred to in the fourth part of the Act. Now, the London and South-Western Acts were before that date. The first is the Act of 1848, and the next is the Act of 1860, so that both those Acts were passed before the Act of 1863. It follows that they do not and could not incorporate the provisions of the fourth part of the Clauses Act of 1863. Then came the later Act of 1868—the Regulation of Railways Act—and the 16th section of that Act extended the Act of 1854 to all railway steamers; but there came a later Act in 1888, the 59th section of which repealed that part of the 16th section of the Act of 1868 which extended the provisions of the Act of 1854 to all railway steamers. Therefore, it seems to me, upon such consideration of these Acts as I have been able to give, that the Act of 1854, so far as the London and South-Western Railway Company is concerned, does not apply. But that does not quite exhaust the case, because it was further said that the 14th section of the Regulation of Railways Act 1868 was applicable to this contract, and prevented the company from taking advantage of the exonerating clause of the free pass. That is a section which deals with the case of a company agreeing, by through-booking contracts, to carry any animal, luggage, &c., partly by railway and partly by sea, &c., and provides that any conditions exempting the company from liability for loss and damage shall not have effect unless they have been published in a conspicuous manner in the company's office, and printed in a legible manner on their documents. But my view is that that section does not apply to such a case as the present. It really, I think, was intended to apply to through-booking contracts made in the ordinary course of business, and I cannot in its terms find anything preventing the railway company from making such conditions as in the present case. For these reasons it appears to me that the appeal must be dismissed with costs, and the claims put forward excluded from the fund which has to be distributed in this case.

ADM.] Re ARBIT. BETWEEN GOODBODY AND CO. AND BALFOUR, WILLIAMSON, AND CO. [APP.]

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Willson and Norman.

Solicitors for the respondents, Clarksons, Greenwell, and Co.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Nov. 27 and 28, 1899.

(Before SMITH, COLLINS, and WILLIAMS, L.JJ.)
Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN GOODBODY AND CO. AND BALFOUR, WILLIAMSON, AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Bill of lading—Excepted port—Port of Manchester—Meaning—Immaterial addition.

A contract for the sale of a cargo of wheat per Vaudara provided that the vessel should discharge "at any safe port in the United Kingdom." The vessel was chartered by the sellers to discharge at "any safe port in the United Kingdom (Manchester excepted)," and the bill of lading was in the same terms.

By the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885, and by the Customs regulations, the port of Manchester included the whole of the ship canal, but in the ordinary commercial meaning it included only Manchester and the waters adjacent thereto.

In the wider meaning Manchester was, but in the more limited meaning was not, a safe port for the Vaudara.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[APP.] Re ARBIT. BETWEEN GOODBODY AND CO. AND BALFOUR, WILLIAMSON, AND CO. [APP.]

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that Manchester, within the meaning of the charter-party and bill of lading, was not a safe port for the Vanduara, and that therefore the addition of the words "Manchester excepted" in the bill of lading and charter-party was not a material alteration of the contract of sale so as to release the buyers from taking the documents.

THIS was an appeal by Goodbody and Co from the decision of the Divisional Court (Bruce and Ridley, JJ.) upon a special case stated by arbitrators.

By a contract of sale, dated the 29th Dec. 1896, Balfour, Williamson, and Co. sold to Goodbody and Co. a cargo of wheat per the vessel Vanduara, sailed or about to sail.

The contract contained the following clause :

Shipped in good condition per Vanduara, first-class iron vessel, classed not lower than A1 English . . . from Oregon and [or] Washington, sailed or about to sail, as per bill or bills of lading, dated or to be dated accordingly, about 13,000 units, or whatever quantity vessel may carry, at the price of 33s. 10½d. per 500lb. gross, including freight and insurance, to any safe port in United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or to Havre or to Dunkirk or to Antwerp, calling at Queenstown, Falmouth, or Plymouth for orders as per charter-party, vessel to discharge afloat.

The Vanduara had been chartered, under a charter-party dated the 22nd Sept. 1896, by Balfour, Williamson, and Co. for a voyage from Portland, Oregon, to Queenstown, Ireland, or Falmouth, for orders to discharge at a safe port in the United Kingdom (Manchester excepted), or on the continent between Havre and Hamburg, both inclusive.

The bills of lading for the cargo were also for a safe port in the United Kingdom (Manchester excepted), or on the continent between Havre and Hamburg, both inclusive; they were dated the 17th Dec. 1896.

The Vanduara when loaded with the said cargo would have been unable to go up the Manchester Ship Canal to the Manchester Docks because it would be necessary to dismantle the ship to get her under Runcorn Bridge.

Runcorn is about twenty-four miles from Manchester, and about twelve miles from the entrance to the canal.

On the 7th Jan. 1897 Balfour, Williamson, and Co. rendered a provisional invoice for the cargo.

On the 1st March the agents of Goodbody and Co. inspected the documents, and on the 6th March saw Balfour, Williamson, and Co., and took exception to the fact that the charter-party and bills of lading excepted Manchester, whereas the contract for sale provided for any safe port in the United Kingdom, and they stated that the buyers declined to take up the documents.

The due date of payment was the 12th March 1897.

Some time between the 6th March and the 11th March, Balfour, Williamson, and Co., by a payment of 30l. and a promise to pay an additional 30l. if the ship actually went to Manchester, obtained the consent of the shipowners to delete the words "Manchester excepted" from the charter-party and bills of lading. Those words were accordingly deleted by the agents for the shipowners, and the erasures were duly initialled.

On the 11th March the documents so altered were tendered to Goodbody and Co., and objection was taken to the erasures.

The matter was then referred to arbitration.

At the arbitration it was contended that the buyers were justified in refusing to take up the documents both (a) before and (b) after the erasures. Before the erasures, because the cargo tendered did not fulfil the terms of the contract in that the vessel was excluded from Manchester which it was alleged was a safe port. After the erasures, because no alteration ought to be made in documents after signature which may affect the rights of the parties interested; because the property in the cargo was in the buyers, subject only to the right of rejection if the documents were not in order, and therefore the buyers' consent was necessary before any alteration could be made in the documents; because the captain of the ship was a party to the bills of lading, and his consent also must be necessary; because the erasures formed a material alteration of the charter-party and the bills of lading.

On behalf of the sellers it was contended that, inasmuch as the contract for sale was for a safe port for the Vanduara, and as Manchester was not a safe port for her, the words "Manchester excepted" were implied in the contract, and therefore the documents as originally tendered were in conformity with the contract; that the subsequent erasures remedied any defect in the documents before the due date for payment and taking up the documents; that the erasures did not constitute a material alteration.

Subject to the opinion of the court, the arbitrators found on these facts that the shipping documents tendered by the sellers fulfilled the obligation of the sellers under the contract in all respects, and must be accepted by the buyers.

When the special case came before the Divisional Court for argument it was referred back to the arbitrators to find and state all material facts upon the question whether a shipowner, under the charter-party and bill of lading with the words "Manchester excepted" therein, could have been compelled to proceed to Runcorn Lay-by and there discharge; and, in particular, upon the question whether, and to what extent, the words "Manchester excepted" and "Port of Manchester" in such documents have any recognised meaning among shipowners, shippers, or charterers, as including or not including Runcorn Lay-by.

The arbitrators thereupon found the following facts :

Runcorn was, prior to the construction of the Manchester Ship Canal, a port on the river Mersey available for vessels not exceeding 500 tons or thereabouts; and, prior to the construction of the canal, there was no port of Manchester.

Since the construction of the canal Runcorn is for commercial purposes treated as a separate port.

Runcorn Lay-by consists of an embayment which was made by the Manchester Ship Canal Company in the canal between the town of Runcorn and the old river bed, and affords capabilities for vessels up to 5000 tons to discharge cargo there.

APP.] Re ARBIT. BETWEEN GOODBODY AND CO. AND BALFOUR, WILLIAMSON, AND CO. [APP.

Runcorn Lay-bye is part of the present port of Runcorn, which is the last port on the canal below bridges.

Vessels exceeding 500 tons or thereabouts can only reach Runcorn Lay-bye by entering the canal at Eastham Locks.

Various provisions are inserted in charter-parties with reference to the exclusion of Manchester and the canal, some charter-parties having the words "Manchester excepted," but more commonly the words inserted are "Manchester Ship Canal excepted," or "Manchester and all places on the canal excepted," or "Manchester Canal above bridges excepted."

A ship not exceeding 5000 tons, where the words "Manchester excepted" occurred in the charter-party or bill of lading, could, in the opinion of commercial men, be compelled to proceed to Runcorn Lay-bye and there discharge.

The evidence of the Custom House authorities was to the effect that, for the purposes of customs, Runcorn and Runcorn Lay-bye are treated as a part of the port of Manchester; but the evidence of the other witnesses was to the effect that, in a commercial sense, the interpretation placed upon the words "Manchester excepted" introduced into shipping documents is that Manchester alone is excepted, and not Runcorn Lay-bye.

In a commercial sense the words "Port of Manchester" introduced into shipping documents include Manchester and the waters adjacent thereto only, and do not include Runcorn Lay-bye.

The Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. clxxxviii.) provides:—

SECT. 3. From and after the completion and opening for traffic of the canal by this Act authorised the said canal and so much of the navigable waters of the rivers Mersey and Irwell as lie between Hunt's Bank in the parish and township of Manchester and the limit of the port of Liverpool at Warrington and all channels, canals, cuts, docks, and works of the company within those limits shall be and are hereby constituted the harbour and port of Manchester, and the company shall be harbour authority of that harbour and port, but nothing in this Act shall extend to prejudice or derogate from the rights, interests, privileges, and jurisdiction of the Mersey Commissioners, or to prohibit, alter, or diminish any powers, authority, and jurisdiction of the said commissioners, their officers and servants, provided always that such harbour and port shall not by virtue of this Act be deemed a port for customs purposes, nor shall anything in this Act contained abridge or affect in any way the powers of the Commissioners of the Treasury to appoint a port of Manchester under the Customs Consolidation Act 1876 with such limits as they may think fit, nor abridge or affect any powers whatsoever conferred by the said Act, provided also that nothing in this Act shall be deemed to affect any of the rights or privileges of the port or harbour of Liverpool or of the port or harbour of Runcorn or any of the rights or privileges of the station at the mouth of the Mersey Canal known as Ellesmere Port.

By a Treasury Warrant of the 18th Dec. 1893, made under the Customs Consolidation Act 1876, the port of Manchester was made to include the Manchester Ship Canal from the entrance thereof at Eastham to Hunt's Bank in the city and parish of Manchester; and by the same Treasury Warrant it was declared that Runcorn should be no longer a port.

The Divisional Court (Bruce and Ridley, JJ.) decided in favour of Balfour, Williamson, and Co., and affirmed the award made in their favour: (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 503; 80 L. T. Rep. 188). Goodbody and Co. appealed.

E. Bray, Q.C. and Edward Bray for the appellants.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Danckwerts for the respondents.

SMITH, L.J.—I think that this appeal must be dismissed. It is contended by the respondents that the words "Manchester excepted" in the charter-party and bill of lading are immaterial, because the appellants were only entitled to have the wheat which they bought delivered at a safe port, and Manchester was not a "safe" port for the vessel in question. The appellants contended on the contrary that the port of Manchester includes Runcorn Lay-bye and that the vessel could have gone there safely although she could not have gone safely to Manchester. It was clearly shown that Manchester itself was not a safe port for this vessel, because it is found by the award of the arbitrators that it would have been necessary to dismantle the ship in order to enable her to pass under Runcorn bridge, which is the first bridge on the way up to Manchester. The arbitrators have found in their further award that Runcorn Lay-bye is not part of the port of Manchester in a commercial sense. It is indeed true that, for the purposes of the customs, Runcorn and Runcorn Lay-bye are treated as forming part of the port of Manchester, but the authorities show that, in considering what constitutes a particular port in a commercial sense, the limits of the port for the purposes of customs may be disregarded: Price v. Livingstone (47 L. T. Rep. 629; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 13; 9 Q. B. Div. 679); Garston Sailing Ship Company v. Hickie (53 L. T. Rep. 795; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 499; 15 Q. B. Div. 580); Hunter v. Northern Marine Insurance Company (13 App. Cas. 717). In the case of Garston Sailing Ship Company v. Hickie (ubi sup.) Lord Esher, M.R. said: "The word 'port' in a charter-party does not necessarily mean an Act of Parliament pilotage port, or, which is the better word, pilotage district. Therefore, when you are trying to define the port with regard to which persons who enter into a charter-party are contracting, you endeavour to find words which will shut out those things which you know they do not intend. What do they intend? They intend the port as commonly understood by all persons who are using it as a port—i.e., for sailing to or from it with goods and merchandise. What persons are they? Shippers of goods, charterers of vessels, and shipowners. What do all these persons in their ordinary language mean by a port? What they understand by the word is, port in the ordinary sense, in its business sense, in its popular sense—i.e., the popular sense of such persons. It is also the port in its commercial sense, for, with them, business means commercial business." Upon the facts as found in this case, I am clearly of opinion that it was quite immaterial whether the words "Manchester excepted" were in the charter-party and bill of lading or not. What, then, is the effect of an immaterial alteration in a written contract? Upon that point I will refer to 1 Smith's Leading Cases, p. 783, 10th edit., where, in the notes to Master v. Miller it is thus stated: "The addition of anything perfectly immaterial does not affect the liability of the parties." For that proposition, Catton v. Simpson (8 A. & E. 136) and Aldous v. Cornwell (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 573) are referred to as authorities; in the latter case, in an action by the payee against the maker of a promissory note, the addition of the words "on demand" was held to be immaterial. I am of opinion, therefore, that the decision of the Divisional Court was right, and that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Were it not for the facts which have been found by the arbitrators, there would be much strength in the objection of the buyers to the shipping documents in this case, for, by the terms of the contract the vessel is to discharge the cargo at any "safe" port and there are tendered to the buyers shipping documents, which, upon their face, seem to say that Manchester is a safe port, but is excepted. If Manchester were in fact a safe port, that stipulation would certainly alter very materially the contract which was made between the parties. If, however, Manchester was not a safe port for the ship in question, then the addition of the words "Manchester excepted" did not alter the contract between the buyers and the sellers. It is necessary, therefore, to consider whether Manchester was or was not a safe port, and I think that there is no difficulty about that question as soon as the boundaries of the port of Manchester are ascertained. The real question, therefore, is what the parties intended by the expression "port of Manchester." Now the arbitrators have found that the expression "port of Manchester," as used in these documents, means Manchester and the waters adjacent thereto, but not Runcorn Laysby. It is not disputed that in that meaning Manchester was not a safe port for this vessel. It is clear, therefore, that the words "Manchester excepted" in the shipping documents introduced nothing into the contract between the parties which was not there before, and the addition of those words was quite immaterial. I agree, therefore, that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the view which I take of the facts of this case it is unnecessary for me to express an opinion as to the effect of the alteration of the shipping documents by erasing the words "Manchester excepted," if that had been a material alteration. I do not know that, even in that case, the buyers would have had a right to refuse the documents, seeing that the charterers and the shipowners both agreed to the alteration; and I do not know that the captain would not also be bound by such an alteration. It is not, however, necessary to decide those points. The real question is the contention of the sellers that it makes no difference whether the words "Manchester excepted" are in the shipping documents or not, because Manchester was not a safe port for this ship, and she was not bound to go there. That brings us to the question, what is the commercial meaning of the "port of Manchester." That question is a question of fact, and does not depend upon the practice of the customs authorities or anything of that kind, but upon considerations which are enumerated in Garston Sailing Ship Company v. Hickie (ubi sup.) by Bowen, L.J. Now, it is quite clear upon the findings of the arbitrators that, in a commercial sense, the port of Manchester does not extend beyond Runcorn Bridge, and it is not disputed that in that sense Manchester was not a safe port for this vessel. The addition of the words "Manchester excepted" in the shipping documents was, therefore, an immaterial alteration—that is, one which did not affect the contractual relations of the parties to the contract of sale. In the case of Aldous v. Cornwell (ubi sup.) it was held that the addition to a promissory note of the words "on demand," even if made by a party to the note, was immaterial, that alteration being one which only expressed the common law with regard to the note. It is desirable to carry the matter a step further and to show that an alteration, which does not import a rule of the common law into the document, but expresses something which is consistent with the terms of the document, is not a material alteration. I think that Sanderson v. Symonds (1 B. & B. 426) is an authority upon that point; in that case there was a policy of insurance upon a ship "at and from Liverpool to her port or ports, place or places, of discharge and loading in Africa, and during her stay there"; after the execution of the policy, the words "and trade" were inserted after the words "during her stay." The court there held that the alteration was immaterial, and did not avoid the policy; so, in the present case, there is an alteration made in the shipping document which does not at all affect the contractual obligations of the parties. Therefore it seems to me in this case that the buyers got all that which they were entitled to have when these shipping documents were tendered to them either with the words "Manchester excepted," or with those words erased. In either case their rights were the same. I agree therefore that the judgment of the Divisional Court was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed. Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellants, Tilleards.

Solicitors for the respondents, Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

Tuesday, May 15, 1900.

(Before SMITH, WILLIAMS, and ROMER, L.JJ. and NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.)

THE PHILADELPHIAN (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Anchor light—"Forward part of the vessel"—Art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

A vessel at anchor, 313ft. in length, which is exhibiting her forward light in the fore shroud of the starboard fore rigging, 72ft. abaft the stem, is carrying it "in the forward part of the vessel," in compliance with art. 11 of the Collision Regulations.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action from a decision of Bucknill, J., who held the defendants' steamship Philadelphian alone to blame for a collision with the plaintiffs' steamship Ella Sayer (81 L. T. Rep. 728; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 38; (1900) P. 43).

The collision occurred about 11 p.m. on the 10th Aug. 1899 in Quebec Harbour.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CT. OF APP.]

THE PHILADELPHIAN.

[CT. OF APP.]

The plaintiffs' case was that the Ella Sayer, a steamship of 2549 tons gross register and 313ft. in length, was lying at anchor in about mid-channel in Quebec Harbour, heading up stream. There was a light breeze from the N.E., the weather was fine and clear, and the tide ebb, of the force of about one and a half knots an hour. The Ella Sayer was exhibiting two riding lights, one forward on the starboard side on the foremost shroud of the fore rigging, 23ft. 6in. above the forecastle deck, 8ft. from the centre of the mast, and 72ft from the stem; and the other aft in the usual place. While so at anchor the Philadelphian, which was coming down river, collided with her.

The plaintiffs charged the Philadelphian with failure to keep a good look-out, neglect to keep out of the way, and with proceeding at an excessive rate of speed.

The defendants, in their defence, charged the plaintiffs with not keeping a good anchor watch, and with neglecting to exhibit any or proper anchor lights in accordance with art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

Art. 11 is as follows :

A vessel under 150ft. in length, when at anchor, shall carry forward, where it can best be seen, but at a height not exceeding 20ft. above the hull, a white light in a lantern so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light, visible all round the horizon at a distance of at least a mile. A vessel of 150ft. or upwards in length, when at anchor, shall carry in the forward part of the vessel, at a height of not less than 20ft. and not exceeding 40ft. above the hull, one such light, and at or near the stern of the vessel, and at such a height that it shall not be less than 15ft. lower than the forward light, another such light.

Bucknill, J. held that there was a bad look-out on board the Philadelphian, and that she was being navigated at an excessive rate of speed. In dealing with the position of the forward light of the Ella Sayer, he held that she was exhibiting a light, but it was not in the "forward" part, and that art. 11 of the regulations had not been complied with. He also held that in the circumstances the breach of the regulation could not possibly have contributed to the collision.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Butler Aspinall, Q.C. and Glynn with him) for the appellants.—The learned judge has held that there was an infringement of art. 11 on the part of those on the Ella Sayer, but was wrong in saying it could not possibly have caused the collision. The light must be right forward, not merely forward of the middle line of the vessel. It should be at or near the stem, just as the after light is to be at or near the stern. It must be put on the forestay. It is admitted the light could have been placed 20ft. further forward than it was. He referred to

The Rita and The Vera Cruz (unreported).

Laing, Q.C., Dawson Miller, and Roche, for the respondents, were not called upon.

SMITH, L.J.—We must consider this rule according to what it says. The Ella Sayer had a proper anchor light in the forward part of the vessel, and a proper anchor light in the after part of the vessel, and the question is whether that proper light in the forward part of the vessel, which was hung on the starboard forestay, was in a proper position. Bucknill, J. has held that it made no difference in this case, as if it had been forward in the right place the defendants would not have seen it, as they were not looking out. But he has put an interpretation upon the meaning of the word "forward" which is only surmise. The word "forward" is in contradistinction to the word "aft," with the addition that it must be where it can best be seen. The rule is as follows: [His Lordship read art. 11, and continued:] This vessel was more than 150ft. in length, and therefore the first part of the rule does not apply. She was 313ft. in length, and the forward light was therefore a quarter of her length from the stem. Now, it was not amidships. It was not in the after part of the ship. Where was it? In the forward part of the ship. It is clear it must have been. Then what does the rule say? 'A vessel 150ft. in length when at anchor shall carry'—Where? Not at or near the stem. No place is mentioned as regards the stem—" . . . in the forward part of the vessel." It is not for us to inquire whether that is a place where ships ordinarily carry anchor lights—whether they ordinarily carry it on the fore stay or not. That is not the point. The question is what is the construction of the rule, "Carry it in the forward part of the vessel at a height not less than 20ft. and not exceeding 40ft. above the hull." That light is to be carried in the forward part of the vessel. So much for the forward light. Now, where does the rule say that the after light is to be carried? It does not say that it is to be carried "in the after part of the ship," as, in the case of the forward light." But the rule says that the after light shall be carried "at or near the stern," and what the learned counsel for the Philadelphian argued was that you ought to read the first part of the second paragraph of the rule as "in the forward part of the vessel at or near the stem." How is any court to do that; what justification has any court for reading such words into the rule? It cannot be done. The framers of this rule for some reason have let the forward light be "in the forward part of the ship," and the after light is to be "at or near the stern," and it is not competent to read the two clauses as though they were, "Forward light to be at or near the stem, and the after light at or near the stern." It is said that we ought to read it like that because the meaning is that if the ship is over 150ft. the length of the ship might not otherwise be seen by an approaching vessel. If that is the meaning of it, the framers have not drawn the rule so as to carry out their intention. It seems to me, therefore, that in this case the light, being in the forward part of the starboard rigging, was, within the terms of this rule, in the forward part of the vessel. I wish just to refer to art. 2 of the rules about steam vessels under way. There it is stated that "a steam vessel when under way shall carry on, or in front of the foremast, or if a vessel without a foremast, then in the fore part of the vessel. . . ." Therefore it is to be seen that the rules are in the same category with regard to where the light is to be in the fore part of the vessel. I think, myself, without going into the second point which Bucknill, J. decided against the Philadelphian, that this hits the Philadelphian, and that the appellants do not make out that the Ella Sayer was guilty of a breach of the articles.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. Mr. Walton in his argument admitted that he was asking us to construe the words in reference to the forward light as if the words had been "at or near the stem of the vessel." It seems to me that that would be doing great violence to the words, and it is plain that under this rule, so far as the stern light is concerned, these words "at or near the stern," give you substantially a fixed point; but that the words as to the forward light do not limit you to a fixed point, but give you discretion.

ROMER, L.J. concurred.

Solicitors for the appellants, Thomas Cooper and Co., agents for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondents, Botterell and Roche.

Wednesday, May 16, 1900.

(Before SMITH, WILLIAMS, and ROMER, L.JJ. and NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.)

THE ARGO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Lights—Breach of art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 419, sub-s. (4).

Where a steamer collided with a sailing ship which after sunset was showing no lights, the court held that, although there was some look-out on the steamer, nevertheless the absence of the lights could not in the circumstances have possibly caused or contributed to the collision; and that therefore the sailing ship was not to be deemed to be in fault under sect. 419, sub-sect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action brought by the owners of the ketch Batavia against the owners of the steamship Argo.

The plaintiffs' case was that shortly before 4.35 p.m. on the 15th Nov. 1899 the Batavia, a ketch of 67 tons, whilst on a voyage from Victoria Dock, Hull, to Montrose with a cargo of oil cake, was being hauled and pushed out of the entrance to the Victoria Dock along the East Pier, in order that she might get into the river. The weather was fine and clear, and the tide about high water. Under these circumstances, when the Batavia had just cleared the end of the East Pier, the steamship Argo was seen from a quarter to half a mile distant broad on the port bow. The Argo continued to approach, and took no steps to keep clear of the Batavia, and shortly afterwards came into collision with her.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants with a bad look-out, with neglecting to keep out of the way of the Batavia, and with navigating across the lock entrance in disregard of warning signals from the dockhead.

The defendants' case was that the Argo, with her lights duly exhibited, was on a voyage from Grimsby to Hull with a general cargo, and was in Hull Roads. The weather was clear but dark, the tide first quarter ebb, of the force of about half a knot. The Argo was proceeding up the river to the northward of mid-channel, making five to six knots an hour through the water. In these circumstances the loom of the Batavia was seen about 300ft. off, and bearing about half a point on the starboard bow of the Argo. The helm was at once ported, the engines reversed full speed astern, and the anchor dropped, but the Batavia continued to come on across the bows of the Argo and a collision occurred.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs with not keeping a good look-out, with not exhibiting any lights, and with failing to comply with art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. It was proved that sunset was at 4.10, but that vessels without lights could be seen at a considerable distance.

At the trial before the President (Sir Francis Jeune), the learned judge found as a fact that the Batavia ought to have been exhibiting proper side lights, and that she had been guilty of a breach of art. 5. He then continued: "Then comes the question which is all-important in the case. Can it be said that the absence of the red light could by any possibility have contributed to the collision? The authorities to which I have been referred do not throw much light upon this matter, because they decide that under the peculiar circumstances of each of those cases there was not any breach of the rules that could have contributed to the collision. In the case of The Englishman (37 L. T. Rep. 412; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 506; 3 P. Div. 18) it was shown conclusively that, although the correct lights were not exhibited, inasmuch as the lights that were shown were not seen, it was clear that even if proper lights had been shown they would not have been seen either. Therefore the fact that they were not shown became wholly immaterial. In the same way in the case of The Breadalbane (46 L. T. Rep. 204; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 505; 7 P. Div. 186) it appeared that a vessel which should have shown a stern light failed to do so, but it seems also clear that she was showing a light through a pane of glass in the after part of the deckhouse—one of the binnacle lights—which would practically have the same effect as a stern light, and therefore it was held that she was guilty of a breach of the rule inasmuch as she was not showing such a light as the rule required, but that she was showing a light, and that therefore the Breadalbane was not to be exempted from the consequences of her negligence. In this case this is the practical question, whether by failing to show the red light the Batavia was not only guilty of a breach of the rules, but contributed, or can be supposed possibly to have contributed, to this collision? Or, in other words, if the red light had been exhibited, would the Argo have been in any better position than she was? This is a matter which appears to me to be a practical question, because it turns upon the consideration whether the Argo coming up would have seen, or would probably, or possibly, have seen, the red light under the circumstances of the case? Upon this point I have consulted carefully with the Trinity Masters, and they are clearly of opinion that, although the red light was not shown by the Batavia, that did not and could not be supposed to have contributed in any degree to the collision. In other words, that the Argo, so far as one could judge, would not have seen the red light any more than the Batavia herself.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CT. OF APP.]

THE ARGO.

[CT. OF APP.]

Now that conclusion, in which I agree, turns mainly upon this, that beyond all question on the Argo at that time—I do not like to put it quite so high as to say there was no look-out—but it is, I think, quite correct to say there was a very bad look-out indeed, and that at a time when a good look-out was, as the Elder Brethren advise me, imperative.”

The learned judge then dealt with the facts of the case, and came to the conclusion that the collision was due to the bad look-out kept on the Argo, and that, “inasmuch as there was not an efficient look-out on the Argo, even if the proper lights had been exhibited on the Batavia, she would have failed to see her in such a time that the collision could have been prevented. Under these circumstances I have to hold that although the Batavia has broken the rule, she cannot be regarded as having by any possibility contributed to the collision, and therefore the Argo must be held alone to blame.”

Sect. 419, sub-sect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) :

Where in a case of collision it is proved to the court before whom the case is tried that any of the collision regulations have been infringed, the ship by which the regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary.

Butler Aspinall, Q.C. (with him Batten), for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The learned judge ought to have held the Batavia in fault for not showing any lights. He was not entitled to hold that the breach of the article could not by any possibility have contributed to a collision :

The Duke of Buccleuch, 62 L. T. Rep. 94 ; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 471 ; (1891) A. C. 310.

The judge has not held that there was no look-out. If so, it is impossible to say that a look-out, however bad, might not have seen a light on the Batavia. To say that, because the look-out never saw the Batavia, the absence of lights could not have possibly caused this collision is to give no effect to the Act of Parliament. If a breach of a regulation might cause a collision, the court is not entitled to draw the conclusion from the particular facts of the case that the breach could not have caused the particular collision because it did not cause it. The court is bound by the Act of Parliament to say that the ship is to be deemed in fault. In The Duke of Buccleuch (ubi sup.) the court investigated the facts to ascertain whether the obscuration could have obscured the light to a look-out on the other ship ; but there is no case where, given a breach of the rules as to lights and given a look-out, however bad, the court has held the infringing ship free from blame. To escape the presumption of fault, a ship which infringes the regulations must show that it was physically impossible that the infringement could have caused the collision.

Robson, Q.C. and Stephens, for the plaintiffs, contra.—It is a question of fact in each case whether a breach of the collision regulations can possibly have caused the collision. In this case the learned judge has held as a fact upon the evidence that the breach of the article could not possibly have caused the collision. All the circumstances of each case must be considered.

Aspinall, Q.C. in reply.

SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from the learned President, in an action brought by a ketch called the Batavia, the steamship Argo having run into her on the afternoon of the 15th Nov. 1899, at about 4.45 or about half an hour after sunset. Now, the evidence seems to be all one way—namely, that although the lights were up on some of the vessels in the Humber, and lights were put up on the pier-head, the state of the atmosphere was such that objects could be seen at a long distance off, and what took place on one side of the Humber was perfectly visible to those on the other side, though the Humber is a mile and a half wide there. Now, the Argo was coming up, hugging the north shore of the Humber. The ketch had been in the Victoria Dock, and was coming out of the dock into the Humber, and just as the Argo was approaching the dock entrance the ketch was being warped out. We do not know what the height of the ketch out of the water was, but she had two masts, which showed over the dock pier. She was being warped out without lights, and it is agreed that inasmuch as it was after sunset she ought to have had lights. Not having a light upon her port bow, she is to be taken to be in fault within sect. 419, sub-sect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. The action was tried before the learned President and Trinity Masters, and they came to the conclusion that the Argo was alone to blame ; and that the Argo is to blame there cannot be a doubt, and indeed it is not disputed here that she was to blame. The Argo appeals against that finding, and says that the Batavia is also to blame because she says, and says truly, that a case has been made out that the Batavia committed a breach of the section I have referred to. That does not end this case, because it has been said in the House of Lords, in the case of The Duke of Buccleuch, that it may be that although there has been a breach of the rule, that breach of the rule does not necessarily condemn the ship which has committed that breach of the rule ; “that the infringement must be one having some possible connection with the collision ; or in other words, that the presumption of culpability may be met by proof that the infringement could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision,” and the burden of showing this lies on the party guilty of the infringement ; proof that the infringement did not, in fact, contribute to the collision being excluded. Therefore, that onus is undoubtedly upon the ketch, she having committed a breach of the rules, to prove that this infringement could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision ; and unless she proves that, she fails in getting rid of her responsibility, and the President ought to have condemned both ships. I will just read a passage from the judgment in the House of Lords, in which the case of The Fannie M. Carvill is cited. The House of Lords, although they differed as to the facts of the case (The Duke of Buccleuch), agreed that this was the true construction of this section of the Merchant Shipping Act. I will read from Lord Hannen’s judgment. He says : “Sir James Colville, who delivered the judgment of the court in the case of The Fannie M. Carvill, said : ‘Their Lordships therefore conceive that whatever be the true construction of the enactment in question, that which would take the case out of its operation by mere proof that the infringement of the regulations did not in point of fact contribute to the collision is inadmissible. They conceive that the Legislature intended at least to obviate the necessity for the determination of this question of fact upon conflicting evidence. He then proceeds to consider the possible constructions which may be put upon the enactment, and he rejects the one that an infringement of any of the regulations gives rise to an absolute presumption of culpability, and adopts the other, 'that the infringement must be one having some possible connection with the collision; or, in other words, that the presumption of culpability may be met by proof that the infringement could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision;' and he concludes by saying that this construction 'gives effect to the statute by excluding proof that the infringement which might have contributed to a collision did not in fact do so, and by throwing on the party guilty of the infringement the burthen of showing that it could not possibly have done so.' There can be no doubt that that is the law applicable, and unless the ketch satisfied the learned judge below that the infringement could not possibly have contributed to the accident, she must be held in fault.

Now, that being the law, the evidence is that this was, I will not say a light night, but it was light altogether. The President says it was dusk. Be it so, but it was such that anybody looking out and using his eyes could see ships at a considerable distance, and see a mile and a half across the Humber. I call that nearly daylight. It is true that lights had been put up, but I understand that lights have to be put up at sunset, which was half an hour before, and on some nights at sunset you can see all round. The evidence is overwhelming on this point, that it was light. Very well! The ketch was coming out of this dock entrance; and it is quite clear that no one on board the Argo saw her coming out. That is absolutely clear. The question at once arises, why didn't they? There was nothing in the light to prevent them. The question is, why could they not have seen the ketch if they had been looking at the pierhead where they ought to have been looking? They were shaving this pierhead close, and they were steaming ahead, and I think the evidence is clear that they were not looking at the place at which they ought to have been looking—namely, the dock gates, where the ketch was coming out. What happened was this: The ketch comes out—she is being warped out—and the length of time between when she ought to have been seen if anybody had been looking out and the time of the collision was forty-five seconds, and we are advised by our assessors that considering the propinquity in which the steamer was to the ketch when the ketch was coming out of the dock gates, the accident was nearly inevitable. On that ground it seems to me that the plaintiffs have shown that the non-exhibition of the red light by no possibility could have contributed to the accident; because, if there had been a red light, or no red light, considering the propinquity of the steamer to the ketch, we are advised, and we agree, that the collision was inevitable; and the steamer, going at the pace she was, did all she could to pull up, but yet ran into the ketch. The ketch has succeeded in meeting the onus which is upon her of showing that red light or no red light, owing to the action of the steamer the collision was inevitable. The learned President, in his judgment, says: "In those circumstances I am advised by the Elder Brethren that they have come clearly to the conclusion that the collision was due to the faulty look-out on the Argo; that if she had had a proper look-out there was no reason under the circumstances why she should not have seen the Batavia in sufficient time; but that inasmuch as she practically had no look-out at all, even if the red light had been exhibited on board the Batavia, the Argo would have failed to see it in time to avoid the collision." Our assessors advise us in the same way. The President continues: "Under these circumstances, I hold that although the Batavia has broken the rule, that breach has not and could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision, and therefore the Argo must be held alone to blame." In my judgment there is plenty of evidence to support that finding. But it is said that the learned judge has used some expressions which did not go far enough to exculpate the owners of the ketch. The President said: "This is a matter which appears to me to be a practical question, because it turns on the consideration whether the Argo, coming up, would have seen or could possibly or probably have seen, the red light under the circumstances of the case. The question is whether by failing to show a red light the Batavia was not only guilty of a breach of the rules, but that that breach of the rules contributed to the collision; or, in other words, if the red light had been exhibited, would the Argo have been in a better position than that in which she was? On this point I have carefully consulted the Trinity Masters, and they are clearly of opinion that although the red light was not shown by the Batavia, that fact could not reasonably or probably be supposed to have contributed in any degree to the collision; in other words, that the Argo, as far as may be judged, would not have seen the red light any more than she saw the Batavia herself." Then he goes on to say: "I don't like to put it so high as to say there was no look-out, but a very bad look-out indeed, at a time when a good look-out was imperative." In my judgment, he has found this, that although there were persons who called themselves the look-out, as a matter of fact the evidence satisfied him they were not looking at the place where they ought to have been looking—namely, where the ketch was coming out of the dock. If one of them had been looking, it is perfectly obvious that he would have seen the mast of the ketch over the pier, and the collision would have been avoided. For these reasons I think the judgment should be upheld and the appeal dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree so far as the rule of law is concerned; the case of Eastern Steamship Company Limited v. Owners of the Vandalia (65 L. T. Rep. 422; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 68; (1891) A. C. 310), in the House of Lords, puts it beyond any possibility of question. It is this, that the presumption of culpability arising from the terms of the Merchant Shipping Act, s. 419, may be met by proof that the infringement could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision, but the burden of showing this lies on the party guilty of the infringement; proof that the infringement did not, in fact, contribute to the collision being excluded.

CT. OF APP.]

THE ARGO.

[CT. OF APP.]

That is perfectly clear and definite, but I can see myself that this rule is very difficult of application, because it is quite plain that when one deals with the question of whether it has been shown that the infringement could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision, that that must mean, and does mean, having regard to the facts of the case. There is the example that Lord Esher gave in this very case when it was in the Court of Appeal, of a collision on a bright, clear, fogless day, and the breach of the regulations in respect of the fog-horn. It is obvious that in that case Lord Esher assumed that the judge having to try the case had satisfied his mind as to the surrounding circumstances—that is to say, that the day was a bright, cloudless day—before he arrived, or could have arrived, at the conclusion that there could be no possible connection between the infringement and the collision. So in each case you must arrive at the facts, and it is very plain that a great deal of evidence going to show what the surrounding facts are will also be material evidence to show that the infringement did not in fact contribute to the collision. The consequence is that it is not an easy matter in these cases to say whether the proper conclusion is that the facts were such that the infringement could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision, or whether the evidence only shows that the infringement did not in fact contribute to the collision. I want to say this—before dealing with the present case further—that it is quite plain that whichever question you are dealing with, you cannot get rid of the necessity of considering which way the balance of evidence turns the scale, in case there is a conflict of evidence; and Lord Esher, in his judgment in The Duke of Buccleuch, when that case was in the Court of Appeal, points out in the clearest way that that is so. He says if there is a dispute as to the way in which one ship is approaching another, and the evidence of the way in which she is approaching on the one side will make it clear that it could not have any effect on the collision, and the evidence on the other side will show that it could, then the court must try the question of how the ship was approaching. Under those circumstances, having regard to that observation, it seems to me perfectly clear that in order that the onus on the party infringing the rule may be satisfied it is not necessary that the evidence should be all one way. It was more or less hinted—I do not think it was actually said in terms—by Mr. Aspinall in his argument that the only case in which you could say it was impossible there could be no connection between the infringement and the collision was a case where it was physically impossible that there should have been such a connection, but really he himself departed from that contention in his argument. In The Duke of Buccleuch case the suggested impossibility no doubt was based upon the physical fact that a sail was intervening, which would have rendered it impossible, having regard to the direction in which the ship was going, for the approaching ship to have seen the light if it had been there. But it cannot be doubted that it would equally come within this rule as to impossibility if in point of fact there had been no look-out at all. It is impossible in such case that the infringement of the rule should be taken to be the cause of the collision. But it is impossible to stop at that point, and to say that if the look-out people, although there, had been proved to be in a condition incapable of observation—from illness or drunkenness, or anything else—they would not also come within the rule. If you cannot stop there, why is one to stop in a case where the facts show that although the men were there with eyes which should have looked out, their eyes were in point of fact all turned in another direction? It seems to me that if you show that although there was an opportunity for these people to look out if they had chosen, in fact there was no look-out kept, that that is sufficient. The learned judge seems to me to have come to that conclusion, and there seems to me to be a great deal of evidence to justify the conclusion at which he arrived; but I do not conceal from myself that when one is relying upon the fact that those placed to look-out did not in fact look-out, one is getting perilously near that which the House of Lords said must be excluded from the category of things which can rebut the statutory presumption; that is to say, proof that the infringement did not in fact contribute to the collision. But that is the conclusion which the learned judge has come to, and it does not seem to me that we ought to depart from the conclusion of the learned judge unless there is much more cogent reason than there is here to induce us to do so. He put to himself the law properly, and he has arrived at the conclusion that in fact the infringement could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision, and I do not think we ought to differ from his conclusion. But in this particular case really one is not driven to rely upon that finding of the learned judge only, and for this reason, that we have been advised by the assessors sitting with us that having regard to the very short space of time between the time when the ketch was first projected into the river and the moment of the actual collision, which was forty-five seconds only, it is impossible that the presence of any light could have made any difference whatsoever as to the happening of the accident. Upon this question of seamanship it is right we should be guided by their opinion.

ROMER, L.J.—I also think that this judgment should not be disturbed. As I understand the judgment, the learned President has come to the conclusion of fact that the breaking of the rule as to the lights by the Batavia did not and could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision, and that the look-out on the Argo—the so-called look-out—was such that even if the proper lights had been exhibited on the Batavia she would have failed to see her in such time that the collision could have been prevented. I have carefully attended to the evidence, and in the result I am not disposed to differ from the conclusion of fact at which the President has arrived. He had the inestimable advantage of seeing the witnesses. I say inestimable, because in such a case as this much must depend upon what weight is to be attached to the evidence given by individual witnesses.

SMITH, L.J.—I ought to say that I mentioned forty-five seconds as indicating the shortness of time. I do not pledge myself to that time—it was very short.

Appeal dismissed.

[CT. OF APP.]

THE SANSPAREIL.

[CT. OF APP.]

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Holman, Birdwood, and Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Pritchard and Sons, agents for Hearfield and Lambert, Hu'l.

May 16 and 17, 1900.

(Before SMITH, WILLIAMS, and ROMER, J.JJ. and NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.)

THE SANSPAREIL. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Tug and tow and a ship of war—Duty of single vessels to avoid crossing course of large fleet—Exemption of Her Majesty's ships from Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Order in Council of June 1899 applying collision regulations to Her Majesty's ships—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 19, 21, 27, 29—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 419, 741.

The statutory sanction imposed by sect. 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 for a breach of the collision regulations has no application to a merchant trader which is crossing the course of one of Her Majesty's ships from starboard to port, because the obligations imposed by arts. 21 and 27 are only applicable to ships both of which are bound to obey the regulations.

Under ordinary circumstances a tug and tow are not justified in crossing ahead of a fleet of warships which has the tug and tow on the starboard hand, and the tug and tow ought not to keep their course and speed under art. 21 of the collision regulations.

A vessel which neglects, in disregard of arts. 27 and 29 of the collision regulations, to depart from any of the collision regulations is not to be deemed in fault under sect. 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

THIS was an appeal by the defendant, the navigating officer of H.M.S. Sanspareil, from a judgment of Gorell Barnes, J. pronouncing him alone in fault for a collision between the Sanspareil and the plaintiffs' sailing ship East Lothian (82 L. T. Rep. 356; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 59).

About 10.30 p.m. on the 7th Aug. 1899 the East Lothian, while on a voyage from Nantes to Cardiff in tow of the tug Sir W. T. Lewis, was in the English Channel on a course N. 9 degrees E., the Wolf Rock bearing about N. by W., distant about thirteen miles.

The Sanspareil was one of a large squadron of ships of war returning from the manœuvres. The tug and tow were heading so as to cross the course of the squadron from starboard to port.

The ships were proceeding in four columns, in line ahead, and the Sanspareil was the leading ship of the second column.

The tug and tow kept their course ahead of the first column of ships and safely passed them, and as they approached the second column the helm of the Sanspareil was ported in order to pass astern of them, but shortly afterwards starboarded, with the result that the ram struck the port side of the East Lothian, causing such damage that she sank in a few minutes.

At the trial of the action Gorell Barnes, J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C.) and Acland for the appellant.—It was bad seamanship of the tug and tow to attempt to pass ahead of the fleet. They ought to have waited until it had passed. There were here special circumstances within the meaning of art. 27, and it was consequently the duty of the tug and tow to depart from art. 21. In other words, arts. 27 and 29 of the regulations were applicable. The plaintiffs have infringed those articles, and therefore their ship ought to be deemed to be in fault within the meaning of sect. 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Scrutton for the respondents.—There was no duty on the tug and tow to keep out of the way of the fleet. The duty, if it exists at all, is outside the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. It is impossible to say when such duty arises. Are merchant ships bound to get out of the way of one or two ships of war when in company? The regulations are expressly silent as to this. But, even if the plaintiffs were wrong in keeping on across the fleet, it is submitted they cannot be held to blame. Such negligence would not be a breach of a statutory rule, and therefore the case of The Monte Rosa (68 L. T. Rep. 299; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 326; (1893) P. 23) is in point, for the defendant by the exercise of ordinary care and skill could have avoided the consequences of the plaintiff's negligence:

The Margaret, 52 L. T. Rep. 361; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 204; 9 App. Cas. 873.

Art. 27 does not apply because there were no "special circumstances" in this case. It is admitted the collision was due to a wrong manœuvre on the part of the defendant. Had not the helm of the Sanspareil been starboarded at a wrong time she would have cleared the East Lothian.

The Attorney-General replied.

SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from my brother Barnes, and it is an action brought by the merchant ship East Lothian against the navigating lieutenant of H.M.S. Sanspareil. No technicalities have been raised, but the action has been fought upon the basis that it is an action between subjects of the Queen. The merchant ship contended that she was run into and rammed by the Sanspareil by reason of the neglect of those in charge of the Sanspareil on the day on which the occurrence took place. It took place at about 11 p.m. on the 7th Aug. last, S.W. of Lizard Point, and the East Lothian sank, and some loss of life occurred. Whereupon the East Lothian brings an action against the Sanspareil. The facts are not in dispute, and are very clear. On the night in question the fleet, a squadron of H.M. ships of war, was steaming up Channel. They were in four lines or columns. The southernmost line or column consisted of about eight cruisers, headed by a cruiser called the Europa. On the port side of that line—that is, to the north of that line—came a line of battleships. There were seven battleships in that line, headed by the Sanspareil, which is the battleship which ran down and sank the East Lothian. To the north of that line of battleships there was

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C. and SUTTON TIMMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CT. OF APP.]

THE SANSPAREIL.

[CT. OF APP.]

another line of battl-ships, headed by a battleship called the Alexandria, and there were seven vessels in that line. To the north of that line there was another line of cruisers, consisting of eight vessels. The squadron, coming up the English Channel, was two and a quarter miles in breadth, and the length of the different columns was from a mile and three-quarters to two miles. The East Lothian was going from Nantes to Cardiff, and was proceeding in a northerly direction; in other words, it was crossing the water which this squadron was in, and came up with the squadron when the East Lothian and her tug were going to the north. It is an admitted fact in this case that the tug and tow had all their lights burning properly, and that the tug had two white lights, one above the other, at the regulation distance, which showed any seaman that the tug was a vessel which had another vessel in tow. The squadron, which was on the port side of the East Lothian—that is, to the westward—was seen at a distance of about six miles on the night in question, and the vessels in it had all their lights up. The East Lothian proceeded on her course, towed by the tug, and so the matter went on. The fleet was steaming at a speed of ten knots an hour, and the East Lothian and her tug were going at about six knots an hour. That they were crossing ships—that the East Lothian was crossing the squadron—cannot be denied. What happened was this: The East Lothian crossed the leading ship of the southernmost line of cruisers, the Europa, and nothing occurred. When she got to the line of battleships, at the head of which was the Sanspareil—and I should say that the line of battleships was no less than three-quarters of a mile off the southernmost line of cruisers, and each of these four lines were three-quarters of a mile apart, and they were following each other at a distance of somewhere about 400 yards—when the East Lothian in the position I have indicated, with lights burning, and with two lights on the tug, got to the first line of battleships, the navigating lieutenant of the Sanspareil somehow or other—I do not know how, it is admitted he was negligent about this—ported his helm to go astern of the tug, but understanding and mistaking, and wrongfully mistaking, that the tugboat had nothing behind it, when in reality it had the East Lothian, then starboarded his helm to get back into line. He starboarded his helm, and did not see the bright light of the East Lothian, and there is no complaint about that light. He starboarded his helm to get back into line and rammed the East Lothian, and thereupon the owners of the East Lothian bring an action against the Sanspareil to recover damages. My brother Barnes has held that the Sanspareil was solely to blame, and he was advised by his nautical assessors. We are advised by ours, and I will state what they advise us in a moment.

The proposition which is adumbrated by the learned Attorney-General, though I admit he did not state it in so many words, and when I put my proposition he said he did not contend for it, is really this: That a squadron of Her Majesty's ships might proceed in four lines in the manner which I have described this squadron as doing, and that it is the duty of every one of Her Majesty's subjects, and anybody else, to get out of the way. That is what the Crown wish to have held, and I can find neither rule nor regulation, nor Act of Parliament, nor rule of law, nor anything which will support that, and it seems to me that when Her Majesty's ships are navigating the waters they must observe the good principles of navigation, just the same as any other of Her Majesty's subjects, and that those rules are binding upon Her Majesty's ships just as they are on Her Majesty's other subjects. That brings me to the rules. It is very clear to my mind how the rules stand. Sect. 418 of the Act of 1894 enacts that: "Prevention of Collisions: Her Majesty may, on the joint recommendation of the Admiralty and the Board of Trade, by Order in Council, make Regulations for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea"—those are the regulations which bind merchant ships—"and may thereby regulate the lights to be carried and exhibited, the fog-signals to be carried and used, and the steering and sailing rules to be observed by ships, and those regulations shall have effect as if enacted in this Act. The collision regulations, together with the provisions of this part of this Act relating thereto, or otherwise relating to collisions, shall be observed by all foreign ships within British jurisdiction, and in any case arising in a British court concerning matters arising within British jurisdiction foreign ships shall, so far as respects the collision regulations and the said provisions of this Act, be treated as if they were British ships." I won't come to sect. 419 for a moment, but it appears that in the court below it was discovered that there was a section in this Act of 1894 which indicated that this Act shall not, except where specially provided, apply to ships belonging to Her Majesty, and therefore the rules and regulations made under the Act of 1894, and, it seems to me, the statutory provisions relating to those rules, have no application whatever to Her Majesty's ships. What happened was this, that two years after the rules and regulations, which I will call the statutory rules and regulations, Her Majesty enacted rules largely identical with the rules called statutory rules, but they were not statutory rules, and they had no vitality given to them by statute. I come first of all to the statutory rules, so far as they are applicable and relate to the ship in question. Rule 21 is: "Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course and speed." By another rule (19) it is enacted that where there are crossing ships, and one ship has on its starboard side a crossing ship, it is the duty of the ship which has the other crossing ship on its starboard side to keep out of the way of the ship which is crossing it, and art. 21 enacts that where by any one of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way—in this case it is the Sanspareil—the other is to keep her course and speed. As has been pointed out in the court below, and said by my brother Barnes, that only applies to where the rules apply to both crossing ships. Where, by any of these rules the Sanspareil is to keep out of the way, the East Lothian is to keep her course and speed. It seems to me that the rule does not apply at all to a Queen's ship. Art. 21 also enacts that "when in consequence of thick weather or other causes such vessel finds herself so close that collision cannot be avoided by the action of the giving way vessel alone, she shall take such action as will best avert collision." By art. 27 it is enacted that "in obeying and construing these rules due regard should be had to all dangers of navigation and collision, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary, in order to avoid immediate danger." Art. 29 is: "Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any vessel, or the owner or master or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case." Now, it is said that, although prima facie a crossing vessel should keep its course and speed, the circumstances were such that the East Lothian should not have done what she did—namely, keep her course and speed.

The first point which arises is whether or not the East Lothian, having done what she did in keeping across the Sanspareil, has been guilty of an infringement of a statutory regulation, so that she shall be deemed to be in fault; because if it is a statutory regulation which she has broken then she is to be deemed to be in fault, which would render her jointly liable with the battleship, and the damages, I suppose, would be divided in the manner in which they are divided in the Admiralty Court. But if she has not been guilty of a breach of a statutory regulation, and has been guilty of negligence, then the right of action which the merchantman has against Her Majesty's ship would be an action at common law for negligence, and the doctrine of contributory negligence would apply. The first question, therefore, to make out is this, whether my brother Barnes is right when he has held in his judgment: "It appears to me necessarily to follow that the statutory provisions of the said sect. 419, sub-sect. 4, could not apply in the present case, even if the East Lothian and her tug did not act in accordance with art. 27." He says it does not come within the statutory rules, but only the rules with regard to good seamanship. I agree with him in respect of that. What are the provisions of sect. 419 of the Act of 1894? Sub-sect. 3 says: "If any damage to person or property arises from the non-observance by any ship of any of the collision regulations, the damage shall be deemed to have been occasioned by the wilful default of the person in charge of the deck of the ship at the time, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary." It is said in this case that it was necessary to depart from the regulation to keep both course and speed, because of the special circumstance that a line of battleships was coming up. Sub-sect. 4 says: "Where in a case of collision it is proved to the court before whom the case is tried that any of the collision regulations have been infringed, the ship by which the regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulations necessary." If it is a statutory regulation that the East Lothian has broken, there would be an end of this case. But I do not think these regulations apply. Then, has the East Lothian been guilty of any breach of the collision regulations. When I read these collision regulations, it seems to me that they contemplate a departure from the regulations if there are special circumstances which necessitate it. It seems to me that then the regulations are to be observed no further, and that a master is left to do what, according to his best knowledge, is the course of good seamanship. That is not a regulation in any shape or form. He must do what is best in the circumstances to avoid collision or anything else. The regulation is done with and departed from, and I think therefore that, when you come to arts. 27 or 29, they ought not to be held—and I do not hold them—to be collision regulations, or that when a man is put to do his best because the collision regulations cannot be carried out, that there can be a breach of the regulations within sect. 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act. Therefore, in this case I do not think the East Lothian can be held to be in fault under the statute, and the result is that the cause of action by the merchantmen against the Sanspareil is really for negligence. Now, with regard to the Sanspareil, I understand that the late Attorney-General in the court below raised no point, and practically admitted, that the Sanspareil was to blame. Then how does this question arise? The merchant ship says to the battleship, "You ran into me by reason of your negligence." True! What does the battleship say? "Yes! and you were guilty of negligence also, and therefore you cannot recover." We have asked our assessors this question: "Was the East Lothian under the circumstances of this case guilty of negligence in passing across the bows of the Sanspareil?" And the answer is that it was improper navigation. I take that to mean, and it does mean, that it was not what the assessors advised my brother Barnes; and I think our assessors are right upon this, and I must exercise my own opinion, and I think it was an improper act of navigation for this vessel, the East Lothian, to continue its course when it saw this fleet coming up on its port side, six miles off, and to persist in going across this fleet. It has been pointed out by the Attorney-General that with a very slight deviation, by starboarding, of the tug and tow, there would have been no danger of collision at all. Instead of that they go across the bows of the fleet, and the result was that the Sanspareil rammed the East Lothian. What is the law applicable to a case like this, supposing you get a case of common law negligence? What is the law about contributory negligence? It is laid down in the House of Lords by Lord Penzance, and agreed to by Lord Cairns and Lord Blackburn, and Lord Gordon. "The first proposition," says Lord Penzance, "is a general one, to this effect, that the plaintiff in an action for negligence cannot succeed if it is found by the jury that he has himself been guilty of any negligence or want of ordinary care which contributed to the accident. But there is another proposition equally well established, and it is a qualification upon the first—namely, that though the plaintiff may have been guilty of negligence, and although that negligence may, in fact, have contributed to the accident, yet if the defendant could in the result, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have avoided the mischief which happened, the plaintiff's negligence will not excuse him." The case of The Margaret also shows that the common law doctrine is applicable to such a case as this. Now, the question is

[CT. OF APP.]

THE SANSPAREIL.

[CT. OF APP.]

whether on the facts of this case, the Sanspareil by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence could have avoided the mischief which happened. It seems perfectly clear that she could. The navigating lieutenant of the Sanspareil saw the tug, and did that which was perfectly right. He saw the tug crossing his bows, and he rightly ported so as to go behind her. But somehow or other he negligently failed to see the tow, although she had all her lights burning, and then he did the act which brings about the collision. He starboarded back again. If he had only kept on for a very short period—if he had only kept his helm a-port for a very short time indeed—if he had seen or known, as he ought to have known, that there was a tow behind the tug and kept his helm a-port, he would have gone astern of the tow. What he does is this: Thinking that everything has passed him, he put his helm a-starboard to get back into his line. There was nothing in the position of the fleet on either side or behind which incommoded him, and with regard to this part of the case it may be considered that the Sanspareil was there and nobody else, because the vessel on the starboard side was three-quarters of a mile off. It did not hamper him one bit. If he had been hampered by the fleet other considerations would have arisen, but he was not. The negligence which he was guilty of was in trying to go round negligently, by starboarding his helm, without seeing the East Lothian. How can it be said in these circumstances that the Sanspareil could not by the exercise of ordinary care and skill have avoided the collision? It seems perfectly plain that she could. For these reasons I am of opinion that this judgment must stand and the appeal be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—In the view which we take of this case it is of no great importance so far as it determines any matter of principle, because we take the view that under the circumstances of this case, to which I will allude a little more presently, there has been no infringement of the regulations; and that as there has been no infringement of the regulations, the question is merely a question of either common law or Admiralty law; and that, having regard to what has been thoroughly well established, as to both common law and Admiralty law, there can be no serious question in this case after the admission of the Attorney-General in the court below. I do not know, therefore, that any useful purpose can be served by an expression by me of any opinion of mine as to what are the rights of Her Majesty's ships of war, when they are going together in squadron, as these ships of war were. But as something has been said about it, I wish to say for myself that I do not assent to the proposition that Her Majesty's ships of war, going in squadron in this way, are governed by the same rules that other ships are. It seems to me manifest that if Her Majesty's ships were held in such circumstances to be governed by the ordinary regulations, it would result in extreme danger not only to such ships as the squadron should happen to meet in its course, but obviously to the men-of-war in the squadron, inter se. It seems to me that under those special circumstances it is impossible to say that the ordinary rules of navigation, and the ordinary rules for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea, apply, and this is not because there is any special favour or exemption to Her Majesty's ships of war. It is because when Her Majesty's ships of war are sailing together in squadron, as they have a perfect right to do, you have a special set of circumstances which would make it dangerous and bad seamanship to apply the ordinary regulations. To apply the ordinary regulations would put the squadron and the ships that it met in serious danger of collision, both between the men-of-war and the other ships, and amongst the ships of war, inter se. The advice that has been given to us by those who have to advise us seems to me to be based upon this view, which I have tried to enunciate. They tell us that for the tug and tow to pass across the bows of the ships of the squadron was reckless and improper navigation, and, to my mind, it is perfectly clear that that was so. I therefore say no more upon that point at present.

Well, now, having regard to what I have said, one has to consider here two questions—first, whether there was an infringement of the rules by the tug and the East Lothian, which for this purpose must be considered as one ship; and secondly, whether, if there was no such infringement, under the circumstances, there was such contributory negligence by the tug and tow which would prevent the plaintiffs recovering in this case. With regard to the regulations, I should hesitate myself to assent to the proposition that because you meet a ship not bound by the regulations that therefore the regulations do not bind the British ship, because it may be that the very fact that you meet a foreign ship, and happen to know that it is a foreign ship, and that it is a ship of such a character that it must not be assumed to be likely to follow the regulations, is a very good reason for departure from the regulations. But it seems to me that it by no means follows from that that the regulations do not apply. The only thing you can say is that such circumstances are special circumstances which justify a departure by the British ship from the regulations. That being so, according to my judgment we ought, notwithstanding the fact that the regulations which are made under the Merchant Shipping Act do not apply to H.M.'s ships of war, to look and see whether there has been any breach of the regulations by the plaintiff ship. The Crown do not insist upon it that there has been any breach of art. 21, because they say, and justly say, that the circumstances of this case were such that art. 21 could not be insisted on; that the special circumstances not only warranted but necessitated a departure from arts. 19 and 21. The question here is whether there has been any breach of arts. 27 and 29. Now, art. 27 says: "In obeying and construing these rules, due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and collision, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." I quite feel the force of the argument addressed to us that the words "regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and collision, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary," go to show that the moment you have got such circumstances that justify a departure from the rules, in one sense, at all events, it can be no longer said that those rules from which you may depart are obligatory.

But it does not seem to me that that quite disposes of the whole question, because on the facts here there is a good deal to show that the East Lothian and the tug in dealing with these rules refused to depart from them, notwithstanding the fact that there were special circumstances which rendered it necessary to depart from those rules in order to avoid immediate danger. What the tug and the East Lothian did was this: There being a rule which if they had met another vessel under ordinary circumstances would have justified them in going on on their course, and at the same speed, persisted in so doing, although there were special circumstances which rendered departure from the rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. I am not myself, at all sure that that might not be a case of an infringement of the rule within the meaning of the 419th section of the Merchant Shipping Act. Of course the importance of this is that if you once get an infringement of such a rule, the mere fact of the proof of the infringement is sufficient to make it necessary to deem the ship guilty of the infringement in fault, and so to deem it in fault notwithstanding the fact that the particular infringement may not in any sense have brought about the collision or the accident. Under the circumstances, without saying that it is impossible that it should be a breach of the rules, particularly of art. 27, for a vessel to insist upon going on abiding by the express rules, notwithstanding the special circumstances, I am not prepared to say that in this particular case it was. If one says that, the only remaining question is whether, applying the common law rules to this matter, there is evidence of such a state of circumstances that the plaintiff is disentitled to recover. That there was negligence by the plaintiffs there can be, to my mind, no doubt. If the advice of our assessors is right, there obviously was, and, speaking for myself, I entirely agree with the view they take. That is not sufficient, according to the rules laid down in Radley v. The North-Western Railway Company you must show that the negligence was of such a character that the defendant could not with ordinary skill and care have avoided any accident. That that rule applies even in the Court of Admiralty—where as a rule the practice is that if both ships have been to blame the damages must be divided—is plain from the case of The Margaret, which is reported under the name of Cayzer v. Carron Company in 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 371; 9 App. Cas. 873. If one reads there the opinions of Lord Blackburn and Lord Watson, they both of them, to my mind, make it clear that the common law principle governs the Admiralty rule. The short passage by Lord Blackburn, on page 881, is: "I do not think that the judges of the Court of Appeal for a moment meant to say that the transgression of this rule"—they were dealing with the Thames rules—"was in itself sufficient, unless it was an occasion of the accident." So he assumes that the principle of Radley v. North-Western Railway Company applies, and Lord Watson, when he delivers his opinion in the House of Lords, on page 887, says: "And the ground of my judgment is shortly this, that assuming there was a breach of the rule and culpable neglect at the time, yet the consequences of that neglect could have been avoided by ordinary care on the part of the Margaret." And so he again assumes that if the consequences of the neglect of the plaintiffs could have been avoided by ordinary care and prudence on the part of the defendants, the negligence of the plaintiffs would be no answer to the action. These rules which are laid down by Lord Penzance are really rules of evidence and not rules of law, but it all goes back to the common law rule that the plaintiff must prove the negligence of the defendants to have been the cause of the accident. But when one applies it to this case, and takes into consideration the admission of the Attorney-General, what does it come to? Why, it comes to this, that he practically admits—the admission is given on pages 11 and 12 of the record—that the cause of this accident was the mistake of the navigating lieutenant. Under those circumstances, it seems to me impossible for us to go into the question whether that which Lieut. Potter did was or was not inconsistent with the exercise of ordinary care and prudence on his part. I cannot help saying for myself that but for that admission I should have been very far from thinking that it was perfectly clear that the consequences of the improper navigation of the tug and tow could have been avoided by the ordinary care and skill of the navigating lieutenant. It is not the rule that those who have to meet the negligence of the plaintiffs have to act up to counsels of perfection. The very words of the rule, "ordinary care and prudence," assume a margin of deviation from counsels of perfection, and I should require to consider some time before I came to the conclusion that having regard to the short space of time that elapsed, and the difficult circumstances the navigating lieutenant was placed in by the misconduct of the tug and tow, the consequences of their misconduct could have been avoided by ordinary care and prudence on the part of the navigating lieutenant.

ROMER, L.J.—The first question we have to consider, and it is the only question in the case of real general importance, is whether or not the tug and the East Lothian were or were not justified in trying to cross in front of the Channel Squadron. In the court below the Elder Brethren have found, on being asked, that "the position and movements of the fleet did not constitute such a danger to navigation or of collision, or such circumstances as to render it necessary for the tug and tow to wait till the fleet had passed, or to starboard and go under the stern of the fleet; in other words, they do not consider that the tug and tow acted improperly in this case in proceeding as they did." I am bound to say I entirely disagree with that finding. I think that in the circumstances of this case the tug and tow were not justified either under arts. 19 and 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, or otherwise, in attempting as they did to pass in front of this Channel Fleet. The special circumstances of the case, to my mind, ought to have negatived to the tug and tow any such idea. Consider the position. The whole fleet was coming up Channel in four columns, each column consisting of several ships. The ships being in that formation, it is of the utmost importance that perfect order should be preserved, because to become disorganised is to run risk of great disaster and to cause great danger. That the Channel Fleet had a perfect right to come up Channel as it was in that formation cannot be

[CT. OF APP.]

THE SANSPAREIL.

[CT. OF APP.]

challenged. They had, on the other hand, no special right beyond that which all ships have, but it cannot be said that in coming up in that formation and in the way they did the Channel Fleet were acting in any degree improperly. On the other hand they, of course, had no right to assume that their path up the Channel would be left perfectly clear; still less had they a right to assume that they could go up Channel without keeping a good look-out without being guilty of negligence. Nor is any such right claimed on the part of the Crown. But on coming up with a big fleet like that, what, under the circumstances, ought the tug and tow to have done? Consider what the tug and tow proposed to do. They proposed to keep a course which would have just cleared them of the first column of cruisers, which would just land them, if the squadron did not stop, in front of the leading ship of the second column, which would carry them into the centre of the third column, and if they escaped those battleships would carry them into the centre, or about the centre, of the fourth column. What must have been the probability, or possibility, of such a course of conduct? Consider the danger that is cast upon a Channel fleet in having its columns broken in such a way—the difficulty of stopping ships of that huge build and weight suddenly and interfering with their course. Assume, as I think might have happened, that the second column might have avoided any collision, what would have happened to the third column? It must have been wholly disorganised if the tug and tow had persisted in their course. Still more, it appears to me that even if the case had been the case of a single steamship, prudence dictated that that vessel should not attempt to cross in front of that squadron. It was still less prudent or proper, in my opinion, on the part of a tug towing a ship with a long scope of hawser. It could not be said to have been reasonable that this tug and tow should have expected that the whole Channel Squadron should manœuvre so as to try and escape from proceeding on its way. I do not see how, without great difficulty and danger, the Channel Fleet could possibly have done so without running great risk of injury to its vessels. The tug and tow were not entitled to expect that it would have altered its course and formation simply to avoid them, but that does not end the matter. The tug and tow did cross, and, as I have already said, the fleet were bound to keep a good look-out and not be guilty of negligence, but to do all they could to avoid disaster. It could not be said that, because the tug and tow improperly crossed the line of the fleet, every accident that might subsequently ensue, though directly caused by the negligence of one of Her Majesty's ships, was to be held to have been contributed to by the initial error of the tug and tow in crossing the line. But the question where the line of demarcation is to be drawn is a very difficult one. I think, as at present advised, that though some negligence on the part of one or more of the vessels of the fleet were proved, yet if the accident had to an appreciable extent arisen from the formation of the fleet, the case should be dealt with as one of contributory negligence. But in the special facts of this case it appears to me that the accident had nothing really to do, except remotely, with that difficulty. It arose wholly, speaking in any substantial sense, by reason of the negligence of the navigating lieutenant on board the Sanspareil in not seeing, or properly interpreting, the lights on the tug, and not observing the ship in tow. Had it not been for that negligence of the navigating lieutenant the accident could easily have been avoided, and would have been, for the Sanspareil could have kept under its port helm a little longer, and then starboarded, and so escaped both tug and tow, and that without any difficulty whatever, or any danger to the fleet, either as a column or as individual ships in each column. So that the truth is that this accident has been brought about by that negligence of the navigating lieutenant of the Sanspareil, as if that had been a ship by itself. It is really an accident which has nothing to do with the fleet, and which arose by the negligence of a particular ship, and so far as appears it would have happened if that vessel had been steaming by itself. Under those circumstances it appears to me that the Sanspareil cannot avail itself of the initial error of the steamtug and tow, and say it is to be dealt with as a case of joint or contributory negligence.

I should like to add this with regard to the point taken on behalf of the Crown, which is of some importance in the legal sense—with reference to the contention on behalf of the Crown that the tug and tow were to be deemed in default under sect. 419, sub-sect. 4, because they had infringed some of the collision regulations. The only regulations which it can be suggested they did infringe are arts. 27 and 29. In my opinion the case here is not one to which sect. 419, sub-sect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 applies. Art. 27 does not, in my opinion, create any regulations within the meaning of sect. 419, sub-sect. 4, at all. The kind of regulation that the sub-section is referring to is well shown by the words used in the sub-section, that "the ship by which the regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault unless it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the court that special circumstances made a departure necessary." Those last words are to my mind significant, and if you look at art. 27 it will be seen that so far as there are express directions in that article at all they are carefully limited. Art. 27 does say that due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and collision, but for all purposes it is limited—"In obeying and construing these rules"—and although it does say "due regard shall be had to any special circumstance," it is only when it shall render departure from the above necessary. Now, in the case before us there is no question of construing this. The only question is whether rules 19 and 21 should be obeyed, and under art. 27, if you obey that article all you have to do is to disregard the prior rules, 19 and 21. Art. 27 is only stating what you are to do as to obeying or not obeying the other rules. It contains no directions, and no rule in itself as to what you are to do when the rules are held not to apply. The parties are then left to the ordinary rules of good conduct and seamanship, and if a vessel or any master broke such rules of good conduct and seamanship, then there is negligence; but though there has been negligence the party has not been guilty of a breach of the collision regulations within the meaning of sect. 419, sub-sect. 4. Similar observations apply with regard to art. 29. There is no express rule or regulation there. That article only prevents the other rules acting as exonerating the vessel under circumstances specified in the articles. For these reasons it appears to me that the Crown is wrong in the contention that the tug and tow are to be treated as if they had been guilty of a breach of the collision regulations, and so brought themselves under sect. 419, sub-sect. 4. That being so, the case remains to be dealt with on the footing of my first observation, and I therefore agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, The Treasury Solicitor.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, T. Cooper and Co.

Friday, May 25, 1900.

(Before SMITH, WILLIAMS, and ROMER, L.JJ.)

HOGARTH AND Co. v. WALKER. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance, marine—Policy on ship and furniture—What included in "furniture"—Dunnage mats and separation cloths.

A ship, which was employed in the grain trade, carried separation cloths and dunnage mats in accordance with the recognised custom of that trade. She was insured by a time policy in the form of an ordinary Lloyd's policy. The cloths and mats were lost by perils of the sea on a voyage during which they were not in use.

Held (affirming the judgment of Bigham, J.), that the cloths and mats were covered by the policy of insurance as "furniture" of the ship.

THIS was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury in Middlesex.

The plaintiffs sued the defendant, upon a policy of insurance upon the plaintiffs' ship Felbridge for twelve months, to recover for the loss of dunnage mats and separation cloths.

The policy of insurance was in the ordinary form of a Lloyd's policy, and was for twelve months, "at all times, in all places, and on all occasions, services, and trades, whatever and where-soever," upon the "body, tackle, apparel, ordnance, munitions, artillery, boats, and other furniture of and in the good ship or vessel Felbridge."

The Felbridge was continuously employed in the grain-carrying trade. It was the recognised custom of that trade for the vessels employed in it to carry separation cloths and dunnage mats. The separation cloths were used for the purpose of dividing the different parcels of grain, and the dunnage mats were used mainly for the purpose of keeping the grain off the ship's floor.

The Felbridge was generally engaged in carrying grain from the Black Sea; and, as in that trade grain was shipped in many different parcels, the use of separation cloths was absolutely necessary.

In a cargo of grain from America there is never more than one parcel, and therefore separation cloths are not necessary in that trade.

It is not the practice in the American trade to use dunnage mats, wooden battens being used instead for dunnage purposes.

During the currency of the policy of insurance, the Felbridge, being homeward bound from an American port with a cargo of grain, and having her separation cloths and dunnage mats stowed away in the forepeak, came into collision with a pierhead stem on. Her stem was damaged, and a large quantity of the cloths and mats were washed out of the forepeak and lost.

The underwriters refused to pay for the loss of the separation cloths and dunnage mats upon the ground that they were not covered by the policy of insurance.

The defendant was one of the underwriters.

The action was tried before Bigham, J. without a jury.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C. and Montague Lush for the plaintiffs.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the defendant.

July 5, 1899.—BIGHAM, J.—I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed in this case. The question is whether the ordinary Lloyd's time policy covers the things which are called separation cloths and dunnage mats used in connection with the carriage of grain cargoes. Now, it is not to be forgotten that this was a grain ship, and, as a grain ship, she would require all the things necessary to adapt her for the trade with which she was connected. Those things included the separation cloths and the dunnage mats; and, if she went to sea in the trade for which she was meant and for which she was being worked without those appliances, she would, in my opinion, be an unseaworthy ship. It seems to me, therefore, to follow that those things are part of her equipment, within the meaning of the policy; they are part of her furniture. I see no distinction between such things and a movable bulkhead, which is admitted to be part of a ship's furniture. A movable bulkhead is simply intended to separate one class of cargo from another, and I do not know why there should be a difference between the movable bulkhead and these separation cloths and dunnage mats, both of them being things that could be moved from one portion of the ship to another, and both being things intended for the same purpose. It is true that in one case the thing is made of wood, and in the other it is made of cloth, but, in principle, there is no distinction between the two. I think, therefore, that the underwriters ought to pay, and my judgment is for the plaintiffs.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

J. A. Hamilton (Joseph Walton, Q.C. with him) for the appellant.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that these cloths and mats were covered by the policy. Things like these, which are no part of the ship as a ship, but are only incidental to and used for the purposes of the business of the shipowner as a carrier of goods, are not part of the "apparel, furniture," &c., of the ship. The shipowner is not necessarily himself a carrier at all, for he may charter or demise his ship. If he does also carry on the business of a carrier, the things which are necessary and incidental to his business as a carrier are not necessarily part of his property as a shipowner. These particular things were things which he had in his business as carrier of grain, and not as shipowner; they are in no way necessary to him as

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CT. OF APP.] BURGER v. INDEMNITY MUTUAL MARINE ASSURANCE CO. LIM. [CT. OF APP.]

shipowner. This was a time policy, which would cover many voyages, and voyages for trading of any kind. That is important, for in that case the underwriter would not contemplate that he was insuring, as part of the ship and furniture, things used only for voyages in a particular trade. In Hoskins v. Pickersgill (3 Doug. 222) it was held that the fishing tackle of a ship employed in the Greenland trade was not covered by an insurance on the "ship, tackle, apparel, and furniture." [WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Gale v. Laurie (5 B. & C. 156, 164), where Abbott, C.J. said: "The fishing stores were not carried on board the ship as merchandise, but for the accomplishment of the objects of the voyage; and we think that whatever is on board a ship for the object of the voyage and adventure on which she is engaged, belonging to the owners, constitutes a part of the ship and her appurtenances within the meaning of this Act, whether the object be warfare, the conveyance of passengers or goods, or the fishery. This construction furnishes a plain and intelligible general rule; whereas if it should be held that nothing is to be considered as part of the ship that is not necessary for her navigation or motion on the water, a door would be opened to many nice questions and much discussion and cavil."] Bigham, J. founded his judgment upon the ground that, without these cloths and mats, the ship would not be seaworthy. That cannot be so, for these things are not in any sense necessary for the navigation of the ship, and grain could be carried just as safely without them. Seaworthiness is not, however, the proper test by which to try whether these things come within the words of the policy. Such things as these would be properly included in an insurance upon "goods" or "disbursements," but not in an insurance upon ship and apparel. [WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Hill v. Patten (8 East, 373).] He cited also

Robertson v. Ewer, 1 T. R. 127;
Brough v. Whitmore, 4 T. R. 206.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C. and Montague Lush, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

SMITH, L.J.—I think that the judgment of Bigham, J. in this case was quite right. The question turns upon the meaning of a clause in a Lloyd's policy. The policy covers a trading ship in the largest possible way for the period of one year. The words of the policy are: "At all times in all places, and on all occasions, services, and trades, whatever and wheresoever." Therefore it was allowed to the ship, which was covered by the policy, to trade in the largest possible manner, and therefore the policy covers the trading of the ship to the Black Sea for grain. The subject-matter of the policy is the "body, tackle, apparel, ordnance, munitions, artillery, boats, and other furniture of and in the good ship or vessel Felbridge." Now, evidence was given at the trial that in the Black Sea grain trade separation cloths and dunnage mats were always required. If that were so, and these things were always required for that trade upon which this ship was entitled to go, do these dunnage mats and separation cloths form part of the furniture, &c., of the ship within the meaning of the policy? It seems to me that only one answer is possible—i.e., that they do. The judgment of Bigham, J. has been criticised because he said that, if the ship went to sea without these things, she would be unseaworthy. Now, I should think that she would certainly be unseaworthy if she was without the protection for a grain cargo afforded by dunnage mats. Even if that would not be so with regard to the separation cloths, that would not affect the correctness of the decision. Those things are a part of the furniture of the ship. It was admitted before Bigham, J., and has been admitted in this court, that movable bulkheads would form part of the ship's furniture, and I cannot see any distinction in principle between the two things, or why the one is not just as much furniture of the ship as the other. I think, therefore, that the judgment of Bigham, J. was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. I think that in such a time policy as we have in this case there would be included in the "furniture," &c., of the ship all those fittings or things in the nature of fixtures, though not actually fixed to the ship, provided by the shipowner for use on the ship, and reasonably necessary to enable the ship to carry properly the kind of cargo ordinarily carried by such a ship, and even though those things are not being used at the time when the loss is incurred. I agree that the appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Solicitors for the respondents, Botterell and Roche, for Vaughan and Roche, Cardiff.

June 20 and 21, 1900.

(Before SMITH, WILLIAMS, and ROMER, L.JJ.)

BURGER v. INDEMNITY MUTUAL MARINE ASSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance, marine—Collision clause—Insurance against liabilities in respect of collision—"Sums paid in respect of injury to other ship itself"—Expenses of removal of wreck of other ship.

By a policy of marine insurance the underwriters agreed that, if the ship assured came into collision with any other ship and the assured in consequence thereof was bound to pay any sum "in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself, or to the goods or effects on board thereof, or for loss of freight then being earned by such other ship or vessel," they would pay to the assured a proportion of such sum.

The ship assured ran into and sank another ship in the Tees. The owner of the wreck was compelled to pay to the harbour authorities the expenses of removing the wreck, and he recovered the amount from the owner of the ship assured.

Held, that the sum paid by the assured in respect of the removal of the wreck of the other ship was not a sum paid by him "in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself," within the meaning of the policy.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mathew, J. at the trial of the action as a commercial cause without a jury.

The plaintiff was the owner of the ship Durward, and the defendants granted a policy of insurance for 3500*l.* on the hull and machinery of the Durward for twelve months from the 1st April 1897.

The policy of insurance contained the following clause:

Collision Clause.—Cross Liability.—And we further agree that if the ship hereby assured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall in consequence thereof be found liable to pay and shall pay any sums (not exceeding the value of the ship assured) in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself, or to the goods or effects on board thereof, or for loss of freight then being earned by such other ship or vessel, we will severally pay the assured such proportion of three fourth parts of the said sums as our respective subscriptions hereto bear to the value of the ship hereby assured. . . . But this agreement is in no case to be construed as extending to any sums the assured may become liable to pay in respect of loss of life or personal injury to individuals from any cause whatever.

On the 25th Nov. 1897 the Durward came into collision with, and sank, the tug Victory in the river Tees.

The Victory became a total wreck, which was subsequently dispersed by the Tees Conservancy Board, acting under their statutory powers. The expenses of dispersing the wreck amounted to 1178*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.*, and were recovered by the Tees Conservancy Board from the owner of the Victory.

In an action in the Admiralty Division the Durward was held to be alone to blame for the collision, and the present plaintiff, her owner, was held liable to pay as part of the damages, and did pay, to the owner of the Victory that sum of 1178*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.*

The plaintiff claimed a proportion of that sum from the defendants under the policy of insurance, and brought this action to recover the same.

The action was tried before Mathew, J., as a commercial cause, without a jury, and the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Carver, Q.C. and T. E. Scrutton for the appellants.—The learned judge at the trial was wrong in holding that this claim was covered by the policy of insurance. This sum of 1178*l.* was not a sum which the assured became liable to pay "in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself," within the meaning of the policy, and, if it does not come within those words, it cannot be covered by the policy. If the words "in respect of injury to the ship itself" were intended to include these damages, then the express provisions as to injury to cargo and loss of freight would be unnecessary, as liability in respect of those matters could in fact only be incurred if there were injury to the ship itself. The liability in respect of freight is further limited to freight then being earned, so as not to include freight under a future contract as in The Argentino (61 L. T. Rep. 706; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 433; 14 App. Cas. 519). That shows that the underwriters did not intend to be liable for all the damages which might be recoverable in a collision action. The meaning of this clause is that the underwriters contract to be liable for three kinds of loss, which are expressly specified—that is, for injury to the ship itself, for injury to the cargo, and for loss of freight then being earned, and that everything else is excluded. No argument in favour of the plaintiff really arises from the insertion of the proviso at the end; that proviso is used only ex abundanti cauteli. In some cases, where very wide words are used in the clause imposing liability, this particular liability in respect of the expenses of removing a wreck is excluded by a proviso:

The North Britain, 70 L. T. Rep. 210; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; (1894) P. 77;
The Engineer. 78 L. T. Rep. 473; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 401; (1898) A. C. 382.

In such a case as this, where the words imposing liability are restricted, there is no necessity for a proviso such as was used in the above cases. They cited also

Taylor v. Dewar, 10 L. T. Rep. 267; 5 B. & S. 58.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the respondent.—The judgment of Mathew, J. was right. The only reasonable construction of this clause is that which was put upon it by the learned judge. The words "injury to the ship itself" are used because liability for loss of life or personal injuries is excluded by the proviso. The specific provision as to freight is inserted because the liability in respect of freight is specially restricted to freight "then being earned." The words "in respect of injury to the ship" are the widest words which can be used, and there is no reason why those words should be cut down in any way; they include all damages which would have to be paid because of the collision and of the injury to the ship. The liability to pay the expenses of the removal of the wreck from the fairway was a direct consequence of the injury to the ship, and the words "in respect of injury to the ship" must include everything which is a direct consequence of such injury.

Carver, Q.C. was not called upon to reply.

SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mathew, J. I cannot agree with his decision in this case, though I feel some diffidence in differing from that learned judge who has had such very great experience in matters of this kind. [His Lordship summarised the facts and continued:] The sole question is, What is the true construction of the clause in question in this policy of insurance? Mathew, J. has held that the sum of 1178*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.* paid by this plaintiff in respect of these expenses is covered by this policy of insurance. The underwriters have appealed. Now, the clause in question is as follows: "And we further agree that if the ship hereby assured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall in consequence thereof be found liable to pay, and shall pay, any sums (not exceeding the value of the ship assured) in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself, or to the goods or effects on board thereof, or for loss of freight then being earned by such other ship or vessel, we will severally pay the assured," &c. That clause is in respect of three subject-matters; that is my view of the meaning of the clause. It is limited to those three subject-matters, and they alone are covered by the policy of insurance. The first subject-matter is any sums which the assured may be liable to pay "in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself." The plain meaning of that, in my opinion, is the injury to the tug Victory itself, which has been paid for by the defendants. The second subject-matter of insurance is sums paid in respect of injury "to the goods or effects on board" of such other vessel; and the third is any sums paid "for loss of freight then being earned by such other ship or vessel." Those are the three subject-matters in respect of which the underwriters have agreed to pay three-fourths of the loss incurred by the owner of the Durward. Now, stopping there, I must say that those three subject-matters are plain and clear according to the ordinary meaning of the English language, and I do not intend to alter the meaning of the words which have been used. I will take them as they are. The meaning of the words "in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself" is quite plain. The underwriters have paid all that loss. The damages which the plaintiff has paid for the expenses of removing the wreck were not damages paid for injury to the ship itself. Then there is a proviso upon which an argument has been founded by the respondent; it is said that as there is such a proviso, which is not a proviso relating to the statutory liability to pay the expenses of removing a wreck, it shows that the previous part of the clause includes damages payable in respect of that liability. I think that this proviso was inserted ex abundanti cautela, and that it is not enough to make the first part of the clause read otherwise than I have read it. I think, therefore, that the appellants are right, and that in this case the decision of Mathew, J. was wrong. This appeal must therefore be allowed.

WILLIAMS, J.—I agree. The assured in this case was held liable to pay to the owner of the tug Victory the expenses incurred in dispersing the wreck, which the owner of the Victory was obliged to pay to the harbour authorities. The assured now seeks to recover that amount from the underwriters under this policy of insurance. The question whether he can do so plainly depends upon the meaning of these words in the policy: "And we further agree that if the ship hereby assured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall in consequence thereof be found liable to pay and shall pay any sums . . . in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself, or to the goods and effects on board thereof, or for loss of freight then being earned by such other ship or vessel, we will severally pay," &c. It seems to me that those words are so plain that they really require no explanation whatever. They catalogue the injuries in respect of which the underwriters undertake to pay to the assured three-fourths of the amount which he has to pay. It seems to me prima facie to be impossible to say that the money which the assured has been bound to pay in respect of the expenses of clearing away the wreck from the fairway is money paid by him "in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself." That being so, we are asked to give a different meaning to those words by reason of the proviso at the end of the clause, which is as follows: "But this agreement is in no case to be construed as extending to any sums the assured may become liable to pay in respect of loss of life or personal injury to individuals from any cause whatever."

If the words defining the subject-matter of the insurance are plain, I do not think that we can alter them by reason of the introduction of this proviso, which is a proviso which from natural motives of prudence underwriters might think it desirable to introduce into every policy whatever its special terms might be. The learned judge in the court below does not seem to have relied upon this proviso at all, but to have based his decision upon a construction of the earlier words of the clause, with which we do not agree. This appeal therefore succeeds and must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I think that one thing is quite clear—viz., that this clause was not intended to make the underwriters liable for every loss which might happen to the assured. It was intended to limit the liability of the underwriters in some respects. I think that it was intended to limit their liability to three heads of loss: (1) In respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself; or (2) to the goods or effects on board thereof; and (3) for loss of freight then being earned by such other ship. As to the proviso at the end, I think that it was unnecessary and was inserted ex abundanti cautela. The mere addition of such a clause as that contained in the proviso is not enough to alter the construction of the plain words of the first part. If the earlier words are to be read, as contended by the respondent, so as to cover all consequences of the injuries to another ship, it is difficult to see why there should be a specific addition as to injury to cargo or loss of freight, for I cannot see how the latter could arise without injury to the ship itself. There would therefore arise the same difficulty as to the use of unnecessary words and clauses if we were to accept the contention of the respondent. I agree, therefore, that the judgment of Mathew, J. was wrong, and that this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Solicitors for the respondent, W. A. Crump and Son.

Friday, June 22, 1900.

(Before SMITH, WILLIAMS, and ROMER, L.J.J.)
THALMANN AND OTHERS v. TEXAS STAR FLOUR MILLS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Sale of goods—Contract—Sale of wheat for shipment in United States—“Clearance not later than May 31”—Certificate of clearance given before completion of loading—Meaning of “clearance.”

Wheat was sold for shipment at Galveston, in the United States, by a specified vessel for Havre, “clearance” to be not later than the 31st May.

A certificate of clearance was obtained on the 28th May. Part only of the cargo was then on board, the rest being alongside ready to be loaded. The loading was not completed until the 2nd June, when the vessel sailed.

By the statute of the United States the master must

CT. OF APP.]

THALMANN AND OTHERS v. TEXAS STAR FLOUR MILLS.

[CT. OF APP.]

furnish a manifest of the cargo "on board, whereupon the collector shall grant a clearance." It was, however, customary to grant a clearance before the completion of loading, and such a clearance was valid and effective for all purposes, and entitled the vessel to sail immediately.

Held (affirming the judgment of Bigham, J.), that the vessel had obtained a "clearance" within the meaning of the contract, when the certificate of clearance was granted.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action, as a commercial cause, without a jury.

The plaintiffs brought this action to recover damages from the defendants for breach of contract.

The defendants had agreed to sell to the plaintiffs two parcels of Colorado wheat, to be shipped at Galveston, in the United States, by the steamship Highfield for Havre.

The contract contained a provision as follows: "Clearance not later than 31st May 1898."

On the 28th May a certificate of clearance was issued to the Highfield by the Customs authorities at Galveston. On that day the loading of the cargo of the Highfield was not completed, part being on board and the remainder being on the quay alongside ready to be loaded.

The loading was not in fact completed until the 2nd June, on which day the vessel sailed.

The vessel was delayed on the voyage by a breakdown of machinery, and consequently did not arrive at Havre until the 1st July.

The French Government had temporarily suspended the import duty on wheat, and in order that the plaintiffs might obtain the benefit of this remission of duty it was necessary that the wheat should arrive at Havre by the end of June, as after the 30th June the duty again became payable.

By the United States statute which regulates the granting of clearances, the master of a ship is required to furnish the Customs authorities with a manifest of the cargo "on board, whereupon the collector shall grant a clearance."

It was proved, by an affidavit of the special deputy collector and chief executive officer of the port of Galveston, that it is the custom, and for very many years has been the custom, of this port and other ports of the United States to clear vessels at the Custom House before they have completed loading, and that such clearance is and has been regarded by the Treasury Department as regular, valid, effective, and final. That no other clearance of the Highfield was issued by this Custom House, that the vessel required no other clearance, and that the clearance so issued was the final and valid and only clearance of the vessel for the voyage issued by the Custom House. That the vessel was entitled to sail immediately and at the convenience of her master after the issuance of the said clearance. That it is a common and well-known and recognised practice, and one of long standing, both in the port of Galveston and other ports of the United States, and lawful under the rules and regulations of the Treasury Department of the United States, to grant a clearance to a vessel whose cargo is delivered and alongside, and, if known, can be manifested before the whole cargo is actually placed on board of the vessel; that such a clearance is not provisional, there being no such clearance in the American usage as a temporary or provisional clearance; but that such a clearance is immediate, effective, and valid, and entitles a vessel to sail with the whole or any part of the cargo comprised in the manifest.

The master of the ship, by an affidavit, proved that he obtained the clearance on the 28th May for the purpose of being able to sail as soon as possible in the usual and ordinary course; that it was his regular practice in American ports, when he was in a position to give a complete manifest of the cargo, to obtain clearance before the completion of the loading so as to be able to sail at the earliest possible moment after the loading is completed; and that sailing would often be unnecessarily delayed if it were compulsory to wait for clearance until after the loading was completed.

The action was tried before Bigham, J. without a jury as a commercial cause.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the plaintiffs.

R. M. Bray, Q.C. and E. Bray for the defendants.

July 5, 1899.—BIGHAM, J.—The plaintiffs are corn merchants carrying on business in Paris, and the defendants are corn shippers in Galveston. On the 10th May 1898 the defendants telegraphed to the plaintiffs offering to sell two parcels of wheat on c.i.f. terms, by the steamer Highfield for Havre, "shipment within twenty-one days." On the 11th May the plaintiffs answered: "Highfield. Steamer's clearance not later than 25th May, we accept, &c." On the same day the defendants replied: "Highfield now on passage from Las Palmas since the 5th May, expected ready to load on May 22nd; steamer's clearance early as possible; steamer's clearance not later than end of this month; cable immediately if in order." On the 12th May the plaintiffs closed the negotiation by wiring: "Highfield, we accept your offer." Then the contract was made on the conditions that the steamer's clearance should be as early as possible and not later than the end of May. Contracts were subsequently exchanged on the forms of the London Corn Trade Association, and in these contracts the expression used was: "Clearance not later than 31st May instant." The question in the case is whether the condition as to clearance by the 31st May was complied with. No doubt the stipulation was made by the plaintiffs because it was necessary to have an early delivery of wheat in Havre. The French Government had temporarily suspended the import duty on wheat, and in order that the plaintiffs might obtain the benefit of this remission it was necessary that the wheat should arrive in Havre by the end of June; after that date the duty would become again payable. The vessel was not under the control or in the management of the defendants. She was a general ship managed by her own agents. She arrived at Galveston on the 26th May, and at once began taking in cargo—cotton and grain. She continued taking in cargo on the 27th and 28th May, and on the latter date she was moved to another pier where further cargo was waiting for her. There she completed her loading, the last cargo being taken on board on the 2nd June, on which date the vessel sailed. She was delayed on her voyage by a breakdown of machinery, and consequently did not arrive in Havre until the 1st July, a day too late to enable the plaintiffs to secure the benefit of the remission of the duty. Meanwhile, the plaintiffs had paid the defendants drafts for the price of the wheat and had obtained the shipping documents. This action was brought to recover back the money so paid, on the ground that the vessel had not "cleared" on the 28th May according to the contract.

Now, "clearance," in my opinion, has a well-known and definite meaning. It is a certificate issued by the Customs showing that the vessel named in it has complied with the Customs requirements and is authorised to proceed to sea, and the acts which have to be done at the Customs to procure such a certificate constitute the process of "clearing the vessel." In this case the clearance was issued to the Highfield on the 28th May. The document, or a certified copy of the document, was produced to me, and it reads as follows: "(Clearance.) The United States of America. Clearance of vessel to foreign port. District of Galveston, Port of Galveston. These are to certify all whom it doth concern that W. Richardson, Master or Commander of the British steamship Highfield, burden 164 tons or thereabouts, mounted with guns, navigated with 26 seamen all told, steel built, and bound for Havre, via Newport, Va., having on board bath here entered and cleared his said vessel, according to law." It is true that this document was issued before all the cargo was on board, but it was issued at a time when all the cargo was alongside and waiting to be put into the ship. The affidavits from America, which were read at the trial, satisfy me that it was issued in the ordinary course of business, and that it is customary to obtain the clearance of vessels before the loading is actually complete, so that there need be no delay in putting out to sea. I believe the practice is the same in this country and elsewhere, and it is obviously convenient because, if the formalities at the customs could not be gone through until every package was on board, great delay would be occasioned. A diligent captain, therefore, obtains his clearance as soon as his cargo is in such a position as to enable him to make out his manifest for use at the Customs, and that course was followed in this case. It was said that by the United States statute regulating the granting of clearances (sect. 197) the master of a ship is required to furnish the custom authorities with a manifest of the cargo, "on board . . . whereupon the collector shall grant a clearance." And it was suggested that, inasmuch as the cargo was not all on board, the clearance in this case was null and void. I cannot, however, listen to such a suggestion. For the purpose of the section in question it is obvious to me that the authorities treat cargo as on board if in fact it is already alongside the ship and in such circumstances that it must in the ordinary course of business find its way on board. The clearance obtained in this case was the only clearance ever issued, and the affidavits satisfy me beyond all doubt that it was issued in accordance with the usual practice, and that it authorised the vessel to sail whenever it pleased her master to put to sea. There is an affidavit by Mr. Rosenthal, the special deputy collector or chief executive officer of the port of Galveston. In that affidavit he says:—"It is the custom, and for very many years has been the custom, of this port and other ports of the United States to clear vessels at the Customs House before they have completed loading; and such clearance is and has been regarded by the Treasury Department as regular, legal, valid, effective and final." He further says, with reference to the clearance of this particular vessel: "No other clearance of the said vessel was issued by this Custom House; the vessel required no other clearance; and the clearance so issued was the final and valid and only clearance of the vessel for the voyage issued by the Custom House." He further says: "The vessel was entitled to sail immediately, and at the convenience of her master, after the issuance of the said clearance." He goes on further to say: "It is a common and well known recognised practice, and one of long standing both in the port of Galveston and other ports of the United States, and lawful under the rules and regulations of the Treasury Department of the United States to grant a clearance to a vessel whose cargo is delivered and alongside, and if known can be manifested before the whole cargo is actually placed on board of the vessel; that such a clearance is not provisional, there being no such clearance in the American usage as a temporary or provisional clearance; but that such a clearance is immediate, effective, and valid, and entitles a vessel to sail with the whole or any part of the cargo comprised in the manifest." There is not only the affidavit of the collector of Customs, but there is the affidavit of the master of this ship, William Richardson, in which he says: "I anticipated and hoped that I should have been able to complete the loading of the cargo by the 30th May or early on the 31st. The 29th was a Sunday, and the 30th was a public holiday, on which days I should have been unable to obtain clearance, and I was anxious to be in a position to sail without unnecessary delay and at the earliest possible moment, especially in view of the promise of a gratuity which had been offered to me by the above-named Messrs. Thalman Frères if I arrived in French waters by or before a certain date. The said clearance was issued to me regularly in accordance with the usual practice, and was final and complete when so issued, entitling me to sail whenever I chose after the said clearance and when loading was completed. It was applied for by me in the ordinary and usual course of my business for convenience of sailing. It has been my regular practice in American ports when, as in this case, I am in a position to give a complete manifest of my cargo as known to me, and it is, I believe, the almost universal practice of masters in similar circumstances, to obtain clearance before the completion of the loading, so as to be able to sail at the earliest possible moment after the loading is completed, which sailing might and often would be unnecessarily delayed by reason of the Customs office being closed at the time of the completion of the loading if it were compulsory to wait until this was completed." It was said that, having regard to the object of the stipulation as to clearance, I ought to put upon the terms a meaning different to that which I believe to be its ordinary meaning, and that I should read the words of the contract as meaning "cleared and ready to sail" not later than the 31st May. But it is not my duty to read into the contract words which the parties have not chosen to use; my duty is to give to the words which I find in the contract their ordinary signification and to interpret the contract accordingly. If the plaintiffs had chosen to do so, they could have stipulated that the vessel should sail by the date named—a very ordinary stipulation in contracts such as this. Such a stipulation, however, is by no means the same as clearing. Clearing and sailing are two quite different things, and clearing and being ready to sail are by no means necessarily the same thing. The plaintiffs chose their own expression—an expression, the meaning of which is to my mind not in the least doubtful—and, having chosen their own expression, their contract must be interpreted according to the meaning which I attribute to the word they have used. In these circumstances it appears to me that the condition in the contract has been performed, and the plaintiffs must therefore abide by their bargain, and having paid their money and taken their cargo, in my opinion the best thing they can do now is to abide by it. There will be judgment for the defendants.

Judgment for the defendants.

Carver, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the appellants.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that the certificate of clearance given in this case was a "clearance" within the meaning of the contract. The statute of the United States provides that a clearance is to be given when the cargo is on board, and that clearance is obtained upon a sworn statement of the master declaring all the cargo which is on board. A certificate of clearance can only be obtained before the loading of the cargo is completed if the master makes a false declaration that all the cargo is on board. The intention of the parties in this contract was that a "clearance" should be obtained in accordance with the law of the United States, and not that a certificate of clearance improperly obtained before all the cargo was loaded should satisfy the contract. The object of the purchasers was to make it certain that the vessel should sail soon enough to reach Havre before the end of June, and by "clearance" the parties meant that the vessel should have all the cargo on board so as to be ready to sail. Bigham, J. relied upon the practice in England as to giving clearances before all the cargo is loaded, but the statutory provisions in this country are not the same as those of the United States statute. The Customs Laws Consolidation Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36), by sect. 128 provides that "before any ship shall be cleared outwards the master . . . shall deliver to the collector a content of the ship" in the prescribed form, and by that form the master declares that the content is a true account of all goods "shipped and intended to be shipped on board;" and therefore a clearance may be given before the cargo is all loaded.

R. M. Bray, Q.C. and E. Bray, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Bigham, J. The action is brought by the purchasers of some wheat against the vendors for not delivering the wheat according to the contract. The term of the contract which it is alleged has been broken is that the vessel, by which the wheat was to be carried from Galveston to Havre, should be cleared not later than the 31st May. The plaintiffs say that they have suffered great damage by reason of the breach of that condition, because, if the wheat had arrived at Havre before the 1st July, it would have been free from import duty, and as the vessel did not arrive until the 1st July it was not in time and the import duty had to be paid. The only question in this case is whether, within the meaning of the contract, the vessel was cleared not later than the 31st May. The vendors say that it was, because the document known as a "clearance" was obtained by the master of the vessel on the 28th May, and therefore not later than the 31st May, and that it was an effective and valid clearance under which the vessel could sail at any time from Galveston, and under which she did in fact sail. What is the meaning of "clearance" in the contract? In my opinion it clearly means the obtaining of a certificate of clearance. The appellants say that it means a clearance according to the law of the United States, which cannot be given until all the cargo is on board, and that in this case the cargo was not all on board on the 28th May, when the certificate in question was given. I do not think that the meaning of this contract is that there must be a certificate of clearance given in strict accordance with the statute of the United States. I read the contract as meaning a clearance in accordance with the practice in vogue at Galveston, under which certificates of clearance are given by the Custom House authorities at Galveston. The certificate of clearance in this case was given in accordance with the practice at Galveston and at many other ports of the United States, and documents so given are valid and effective clearances which would entitle a vessel to sail from the port. The statement in the affidavit of the official at Galveston is that this clearance was regarded as "regular, valid, effective, and final"; that the vessel required no other clearance; that it is not provisional but is immediate, effective, and valid, and entitles a vessel to sail at the convenience of the master. What then is the meaning of "clearance" in this contract? It is not contended that it means that the ship shall sail not later than the 31st May. "Clearance" means the document of clearance which is usually given when the vessel is about ready to sail. It means the certificate of clearance, and Bigham, J. was right in so holding. I think, therefore, that the judgment of Bigham, J. was right and that this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. The plaintiffs did not enter into a contract by which it was agreed that the vessel should sail not later than the 31st May. The agreement is for "clearance not later than the 31st May." I think that that means a certificate of clearance, an execat, which permits the vessel to leave the port. It seems to me that the condition was performed in this case. It is admitted that a certificate of clearance was obtained not later than the 31st May, and that that certificate was valid and effective in the United States. Under those circumstances it seems to me that this condition was performed, and that there is nothing in the defence which has been set up.

Q.B. Div.]

HARROWING STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v. TOOHEY.

[Q.B. Div.]

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Hollams, Son, Coward, and Hawkesley.

Solicitor for the respondents, Tilleards.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Monday, March 12, 1900.

(Before KENNEDY, J.)

HARROWING STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v. TOOHEY. (a)

Shares in ships — Transfer — Registration of transfer—Fees payable on registration—Mode of calculating—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 26—Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44), s. 3, sched. 1.

Sect. 3 of the Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act 1898 provides that "such fees shall be paid in respect of the registration, transfer, and mortgage of British ships as the Board of Trade determine, not exceeding those specified in the first schedule to the Act"; and by the 1st schedule the fees to be paid on the transfer of ships are to be "according to the gross tonnage represented by the ships or shares of ships transferred."

Held, that, where shares in a ship are transferred by different bills of sale to the same transferee, each bill of sale is a separate transfer of interest, and on the registration of such bills of sale by the transferee a separate fee, according to the scale, is payable on the tonnage represented by the shares transferred by each bill of sale.

Fifty-eight shares in a ship were transferred by twenty bills of sale to the plaintiffs :

Held, that, on the registration of these bills of sale, the plaintiffs were bound to pay a separate fee on each bill of sale calculated on the tonnage transferred by such bill of sale, and not merely one fee on the total tonnage represented by all the shares transferred.

ACTION tried before Kennedy, J. in the Commercial Court.

The action was brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful refusal of the defendant to register the plaintiffs' name as transferees and owners of certain shares in six ships.

The action was tried upon an agreed statement of facts as follows :

The defendant is, or was recently, chief officer of Customs at the port of Whitby, within the meaning of sect. 4 (1) (a) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and is or was recently therefore registrar of British ships at the said port.

On the 4th July 1899 the plaintiffs produced to the defendant as such registrar 166 bills of sale for the transfer to the plaintiffs of in all 316 shares in six registered ships, with the declarations of transfer required by sect. 26 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and requested the defendant to enter their name as transferees in the register book as owners of the said shares, and indorse on the said bills of sale the fact of such entry having been made in accordance with the provisions of the last-mentioned section. The bills of sale represented the under-mentioned shares in respect of the six vessels :

Name of vessel.	Gross tonnage.	No. of 64th shares.	No. of bills of sale.	Gross tonnage represented by such number of 64th shares.	Fees.
Ethelburga	2223	58	20	2015	£4 0 0
Ethelreda	2160	47	28	1589	£3 7 6

[The names, gross tonnage, &c., with regard to the four other ships were given in the same way, and the total amount of the fees in the last column was 24l. 10s., which was the sum tendered by the plaintiffs in respect of the six vessels.]

There was only one declaration of transfer tendered in the case of each ship, which declaration included all the shares dealt with by the separate transfers relating to shares in such ship. It was not admitted, on the part of the defendant, that separate declarations in respect of each transfer could not, strictly speaking, have been required.

The plaintiffs at the same time tendered to the defendant the sum of 24l. 10s. as the amount due for fees upon such registration under the provisions of sect. 3 of the Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act 1898. The sum of 24l. 10s. was arrived at by charging one fee on the scale mentioned in the said Act upon the total of the tonnage on each of the six ships represented by the shares transferred in such ships respectively and dealt with by the transfers relating thereto respectively.

The defendant refused to register the plaintiffs' name without the payment of a separate fee upon the said scale on the tonnage transferred by each bill of sale. The amount payable on this principle would be 118l. 17s. 6d.

The point for the decision of the court was whether the fees tendered by the plaintiffs were sufficient. If such fees were sufficient, it was agreed that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment and damages for a nominal amount with costs.

Then there followed a complete list of the bills of sale, giving, with regard to each ship, the name of the transferor and of the transferees (the plaintiffs), the tonnage transferred for assessment per bill of sale, and the fee on the said tonnage if chargeable separately according to the tonnage transferred by each bill of sale.

For instance, taking the Ethelburga, out of a gross tonnage of 2223 tons there was a gross tonnage transferred of 2015 tons by twenty bills of sale. In each of fifteen of these bills of sale there was a tonnage of 34 tons transferred, and if separately chargeable—as the defendant contended—there would be a fee of 10s. in respect of the 34 tons transferred by each of these bills of sale, in all 7l. 10s.; there was one bill of sale transferring 69 tons (separate fee, 15s.); one transferring 104 tons (separate fee, 1l.); one transferring 138 tons (separate fee, 1l. 2s. 6d.); one transferring 555 tons (separate fee, 2l. 2s. 6d.); and one transferring 624 tons (separate fee, 2l. 5s.); so that if the fees were separately chargeable on the number of tons transferred by each bill of sale of shares relating to this one ship, the total fees would be for the Ethelburga, 14l. 15s.; whereas by the plaintiffs' contention only one fee was chargeable on the total tonnage (2015 tons) in the Ethelburga

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.B. Div.]

HARROWING STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v. TOOHEY.

[Q.B. Div.]

transferred by all the bills of sale, which according to the scale was 4l.

The difference in the amount of fees payable in respect of each ship according to the two modes of estimating the amount was as follows:

Name of vessel.	Fees according to plaintiffs' contention.	Fees according to defendant's contention.
Ethelburga ...	£4 0 0	£14 15 0
Ethelreda ...	3 7 6	17 0 0
Ethelvalda ...	4 0 0	22 17 6
Ethelaida ...	4 2 6	24 2 6
Ethelhilda ...	4 2 6	21 17 6
Ethelbryghta ...	4 17 6	18 5 0
Total ...	£24 10 0	£118 17 6

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) provides:

Sect. 26.—(1) Every bill of sale for the transfer of a registered ship or of a share therein, when duly executed, shall be produced to the registrar of her port of registry, with the declaration of transfer, and the registrar shall thereupon enter in the register book the name of the transferee as owner of the ship or share, and shall indorse on the bill of sale the fact of that entry having been made, with the day and hour thereof.

The Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44), provides:

Sect. 3. Such fees shall be paid in respect of the registration, transfer (including transmission), and mortgage of British ships as the Board of Trade, with the consent of the Treasury, determine, not exceeding those specified in the first schedule to this Act, and all such fees shall be paid into the Exchequer. Provided that fees shall not be payable under this section in respect of vessels solely employed in fishing or sailing ships of under one hundred tons.

First Schedule.—Table of maximum fees to be paid on the registration, transfer, and mortgage of ships.—2. Transfer and mortgage. — On transfer, transmission, registry anew, transfer of registry, mortgage and transfer of mortgage. According to the gross tonnage represented by the ships or shares of ships transferred, &c. (e.g., the transfer of a one-sixty-fourth share in a ship of 6400 tons to be reckoned as the transfer of 100 tons)

	£	s.	d.
Under 10 tons .....	0	2	6
10 tons and under 20 tons .....	0	5	0
20 " " 30 " .....	0	7	6
30 " " 40 " .....	0	10	0
40 " " 50 " .....	0	12	6
50 " " 75 " .....	0	15	0
75 " " 100 " .....	0	17	6
100 " " 125 " .....	1	0	0

and a further fee of 2s. 6d. for every additional fifty tons, or part of fifty tons, up to 500 tons, after which 2s. 6d. for every 100 tons, or part of 100 tons.

Horridge for the plaintiffs.—On the construction of the sections the basis of calculating these fees adopted by the plaintiffs is the correct one. These fees, specified in sched. 1, were not intended to meet the expenses of the registration of each transfer, but were intended to go to the General Lighthouse Fund constituted under the Act of 1898. The transaction must be looked at as a whole, and the intention of the Act clearly was that one fee should be payable in respect of the gross tonnage of all the shares in any one ship transferred to the person who seeks to be registered as owner of those shares, and it is immaterial that these shares are transferred to this person by more transfers than one. The fee is payable on the transaction as a whole, and not on the several transfers or several documents by which the shares are transferred to the plaintiffs. The fee is payable in respect of the ownership of a ship or shares where those have been transferred to one person. It is, as stated in the schedule, payable "according to the gross tonnage represented by the ships or shares of ships transferred"; and it makes no difference that the transfer of the ship or shares to one person has been effected by transfers from different transferors. The Act may fairly bear this construction, but if there be any doubt as to its construction, then, as it is a Taxing Act, it ought to be construed in favour of the plaintiffs. In Stockton Railway Company v. Barrett (11 Cl. & F. 590, at p. 607) Lord Brougham says: "It must be observed that, in dubio, you are always to lean against the construction which imposes a burthen on the subject. The meaning of the Legislature to tax him must be clear." In the case of Re J. Thorley; Thorley v. Massam (64 L. T. Rep. at p. 517; (1891) 2 Ch. at p. 623) Lindley, L.J.—speaking of Acts of Parliament which impose legacy duty—says: "Those Acts, like all other Taxing Acts, are to be read strictly; that is to say, they are not to be extended so as to have the effect of imposing on the subject a tax which Parliament has not clearly made him pay." The principle laid down in Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes (3rd edit. pp. 401, 402) is to the same effect.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Robert Finlay, Q.C.) (S. A. T. Rowlatt with him) for the defendant.—The fee is to be paid not on the transaction as a whole, but upon each transfer of interest. "According to the gross tonnage represented by the shares transferred" means according to the shares transferred by each transfer, and not according to the total shares transferred to one transferee by all the transfers relating to one ship. To see what fees are payable, we have to find out how many transfers of interest there have been to the person seeking to be registered as owner. In the case of the first ship, the Ethelburga, there were twenty separate transfers to the plaintiffs, and therefore twenty separate interests have been transferred to the plaintiffs. If these twenty separate transfers had been to twenty separate persons, instead of to one person (the plaintiffs), then it could not have been contended that the fee would not have been payable on each transfer. Take the case of a person having five shares which he transfers to five different persons, then clearly there would be five different transfers of interest, and the fee would be payable on the tonnage transferred by each transfer. In the same way if there be five persons who have between them five shares and they transfer these five shares to one person, there would be five transfers of interest; and there are none the less five transfers because they result in transferring the five shares to one person instead of to five persons. The basis of calculation, therefore, adopted by the defendant is in accordance with the intention of the Act, and is the correct one.

Horridge in reply.

KENNEDY, J.—I think that this matter is reasonably clear; and that the view which is taken by the Customs is the right one. As I read the section, on a transfer there is to be a payment of a fee according to the gross tonnage represented by the ships or shares of ships transferred. Now, in the present case one purchaser gets transferred to him a number of shares, but each of those shares, or a certain number of those shares, are not merely transferred in different documents—and this is not a tax or charge upon documents—and each of those transfers is in fact a separate transaction, and is in that sense a separate transfer. Just as, I take it, if a man got by will a transmission of ten shares and by purchase another ten, each of these would be chargeable with a separate fee when he came to register, although he might buy the ten shares, and have possibly transmitted to him the other ten shares by succession or by devise at the same time. So it seems to me that, although it is a purchasing at the same time from different persons, the plaintiffs ought to pay according to this scale on the gross tonnage represented by the shares in each transfer as a separate transaction, and as if they had not at the same time bought the others. Therefore to my mind it appears to be clear that the defendant is entitled to judgment.

Q.B. DIV.] TURNBULL, MARTIN, AND CO. v. HULL UNDERWRITERS' ASSOCIATION. [Q.B. DIV.]

Judgment for the defendant with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Holman, Birdwood, and Co.

Solicitor for the defendant, C. J. Follett, Solicitor of the Customs.

April 25 and 30, 1900.

(Before MATHEW, J.)

TURNBULL, MARTIN, AND CO. v. HULL UNDERWRITERS' ASSOCIATION. (A)

Marine insurance—Loss of freight—Exception—
—“Claim consequent on loss of time”—Frozen meat—Destruction of refrigerator.

A policy on freight of frozen meat contained the clause, “Chartered freights and freights are warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time.” Before the vessel loaded the meat, a fire destroyed her refrigerating machinery, so that she could not carry frozen meat. It was necessary to bring the materials to repair from England to Australia, where the fire occurred, which would have involved great delay.

Held, that, as this would have rendered the earning the freight commercially impossible, this was a loss “consequent on loss of time” within the words of the policy.

THIS was an action to recover a total loss on a policy on freight on a cargo of frozen meat.

The insurance was on the outward voyage of the steamship Buteshire for freight expected to be earned on the homeward voyage, and the risk was described in the following terms:

At and from London to any port or ports and (or) place or places in any order or rotation in Australia and (or) Tasmania and (or) New Zealand, risk to continue until steamer sails from final loading port on homeward voyage.

The subject-matter was described as follows:

Upon freight of frozen meat, chartered or as if chartered, on board or not on board, full interest admitted.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The policy also contained the following special clause:

Chartered freights and freights are warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time whether arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise.

It was not disputed that the words “or otherwise” meant other perils insured against.

The evidence showed that at the time when the vessel sailed no contracts had been secured by the plaintiffs for the shipment of frozen meat from the colonial ports, but such contracts were made, and the homeward cargo was booked at Newcastle, Melbourne, and New Zealand ports, while the vessel was making her outward voyage. Frozen meat must be shipped at the times specified in the contracts with shippers, and the shipments cannot be delayed. Where the vessel is disabled from fulfilling her engagements frozen meat would in the ordinary course be forwarded in another vessel. A delay involving no great length of time due to damage by perils insured against, either to ship or machinery, would prevent the vessel from earning freight contracted for, and would thus defeat the object of the adventure. The risk is therefore one which underwriters would be cautious about accepting. The Buteshire was fitted with refrigerating machinery of a special kind in three of her five holds. The other holds were used for ordinary cargo.

The ship arrived at Sydney on the 15th Oct. 1898 and discharged her outward cargo.

On the 18th Oct. a fire occurred on board, and so damaged her refrigerating machinery that she was disabled from carrying a cargo of frozen meat. Materials for the repair of the refrigerating machinery could not be procured, and must have been brought from England, and the owners properly determined to send the vessel home with such ordinary cargo as she could procure and to have the damage repaired in England. The earning of the freight was in this way rendered commercially impossible.

Carver, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the plaintiffs.—The clause that “chartered freights and freights are warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time” has no application here. The case upon which the defendants are relying is Bensaude v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company (77 L. T. Rep. 282; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 315; (1897) A. C. 609). In that case the clause was “free from any claim consequent on loss of time, whether arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise,” and owing to the shaft breaking and the delay arising the charterers put an end to the charter. Here the loss is not one of time, but of machinery, and the power of carrying frozen meat only arose because the refrigeration was gone. This was not a case of a chartered freight. They also referred to

Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company, 31 L. T. Rep. 789; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Theobald Mathew for the defendants.—This case cannot in principle be distinguished from Bensaude v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), and this is a “claim consequent on loss of time.” The whole loss was incurred here because the refrigerating machinery could not be repaired

Q.B. Div.]

NICKOLL AND KNIGHT v. ASHTON, EDRIDGE, AND CO.

[Q.B. Div.]

quickly, and so it was "consequent on loss of time."

Carver, Q.C. in reply.

April 30.—MATHEW, J. read the following judgment:—[His Lordship, after stating the facts set out above, continued:] It was argued for the plaintiffs upon the authority of Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (31 L. T. Rep. 789; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125) that a delay due to a peril insured against which frustrated the object of the voyage and prevented the vessel from earning her homeward freight entitled the plaintiffs to recover as for a total loss. For the defendants reliance was placed on the terms of the warranty and upon the decision in the case of Bensaude v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company (77 L. T. Rep. 282; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 315; (1897) A. C. 609). The loss, it was argued, was due not merely to the fire, but to the time which the repairs must have taken. The argument for the plaintiffs, on the other hand, that the claim was consequent not upon loss of time but upon the disablement of the vessel by a peril insured against was rejected by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords in that case. The damage in both cases was of such a character that it became impossible to prosecute the voyage within the necessary time. An attempt was made to distinguish the present case from the decision in Bensaude v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company on the ground that this was not chartered freight; but the warranty applies not only to chartered freight but to all freights; and the several contracts of affreightment made with the shippers had the same operation as if they were grouped in a charter party. In each case the result of the peril insured against would have been the same—viz., to disable the ship from fulfilling her engagements in proper time. It seems to me that no such distinction can be reasonably made. The ship was damaged by a peril insured against; and her capacity to carry frozen meat was suspended until her machinery had been repaired. If she could have been repaired promptly there would have been no loss of freight. The loss, therefore, was "consequent on loss of time" within the meaning of the warranty. I give judgment for the defendants.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitors: Hollams, Son, Coward, and Hawksley; Walton, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

May 2 and 7, 1900.

(Before MATHEW, J.)

NICKOLL AND KNIGHT v. ASHTON, EDRIDGE, AND CO. (a)

Sale of goods—Contract for sale of cargo—Cargo to be shipped by specified ship at specified time—Impossibility of performance through damage to ship—Liability of seller—Implied condition as to ending of contract.

The defendants on the 24th Oct. 1899 made a contract with the plaintiffs for the sale to the plaintiffs of a cargo of cotton seed to be shipped at Alexandria during the month of Jan. 1900

by the steamship Orlando, which had been chartered on the 13th Oct. by Messrs. B. to proceed to Alexandria and load the cargo, the charterers having the option of cancelling the charter if the ship did not arrive by the 25th Jan. 1900. Messrs. B. sold the cargo to the defendants, who in turn sold it to the plaintiffs. While the ship was on her way to load her outward cargo she was, on the 21st Nov., so damaged by perils of the seas through stranding as to make it impossible for her to arrive at the port of loading in time to take the cargo on board, and on the 20th Dec. notice of this fact, and that it would be impossible for the ship to load before March, was given to the plaintiffs. The contract contained no express provision as to what was to happen in the event of the ship being so damaged as to be unable to perform the contract, and its performance thus became impossible through no fault of either party. In an action by the plaintiffs for damages for breach of the contract:

Held, that the contract having become impossible of performance through the damage to the ship, a condition ought to be implied in it that under the circumstances neither party was bound by it; that the contract was therefore at an end, and that the defendants were not liable to the plaintiffs for its non-performance by them.

ACTION tried before Mathew, J. in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs Messrs. Nickoll and Knight carried on business in the city of London as grain and seed merchants and oil brokers, and the defendants carried on business there as grain and seed brokers.

The action was brought to recover a sum of 2808l. 2s. 9d. as damages for breach of a contract dated the 24th Oct. 1899, for the sale by the defendants to the plaintiffs of a cargo of Egyptian cotton-seed for shipment in the month of Jan. 1900, per the steamer Orlando.

On the 13th Oct. 1899, Messrs. Behrend, of London, agreed with the owner of the Orlando to charter the steamer, which was to proceed from the Baltic or the United Kingdom or Continent to Alexandria, in Egypt, and there load a cargo not exceeding 1900 tons of cotton-seed for a safe port in the United Kingdom or Continent within certain limits. By clauses in the charter-party the owner was to be at liberty to take an outward cargo to the Mediterranean or any ports on the way to Alexandria, and lay days were not to commence until the 1st Jan. 1900, unless both ship and cargo were ready before that date, and the charterers were to have the option of cancelling the charter if the steamer did not arrive and be ready to load by the 25th Jan. 1900; and the act of God, perils, dangers, and accidents of the sea, fire from any cause, strandings, collisions, and all other accidents of navigation and all losses and damages caused thereby were excepted in the usual way.

On the 24th Oct. 1899, Messrs. Behrend instructed the defendants to sell a cargo of from 1600 tons to 1900 tons of cotton-seed for shipment by the Orlando, in Jan. 1900, and on the same day the defendants arranged for the sale to the plaintiffs. The defendants not giving the name of their principals became liable as principals

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.B. Div.]

NICKOLL AND KNIGHT v. ASHTON, EDRIDGE, AND Co.

[Q.B. Div.]

on this contract. The sale was effected by the defendants passing to the plaintiffs a sold contract, and to Messrs. Behrend a bought contract in identical terms (except as to commission).

The material parts of this contract were as follows:

Sold this day (24th Oct. 1899) to Messrs. Nickoll and Knight the following Egyptian cotton-seed, namely, a cargo to consist of from 1600 tons to 1900 tons to be shipped by a steamer at Alexandria and (or) Port Said and (or) Ismalia, during the month of Jan. 1900, per ss. Orlando, at 6l. 3s. 9d. per ton. The seed is to be delivered at destined port to buyers' craft alongside in sound and merchantable condition, and paid for in London in fourteen days from being ready for delivery by cash (against shipping documents or delivery order if required), &c. Particulars of shipment are to be duly declared, the vessel to go to any safe floating port in the United Kingdom, buyers to give destination in writing immediately upon receiving notice from the sellers that such is required, &c.

Clause 5 was as follows:

In case of prohibition of export, blockade, or hostilities, preventing shipment, this contract, or any unfulfilled part thereof, is to be cancelled.

Clause 6 dealt with the case of the non-discharge of the cargo by reason of a strike or lock-out, and clause 7 provided as to arbitration in case the whole or any portion of the seed should on arrival turn out not equal to the warranty or be damaged or out of condition and generally in case there should be any claim or dispute arising out of the contract, and the contract was to be void as regards any portion that might not arrive by the steamer declared under this contract.

The contract made no provision as to what should be the rights of the parties in case the vessel were unable to perform the contract.

While the vessel was proceeding on her way from West Hartlepool to load her outward cargo she grounded in the Baltic on the 21st Nov. She was salvaged, taken into harbour, and was found to be so severely damaged as to render it impossible for her to proceed to Alexandria in the stipulated time.

The repairs were not completed till the end of February or early in March.

On the 19th Dec. the shipbrokers wrote that the ship was so damaged that it would be impossible for her to load before March, and on the 20th Dec. the defendants sent a copy of this letter to the plaintiffs with the additional statement by the shipbrokers that it would possibly be May before the ship could be loaded, so that the plaintiffs knew on the 20th Dec. that it would be impossible for the ship to arrive and load the cargo at the stipulated time.

As soon as it became apparent that the ship could not arrive in time to carry out the contract arbitration proceedings took place between the parties, but these proceedings ultimately proved abortive, and the present action was begun on the 28th Feb. 1900.

A week after action brought Messrs. Behrend heard that the Orlando was about to proceed to Alexandria to fulfil her charter, and on the 8th March the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs and offered to load the cargo, but the plaintiffs refused.

The question now was whether, the contract having become impossible of performance through the damage to the vessel without any default on the part of the defendants, the defendants were liable to the plaintiffs for breach of the contract, the contract itself making no provision for what happened to the vessel.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (F. W. Hollams with him) for the plaintiffs.—The contract was an absolute contract to load this cargo during the month of January, and amounted to an implied undertaking or a warranty by the defendants that the ship should be able and ready to take the cargo on board at the stipulated time. By the contract the defendants undertook the risk of the vessel being disabled or damaged by perils of the seas and not being able to perform the contract, and the defendants are liable in damages if the ship is so damaged that she cannot arrive in time to perform the contract. It may be said that the damage to the ship arose from unforeseen circumstances over which the defendants had no control, and the defendants ought not to be liable in damages in consequence. The answer to that is that the defendants could have, and ought to have, provided against that in the contract, but they have not done so. There is no such clause in the contract as would exonerate the defendants from the risk of damage to the vessel; on the contrary, there is an indication in the contract that the defendants are to be liable in such a case. It is said that there ought to be a condition implied in the contract that if the contract becomes impossible of performance without default of either party, then neither party ought to be bound. But clause 5 of the contract expressly provides for the cases where the contract was to be cancelled, and these must be taken to be exclusive of all other causes. The non-arrival of the ship to take the cargo on board at the proper time is not one of these cases, and must therefore be taken to be excluded from the causes which entitle the defendants to cancel the contract. The defendants, therefore, not having loaded the cargo according to the contract, are liable in damages to the plaintiffs: Ashmore and Son v. C. S. Cox and Co. (1899) 1 Q. B. 436.

Bray, Q.C. (Edward Bray with him) for the defendants.—When the contract became impossible of performance by the damage to the ship the defendants were no longer bound by it, and a condition ought to be implied in the contract that under such circumstances the defendants were excused from the performance of it. The argument for the plaintiffs rests on this, that a warranty should be implied in the contract that the ship should be in existence, and should be able to take the cargo on board in January. That would amount to insuring the ship, and it would be most unreasonable to throw that burden upon the defendants in the absence of an express stipulation for the purpose. There is no such express stipulation. The principle applicable in this case is well laid down by Blackburn, J. in Taylor v. Caldwell (8 L. T. Rep. 356, at p. 358; 3 B. & S. 826, at p. 839), thus: "The principle seems to us to be that, in contracts in which the performance depends on the continued existence of a given person or thing, a condition is implied that the impossibility of performance arising from the perishing of the person or thing shall excuse the performance." Here the performance depends on

Q.B. Div.]

NICKOLL AND KNIGHT v. ASHTON, EDRIDGE, AND Co.

[Q.B. Div.]

the continued existence of the ship, and it became impossible to perform the contract in January without any fault on our part, and therefore in the words of Blackburn, J. that excuses the performance. Again he says that in such a contract as this, "in the absence of any warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused, in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor." This language is cited and approved of by Kelly, C.B. in Robinson v. Davison (24 L. T. Rep. 755; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 269). So, in Howell v. Coupland (30 L. T. Rep. 677; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 462), where the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff a quantity of potatoes to be grown, and where before the time for delivery the potato blight appeared and the crop failed, it was held that the contract was subject to the implied condition that the defendant should be excused when the performance had become impossible without any default on his part; and Blackburn, J. held that the principle he had laid down in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.), applied. The same principle was laid down in Baily v. De Crespigny (19 L. T. Rep. 681; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 180), and in Clifford v. Watts (22 L. T. Rep. 717; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 577). This was the case of a cargo to be shipped by a particular vessel, to arrive at a particular time with a particular cargo, and every one of these decisions shows that in the absence of an express warranty that she should arrive, there is no contract that she should arrive. The whole thing is made to depend on the vessel arriving, and it assumes the continued existence and safe arrival of the vessel. In the words of Parke, B., in the case of a similar contract, in Johnson v. Macdonald (9 M. & W. 600, at p. 605): "I think, therefore, that according to its true meaning, the language of this contract renders the performance of it conditional on a double event, the arrival in safety of the vessel and her cargo . . . and that, if the vessel is lost, the contract is to be altogether void." No inference can be drawn from the insertion in the printed contract of clause 5, which has been relied on by the plaintiffs. There is nothing in that clause which excludes the implication which is shown by the above cases to exist. [MATHEW, J. referred to Roth v. Taysen, Townsend, and Co. (73 L. T. Rep. 628; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 120; 1 Com. Cas. 306); and to Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company Limited (31 L. T. Rep. 789; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125.)

Joseph Walton, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 7.—MATHEW, J.—This was an action brought to recover 280*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* as damages for breach of contract for the sale by the defendants to the plaintiffs of a cargo of cotton-seed. The contract was entered into on the 24th Oct. 1899, and the defendants by that contract sold to the plaintiffs a cargo of Egyptian cotton-seed consisting of from 1600 to 1900 tons to be shipped at Alexandria and (or) Port Said and (or) Ismalia during the month of Jan. 1900 by the steamship Orlando at 6*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* per ton. The contract contained a series of clauses, each of which is important in arriving at the meaning of the contract. What happened was this. The ship was disabled by perils of the seas from arriving in time to take the cargo on board, and in these circumstances damages were claimed by the plaintiffs because the defendants had not done what was impossible, namely, to ship the cargo as provided for in the contract. It is only necessary to say that the 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th clauses of the contract all would seem to assume that the contract was to become operative on its being shown that the ship was fit to take the cargo on board in the time specified in the contract. No express provision was made in the contract for what happened to the ship. The contract having been made in October, in the following month the ship, which was then in the Baltic, was stranded by perils of the sea and was so damaged, it was agreed, as to make it impossible for her to arrive in time at the port of loading. Notice of this fact was given to the plaintiffs on the 20th Dec. and the position of the parties to the transaction at that time was this: From the correspondence it appears that a firm of Behrend and Co. had chartered the ship to bring the cargo home. They sold the cargo to the defendants who, by a contract in similar terms, sold it to the plaintiffs. When notice was given of the condition of the ship and it was clear that she could not be repaired in time, there was a proposal to settle any dispute between the parties by arbitration. The attempt to arbitrate became abortive. The umpire who was appointed refused to state a case upon the question of law proposed to be raised, and upon that he withdrew from his position of umpire, and the case then came into court. The argument for the plaintiffs was this: The contract, it was said, was an absolute contract to load the cargo in January and that a warranty should therefore be implied that the ship would then be able to take the cargo on board. The defendants, it was said, took upon themselves the risk of the ship being lost or disabled by perils of the sea and must therefore be answerable in damages. It was said that the matter occurred from unforeseen circumstances which were beyond the control of the defendants, but that they ought to have provided against any such contingency by the terms of their contract. The principle upon which the plaintiffs based their argument is indicated in very many cases; and I may refer to the recent case of Ashmore and Son v. C. S. Cox and Co. (1899) 1 Q. B. 436, as indicating that principle. On the other hand, for the defendants it was urged that any such warranty was unreasonable and ought not to be implied, as no man of business would be likely in such a contract to insure the safety of the ship from the date of the contract in October until the following January. Both parties, it was argued, assumed that the ship would be fit to fulfil her engagement and therefore had contemplated her continued existence and her fitness to take cargo on board and that this was the basis of what was to be done. Therefore, it was argued, a condition ought to be implied that the defendants should be excused when performance became impossible by the loss or damage to the ship by a sea peril. Many cases were cited in support of this contention; but reliance was principally placed upon the statement of the law in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.). There the rule is stated in the following terms by Lord Blackburn (then Blackburn, J.) (8 L. T. Rep., at p. 357; 3 B. & S., Q.B. Div.]

SLEIGH v. TYSER.

[Q.B. Div.]

at p. 833): "There seems no doubt that where there is a positive contract to do a thing, not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although in consequence of unforeseen accidents, the performance of his contract has become unexpectedly burthen-some or even impossible. . . . But this rule is only applicable when the contract is positive and absolute, and not subject to any condition either express or implied; and there are authorities which, as we think, establish the principle that where from the nature of the contract it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract, they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done; there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor." Many cases were cited in the course of the argument to show that that is an established principle of law, and it may be pointed out that it is recognised in the Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 7. That section runs: "Where there is an agreement to sell specific goods, and subsequently the goods, without any fault on the part of the seller or buyer, perish before the risk passes to the buyer, the agreement is thereby avoided."

It seems to me that the contention of the defendants is right, and that in the circumstances of this case the contract was at an end. It had become impossible of performance, and the condition ought to be implied that in the circumstances neither party was to be bound. It was further contended for the plaintiffs that, although such an implication might arise in other circumstances, it was not reasonable having regard to clause 5 of the contract in question. That clause contained, it was said, the sole conditions upon which the contract was not to be binding. The clause ran thus: "In case of prohibition of export, blockade, or hostilities, preventing shipment, this contract or any unfulfilled part thereof, is to be cancelled." It was said that no additional condition ought to have been implied—expressum facit cessare tacitum—and it will be remembered that a similar argument was urged in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company Limited (31 L. T. Rep. 789; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125); but the stipulations are not repugnant to each other. They are all useful and reasonable, and the stipulation in question, the implied stipulation contended for by the defendants, applies to a different stage of the transaction than that contemplated by clause 5. I therefore think that contention on the part of the plaintiffs fails. Then it was asked how far will this implied condition go? Was it to be applied in all cases, as, for example, where the shipowner was guilty of a breach of the charter-party and sent the vessel elsewhere, or absolutely refused to take the cargo on board? In such a case the implication would not be reasonable, for the plaintiffs would assume that the defendants had entered into a contract of charter, or were protected by a contract of charter, which would bind the owner to take the cargo on board, and there would be a remedy over against the owner of the ship for any breach of his charter-party. It is only necessary to refer to one other point in the case. There was a prolonged argument as to the proper measure of damages, and it appeared that towards the end of December the plaintiffs might have obtained another cargo at the then market price much less than the price at the end of the month of January. That they might have obtained it was clear from the fact that they did procure another cargo, but it was insisted that the plaintiffs were entitled to wait and watch the rising market until the end of January and claim their damages on the footing of the then market rate. I can only express the opinion—because it is not necessary for my judgment—that no such contention is tenable on the part of the plaintiffs. I think, having regard to the decision in Roth v. Taysen, Townsend, and Co. (73 L. T. Rep. 628; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 120; affirmed in C. A. 1 Com. Cas. 306), the plaintiffs here would have been bound to endeavour to mitigate the loss by acting as ordinary men of business would act, and determining the liability at the date when they entered into the second contract. If that is the proper measure of damages the amount that has been paid into court would cover the plaintiffs' claim. I therefore give judgment for the defendants with costs.

Judgment for defendants with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Hollams, Sons, Coward, and Hawkesley.

Solicitors for the defendants, Tilleards.

May 7, 8, 9, and 22, 1900.

(Before BIGHAM, J.)

SLEIGH v. TYSER. (a)

Marine insurance — Policy — Cargo — Implied warranty as to seaworthiness — Approval of Lloyd's agents' surveyor — Ventilation — Insufficiency of cattlemen.

In a policy on a cargo the implied warranty of seaworthiness is not excluded by a provision that "fittings and conditions of the cattle to be approved by Lloyd's agents' surveyor."

Insufficient ventilation and an insufficient supply of cattlemen constitute a breach of the implied condition of seaworthiness of a cargo of cattle.

THIS was an action brought on a Lloyd's policy to recover from the defendant his proportion of the amount payable in respect of a loss of cattle shipped at Brisbane in the steamer Ningchow for carriage to Lorenço Marques in Delagoa Bay.

The defence was that the ship was unseaworthy for the carriage of the cargo because of want of proper appliances for ventilation, and because she carried an insufficient number of cattlemen to attend to the beasts.

The reply to that defence consisted of a denial of the unseaworthiness and of an allegation that the implied warranty of unseaworthiness was excluded by the express terms of the policy.

The policy was dated the 10th Feb. 1899.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[Q.B. Div.]

SLEIGH v. TYSER.

[Q.B. Div.]

It was in the usual form, but contained some special provisions.

The subject-matter of the insurance was described as "500 cattle valued at 14*l.* each."

The premium was 15 guineas per cent., but to return 3 per cent. for no claim.

The insurance was to cover "all risks of shipping, unloading craft, &c., until safely landed; all risks including mortality and jettison arising from any cause whatever; animals walking ashore or when slung from the vessel, walking after being taken out of the slings, and landed, to be deemed arrived and no claim to attach to this policy on such animals. Each animal to be deemed a separate insurance. Fittings and conditions of the cattle to be approved by Lloyd's agents' surveyor."

The Ningchow had been chartered by the plaintiff under a time charter which provided that the owners of the ship should allow the charterer to erect and secure stock and extra passenger fittings, and should provide accommodation for not exceeding twelve stockmen, the charterer paying the owners two shillings per man per day for victualling the number carried.

The shipment of the cattle began on the 20th Feb. and finished on the 22nd Feb. 1899, 438 beasts being put on board. Of this number eighty-eight were put on an orlop deck, which was laid at the bottom of the vessel; 180 were put on the between decks, and 170 on the main deck. Above the cattle on the main deck 1000 sheep were carried on a temporary staging erected for the purpose. The animals were in charge of a body of about fourteen stockmen furnished by the plaintiff, a man named Monro being their foreman or captain.

Before the vessel arrived at Lorenzo Marques practically all the cattle on the between decks had died, and over 30 per cent. of those on the orlop and main decks had met the same fate. Only 185 beasts out of the whole number were landed alive at the port of destination.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and G. A. Hamilton for the plaintiff.—The bad weather was the cause of the mortality of the cattle. If there ever was any defect in the ventilation it was put right before the ship sailed. The fittings and the condition of the cattle were all approved by Lloyd's agents' surveyor before the voyage commenced, and this under the express terms of the policy excludes the implied warranty of seaworthiness.

Robson, Q.C. and Scrutton for the defendant.—There was a breach of the implied warranty of seaworthiness, as the ship was not seaworthy as a cattle ship. It was laid down in Quebec Marine Insurance Company v. Commercial Bank of Canada (22 L. T. Rep. 559; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 414; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 234) that there may be different stages of seaworthiness in cases where the different stages of navigation involve the necessity of a different equipment or state of seaworthiness, but the vessel must be properly equipped, and in all respects seaworthy for each of the stages respectively at the time when she enters upon each stage, otherwise the warranty of seaworthiness is not complied with. The Court of Appeal held in Owners of Cargo on Ship Maori King v. Hughes (73 L. T. Rep. 141; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; (1895) 2 Q. B. 550) that there was an implied warranty that the refrigerating machinery was at the time of shipment fit to carry the frozen meat in good condition; so here there must be such a warranty implied that the ventilation was sufficient to carry cattle safely. It is said that the clause relating to the approval of Lloyd's agents' surveyor excludes the implied warranty, but that is not so. In Bigge v. Parkinson (7 L. T. Rep. 92; 7 H. & N. 955), where the defendant undertook to supply the plaintiffs with troop stores "guaranteed to pass survey of the East India Company's officers," it was held that this express warranty did not exclude the warranty implied by law that the stores should be reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were intended.

Walton, Q.C., in reply, referred to

Mody v. Gregson, 19 L. T. Rep. 458; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 49;

Dickson v. Zinzinia, 15 Jur. 359.

May 22.—BIGHAM, J. read the following judgment:—[After stating the facts set out above, his Lordship continued:] This mortality (about 60 per cent.) is admittedly far in excess of what might reasonably be expected. The bulk of it occurred during the first part of the voyage when the ship was traversing Australian waters, where the carrying of live cattle is a common trade, and where the evidence shows that the mortality in ordinary circumstances seldom exceeds 3 per cent. To what was this exceptional mortality due? On the one hand, the defendant says it was due to bad ventilation and insufficient attendance to the wants of the cattle. On the other hand, the plaintiff says it was due to the weather and the consequent rolling of the ship. I am satisfied that there was no weather to account for the loss. Before the vessel went to sea—namely, on the 22nd Feb.—dead bullocks were being thrown out of No. 1 and No. 2 holds, and the same thing was taking place on the day after the vessel sailed, the 24th. On these two days nineteen beasts were thrown into the sea. No weather or rolling of the sea can account for this initial mortality, and indeed counsel for the plaintiffs admits that he cannot claim for this part of the loss, because he says that the deaths may be reasonably attributed to bad ventilation existing on the 21st and 22nd Feb. He says, however, that the defects in ventilation were remedied on the 23rd, and on that day, which is the day of sailing, it was in proper order. But what happened immediately after sailing? The ship rolled heavily at times, at times she was pitching, and for two or three days the weather may be described as bad—namely, from the 28th Feb. to the 2nd March. In my opinion this weather was by no means exceptional; it was such as might be expected, and should be provided against by making the fittings and the construction of the pens such as to prevent undue damage to the cattle by being knocked about. What happened to the cattle during this short period from the 25th Feb. to the 3rd March? Twenty were thrown overboard on the 25th, twenty-four on the 26th, twenty-three on the 27th, two on the 28th, twenty-six on the 1st March, &c. So by the time the vessel had been out eight days she had lost more than a third of her shipments. After this no doubt the weather became fine, and the number of deaths decreased. But the number, having regard to the small number of beasts on board, was still quite exceptional. The facts I have already mentioned appear in the log. Then the captain, although in cross-examination he says there was enough in the weather to account for a great deal of the loss, in examination in chief he says that the deaths were due to heat, overloading, and insufficiency of cattlemen. In that I agree with him, and also in what he says that there was no weather to account for the heavy mortality. The vessel, in my opinion, went to sea most insufficiently ventilated for the cargo she had to carry. Evidence was called before me which satisfied me that the ventilation on all three decks was insufficient. To this cause I attribute the abnormal mortality. I think also that the number of men, fourteen, put on board for attending to the cattle was not large enough to secure the carriage of the cattle in safety to their destination. I do not forget in coming to these conclusions either the certificate of Lloyd's agents' surveyor or the fact that certain statutory provisions had to be complied with, and are certified by a Government official as having been complied with in connection with the accommodation for the cattle on board the vessel. I arrive at my conclusions notwithstanding this double certification. The insurance having been effected the cattle were hurriedly shipped without any proper care being taken to secure their safe arrival. Of course, the onus of proving the unseaworthiness is upon the defendant; but he fully discharged it. The question then arises whether insufficient ventilation and an insufficient supply of men constitute a breach of the implied condition of seaworthiness. I think they do. This implied condition in a policy on cargo is exactly the same as in a policy on ship—viz., that the ship shall be seaworthy for the adventure on which she starts; stating the condition with particular reference to a policy on cargo, it may be defined as a condition that the ship shall be fit for the proposed service; fit, that is, in respect of all those things which appertain to the safe carriage of the cargo in question to its destination. No doubt it is not usual for underwriters on cargo to rely on the defence of unseaworthiness; the underwriter usually pays the cargo owner and avails himself of the latter's rights against the shipowner, the benefit of which he obtains by subrogation: (see McArthur, Contract of Marine Insurance, 2nd edit., p. 13). But this is because of the supposed hardship of the law which makes innocent shippers of cargo responsible for the oversight or negligence of the shipowner. The practice does not modify the law, and in the present case the hardship out of which the practice has sprung does not exist, for the plaintiff had himself undertaken with the shipowner to provide both the ventilation appliances and the cattlemen. Then were proper ventilation and a sufficient number of men to attend to the beasts things which were required on board this vessel for the safe carriage of the cargo to its destination? I am clearly of opinion that they were. Many cargoes besides cargoes of living animals require ventilation if they are to be carried safely, and it cannot be doubted that a ship which put to sea without proper means of providing the necessary ventilation, or without sufficient men to utilise those means, would be unseaworthy for the service required.

[Q. B. Div.]

SLEIGH v. TYSER.

[Q. B. Div.]

But it is said that in this case the implied warranty is gone by reason of the express words in the policy to which I have already referred—"the fittings and conditions of the cattle to be approved by Lloyd's agents' surveyor." They were in a somewhat halting way so approved; the certificate of the surveyor has been read, and it sufficiently complies with the requirements of the clause. It is argued for the plaintiff that his compliance with this express provision discharges him from further obligation. I do not think so. The certificate has nothing to do with the sufficiency of men shipped on board to attend to the cattle; with that matter the surveyor did not concern himself; and though ventilation appliances may well come within the meaning of the word "fittings," the question remains, Did the parties by this stipulation, that the fittings should be approved by the surveyor, intend to supersede the implied warranty of seaworthiness in respect of ventilation? I am of opinion that they did not. I think this stipulation was inserted in the policy for the benefit of the underwriter, and was intended to be additional to and not in substitution for the important condition upon the basis of which all contracts of this description are prima facie made. It may be asked what additional advantage does the stipulation give to the underwriter? I think the answer is that it probably enables him to reinsure with greater ease, and it affords him some assurance that he will not find himself involved in an action such as this. To exclude the implied warranty of seaworthiness the words used must be express, pertinent, and apposite: (per Lord Penzance in Quebec Marine Insurance Company v. Commercial Bank of Canada, 22 L. T. Rep. 559; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 414; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 234). If I could find in these words sufficient to satisfy me that the parties intended that Lloyd's agents' surveyor should be put in the position of a sole judge to decide once for all whether the fittings were enough for the purpose required, I should probably come to a different conclusion as to the intention of the parties in introducing the stipulation relied on. But I do not find anything of the kind. The stipulation is, in my opinion, merely superadded for the benefit of the underwriter, and therefore does not exclude the implied warranty: (Mody v. Gregson, 19 L. T. Rep. 458; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 49). A question was raised by me during the hearing of the case as to the effect of the clause in the policy by which each animal is to be deemed a separate insurance; but I think nothing turns on that clause. It is inserted with a view to qualifying the liability for particular average, and with that view only. The result is that there must be judgment for the defendant. Judgment accordingly.

Solicitors: James Ballantyne; Parker, Garrett, and Holman.

ADM.]

THE CATHAY.

[ADM.]

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY
DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

April 30 and May 11, 1900.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE CATHAY. (a)

Limitation of liability—Foreign ship—Foreign certificate of registry—Deduction of crew space—Sects. 79, 84, 210, 503, and 6th schedule of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

The owners of a Danish ship are not entitled in limiting their liability to deduct crew space from the gross tonnage, although the tonnage regulations of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 have been adopted by Denmark, and according to the Danish certificate of registry the crew space is stated therein and it is proved that the dimensions of crew space have been cut up over the hatchway. To entitle a ship to such deduction it is necessary to prove that the certificate mentioned in the 3rd paragraph of the 6th schedule to the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 has been given by a surveyor of ships to the collector of customs.

THIS was a limitation suit which arose out of a collision between the Danish steamship Cathay and the defendants' steamship Clan Macgregor, off Cape St. Vincent, on the 4th Sept. 1899. There was no loss of life. The plaintiffs, the owners of the Cathay, now sought to limit their liability under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

The gross tonnage of the Cathay, as shown on her certificate of registry, without deduction on account of engine-room, was 4112·37, and from this the plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to deduct 106·53 tons for the space occupied by the crew. The defendants contended that, the Cathay being a foreign vessel and registered abroad, the owners were not entitled to make any deductions for crew space, as the 6th schedule of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 could only be complied with by British ships. Evidence was called by the plaintiffs to prove that the vessel, which had been built in 1893 in England, had been surveyed by a Board of Trade surveyor, as required by sect. 210 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and a certificate given, and that the dimensions of the accommodation supplied to the crew had been cut up over the hatchway in compliance with the requirements of the 6th schedule. The plaintiffs also put in an affidavit by the owners of the Cathay that there had been no structural alterations since the certificate had been given by the Board of Trade surveyor.

The material parts of sects. 79 and 210 and the 6th schedule of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) are as follows :

Sect. 79.—(1) In measuring or remeasuring a ship for the purpose of ascertaining her register tonnage, the following deductions shall be made from the space included in the measurement of the tonnage, namely : (a) in the case of any ship, (i.) Any space used exclusively for the accommodation of the master ; and any space occupied by seamen or apprentices and appropriated to their use which is certified under the regulations scheduled to this Act with regard thereto. (2) The deductions allowed under this section, other than a deduction for a space occupied by seamen or apprentices, and certified as aforesaid, shall be subject to the following provisions, namely : (a) the space deducted must be certified by a surveyor of ships as reasonable in extent, and properly and efficiently constructed for the purpose for which it is intended ; (b) there must be permanently marked in or over every such space a notice stating the purpose to which it is to be applied, and that whilst so applied it is to be deducted from the tonnage of the ship.

Sect. 210.—(1) Every place in any British ship occupied by seamen or apprentices, and appropriated to their use, shall have for each of those seamen or apprentices a space of not less than seventy-two cubic feet, and of not less than twelve superficial feet measured on the deck or floor of that place, and shall be subject to the regulations in the sixth schedule to this Act, and those regulations shall have effect as part of this section, and if any of the foregoing requirements of this section is not complied with in the case of any ship, the owner of the ship shall for each offence be liable to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds. (2) Every place so occupied and appropriated shall be kept free from goods and stores of any kind not being the personal property of the crew in use during the voyage, and if any such place is not so kept free, the master shall forfeit and pay to each seaman or apprentice lodged in that place the sum of one shilling for each day during which, after complaint has been made to him by any two or more of the seamen so lodged, it is not kept so free.

The 6th schedule of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 requires :

(1) Every place in a ship occupied by seamen or apprentices, and appropriated to their use, shall be such as to make the space which it is required by the second part of this Act to contain available for the proper accommodation of the men who are to occupy it, and shall be securely constructed, properly lighted and ventilated, properly protected from weather and sea, and, as far as practicable, properly shut off and protected from effluvia which may be caused by cargo or bilge water.

(2) A place so occupied and appropriated as aforesaid shall not authorise a deduction from registered tonnage under the tonnage regulations of this Act unless there be in the ship properly constructed privies for the use of the crew, of such number and of such construction as may be approved by the surveyor of ships.

(3) Every place so occupied and appropriated as aforesaid shall, whenever the ship is registered or re-registered, be inspected by one of the surveyors of ships under this Act, who shall, if satisfied that the same is in all respects such as is required by this Act, give to the collector of Customs a certificate to that effect, and if the certificate is obtained, but not otherwise, the space shall be deducted from the register tonnage.

(4) No deduction from tonnage as aforesaid shall be authorised unless there is permanently cut in a beam, and cut in or painted on or over the doorway or hatchway of every place so occupied and appropriated, the number of men which it is constructed to accommodate, with the words "Certified to accommodate . . . seamen."

(5) Upon any complaint concerning any place so occupied and appropriated as aforesaid, a surveyor of ships may inspect the place, and if he finds that any of the provisions of this Act with respect to the same are not complied with he shall report the same to the chief officer of Customs at the port where the ship is registered, and thereupon the registered tonnage shall be altered, and the deduction aforesaid in respect of space disallowed, unless and until it be certified by the surveyor, or by some other surveyor of ships, that the provisions of this Act in respect of the place are fully complied with.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE CATHAY.

[ADM.]

Sect. 84.—(1) Wherever it appears to Her Majesty the Queen in Council that the tonnage regulations of this Act have been adopted by any foreign country, and are in force there, Her Majesty in Council may order that the ships of that country shall, without being remeasured in Her Majesty's dominions, be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry or other national papers, in the same manner, to the same extent, and for the same purpose as the tonnage denoted in the certificate of registry of a British ship is deemed to be the tonnage of that ship.

By an Order in Council of the 21st Nov. 1895 it appeared that the tonnage regulations of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 had been adopted by Denmark.

Scrutton for the defendants.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to deduct the crew space. Sect. 503, sub-sect. 2 (a), only allows crew space to be deducted "which is certified under the regulations scheduled to this Act with regard thereto." Only registered British ships can obtain the required certificate, as the schedule provides that it is to be given upon registry or re-registry to the collector of Customs :

The Brunel, 79 L. T. Rep. 527; 81 L. T. Rep. 500; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 477; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 10; (1899) P. 45; (1900) P. 24.

In this case the certificate given by the Board of Trade surveyor was not given under any provision of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. What is required is a certificate given at the time of registry or re-registry to the collector of Customs. As regards the foreign certificate of registry, the Order in Council makes it prima facie evidence of the ship's tonnage, but does not affect the law as regards the deduction of crew spaces for the purpose of limitation of liability :

The Franconia, 39 L. T. Rep. 57; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 3 P. Div. 164.

H. Stokes for the plaintiffs.—The question is what is the meaning of the words "certified under the regulations scheduled to this Act." The Franconia (ubi sup.) is not in point. In that case sect. 60 of the Act of 1862 and the Order in Council made under that section dealt only with the "rules concerning the measurement of tonnage," and it was held that the effect of the Order in Council was to make the foreign certificate prima facie evidence that the rules of measurement had been complied with and correctly taken. But sect. 84 of the present Act deals not with measurement only, but with the tonnage regulations of the Act, including all the provisions as to the accommodation to be afforded to seamen, and the Order in Council of the 21st Nov. 1895 recites that the "tonnage regulations" have been adopted by Denmark, and are in force there. Therefore, following the decision in The Franconia, the foreign certificate is evidence that the tonnage regulations have been complied with, including the regulations with regard to crew spaces. It must have been contemplated that as regards foreign countries within sect. 84 the tonnage regulations should be adopted without the intervention of a British surveyor, and that the measurement of the spaces and the necessary certificates should be given by the foreign surveyor to the foreign official representing the collector of Customs in this country. If that is the intention of the Act, it is submitted the foreign certificate is evidence that the requirements of the Act with regard to crew space have been complied with, and that evidence has not been rebutted. Further, if the defendants' contention is correct, the owners of foreign vessels will not be entitled to deduct crew space for any purposes at all, and will have to pay harbour dues on it, which up till now they have never been required to do. Cur. adv. vult.

May 11.—BARNES, J.—In this case the owners of the Cathay seek to limit their liability in respect of a collision which took place on the 4th Sept. in last year, and the defendants are the owners of the steamship Clan Macgregor, with which the Cathay had been in collision, and the owners of her cargo. As I understand, all the parties connected with and interested in the Clan Macgregor are represented, or have consented to have the case heard in the way in which it has been heard. The case was originally heard by my brother Bucknill, but owing to the fact that he was only sitting here for a time, and owing to his absence on circuit a request was made by him that the matter should come before me, and, with the consent of all parties, the case has been, perhaps I should say reheard, before me, on the evidence which was taken before Bucknill, J., supplemented by an affidavit verifying the translation of the foreign certificate. Now, the point in the case is this, that the defendants do not dispute that the plaintiffs are entitled to limit their liability, but they say that in arriving at that limit of liability the plaintiffs are not entitled to deduct the crew space of their ship. The foreign certificate of register shows the gross registered tonnage to be 4112·37 tons, and the crew space to be 106·53 tons, so that I think I am correct in saying that the contention of the defendants is that the amount is to be calculated as on 4112·37 tons, whereas the plaintiffs contend that it should be calculated on that figure, less 106·53 tons. Now, the point raised in this case is to my mind of very general and great importance. The vessel is a foreign ship—a Danish vessel—and, apart from one point in the case, this matter affects all foreign vessels seeking to limit their liability in collision cases, and possibly too, though I am not sure how that will be, their tonnage in regard to the calculation of dues. I have considered with some care the Act of Parliament which now deals with the matter in question, and the result is that I have come to the conclusion that it is not necessary for me to consider strictly what conclusion I should have come to about this matter if the case of The Franconia (39 L. T. Rep. 57; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 3 P. Div. 64) had not been decided. I think that, although that case was on an earlier Act, that case is practically conclusive of this matter. Now, the reasons for that opinion are these: The Franconia (ubi sup.) was to this effect—I am reading the headnote: "The owners of a German steam vessel instituted an action under the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, s. 54, to limit their liability for damages occasioned by a collision. The vessel had three decks, and her crew were berthed below the spar deck. By Order in Council, dated the 26th June 1873, made under sect. 60 of the same Act, it was directed that German steamships measured after the 1st Jan. 1873, should be deemed to be of the tonnage mentioned in their registers in the same manner and to the same extent as the tonnage denoted in the

ADM.]

THE CATHAY.

[ADM.]

certificate of registry of British ships was deemed to be their tonnage. In the register of this ship the crew space was deducted. Held, by the judge of the Court of Admiralty, that in estimating the tonnage for the purpose of limitation of liability, the crew space must be deducted. Held, by the Court of Appeal, that the Order in Council of the 26th June 1873 did not make the certificate of registry conclusive evidence of the tonnage, or of the propriety of deducting the space solely appropriated for berthing the crew. Held, further, that under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 21, sub-s. 4, a closed-in space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew is to be excepted in estimating the tonnage only when it is on the upper deck, and not when it is between the spar deck and the tonnage deck. Held, also, that the crew space cannot in the case of a foreign, any more than of a British, ship be deducted under the Merchant Shipping Act 1867, s. 9, unless the provisions of that section as to inspection by a surveyor appointed by the Board of Trade, and the other conditions therein contained, have been complied with; and therefore that, as in the present case these conditions had not been complied with, the space appropriated for berthing the crew must not be deducted." That was a case of crew space below the spar deck, and the only means that I can see by which the crew space could be deducted was by virtue of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867. That that is so appears clearly, I think, from the subsequent decision in the case of The Palermo (52 L. T. Rep. 390; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 369; 10 P. Div. 21). The headnote to that case is this: "The owners of a foreign ship with a closed-in space on the upper deck, solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew, are entitled, in limiting their liability, to deduct such space under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 21, sub-s. 4, though the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867, s. 9, have not been complied with." The reason for the difference between these two cases is to be found upon consideration of sect. 21, sub-sect. 4, which I have referred to, because that provides as follows: that "If there be a break, a poop, or any other permanent closed-in space on the upper deck available for cargo or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew, the tonnage of such space shall be ascertained as follows." Then it deals with how the tonnage is to be ascertained, and says it is to be subjected to the following provisions, and that nothing shall be added for a closed-in space solely appropriated for the berthing of the crew, unless such space exceeds one-twentieth of the remaining tonnage of the ship, and in case of this excess the excess only shall be added. As Butt, J. pointed out in giving his judgment in The Palermo, the deduction in the case before him was to be made, although it was not to be made in the case of The Franconia, and for these reasons. He said The Franconia decided "not that the German ship in that action was not entitled to deduct from the registered tonnage the spaces allotted to the crew which were inclosed and which were above the upper deck, that being the deduction contemplated by the Act of 1854, but that she was not entitled to further deductions provided by the more recent Act of 1867, unless she had in all respects complied with the requirements of that Act."

Now, it seems to me that the difference between these two cases was practically got rid of by the Act of 1889, which by sect. 1 said: "In the measurement of a ship for the purpose of ascertaining her register tonnage, no deduction shall be allowed in respect of any space which has not been included in the measurement of her tonnage." Sub-sect. 2 says: "In sect. 21, par. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 the words 'first that nothing shall be added for a closed in space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew, unless such space exceeds one-twentieth of the remaining tonnage of the ship and in the case of this excess the excess only shall be added, and secondly;' and in sect. 22, par. 2, of the same Act, the words 'subject to the deduction for a closed-in space appropriated to the crew, as mentioned in rule 1,' shall be repealed." It is not at all easy to follow these Acts without very close scrutiny, and I should like to state what I conceive to have been the general position with regard to these spaces prior to the Act of 1889. The upper deck crew space does not seem to have been included in the tonnage, but the upper deck was. But the Act of 1867 says that was to be excluded if you complied with certain conditions. The Act of 1889 practically, seems to me, to put both sets of crew space on the same footing, and say you must not deduct crew space unless it has already been included in the tonnage, and then you can only deduct it if you comply with certain conditions. That seems to explain these two cases. Now we come to the Act of 1894, which has several sections which bear upon this subject. There is sect. 210, which provides for the accommodation of seamen and what it is to be, and which is practically a repetition of the provision, so far as the accommodation itself is concerned, of sect. 9 of the Act of 1867. Then there is further in the Act of 1894 the 6th schedule, which I need not read at any length, but the whole of it is material in considering whether the case of The Franconia (ubi sup.) is binding upon me in this case. The first rule of the 6th schedule provides that "Every place occupied by seamen or apprentices, and appropriated to their use, shall be such as to make the space which it is required by the second part of this Act to contain available for the proper accommodation of the men who are to occupy it," and so on. The second paragraph provides that "A place so occupied and appropriated as aforesaid shall not authorise a deduction from registered tonnage under the tonnage regulations of this Act unless there be in the ship" certain conveniences. The 3rd paragraph provides that: "Every place so occupied and appropriated as aforesaid shall, whenever the ship is registered or re-registered, be inspected by one of the surveyors of ships under this Act, who shall, if satisfied that the same is in all respects such as is required by this Act, give to the collector of customs a certificate to that effect, and if the certificate is obtained, but not otherwise, the space shall be deducted from the register tonnage." That is, in substance, the same as the 4th sub-section of sect. 9 of the Act of 1867. Then there is a provision that no deduction shall be authorised unless there is permanently cut in a beam, and cut in or painted over the door or hatchway, the number of the men which the place is constructed to accommodate. Then there is a provision as to what an inspector of ships may do on complaint being made, and that is a very important provision in this case, because it says: "Upon any complaint concerning any place so occupied and appropriated, as aforesaid, a surveyor of ships may inspect the place, and if he finds that any provisions of this Act with respect to the same are not complied with he shall report the same to the chief officer of Customs at the port where the ship is registered, and thereupon the registered tonnage shall be altered, and the deduction aforesaid in respect of space disallowed, unless and until it be certified by the surveyor, or by some other surveyor of ships, that the provisions of this Act in respect of the place are fully complied with." That is the same as sub-sect. 7 of the 9th section of the Act of 1867. I have shown that clause 210 of the Act of 1894 provides that British ships are to provide certain accommodation for their crews, and that the means of getting a deduction from the registered tonnage is provided for by the 6th schedule when certain conditions are complied with, and I think that it follows from a careful examination of the 6th schedule that, as drawn, it really only relates to British ships. That I think is the decision on the analogous provisions in the case of The Franconia (ubi sup.). The reason for saying that is this. The 6th schedule, which I have summarised, shows that at the time of registry certain things are to be done if it is desired to get a deduction for crew space, and at any time afterwards, if the provisions imposed on a British ship are not complied with, the benefit of the deduction can be got rid of by the surveyor inspecting it, and certifying that the provisions have not been complied with. None of that is applicable to foreign ships. There is this further point that, as drawn, that schedule seems to contemplate that at the outset the certificate shall be obtained when the ship is registered or re-registered, because the certificate has to be given to the collector of Customs, and if the provisions are not complied with a report has to be made by the chief officer of Customs. I find by sect. 4 that the chief officer of Customs is a registrar of British ships, and by sect. 742, the definition clause, that "a chief officer of Customs includes the collector." I have very little doubt that it was contemplated, in transferring the provisions of the earlier Acts to the 6th schedule, that in providing that the certificate should be given to the collector of Customs it really was meant that it should go to the registrar to register the ship as of the tonnage which was properly certified by the surveyor. Leaving out for the moment foreign ships when the limitation section, sect. 503, is referred to, it is found that a shipowner may limit his liability to a certain amount on his ship's tonnage, and in case of a steamer that shall be her gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine-room, and in the case of a sailing ship that shall be her registered tonnage. Then there is this: "Provided that there shall not be included in such tonnage any space occupied by seamen and apprentices, and appropriated to their use, which is certified under the regulations scheduled to this Act with regard thereto." So that in order to limit his liability the owner of a British steamship has to take the gross tonnage, without deduction on account of engine-room, but less the space occupied by seamen and apprentices, and appropriated to their use, and which is certified under this Act, and that certificate can only be obtained at a certain time and from a certain person, and when certain provisions are complied with. Of course the object of that is to see that the crew are properly provided for. With regard to the other sections which deal with this subject, they are the 77th and 79th, which provide for the measurement of a ship and her tonnage, and for the deductions. In sect. 79 there is this provision: "In measuring or re-measuring a ship for the purpose of ascertaining her register tonnage, the following deductions shall be made from the space included in the measurement of the tonnage, namely:—(a) in the case of any ship (1) Any space used exclusively for the accommodation of the master; and any space occupied by seamen or apprentices, and appropriated to their use, which is certified under the regulations scheduled to this Act with regard thereto." The deduction in regard to seamen and apprentices is to be made when and if there has been a certificate under the regulations scheduled to the Act. So much with regard to British ships. The point made by Mr. Stokes, who argued this case very ably for the plaintiffs, is that sect. 84 of the Act 1894, which deals with the tonnage of foreign ships adopting tonnage regulations, makes the certificate which has been put in in this case from abroad evidence of the tonnage and of the deductions on which he is entitled to rely, and that when that certificate is looked at that 106.53 tons is to come off. That section is: "Whenever it appears to Her Majesty the Queen in Council that the tonnage regulations of this Act have been adopted by any foreign country, and are in force there, Her Majesty in Council may order that the ships of that country shall, without being re-measured in Her Majesty's dominions, be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry, or other national papers, in the same manner, to the same extent, and for the same purposes as the tonnage denoted in the certificate of registry of a British ship is deemed to be the tonnage of that ship." The 2nd and 3rd sub-sections were not, I think, relied on. Then there was the Order in Council made in regard to Danish ships on the 21st Nov 1895. That follows the terms of the Act. The words of sect. 84 of the Act of 1894 are the same as sect. 60 of the Act of 1862, which was before the Court of Appeal in The Franconia (ubi sup.) with a slight variation. They are precisely the same, according to my reading of the Act, so far as the operative part of the words is concerned. So that when the Court of Appeal held that the certificate of registry produced from abroad was not conclusive, but might be examined to see whether the provisions in regard to crew space had been complied with, and when as it was found that they had not been complied with, it was held that the deduction could not be obtained, the reasoning of that judgment appears to apply to the present case, having regard to the words which are used in sect. 84.

ADM.]

THE CATHAY.

[ADM.]

There is, therefore, this position of things, that a shipowner in limiting his liability can obtain a deduction in respect of crew space which has been certified in a certain way, but cannot get the benefit unless it has been certified in that way. Although it is true that the schedule which provides for that certificate is one which the foreigner cannot comply with, yet so it is, and there it was in the case of The Franconia (ubi sup.), and the judges felt they could not alter that Act of Parliament. They could not legislate about the matter. They practically treated it as an oversight. Assuming their decision to have been correct and taking it as binding upon me, it seems to me the reasoning which produced that decision is entirely applicable to the situation in this case. I do not feel that I can, myself, commence to reconsider these sections, and do what Mr. Stokes asked me to do, and look at the matter from the point of view of its being impossible for the foreigner to comply with these regulations, and, therefore, to regard the certificate he produces as one giving him the benefit of the deductions, without it being shown on the face of it how they are arrived at. There is one other point made by Mr. Stokes—namely, that there had, in fact, been a certificate given at the time when this ship was built, because I understand she was built in England, which would sufficiently comply with the provisions of the 6th schedule. That certificate was given by a surveyor and sent to the Board of Trade, according to the evidence, for departmental purposes, whatsoever that may mean. It was not a certificate given or sent to the collector of Customs, and although this point may seem to be a fine one, it appears to me to have this substance in it, that there can be little doubt this 6th schedule was drawn as applicable to ships which would be surveyed by British surveyors when registered in British ports, and that it was contemplated that the certificate should be given to the registrar—in other words, the collector of Customs—the result or effect of it to appear in the register when the ship was registered, and the benefit of which might be got rid of at any time if a surveyor or surveyors afterwards found that the provisions had not been complied with. Therefore it seems to me to follow that the certificate which was obtained in this case, and sent to the Board of Trade for departmental purposes, was not a certificate which was given in accordance with the regulations contained in the schedule to which I have referred. The point in this case, as I have said, is one of very great importance, and of very great substance, in connection with foreign ships, because, although I have not to decide it here, one must not lose sight of this fact, that apparently the 79th section, which deals with the registry of ships, and provides for this deduction in respect of crew space, is made very much in the same way as the provisions which are put in force when limitation of liability comes to be considered. Of course I have not got to consider that particular point. It is not necessary that I should do so. But Mr. Stokes pressed upon me that if this decision in The Franconia (ubi sup.) was to stand in this case it might affect all foreign ships as regards tonnage dues. I am not concerned to decide that point. It seems to me there is some little difficulty about it. All I say is that on the whole I feel bound by the decision in The Franconia (ubi sup.), and I do not feel entitled, even if I were desirous of doing so, to review the Act in a general way, so as to give to a foreign ship the benefit of this deduction on some broad principle. I hold that if it is to be done it must be done by a higher tribunal than myself, and it may be that if the case is carried further the Court of Appeal may take the view that their previous decision is not one which actually governs this case. For myself I think it does. In the result, therefore, my judgment is that, while the plaintiffs are entitled to limit their liability, it must be for an amount calculated upon the tonnage without the benefit of this deduction in respect of crew space.

ADM.]

THE CRIMDON.

[ADM.]

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Stokes and Stokes.
Solicitors for the defendants, Hollams, Son, Coward, and Hawkesley.

Monday, May 14, 1900.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE CRIMDON. (a)

Practice—Undertaking to give bail—Rules of Supreme Court, Order XXIX., rr. 11, 12. 18—Damages for arrest without cause after undertaking given—Caveat—Salvage.

Where plaintiffs in a salvage action insisted on arresting the defendants' ship after a caveat warrant had been entered by the defendants' solicitors, the court was of opinion that the defendants had not shown "good and sufficient reason" within the meaning of Order XXIX., r. 18, for arresting, and ordered the defendants to pay the costs and damages of and incidental to the arrest.

THIS was an application, adjourned into court in order that it might be dealt with by the judge at the trial of the action, in which the defendants in an action for salvage asked for damages and costs of and incidental to the arrest, detention, and release of the Crimdon, her cargo and freight.

The steamship Crimdon broke down while on a voyage from Freijo to Cardiff, and was towed into Plymouth by the foreign steamship Helene Woermann on the 25th Feb. 1900.

On the 26th Feb. a caveat was entered by the defendants' solicitors, in accordance with Order XXIX., r. 11, 12, and bail was offered, but the plaintiffs refused to accept their undertaking and arrested the ship the next day.

On the 28th Feb. an application was made to Barnes, J. in chambers, and he ordered the ship to be released, and the question whether the defendants were entitled to costs and damages for the arrest of their vessel after the caveat had been entered to be dealt with at the trial of the action.

Order XXIX., r. 11.—A party desiring to prevent the arrest of any property may cause a caveat against the issue of a warrant for the arrest thereof to be entered in the principal registry.

Order XXIX., r. 18.—Nothing in this rule shall prevent a solicitor from taking out a warrant for the arrest of any property, notwithstanding the entry of a caveat in the Caveat Warrant Book, but the party at whose instance any property in respect of which a caveat is entered shall be arrested shall be liable to have the warrant discharged and to be condemned in costs and damages unless he shall show to the satisfaction of the judge good and sufficient reason for having so done.

The caveat was in the form prescribed by the Rules of Court, and was as follows :

We, D. B. and Co., of 44, Leadenhall-street, in the city of London, hereby undertake to enter an appearance in any action that may be commenced in the High

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE CRIMDON.

[ADM.]

Court of Justice against the ss. Crimdon or Cumdon, her cargo and freight, and within three days after we shall have been served with a notice of the commencement of any such action to give bail therein in a sum not exceeding value of ship, cargo, and freight, or to pay such sum into the Admiralty Registry. And we consent that all instruments and other documents in such action may be left for us at 44, Leadenhall-street, in the city of London.—Dated the        day        —D. B. and Co., 44-46, Leadenhall-street, E.C.

D. B. and Co. were the defendants' solicitors.

It appeared from the correspondence that, although the plaintiffs' solicitors instructed their clients that they ought to accept the personal undertaking of D. B. and Co., the plaintiffs insisted upon the vessel being arrested.

Butler Aspinall, Q.C. (with him Noad) for the defendants.—The plaintiffs are liable in costs and damages unless they can show good and sufficient reason for having arrested the ship. Plaintiffs are not entitled to insist upon the security of the res if good and adequate personal security is offered. In The Johan Benjamin (Prit. Digest, vol. 1, p. 370, No. 1628, the 20th Oct. 1863) the plaintiff was condemned in costs for taking out a warrant of arrest, notwithstanding the entry of a caveat warrant and of appearance and undertaking for bail.

Scrutton and Chaytor for the plaintiffs contra.—The caveat does not state on whose behalf bail is to be given or the amount. The plaintiffs, instead of the security of the res, are merely offered a solicitor's personal undertaking. The court only gives damages if the arrest is made mala fide or through gross negligence:

The Evangelismos, Swa. 378;

The Corner, Br. & L. 161;

The Don Ricardo, 42 L. T. Rep. 32; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 225; 5 P. Div. 121.

BARNES, J.—In this case the question which I have to determine was left over after the determination of the principal point in the case. It is whether the plaintiffs are liable in the circumstances to be condemned in costs and damages under the 18th rule of Order XXIX., for arresting the Crimdon after a caveat warrant had been filed by the solicitors for the defendants. The dates, as far as I can make out appear to be as follows: The writ in the action was issued against this ship, the Crimdon, on the 26th March in the district registry of East Stonehouse, which, I believe, is the district of Plymouth. On the same day the warrant to arrest was extracted in the same registry, but before doing so—before, I mean, the warrant was issued—apparently the plaintiffs and the registrar of the district ascertained, in accordance with the practice, whether a caveat had been filed against the arrest of the Crimdon; and this registry communicated by telegram the fact that there had been a caveat against the arrest already entered. It appears that on the same day, the 26th, Messrs. Downing, Bolam, and Co. filed the usual undertaking, which was termed the caveat warrant. It was signed by Messrs. Downing, Bolam, and Co., without any qualification. The plaintiffs, however, according to the correspondence, were not satisfied with the undertaking of the solicitors, although their own solicitors appear to have been so. The clients themselves were not ready to accept it, and decided that the ship should be arrested. The ship was arrested on the following day, the 27th, and she remained under arrest until the evening of the 28th. In the meantime, on the 28th the application was made to me to direct the ship to be discharged from arrest, and on the 28th I ordered that the ship should be discharged. At that time, according to my recollection, and I believe I am right, no objection was made to the solicitors who had signed this undertaking, and I ordered the release of the ship, and she was accordingly released. Then the question comes to be this, whether for the day's detention from the 27th to the 28th, which has been proved to have cost the defendants about 18l. and costs, the plaintiffs ought to be held responsible.

Now, there are two or three points taken on the form of the undertaking by Mr. Scrutton, on behalf of the plaintiffs, but it does not seem to me that there is any substance whatever in them. It is in accordance with the rules, and my opinion distinctly is that if the solicitor himself signs an undertaking of this kind without any qualification whatever he would be personally responsible to see that it is carried out. I am of opinion that the course of business which is intended to be followed in that way is purposely followed in order to facilitate matters. The position taken up by the plaintiffs is that it is not unreasonable to object to the personal undertaking and to insist upon the arrest. Rule 18 comes in in connection with that matter, and that rule is this: "Nothing in this order shall prevent a solicitor from taking out a warrant for the arrest of any property, notwithstanding the entry of a caveat in the Caveat Warrant Book; but the party, at whose instance any property in respect of which a caveat is entered shall be arrested, shall be liable to have the warrant discharged and to be condemned in costs and damages, unless he shall show, to the satisfaction of the judge, good and sufficient reason for having so done." Now, the good and sufficient reason suggested by the plaintiffs in this case is a broad one—namely, that they were not bound to accept a solicitor's undertaking, and were entitled to arrest the ship. I think that that is an erroneous position to take up, having regard to the rules and practice of this court. It seems to me that the position arrived at by these rules is analogous to that of bail being tendered. In the case of bail being tendered names have to be given, and the other party has twenty-four hours to consider whether he will object to the bail or not, and if he objects to the bail he can do so; but I think he objects more or less at his peril, because there is one case in which, after objection had been taken and found to be unfounded, the party objecting was held liable in damages. It seems to me that a precisely similar class of considerations comes in in this case. There is an undertaking, and the object of it is to prevent a ship being arrested, and to get rid of the trouble and inconvenience to the shipowner which he incurs if his ship is arrested when there is adequate security elsewhere to be availed of. Then, what is the position if that undertaking is given? It appears to me to be this: That the plaintiff is to have a reasonable opportunity of seeing whether he ought to be bound to accept it or not, and then if he does not and shows to the satisfaction of the court good and sufficient reason for objecting, then, of course, he will not be condemned in the costs. I think in this case if the plaintiffs had said, "We have not time to act," or "we are not satisfied on some grounds that there is adequate security," the point would have been a perfectly good one to take; but neither of those points were raised. The plaintiffs themselves—not their solicitors—said, "No, we will not have this undertaking at all; we will have the security of the ship," and they never raised any question of time to investigate. The answer to that is that when the case came before me the ship was released without any objection. Again when the case comes on here the only point raised is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to have the security of the ship. The rules say, "No, if you have adequate security otherwise." That is the real principle, and I think it is right from a business point of view. The whole object of the rules, and of the practice in this court, is to facilitate business, and not to check it, and if a man, such as a solicitor, can give an undertaking which is satisfactory, then business will proceed easily and satisfactorily. On the other hand, if no facilities of this kind are to be allowed, the rules are practically useless; and the argument put forward by the plaintiffs is that the rules are practically useless. To my mind, therefore, as soon as it was seen that there was reasonable time—because there was practically a day—if the point had been taken, to inquire into the standing of the parties, there was no reason whatever for arresting, because the plaintiffs solicitors themselves were satisfied. It therefore seems to me that there is no ground shown at all for objecting to this undertaking, and that that being so, the plaintiffs are liable for the costs and damages occasioned by the arrest. So far as damages are concerned, I think that they ought to be fixed at 18*l.*, and with regard to the costs, they must be a matter for taxation.

ADM.]

THE RONDANE.

[ADM.]

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Hollams, Son, Coward, and Hawksley.

Solicitors for the defendants, Downing, Bolam, and Co., agents for Downing and Handcock, Cardiff.

July 2, 3, and 4, 1900.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President.)

THE RONDANE. (a)

Collision—Fog—Failure to stop and ascertain position of approaching vessel—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 16.

It is the duty of a steam vessel in a fog, under art. 16, on first hearing forward of her beam another vessel's fog signal, to stop her engines and to keep them stopped until by hearing further signals she ascertains the position of the other vessel.

THIS was a collision action brought by the owners of cargo lately laden on board the German steamship Hermann Koeppen against the owners of the Norwegian steamship Rondane.

The collision occurred at about 8.25 p.m. on 9th May 1900, in the North Sea, near the Newarp Lightship. The weather at the time was a thick fog.

The plaintiffs' case was that about 8.15 p.m. the Hermann Koeppen, a steamer of 1609 tons gross and 1097 tons net register, manned by a crew of eighteen hands all told, was, whilst on a voyage from South Shields to Barcelona with a cargo of coals, in the Would Channel off the Norfolk coast. Her whistle was being sounded at proper intervals for fog, and she was proceeding with engines at slow, making about three knots an hour. She was on a course S.S.E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  E. magnetic. In these circumstances the whistle of an approaching steamship which proved to be the Rondane was heard about a point on the port bow, and from one and a half to two miles off.

The Hermann Koeppen was kept on her course and her whistle blown in reply, and the whistle of the Rondane was heard several times afterwards, getting each time a little broader on the port bow. The helm was ported a point and then steadied, and a short blast sounded in order to give the Rondane more room to pass. The whistle of the Rondane continued to be heard, but, although in a position to pass port to port, the Rondane, when close to, was heard to blow two short blasts, whereupon the engines of the Hermann Koeppen were put full speed astern, but shortly afterwards the masthead and green lights of the Rondane came into sight about three points on the port bow and about a ship's length off. She came on at great speed and struck with her stem the bluff of the port bow of the Hermann Koeppen, doing her such damage that she afterwards sank and was lost with the plaintiffs' cargo on board of her.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants with neglecting to keep a good look-out, improperly starboarding, failing to pass port to port, proceeding at an excessive rate of speed, and not stopping and reversing. They also charged them with breach of arts. 16, 19, 22, 23, and 29 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The defendants' case was that the Rondane, a steamship of 1131 tons gross and 749 tons net register, whilst on a voyage from Rouen to Blyth in ballast, manned by a crew of seventeen hands all told, was near the Newarp Lightship. She was on a course of N.W.  $\frac{1}{2}$  N. magnetic, making about two knots an hour. Her whistle was being sounded at short intervals for fog. Under these circumstances a faint prolonged blast was heard from a steamship which proved to be the Hermann Koeppen apparently a long way off, and about three points on the starboard bow of the Rondane.

The engines of the Rondane were kept working slow ahead owing to the whistle of another steamship being heard astern on the port quarter, and shortly afterwards a second faint prolonged blast was heard apparently closer and a little broader on the bow, and almost at the same time the masthead and red lights of the Hermann Koeppen came into view about a ship's length off and about four points on the starboard bow. The engines of the Rondane were immediately stopped and reversed full speed astern and the helm starboarded, but the Hermann Koeppen came on and struck the Rondane with her port bow, doing considerable damage.

The defendants charged those on the Hermann Koeppen with keeping a bad look-out, proceeding at an excessive speed, not being provided with an

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE RONDANE.

[ADM.]

efficient whistle, not sounding their whistle, and improperly porting. They also charged them with not stopping when the Rondane's whistle was first heard, not stopping and reversing before the collision, and failing to comply with arts. 15, 16, 23, and 29 of the regulations.

Art. 15 deals with signals to be made in a fog.

Arts. 16, 22, 23, and 29 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea are as follows:

Art. 16. Every vessel shall, in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain storms, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions. A steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog-signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.

Art. 22. Every vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, if the circumstances of the case admit, avoid crossing ahead of the other.

Art. 23. Every steam vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, on approaching her, if necessary slacken her speed or stop or reverse.

Art. 29. Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any vessel, or the owner, or master, or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case.

Baden Powell, Q.C. and Dr. Stubbs for the plaintiffs.—The Rondane is alone to blame. She never ascertained the bearing of the Hermann Koeppen, and ought to have stopped her engines sooner. The vessel following her was not in such a position as to have prevented her stopping in obedience to art. 16 of the collision regulations. In the circumstances there was no obligation on the Hermann Koeppen to stop on hearing the Rondane's first whistle. She in fact accurately ascertained the position of the Rondane. Moreover, if she committed a breach of the article, such breach could not possibly have contributed to the collision.

Butler Aspinall, Q.C. and Balloch for the defendants.—The Hermann Koeppen is alone to blame. The presence of a vessel immediately astern of the Rondane was a circumstance which did not admit of the Rondane stopping on hearing the first whistle of the Hermann Koeppen. Apart from some such justification, a vessel is bound on first hearing a vessel's whistle to stop in obedience to art. 16.

THE PRESIDENT.—This is a case of collision in a fog, which presents most of the ordinary features, but it brings into prominence one feature which up to this time has not been common. It is quite clear that these vessels were approaching one another in a dense fog, and it is quite clear also that the collision was caused by their coming against one another at something very like right angles. So one is presented with this problem, as a matter of navigation, that one or other must have altered its course a great many points, and the question is whether the Hermann Koeppen ported to a very considerable extent, or whether the Rondane starboarded so much as to bring about what I have said was the actual collision.

I do not know that it is necessary in this case to determine very accurately this question of navigation, because I think there are other matters which suffice to decide the liability of the vessels. But I have considered the matter with the Trinity Masters, and the conclusion to which I have come is that the story of the plaintiffs is that which in the main is to be accepted; in other words, that the collision was brought about by very considerable starboarding on the part of the Rondane. I have, of course, considered very carefully the arguments which Mr. Aspinall used with regard to the difficulties which that conclusion may be supposed to give rise to, but they do not appear to me to be insuperable. I can see no difficulty in the theory that at a very early time the Rondane may have been, and probably was, on the starboard bow of the Hermann Koeppen. As the Rondane came up towards the Newarp she rounded that, not by a single action but by repeated actions of starboarding, and after that I think she continued that starboarding course, and the suggestion of Mr. Baden Powell that she wished to get into shoaler soundings may be well founded. At any rate there appears to me to have been substantial rounding, and the vessel in that way brought herself into collision at the angle I have described. But apart from that I think the navigation of the Rondane is clearly open to blame. It was not what it should have been. She did not hear the whistles of the other vessel until quite close to; in fact, she only heard two whistles. The suggestion which is made is that that must have been because the whistle of the Hermann Koeppen was a bad whistle. It is impossible to investigate that with accuracy, but I confess that when I find the speed of the Rondane was what I think it was, it appears to me to be on the whole impossible to give force to a suggestion which was a pure hypothesis, and which hardly appears to me to be compatible with the facts. The look-out on the part of the Hermann Koeppen was undoubtedly good, and the conclusion to which I have come is that it was because the Hermann Koeppen was keeping a good look-out, that she heard several whistles from the Rondane, whereas the Rondane heard no whistles, except those I have mentioned, from the Hermann Koeppen. When one comes to the speed of the Rondane, one is on ground which is far more certain, and it appears to me that when we know she was passing a lighthouse during a dense fog at full speed—and I think she never reduced it at all until she came close to the Newarp—and never went slow at all—because I think the evidence of the chief officer must be accepted on the point—until she was close to and heard the whistle of the Hermann Koeppen, then it appears to me to be clearly made out that the speed of the Rondane was a matter to which they were not paying sufficient attention. It is impossible not to be impressed, though I do not lay too much stress upon it, by the fact that two blasts are admitted now to have been given by the Rondane. Of course they support the view I have expressed that the Rondane was starboarding. But I am impressed still more by the fact that although it is now admitted they were given, they were not stated in the preliminary act, where they clearly ought to have been stated; the very object of those additional questions being put in the preliminary act being to bring out matters of that kind. Although it is clear to me that the Rondane did give those two blasts on that last occasion, it becomes equally clear that she did not give those two blasts, or any two blasts, on the previous occasion of her star-boarding; and also that it must have been felt, I suppose by those who have the conduct of their case, that those two blasts could not be admitted in the preliminary act. Of course it may have been a mistake, but I think it is a material fact. It must also not be forgotten that it is not until they come into court that the sounding of the two blasts is admitted. It follows from what I have said that I accept substantially the story of the Hermann Koeppen. I am not at all inclined to think that the statement made by those on board, to the effect that the whistle of the Rondane grew broader and broader, is one which is very easy to explain, but I do not know that it is a matter to which any great importance is to be attached. It is admitted by the other side that the Hermann Koeppen's speed was only about two knots at the time of the collision, and she at any rate, was conducting herself in that respect with sufficient care. That brings one to this consideration, that the Hermann Koeppen must be absolved from blame unless she is held in fault under art. 16. That article has to be considered with regard to both vessels. I have considered art. 16, and have had the advantage of reading the judgment of Barnes, J. in the case to which I was referred (The Pontos v. The Star of New Zealand), not reported, which, as far as I know, is the only authority which bears upon the rule. So far as my judgment in the matter goes, I feel no great difficulty in understanding substantially what the rule means. The words are: "A steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog-signal of a vessel, the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over." I think I understand what that rule means. It was an approach to what many persons had advocated at different times—namely, that in a fog vessels should absolutely stop. Of course a suggestion of that kind applies with far more force to river navigation than to the open sea, because, of course, as has been said over and over again, in the Channel, if vessels had to stop dead, it might be that you would get the Channel crowded with ships, which would be unable to reach their destinations. In a river like the Thames it might be better for vessels to stop and anchor, though what injury it might cause to trade I do not say. This rule stops short of that. It does not say that a vessel is to stop and never move again in the fog. On the contrary all she has to do is to stop her engines and then navigate with caution, and she is to do that because she hears forward of her beam a fog-signal of a vessel, the position of which is not ascertained. She is to keep them stopped until she can, by hearing further signals from the other vessel, ascertain the position of that other vessel. The rule does not say that in terms, but that appears to me to be the meaning. The object, of course, is clear—namely, to give the vessel which stops her engines an opportunity of hearing better than she otherwise would do, and also to specially call the attention of those on board to the matter, so that they may be more acute to hear a second whistle and to locate it if possible. Therefore the duty of a vessel in a fog clearly appears to me to be to stop her engines when the first whistle is heard, for the purpose I have mentioned.

ADM.]

THE RONDANE.

[ADM.]

In this case neither vessel stopped her engines. I take the case of the Rondane first. She, admittedly, on hearing a whistle did not stop her engines at all. She endeavours to excuse herself under the words in this rule: "Shall so far as circumstances admit." Her case is that there was a vessel following her so closely that it would not have been safe to have stopped her engines without danger of that vessel running into her. I do not, myself, feel very sure of what exactly was in the minds of the framers of this rule when they used those words, because it is not very easy to imagine circumstances under which a vessel could not stop her engines. It does not imply any sudden stopping of her way. I think they must have had in their minds matters connected with river navigation, where, for instance, you might have a vessel coming up the Thames and another small vessel crossing under her stern, and where to take off speed by stopping the engines might at that moment be difficult and dangerous. I can understand the existence of such circumstances in a river, but not in the open sea, and certainly in this case I cannot see that there was any real reason why the Rondane should not have stopped her engines. The vessel following the Rondane could, I suppose, see her, because she was herself seen, and if the defendant's story is to be accepted the vessel was in such a position that a checking of the Rondane's speed could have been perfectly well met by a movement of the other vessel's helm. I have my doubts, I confess, whether the story of the Rondane can be accepted in its entirety. That there was a vessel astern at some time I think is very likely, but to suppose that she was so close as the defendants say appears to me to be very difficult to accept, for this among other reasons which have been pointed out, that at the time of the collision, when the movement of the Rondane was stopped with considerable suddenness, the other vessel was not seen by anybody. It is curious that in the case before Barnes, J. exactly the same suggestion was made, and under circumstances of peculiar force, if well founded. But the learned judge rejected it upon very similar grounds as those upon which I feel bound to reject it. Therefore there was no reason why the Rondane should not have obeyed the rule. I do not know that it was argued, and I do not think it could have been suggested with any force, that it would not have made any difference if she had stopped. Under the circumstances I think the breach of art. 16 is a breach of which the consequences must be visited upon the Rondane. What is to be said as to the Hermann Koeppen, because she lies under the same stigma of having violated that article? She certainly did violate it. At the first signal of the Rondane she did not stop her engines, but it is said, and this of course is a matter which requires careful consideration, that although that was so, in the case of the Hermann Koeppen the breach of the rule must necessarily be considered immaterial, because she heard several whistles afterwards, when she was navigating with caution, and if she had stopped her engines she would not have gained any information which she did not have—that she would not have pursued any other course if she had first

H. OF L.]

ISIS STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. BAHR, BEHREND, AND ROSS.

[H. OF L.]

stopped her engines. I feel the full force of that suggestion, but I am not able to yield to it, and do not think that this rule is one which can be, under those circumstances, broken with impunity. When a vessel has broken a statutory rule the onus on those who seek to say that it is immaterial is a very considerable one. In this case one is necessarily cast upon a matter of imagination. One has to consider whether it can possibly be the case that the failure of the Hermann Koeppen to obey this rule is immaterial. I am not able to come to that conclusion. It is a matter for imagination, and nobody can possibly say what would have happened if the Hermann Koeppen had obeyed that rule. Everyone can conjecture what would have happened. The result would have been, in the first instance, that she would have been in a better position to hear the following whistles of the Rondane. Those on board of her say that that would have made no difference, because they, in fact, heard them. I am not satisfied that that is a fair observation to make, because if they had heard them with the engines stopped I am not sure they would not have been in a position to appreciate more accurately what the position of the other vessel was. It is said that the whistles kept on broadening, and I have said that I think that is taking an exaggerated view of those whistles, and I am not sure that if the Hermann Koeppen had stopped and listened to those whistles those on board would not have ascertained more accurately what it was the Rondane was doing—namely, that she was rounding the Newarp. Under the circumstances I feel compelled to say that I do not think the omission of the Hermann Koeppen to obey the rule can be excused. I say candidly that I am compelled to find this with great regret, because I think the Hermann Koeppen in every other respect appears to be well navigated in somewhat difficult circumstances. I confess I was struck by the way in which the evidence on her behalf was given, both by the master and other persons. I thought the evidence was fairly and sensibly given, and therefore it is with great regret that I feel compelled to say that the Hermann Koeppen has brought herself within the words of art. 16, and I feel unable to absolve her from those consequences. For that reason I am compelled to say that in this case both vessels are to blame.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Stokes and Stokes.

Solicitors for the defendants, Botterell and Roche.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, May 11, 1900.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury), LORDS MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, SHAND, and BRAMPTON.)

ISIS STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. BAHR, BEHREND, AND ROSS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party—Freight—“Full and complete cargo”—Frozen cargo.

By a charter-party made between the appellants and the respondents it was agreed that the respondents should “load a full and complete cargo of wet woodpulp” on board the appellants’ ship, at an agreed rate of freight. The cargo was to be loaded in mid-winter at a port where severe frosts were probable. It was delivered frozen hard, and in consequence the ship was only able to load a much smaller quantity than if it had been unfrozen and compressible. The shipowners claimed damages for short shipment of cargo.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the charterers had not, under the circumstances, broken their contract to load a full and complete cargo.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Smith and Rigby, L.J.J.), Williams, L.J. dissenting, who had reversed a judgment of Bruce, J. in favour of the appellants (the plaintiffs below) in a case tried before him without a jury at the Liverpool Assizes.

The case is reported in 81 L. T. Rep. 241; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 569; (1899) 2 Q. B. 364.

The action was brought to recover 337*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.* dead freight on an alleged short shipment of 450 tons of cargo, or, in the alternative, to recover the like amount as damages for breach of charter in not loading proper or usual wet woodpulp, by reason of which the said pulp stowed so badly that the plaintiffs’ ship was prevented from being loaded to within 450 tons of her proper cargo.

Other questions between the parties were discussed in the courts below, but this was the only point raised on this appeal.

The appellants by their statement of claim alleged that the respondents had shipped 450 tons short of a full and complete cargo, and that they had thereby lost freight in respect of which they had sustained a loss of 337*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.*, and they alternatively alleged that the respondents had not shipped proper or usual wet woodpulp which contained about 50 per cent. of water, but improperly and in breach of their charter had shipped bundles of ground woodpulp, which were frozen hard and frozen into different and unusual forms and shapes, and not properly rolled up into proper square bundles secured by paper and string, but had supplied the same in loose and insecure rolls and in rolls and bundles of varying and unusual shapes, in consequence of which the pulp had stowed so badly as to prevent the steamship Isis from being loaded so as to carry within 450 tons of her usual and proper cargo.

The respondents in their defence, whilst denying the breaches alleged against them, alleged that a full and complete cargo was not shipped owing to the bales being frozen too hard for compression into the usual space occupied by such bales, in consequence whereof the appellants were unable and refused to receive any further cargo although the respondents were ready and willing to supply further cargo.

The charter-party was made on the 22nd Dec. 1897, between the appellants as the owners of the Isis of the one part and Messrs. A. Wertheim and Co. as charterers of the other part, but for the purposes of this action it was arranged between the parties that the respondents, Liverpool charterers, should represent Messrs. Wertheim and Co.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

H. OF L.]

ISIS STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. BAHR, BEHREND, AND ROSS.

[H. OF L.]

By the charter-party it was provided that the steamship Isis should with all possible despatch sail and proceed to Bangor, which is an inland port in Maine in the United States, as ordered by charterer, or so near thereunto as she might safely get always afloat, and there load under deck from the agents of the freighters a full and complete cargo of wet woodpulp, which contains about 50 per cent. of water, which the freighters bound themselves to ship, not exceeding what she could reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, fuel, and furniture, and being so loaded, should proceed to Manchester or so near thereunto as she could safely get always afloat. It was further provided that should ice prevent the steamship getting to Bangor she should load at Bucksport, which is a port on the same river as Bangor, but about twenty miles lower down, on the same terms as stipulated for at Bangor.

It was stated that there were two kinds of wet woodpulp answering to the description in the charter-party, one kind known as "moist sulphite fibre pulp," which was compressed into square parcels and wrapped in paper, and was a more expensive kind of wet woodpulp, and "moist ground woodpulp," which was coarser and less expensive, and was usually shipped in loose bales tied up but not pressed or closely packed.

On arrival of the Isis at Bucksport, ice having prevented her from reaching Bangor, the respondents tendered a cargo, a small portion of which consisted of the sulphite fibre pulp, and the larger portion consisted of moist ground woodpulp, which, owing to the frost prevailing at the time, was so frozen as to be rendered quite hard. When in their ordinary condition and not frozen, the bales of moist ground woodpulp are flexible and capable of being compressed so as to be stowed closely together in the corners of the ship's hold under the beams and stringers, but when they are frozen they are quite hard, and, owing to their irregular shapes, take up much more room in the ship's hold. In consequence of the frozen condition in which the moist ground woodpulp was shipped there was a large amount of broken stowage, and it was not possible to stow a full and complete cargo.

The cargo actually loaded (about 2496 tons) was short by 450 tons of the cargo which the ship could have carried had the bales been presented for shipment in the ordinary way.

The smaller portion of the cargo, consisting of sulphite fibre pulp, compressed and wrapped in paper, was stowed without difficulty and without any loss of space.

At the trial of the action at Liverpool Bruce, J. gave judgment for appellants for 336*l.* upon the ground that there was no protection in the charter-party relieving the respondents from liability for matters occasioned by frost.

The Court of Appeal reversed this decision as above mentioned.

The shipowners appealed.

Carver, Q.C., Horridge, and Hyslop Maxwell appeared for the appellants, and contended that this was not a full and complete cargo within the meaning of the charter-party. There was no evidence of any custom to treat it as such. The evidence shows that there are two kinds of wet woodpulp, "chemical" and "mechanical" wood-pulp. The former is packed in bales of uniform size and shape which can be conveniently stowed, whether frozen hard or not; the latter can be stowed when it is soft and compressible, but not when frozen hard in irregular packages. If an article packed in one way gives a full cargo, and in another way does not, the charterer is bound to supply it in such a form that a full cargo may be shipped. See

Cuthbert v. Cumming, 11 Exch. 405;

Cole v. Meek, 15 C. B. N. S. 795; 33 L. J. 183, C. P.

Secondly, they were not entitled under the charter-party to ship "frozen" woodpulp for "wet." See

Southampton Steam Colliery Company v. Clarke, 19 L. T. Rep. 651; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 197; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 73; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 53.

This was not "wet woodpulp" within the meaning of the charter-party, and the charterers should have provided that if they were prevented from shipping "a full and complete cargo of wet woodpulp" as agreed, the loss should fall on the ship. There was no exception in the charter-party to relieve the charterers from liability for matters caused by frost. It is a fallacy to say that it was in the contemplation of both parties. See

Hudson v. Ede, 18 L. T. Rep. 764; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 114; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 412;

Grant v. Coverdale, 51 L. T. Rep. 472; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 353; 9 App. Cas. 470;

Kearon v. Pearson, 7 H. & N. 386; 31 L. J. 1, Ex.

J. Walton, Q.C. and Collingwood Hope, who appeared for the respondents, were not called upon to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellants, their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: [After going through the facts of the case as set out above, his Lordship continued as follows:] The question is, what was the cargo contracted to be tendered for shipment by the charterers. Was it an unfrozen wet woodpulp cargo as is now set up by the shipowners, or a frozen wet woodpulp cargo as such cargoes always are at Bucksport in the winter? If it was to be unfrozen, where was it to come from with frost of 14 degrees below zero? There is not even a suggestion made by the shipowners as to this, and much less evidence that an unfrozen cargo could have been shipped in winter either at Bangor or Bucksport. It appears to me that when the facts are ascertained, there can be but one answer, and that is that the contract cargo which the defendants were to tender to the ship was that which they did tender as a full and complete cargo of wet woodpulp containing 50 per cent. of water, in its normal winter condition, shipped at Bucksport, namely, as frozen wet woodpulp. All that the charter-party did was to say that the vessel should load a full and complete cargo of wet woodpulp. It has been faintly contended that the merchant was bound to select that class of article which would make the greatest amount of tonnage which could be carried. But it is impossible to maintain that proposition, and counsel wisely abandoned it. Neither of the parties to the charter-party took into contemplation that the pulp became heavier or lighter, or more cumbersome in form, according to the state of the weather.

H. OF L.]

WEIR AND CO. v. UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

[H. OF L.]

That it was before their minds must have been clear enough, considering that sometimes they had 14 degrees below zero, at Bucksport. But it was said there should be some exception, and your Lordships were asked to imply an exception. You are not required to do anything of the kind. I look at the charter-party and I find that the article tendered and loaded was within the description of the charty-party, and was so tendered until the ship would hold no more. There has, therefore, been a complete performance of the stipulations of the charter-party. I cannot help thinking that the error which I notice both in the judgment of Bruce, J. and of Williams, L.J., is that they assumed that there had been a breach of the contract. It is not true to say that the ship did not load a full and complete cargo. It did load a full and complete cargo of the thing contemplated. Under those circumstances it appears to me that the plaintiffs fail, and I move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lords MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, SHAND, and BRAMPTON, concurred.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Rowcliffes, Rawle, Johnstone, and Gregory, for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondents, Wynne, Holme, and Wynne, for Forshaw and Hawkins, Liverpool.

July 19, 20, and 23, 1900.

(Before Lords DAVEY, BRAMPTON, and ROBERTSON.)

WEIR AND CO. v. UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party—Obligation to supply ballast.

By a charter-party which did not amount to a demise or parting with the possession of the ship by the owners, a ship was, in consideration of a certain sum per month, placed at the disposal of the charterers to be employed in the conveyance of lawful merchandise and (or) passengers between certain ports, and it was stated that she was let for the sole use and benefit of the charterers from a specified date on which she was to be placed "with clear holds" at the disposal of the charterers, they having the "whole reach or burthen" of the vessel, proper and sufficient room being reserved to the owners for the officers, crew, tackle, furniture, stores, and provisions.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the terms of the charter-party did not rebut the ordinary implication by which the obligation of supplying such ballast as may be necessary for the safe navigation of the ship rests with the owner.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Smith, Collins, and Williams, L.J.J.), reported in 81 L. T. Rep. 553; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 13; (1900) 1 Q. B. 28, who had affirmed a judgment of Bigham, J. upon a preliminary point of law ordered to be tried before him.

The respondents had chartered the steamship Elleric, belonging to the appellants, for three round voyages.

The appellants stated that on the first voyage the respondents directed the master to proceed without cargo from South Africa to New York, which he did. It was a disputed point whether or not he demanded ballast beyond the ship's water ballast from the charterers, or informed them that it was dangerous for his vessel to proceed to New York without it. The ship, however, started from South Africa with water ballast only, encountered heavy weather, and in endeavouring to keep her guaranteed speed broke three blades of her propeller, and was thus delayed for three and a half days. In consequence of this delay an additional quantity of coal was consumed, amounting in all to seventy tons. On the steamer's arrival at New York she had to be put into dry dock to repair the damage, and was further delayed five and a half days.

On the second and third voyages the captain refused to proceed without cargo unless the charterers would provide ballast over and above the ship's water ballast. Under protest they did so provide 600 tons upon the second voyage from Natal and 500 tons upon the third voyage from Marseilles.

When paying freight the charterers claimed a right to deduct, and did deduct, the following amounts: 315*l.*, hire of the ship for the nine days during which she was unable to proceed owing to the damage received on the first voyage; 76*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, price of the extra coal consumed in consequence of the said damage; 151*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, cost of purchasing, shipping, and discharging ballast upon the second voyage; and 92*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, cost of purchasing, shipping, and discharging ballast upon the third voyage; and sundry small items for dock dues, wharfage, overtime, &c.

The shipowners refused to admit the charterers' right to make the foregoing deductions, and in consequence brought the present action to recover the balance of freight alleged to be due to them, and in the original claim to recover the cost of repairs of the damage on the first voyage.

The material clauses of the charter-party are set out in the report in the court below and in the judgments of their Lordships.

By an order made by Kennedy, J. at chambers it was directed that the following question should be tried as a preliminary point of law: "Whose duty was it under the charter-party to provide any ballast beyond water ballast that might be necessary for the safe sailing of the Elleric on the chartered voyage, and at whose expense?"

Bigham, J. held that it was the duty of the shipowners under the charter-party to supply the ballast, and gave judgment for the defendants accordingly, and his judgment was affirmed as above mentioned.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Carver, Q.C. and Leck, for the appellants, contended that though under ordinary circumstances the owner must provide the ship in a fit state for the voyage, here the position was altered by the express provisions of the charter-party. The owners did not agree to supply ballast, and in fact had no right to put any on board, and the

H. OF L.]

WEIR AND CO. v. UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

[H. OF L.]

obligation to do so, if necessary, was on the charterers. They cited

Trinity House v. Clark, 4 M. & S. 288;
Towse v. Henderson, 4 Ex. 890.

J. Walton, Q.C. and Scrutton supported the judgment of the Court of Appeal

Carver, Q.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 23.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords: The appellants are owners of a steamship called the Elleric, and the respondents were the charterers of that vessel from the appellants under a charter-party, dated the 10th June 1897. The only question raised on the appeal is whether, in settling the accounts between the parties, the appellants (the owners) ought to be charged with all the expenses of ballasting the vessel with sand, in addition to the water ballast, on a voyage from South Africa to New York. Was it the duty of the shipowners to provide the ballast, or was that a duty which in this case was undertaken by the charterers? The answer to this question must depend on the true construction of the charter-party. The usual form of charter-party is a contract by which the use of the vessel is placed at the disposal of the charterers, but possession remains in the owners who navigate the vessel by their own officers and crew. It is not and cannot be denied that in such a contract the shipowner is bound to provide the necessary ballast for his ship, the reason being, as Smith, L.J. puts it, that as he is responsible for the navigation of his ship by his captain he is responsible for the ballast necessary to enable his ship to perform the contemplated voyage. But of course this prima facie obligation may be rebutted by the express words of the instrument. Mr. Carver's first argument was that the charter-party in the present case was not of the character I have described, viz., a contract of carriage, but amounted to a demise of the ship, and he argued that a provision that the master and crew should be the servants of the owners was not inconsistent with that construction, and in support of this argument he cited the case of Trinity House v. Clark (4 M. & S. 288). That case was decided on very special circumstances, and can hardly be a precedent for any other. But I cannot entertain any doubt that this contract is one by which the right duty and responsibility of navigating the vessel is on the owners. In this respect the case is hardly distinguishable from that of the Omoa and Cleland Coal and Iron Company v. Huntley (37 L. T. Rep. 184; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; 2 C. P. Div. 464), and if this point be determined in favour of the respondents the question whether the contract otherwise more nearly resembles one of demise than one of carriage becomes academic. It is clear that this contract is not one in which the ship is completely handed over to the charterers to be navigated by them at their own risk and responsibility. Prima facie, therefore, the obligation of providing the ballast is on the appellants. The second clause of the charter-party provides that on the appointed day the vessel is "to be placed with clear holds at the disposal of the charterers at the port of New York, they having the whole reach or burthen of the vessel, including passenger accommodation, if any, proper and sufficient room being reserved to the owners for the officers, crew, tackle, apparel, furniture, provisions, and stores, and the vessel is not to be required to load more than she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, provisions, stores, and fuel. The owners guarantee that the vessel has just been put in dry dock and painted, and undertake to maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state during the currency of the charter." Mr. Carver contended that the obligation to place the vessel "with clear holds" at the disposal of the respondents was inconsistent with the existence of any right or power to place ballast in her. I am not of that opinion. I think that you must read this clause with the other stipulations of the contract, and if you find that the owners are responsible for the safe navigation of the ship they must have the right and the power to do whatever may be necessary to enable them to discharge their responsibility. In other words, you must read such expressions as "with clear holds" or "the whole reach or burthen of the vessel" as meaning the full space of the vessel proper to be filled with cargo—and on this question I think Towse v. Henderson (4 Ex. 890) is in point. Before parting with the second clause I observe that the charterers are not obliged to ship a full cargo or any cargo, and it was, therefore, within the contemplation of the parties that the vessel might have to sail in ballast. I will not pause on clause 3, which provides that "loading and discharging" is to be carried out by and at the risk and expense of the charterers, because I am clearly of opinion that that provision applies to cargo only.

Reliance was also placed on clause 4, which is in these terms: "The captain (although appointed by the owners) shall be under the orders and directions of the charterers as regards employment, agency, and other arrangements"—not, your Lordships will observe, as regards navigation—"and the charterers hereby agree to indemnify the owners against all consequences or liabilities that may arise from the captain signing bills of lading or otherwise complying with such orders and directions." The argument was that the necessity for ballast was the direct consequence of the charterers' orders as to the vessel's employment, and therefore a matter in respect of which the owners were entitled to indemnity. The argument is ingenious, but the answer appears to me to be that the clause has nothing whatever to do with navigation, or any incident of navigation, and was not in my opinion intended to shift the responsibility for the safe navigation of the vessel from the shoulders on which it is placed by other terms of the contract. The only other clause relied on was clause 7, which is in these terms. I only read it so far as it is material—"The charterers shall also bear all port and dock charges, pilotage, light dues, agency commissions, delivery, labourage, and all other duties, charges, and expenses, the owners providing and paying for all ship's stores, insurance, crew's wages and victualling, and necessary stores for the engine-room, and all stores, bedding, crockery, mess utensils, and other requirements for passengers." It was said first that all expenses of every description other than those expressly undertaken by the owners are imposed on the charterers, and also that "labourage" would include the labour of loading and unloading the ballast. But it is obvious that many expenses relating to the ship and labour employed about her would not be included in these words. For example, expenses connected with maintenance of a ship in an efficient state. And if so, why should expenses necessarily incurred for the purpose of her safe navigation be included? The duties of maintenance and navigation are by the eighth clause of the contract put on the same footing in this respect that the payment of hire is to cease as well from any accident of navigation as from any default in maintaining the vessel in a state of efficiency. I have dealt with these minor points out of respect to the learned counsel who argued the case of the appellants. But the broad and sufficient ground for decision is that the providing proper ballast for the stability of the vessel is incident to her safe navigation, the responsibility for which is by the contract imposed on the appellants. I am of opinion that the judgments of Bigham, J. and of the Court of Appeal are quite right and ought to be affirmed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

H. OF L.]

WEIR AND CO. v. UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

[H. OF L.]

Lord BRAMPTON.—My Lords: The only substantial question in this case appears to me to be whether the charter-party under consideration ought to be construed as a contract for the hire and letting by the owners to the charterers of the ship itself in its integrity, so as to transfer for the time being to the charterers the control over her working and navigation, and making them practically the owners of her during the voyages contemplated by the charter-party, or as a contract conferring upon the charterers a right to insist upon the ship being used and employed to the extent of her carrying power, exclusively on their behalf and for their sole benefit, according to the terms agreed on, the ship itself, subject to such right, remaining for all purposes of navigation and maintenance under the control of the officers and servants of the owners, and on their behalf. Bigham, J. and the Court of Appeal held the latter to be the true construction of the contract. I am of opinion that those judgments are right. I am far from saying that some of the phrases employed in the charter-party do not give colour to the argument for the appellants; for instance, the stipulations in clause 1, that the vessel shall be placed at the disposal of the charterers; in clause 2, that the vessel is let for the sole use of the charterers and with liberty to sublet; and in clause 8, that the freight for the hire of the vessel shall be paid at so much per month until the vessel is again returned by the charterers to the owners at New York, in like good condition as when chartered; but none of them necessarily indicate that it was the intention either of the owners to transfer to the charterers, or of the charterers to accept the absolute possession of the ship, during the currency of the charter; while there are stipulations throughout the charter-party which, to my mind, indicate a contrary intention. Clause 1 provides that the vessel shall be maintained by the owners with sufficient complement of officers, seamen, engineers, firemen, and stewards; and although by clause 2 the charterers are to have the disposal of the whole reach or burthen of the vessel, proper and sufficient room is reserved to the owners for the officers, crew, tackle, apparel, furniture, provisions, and stores; and further, in the same clause the owners undertake to maintain the vessel in a thoroughly efficient state during the currency of her charter. These clauses, coupled with clauses 3, 4, 5, and 6, indicate to my mind, that it was the intention of both owners and charterers that the captain with his officers and crew were to remain in actual possession of the vessel as the servants of the owners, for the purposes of her maintenance and proper navigation throughout all the voyages contemplated by the charter, but for such purposes only. In all other respects the carrying capacity of the vessel was at the disposal of the charterers, whose orders and directions as to the voyages were to be obeyed. The case of the Trinity House v. Clark (ubi sup.) turned very much upon the character of the service for which the vessel in that case was chartered, and I do not regard it as any authority against the contention of the respondents. The case of the Omoa and Cleland Coal and Iron Company v. Huntley (ubi sup.) is an authority for holding that in this case the vessel, for the purposes of navigation, remained in the possession and under the control of the owners.

The Elleric, the subject of the contract, was duly placed at the disposal of the charterers at New York on the day named with clear holds, as stipulated. It will be observed, however, that the charter-party imposed no obligation upon the charterers to load a full or, indeed, any cargo on board, but the holds were clear to enable them to do as they pleased in that respect, and they did in fact load a cargo which was duly discharged at South African ports. The respondents then directed the captain to take the vessel back to New York without any cargo, as it is conceded they had a perfect right to do. The captain, however, very truly pointed out that the water ballast tanks with which the vessel was fitted were not sufficient to enable her to proceed safely on such a voyage without cargo or extra ballast, which he requested the respondents to furnish. This they refused to do, and the Elleric made the voyage without it, but sustained damage in so doing. On the second and third voyages the captain was also requested to take the vessel from a South African port to New York without any cargo or such extra ballast, but he refused to do so. Thereupon the respondents supplied the ballast required under protest, and when they came to make payment to the appellants for the hire of the vessel they deducted the expenses of so doing. It must be conceded that such ballast was absolutely necessary for the safety of the vessel. Taking the facts as I have stated them, and construing the contract as I think it ought to be construed, I do not think it open to question that, in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, the owners would be responsible for the expenses of the requisite ballast so supplied. I fail to find in the charter-party anything which exonerates the owners from the duty of supplying all ballast necessary for the safe navigation of the ship on the voyages for which she was chartered. The requirement that she shall be placed with clear holds at the disposal of the charterers before the commencement of any voyage meant, in my opinion, no more than this—that the charterers were to have the holds clear to enable them to stow in them such cargo as the ship could reasonably carry. They might stow in and fill them with a cargo of such bulk and weight as to make further ballast, beyond the water ballast, altogether unnecessary. On the other hand, they might think fit to load so light a cargo as that without more ballast the ship would be unsafe for her voyage. Can it be seriously doubted that in such a state of things the captain would be justified in requiring, nay more, that it would be his duty to require space to be reserved for him to put into the hold on behalf of his owners such ballast as was necessary properly to trim the ship and make her fit for the voyage? Let me suppose for a moment that the charterers at starting had determined to send the ship out from New York to South Africa without any cargo (as they did from South Africa to New York); could it be said that, the holds being then clear, the captain would not have been at liberty and that it would not have been his duty towards his owners to put in them such ballast as he deemed necessary for the safety of the ship—of course at their expense? I have read most carefully clause 7—so much relied on for the appellants—but I fail to see any obligation imposed on the charterers to provide anything essential for the navigation of the ship. No such obligation is conveyed in the word “labourage,” and it seems to me to be impossible that in the use of the words “other duties, charges, and expenses” the parties meant or had it in contemplation to include ballast if necessary. If it had been their intention to shift on to the shoulders of the charterers the ordinary obligation of the owner under such a contract, I should have expected to find express words to that effect. As the result of the best consideration that I can apply to this case I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord ROBERTSON.—My Lords: I cannot say that I have any doubt of the soundness of the decision appealed against. The appellants have relied on the peculiar terms of the charter-party and of those I shall presently speak. But the general rule is admittedly that in an ordinary contract of affreightment the owner is liable for ballast. Now, why is this? It is because the function of ballast is, as Tindal, C.J. says, to make the ship trim for her voyage. It is put in, therefore, to fit the ship safely to carry the particular cargo placed on her. One ship will require more ballast and another less, and it is for the master to judge whether any, and what, ballast will be required by his ship during a proposed voyage having regard to the nature of the proposed cargo. The expense of ballast is, therefore, on the owner, because it is an incident of the duty of navigating the ship. It seems to me therefore, that in every case the key to the question, Who pays for ballast? is found in the answer to the question, With whom is the duty of navigating? Now, although there has been some discussion as to whether there is, under this contract, a demise of the ship, there can be no question that the duty of navigation is with the owners. This being so, it seems to me that all controversy as to whether there is not here at the same time a demise of the ship is immaterial and theoretical. But I say this, not in order to suggest any doubt of the soundness of the view expressed on this point in the Court of Appeal, but rather to indicate that prima facie the criterion of such disputes is to be found in what is uncontroverted. Now, it has been argued that certain provisions of the charter-party imply that the charterers undertake the duty of ballasting. The appellants attach much importance to the fact that clause 2 places the ship at the disposal of the charterers “with clear holds.” The phrase is striking; but I do not think that it stands the strain of the appellants’ argument. If there is anything in the arguments it proves too much, for it would equally show that, whoever paid for it, the putting in ballast at all would be a breach of the contract, as depriving the appellants of part of the stipulated cargo space. In truth, however, the words “with clear holds” must be read along with the sequel of the clause, and the words “and the vessel is not to be required to load more than she can reasonably stow and carry” show that the whole is subject to the effective fulfilment by the owners of the duty of safe navigation. To that extent the “clear holds” mean holds with ballast in if and when required; and no light is obtained from those words as to who is to pay for the ballast. Nor would any repugnancy to clause 2 arise if it be allowed that the well settled rule would apply that the owners might carry freight-earning ballast, for ballast is never anything but the complement of the proposed cargo; and the owner can never claim a right to put in ballast so as to oust cargo which would itself make the ship trim. It is only when the cargo is announced that the question of ballast arises. Clause 7 is the only other which seemed to give a foothold for Mr. Carver’s argument, and he relied mainly on the word “labourage.” Now, at the best this word is insufficient to cover the whole of the claim now in dispute, for the price of the ballast is one part of the claim. But, apart from this, the very general word “labourage” may well be satisfied by labour required in any of the incidents or contingencies which may occur in port. I do not find in clause 7 or in any other part of the charter-party any implication, much less any provision, sufficiently clear to transfer to the charterers a liability which in its nature falls on the owners as navigating the ship.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Lowless and Co.
Solicitors for the respondents, Bircham and Co.

May 21, 22, and July 30, 1900.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury), Lords ASHBOURNE, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, and BRAMPTON.)

SAXON STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party—Colliery guarantee—Demurrage—“Colliery working days.”

By a charter-party which incorporated a “colliery guarantee” the charterers agreed to load a ship

H. OF L.]

SAXON STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

[H. OF L.]

with coal "in twelve clear working days, Sundays and holidays excepted."

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that, in the absence of evidence of any special meaning attached to the words "working days," they meant days on which the collieries usually worked, not days on which they actually worked, and that the shipowners were entitled to demurrage in respect of a delay in the loading caused by a strike at the collieries.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., Smith and Romer, L.JJ.), reported in 81 L. T. Rep. 246; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 574, who had reversed a judgment of Lord Russell, C.J., reported 79 L. T. Rep. 486; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 449, in favour of the appellants, the plaintiffs below, in a case tried before him in the Commercial Court.

The appellants, as owners of the steamship Saxon, brought their action against the respondents, the charterers, for demurrage alleged to be due under a charter-party and for loss of freight.

The following facts were admitted or proved:—

Under the charter-party of the 25th Jan. 1898 the Saxon was to load a cargo of coal at Barry, subject to certain terms and conditions, of which the following are the material parts:

Cargo, except any portion thereof required for stiffening, to be loaded in twelve clear working days, Sundays and holidays excepted, from the time that written notice is given, between 9 a.m. and 6 p.m., that all ballast or inward cargo is discharged and the stiffening coal (if any) is on board, and the ship is ready to receive her cargo. Stiffening coal, if required, is to be supplied at ship's expense, at the rate of 100 tons per clear working day, after twenty-four hours' notice is given of its being required and that the ship is ready to receive the same. The loading both of cargo proper and stiffening coal is subject to the conditions of the colliery guarantee in use at the said colliery. Any time lost through riots, strike, lock-out, or stoppage of pitmen, trimmers, or other hands connected with the working or delivery of the said coal, or from any conditions or exceptions mentioned in the colliery guarantee, or by reason of accidents to mines or machinery, obstruction on the railway and in the docks, or by reason of floods, frosts, storms, or any cause beyond the control of the said colliery, not to be computed as part of the aforesaid loading, or the hereafter mentioned discharging time.

Demurrage at loading ports as per colliery guarantee, at port of discharge at the rate of 3d. per register ton per working day.

The colliery guarantee, referred to in the charter-party, was dated the 28th Jan. 1898, and was addressed to the respondents.

By its terms the Saxon was to be loaded with a cargo of coal in twelve days, subject to the following:—

The following exceptions not to be computed as part of the aforesaid loading or stiffening time unless used, notwithstanding that during the time of any such exceptions coal may be shipped by us into any other vessel: All holidays, whether public holidays or colliers' holidays, whereby work is suspended, either at the docks, or at our colliery or collieries. Time from 5 p.m. on Saturday until 7 a.m. on Monday. Time occupied in shifting from hatch to hatch and in repairing. Any time lost through riots, strikes, lock-outs, dismissal of workmen, or from any dispute between masters and men causing a stoppage of our colliery or collieries, or of the trimmers, dock, railway, or other hands connected with the working, delivery, shipment, or trimming of the coal or on the railway or railways over which our traffic is usually conveyed to the loading dock or docks, or by reason of accidents to mines or machinery, causing stoppage of the same, or by obstructions or accidents at our colliery or collieries, or on the said railways or in the docks, or by reason of storms, floods, frosts, snow, or from any cause of whatsoever kind or nature. In case of partial holiday or partial stoppage of our colliery or collieries from any or either of the aforesaid causes, the lay days to be extended proportionately to the diminution of output arising from such partial holiday or stoppage. For the purpose of this guarantee, all holidays and full-day stoppages at our collieries shall be deemed to commence at 5 p.m. the working day preceding, and to end at 7 a.m. the working day following such holiday or stoppage. In case the vessel, whether on demurrage or not, can complete loading the cargo by 5 p.m. on the day preceding any Sunday, holiday, or other stoppage of work, and such completion is prevented otherwise than by our act or default, time shall not count either for loading or demurrage until 7 a.m. on the day on which work is resumed.

The colliery guarantee contained a scale of rates for demurrage (if any), the rate applicable to the Saxon being 13l. per day. The colliery guarantee also provided that demurrage was to be "payable per colliery working day, or in proportion for any part of a day, which for purpose of computation shall be divisible into twenty-four parts."

The Saxon arrived at Barry on the 8th March, and the lay days for loading expired on the 31st March at 2 p.m. After the expiration of the lay days—viz., on the 9th April—a strike took place at the Ferndale Company's Collieries, which lasted a long time. The Saxon remained waiting for cargo, notice that the vessel was on demurrage being given from time to time to the respondents and the colliery company, until by letter dated the 26th May 1898 the respondents gave notice to the appellants' brokers that they could not load the ship. This notice was communicated to the owners, who thereupon took steps to obtain another charter-party. On the 13th June they chartered her to Messrs. Hickie, Borman, and Co. Under that charter-party she was loaded without delay and sailed on the 17th June. The cargo loaded was 2719 tons of coal, and the freight was 14s. per ton to Cape Town as against 18s. 6d. per ton to the same place under the respondents' charter-party, the freight in each case being subject to certain discounts and deductions.

The claims put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs (appellants) were (1) for loss of freight. The amount claimed was 609l. 19s. 9d., and was made up of the difference of freight in the two charter-parties, taking all deductions into account and taking a full and complete cargo of coal at 2719 tons, the quantity actually loaded under the second charter-party; and (2) for the detention of the Saxon by the respondents. The amount claimed was 785l. 8s. 4d., being demurrage at the colliery guarantee rate of 13l. per day for the colliery working days from 2 p.m. on the 31st March until the 17th June, when the loading under the second charter-party was completed. The appellants' calculation was upon the basis of reckoning every day from the 31st March to the 17th June as a colliery working day, except such days as were Sundays or public holidays, or colliers' holidays, and therefore excluded the following days: Sunday, April 3; Mabon's Day (colliers' monthly holiday), April 4; Good Friday, April 8; Sunday, April 10; Easter Monday April 11; Sundays, April 17 and 24; Sunday, May 1; Mabon's Day, May 2; Sundays, May 8, 15, 22, and 29; Whit Monday, May 30; Sunday, June 5; Mabon's Day, June 6; and Sunday, June 12, upon the ground that demurrage was payable "per colliery working day," and that the days excluded for the above reasons from the demurrage computation were all such days as were not "colliery working days."

It was admitted that the lay days having expired on the 31st March, at 2 p.m., the respondents were in default and liable to pay demurrage until the 9th April, when the strike began, but the respondents contended that failure to load after the 9th April was due to the strike, and that owing to the strike the days for which demurrage was claimed were not "colliery working days," inasmuch as no work was in fact done at the Ferndale Company's Collieries on the days in question, and that, therefore, no demurrage was payable for the detention after the 9th April. The respondents further contended that all the exceptions, which by the terms of the colliery guarantee were not to be computed as part of the loading or stiffening time, also applied, notwithstanding that the loading time had expired, and the vessel was on demurrage, and, therefore, claimed a right, in any event, to exclude the time from 5 p.m. to midnight on the day before a Sunday or holiday, and from midnight to 7 a.m. on a Monday or day after a holiday, in computing the demurrage time.

The appellants, on the other hand, contended that such exceptions had no application, except for the purpose of computing the loading or stiffening time, and in any event the appellants contended that the 6*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* allowed by the respondents to be due for demurrage up to the 9th April must be increased by 18*l.* 19*s.*, being the demurrage payable for the thirty-five hours deducted by the respondents in respect of the periods from 5 p.m. to midnight, and midnight to 7 a.m. as aforesaid.

The Lord Chief Justice gave judgment for the appellants on both heads, with certain deductions, but his judgment was reversed as above mentioned.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C. and Leck appeared for the appellants, and argued that "colliery working days" meant days on which the collieries usually worked in the ordinary course, not days on which in fact they did not work for any reason. They cited

Clink v. Hickie, Borman, and Co., 4 Com. Cas. 292; 15 Times L. Rep. 408;

Nielsen v. Wait, 54 L. T. Rep. 344; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 553; 16 Q. B. Div. 67.

J. Walton, Q.C., Carver, Q.C., and Bailhache, for the respondents, supported the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 30.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: The controversy between the parties in this case is reduced to very narrow limits, and may, I think, be treated as simply the question of what is the contract between them. The contract is to be found in the charter-party and the colliery guarantee, which, by incorporation and reference, forms part of the contract, and the sole question in the case appears to me to turn upon one phrase—viz., the phrase "colliery working day." If the construction which the Lord Chief Justice placed on that phrase at the trial meant ordinary working days under ordinary normal circumstances, then the demurrage which the appellants claim is clearly due under the contract. If, on the contrary, the period during which a strike in the coal trade prevailed there was no colliery working day, then the demurrage claimed was not due, and it seems to me that, apart from some evidence giving a technical meaning to the phrase, it is impossible to deny that, though workmen were on strike and did not work, these were, as the Lord Chief Justice held, colliery working days. I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that the real question in the case is, What is a "colliery working day"? Does it mean only a day upon which the colliery is in fact working, or does it mean what are ordinary working days in normal times and in normal circumstances? In the first place, I think on the ordinary construction of language that one would understand the words as the Lord Chief Justice has understood them. A working day is I think in ordinary parlance to be understood as distinguished from a holiday—including in that term a Sunday or some fixed and usual day for rest and not for work, as a Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, and the like. But, besides what I have described as the ordinary and natural meaning of the words, there is the additional circumstance that, if the parties had intended what it is now contended that they meant, I see no reason why they should not have said in plain terms that by "colliery working days" they meant days on which the colliery was actually working in fact. I am unable to follow the view of the Court of Appeal; they appear to recognise what I have described as the ordinary and natural meaning of the words, and I quite agree that the ordinary and natural meaning of words may be altered or modified by their use in a particular neighbourhood or in relation to a particular subject-matter. They adopt the Lord Chief Justice's exposition of the words generally, but they add to that exposition, "You must give the qualification as to how these words would be understood in the neighbourhood of the place where the parties were contracting." This would be quite intelligible if there were any evidence that the words were so understood like the custom of a port, or any other evidence which practically makes the use of particular words technical in the neighbourhood or in relation to the particular subject-matter. But the difficulty which I have is that there is no evidence from which any such technical meaning can be gathered, and it certainly lies upon those who wish to give a technical meaning to plain language to establish that the words sought to be modified have acquired the meaning upon which they insist. The truth is that the respondents are endeavouring to establish that a strike, which in this case prevented the loading of the vessel, prevents the days upon which the colliers would be working under ordinary normal circumstances

H. OF L.]

SAXON STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

[H. OF L.]

from being colliery working days. It is, to my mind, very clear that at the time when this contract was signed between the parties no such idea had occurred to them, for in relation to another matter—which, however, does not touch the liability now in question—they expressly mention strikes, and I cannot conceive that, if the construction now sought to be put upon this contract was in their minds, they should not in plain terms have expressed their meaning. I have spoken of the contract between the parties, and it is, of course, one contract, so far as the present question arises, although one part of the contract is referred to and incorporated by reference instead of being a contract on one piece of paper. And, although some confusion arises from this circumstance, I am unable to see anything in the other parts of the contract which have relation to the question now in debate. If I am right in saying that the words in question ordinarily bear the meaning that I have attributed to them, I do not think it possible in the state of the evidence before your Lordships to assume that there is anything in any other part of the contract which was intended to operate, or does, in fact, operate, to alter the construction which the words would generally bear. It follows from the facts proved that the delay in respect of which the demurrage is claimed was a delay during colliery working days, and the appellants are entitled to the amount which they claim. For these reasons I move, your Lordships, that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice be restored, and in that respect the judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed, with the usual consequences as to costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: This is a case of demurrage. The respondents chartered the ship Saxon from the appellants to carry a cargo of steam coal from the Port of Barry to Cape Town. The cargo was to be provided by the owners of the Ferndale Colliery, who were at the time under contract to supply the respondents with a large quantity of coal. In accordance with a well-known practice the colliery owners gave the charterers a guarantee as to the loading and despatch of the vessel, and the charter-party was made in view of this guarantee. The charter-party provided for “demurrage at loading port as per colliery guarantee.” According to the guarantee demurrage was to be at a certain scale (about which there is no question), and was expressed to be “payable per colliery working day.” The main question is, What is the meaning of the expression “colliery working day”? Does it mean a day on which under ordinary normal circumstances the colliery would be working, or does it mean a day on which the colliery is actually at work? There is a further question as to the exclusion from the period of demurrage of certain hours of grace in extension of non-working days, which for some purposes certainly were to be reckoned from 5 p.m. on the day preceding to 7 a.m. on the day following. The vessel was not loaded in accordance with the charter-party. The lay days in which the loading ought to have been completed expired at 2 p.m. on the 31st March 1898, and thereupon the period of demurrage began. There is no dispute as to the liability of the charterers for demurrage during the period between the expiration of the lay days and the 9th April following. Then came the great South Wales coal strike, and after a time the charter-party was abandoned. The question is as to liability for demurrage during the time while the colliery was idle owing to the strike. Lord Russell, C.J. and Lindley, M.R., who gave the judgment of the Court of Appeal, were both agreed that prima facie the expression “colliery working day” means “ordinary working days under ordinary normal circumstances.” But the Court of Appeal, differing from the Lord Chief Justice, was of opinion that this prima facie meaning was displaced by the language of the particular contract under consideration. It was common ground that the liability of the charterers to the ship and the liability of the colliery to the charterers were meant to be co-extensive. Taking first the colliery guarantee, the Master of the Rolls came to the conclusion that the clause as to demurrage in that document excluded days on which the colliery was not at work owing to any cause whatever other than the fault of the owners. Then turning to the charter-party, his Lordship expressed the opinion that there was nothing to be found there repugnant to the construction which he had placed upon the demurrage clause in the colliery guarantee.

The case is certainly not free from difficulty, but on the whole upon this point I prefer the conclusion at which the Lord Chief Justice arrived. The Master of the Rolls relies upon two clauses in the colliery guarantee, which for the sake of convenience of reference were numbered 6 and 7. He thinks that those clauses show that days on which the colliery was not actually worked were not to be treated as “colliery working days.” I am not able to agree in this opinion. Clause 7, I think, has not much bearing upon the point. It provides for a very exceptional case when the vessel, “whether on demurrage or not,” could complete loading by 5 p.m. on the day preceding “any Sunday, holiday, or other stoppage of work.” The expression “working day” is not to be found in that clause at all. The preceding clause, numbered 6, is in these words: “For the purpose of this guarantee all holidays and full day stoppages at the collieries shall be deemed to commence at 5 p.m. the working day preceding and to end at 7 a.m. the working day following such holiday or stoppage.” The judgment of the Court of Appeal is, I think, really based on that clause alone. Now, in the first place, it seems to me, reading the whole instrument fairly, that in clause 6 the parties had nothing in view beyond the period of lay days or loading time. In the next place, I cannot myself see anything to show that in clause 6 the expression “working day” means a day on which work is actually done rather than a day which is an ordinary working day under ordinary normal circumstances. The clause is not very artistically drawn. But, whichever construction of the expression “working day” is adopted, the result is the same, and in either case there must be occasionally some overlapping of hours. I am rather disposed to think that the expression “working day” in that clause means an ordinary working day under normal circumstances, because I find in the very next clause, where a day on which work is actually done is evidently meant, the parties do not use the expression “working day.” The language is changed. The expression used is “the day on which work is resumed.” I may observe in passing that clause 6 does not take account of Sundays. It only speaks of "holidays and full-day stoppages." Why are Sundays omitted? If you turn to clause 4 you find that Sundays are already provided for by the exclusion of "time from 5 p.m. on Saturday until 7 a.m. on Monday." Now the application of clause 4 is unquestionably confined to lay days or loading time. This circumstance, taken in connection with the special reference to demurrage in clause 7, seems to me to show that, apart from the special case provided for in clause 7, the whole group of clauses 4, 5, 6, and 7 are applicable only to lay days or loading time. There is a further indication tending to show that the charterers meant by the expression "working day" an ordinary working day under ordinary normal circumstances. It is to be found in the charter-party. That instrument provides that the cargo is to be loaded "in twelve clear working days, Sunday and holidays excepted." Now Sundays are not working days, nor are holidays. The provision therefore must, I think, be paraphrased thus—"the loading is to be done in twelve clear working days, but note that by working days we mean days exclusive of Sundays and holidays." I have criticised, perhaps too minutely, the language of these two documents—the charter-party and the colliery guarantee—following the line of argument adopted by the Master of the Rolls. I should, however, prefer to put my judgment on rather a broader ground. When once it is admitted, as it is on all sides, that the expression "colliery working day" prima facie means an ordinary working day under ordinary normal circumstances, it is, I think, for those who say that it means something else to make out their case satisfactorily, and I do not think that the respondents have done so. It seems to me to follow, from the view which I find myself compelled to take on the main question, that in calculating the period of demurrage no account is to be taken of the conventional extension of Sundays and holidays, whether public holidays or colliery holidays. The extension was, I think, introduced for the purpose of reckoning the period of lay days or loading time. It has, as it seems to me, no application to the period of demurrage. I am therefore of the opinion that the appellants are right on both points, and that the appeal must be allowed with costs and the order of the Lord Chief Justice varied accordingly. My noble and learned friends Lord Ashbourne and Lord Morris and Killanin concur in this judgment.

[H. OF L.]

SAXON STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

[H. OF L.]

Lord BRAMPTON.—My Lords: [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The respondents deny any liability for demurrage after the commencement of the strike, upon the ground that the days of the strike were not "colliery working days" within the meaning of the demurrage clause in the guarantee, because no work was done upon them at the colliery; whether they were so or not depends upon the true interpretation of the clause. Lord Russell, C.J., who tried the case, held that the expression "colliery working days" meant "ordinary working days under ordinary normal circumstances." The Court of Appeal agreed that subject to the addition of the words "in the district within which the Ferndale Collieries are situate," this would be the prima facie interpretation of the expression; but Lindley, M.R. in delivering the judgment of the court, went on to say that this construction was excluded by the language of the guarantee, and particularly by the words of clauses 6 and 7 of that document, holding that Sundays, holidays, and days on which work is stopped are not to be treated as days on which work is going on. On this ground the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was reversed, so far as it related to the demurrage after the commencement of the strike. With all deference to the Lords Justices I am unable to give my assent to the view thus taken. I should agree with them if the words "working days," according to their true construction, meant "days on which work is going on," but I think they do not bear that construction in the document in question. In ordinary parlance to speak of particular days as working days is to distinguish them from Sundays or recognised and established holidays, and is descriptive of them merely as days on which men ordinarily work in their respective callings; it is a general name applied to such days and means nothing more. In the absence of any fixed holiday a week is commonly said to consist only of Sunday and working days, to distinguish the day of rest from the days devoted to labour. A day so ordinarily spoken of as a working day does not cease to be properly so described because a body of men, who might work if they would, refuse to do so, and make it for their own purposes a day of idleness. Of course, this ordinary interpretation of the expression might be disregarded on proof that the expression in question had, when the guarantee was executed, already acquired a different signification when used in connection with shipping or colliery businesses; or if in the written guarantee from the context, or from other clauses in it, it could be made obvious to the judge charged with the construction of the contract that the expression was not intended by the parties to be used in its ordinary sense, but in the sense contended for by the respondents. No such evidence was given or tendered. The Court of Appeal, however, having held that other clauses in the guarantee, particularly clauses 6 and 7, did justify the interpretation contended for by the respondents, it becomes necessary to refer to those clauses particularly, but I must preface what I have to say about them by a short reference to the substance of the three clauses which immediately precede them, Nos. 3, 4, and 5. No. 3 introduces the others thus: "The following exceptions not to be computed as part of the aforesaid loading or stiffening time." No. 4 enumerates those exceptions: "All holidays, whether public holidays or colliers' holidays, whereby work is suspended, &c. Time from 5 p.m. on Saturday until 7 a.m. on Monday. Any time lost through riots, strikes, &c., causing a stoppage of our colliery, &c., or by reason of accidents, &c., at our colliery, or by reason of storms, &c., or from any cause of whatever kind." No. 5: "In case of partial holiday or partial stoppage of our colliery, the lay days to be extended as therein stated." It will be observed that in neither of these clauses are demurrage days in any way referred to, but the exceptions are confined exclusively to loading and stiffening time, and nowhere in the guarantee is there any reference to any stoppage of work to be found, except in the five clauses I have mentioned. As to No. 6 I confess myself at a loss to understand how it can affect the question at issue.

H. OF L.]

IREDALE &amp; ANOTHER v. CHINA TRADERS INSURANCE COMPANY. [CT. OF APP.]

The object of it is, as it seems to me, simply to define the hours when holidays and full day stoppages shall be deemed to commence and terminate (the hours to be included in the Sunday exception having already been fixed as from 5 p.m. on Saturday until 7 a.m. on Monday in clause 4, and the mode of extending the lay days in the case of partial holidays or stoppages having been dealt with in clause 5) in using the word "working day." I see no reason for supposing that the colliery company, in using the expression working days in clause 6, intended them to be treated in any other manner than according to their ordinary interpretation as days on which men are accustomed to work. Lindley, M.R. in his judgment pointedly stated that in clause 6 "working day" is contrasted with "holidays" and "full-day stoppages," but in considering the weight to be attached to this observation it must not be overlooked that the word "stoppage" is used, and is to be found only in the clauses relating to exceptions to be made in the computation of the loading and stiffening time, and then only as descriptive of days to be deducted in the computation of those times: and they are not in any way ever referred to as days to be deducted in the computation of "demurrage"—that for the purpose of computing the loading days it is immaterial whether one construction or the other is correct, for with either construction strikes and stoppages are expressly excepted from the loading days, and does not in the least degree depend on whether "working day" is interpreted in the one way or the other. It is further to be observed that demurrage is only mentioned in clauses 10 and 7, and that the only exception in the computation of demurrage is the very exceptional one for which provision is made in clause 7. I cannot bring my mind to the belief that the colliery company, when they signed the guarantee, really considered that the expression "colliery working days" would legally be construed as days only on which work is actually done, for at the end of clause 7, when they intended that the day should be so treated, they carefully use the expression "on the day on which work is resumed," which would be superfluous and unnecessary if the construction now sought to be put upon it be correct. Probably they never gave the matter a thought until they found the strike to be serious and the claims heavy. As to clause 7, it applies only to a case where the loading of a vessel is so far advanced that it might and would be, under ordinary circumstances, completed on a day preceding a Sunday, holiday, or stoppage of work, but for its prevention by a cause for which the colliery is not responsible. In such case it provides that time shall not count for loading or demurrage until the day "on which work is resumed." It is obvious that this clause has no application where there has been no loading of nor even an attempt to load the vessel with any part of her cargo. This is the only clause in which a suspension of demurrage days is provided for. If it had been the intention of the colliery in all cases to suspend them during a strike, it is impossible to suppose they would not have expressly so provided, as they easily could have done, by the addition of a few words to clause 3, or by a short and independent clause. For the reasons which I have stated, I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, with costs.

Judgment appealed from reversed. Judgment of the Lord Chief Justice restored with a variation. Respondents to pay to the appellants their costs here and in the courts below.

Solicitors for the appellants, Lowless and Co.
Solicitors for the respondents, Riddell and Co.
for Vachell and Co., Cardiff.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

June 21, 22, and July 3, 1900.

(Before SMITH, WILLIAMS, and ROMER, L.JJ.)

IREDALE AND ANOTHER v. CHINA TRADERS
INSURANCE COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

General average—Sacrifice of freight—Abandonment of voyage.

A cargo of coal, which was being carried on a voyage from C. to E., became heated during the voyage, and the master for the safety of the ship, freight, and cargo, made for B. and put in there. The cargo was there unloaded, and was found to be in such a state that it could not safely be carried to E.

The cargo was thereupon sold, and the voyage was abandoned, the freight being thereby lost.

Held (affirming the judgment of Bigham, J.), that there was no general average sacrifice of the freight which could give a right to general average contribution.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiffs owned the iron ship Lodore, and by a charter-party, dated the 10th Feb. 1897 chartered her to load coals at Cardiff for Esquimault at 19s. 9d. per ton delivered.

By a policy of insurance, dated the 3rd March 1897, they insured the chartered freight, valued at 1650l., with the defendants, against (inter alia) loss by fire, and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said freight.

The Lodore proceeded to Cardiff, and there loaded a full cargo of coals, and sailed on the insured voyage on the 29th March 1897.

On the 26th May 1897 the coals began to heat, and the master decided, for the safety of the ship, freight, and cargo, to jettison cargo and to bear up for the River Plate.

About forty tons of cargo were jettisoned, and the Lodore subsequently anchored in Buenos Ayres Roads on the 29th May 1897.

Between the 29th May and the 25th June 1897 cargo was from time to time discharged and various surveys were held upon the coals, and it was found that the coals continued hot and would heat still further if the voyage was proceeded with.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CT. OF APP.] IREDALE & ANOTHER v. CHINA TRADERS INSURANCE COMPANY. [CT. OF APP.]

Accordingly, on the 25th June 1897, the coals were condemned, and were ultimately sold.

The vessel abandoned her voyage to Esquimaux and returned to the United Kingdom with another cargo, and the chartered freight was totally lost.

It was necessary for the safety of the whole adventure that the vessel should put into Buenos Ayres as aforesaid: and it was reasonably certain that, if she had continued on her direct voyage, the temperature of the coal would have continued to rise until spontaneous combustion ensued, and that, had she so continued her voyage, the ship and cargo would have been destroyed by fire before reaching Esquimaux.

When and while she was at Buenos Ayres, the ship and her cargo, both the portion landed and the portion remaining on board, were in safety, but after she reached Buenos Ayres no part of the cargo could have been reloaded and (or) carried with safety to Esquimaux in the same or another bottom, and it was all necessarily and properly sold at Buenos Ayres.

This action, in the defence of which all underwriters interested similarly to the defendants concurred, was defended to test the question whether, by way of set-off and deduction from the total loss on the policy, which was admitted, the defendants were entitled to have the said loss of freight made good in general average to any and what extent, and to deduct the contribution to the same, falling on the plaintiffs as shipowners, from the amount due on the policy.

The defendants did not allege or rely on improper condition of the cargo as a defence to any claim there might be.

It was agreed that the court should have power to draw all necessary inferences of fact from the above facts which were agreed to; and the parties agreed to leave the adjustment of figures, on such principle as might be laid down, to an average adjuster.

The action was tried before Bigham, J. without a jury.

The learned judge held that, at the time when the voyage was abandoned, the freight was hopelessly lost, and that there was, therefore, no general average sacrifice of the freight. He therefore gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs (81 L. T. Rep. 231; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 580; (1899) 2 Q. B. 356).

The defendants appealed.

Carver, Q.C. and T. E. Scrutton for the appellants.—The learned judge in the court below was wrong in holding that there had not been a general average sacrifice of the freight. The question whether an act is a general average sacrifice or not depends upon the intention of the master of the vessel when he does the act:

Shepherd v. Kottgen, 37 L. T. Rep. 618; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 2 C. P. Div. 585.

In this case, when the vessel bore up for the River Plate, the voyage was abandoned. It was not certain that the freight could not be saved; there was a possibility that it might be saved. That question is not to be decided by what happened afterwards. There was here a voluntary giving up of the prosecution of the voyage for the general safety, the ultimate result of which was that the voyage and freight were lost:

Pirie v. Middle Dock Company, 44 L. T. Rep. 426; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 388.

At the time when the master made for Buenos Ayres it was not certain that the freight would be lost, and that was a general average sacrifice.

Atwood v. Sellar, 41 L. T. Rep. 83; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 153, 283; 4 Q. B. Div. 342; 5 Q. B. Div. 286;

Barnard v. Adams, 10 Howard's Rep. 270 (American).

In this case the question really to be decided is the question which was left open by Barnes, J. in The Knight of St. Michael (78 L. T. Rep. 90; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; (1898) P. 30). In that case Barnes, J. said: "I may add that the case does not raise, and I am not asked to determine, any question as to the right of the defendants to deduct, in settling the loss, the amount which the plaintiffs and his co-owners, as owners of the ship, are liable to contribute in general average towards the loss of freight." At the time when the master decided to make for Buenos Ayres the ship, cargo, and freight were all safe, but a danger was then threatening which might destroy the ship, cargo, and freight. It was then the duty of the master to do what might be necessary to avert the threatened danger, and in order to avert it he made for Buenos Ayres. That turning aside was a general average sacrifice which resulted in the loss of the freight and gave rise to a claim for general average contribution:

Anglo-Argentine Live Stock and Produce Agency v. Temperley Shipping Company, 81 L. T. Rep. 296; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 595; (1899) 2 Q. B. 403.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the respondents.—The judgment of the learned judge was right, for he was right in holding that there was no possibility of earning the freight at the time when the voyage was abandoned, and that, therefore, there was no loss of freight by reason of that turning aside. There must be some chance of saving, otherwise there can be no sacrifice. If there is no chance of saving the thing which is given up, there is no sacrifice:

Shepherd v. Kottgen, 37 L. T. Rep. 618; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 2 C. P. Div. 585.

If the condition of the thing in question is such that it must be lost in any event, then there is no general average sacrifice. The cargo was heated at the time of the master's act, and it was proved that it was impossible to carry it to its destination. In putting in to Buenos Ayres the master acted for the safety of ship and cargo, and all that followed from that was a general average loss, such as the expenses of putting in to that port. The impossibility of carrying the cargo to its destination was not, however, a consequence of putting in to Buenos Ayres, but was in consequence of the cargo having been previously heated. The master did not abandon the voyage when he made for Buenos Ayres; he made for that port in order to save the freight if possible. The plain, simple, and well-recognised principles for ascertaining whether there has been a general average sacrifice are stated in Pirie v. Middle Dock Company (ubi sup.), and this case does not come within those principles. The voyage was really abandoned after the vessel arrived at Buenos Ayres, and there was then no common peril in respect of which a general average sacrifice could be made. The abandonment of the voyage was after the cargo was discharged and surveyed, and the common peril was then at an end:

CT. OF APP.] IREDALE &amp; ANOTHER v. CHINA TRADERS INSURANCE COMPANY. [CT. OF APP.]

Walthev v. Mavrojanis, 22 L. T. Rep. 310; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 382; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 116.

A general average sacrifice must be a sacrifice made voluntarily in the hour of peril for the common preservation of ship and cargo:

Svensden v. Wallace, 50 L. T. Rep. 799; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 232, 453; 13 Q. B. Div. 69, 84.

Carver, Q.C. in reply.—The master made for Buenos Ayres in order to secure the general safety, and any consequence of so doing was a sacrifice; the abandonment of the voyage was a consequence of that act.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 3.—SMITH, L.J. read the judgment of the court as follows:—This is an action by shipowners upon a policy of marine insurance by which the defendants underwrote for the plaintiffs the chartered freight of coals, valued at 1650*l.*, upon a voyage from Cardiff to Esquimaux in the plaintiffs' ship Lodore, and the perils insured against were "loss by fire and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid freight." It is not disputed by the defendants that the chartered freight was lost by reason of the perils insured against within the meaning of the policy (The Knight of St. Michael, 78 L. T. Rep. 90; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; (1898) P. 30), and that for this loss the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs. But the defendants contend that upon the facts of this case there has been a general average loss which is the subject of a general average contribution payable by the plaintiffs, and that for the amount of this contribution the defendants are entitled to have credit given to them when they pay to the plaintiffs the amount recoverable under the policy. The question argued before us is whether as regards the coal, upon the delivery of which at Esquimaux the freight would have become payable, there has been a general average sacrifice which would form the subject of a general average contribution, and, as this was the only point taken or argued, I pass on without observing upon the form in which the question is raised. My brother Bigham has held that the defendants' contention is ill-founded, and they appeal. It has long since been established that to constitute a general average loss so as to be the subject of a general average contribution two things at least must co-exist—(a) there must be an intentional sacrifice of part of the ship or cargo, or a voluntary expenditure for the benefit of the ship and cargo; (b) that such sacrifice or expenditure must be made at the time when a common danger to ship and cargo existed, for when the common danger has ceased there can be no sacrifice or expenditure that can be the subject of a general average contribution. Bowen, L.J. in Svensden v. Wallace (50 L. T. Rep. 799; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 237; 13 Q. B. Div. 69, 84) thus expresses himself as to what constitutes a general average sacrifice. He says: "It is essential at the outset to bear in mind two things—the nature of every general average sacrifice, and the object of every general average contribution. A general average sacrifice is an extraordinary sacrifice voluntarily made in the hour of peril for the common preservation of ship and cargo. . . . The sacrifice" must be "made for the common safety in a time of danger." What the learned Lord Justice here says about a general average sacrifice is only what will be found laid down in many cases and stated in the text-books of authority, though clothed in different language. We have nothing in this case to do with any expenditure, for it is not suggested that there has been any. What we have to consider is whether there has been a general average sacrifice of cargo, so as to be the subject of a general average contribution by the owner of ship and freight. It is said by the defendants that there was a general average sacrifice of the coal when the ship turned off her course and bore up to the River Plate, followed, as it was, by an abandonment of the voyage after the ship arrived at Buenos Ayres. To appreciate this argument it seems to me important to consider—first, the position of matters and what took place when the captain of the ship determined to bear up for the River Plate; and, secondly, what took place after the ship's arrival there. The admitted facts are that upon the 26th May 1897, when the ship was on her voyage from Cardiff to Esquimaux, the coals began to heat and the master decided "for the safety of the ship, freight, and cargo to bear up for the River Plate." I leave out of consideration the forty tons of cargo which were jettisoned, for no question now arises thereon. I do not doubt that the bearing up under the circumstances above mentioned for the River Plate was a general average act, which would have given rise to a general average contribution if, in consequence of such act, any expenses or loss to the cargo were thereby occasioned. But no question of expenses arises, for none were incurred, and there was no loss to the cargo thereby occasioned. In these circumstances how can it be said that the bearing up for the River Plate was a general average sacrifice as regards the cargo, so as to be the subject of a general average contribution? No part of the cargo was in fact sacrificed, and à fortiori there was no general average sacrifice so as to be the subject of a general average contribution. Mr. Carver argued that the voyage was abandoned when the captain decided to bear up for the River Plate, but in my judgment it clearly was not. The master bore up for the River Plate and went into Buenos Ayres for the purpose, if possible, of continuing the voyage after he had got the cargo in order. He did not bear up for the River Plate for the purpose of abandoning the voyage. That was wholly foreign to his purpose. The bearing up for the River Plate was no abandonment of the voyage at all, and it is wholly erroneous to say that it was. Now, the ship with the coals on board—other than those jettisoned—arrived at Buenos Ayres on the 29th May 1897, and remained there till the 25th June 1897, on which day the coals were condemned and ultimately sold. The admission is that "when and while the ship was at Buenos Ayres the ship and her cargo were in safety." The sale of the cargo, which in my opinion constituted the abandonment of the voyage, was not a general average sacrifice which forms the subject of a general average contribution, for the common danger had ceased, and the ship and cargo had then been in safety for about a month. The suggestion that the sale of the coal at Buenos Ayres was made for the common safety of ship and cargo to enable the vessel to bring her voyage and the common adventure to a successful issue will not assist the defendants, for, as was pointed out by Bowen, L.J. in Svensden v. Wallace (ubi sup.), a sacrifice for the safety of the common adventure does not constitute a general average sacrifice according to the law of England; nor, indeed, did Mr. Carver argue that it did. What he argued was that there had been a general average sacrifice of cargo when the ship bore up for Buenos Ayres, and at that time there was a common danger. I agree that then there was a common danger, but then there was no sacrifice of cargo. I am of opinion that there has been no general average sacrifice in this case, and consequently the right to a general average contribution never arose, and that this appeal must be dismissed. I agree with Bigham, J.'s inference of fact that at Buenos Ayres the coal was hopelessly lost.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: for the appellants, Field, Roscoe, and Co., for Batesons, Warr, and Wimshurst, Liverpool; for the respondents, Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., for Hill, Dickinson, and Co., Liverpool.

June 29, July 3 and 18, 1900.

(Before SMITH, WILLIAMS, and ROMER, L.JJ.)
MILBURN AND Co. v. JAMAICA FRUIT IMPORTING AND TRADING COMPANY OF LONDON. (a)
APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

General average—Loss occasioned by default of master—Negligence clause—Right of shipowner to contribution.

If the charter-party or bill of lading under which goods are carried contains a clause excepting liability for negligence of the servants of the shipowner, the shipowner is entitled to contribution from the owner of the goods for general average expenses although they have been occasioned through the negligence of the master.

The Carron Park (63 L. T. Rep. 356; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543; 15 P. Div. 203) approved.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mathew, J. at the trial of the action, without a jury, as a commercial cause.

By a charter-party, dated the 9th Oct. 1896, the plaintiffs agreed to let, and the defendants to hire, the steamship Port Victor for the term of thirty-six calendar months, the charterers to pay for the use and hire at the rate of 1025*l.* a month.

The charterers were to have the whole reach of the vessel's holds and usual places of loading, including passenger accommodation.

The captain, although appointed by the owners, was to follow the instructions of the charterers, who were to furnish him from time to time with the necessary sailing directions.

The captain was to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight the charterers or their agents might choose, without prejudice to the stipulations of the charter-party.

The charterers agreed to "indemnify the owners from any consequences which might arise from the captain following the charterers' instructions and signing bills of lading."

The charter-party contained clauses as follows:

Clause 22. The act of God . . . negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, officers, engineers, refrigerating engineers, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners or charterers always mutually excepted. . . . In the event of breakdown of the steamer, or accident, all port charges, pilotages, and other expenses thereby occasioned to be for owners' account; and Clause 25. Average (if any) to be regulated according to York-Antwerp Rules 1890.

By agreement between the charterers and the Government, certain Government stores were shipped on board the Port Victor, on a voyage from London to Jamaica, under bills of lading, signed by the captain in pursuance of the charterers' instructions, which contained no negligence clause.

While on the voyage the Port Victor came into collision with another vessel, and she was thereby compelled to put back to London, and certain general average losses and expenses were incurred by the owners.

The collision was caused by the negligent navigation of the Port Victor.

The plaintiffs applied to the Admiralty department for contribution in respect of the Government stores. The department refused to pay, upon the ground that the collision was due to the negligence of the master and crew, and the bills of lading contained no negligence clause. If the bills of lading had contained a negligence clause, the Government would have paid the contribution.

The plaintiffs brought this action against the defendants, the charterers, to recover in respect of the loss of such a contribution, under the indemnity clause in the charter-party.

The action was tried before Mathew, J. without a jury. The learned judge held, upon the authority of the decision in The Carron Park (63 L. T. Rep. 356; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543; 15 P. Div. 203), that the plaintiffs could have recovered contribution if there had been a negligence clause in the bills of lading, and that the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to be indemnified by the defendants.

The defendants appealed.

Carver, Q.C. and Scrutton, for the appellants.—

The judgment of Mathew, J. was wrong, for the shipowners are not entitled to the indemnity which they claim under the 10th clause of the charter-party. That clause does not contemplate any such consequence of signing bills of lading as an inability to recover general average contribution from the owners of cargo shipped under the bills of lading. Further, even if the bills of lading had contained a negligence clause, that clause would have made no difference as to the right of the shipowner to obtain a general average contribution from the owners of cargo. The law as to general average depends upon the law maritime, and not upon contract. Under the law as to general average a shipowner cannot claim any general average contribution in respect of any sacrifice, or expenses, which have been rendered necessary by the negligence of himself or his servants. When a loss has been caused by the negligence of the shipowner or his servants, he is not entitled to any contribution, because the loss has been caused by his own fault :

APP.] MILBURN &amp; Co. v. JAMAICA FRUIT IMPORTING &amp; TRADING Co. OF LONDON. [APP.]

Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co., 61 L. T. Rep. 597; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 419; 14 App. Cas. 601;

Schloss v. Heriot, 8 L. T. Rep. 246; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 335; 14 C. B. N. S. 59;

Schmidt v. Royal Mail Steamship Company, 45 L. J. 646, Q. B.;

Crooks v. Allan, 41 L. T. Rep. 800; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 216; 5 Q. B. Div. 38;

Burton v. English, 49 L. T. Rep. 768; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 12 Q. B. Div. 218;

The Ettrick, 44 L. T. Rep. 817; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 465; 6 P. Div. 127.

No clause in the contract of carriage can alter that legal position. The negligence clause in a contract of carriage only exempts the shipowner from a liability to which he would otherwise be subject under the contract of carriage. It is not intended to affect, and does not in any way affect, the general rule of law as to general average contribution by which the person who is at fault cannot recover contribution for loss caused by his fault. The decision of Sir James Hannen, in The Carron Park (63 L. T. Rep. 356; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543; 15 P. Div. 203), that, where there is a negligence clause, the shipowner can recover a general average contribution for loss caused by the negligence of his servants, was wrong, and ought to be overruled. The observations of Barnes, J., upon this point, in The Mary Thomas (71 L. T. Rep. 104; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 495; (1894) P. 108, 117) were merely incidental, the question not having been argued before him. By the express terms of clause 22 of the charter-party, the expenses, in respect of which the plaintiffs now claim, are to fall upon the owners, and therefore they cannot claim contribution in respect of those expenses.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Balloch for the respondents.—The provisions of clause 10 of the charter-party clearly give the plaintiffs a right to the indemnity which they claim. It was in consequence of the master signing bills of lading, which did not contain a negligence clause, in accordance with the instructions of the charterers, that the shipowners were unable to obtain a general average contribution from the owners of cargo. From that consequence the charterers are bound by the express terms of the charter-party to indemnify the owners. If the bills of lading had contained a negligence clause, the owners would undoubtedly have been able to obtain contribution from the owners of cargo. That was so decided in The Carron Park (63 L. T. Rep. 356; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543; 15 P. Div. 203), and that case was rightly decided. A shipowner cannot obtain contribution for a sacrifice or expenses if he or his servants are in default—that is, if there has been some breach of duty. The duty of the shipowner is regulated by the contract of carriage, and if by that contract there is a mutual exception of negligence of the master and crew, the shipowner is not in default if there is such negligence :

Johnson v. Chapman, 19 C. B. N. S. 563;

Wright v. Marwood, 45 L. T. Rep. 297; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 451; 7 Q. B. Div. 62;

Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co., 61 L. T. Rep. 597; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 419; 14 App. Cas. 601.

When there is an exception of the negligence of master and crew, that negligence becomes a risk common to ship and cargo, and for loss or expenses occasioned by that common risk and made or incurred for the common interest the shipowner is entitled to contribution. The words at the end of clause 22 of the charter-party have no application to a general average sacrifice.

Carver, Q.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 18.—The following judgments were read :—

SMITH, L.J.—This is an action by the owners of the steamship Port Victor against the charterers thereof upon an indemnity clause contained in the charter-party whereby the defendants agreed with the plaintiffs to indemnify them “from any consequences that might arise from the captain following the charterers’ instructions and signing bills of lading.” I agree with my brother Mathew that the scheme of the charter-party is that, while the ship was to be employed as a general ship, the owners were to be in the same position as if the goods put on board were the charterers’ goods. By this charter-party it was provided that negligence or default of the master, officers, mariners, and other servants of the shipowners or charterers was to be always mutually excepted. The captain, following the directions of the charterers, signed bills of lading for certain Government stores shipped on board the Port Victor by the Government. In these bills of lading there was no exception as to negligence or default of master, officers, mariners, and other servants of the shipowners. During the voyage covered by the charter-party and bills of lading, by reason of the negligence of the master of the plaintiffs’ ship, it came into collision with another vessel, and in consequence thereof it is not disputed that general average expenses were incurred in putting back to London, in payment of tug, pilot, and port dues, of wages, and victualling the crew, and of other matters. The plaintiffs thereupon demanded contribution for these general average expenses from the shippers of the Government stores, which was refused upon the ground that these expenses had arisen owing to the negligence of the plaintiffs’ master, and it is not denied that, if the general average expenses were owing to such negligence, as the bills of lading contained no exception as to this negligence, the cargo owners—that is, the shippers of the Government stores—would not be liable to make general average contribution to the plaintiffs. Lord Watson, in Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co. (61 L. T. Rep. 597; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 419; 14 App. Cas. 601), sums up the position as follows. He says: “When a person who would otherwise have been entitled to claim contribution has, by his own fault, occasioned the peril which immediately gave rise to the claim, it would be manifestly unjust to permit him to recover from those whose goods are saved. . . . In any question with them he is a wrongdoer. . . . He cannot be permitted to claim either recompense for services rendered, or indemnity for losses sustained by him, in the endeavour to rescue property which was imperilled by his own tortious act.” The allegation of the plaintiffs, the shipowners, is that, if there had been inserted in the bills of lading an exception as to negligence of the master, which usually is the case, there would then, as between themselves and the cargo owners have been no negligence or default of the master, for this would have then been excepted. Mr. Carver for the defendants, on the other hand, asserts that the introduction of such an exception into the bills of lading would have made no difference whatever, for he says that general average is not the creature of contract. In this I agree, for the foundation of a general average claim is ordinarily, not that of contract, but is founded upon a loss which arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made, or expenses incurred, for the preservation of the ship and cargo in the time of peril, and which must be borne proportionately by all who are interested: (see per Lawrence, J. in Birkley v. Presgrave (1 East, 220, 228). Brett, M.R., in Burton v. English (49 L. T. Rep. 768; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 12 Q. B. Div. 218, 221), says that the right to contribution comes "from the old Rhodian laws, and has become incorporated into the law of England as the law of the ocean. It is not a matter of contract, but in consequence of a common danger, where natural justice requires that all should contribute to indemnify for the loss of property which is sacrificed by one in order that the whole adventure may be saved." But, although general average is not the creature of contract, this does not settle the question in the present case, for what the contract of carriage is becomes an important factor when considering, not whether a general average claim for contribution has arisen, but in considering, assuming that such a claim has arisen, whether it can be taken away by the cargo owner showing that, as between him and the shipowner, the latter, to use Lord Watson's words, has been a wrongdoer. To create the shipowner a wrongdoer as regards the cargo owner there must be the breach of some duty, and if by agreement between the two it has been agreed that it shall be no breach of duty for the master to be guilty of negligence—in other words, that as between the two the negligence of the master shall be always excepted—it cannot be said that it is a breach of duty towards the cargo owner for the master to be guilty of that which the cargo owner and shipowner have agreed shall be no breach of duty at all.

This appeal raises the question whether The Carron Park (63 L. T. Rep. 356; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543; 15 P. Div. 203), decided by Sir James Hannen in the year 1890, is good law. That very learned judge says: "The claim for contribution for general average cannot be maintained when it arises out of any negligence for which the shipowner is responsible; but negligence for which he is not responsible is as foreign to him as to the person who has suffered by it." Having cited Lord Watson's judgment in Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co. (61 L. T. Rep. 597; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 419; 14 App. Cas. 601), Sir James Hannen proceeds: "Here it appears to me that the relation of the goods owner to the shipowner has been altered by the contract that the shipowner shall not be responsible for the negligence of his servants in the events which have happened." This decision of Sir James Hannen has been acted upon in practice in this country ever since it was given, and we are asked now to overrule it. It was expressly approved of by Barnes, J. in The Mary Thomas (71 L. T. Rep. 104; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 495; (1894) P. 108, 117), and my brother Mathew does not doubt its accuracy in his judgment now appealed from, and in my opinion it correctly followed out that in the Privy Council delivered by Lord Watson in Strang v. Scott (ubi sup.). I believe The Carron Park (ubi sup.) is in accord with the law of England relating to general average in this country. It is said that The Carron Park is not in accord with what has been said in Schmidt v. Royal Mail Steamship Company (45 L. J. 646, Q. B.) and Crooks v. Allan (41 L. T. Rep. 800; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 216; 5 Q. B. Div. 38, 40), cited by Bowen, L.J. in Burton v. English (49 L. T. Rep. 768; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 12 Q. B. Div. 218, 222)—viz.: "The office of the bill of lading is to provide for the rights and liabilities of the parties in reference to the contract to carry, and is not concerned with liabilities to contribution in general average." When read, it will be seen that these cases do not deal with the question whether, where a general average expenditure has been incurred, the right to contribute thereto can be taken away by showing that the party incurring the expenditure was a wrongdoer as regards the person called upon to contribute. Whether he be such a wrongdoer must, as it seems to me, depend upon the contract which existed between the parties. This is not, as before stated, a case in which the question is whether a general average claim has arisen, for that in this case is not disputed, but the question is whether the shipowner has been a wrongdoer to the cargo owner. The shipowner says to the cargo owner: "A general average loss has occurred to which you must contribute, and you cannot show that I have been guilty of negligence so as to absolve you from contributing thereto, for by express contract between us negligence is excepted." That the contract may at times be looked to appears from what Willes, J. said in Johnson v. Chapman (19 C. B. N. S. 563, 583), when the question arose whether the owner of a deck cargo was entitled to claim general average in respect of such cargo jettisoned, and it was held that he was, for "when it is established," said Willes, J., "that the deck cargo was lawfully there by the contract of the parties it becomes subject to the rule of general average." Lord Watson, as will be seen, deals with the effect an exception as to negligence in a bill of lading may have upon a general average claim in Strang v. Scott (ubi sup.). In the present case it is clear that the plaintiffs have been unable to obtain a general average contribution from the shippers of the Government stores by reason of no clause excepting negligence having been inserted in the bills of lading, and in my judgment the charterers are therefore liable to the plaintiffs under the indemnity clause in the charter now sued on, by reason of bills of lading having been signed without the exception of negligence being contained therein. As to the second point—viz., as to the effect of the clause at the end of par. 22 of the charter-party—I have nothing to add to what my brother Mathew has said thereon, except to say that I agree with him. In my judgment, for the reasons given above, the appeal must be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the charterers have agreed to give the shipowners an indemnity against any consequences that may arise from the captain following the charterers' instructions and signing bills of lading. The question is whether it is a consequence of the captain's signing the bills of lading, which in fact he did sign, that the shipowners have lost a right of general average contribution which they would otherwise have had against the owners of part of the cargo shipped. The peril, in respect of which the expenses were incurred by the ship which form the basis of the claim for general average contribution, was a peril incurred by the negligence of the officers and crew of the ship, who under the charter-party continued to be the servants of the shipowners and in possession of the ship on their behalf. The charterers had nothing to do with the navigation of the ship. The cause of the peril was careless navigation, resulting in a collision with another ship. Now, it is clear law that the rule of contribution has no application in cases where the danger which led to the sacrifice was brought about by the fault of the person claiming contribution, and, if the right of contribution was thus excluded, it could not be said that the fact that the ship could make no claim for contribution was the consequence of the captain following the instructions of the charterers and signing the bills of lading, and the case would not fall within the scope of the contract of indemnity. In such circumstances, in the absence of some special contract, the right of contribution would never arise, and it would not be true to say that the exclusion of the right to contribution was due to anything but the negligence of the shipowners' servants. But it is said that, if the bill of lading had been in a different form from that in which it in fact was, and had contained, as undoubtedly is very usual, an exception of negligence of the master and crew, the right to contribution would have arisen. The Carron Park (63 L. T. Rep. 356; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543; 15 P. Div. 203) is relied on as an authority that such an exception in the contract of carriage would have this effect, and seems so to decide. Lord Hannen, speaking of such an exception in a contract of carriage, in that case a charter-party, says: "Here it appears to me that the relation of the goods owner to the shipowner has been altered by the contract" [constituted by the exception] "that the shipowner shall not be responsible for the negligence of his servants." Lord Hannen held on this ground that the shipowner was entitled to recover general average contribution, although the peril was caused by the negligence of the ship's officers. This conclusion of Lord Hannen was based upon a passage in the judgment of Lord Watson, in Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co. (ubi sup.), in which he said: "The fault of the master being matter of admission, it seems clear upon authority that no contribution can be recovered by the owners of the ship unless the conditions ordinarily existing between parties standing in that relation had been varied by special contract between them and their skippers." I do not think that the judgment of Lord Watson justifies the decision in The Carron Park (ubi sup.), and the decision in The Carron Park does not bind this court, and it is our duty to consider whether that decision was right in principle. I think it was not. I think that the exceptions in the contract of carriage had nothing to do with the liability of the shipowner, under the law of general average contribution. The liability to contribute in no sense results from the contract of carriage, but exists wholly independently of the contract of carriage, by virtue of the equitable doctrine of the Rhodian law which, as part of the law maritime, has been incorporated in the municipal law of England. Lush, L.J., in Schmidt v. Royal Mail Steamship Company (45 L. J. 646, Q. B.), says: "The office of the bill of lading is to provide for the rights and liabilities of the parties in reference to the contract to carry, and is not concerned with liabilities to contribution in general average." This dictum of Lush, L.J. is affirmed emphatically by all the Lords Justices in Burton v. English (49 L. T. Rep. 768; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 12 Q. B. Div. 218). It has been argued that there is no duty on the shipowner except that contained in the contract of carriage, in cases in which there is a contract of carriage, and it is said that this contract of carriage excludes the common law liability of carriers, excepting so far as it is expressly or impliedly incorporated in the contract of carriage. I agree, so far as regards the obligation to carry and deliver, the contract of carriage is exhaustive, and that the exception applies to every duty under that contract. But the rule of the Rhodian law, excluding the person through whose fault the peril arose from benefits of general average contribution, is based upon an obligation outside the contract of carriage. It is based upon that duty—which arises whenever one person is by circumstances placed in such a position with regard to another that everyone of ordinary sense, who did think, would at once recognise that, if he did not use ordinary care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances, he would cause danger of injury to the person or property of the others—to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger: (Heaven v. Pender, 49 L. T. Rep. 357; 11 Q. B. Div. 503). The charter-party leaves the ship in the possession of the shipowner, and its navigation a duty to take due care in the navigation of his ship, because otherwise danger will arise for the person and property of others, both the persons and property on board his own ship and the ship he may meet and the persons and property therein, and, if he fails in the observance of this duty and peril is thereby caused to the person or goods on board his own ship, he is, in my judgment, at fault in such sense as to exclude him from the benefits of the maritime law of contribution. He has failed in his duty to his co-adventurers. He cannot claim contribution, because peril has been caused by his fault; and the fact remains that it was caused by his fault, notwithstanding the fact that it may be a term of the charter-party that the charterer shall relieve him from responsibility, so far as relates to the contract of carriage, for that fault of which he has been guilty. In my judgment, the only way in which a shipowner can be placed in a position to recover general average contribution, in a case where the peril has arisen from the negligence of the master or crew, is a case where the master and crew have ceased, by the terms of the charter-party or otherwise, to be the servants or agents of the shipowner. In my opinion, the exception in the charter-party has not this effect, and a similar exception in the bill of lading would not have had that effect. The exception in the bill of lading relieves the shipowner from all breaches of the contract of carriage brought about by the negligence of the master or crew, but it does not relieve the shipowner from those legal duties which are by law cast upon him by reason of the fact that the ship is in the possession of his servants and navigated by him. If the peril is caused by the negligence of his servants in navigating the ship, he is a person at fault, within the meaning of the law of general average contribution, and, so long as the ship is navigated by his servants, the shipowner can no more get rid of responsibility for his legal duty by a contract which he makes with a third person than a man can get rid of a statutory, or any other positive, duty arising from his position by any contract which he makes with any person upon whom the duty is not by law cast. I think The Carron Park (ubi sup.) was wrongly decided. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs cannot recover, and that the judgment of Mathew, J. ought to be reversed.

[APP.] MILBURN &amp; Co. v. JAMAICA FRUIT IMPORTING &amp; TRADING Co. OF LONDON. [APP.]

The case of Johnson v. Chapman (19 C. B. N. S. 563) only comes to this. It was sought to say that deck cargo could not have the benefit of general average contribution. Willes, J. said there was no law making it unlawful to carry deck cargo, but that it was suggested there was a custom affecting the voyage, and that it was not necessary to consider this, as by the contract between the parties there was to be a deck cargo. It was not suggested that the carrying of the cargo made the ship unseaworthy, and Willes, J., under these circumstances, said that when you have established that it is a deck cargo lawfully there by the contract of the parties, it becomes subject to the rule of general average: (see p. 583). The case in no sense decides that the obligation of the co-adventurers on a voyage towards their fellows to take care not to bring them or their property into danger is the creature of contract, or that by contract between two of the co-adventurers the law of general average contribution can be so modified that it shall operate in favour of the guilty. Two adventurers may agree that they will make no claim on one another for general average contribution, and thus as between themselves exclude the Rhodian laws; or two may agree that, as between them, there shall be general average contribution notwithstanding the fact that the claimant by his negligence brought about the peril necessitating the sacrifice or general average act, but in such a case the right to contribution would in no sense depend on the law maritime incorporated in the municipal law of England, but will be entirely the creature and result of contract. In my judgment, the law of general average contribution cannot be applied in favour of a claimant through whose fault, whether personal or by his agents, the maritime peril was in fact brought about. Moreover, even if by special contract the right of contribution can be enforced against a party to the contract by the other party even though his fault, or negligence, or his omission, or his act of commission has brought about the peril, I do not think that such a special contract is to be found in the exception to the charter-party, or would arise from the introduction of such an exception into the bill of lading. What is the business meaning of the mutual exception in the charter-party (for the exception here is mutual) of the negligence of the master and crew? It means that shipowner and charterer must each insure their own interest against losses arising from the voyage from negligence of the master and crew. The exception does not mean that the one is to have a claim against the other, but merely that each, in respect of matters falling within the exception, is to be relieved from the liability which otherwise would fall upon him. That is, in the case of a charter-party, the liability from the letting or hiring of the use of the ship, or, in the case of a bill of lading, the liability of the carrier of goods by sea and of the consignor of such goods, but I cannot see how the exception from these liabilities can give the party excepted a claim which he would not otherwise have had, or render the party who had the benefit of the exception liable to a claim for which, but for the exception, he would not have been liable. I do not think that the exception makes the charterers or cargo owners liable to the shipowners for contribution in respect of a sacrifice made to avert a danger brought about by their own negligence. The mutual exception, if it applied at all to general average contribution, would rather have the contrary effect.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the conclusion that this appeal should be dismissed. I can state my reasons briefly. On this charter-party, as between the shipowners and the charterers, I think that, for all purposes connected with the management of the ship during the existence of the charter, the negligence of the master and the crew was not to be treated as attributable solely to the shipowners. Between shipowners and charterers such negligence was to be "mutually excepted," so that both parties could be regarded as equally blameless in respect of it. Let me, then, first consider how the case would have stood between the parties to the charter-party if all the goods on board the vessel during a voyage had been the property of the charterers, and then by the master's negligence a condition arose necessitating a sacrifice at the expense of the shipowners for the common good, so that primâ facie a claim for general average contribution against the owners of the cargo had arisen. In my opinion, there would have been no answer to the claim. The charterers could not have brought themselves within the exception to general average claims which is so well known and was discussed by Lord Watson in the case cited in the judgments already delivered—Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co. (ubi sup.). For the charterers could not have said as against the shipowners that the negligence of the master was to be attributed to the shipowners so as to place the latter in the position of persons who had brought about the peril necessitating the common sacrifice by their own wrong. There would have been no ground for treating the shipowners and the charterers as standing on a different footing at the moment when the common sacrifice became necessary. As between themselves they stood at that moment on a footing of equality. Neither the goods as against the ship, nor the ship as against the goods, had any claim by reason of any peril arising, or loss which might have resulted, from the master's negligence. And the position of equality is the very essence of the right to contribution. It would, in my opinion, be matter for regret if the opposite view were upheld, for the result would be that though, if loss ensued to the goods by the peril, the shipowners could not be made

[CT. OF APP.]

BUCKNALL BROTHERS v. TATEM AND Co.

[CT. OF APP.]

responsible for that loss, yet if to avoid the peril a sacrifice is made at the expense of the ship there would be no right of contribution. These being, in my opinion, the relative rights of the ship-owners and charterers in a case where the goods are the property of the latter, I will now consider how matters stand in a case where the charterers ship some third person's goods and not their own. Now, in respect of these goods, it appears to me that under this charter-party the charterers, as between themselves and the shipowners, were bound, if they wished to avoid any liability towards the shipowners, to ship the goods on the same terms as their own goods—that is to say, on the terms of the charter-party. But the charterers might by the bills of lading, as between themselves and the third person, have shipped the goods on terms different from those of the charter-party. In that case, if any loss arose to the shipowners in consequence of the contents of the bills of lading, then by the terms of the charter-party such loss would fall on the charterers. Now, considering the special circumstances of this case, it appears that the charterers did ship the Government goods on terms which (as shown by the bills of lading) materially differed from the terms of the charter-party, inasmuch as those bills of lading left the shipowners responsible for the negligence of the master, officers, and crew of the ship. The consequence has been that the shipowners have lost the right of contribution for general average which, in my opinion, they would have had as against the Government's goods if the latter had been shipped on the terms of the charter-party. That loss has, it appears to me, flowed directly from the bills of lading having been signed by the master by the directions of the charterers in a form which, as between the charterers and shipowners, should not have been adopted. That being so, I think the loss is a consequence of the signing of the bills of lading within the meaning of the charter-party, and is accordingly recoverable by the shipowners from the charterers. On these grounds I think the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Parker, Garrett, and Holman.

Solicitors for the respondents, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Monday, July 23, 1900.

(Before SMITH and WILLIAMS, L.JJ.)

BUCKNALL BROTHERS v. TATEM AND Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Option of charterers to cancel on non-arrival of vessel by fixed date—Impossibility of arrival—Refusal to proceed—Injunction.

By a charter-party the shipowner agreed that his vessel should proceed to a named port and there load a cargo for the charterer, and it was provided that, if the vessel should not be at that port ready to load by a specified date, the charterer should be at liberty to cancel the charter-party.

The vessel was then at another port unloading, and was delayed in doing so for so long that it became impossible for her to arrive at the agreed port by the specified date. The charterer refused to extend the time for cancellation, or to promise to load the vessel if she proceeded to the agreed port, and said that if he did load, the rate of freight must be reduced, and he insisted on the vessel proceeding to the agreed port. The shipowner thereupon refused to send his vessel there. Held, that an injunction ought not to be granted to restrain the shipowner from using the vessel for any purposes other than those of the charter-party.

De Mattos v. Gibson (28 L. J. 165, 498, Ch.) and Sevin v. Deslandes (30 L. J. 457, Ch.) distinguished.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of Darling, J. at chambers, dissolving an interim injunction, which had been granted upon an ex parte application, by Bucknill, J.

The action was brought by the charterers of a vessel against the shipowners to obtain a declaration that the charterers were entitled to require that vessel to proceed to Bussorah, and an injunction restraining the shipowners from using the vessel for any other purposes than the purposes of the charter-party.

The charter-party was made on the 8th May 1900, and it was thereby agreed that the vessel should proceed to Bussorah and there load a cargo for the charterers, and it was further provided that the charterers should be at liberty to cancel the charter-party if the vessel was not ready to load at Bussorah by the 18th June.

The vessel was at Delagoa Bay with a cargo, and there was so much delay in unloading that cargo that it became impossible for her to proceed and arrive at Bussorah by the 18th June.

The shipowners thereupon asked the charterers to extend the time for the exercise of their option to cancel the charter-party for a sufficient time to enable the vessel to get to Bussorah by the altered date.

The charterers refused to extend the time, and refused to say whether they would or would not load the vessel when she reached Bussorah, and they said that if they did load the vessel at Bussorah they would only do so at a lower rate of freight than that fixed by the charter-party.

The shipowners thereupon refused to send the vessel to Bussorah at all, and the charterers commenced this action.

Upon an ex parte application by the plaintiffs, Bucknill, J. at chambers granted an injunction restraining the defendants until the trial of the action from using the vessel for purposes other than those of the charter-party.

Upon the application of the defendants this interim injunction was subsequently dissolved by Darling, J. at chambers.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Bateson for the appellants.—Under a charter-party like this the charterers have a right to demand that the vessel shall proceed to the place agreed, although it may be impossible for the vessel to get there before the time at which the charterers will have an option to cancel the charter-party. There is an absolute obligation on the defendants to send their vessel to Bussorah, which is in no way affected by the option of the charterers to cancel:

Shubrick v. Salmond, 3 Burr. 1637.

In that case it was expressly so decided, and the

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CT. OF APP.]

LYLE SHIPPING COMPANY v. CARDIFF CORPORATION.

[CT. OF APP.]

obligation in the present case is precisely the same as in that case. Those being the rights and obligations of the charterers and the shipowners, the charterers are entitled to an injunction to restrain the shipowners from using their vessel for any other purpose than that of performing their obligation under this charter-party :

De Mattos v. Gibson, 28 L. J. 165, 498, Ch.;
Sevin v. Deslandes, 30 L. J. 457, Ch.

Those cases show that the charterer is entitled to an injunction unless he has done something which disentitles him to the assistance of a court of equity. Here the plaintiffs have only insisted upon their strict rights under the charter-party; and that is not such unreasonable conduct on their part as to take away their right to an injunction—that is, as to cause the court to refuse to enforce their rights by injunction. Nothing beyond insisting upon their strict rights has been done by the charterers, and that is no ground for refusing them an injunction. The peculiarity of the rights of the charterers, arising from the cancellation clause, makes it extremely difficult to estimate damages in this case, and that is an additional ground for granting an injunction.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C. and J. E. Bankes for the respondents.—The judge at chambers was quite right in holding that this was not a case in which an injunction ought to be granted. In such a case as this the charterers are properly left to their remedy in damages. There is no authority for the granting of an injunction to restrain the use of a vessel for purposes other than those of a particular charter-party, unless the charterers intend to load the vessel when she has proceeded to the agreed port. Here the charterers have refused to say whether they will load the vessel or not if she proceeds to the agreed port, and the court will not under those circumstances grant an injunction which will have the effect of compelling the vessel to go to the agreed port, where the charterers may decline to use her at all. This is not a bonâ fide application for an injunction in order that the charterers may secure the use of the vessel which they have selected, but an injunction is asked for in order to extort a reduced rate of freight.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. replied.

SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Darling, J. at chambers, dissolving an interim injunction obtained by the plaintiffs. Upon the facts of the case I have come to the conclusion that the order of Darling, J. was right. The charter-party between the plaintiffs and the defendants was made on the 7th May, and the vessel was then at Delagoa Bay. The vessel was to proceed to Bussorah, and it was provided that the charterers should be at liberty to cancel the charter-party if the vessel was not there by the 18th June. The vessel was detained at Delagoa Bay unloading cargo until it was impossible for her to get to Bussorah by the 18th June. This is not a case in which the vessel is going upon another voyage under another charter-party; it was simply impossible for her to get to Bussorah by the time stated. I agree that the shipowners were bound to send the vessel to Bussorah, and that, if they do not send her there, they must pay damages. It may perhaps be difficult to assess the damages, but they can be assessed. Naturally, under the circumstances, the shipowners asked the charterers for an extension of the time for cancellation of the charter, as it was impossible for them to perform their agreement to have the vessel at Bussorah by the 18th June. The charterers refused, and declined to say whether they would or would not load the vessel when she got to Bussorah, but said that, if they did so, the shipowners would have to accept a reduced rate of freight. It seems to me to be most unreasonable for the charterers, under those circumstances, to come to the court and ask for an injunction, as of right, to prevent the shipowners from sending their vessel upon any voyage except a voyage to Bussorah under this charter-party. I think, therefore, that Darling, J. was quite right in not letting the charterers have an interim injunction. The matter of an injunction of this kind was thoroughly thrashed out in the cases of De Mattos v. Gibson (28 L. J. 165, 498, Ch.) and Sevin v. Deslandes (30 L. J. 457, Ch.), and I agree that, where there is a legal right, ordinarily the person having that right can come to a court of equity and obtain an injunction. That rule is, however, subject to this qualification, that the plaintiff must not have done anything which may disentitle him to come to a court of equity to ask for an injunction. In this case I think that the plaintiffs have so acted as to disentitle them to an injunction. This appeal therefore fails, and must be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. The charterers come here and pretend that they want the assistance of the court to compel the defendants to send their vessel to Bussorah. They really come in a cynical frame of mind, and say that they wish to screw a reduction of the rate of freight out of the shipowners. They are not content with the ordinary claim for damages, though sufficient to satisfy any loss which they may sustain. They say that they want something more, and they ask for the assistance of the equitable jurisdiction of the court to get that something more. I think that they cannot have the assistance of the court in such a transaction. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: for the appellants, Ince, Colt, and Ince; for the respondents, Riddell and Co.

July 10 and Aug. 2, 1900.

(Before SMITH, WILLIAMS, and ROMER, L.JJ.)

LYLE SHIPPING COMPANY v. CARDIFF CORPORATION. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Demurrage — Discharge "with all despatch as customary" — Discharge into railway wagons — Delay owing to difficulty of procuring wagons — Obligation of charterers.

By a charter-party it was agreed that the vessel should be discharged "with all despatch as customary." The rule or custom at the port of discharge was that cargo should be delivered into railway wagons and in no other way.

The charterers made the usual arrangements with a railway company for the supply of wagons to receive the cargo at the ship's side. Owing to

CT. OF APP.]

LYLE SHIPPING COMPANY v. CARDIFF CORPORATION.

[CT. OF APP.]

great pressure of work at the port when the vessel arrived there was great difficulty in procuring sufficient wagons, and the discharge of the cargo was thereby delayed for many days. The charterers were not guilty of any negligence, but did their best to procure sufficient wagons, and used the wagons with proper despatch when they had obtained them.

Held (affirming the judgment of Bigham, J.), that the obligation of the charterers was to use all reasonable diligence under the existing circumstances in procuring the discharge of the cargo within a reasonable time, and that they had fulfilled that obligation and were not liable for the delay.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action, as a commercial cause, without a jury.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the vessel Cape Wrath, and they brought this action to recover from the defendants demurrage, or damages for detention of the ship at Cardiff, the port of discharge.

The defendants were the indorsees of a bill of lading for a cargo of Jarrah wood. The bill of lading incorporated the terms and conditions of a charter-party, which provided that the vessel was to be discharged "with all despatch as customary."

The vessel with her cargo of Jarrah wood arrived at Cardiff and was berthed on the 2nd Oct., and the discharge began on the following day.

The discharge occupied forty-five working days. The plaintiffs alleged that the discharge ought to have been completed within twenty-three days, and claimed damages for the detention at the rate of 24*l.* a day.

The usual mode of discharging at the docks at Cardiff was into railway wagons, and cargo could not be discharged upon the quay.

The defendants had, in accordance with the usual practice, made arrangements with a railway company for a supply of wagons to take the cargo from the ship's side.

There was at that time a great pressure of work at Cardiff, and in consequence there was much difficulty in procuring railway wagons.

The delay in the discharge of the cargo was owing to the insufficiency of railway wagons at the time, and was not due to any fault or delay of the defendants themselves.

The learned judge at the trial found that the defendants had done their best to procure railway wagons, and had used them with proper despatch when they had obtained them.

The action was tried before Bigham, J., without a jury, as a commercial cause.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and D. C. Leck for the plaintiffs.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C. and Bailhache for the defendants.

Dec. 5, 1899.—BIGHAM, J.—This action is brought by the shipowners, the owners of the Cape Wrath, against the defendants, who are the indorsees of a bill of lading for the cargo of the ship, in which bill of lading are incorporated the terms of the charter-party, so that the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs for the performance of the conditions of the charter-party. The action is brought to recover demurrage at the port of discharge, or damages for detention (it does not matter which), and the terms of the charter-party are that the cargo is "to be discharged with all despatch as customary." That is all that need be said about the contract. The defendants are charged with a breach of the contract, by which they are bound to discharge the vessel "with all despatch as customary." Now the facts of the case were these: The ship was loaded at Freemantle with a cargo of Jarrah wood. There was considerable delay at Freemantle, and a large claim arose at that port for demurrage. She arrived on the 2nd Oct. at Cardiff, and her discharge commenced on the 3rd. The discharge did not finish until the 23rd Nov., and it occupied a period of forty-five working days. It is alleged that that number of days was in excess of the time permitted by the charter-party, and that is the question in the case. Was it? Now, I am satisfied that the defendants were not personally guilty of any neglect at all in taking discharge of the cargo. They did their best to get the appliances which were available at the port at the time and which were customarily used for the purpose of discharging vessels, and, having done their best to get those appliances, in my opinion they made the best possible use of them, and therefore no blame of any kind can, in my opinion, be imputed to them. I have carefully considered the evidence, and particularly the letters and documents which have been read to me, and I see plainly that, when that vessel arrived, there was a great stress of work and difficulties that had to be contended with in taking discharge of this cargo, which was no doubt of an exceptional character. But I repeat that, in my opinion, the defendants did their best to deal with those difficulties, and took delivery of this cargo as quickly as it was practicably possible for them to do. It is, however, said by the counsel for the plaintiffs that the ship could have been discharged in much quicker time—in a much shorter time—if the defendants had furnished the vessel with a larger number of wagons, and that the fact that they were not able to get a larger number of wagons is a misfortune of which the defendants and not the plaintiffs must bear the brunt. Now, in order to see if that is so, it is necessary to consider the meaning of the contract, "to be discharged with all despatch as customary," and, in order to assist me to ascertain what those very few English words mean, a number of authorities have been referred to. The first in order of date is Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (40 L. T. Rep. 413; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 118; 4 Ex. Div. 165). In that case the contract in the charter-party was simply that the charterers should deliver into lighters. The discharge of the ship was delayed by reason of insufficiency of lighters, and the charterers, in the action against them for damages for that delay or for demurrage, whichever it was, alleged that they had done their best to get the only lighters which were available at the port, and, if they had not succeeded in getting more than were necessary for the purpose or than were sufficient for the necessities of the case, they were not to be blamed for it. Now, as I understand it, the decision in that case was this: It was in accordance with the ordinary common law rule that, if a man will undertake to do a thing in a particular way, he must do it, or answer for the consequences. That seems to be the effect of that case; but when the case is explained in later decisions it seems to me that the real effect of it is this, that all that the charterer is required to do is to do his best, and that in that case he did not do his best, and therefore he was held responsible. I say, and I repeat, that I do not think that is the meaning of the judgment of the learned judges in that case. Lord Herschell, in the case of Hick v. Raymond and Reid (68 L. T. Rep. 175; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1893) A. C. 22), decided in the House of Lords in 1892, in dealing with that case, says this: "The learned judge who tried the case, in summing up, told the jury that they were to take into consideration the circumstance that the port was full of vessels; but he did not directly tell them not to consider the deficiency of lighters caused by the large number of ships, so far as that state of things had been produced by the defendants themselves, nor did he tell them that the defendants were bound to provide the means of unloading within a reasonable time, nor that they were bound to allot the lighters proportionately among the vessels, or to use the lighters for them in the order in which they arrived. The jury found in favour of the defendants, and the appeal was against the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division making absolute a rule for a new trial. It will thus be seen that the circumstances which prevented the vessel from being discharged within the ordinary time were not beyond the control of the defendants. It was not shown that they could not by reasonable precautions or exertions have procured the necessary lighters else where or earlier, and so have avoided the delay which took place. Under these circumstances, I think the decision was perfectly right and a new trial properly granted." I do not think the judgment in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.) proceeded upon those grounds at all, but Lord Herschell evidently thinks, when he is delivering the judgment in Hick v. Raymond and Reid (ubi sup.), that that judgment can only be justified on those grounds. His view of the case, in my opinion, is that there were circumstances to show, and which did show, that the defendants had not taken proper care to use them in a business-like way; and upon these grounds he thinks that the decision of the Court of Appeal directing a new trial was a right decision. Now, the next case in order of date is that of Postlethwaite v. Freeland (42 L. T. Rep. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599). Postlethwaite v. Freeland is different in this sense, that the wording of the charter-party introduces the expression "as customary." In Postlethwaite v. Freeland itself, and in other cases, judges have intimated a doubt as to whether the introduction of those words in a charter-party really makes any difference. For my part, I should have thought that the introduction of the words did make a difference, and did make all the difference; but I cannot help seeing that Lord Herschell and many other judges have read the case of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.) as being a case in which there would not have been any difference at all even if the words "as customary" had been introduced—that is to say, that in these charter-parties, where the undertaking is to deliver with due dispatch, the introduction of the words "as customary" adds nothing to, or takes nothing from, the obligation of the charterer. I confess, for my own part, that I think the introduction of those words is of importance. Now, what does "as customary" mean? I think it means that attention must be given to the rules of the port which affect the discharge of vessels—rules which affect the place where the vessel is to go, and rules which affect the time during which a vessel may work. I think the words, moreover, mean that the practice as to the kind of appliances to be used in the discharge must be taken into account; and I think, further, that the words mean that the practice as to the source from which those appliances are to be obtained must be taken into account. Applying those considerations to this particular case, I observe that the rule of the port at Cardiff in this particular case was that the goods should be delivered into wagons, and in no other way. The practice was to deliver into wagons, and the course of business was for the consignees to obtain those wagons from specific railway companies. That was, I find in this case, the custom of the port. So, in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.), the custom was to discharge into lighters—specific lighters, no doubt—belonging to one company. The custom was for those lighters to be warped across the bar by one rope. Those were the appliances, and, the words in Postlethwaite v. Freeland being in effect the same as the words in the present case, the House of Lords were of opinion that the charterers had performed their duty, their part of the contract under the charter-party, when they had taken diligent and proper steps to obtain the services of the appliances which were customarily used, and when, having obtained the services of those appliances, they utilised those appliances with proper and business-like despatch. I confess, for my own part, that I can see no difference in principle between Postlethwaite v. Freeland and this case. Now, there is also a Scotch case, which was decided, I think, before the case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland, to which my attention has been called. I mean the case of Wyllie v. Harrison and Co. (13 Court Sess. Cas., 4th series, 92), which was decided in 1885. I will first say a word or two about that case, because it appears to be nearly on all fours with the case before the court at present. In that case the cargo, which I think was a cargo of iron, was to be discharged as fast as the steamer could deliver after being berthed as customary. The custom of the port there was to deliver by steam cranes into wagons brought alongside, and a further custom was that no pig-iron should be put upon the quay. One of the railway companies failed to supply sufficient trucks or wagons and thereby delay was caused. It was held by the court that for such delay the charterers were not liable, and I will read one or two passages in the judgment to show the grounds on which the judgment proceeded. The Lord Justice-Clerk said, at the beginning of his judgment: "Under it (the charter-party) the cargo was to be delivered as customary—that is, subject to the custom of the port. Now, from the nature of the cargo and the plan of delivery, the goods could not be delivered except into trucks. Under the general rules regulating maritime carriage the charterer is responsible for the goods to be conveyed until loading is complete. After loading is complete, and till the vessel arrives at its desti-

[CT. OF APP.]

LYLE SHIPPING COMPANY v. CARDIFF CORPORATION.

[CT. OF APP.]

CT. OF APP.]

LYLE SHIPPING COMPANY v. CARDIFF CORPORATION.

[CT. OF APP.]

nation, the owners are responsible. When the vessel has arrived, the duty of taking delivery is on the charterer. But, when delivery is to be taken at a port subject to regulations not in the power of either charterers or owners, there may occur difficulties, and there may be entailed delay for which neither party is responsible to the other. They both contracted subject to the regulations of the port of discharge." In my opinion, every word of that sentence applies to the particular circumstances of this case. He then goes on to say: "Now, one of the rules of the port of discharge selected, Glasgow General Terminus, was that no cargo should be laid down on the quay, but that all cargo should be delivered into trucks. That being so, and there being no trucks available, or not sufficient trucks available, I think a delay occurred for which neither party was responsible to the other." Now, it is to be observed that the Lord Justice-Clerk there relies upon the words in the charter-party, "as customary." When I look at Lord Young's judgment, I cannot help seeing that his decision would have been the same if the words "as customary" had not been there; for he says: "The charter-party happens to add 'as customary,' but the addition is a superfluity, for, unless the contrary is expressed, 'as customary' is implied." That is to say, he takes the view which apparently many English judges have taken, that these words "as customary" are to be implied, and ought to have been implied in the case of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.). He says further: "Delivery into trucks furnished by the railway companies and brought to the ship's side was by the custom of the place the recognised method of delivery. The trucks, we must take it, were only those of the railway companies, and all that the charterers could do was, as the sheriff says, 'to give notice that trucks were wanted, and, then if necessary, hurry and stir up the railway companies to provide them.' This the sheriff and I think they did—that is, they have committed no breach of their duty to take delivery as fast as it could be taken at that place." Now I say, having regard to these authorities, that the whole obligation in this case upon the charterer is to do his best to procure the appliances that are customarily used at this port for the purpose of discharging such vessels. I say that the appliances used were, in my opinion, the wagons of certain specified railway companies and no others. I find as a fact that they did use their best exertions to get the services of those appliances. Their contractual obligation, however, goes further than the mere obligation to obtain the appliances; it goes thus far, that, having obtained them, they must use them with proper dispatch. I find as a fact in this case that they did use them with proper dispatch, and I think, under these circumstances, on this part of the case my judgment must be for the defendants. I think I ought to add to what I have been saying that, in my opinion, the view I take of this case is amply supported by the observations of Lord Selborne in the case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.). I do not need to read it because the observations have been already read in the course of the arguments.

Judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and D. C. Leck for the appellants.—The learned judge at the trial was wrong in holding that the only obligation of the defendants was to procure the discharge within a reasonable time under the existing circumstances. There was an absolute duty upon the owners of the cargo to be prepared to receive the cargo. They were bound to have ready a sufficient supply of wagons to receive the cargo without any delay. They were bound to discharge with all dispatch with the customary appliances of the port. Wagons were not appliances of the port, but only a mode of carrying away the cargo when discharged, and failure to procure wagons cannot be any excuse for delay. Though the charterer may be bound only to use reasonable care and diligence in effecting the actual discharge of the cargo, he is absolutely bound to have ready, when the vessel arrives in port, all the appliances for discharge that can be used at the port, and all the men necessary to effect the discharge. There was no limit to the number of railway wagons which could be brought to the dock, and the cargo owners were bound to procure a sufficient number:

Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company, 40 L. T. Rep. 413; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 118; 4 Ex. Div. 165;

Good v. Isaacs, 67 L. T. Rep. 450; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212; (1892) 2 Q. B. 555;

Tharvis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morel Brothers and Co., 65 L. T. Rep. 659; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 106; (1891) 2 Q. B. 647.

The case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland (42 L. T. Rep. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599), upon which the defendants rely, was a case of the same kind as those cases where there are appliances belonging to a quay or port which have to be used for unloading, and must be taken in turn by vessels discharging. The wagons in the present case were not appliances of that kind; they could be procured from anywhere.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C. and Bailhache for the respondents.—The judgment of Bigham, J. was correct. There are several authorities which are absolutely in point in favour of the respondents:

Wyllie v. Harrison, 13 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 92; Good v. Isaacs, 67 L. T. Rep. 450; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212; (1892) 2 Q. B. 555;

Castlegate Steamship Company v. Dempsey, 66 L. T. Rep. 742; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 108; (1892) 1 Q. B. 854.

Those cases show that, where no time is fixed for the discharge of a ship, the discharge must be within a reasonable time having regard to the existing circumstances, and that the cargo owner is not liable for delay if he has done his best to get the vessel discharged in the customary manner under the existing circumstances. That principle is laid down in other cases:

Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 42 L. T. Rep. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599;

Ford v. Cotesworth, 23 L. T. Rep. 165; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 127; 5 Q. B. 544;

Hick v. Raymond and Reid, 68 L. T. Rep. 175; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1893) A. C. 22.

In the present case the customary method of discharge was into railway wagons, and the learned judge has found as a fact that the defendants did their best to procure a sufficient supply of wagons and used the wagons when obtained with proper dispatch, and that they were not negligent. The defendants, therefore, fulfilled the obligation which was upon them to discharge in a reasonable time in the customary manner.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., in reply, referred to Kruuse v. Dryman and Co., 18 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 1110.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 2.—The following judgments were read:—

SMITH, L.J.—This is an action by shipowners against the receivers of cargo under a bill of lading for demurrage or damages for detention—it matters not which it is called—of the plaintiffs' ship at Cardiff, which was the port of discharge, the allegation being that the ship was detained by the defendants in unloading for forty-five instead of twenty-three working days, and the plaintiffs claim for this the sum of 382*l.* The real question is, What is the contract the plaintiffs have with the defendants as to the discharge by them of the plaintiffs' ship? By the terms of the charter-party, which were incorporated into the bills of lading and by which the defendants are bound, the cargo was "to be discharged with all despatch as customary." It will be noticed that the plaintiffs have taken no contract from the defendants, as they might have done if they had desired to do so, that the cargo should be discharged in any fixed period of time, in which case beyond question the obligation to discharge undertaken by the cargo owners would have been absolute, and no matter what unforeseen circumstances might have arisen or how diligent they might have been in their endeavours to discharge the ship within the contracted time, if they did not do so, they would have broken their contract and must have paid damages to the shipowners for the breach. But this is not the contract which the plaintiffs have taken from the defendants, for the only contract, as before stated, is that the cargo should be "discharged with all despatch as customary." I think it is important to state at the outset the findings of my brother Bigham, for, considering the arguments addressed to us on behalf of the appellants shipowners, the findings are very important in this case. The learned judge finds that the rule or custom of the port of Cardiff, as applicable to the plaintiffs' ship, was that the cargo was to be delivered into wagons (railway wagons) and in no other way; that the appliances customarily used at the port of Cardiff were the wagons of certain specified railway companies and no others; that the defendants were not personally guilty of any negligence at all in taking discharge of the cargo, and that they did their best to get the appliances which were available at the port at the time, and which were customarily used for the purpose of discharging vessels; that when the plaintiffs' ship arrived there was a great stress of work, and difficulties had to be contended with, and that it was a record month, and that the defendants did their best to deal with the difficulties, and took delivery of the cargo as quickly as it was practical for them to do. The findings were really not contested before us, and there is evidence to support them. Now, these being the facts as found by the learned judge, the question arises,

Have the plaintiffs proved that the defendants have broken their contract with the plaintiffs that the cargo should be discharged with all despatch as customary? That the plaintiffs have no absolute contract with the defendants that the latter will discharge the plaintiffs' ship in any given time is clear, nor have they, in my judgment, an absolute contract that the defendants will have railway wagons down upon the quay ready to take delivery of the cargo at Cardiff, which is the only way delivery can there be taken, for, as Lord Blackburn says in the House of Lords in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (42 L. T. Rep. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599, 620): "If the obtaining of lighters or other customary appliances for the discharge of a ship on its arrival was, like the procuring of a cargo for loading the ship, a matter which fell entirely on the merchant, so that he might choose his own mode of fulfilling it, I am not prepared to say that on the same principle he ought not to be held to undertake, without qualification, to provide those appliances. . . . But I do not think that the undertaking to supply lighters or other appliances to assist in discharging the ship does fall within the same principle as the undertaking to supply a cargo." This appears to me to meet the last suggestion made in the reply of Mr. Joseph Walton that there was an absolute duty on the goods owner to prepare himself to take the cargo. In my judgment his duty is not absolute, but to do his best.

Now, the contract which the plaintiffs have in this case with the defendants for the discharge of the cargo, as will be seen from the latest authority upon the subject in the House of Lords—no fixed time being stipulated for the discharge—is that the defendants will discharge the cargo within a reasonable time under existing circumstances, or, in other words, with all due diligence having regard to all the existing circumstances, and in my opinion there is no limit as to what are existing circumstances, as argued by Mr. Joseph Walton—namely, the limit of the user of the port appliances. The case to which I allude is that of Hick v. Raymond and Reid in the House of Lords (68 L. T. Rep. 175; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1893) A. C. 22), and, when what is therein laid down is understood, it will be seen that the defendants' contract is what I have said it is. In Hick v. Raymond and Reid (ubi sup.) the terms of the contract were that the cargo was to be delivered at the port of London, and that it was to be applied for within twenty-four hours of the ship's arrival, but no time was specified within which the discharge of the cargo was to be completed. It was held by the House of Lords, in a considered judgment, that when a bill of lading is silent as to the time within which the consignee is to discharge the cargo, his obligation is to discharge it within a reasonable time, and that he performs his obligation if he discharges the cargo within a time which is reasonable under the existing circumstances, assuming those circumstances, so far as they involve delay, are not caused or contributed to by him. Lord Herschell, then Lord Chancellor, in his judgment in that case, in clear and unambiguous language states the law applicable to a bill of lading which contains no fixed time for unloading. I am myself inclined to think that it matters not in this case whether the words "as customary" are in the contract or not, for if not they would be implied. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Herschell) said (at p. 28 of the Law Reports) that the bills of lading in that case contained no stipulation that the discharge should be effected in a particular number of days, "and therefore in accordance with ordinary and well-known principles the obligation of the respondents was that they should take discharge of the cargo within a reasonable time. The question is, Has the appellant (the shipowner) proved that this reasonable time has been exceeded? This depends upon what circumstances may be taken into consideration in determining whether more than a reasonable time was occupied." Lord Herschell then states the rival contentions of the shipowner and cargo owner, the shipowner contending that the cargo owner was liable if the discharge of the vessel was delayed beyond the time required to discharge her under ordinary circumstances, the cargo owner, on the other hand, contending that he was not liable if he only occupied the necessary time under existing circumstances. Lord Herschell then continued—and here is the principle to be applied to the present case—"The only sound principle is that the 'reasonable time' should depend on the circumstances which actually exist. If the cargo has been taken with all reasonable dispatch under those circumstances, I think the obligation of the consignee has been fulfilled. When I say the circumstances which actually exist, I, of course, imply that those circumstances, in so far as they involve delay, have not been caused or contributed to by the consignee." It will be seen, Lord Herschell says, that reasonable time should depend on the circumstances which actually exist. What circumstances? Why, all the circumstances which have relation to the discharge of the cargo. The judgment of Lord Watson, though shorter, in no way differs from that of the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Ashbourne's judgment is valuable for bringing together previous decisions, especially that of Blackburn, J. in Ford v. Cotesworth (23 L. T. Rep. 165; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 127; 5 Q. B. 544), in which that learned judge held that reasonable time must be a reasonable time under the circumstances, and the judgment of Lord Selborne, when Lord Chancellor, in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (42 L. T. Rep. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599, 608), which was delivered some twelve years before Lord Herschell delivered his judgment in Hick v. Raymond and Reid, above referred to. Lord Selborne said the same as Lord Herschell subsequently said, though in different language. He said: "There is no doubt that the duty of providing, and making proper use of, sufficient means for the discharge of cargo, when a ship which has been chartered arrives at its destination and is ready to discharge, lies (generally) upon the charterer. If, by the terms of the charter-party, he has agreed to discharge it within a fixed period of time, that is an absolute and unconditional engagement, for the non-performance of which he is answerable, whatever may be the nature of the impediments which prevent him from performing it, and which cause the ship to be detained in his service beyond the time stipulated. If, on the other hand, there be no fixed time, the law implies an agreement on his part to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time—that is, as was said by Blackburn, J. in Ford v. Cotesworth, 'a reasonable time under the circumstances.' Difficult questions may sometimes arise as to the circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration in determining what time is reasonable. If (as in the present case) an obligation, indefinite as to time, is qualified or partially defined by express or implied reference to the custom or practice of a particular port, every impediment arising from or out of that custom or practice, which the charterer could not have overcome by the use of any reasonable diligence, ought, I think, to be taken into consideration." These judgments of two Lord Chancellors in the House of Lords on the point I have now to consider, coupled with the facts found by the learned judge in this case, to my mind are amply sufficient to show that the judgment of Bigham, J. is correct, and cover all the points taken by Mr. Joseph Walton in argument. It appears to me simply waste of time to discuss in detail other authorities cited in argument, such as Good and Co. v. Isaacs (67 L. T. Rep. 450; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212; (1892) 2 Q. B. 555), Castlegate Steamship Company v. Dempsey (66 L. T. Rep. 742; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 108; (1892) 1 Q. B. 854), and Wyllie v. Harrison (13 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 92), which are all consistent with the judgments in Postlethwaite v. Freeland and in Hick v. Raymond and Reid (68 L. T. Rep. 175; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1893) A. C. 22); and, with the exception of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (40 L. T. Rep. 413; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 118; 4 Ex. Div. 165), decided in 1879, before Postlethwaite v. Freeland in the House of Lords, there is not a single case in this country in the plaintiffs' favour. As regards the case of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup), in my judgment it is not now law, dissented from and discussed as it has been on different occasions, and especially by Lord Blackburn in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup), and inconsistent, as it is, with the two cases in the House of Lords. If, however, the case of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company is to be upheld upon the ground suggested by Lord Herschell in Hick v. Raymond and Reid (68 L. T. Rep. 175; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; (1893) A. C. 22, 32)—viz., that it was not shown in that case that the cargo owner could not by reasonable precautions or exertions have procured the necessary lighters elsewhere or earlier, and so have avoided the delay which took place—then, if that be the ground of the decision, the case is not hostile to the defendants, for the findings in this case are that they had taken all reasonable precautions and exertions and done their best as regards the discharge of the cargo, and the case has therefore no application to the present. In my opinion the present case upon the facts found is amply covered by the highest authority, and all Mr. Joseph Walton's points are equally covered. This appeal must be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. The learned judge has found such facts in this case as to put the charterers out of court, whether or not one treats Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup), and the law as laid down by Bramwell, Cotton, and Thesiger, L.JJ., as overruled by the House of Lords and the judgments in the House of Lords to which my brethren have referred. I think I should have arrived at the conclusion in fact in this case, taking all the evidence as to the practice of the port of Cardiff, that the defendants took upon themselves to supply all the appliances ordinarily required for the discharge of a ship in that port, including, therefore, trucks. I see nothing in the evidence to show that the discharging at Cardiff was to be into appliances to be provided or determined by the port. It is true that the discharge was to be into railway trucks, but there is nothing to show that the defendants might not have provided trucks from any source they chose and used the railway to introduce their trucks on the quay to take discharge, or that the railway was blocked. But for the finding of the learned judge, I should have thought there was an obligation on the defendants to provide the trucks and have them ready, and that this obligation was not affected by the fact that no time was fixed by contract for taking delivery.

ROMER, L.J.—The first question we have to consider is as to the meaning of the not uncommon provision in a charter-party as to the ship being discharged “with all despatch as customary.” I think it is now settled that such a provision means that the discharge shall take place with all reasonable despatch, and that in considering what is reasonable you must have regard, not to a hypothetical state of things (that is, to what would be reasonable in an ordinary state of circumstances), but to the actual state of things at the time of the discharge, and in particular to the customs of the port of discharge. So that a charterer is not liable for delay, if he has (under the circumstances) used all reasonable diligence in procuring the discharge, and, in considering what is reasonable diligence, you must have regard (inter alia) to the appliances for discharge customary at the port. That principle, to my mind, is established finally by Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.). Before that case some doubt existed on the subject, chiefly by reason of some observations which had been made by Bramwell and Cotton, L.J.J. in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ubi sup.), and which have been dissented from by Lord Herschell. But that the principle I have mentioned was established by Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) is, I think, clear from the addresses of the noble Lords in that case and especially from the observations of Lord Selborne and of Lord Blackburn, and in particular the remarks of Lord Blackburn as to the distinction between the obligation of loading and the obligation of discharging the ship. This view of Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) has been generally adopted, as, for example, by the judges who decided Castlegate Steamship Company v. Dempsey (ubi sup.) in the Court of Appeal, and by those who decided Wyllie v. Harrison. I think we ought to follow Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.) in this case, for I do not think this case can be distinguished in principle, having regard to Bigham, J.’s findings of fact, which appear to me to be supported by the evidence. From these findings it is clear that, by the custom of the port, the discharge of the ship could only be into wagons to be supplied by the railway companies who had access to the Cardiff Docks, and, further, that, though they used all reasonable diligence, the charterers could not get wagons to receive the discharge according to the custom, so that the delay was not caused by any default on their part. It follows from the above view of the law, as settled by the House of Lords, and of the facts of this case that the present appeal must, in my opinion, be dismissed.

But, before parting with the case, I desire to say something with reference to an ingenious argument of Mr. Joseph Walton. He suggests the following view with regard to the law as laid down in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.), that, though the charterer is only bound to use reasonable care and diligence in effecting the actual discharge of the ship, he is still absolutely bound to have ready at the moment the ship arrives in port all the appliances for discharge, such as lighters, that can be used at the port, and all the men necessary to effect the discharge. I cannot find any judgment supporting such a view of the law, or drawing a distinction between the duty of a charterer in regard to circumstances up to the time the discharge begins and his duty in respect to the actual discharge after it has commenced. It does not appear to me reasonable to make such a distinction. To use an example, I cannot see on principle why a charterer should not be liable if he uses reasonable care and diligence in keeping his men to work after the discharge has begun, and yet should be liable for not getting his men together ready for discharge though he has used all reasonable care and diligence to procure them. Such a distinction appears to me an unjustifiable refinement of the law as laid down in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (ubi sup.), and one not supported by any observation of any of the noble Lords who decided that case, or by any clear expression of opinion of any judge in any other case.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Lowless and Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Riddell, Vaizey, and Smith, for Wheatley, Cardiff.

Aug. 3 and 4, 1900.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Hal’sbury),
SMITH and WILLIAMS, L.J.J.)

FORREST AND SON LIMITED v. ARAMAYO. (a)
APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN’S BENCH DIVISION.
Contract—Contract to make and deliver chattel by certain date—Buyer to provide ship to receive—Concurrent obligations—Delay in making chattel—Obligation of buyer to provide ship.

The plaintiffs agreed to construct and deliver, f.o.b. at the port of London, for the defendants a steam launch by a fixed date. The vessel on board of which the launch was to be delivered was to be found by the defendants. The launch was not in fact ready to be delivered until three months after the agreed date, but the defendants did not during that time notify to the plaintiffs that there was any vessel at the port of London on board of which they required the launch to be delivered.

Held (affirming the judgment of Bucknill, J.), that, as the defendants were not ready and willing to take delivery before the plaintiffs were ready and willing to deliver, the defendants were not entitled to deduct from the price the agreed damages for delay in delivery.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CT. OF APP.]

FORREST AND SON LIMITED v. ARAMAYO.

[CT. OF APP.]

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Bucknill, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiffs brought this action to recover from the defendants the sum of 976*l.*, being the balance of the contract price and extras in respect of the construction of a steam launch.

By a contract, dated the 7th Sept. 1898, between the plaintiffs and the defendants it was agreed that the plaintiffs should construct, and deliver f.o.b. at the port of London, within four months, a steam launch which was intended for the Bolivian Government.

It was agreed that for any delay in delivery of the launch the defendants should be at liberty to deduct from the price, as liquidated damages, the sum of 5*l.* a day.

The vessel on board of which the launch was to be delivered at the port of London was to be found by the defendants.

The launch was not in fact completed and ready for delivery, and was not delivered, until April 1899.

On the 12th Dec. 1898 the defendants wrote saying that they wished the launch to be shipped by a steamer leaving Liverpool on the 29th Dec. and Hamburg on the 6th Jan.; and they subsequently intimated that unless the launch could go by that steamer, there would not be a steamer upon which she could be shipped until April.

The defendants were informed that the launch would not be completed in time to be delivered on board the steamer leaving on the 29th Dec.

In March the defendants wrote saying they would require the launch to be delivered on board the steamer sailing from London on the 17th April.

There was no vessel sailing from the port of London, upon which the launch could have been delivered by the plaintiffs, except the one sailing upon the 17th April. The defendants did not name any vessel to the plaintiffs, except that which sailed from Liverpool on the 29th Dec., before the one which sailed from London on the 17th April, upon which the launch was in fact delivered.

The plaintiffs claimed to be paid a sum of 976*l.* for the balance of the contract price and for extras. The defendants claimed to deduct the sum of 500*l.* for one hundred days delay in delivering the launch, and paid the balance of 476*l.* into court.

The action was tried before Bucknill, J. without a jury.

T. Terrell, Q.C. and H. Tindal Atkinson for the plaintiffs.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C. and C. C. Scott for the defendants.

Jan. 16.—BUCKNILL, J.—I do not propose to give a long judgment, and it will be understood that I purposely omit to state fully that which the pleadings set out in the case because substantially the question here is whether the defendants, Messrs. Avelino Aramayo and Co., are entitled to deduct from the sum, which would otherwise be agreed as owing by them to the plaintiffs, for the reason that the plaintiffs were in default, and were alone in default, in the delivery of this launch. Putting the story quite shortly, it is this: A launch was to be built by Messrs. Forrest and Son Limited, the plaintiffs, for a certain specified sum, I think 2650*l.*, to which has to be added certain extras amounting to 117*l.* 16*s.*, making the amount payable to them in the event of their having performed their contract 2767*l.* 16*s.*, of which a sum of 1791*l.* has been paid on account, leaving a balance claimed of 976*l.* 16*s.* In order to be entitled to defend this action, 476*l.* 16*s.* was paid into court, and the question remains in dispute whether the defendants are entitled to be credited with 500*l.* by way of liquidated damages, and therefore have paid sufficient. In one event they would be entitled, of course, to my judgment, and in the other event they would not. Now, let me first of all state as clearly as I can that which is manifest—that is to say, that this launch in fact was not ready to leave Wyvenhoe, where Messrs. Forrest carry on their business, until April 1899, and she was only finished in just sufficient time for her to be taken round to London and put by them on board a ship provided by the defendants, which sailed on the 17th April. That is clear, and I find that as a fact, and I need therefore say no more about that part of the case, except that such delay does not appear to me to have been the fault of Messrs. Forrest and Son, but through some difficulty and trouble which they had with some contractors; and for some reason or another it is a fact that the launch was not completed until the month of April. I have not got the contract before me for the moment, but I am stating the effect of it from memory. The contract was that this launch was to be made, equipped, tried, completed, and delivered f.o.b. in the port of London. That is clearly all that had to be done by the plaintiffs; all that was their duty. The defendants' duty was to provide a ship on which this launch could be delivered f.o.b., and to pay the amount which they had contracted to pay for it. Now, it is a fact, and I find it to be a fact, that no available ship was found by, or could have been found by, the defendants to take this launch except a vessel which left Liverpool on or about the 29th Dec. 1898, and left Hamburg on the 6th of the following January. There was no available ship between that ship and the vessel which was to have left London on or about the 12th April, but which in point of fact did not leave until some week or ten days later. If this launch had in point of fact been completed, ready to be delivered free on board, there was no means by which the defendants could themselves have taken such delivery as was contemplated between the parties. How did it arise? It arose in this way: On the 12th Dec. 1898 the defendants, by their manager, wrote to Sir Edward Reed, whose position was that he was the defendants' agent in the matter to look after the building of this launch, and, in a certain event, which has not taken place, an arbitrator to say between the parties what was to be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants, or to deduct from the contract price in a certain event. That was not done; he was the person who might have been called upon to do it if the parties had chosen to go to him instead of coming here. That letter was as follows: "We are in receipt of yours of the 9th inst., and in reply beg to point out that this boat appears to be very far behind, and we must ask you to be continually 'at' the builders and engineers so as to keep them up to their time. We wish this boat to be shipped by the steamer leaving Liverpool on the 29th Dec. and Hamburg on the 6th Jan. next, and if this is not done we fear there will be considerable delay. The name of this boat is to be Alonzo." It is only necessary to make this observation on that letter, that there is nothing to show that the defendants were aware at that time that the plaintiffs could not complete the boat up to time. That letter is answered by Sir Edward Reed on the 13th Dec.: "I am obliged by your favour of yesterday. I do not regard this launch as 'very far behind,' although the contractors have experienced great difficulty in getting quick delivery of materials, especially in the engine work, and the very wet weather has somewhat retarded the hull work. I have put exceptional pressure on them (both shipbuilders and engineers) to keep to time. Am continuing the pressure, and will do so to the end. But they will most certainly not be able to finish the work in time for the steamer you name, to do which would mean that the boat must be furnished, tried, and finally completed in nearly a fortnight less than the contract time, which I regard as an impossibility. Working continuously day and night up to Christmas would not accomplish this, and at Christmas time the men will not work for 'love or money.' I note that the boat is to be named Alonzo." Then, on the 14th, a letter came from the defendants to Sir Edward Reed: "We are favoured by yours of the 13th, contents of which are noted. In ours of the 12th we advised you that the boat by which we required the launch shipped left Hamburg on the 6th Jan. By Messrs. Forreth and Son's contract they are to have the launch finished and delivered in the port of London four months from the date of signing contract—viz., the 7th Sept.—therefore the boat should be delivered in London on the 7th Jan. entirely finished, trial trip and all inspection and so on over. We therefore do not see that we are asking them to finish in a fortnight less than contract time. The shipping company advise us that unless the launch can go by the boat mentioned, there will be no opportunity of shipping her until April on account of the boats sailing up to that time not having sufficient deck space; this to us is a serious matter." On the 15th Dec. Sir Edward Reed writes again in reply: "I had not overlooked the possible alternative of shipping the launch at Hamburg on the 6th Jan., but, in view of the immense difficulties of transport by rail and otherwise during the Christmas season (which I think you will appreciate), I regarded and still regard her completion before Christmas as essential to her shipment either from Liverpool on the 29th inst. or from Hamburg on the 6th Jan., and I do not think my estimate of a shortening of the contract time by 'nearly a fortnight' an exaggerated one in either case in view of the Christmas week difficulties." I am quite clear Sir Edward Reed did not make a mistake when he used the expression "a fortnight earlier than the contract time" in his first letter, because he explains it in his subsequent letter as meaning that if the boat were required by the defendants to be put on board at Liverpool on the 29th Dec. or to be put on board at Hamburg on the 6th Jan. or thereabouts, it would mean—looking at the difficulties of transport and the slowness in expedition in this country when you put a thing on a railway, and the uncertainty of its arriving at its destination—that they, the plaintiffs, in order to catch the boat at Liverpool or at Hamburg would have to complete, equip, and try the launch about a fortnight before the contract time. So it is quite clear, in my view, that Sir Edward Reed made no mistake whatever. Those letters were communicated by Sir Edward Reed to the plaintiffs. The next important letter is that of the 10th March 1899 from the defendants to Sir Edward Reed. I need not read it all. It says: "On the 8th Feb. I wrote you inquiring whether the launch would be ready for shipment by the 12th April, and in that letter we endeavoured to impress upon you the absolute necessity of having thoroughly reliable information upon this point, and your reply of the same date was most complete, as you went so far as to add at the end of your letter, 'In fact some weeks before that date.' On the strength of this reply we engaged freights, and have consequently incurred liability of 650*l.* or 700*l.*, for which we must hold someone responsible." I read that letter to show when it was that the defendants made arrangements for the ship on which the launch was in point of fact put. Those are the only letters to which it is necessary for me to draw attention on the question which I have to decide. I find as a fact—as already stated—that this launch was not completed under the contract until about the middle of April. I find as a fact that the defendants decided on or about the 12th Dec. that this boat should be delivered at either Liverpool or Hamburg, and that it was so understood by Sir Edward Reed, and it was so understood by the makers; and I find as a fact that, whether the boat had been completed up to contract time or not, there was no ship on board of which the defendants could by any possibility have taken delivery except the ship indicated in the letter which I have just read, dated the 10th March. That being so, the next question I have to consider is that of damages. It is said that the defendants are entitled, notwithstanding these facts, to a deduction of this 500*l.* by way of liquidated damages. Let me say what I find about these damages. I hold them, on the language of the contract, to be liquidated damages and not penalties, following the cases which have been cited to me. I hold as a matter of law, on the facts which I have found (seeing that the defendants indicated before the time arrived for completion of the contract—i.e., before the 7th Jan.—that they had no ship on board of which they could take the launch after the 6th Jan. at Hamburg, and that the plaintiffs were clearly not bound so to deliver, because they were bound to deliver not a day before the 7th Jan., and then not at Hamburg, but in the port of London) that the defendants are not entitled to deduct anything by way of liquidated damages here. The law with regard to liquidated damages is, as I understand it, quite clear: If the parties agree that in a certain event, that is to say, in the event of a default by one, the other shall receive something by way of liquidated damages so as to save the trouble of the parties thereafter ascertaining what those damages are, the matter is then as clear as it can be. If it is not by way of penalty, and is by way of liquidated damages, the person in default who has caused damage to the other shall pay to the other a certain sum which they themselves have fixed and agreed upon. I do not, however, assent to the proposition that when two persons have to do something, one person to deliver and another to accept, and the person whose duty it is to accept fails in the performance of that duty and is not in a position to accept, and so states to the other side that he is not in a position to accept, he is entitled, simply because the other has not been in a position to deliver, to any damages, whether liquidated or not. Here, seeing that in my opinion the defendants were themselves not in a position to accept, except on the 6th Jan., when the plaintiffs were not bound to deliver, and seeing that the time when they were next in a position to accept was on the 12th April, I find there was not a performance by them on their part, and that they therefore cannot claim liquidated damages, and there must be judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C. and C. C. Scott for the appellants.—The defendants were entitled to deduct from the price the agreed damages for delay in the completion of the launch. The defendants were not, and could not have been, ready to deliver the launch before the time at which they did in fact deliver it, and therefore it was unnecessary for the defendants to name any vessel on board of which the launch should be delivered earlier than the vessel in April which they did name.

T. Terrell, Q.C. and H. Tindal Atkinson for the respondents.—It was part of the obligation of the defendants to provide a vessel at the port of London to take delivery, and to notify to the plaintiffs that they had done so. The defendants cannot recover damages from the plaintiffs for delay in delivery unless they prove that they were always ready and willing to take delivery. There were concurrent obligations to deliver and to be ready to take delivery, and neither party can recover damages for breach of his obligation by the other party unless he was ready and willing to perform his part:

Morton v. Lamb, 7 T. R. 125; 4 R. R. 395;

Goodisson v. Nunn, 4 T. R. 761.

The defendants never had a vessel ready to take delivery at the port of London until April, and therefore they cannot claim damages for delay before that time.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C. replied.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—I am of opinion that the judgment of Bucknill, J. was right. The sole point which I intend to decide upon this appeal is that whenever there are concurrent obligations the party who seeks to recover against the other must show that he has always been ready and willing to perform the obligation upon him. It is immaterial whether the obligation is express or implied; expressio eorum quæ tacite nisent nihil operatur. In a contract for the sale or manufacture of a chattel, the one party must be ready and willing to deliver, and the other to accept delivery. The difference between the two acts is quite immaterial. The one party in this case is bound to build the launch, and the other to accept it when built; the one is bound to finish the launch, and the other to provide a vessel to receive it. It is common ground that neither party has performed that obligation. The law has been well ascertained and accepted for many years upon this subject. Whichever party is the actor, and is complaining of a breach of contract, he is bound to show, as a matter of law, that he has performed all that was incident to his part of the concurrent obligations. The averment that he was always ready and willing to perform his obligation is a necessary averment. Therefore in this case each party has failed to perform his obligation. It is said that the builders of the launch were not ready in time, but the plaintiffs did not give notice that they had a vessel ready. Therefore it seems to me that neither party can bring an action against the other for breach of contract, because neither party was ready and willing to do his part of the concurrent acts. That is the only question with which we need trouble ourselves. The party who brings the action must show that he was ready and willing to perform his part of the concurrent acts. The defendants have not shown that they were ready and willing to perform their part, and therefore their appeal fails and must be dismissed.

SMITH, L.J.—I agree. The defendants are suing the plaintiffs to recover liquidated damages because the plaintiffs did not deliver the launch until many days after the agreed date. The defendants, being the actor, must, in order to recover the damages, show that they were always ready and willing to perform their part of the contract by having a vessel ready to receive the launch on board, and that they gave notice to the plaintiffs that they had such a vessel. The breach of that obligation on the part of the defendants is clear. It is, therefore, clear that the defendants have not performed the condition precedent necessary to entitle them to recover liquidated damages under the contract. The defendants contend that they were excused from performing that obligation because they knew that the plaintiffs were not ready, and could not be ready by the appointed date; but the plaintiffs say, on the other hand, that they were excused from being ready by the agreed date because the defendants would not then be ready to receive the launch. There were conditions to be performed on either side, and, if excused, they were excused on both sides, and the defendants cannot rely on those conditions to support their claim. Therefore the defendants cannot recover, and this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. It is plain that under this contract there was an obligation upon the defendants to name a vessel upon which they were prepared to take delivery of the launch, on the 7th Jan., in London, and it is also plain that before they can claim these damages they must show that they were ready and willing to take delivery, and that they gave notice to the plaintiffs of the name of the vessel. It is now admitted that in point of fact the defendants did not give such notice, and did not name any vessel which would be ready to take delivery, f.o.b., in London on the 7th Jan. On the contrary, the defendants gave notice to the plaintiffs that they would not be ready to take delivery on the 7th Jan. in London, because they said that they must have delivery in Liverpool or Hamburg, and, if they could not have delivery in one of those places, they could not take delivery until April. The defendants cannot deny their obligation to perform the condition precedent, and cannot say that they were ready and willing to perform the concurrent condition, but they say that they were excused because by their conduct the plaintiffs informed them that it would be useless. In the first place it is not pretended that the plaintiffs gave any such notice in words, or even by any act, such as may be in a case where the chattel to be delivered is sold to someone else. But it is said that there was such notice because the defendants were aware of the fact that the plaintiffs could not be ready in time. That does not seem to me to amount to a waiver of the condition that notice of a vessel should be given. It is plain that in this case it did not in the circumstances amount to any such waiver. It therefore seems to me that the onus was on the defendants to give notice that they were able to take delivery on a vessel in London on the 7th Jan., and that they did not do so. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: for the appellants, Dale, Newman, and Hood; for the respondents, G. Terrell.

Thursday, Nov. 1, 1900.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury),
SMITH, M.R., and COLLINS, L.J.)

SEA INSURANCE COMPANY v. CARR. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice—Commercial cause—Entering cause in commercial list—Discretion of judge—Appeal to Court of Appeal.

If a judge directs a cause, which is not in fact a "commercial cause," to be entered in the commercial list, an appeal will lie to the Court of Appeal.

THIS was an appeal by the defendant from an order of Mathew, J., directing the action to be entered in the list of commercial causes.

The plaintiffs brought this action against the defendant to recover the amount which they had paid, under a policy of insurance, to the owners of certain goods which had been seized on board a vessel in the Persian Gulf by the defendant, who was in command of H.M.S. Lapwing.

The present plaintiffs had been sued upon the policy by the owners of these goods, and judgment had been given against them: (Fracis, Times, and Co. v. Sea Insurance Company, 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 418; 3 Com. Cas. 229.)

In respect of other goods which had been seized on board the same vessel, the present defendant had been sued by the owners, and judgment had been given against him: (Fracis, Times, and Co. v. Carr, 82 L. T. Rep. 698.)

The defendant justified the seizure of the goods under a proclamation issued by the Sultan of Muscat and proceedings before a court of inquiry appointed by the Sultan.

Upon the application of the plaintiffs, Mathew, J., at chambers, made an order directing that the action should be transferred to the commercial list, that the plaintiffs should deliver points of claim in seven days, that the defendant should deliver points of defence in seven days, that the parties should exchange lists of documents in seven days and give inspection in three days afterwards, and that the action should be tried without a jury.

The Regulations made by the judges of the Queen's Bench Division for the despatch of commercial business, provide:

1. Commercial causes include causes arising out of the ordinary transactions of merchants and traders; amongst others, those relating to the construction of mercantile documents, export or import of merchandise, affreightment, insurance, banking and mercantile agency and mercantile usages.

2. A separate list for summonses in commercial causes shall be kept at chambers. A separate list will also be kept for the entry of such causes for trial, but no cause shall be entered in such list which has not been dealt with by a judge charged with commercial business, upon application by either party for that purpose, or upon summons for directions or otherwise.

The defendant appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay (A.-G.) and R. B. D. Acland for the appellant.—This action is not a "commercial cause" within the meaning of the regulations, and therefore the learned judge was wrong in ordering the action to be entered in the commercial list. The real question in this case is a serious question of international law. It is not an action "arising out of the ordinary transactions of merchants and traders," within the meaning of the regulations. The discretion of the learned judge to direct causes to be entered in the commercial list extends only to "commercial causes," and an appeal lies against an order which directs a cause, which is not a "commercial cause," to be entered in that list:

Barry v. Peruvian Corporation, 73 L. T. Rep. 678; (1896) 1 Q. B. 208.

The orders as to discovery, exchange of documents, &c., which are usually made in actions which have been entered in the commercial list, ought not to be made in an action like this.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., F. W. Hollams, and Frank Phillips for the respondents.—An appeal cannot be brought in a case of this kind. The question whether an action shall be put into a particular list, or be tried before a particular judge, in the Queen's Bench Division, is purely a matter of discretion. The judges have power for the convenience of business to arrange what actions shall be put into particular lists and be tried before particular judges. There can be no appeal in such matters. The rules of practice and evidence relating to actions entered in the commercial list are the same as those relating to any other actions. There is no "order," within the meaning of sect. 19 of the Judicature Act 1873, against which an appeal can be brought. This action is a "commercial cause" and the learned judge had therefore a discretion in the matter. There is no definition of "commercial cause" and it is entirely within the discretion of the judge to say what are and what are not commercial causes under these regulations, which are not orders and rules of the Supreme Court. The question whether there could be an appeal or not was not raised in Barry v. Peruvian Corporation (ubi sup.).

Sir R. B. Finlay (A.-G.) replied.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister at Law.

Q.B. Div.]

STEAMSHIP BALMORAL COMPANY LIMITED v. MARTEN.

[Q.B. Div.]

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—So far as I am concerned, I am of opinion that upon the main point urged by counsel for the respondents we are bound by the decision of this court in Barry v. Peruvian Corporation (73 L. T. Rep. 678; (1896) 1 Q. B. 208). It was decided in that case that, when the judge directs an action to be entered in the list of commercial causes, it is an order, and, if it is an order, it is a matter of appeal. Although that case was not a decision upon this question, yet it was necessary to decide this question in order to decide the particular point in question in that case, and the court did in that sense decide it. I am, therefore, of opinion that the question is concluded in this court by that decision. With regard to the present case, it has not really been argued that this is a "commercial cause." It is true that there is no definition of a "commercial cause." It would not be easy to make a definition in accordance with the rules of logic, and I do not think that anyone would attempt such a definition. On the other hand, however, few business men would hesitate to say what was not a commercial cause in most instances. It seems to me that it would not be easy to find a case which is more plainly not within the examples of commercial causes given in the regulations. This case raises a grave question of international law as to whether the seizure of these goods was justified under a proclamation issued by the Sultan of Muscat. I am of opinion that the present case is not in any way a "commercial cause" within the meaning of the regulations. I do not intend to throw any kind of doubt upon the convenience and usefulness of the commercial court in cases which are properly entered in the list of commercial causes. I think that it is most useful to litigants, and I do not wish to say anything to interfere with its usefulness. I think that this order was wrong, and that this appeal must be allowed.

SMITH, M.R.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

COLLINS, L.J.—I agree. Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellant, The Solicitor to the Treasury.

Solicitors for the respondents, Hollams, Sons, Coward, and Hawksley.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

July 20 and Aug. 11, 1900.

(Before BIGHAM, J.)

STEAMSHIP BALMORAL COMPANY LIMITED v.
MARTEN. (a)

Marine insurance—General average and salvage expenses—Valued policy—Ship insured for value in policy—Ship of larger value at time of average statement—Proportion of general average and salvage charges to be paid by underwriters.

Where a general average loss occurs under a valued policy of marine insurance and the ship at the time the average statement is made up is of a larger value than the value stated in the policy, the underwriters who have insured the ship for the full value as stated in the policy are not bound to pay the owner the whole loss, but are bound to pay only the proportion which the value in the policy bears to the actual value on which the average statement has been made up, and the same principle applies equally in the adjusting, as between the owner and the underwriters, of a salvage claim which the owner has had to pay for salvage services.

A ship was insured for 33,000l. and was valued in the policy at the same sum. During the currency of the policy a general average loss was sustained, and a salvage claim had to be paid by the owners under a salvage award for salvage services to the ship. The real value of the ship for the purpose of the salvage award and at the time of making up the average statement was taken to be, and was in fact, 40,000l. In adjusting the general average and salvage charges as between the underwriters and the owners of the ship:

Held, that the underwriters, having insured upon the value of 33,000l. as stated in the policy, were only liable under the policy to pay the owners thirty-three-fortieths as well of the salvage charges as of the general average charges, that being the proportion of the value in the policy to the actual value at the time of making up the average statement.

ACTION tried before Bigham, J. in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs were a limited steamship company carrying on business at Glasgow, and the defendant was an underwriter at Lloyd's, and carried on business there.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, as the owners of the steamship Balmoral, to recover a loss under a policy of marine insurance on the Balmoral, underwritten by the defendant; and the question in the case was how the claim for certain salvage services to the Balmoral should be adjusted as between the owners (the plaintiffs) and their underwriters, of whom the defendant was one, the owners contending that they were entitled to be reimbursed the total amount of salvage they had been condemned to pay in a salvage action, and the underwriters contending that as the vessel was valued in the salvage suit at 40,000l., whilst she was only valued in the policies at 33,000l., their proportion should be limited to thirty-three-fortieths, and that the owners should bear the remaining seven-fortieths.

The Balmoral was insured under her annual policies for twelve calendar months from the 5th Dec. 1898 to the 5th Dec. 1899, and the ship was, by agreement between the assured and the assurers, valued in the policy at 33,000l.

In June 1899, during the currency of this policy and while the ship was on a voyage from Philadelphia to London with a general cargo, salvage services were rendered to her by the Amroth Castle, and an action for the recovery of salvage was commenced on the 27th June by the salvors against the owners of the Balmoral, her cargo and freight. In this suit the owners of the Balmoral were condemned to pay 500l. for salvage services to the ship and her cargo with costs and interest (some 136l.).

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this salvage action the value of the Balmoral at the time the salvage services were rendered to her, was, in an affidavit filed on behalf of the owners, stated to be 40,000*l.*, and this value of 40,000*l.* was agreed upon as the value of the ship between the owners and the salvors, the amount being a compromise to save the expense of a valuation.

Also during the currency of the policy a general average loss was sustained and general average expenses were incurred.

In adjusting the general average and salvage charges (the contributory value of the ship being taken at 40,000*l.*), the average adjusters in Glasgow treated the general average and salvage charge by two different methods. They charged the whole of the salvage charges to the ship, but they treated the general average expenses (apart from the salvage charges) the other way by making the insurance for 33,000*l.* pay only thirty-three-fortieths of the total share of the general average falling on the ship; and upon objection being made by the underwriters as to the adjustment of the salvage charges, the adjusters gave as their reasons for not reducing the salvage in proportion to the insured value (1) that salvage is distinct from general average and is recoverable directly on the policy as a loss by perils of the sea: (Aitchison v. Lohre, 41 L. T. Rep. 323; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 168; L. Rep. 4 H. of L. 755), and that it is not a contribution; (2) that this direct claim is recoverable as particular average on a particular charge, and in the case of a valued policy it is recoverable in the proportion which the amount insured bears to the insured value (decision of Lindley, J. in Dixon v. Whitworth, 40 L. T. Rep. 718; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 327; 4 C. P. Div. 371; Gow on Marine Insurance (1896), p. 226).

The underwriters in London interested in the policies took objection to this mode of making out the statement, and said that in adjustments containing salvage charges these salvage charges were adjusted in precisely the same way as general average—namely, that the contributory value is taken as the basis of contribution and the amount of each individual policy is made to pay the proportion that attaches to it when compared with the contributory value, and though they did not dispute that salvage is distinct from general average, they did dispute that there was any existing decision that made them liable to pay salvage charges on a salvaged property in which they were not interested by their insurance, which contemplated only a value of 33,000*l.*, and that there was no decision that a policy must pay salvage charges according to the proportion between the amount of such policy and the value insured, where the salvage award—as in the present case—was based on a value higher than the value insured; and that, therefore, the underwriters were not liable to pay salvage charges on a value (namely, 40,000*l.*) which they did not insure.

After some correspondence on the matter the underwriters finally declined to admit liability for the whole of the ship's share of the salvage charges, and refused to give way over the point concerning the contributory value in its relation to the salvage charges, and they said that as the value of the steamer was put at 40,000*l.* for salvage services, the underwriters were only interested to the extent of thirty-three-fortieths, as she was only insured for 33,000*l.*

The present action was then brought against the defendant, the other underwriters agreeing to be bound by the result.

Mr. Danson, an average adjuster of many years' experience, gave evidence for the defendant to the effect that there was a well-known practice amongst English underwriters extending over a long time that when a vessel was insured for a sum less than the contributory value upon which general average was adjusted, or less than the amount at which the vessel was valued in a salvage action, the underwriters were only liable to pay in the proportion of the insured value to the contributory value or salvage value.

The plaintiffs contended that evidence as to the practice was not admissible, and that the practice contended for by the defendant was wrong in law and ought not to prevail.

Leck (Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Denis O'Connor with him) for the plaintiffs.

Pickford, Q.C. (Scrutton and Mackinnon with him) for the defendant.

Aug. 11.—BIGHAM, J. read the following judgment:—In this case the defendant and others underwrote a policy of marine insurance on the plaintiffs' ship for 33,000*l.*, the ship being valued in the policy at the same sum. While the policy was current a general average loss was sustained and a salvage claim had to be paid, and thereupon an average statement was made up. The real value of the ship at the time of the average statement was 40,000*l.*, and the rights of the different parties interested—namely, owners of ship, freight, and cargo respectively—were regulated inter se on that footing. The question is whether the defendant and the other underwriters must indemnify the plaintiffs against the whole of the average loss payable by them, or only against thirty-three-fortieths thereof. The question divides itself into two parts—viz., that relating to the general average loss, and that relating to the salvage claim. As to the general average loss, the evidence satisfies me that the practice in this country is for the underwriter on a valued policy to pay only the proportion which the value in the policy bears to the actual value on which the statement has been made up. Applying the rule of practice to the present case, the defendant will only be liable to make good to the plaintiffs thirty-three-fortieths of the general average loss. The plaintiffs say that this rule is inconsistent with the contract contained in the policy, because, as between themselves and the defendant, the ship is a fully insured ship. She is, they say, by agreement valued at 33,000*l.*, and she is insured for that same sum; and being fully insured they are entitled to a full indemnity against the general average claim. But I think it is the plaintiffs' contention, rather than the defendant's, which is inconsistent with the terms of the policy; for the defendant and the other underwriters have promised to be bound on the basis of the ship being worth 33,000*l.*, whereas the plaintiffs are asking them to pay on the footing of the ship being worth 40,000*l.* The plaintiffs have not satisfied me that their contention is right. The rule of practice to which I have referred has been in force for nearly a century. I am asked to disregard it. If I did so, I should unsettle the basis on which existing policies for many millions of money have been made. I am not disposed to do this unless I see clear reasons for it. I see reasons rather the other way, and, therefore, on this part of the question I find for the defendant. As to the claim for salvage loss, the practice has been for more than a century to treat such claims precisely as claims for general average are treated. I think, therefore, the defendant must succeed on this part of the case also.

Q.B. DIV.] MONTGOMERY &amp; Co. v. INDEMNITY MUTUAL MARINE ASSURANCE Co. [Q.B. DIV.]

Judgment for the defendant with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lowless and Co.
Solicitors for the defendant, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Nov. 14 and 19, 1900.
(Before MATHEW, J.)

MONTGOMERY AND CO. v. INDEMNITY MUTUAL MARINE ASSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

Marine insurance—General average—Assured owner of both ship and cargo—Insurance on cargo—Sacrifice of mast—Right of assured to recover under policy—Liability of underwriters on cargo.

The fact that the assured under a policy of marine insurance on cargo is owner of the ship as well as owner of the cargo does not prevent him from recovering under the policy from the underwriters on the cargo in respect of a general average loss, as a general average act does not depend on the consideration whether there can be any contribution or not as between the respective interests.

The Brigella (69 L. T. Rep. 834; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; (1893) P. 189) not followed.

A loss caused by the cutting away of the mast of a ship, which by the master's orders is cut away for the safety of the whole adventure, but which at the time it is cut away is not hopelessly lost and might be saved, is a general average sacrifice for which underwriters of a policy on cargo against perils of the seas are liable to the assured for general average contribution, and they are none the less liable because the assured are owners of both ship and cargo.

Shepherd v. Kottgen (37 L. T. Rep. 618; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 2 C. P. Div. 585) distinguished.

COMMERCIAL cause tried before Mathew, J.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, the owners of the ship Airlie and her cargo, to recover from the defendants a general average loss under a policy of marine insurance on cargo effected by the defendants; alternatively, to recover the defendants' proportion of suing and labouring expenses to avert a total loss of the insured cargo.

The policy was expressed to be on a cargo (in bags) of nitrate of soda in the ship Airlie at and from any ports or places on the West Coast of South America to any port of call and (or) discharge in the United Kingdom or on the continent of Europe (within certain limits) or in the United States.

The insurance was against perils of the seas and other losses of the same character, and the policy contained the ordinary sue and labour clause, and a provision that general average was payable as per foreign statement or York and Antwerp rules, if so made up.

During the voyage the ship encountered very bad weather; the main mast, which was of iron and hollow, had settled down. The mast, however, was secured and remained firm in its position.

As the ship continued to roll, the master, fearing that the mast would break, and so cause the loss of the vessel, ordered it to be cut away, and it was cut away and fell over the side.

The plaintiffs were owners of both the ship Airlie and her cargo, and they now sought to recover, under their policy on the cargo, a general average loss incurred by the cutting away of the mast, as they contended that the cutting away of the mast was under the circumstances, a general average sacrifice, rendered necessary by the perils of the seas insured against.

The defendants said that the cutting away of the mast was not a general average sacrifice, and gave rise to no general average claim; that, as the plaintiffs were owners of both ship and cargo, there could be no contribution to general average as between ship and cargo, and therefore the plaintiffs could not claim under the policy on cargo; and that the sue and labour clause did not apply.

Carver, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton for the plaintiffs.—The first ground of defence is that the cutting away of the mast was not a general average sacrifice. With regard to that the cutting away of the mast was, under the circumstances, an act done for the safety of the whole adventure, the crew, cargo, and ship, and was therefore a general average sacrifice. The mast when cut away was not in any danger, but in the opinion of the master it was in such a condition as to endanger the whole adventure, and that is sufficient to establish the right to general average, according to the principles laid down in Shepherd v. Kottgen (37 L. T. Rep. 618; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 2 C. P. Div. 578 and 585) and in Iredale and another v. China Traders' Insurance Company (81 L. T. Rep. 231; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 580; (1899) 2 Q. B. 356). In Shepherd v. Kottgen (ubi sup.), the mast when cut away was a wreck and was hopelessly lost, and upon that ground it was held that there was no general average sacrifice, and therefore no right to general average contribution. Here the evidence shows that the mast was not a wreck but was in fact safe, and could have been saved, and was cut away solely for the safety of the whole adventure. That being so, there is a right to a general average contribution. The second ground of defence is that the ship and cargo belonged to the same owners (the plaintiffs), and that, therefore, there can be no general average as there can be no contribution as between ship and cargo. A claim to general average does not depend on the right to contribution. The mast was sacrificed for the common good and for the safety of the whole adventure. That brings the loss within the definition given by Lawrence J. in Birkley v. Presgrave (1 East, 220, at p. 228): "All loss which arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made or expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo come within general average, and must be borne proportionably by all who are interested"; and it brings it within the principle in Arnould on Marine Insurance, p. 895. Underwriters in such cases are liable for their proportion of the loss falling on the interests insured by them, whether there is a joint ownership of such interests or not. That would show that the assured can recover irrespective of the joint ownership of interests. The defendants rely on the judgment of Barnes, J. in The Brigella (69 L. T. Rep. 834; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; (1893) P. 189). It is submitted that the decision in that case in so far as it touches the present point is erroneous, and also that it was not necessary for the decision of the case. The learned judge was wrong in thinking that the right to general average would depend upon the right to contribution, and that in such a case as this the right to recover would be under the sue and labour clause. The obligation of the underwriters to contribute to general average is not under the sue and labour clause, but under the law maritime (per Lord Blackburn in Aitchison v. Lohre, 41 L. T. Rep. 323, at p. 326; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 168; 4 App. Cas. 755, at pp. 764-5); and in Oppenheim v. Fry (8 L. T. Rep. 385; 3 B. & S. 873, at p. 884) the same learned judge, then Blackburn, J., says: "I have a strong impression that, where a voluntary sacrifice is made for the benefit of the whole adventure, it is general average, whether the ship and cargo and freight belong to one only or to different adventurers, or whether they are partially interested . . . one in the hull and another in the machinery." The same principle is laid down in the two American cases—Potter v. Ocean Insurance Company (3 Sumner, 27) and Greely v. Tremont Insurance Company (9 Cushing, 415); and also in the text-books—Emerigon, c. 12, s. 39; Phillips on Insurance, ss. 1274, 1412; and Benecke on Marine Insurance, p. 473. Also the practice of average staters has always been to adjust general average irrespective of whether or not the different interests are owned by the same person.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. and Loehnis for the defendants.—With regard to the first point, the mast was a wreck and was valueless when it was cut away. When the master ordered it to be cut away he believed that it was a wreck, and the rigging was cut away in order to get rid of it in that way, as the master feared that it might fall on the ship and so cause the loss of the ship. That being so, the case comes within Shepherd v. Kottgen (ubi sup.), which shows that there was no general average sacrifice in this case. With regard to the second point, as the plaintiffs were owners of both ship and cargo, they cannot have any claim for a general average loss against the defendants, who were the underwriters on the cargo. The right to general average depends on the right to contribution as between the two interests, ship and cargo. Where these two interests are owned by the same person, as in this case, there can be no claim for general average. A general average loss is a loss incurred by one interest for the benefit of all the other interests, and that gives a right to contribution from the other interests. Consequently, where there is no right of contribution from the other interests, the loss is not a general average loss, but a particular average loss. The judgment of Barnes, J. in The Brigella (ubi sup.) is right, and concludes this case. That judgment shows that there being no contribution there is no general average loss; but if the plaintiffs "had insured all their interests in one policy, expenses properly incurred in averting a loss of those interests imperilled by a peril insured against would fall to be borne by the underwriters under the sue and labour clause": (per Barnes, J. in The Brigella, ubi sup.); but a general average loss cannot be recovered under the sue and labour clause:

Aitchison v. Lohre (ubi sup.).

They also referred to

Kidstone v. Empire Marine Insurance Company, 15 L. T. Rep. 12; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 468; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 535;

Xenos v. Fox, 19 L. T. Rep. 84; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 146; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 630;

Dickinson v. Jardine, 18 L. T. Rep. 717; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 126; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 639.

Carver, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 19.—MATHEW, J. read the following judgment: This was an action on a policy on the cargo of the ship Airlie to recover a general average loss incurred by the cutting away of a mast. The ship sailed on the 29th March 1900 with a cargo of nitrate from Tocopilla, a port on the West Coast of South America, for Shields. On the 17th May, while in the latitude of the river Plate, the vessel encountered very bad weather with a heavy cross sea, and began to roll and lurch violently. About 9 a.m. it was noticed that the mainmast, which was an iron mast and hollow, had settled down. The rigging which had slackened was at once tightened by a process called "swiffling up," and the mast so secured remained firm in position. The ship continued to roll, and the master, after some time, fearing that the mast would break and fall on the deck and cause the loss of the vessel, thought it best to get rid of it. Accordingly the vessel was brought into position, the windward rigging was cut, and the mast fell over the side, carrying away portions of the other masts and rigging. The wreckage was promptly cut adrift. The vessel was brought home under jury rig, and reached her port of discharge in safety. The first point made by the defendants was that there was no general average sacrifice. The mast, it was said, was already hopelessly lost, and therefore was not sacrificed for the safety of crew, ship, and cargo. But I cannot agree with this contention. The mast was not in such a condition that it must have been lost, whether the rest of the adventure had been saved or not. It could not be said that the mast had no value, or that it was impossible to be saved. There was a chance of saving it, and that chance was thrown away for the safety of the whole adventure. The master would seem to have exercised his judgment reasonably, and it was not necessary that his view should be borne out by the facts when they came to be afterwards examined. It was found when the cargo was discharged that the mast had been in no greater peril than the rest of the adventure. It had broken across about 12in. from the keelson. The upper portion had crushed into the lower in telescope fashion and rested firmly and securely on the keelson. For the defendants reliance was placed on the case of Shepherd v. Kottgen (ubi sup.), where the mast was cut away but was held to be already lost. There it appeared that the rigging had been loosened in the storm, and that all that was done was to anticipate by a few minutes an inevitable loss. The mast of the Airtie before the rigging was cut was firmly upheld, and could have stood and been saved if the master had not ordered it to be cut away. Upon the question of fact I am of opinion that was a general average sacrifice.

Q.B. Div.]

THE HOLAR.

[ADM.]

But the underwriters relied upon another defence which raises a question of great importance. It was said that the loss of the mast did not give rise to a general average claim because the ship and the cargo both belonged to the plaintiffs, and, as there could be no contribution in fact, there was no general average loss. The defendants relied on the case of The Brigella (ubi sup.) which was said to be a judgment in favour of their contention. It was pointed out, however, that the opinion of the learned judge was not necessary to his decision, and I was asked to hear the case argued and give my judgment upon the matter. I feel compelled to do so, though I have great reluctance to express an opinion on the matter which differs from that of Barnes, J. The duty has been probably imposed upon me in order that, if the case should go further, it may be more readily dealt with when the different views which have been held on this subject have been formally stated. It seems to me that a general average act is not affected by the consideration whether there will be a contributor or not. The sacrifice is made for the safety of those on board as well as of the ship and cargo. But there is no contribution from those whose lives have been saved. Further, in such a case it has never been held, or, so far as I know argued, that as between ship and freight there is no distribution of loss among the respective underwriters, because both interests belong to the shipowner. It was not disputed that in the case of general average expenditure, as for instance, in the hire of a tug to extricate a ship from a dangerous position, there was a right to demand contribution from underwriters. The explanation offered on behalf of the defendants was that such expenditure was recoverable under the sue, labour, and travel clause. But that clause, it seems to me, stands clear of the insurance against general average sacrifice. Its object is explained by Lord Blackburn in Aitchison v. Lohre (ubi sup.). It was not intended that the clause should afford an additional remedy for what was already sufficiently protected. Again, what is sacrificed in general average ought, in my judgment, to be treated in principle as lost by the peril averted. In the present case the loss of the mast must be regarded as a loss by perils of the seas—a loss not altered in its character by reason of a voluntary act intended to prevent more disastrous consequences. Accordingly, it has been held that a loss by general average cannot be added to a loss to the full amount insured so as to cast a further liability on the underwriter: (see Aitchison v. Lohre, ubi sup.). One further consequence of the supposed rule would be that in a case of joint ownership a jettison of cargo would leave the underwriter on cargo liable for the whole amount, without any right of contribution; and the concealment of the fact that the owner of goods was also the owner of ship might be treated as an objection to the insurance on the ground of concealment of material fact. Here the policy of insurance is a policy against general average due to perils of the seas, and other losses of the same character; and if there were any question as to whether this loss was covered as general average, it is certainly a loss of the same character. Although the point has not been dealt with in any other case than that of The Brigella (ubi sup.) there is considerable authority for saying that the liability of the underwriter is not affected where insured interests are joint—Oppenheim v. Fry (ubi sup.), per Blackburn, J.; the two American cases, Potter v. Ocean Insurance Company (ubi sup.) and Greely v. Tremont Insurance Company (ubi sup.), and Phillips on Marine Insurance, ss. 1274 and 1412. A man of business desirous of keeping a strict account of his transactions would allocate such a loss as this to his interest in ship and cargo in proportion to their respective values. There seems no reason why his underwriter should not be placed in the same position. It was agreed that the figures should be settled between the parties when the question of principle was determined. I give judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

Judgment for the plaintiffs for 227l. 17s. with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, W. A. Crump and Son.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Oct. 30 and Nov. 5, 1900.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE HOLAR. (a)

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Blyth harbour—41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi., s. 6—River Tyne Pilotage District.

Sect. 6 of 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi., which made pilotage compulsory on foreign vessels coming in or out of the port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, or any of the creeks and members thereof, applies to the port of Blyth, and is still unrepealed in respect of such vessels coming in or out of Blyth.

THIS was a collision action brought by the owners of the steam-tug George Peabody against the Norwegian steamship Holar, which at the time of the collision was called the Vadso.

The collision occurred on the 15th Feb. 1896, at about 2 a.m., inside Blyth harbour. The George Peabody at the time was made fast close astern of the steamship Volturno and was helping to steer her as she entered the harbour. Whilst so doing the Holar was seen coming down the river, outward bound from Blyth to Bandholm. She passed the Volturno safely, but came into collision with the tug. The Holar at the time was in charge of a pilot of the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

The case was tried before Barnes, J. on the 30th Oct., and, after hearing the evidence, he held that the collision was due to the negligence of the pilot on board the Holar, and reserved the question whether or not she was compulsorily in

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE HOLAR.

[ADM.]

charge of a duly qualified pilot for further consideration.

This question was argued before him on the 5th Nov. One of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House of the port of Newcastle was called by the defendants, and produced the charter of James II. and other records to prove that the port of Blyth was a member of the port of Newcastle.

The plaintiffs also called a witness to prove that foreign vessels had been known to go in and out of the port of Blyth without taking a pilot.

The charter referred to was granted to the Trinity House of Newcastle by James II., and is dated the 26th July 1687 (Patent Roll, 2 James 2, part 7, No. 20). A copy of it is to be found set out in the appendix of Brand's History of Newcastle, vol. 2, p. 709.

The charter is granted to "the company, mistery, and brotherhood and society of shippmasters, pylots, and seamen within the town and port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne," and constitutes them a "body corporate by the name of Master Pylots and Seamen of the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne," and gives them jurisdiction over "the river of Tyne, the creeks or members of the same (that is to say), Blyth, Sunderland, Hartlepoole, Whitby, and Steaths, and all other creeks and members belonging to the said port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne."

It then goes on to give the corporation power to appoint pilots, who shall have the exclusive right to pilot vessels, and provides that

All masters or owners of any strange ships which shall at any time or times hereafter resort or come into our said port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne or any the creeks or members of the same shall take in and receive on board the same pylotts. . . . And if such strangers or any of them shall refuse, denie, or neglect to take on board their said ships or vessels the said pylotts so to be appointed as aforesaid they shall nevertheless answer and pay . . . the several duties for pylottage hereinafter mentioned as if they had taken in such pylotts.

41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi., s. 6, is as follows :

And be it further enacted that the owners or masters of any foreign ships or vessels resorting to, or coming into, or departing from the said port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, or any of the creeks or members belonging thereto, shall, and they are hereby obliged and required respectively to receive, take on board, and employ in the piloting and conducting such their ships or vessels, such pilots to be licensed as aforesaid; and in case of their neglect or refusal to receive and employ such pilots as aforesaid, they shall severally, nevertheless, answer and pay to the master, pilot, and seamen the aforesaid pilotage duties, and the same shall be recoverable in the same manner as if such pilots had been actually received and employed: Provided always that nothing in this Act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to oblige or compel the owners or masters of any British ships or other vessels to employ or make use of any pilot or pilots in piloting or conducting such ships or vessels, if they shall not respectively be amended or desirous so to do.

By sect. 332 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) :

Every pilotage authority shall have power by bye-law made with the consent of Her Majesty in Council to exempt the masters of any ships, or of any classes of ships, from being compelled to employ qualified pilots, and to annex any terms or conditions to such exemptions, and to revise and extend any exemptions now existing by virtue of this Act or any other Act of Parliament, law, or charter, or by usage, upon such terms and conditions and in such manner as may appear desirable to such authority.

In 1883 a code of bye-laws relating to pilotage in the port (inter alia) of Blyth was made by Order in Council by virtue of the provisions of sect. 333 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104).

Aspinall, Q.C. (with him Dr. Stubbs) for the defendants.—Pilotage is compulsory on foreign vessels coming in and out of the port of Blyth. This compulsion, which had previously been contained in ancient charters, was provided for by sect. 6 of the Act 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi. That section, so far as it is applicable to Blyth, has not been repealed.

Laing, Q.C. and Balloch for the plaintiffs.—Although pilotage was originally compulsory upon foreign vessels coming in or out of the port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne and its creeks and members, such compulsion has under the powers of the Merchant Shipping Acts been removed. In The Johann Sverdrup (56 L. T. Rep. 256; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 73; (1886) 12 P. Div. 43) it was held that compulsory pilotage had been abolished in the river Tyne by the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 (28 Vict. c. 44), which confirmed a provisional order which had been made. That Act transferred the powers of the Trinity House of Newcastle to the Tyne Pilotage Commissioners. The jurisdiction of the Newcastle Trinity House in regard to other places originally within its jurisdiction has also been taken away from time to time. So with regard to Blyth the new bye-laws made under the Order in Council of 1883 were meant to repeal the compulsion contained in 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi. Such bye-laws contain provisions which are inconsistent with the idea of pilotage being compulsory at Blyth.

Aspinall, Q.C. in reply.—The bye-laws relied upon as relieving foreign ships from compulsory pilotage were made under the powers of sect. 333 of the Merchant Shipping Act. Had they been intended to abolish compulsory pilotage, the Order in Council would have referred to sect. 332, which is the section giving pilotage authorities power to exempt ships from compulsory pilotage, whereas it only refers to sect. 333.

Reference was also made to

The Maria (1839) 1 W. Rob. 95;

The Vesta (1882), 46 L. T. Rep. 492; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; 7 P. Div. 240.

BARNES, J.—In this case there was a collision between the steam-tug George Peabody and the steamship Vadso on the 15th Feb. 1896, and the question of the blame in connection with the case was tried before me lately. I held that the collision was caused by the fault or neglect of the pilot of the Vadso, which vessel is now called the Holar, and the question was reserved for consideration whether the pilot of the Vadso was employed by compulsion of law. If he were so employed it would mean that the defendants would not be held responsible for the collision; whereas if he were not compulsorily employed he would be treated in law as their servant, and they would be held responsible. Now, the defendants assert that the pilot was compulsorily employed

ADM.]

THE HOBAR.

[ADM.]

by virtue of the 6th section of 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi. [His Lordship read it.] There are two matters to state in connection with that section. The first is that the Vadso was a foreign ship—she was a Norwegian steamship—and the second is that it has been proved that the port of Blyth, in which this accident happened, was at the time of this collision “one of the creeks or members of the port of Newcastle,” within the meaning of the section to which I have referred. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, assert that pilotage is no longer compulsory in the port of Blyth, by reason of a change in the regulations affecting the port, which they contend has had the effect of abolishing compulsory pilotage in that port. The question, I think, would perhaps have been more accurately disposed of by me if I were to reserve my judgment and express it more closely and clearly, but at the same time I have formed a definite view about the point, and I do not think I should serve any useful purpose by considering the matter further. I propose to deal with it at once. The point made by the defendants may be shortly stated to be this, that there was originally by the Act of 1801 compulsory pilotage established over the Tyne and various creeks or members belonging to the port of Newcastle, and that nothing has since taken place to repeal or vary the section to which I have referred, so far as compulsory pilotage in Blyth is concerned, since the Act was passed. The case for the plaintiffs seems to be this, that what has since taken place is sufficient to repeal the section in question, so far as it relates to compulsory pilotage, and that now, therefore, pilotage is no longer compulsory. The point which is made on the part of the plaintiffs is that by virtue of sect. 333 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, repeated by another section in the Act of 1894, there has been a new code relating to pilotage established which has the effect of repealing sect. 6 and making pilotage no longer compulsory. There appears to be no doubt about this, that originally the port of Blyth formed part of the port of Newcastle so far as this matter of pilotage was concerned, and that from time to time in late years the Act of 1801 and the jurisdiction of the Trinity House at Newcastle-on-Tyne has been affected by taking out of that Act various ports, among others Newcastle itself, and constituting fresh authorities for the purpose of dealing with pilotage within the various ports. But that has not been done with regard to Blyth. Blyth remains as it was under the Act of 1801, unless it has been affected in the way the plaintiffs contend by the bye-laws made in 1883, pursuant to the 333rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act. There is another section which has been considered—namely, sect. 332, which gives power to pilotage authorities to make and extend exemptions from compulsory pilotage. It is to be noticed that the 333rd section, under which the bye-laws of 1833 were made, does not deal with the question of compulsory pilotage at all, but deals, among other things, with the power to alter and reduce the rates of pilotage. I think it is clear, when those bye-laws are considered, that there is nothing whatever in them which purports to deal with the rights conferred under sect. 332, although there is to a certain extent a change in the rates, for whereas under the Act of 1801 there was a difference between the rates on British and foreign ships, all are put upon the same footing by the bye-laws of 1883. Taking the matter, therefore, as it stands as affecting the port of Blyth, there is nothing but the Act of 1801 and these bye-laws, and I can find nothing in these bye-laws which in any way modifies the obligation to employ a pilot imposed upon a foreign vessel by the Act of 1801.

But Mr. Laing, for the plaintiffs, says that if the case is decided upon the same lines as the case of The Johannes Sverdrup (ubi sup.), it follows that compulsory pilotage has been abolished so far as the port of Blyth is concerned. Now, the case of The Johannes Sverdrup (ubi sup.) was a case of a vessel in the port of Newcastle, and that port—or, to use precise terms, the Tyne—has been taken out of the operation of the Act of 1801 by reason of a provisional order embodied in an Act of Parliament of 1865, which contains a complete code of regulations respecting pilotage in the river Tyne. That provisional order was made by virtue of sect. 39 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, which enabled the Board of Trade, by provisional order, to, amongst other things, transfer pilotage jurisdiction and constitute new pilotage authorities, and to exempt from compulsory pilotage in any district, and so on. In 1865 there is to be found an Act of Parliament giving effect to a provisional order affecting the Tyne, which constitutes a body of commissioners for the Tyne, defines the pilotage district, transfers to the commissioners the jurisdiction vested in the Trinity House of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and provides for pilotage dues, and under sect. 16 provides that “Nothing in this order shall extend to oblige the master or owner of any vessel to employ . . . a pilot if he is not desirous so to do.” It was held in the case of The Johannes Sverdrup (ubi sup.) that that provisional order contained a complete code of regulations respecting pilotage in the river Tyne, and that its provisions superseded those of 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi.; and that, therefore, under sect. 16 of the schedule pilotage was not compulsory in the case of either British or foreign vessels in the Tyne. It seems to me that that case has no application to the matter before me, because it is dealing with the effect of an Act of Parliament confirming a provisional order, and is concerned solely with the effect and result of that provisional order and the Act confirming it. The present case appears to me to be entirely and totally different, because there is no provisional order, and no Act of Parliament varying the effect of the Act of 1801. There is only a set of bye-laws made by the pilotage authority still existing as far as the port of Blyth is concerned—the Trinity House of Newcastle-on-Tyne; and those bye-laws are made, and really only made, by reason of sect. 333 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, now continued by the later Act of 1894. The only other points which I think it necessary to refer to are these: It is said that by the terms of the bye-laws of 1883 themselves there has been an abolition of compulsory pilotage, and Mr. Laing relied upon the latter part of the 13th clause, which says that “the pilotage dues shall be paid to the sub-commissioners or to the pilot performing such pilotage within five days after the performance thereof.” He argued that as the pilotage dues are only to be paid to the sub-commissioners “after” the pilot has performed the pilotage duties they cannot possibly be paid where the pilot has not performed the duty, and that that implies that the dues cannot be compulsorily imposed. The language is nothing more than a repetition of what is to be found in the latter part of sect. 7 of the Act of 1801, and it is impossible to construe that section as taking away the compulsion imposed by sect. 6, merely because it speaks of the pilotage dues being paid within five days after the pilotage duties have been performed. Moreover it appears to me on the evidence which has been given that there is nothing to show that there has been any custom or usage with regard to the matter. It has been said that there are cases in which foreign ships have not been asked to pay after coming in or going out of port. That does not, to my mind, affect the legal question whether it is compulsory in law or not, and the conclusion to which I have come on the reading of these Acts of Parliament, and the orders and bye-laws, is that there is nothing to be found which in any way abolishes the compulsion imposed by sect. 6 of the Act of 1801, though there is a reduction of the rates in accordance with the powers conferred by the Merchant Shipping Acts. For these reasons I must hold that the pilotage in this case was compulsory by law, and that the defendants are exonerated from responsibility.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Ince, Colt, and Ince agents for W. Charlton, Blyth.

Solicitors for the defendants, Stokes and Stokes.

Monday, Nov. 5, 1900.

(Before BARNES, J.)

THE RUBY. (a)

Mortgage—Act of bankruptcy before mortgage—Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 36—Bankruptcy Act 1883, ss. 43, 44, 49.

Where a mortgage is granted on a ship after the mortgagor has committed an act of bankruptcy, in respect of which he is subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt, the mortgage is protected by sect. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act if the mortgagee had no notice of the act of bankruptcy at the date of the mortgage, notwithstanding the fact that the ship remains in the possession of the mortgagor up to the date of the receiving order.

Lyon v. Weldon (1824) 2 Bing. 334 followed.

THIS was a motion on behalf of a mortgagee of a British ship for an order that he was entitled to have paid out of court to him the sum of 221l. 17s. 8d., being the proceeds of the sale of the steamship Ruby.

The case is reported on other grounds in 78 L. T. Rep. 235 and 267; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 389 and 421; (1898) P. 52 and 59.

On the 1st Sept. 1897 the owner of the steamship Ruby mortgaged her to the plaintiff, and on the 2nd Sept. the mortgage was duly registered.

Shortly afterwards an action in rem was commenced in the Bow County Court against the owner of the Ruby by the owners of a skiff for damage by a collision, and on the 3rd Sept. the plaintiffs obtained judgment for 21l. 17s. 10d. debt and costs.

The owner of the Ruby having made default in payment a warrant of execution was issued, and the vessel was seized by the high bailiff of the Bow County Court.

The vessel was duly appraised and sold for 380l. on the 28th Oct., but the registrar of shipping at Newhaven refused to register the bill of sale except subject to the plaintiff's outstanding mortgage.

On the 23rd Nov. a receiving order was made against the mortgagor, the original owner, and the mortgagee exercised his power of sale under the mortgage.

The mortgagee having intervened in the collision action, in Jan. 1898 proceedings were taken before the President (Sir F. Jeune) (78 L. T. Rep. 267; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 389; (1898) P. 52), who ultimately set aside the sale by the mortgagee, upheld the sale by the bailiff, and ordered the proceeds to be brought into the High Court.

The mortgagee now claimed the balance of the fund in court as against the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor. The act of bankruptcy on which the receiving order was made was committed on the 7th July, and it was proved that at the date of the mortgage the mortgagee had no notice of any act of bankruptcy committed by the owner of the Ruby.

By sect. 36 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60):

A registered mortgage of a ship or share shall not be affected by any act of bankruptcy committed by the mortgagor after the date of the record of the mortgage, notwithstanding that the mortgagor at the commencement of his bankruptcy had the ship or share in his possession, order, or disposition, or was reputed owner thereof, and the mortgage shall be preferred to any right, claim, or interest therein of the other creditors of the bankrupt or any trustee or assignee on their behalf.

By sect. 43 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52):

The bankruptcy of a debtor, whether the same takes place on the debtor's own petition or upon that of a creditor or creditors, shall be deemed to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the act of bankruptcy being committed on which a receiving order is made against him, or, if the bankrupt is proved to have committed more acts of bankruptcy than one, to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the first of the acts of bankruptcy proved to have been committed by the bankrupt within three months next preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition; but no bankruptcy petition, receiving order, or adjudication shall be rendered invalid by reason of any act of bankruptcy anterior to the debt of the petitioning creditor.

Sect. 44. The property of the bankrupt divisible amongst his creditors . . . shall comprise the following particulars: (i.) All such property as may belong to or be vested in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, or may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge. (iii.) All goods being, at the commencement of the bankruptcy, in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt in his trade or business, by the consent and permission of the true owner, under such circumstances that he is the reputed owner thereof: Provided that things in action other than debts due or growing due to the bankrupt in the course of his trade or business shall not be deemed goods within the meaning of this section.

Sect. 49. Subject to the foregoing provisions of this Act with respect to the effect of bankruptcy on an execution or attachment, and with respect to the avoid-

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE SANTIAGO.

[ADM.]

ance of certain settlements and preferences, nothing in this Act shall invalidate, in the case of a bankruptcy (c) Any conveyance or assignment by the bankrupt for valuable consideration: Provided that both the following conditions are complied with—namely (1) the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, as the case may be, takes place before the date of the receiving order; and (2) the person (other than the debtor) to, by, or with whom the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction was made, executed, or entered into, has not at the time of the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time.

Laing, Q.C. for the mortgagee.—Sect. 49 is relied upon. This is not a case within sect. 44 (iii.) because at the commencement of the bankruptcy—viz., on the 7th July 1897—the bankrupt was not the apparent owner of the ship, but the real owner. Further, he could not be in possession of the ship with the consent of the mortgagee at the commencement of the bankruptcy since the mortgagee's title did not accrue until some time afterwards. Commencement of the bankruptcy means the date on which the act of bankruptcy was committed:

Lyon v. Weldon (1824) 2 Bing. 334.

Sect. 36 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 has reference only to acts of bankruptcy committed after the date of the mortgage, and refers only to properly registered mortgages. The effect of the section is to take registered mortgages out of subsect. (iii.) of sect. 44 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883.

Muir Mackenzie (Herbert Reed, Q.C. with him) for the trustee in bankruptcy.—The title of the trustee relates back to the act of bankruptcy, and the case does not come within sect. 36 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Sect. 36 only protects a mortgagee where the act was committed after the mortgage, and not, as in the present case, before it was committed. The mortgagee, however, claims the protection of sect. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883, and, that being so, if the case of Lyon v. Weldon (ubi sup.) is good law, the case of the trustee cannot be supported. That case has never been overruled, but has been subject to some criticism in Williams, L.J.'s book on Bankruptcy, 7th edit., p. 211.

BARNES, J.—If you cannot distinguish this case from the decision in Lyon v. Weldon (ubi sup.) I am bound to follow that authority. I think the money must be paid out to the mortgagee, and that there should be no costs—each party must bear their own costs.

Solicitors for the mortgagee, J. A. and H. E. Fanfield.

Solicitors for the trustee in bankruptcy, Trinder and Capron.

Nov. 5 and 6, 1900.

(Before BARNES, J. and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE SANTIAGO. (a)

Salvage—Pilot—Services beyond ordinary scope of employment—Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 593.

Where a pilot in charge of a ship engaged in salvaging another performed services which could not reasonably be considered to come within the scope of his contract as pilot, he was held entitled to receive salvage from the owners of the salvaged vessel.

Akerblom v. Price (44 L. T. Rep. 837; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 441; 7 Q. B. Div. 129) followed.

THIS was an action originally brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Portia for salvage services rendered to the steamship Santiago, her cargo and freight, in the North Sea on the 19th Oct. 1900.

The Portia was a steamship of 484 tons net and 773 tons gross register, and was on a voyage from Hamburg to London with a full general cargo, manned by a crew of seventeen hands all told, and carrying thirty-nine passengers.

About 7 a.m. on the 19th Oct., when about thirteen miles S.E. of Southwold lightship, she fell in with the Santiago, which was at anchor with her engines broken down.

The Santiago was a Spanish steamship of 2138 gross and 1360 tons net, and at the time was on a voyage from Bilbao to Newcastle-on Tyne with a cargo of ore, manned by a crew of thirty-six hands.

The agreed value of the ship was 13,000*l.*, of her cargo 7000*l.*, and of her freight 250*l.*

The weather at the time was a strong E.N.E. wind with a heavy sea, and the hawsers were with some difficulty made fast. Towing proceeded without event, and when inside the Shipwash the Portia was boarded by a pilot, Jonas Harrington.

In coming up the East Swin the plaintiffs' case was that the Santiago sheered badly, and on one occasion took a violent sheer and had to be turned round in order to be got on her course again.

When a little above the Nore a boat was let down by a rope to the Santiago, but, as it came alongside, the Santiago took a heavy sheer, causing the rope to slacken and foul the propeller of the Portia, and in consequence the boat was smashed, the engines of the Portia had to be stopped, and the Santiago overran her, causing the towing hawsers to get foul of her propeller.

At the trial leave was given to the pilot of the Portia to be added as a plaintiff for his alleged services in assisting to save the Santiago.

The pilot also claimed extra pilotage for leading in a vessel which had not a qualified pilot on board under sect. 593 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

The defendants admitted the pilot was entitled to extra pilotage, but not to salvage. It is on this question that the case is reported.

Sect. 593 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 is as follows:

If any boat or ship having on board a qualified pilot leads any ship which has not a qualified pilot on board

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TRIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE SANTIAGO.

[ADM.]

when the last-mentioned ship cannot from particular circumstances be boarded, the pilot so leading the last-mentioned ship shall be entitled to the full pilotage rate for the distance run as if he had actually been on board and had charge of the ship.

Butler Aspinall, Q.C. and Dr. Stubbs for all the plaintiffs.—The pilot is entitled to something more than mere remuneration for pilotage. The Santiago was damaged and sheered badly, and there was great risk of her coming into collision with the Portia, if not other vessels. Here the services were attended with such risk that the pilot could not reasonably be expected to perform them for the ordinary pilot's fees:

Akerblom v. Price, 44 L. T. Rep. 837; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 441; 7 Q. B. Div. 129.

The pilot was under no contractual obligations to the defendants, and rendered services to their property which, under the circumstances, amounted to salvage. The case is not governed by sect. 593. The right to salvage depends upon benefit conferred. The defendants have had the advantage of the pilot's local knowledge and experience and ought to pay for them.

Laing, Q.C. and Dawson Miller for the defendants.—The pilot was bound to go on board the leading ship as pilot. He could not in any sense be called a volunteer. It is undesirable that pilots should be allowed to recover salvage:

The General Palmer (1828) 2 Hagg. 176;
The Enterprise, 2 Hagg. (note), 178.

In this case he did nothing more than he was obliged to do under his contract of pilotage. The only claim he can possibly have is for extra pilotage under sect. 593 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

BARNES, J.—This is a claim for salvage made by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Portia, and by a pilot who was on board of her, Mr. Jonas Harrington, for services rendered to the steamship Santiago off the east coast on the 19th Oct. last. The Portia is a screw steamship of 484 tons net and over 700 tons gross register, and she was bound from Hamburg to London with general cargo and a crew of seventeen hands all told, and thirty-nine passengers. About seven o'clock in the morning she fell in with the Santiago about thirteen miles to the S.E. of Southwold. The Santiago is a Spanish steamer of large size—that is to say, 2138 tons gross register. She was bound on a voyage from Bilbao to Newcastle-on-Tyne with a cargo of iron ore and a crew of thirty-six hands. It appears that shortly before she was found the cover of her cylinder broke and other parts of the engines were damaged, so that her engines became useless. Thereupon she was brought to an anchor, it being feared that she might go ashore. Two of her anchors—a large anchor and a kedge—were lost, but she had others, and finally she was brought up with two anchors. There she was lying at the time when she was sighted by those on board the Portia. The Portia was asked by signal to assist, and did take this vessel in tow, but there was certainly considerable difficulty in doing it, in the course of which the Portia's anchor fouled the anchor of the Santiago, and the Portia's anchor and chain were lost. The weather had moderated from the time when the vessel first broke down, and it does not seem to have been of any very serious force whilst one vessel was in tow of the other. There is no doubt that in the course of the towage which took place from that spot to Gravesend the Santiago was sheering heavily all the time, and on one occasion took such a violent sheer that it was necessary for the Portia to make a complete sweep round in order to get on to her course again. The pilot stated in his evidence that the sheering was such that in the passing traffic there were occasions on which the lights, which ought to be expected from his vessel, were changed; in other words, that his own vessel was forced out of position somewhat so as to show a green light to other vessels when it should show a red light. Whether that could be guarded against by prompt action on the part of the Portia I am not quite sure, but that is what the pilot says about it. They finally got into the Thames, and there again there was considerable difficulty, because in coming to an anchor at the Nore the rope, attached to a boat, which was being passed between the two vessels was caught and drawn by the Portia's propeller, and the boat was smashed up. The mate and men in the boat were in the water for some time. The Portia also got her propeller foul, and there was some difficulty in getting it clear. Afterwards the Portia left the Santiago at anchor in the same place and proceeded to Gravesend, and there sent a tug down to the Santiago. That tug took the Santiago to Gravesend, and is to be paid by the owners of the Portia the sum of 75*l.* The result of the services is that the Santiago was brought successfully into the port of London, a distance altogether of seventy miles. The Portia sustained some delay, and having on board thirty-nine passengers she was anxious to get into port. She also incurred expense by the loss of her cable and anchor, and boat, and is liable to pay 75*l.* to the tug. Now, the principal points to consider are, first of all, the values, which are as follows: Santiago 17,000*l.*, her cargo 2000*l.*, and freight 274*l.*, making a total value of 19,274*l.*; Portia 13,000*l.*, her cargo 7000*l.*, and freight 250*l.*, total 20,250*l.* The other matters are the position and risk from which the Santiago was rescued. As I have said, she was thirteen miles to the south-east of Southwold, and was lying there helpless. It was absolutely necessary she should be got into safety. At the moment she was lying securely anchored, but it was the month of October, and it was uncertain what class of weather she might meet with if she remained there. It is true she was in the traffic, but what did help her helped her effectively into the port of London. With regard to the risk to the plaintiffs, there were several occasions on which the Portia was in trouble in rendering these services, as I have already pointed out in my summary of the facts; and it must be remembered that the Portia was a vessel carrying passengers and desirous of getting rapidly into port. I think, taking all the facts into consideration, that a sum of 1000*l.* is the proper award to make in this case.

The apportionment of that gives rise to one small question, and that is with regard to the services of the pilot. He has been added as a party to this case, and is making a claim for salvage. He has, I understand, made a claim, and been paid, for leading this boat, the Santiago, in, under sect. 593 of the Merchant Shipping Act,

ADM.]

THE ROMANCE.

[ADM.]

amounting to 13l. 9s. 6d. Whether he is entitled to make that claim or not I do not think it necessary for me to determine. He has had this money, and what I have to consider is whether he is entitled in the particular circumstances to make a claim for salvage remuneration. It is not necessary for me in this case to add anything to the judgment in Akerblom v. Price (ubi sup.). It is not at all desirable in general that a pilot taking charge of a vessel, even if she is in distress, coming into port, should be allowed to claim for salvage services, but that he can do so in some cases in pretty clear. I do not think either counsel has disputed this general proposition, which may be summarised from the question stated in Akerblom v. Price, and put into short form, namely, that if a pilot does render such services to a vessel in distress as no reasonable person, either owner or pilot, would consider ought to come within the scope of his contract, then there is no reason why he should not be paid some salvage reward, because he runs risk outside that which anybody has in contemplation. That does not show, at all, that in all cases where there is some risk he is to get salvage, because the circumstances may be covered by what is in contemplation; but the question comes to be this, Does he in any particular case run so much risk that he ought to receive some salvage in addition to what is considered to be pilotage reward? This is a peculiar case. The pilot was on board the towing ship and was engaged to assist her up the Thames. In doing so he had this other ship in tow, and I have asked the Elder Brethren whether they think, having regard to the facts, he ran more risk than anybody ought to consider is covered by the contract of pilotage, assuming there were one, which is not the case here—at least it is doubtful whether there is any contract. They think that to some extent the pilot did perform services entirely outside what it ought to be considered he ought to perform. I think that is pretty obvious, because it is not at all the case of a leading ship giving a guide to the other ship coming in, to which the 593rd section applies. It is a case where he is in charge of a leading ship which is fast to the other ship, and where it is shown that the leading ship is exposed to very considerable risk and danger with the traffic in the Thames—to risk of collision with that traffic. I think that having regard to the facts of this particular case the pilot is entitled to receive something beyond the money which he has been paid. I apportion the award in this way: I think the owners should receive the sum of 720l., the master 80l., the pilot 40l., and the crew 160l. according to their ratings, with this qualification, that the mate and two men who performed the boat service, and who at that critical moment were nearly drowned, should receive treble shares. The claim of the owners of the Portia must not be enforced unless they produce the receipt for the amount of 75l. paid to the tug.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Stokes and Stokes.

Solicitors for the defendants, W. A. Crump and Son.

Wednesday, Nov. 14, 1900.

(Before BARNES, J. and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE ROMANCE. (a)

Salvage—Tug towing vessel up to her anchor—Lights—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897—Preliminary definition—Arts. 3, 5, 11.

Tugs towing a vessel, which has her anchor on the ground, up to her anchor are steam vessels towing another vessel within the meaning of art. 3 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and must carry their side lights and their towing lights.

Semble, a vessel, which is held by her anchor, in the course of being towed up to it by steam tugs, is not a vessel being towed within the meaning of art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, but is a vessel at anchor, and must exhibit only her anchor light.

THIS was a salvage action arising out of services rendered by the plaintiff's steam-tug Knight of the Cross to the defendants' barque Romance, in the river Mersey, on the 13th Aug. 1900.

The facts of the case were as follows:—

The Romance was a barque of 596 tons, belonging to the port of Fredrikstad, in Norway, and at the time of the matters in question was on a voyage from Canada to Garston, in the river Mersey, laden with a cargo of timber. She was lying at anchor in the river, and the plaintiff's tug had been engaged to dock her. The tide at the time was flood running about six knots an hour, high tide being at 1.15 a.m. on the 14th.

At about 11.45 p.m. on the 13th the Knight of the Cross was towing the Romance up to her anchor, preparatory to docking her. She was fast on her port bow; another tug was fast on her starboard bow. The Romance was showing her anchor lights, but both the tugs had up their towing and under-way lights. While the tugs were so engaged the steamship Javary was carried by the tide across the bows of the Romance, and did her considerable damage. Both the tugs slipped their hawsers to avoid the Javary, and the Romance fell back upon her cable, which parted, and the salvage service, in respect of which this action was brought, was then rendered by the Knight of the Cross and other vessels. The service consisted in taking the Romance to some buoys, and subsequently into dock. The salvage service was not disputed by the defendants, but in their defence they pleaded as follows:

Par. 4. . . . The steamship Javary, of Liverpool, whilst proceeding up the Mersey, collided with the Romance, the two tugs (one being the Knight of the Cross) having slipped their ropes immediately before the collision to avoid danger of collision with the Javary. The said collision was caused by the negligence of those on board the said tugs in improperly exhibiting their under-way lights, and thereby misleading those on board the Javary.

Par. 9. As to the claim on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the tug Knight of the Cross, the defendants say that the said collision and damage and subsequent salvage services arose and were caused by reason of the negligence and misconduct of the plaintiffs or their servants in charge of the Knight of the Cross as alleged in par. 4 hereof, and by reason of such misconduct the plaintiffs are not entitled to salvage remuneration.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUITON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897 :

Preliminary Definition.—A vessel is “under way” within the meaning of these rules when she is not at anchor or made fast to the ground, or ashore.

Art. 3. A steam vessel when towing another vessel shall, in addition to her side lights, carry two bright white lights in a vertical line, one over the other, not less than 6ft. apart.

Art. 5. A sailing vessel under way, and any vessel being towed, shall carry the same lights as are prescribed by art. 2 for a steam vessel under way, with the exception of the white lights mentioned therein, which they shall never carry.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Hope for the plaintiffs.—The Knicht of the Cross was a steam vessel towing another vessel, and was therefore bound to carry her side lights as well as her towing lights. The Romance was a vessel under way, as her anchor was not holding her. The tug was not made fast to the ground or ashore. See the preliminary definition in the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897 :

The Esk, 20 L. T. Rep. 587 ; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 350.

Pickford, Q.C. and Miller, contra. — The Romance was at anchor ; that is, she was controlled by her anchor as is shown by her falling back upon it and parting her cable when the tugs slipped. Since she was at anchor the tugs were at anchor also, as a tug and tow are one. The object of having prescribed lights is to inform other vessels of the condition of the vessel showing them ; the side lights carried by the tugs were misleading. They referred to Marsden’s Collisions at Sea, 4th edit., p. 424.

Aspinall, Q.C. in reply.

BARNES, J. (after dealing with the facts, proceeded):—The salvage services are not disputed, except upon one ground, and that ground is that the collision between the Javary and the Romance was caused by the negligence of the people on board the tugs. Of course, for the purposes of this action, it means the negligence of the people on the Knicht of the Cross in improperly exhibiting their under-way lights. As I understand the facts, both tugs which were made fast to the sides of the Romance had their towing lights, and their side lights up, and the Romance herself had her anchor lights up at the time, and the point really made is one of law—at least, the principal point is—namely, whether the tugs had their wrong lights up in the circumstances, and therefore may be said to have contributed to the collision, by possibly deceiving, or, in fact, deceiving the Javary into treating the vessels as being really in motion, and able to move into the adjoining docks. Now, this point turns upon the construction of the rules with regard to lights. The facts are what I have stated. The tugs and the ship, having the lights which I have stated, had moved by the propelling power of the tugs up to a point nearly over the anchor of the Romance. I think it is not at all clear, because we have not had the people from the Romance called, whether the anchor of the Romance was actually holding or not. I think it is not necessary to find that fact specifically. I rather incline to the view that the anchor was still holding the ship, because when the jerk came afterwards which broke the cable the anchor must have been in the ground still. It is not quite clear on the facts whether the anchor was sufficiently free, but it is said in a sense not to have been holding the ship. I rather think it was, and therefore the ship for the purpose of the point I am going to decide the case upon was, still, within the meaning of the decision in The Esk (ubi sup.), at anchor.

Then it is said that the tugs ought not to have had towing lights and side lights, but only to have had anchor lights up. I cannot agree with that view of the case presented by Mr. Pickford. The object of the rules, so far as these lights are concerned, is to indicate to approaching vessels what those who are exhibiting the lights are doing ; and it seems to me as a matter of fact that in this case the lights exhibited showed exactly what they were in fact doing, namely, that the ship was still at anchor, and the tugs were towing her up to get her anchor. Moreover, the Elder Brethren advise me that it is the practice for tugs, when towing a ship up to her anchor to get it, to exhibit towing lights, while the ship would still have her anchor lights up. Then it is said, although that be so, yet according to the rules there is blame to be attributed to the tugs. The point in substance is this, that the tugs were at anchor and not under way, and should have had anchor lights up. Mr. Pickford says that the 3rd rule is not applicable, but that in effect the 11th rule is applicable ; that is to say, the anchor lights article. His contention is that the tugs ought to have carried the lights referred to in that article ; that they were not under way but were at anchor, having regard to the definitions in the preliminary article of the Rules and Regulations for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea. The other view, taken by Mr. Aspinall, is that the 3rd article applies, namely, that the tugs ought to have carried, as they were doing, the towing lights provided by art. 3, and that they were under way within the meaning of the rules. It seems to me that upon the true construction of the rules the tug in this case was, in the circumstances, towing the sailing ship, the Romance, and was under way within the meaning of the rules. In this case the question of what lights the ship herself should have had has not been argued—the question has been what lights the tugs should have had—but it is perhaps necessary to consider all the rules which relate to this question of lights in order to arrive at a clear conclusion upon it. My present impression is that the ship—though it is not necessary for me to decide it—had the right lights, and that art. 5 was not applicable to her ; that is to say, she was not a vessel being towed within the meaning of that article, because she was not, strictly speaking, under way. But I do not think it follows at all from that that the tugs may not have been towing her, and under the 3rd article. In fact, I think the tugs were towing her, and were under way. It seems to me that only by the most violent construction of the last paragraph of the preliminary clause can Mr. Pickford’s contention be maintained. That paragraph is “a vessel is ‘under way’ within the meaning of these rules when she is not at anchor or made fast to the shore, or aground.” It has to be said that the

ADM.]

THE CAMPANIA.

[ADM.]

tug in this case was at anchor. It is said so because, if the ship was at anchor, as the tug was attached to her, the tug is to be treated as using the ship's anchor as her own anchor, and therefore at anchor too, and should have had anchor lights up. It seems to me that that can only be arrived at by a most violent construction of that preliminary section. The tug in this case was not at her own anchor; but was she under control of the ship's anchor? I think not. She was in fact moving the ship up to her own anchor, and was under way for that purpose just as much as if she had been made fast ahead and was towing her, only connected by a towing hawser. I think it would be straining the interpretation of these rules and doing violence to the practice of the rule if I were to uphold that contention. It seems to me that the proper construction to place upon the rules is that the tug in this case was carrying proper lights, and that being so the defence upon that part of the case entirely fails. I cannot myself see, nor can the Elder Brethren, how it can be said that the carrying of these lights in any way contributed to the collision. What really seems to have been the case is that the other vessel was coming up on an extremely strong flood tide without sufficient allowance for the position of these vessels. [His Lordship then dealt with the merits of the salvage service, and awarded the sum of 175*l.*]

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Miller and Son, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Weightman, Pedder, and Weightman, Liverpool.

Nov. 13 and 20, 1900.

(Before BARNES, J. and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE CAMPANIA. (a)

Collision—Fog—Speed—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, art. 16.

A passenger steamship, fitted with twin screws, which was proceeding at the rate of nine and a half knots an hour in a dense fog, was held not to be going at a moderate speed, and to have committed a breach of art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, although it was proved that her engines were so constructed that she could not go slower.

That article is imperative, and therefore although such consequences as loss of handiness and the risk of loss of position may result from proceeding at a lower rate of speed, which may be attained by occasionally stopping her engines, considerations of that nature do not justify a vessel in proceeding at more than a moderate speed. As a general rule, speed such that another vessel cannot be avoided after being seen is excessive.(b)

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b) This is the first case decided under art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897 as to the meaning of "moderate speed." The corresponding article (art. 13) of the 1884 Regulations was as follows: "Every ship, whether a sailing ship or steamship, shall, in a fog, mist, or falling snow, go at a moderate speed."—ED.

THIS was an action for damages arising out of a collision between the plaintiffs' barque Embleton and the defendants' steamship Campania. The facts are fully stated in the judgment of the learned judge, those material to the principal question for decision being shortly as follows:—

The collision occurred at about 8.30 a.m. on the 21st July 1900 about twenty-six miles north-east of the Tuskar light in the Irish Channel. The weather at the time was a dense fog. The Campania, which was a large Cunard passenger steamship fitted with twin screws, ran through and sank the Embleton. She was proceeding up the Irish Channel on her voyage to Liverpool from New York at a speed of 9.23 knots an hour with her engines working at dead slow. The plaintiffs charged the defendants with proceeding at too high a rate of speed in breach of art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, and the main question in the action was whether in the circumstances that speed was a breach of the regulation.

By the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, art. 16:

Every vessel shall in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain storms, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions.

A steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (with him Laing, Q.C. and Bateson), for the plaintiffs, contended that nine and a half knots an hour was not a moderate speed as required by art. 16, and that, even though, as contended by the defendants, it might have been safer for the Campania that she should not proceed at a lower rate, yet that argument, being in face of the wording of the article, could not prevail.

Pickford, Q.C. (with him Butler Aspinall, Q.C. and Batten) for the defendants.—The Campania had a duty to proceed at moderate speed, but, in determining what is moderate, regard must be had not only to the safety of other vessels, but also to her own safety, and in the case of a vessel like the Campania, which carried about 1600 people, a master's first duty is to consider the safety of his own ship. It is submitted that, as the collision occurred in the open sea and the Campania could, from a speed of nine and a half knots, bring herself to a standstill in a little more than her own length, her speed was in fact moderate; but, if not absolutely moderate, it is submitted that it was moderate having regard to existing circumstances and conditions. The Campania will not steer well at a lower rate of speed. If her engines are stopped from time to time, as was suggested, there is danger of her losing her position, which should not be run seeing the number of lives she carries.

Walton, Q.C. in reply.

The following cases were referred to:

The Resolution, 60 L. T. Rep. 430; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 363;

The Pennsylvania, 22 L. T. Rep. 55; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 477;

The Irrawaddy, Marsden on Collisions, 4th edit., p. 439.

ADM.]

THE CAMPANIA.

[ADM.]

Nov. 20.—BARNES, J.—This case arises out of a disastrous collision which occurred about half-past eight on the morning of the 21st July last, about twenty-six miles N.E. of Tuskar, between the barque Embleton and the steamship Campania, and resulted in the total loss of the Embleton and the loss of the lives of eleven of her crew. The Embleton was a barque of 1196 tons register, and at the time of the collision was proceeding down St. George's Channel on a voyage from Liverpool to New Zealand, laden with a general cargo, and manned by a crew of eighteen hands all told. The Campania is a twin-screw steamship of 12,950 tons gross and 4974 tons net register. She was bound from New York to Liverpool with a large number of passengers, mails and general cargo, and manned by a crew of 417 hands all told. The weather at the time was a dense fog. The barque was sailing close-hauled on the starboard tack, under reduced sail, heading about S.  $\frac{1}{2}$  E. by compass, or about S.S.E. true, making about two knots an hour through the water, and her witnesses stated that her fog-horn was being regularly sounded one short blast in accordance with the regulations. According to the account of these witnesses the whistle of the Campania was heard a long way off, broad on the starboard side, and each time it was heard it was answered by the fog-horn. The Embleton was kept on her course and the Campania drew nearer until she came into sight, distant about half the length of the barque, right abeam, and almost instantaneously struck the barque nearly at right angles, went right through her, and sank her, the master and ten of the crew being drowned, while the rest were saved by the boats of the Campania. The steamer's witnesses stated that she was proceeding with her engines working at slow, making between nine and ten knots an hour on a course of N. 35 E. true. Her whistle was being continuously sounded a long blast every minute. Her master, Capt. Walker, who has been in the Cunard service for thirty-three years, and has crossed the Atlantic 124 times in her, without any previous accident, was on the bridge with the first officer and extra second officer. There was an A. B. on the look-out in the crow's nest on the foremast, who had been at sea for seven or eight years, and had made three voyages in the Campania, and a man on the fore-castle head who had been shipped through the shipping office for seamen in New York, but had not been at sea before, though Capt. Walker stated that the shipping office guarantees to the company that the men shipped are seamen or firemen, as required. While thus proceeding, those on board the Campania made out the loom of the barque about 150ft. from the steamer's bows. The look-out-men reported her, and she was seen almost at the same time from the bridge. The engines were at once reversed full speed astern, and the helm put hard a-starboard, but the collision happened almost immediately. The boats of the Campania were in the water in less than three minutes, and those of the barque's crew who were rescued were picked up by them. No sound of the barque's fog-horn was heard by anyone on board the Campania, neither before nor after the barque came in sight, though the witnesses for the barque stated that it was being regularly sounded, and that from the moment of the Campania's coming into sight it was sounded continuously. The only charge made by the defendants against the barque was that her fog-horn was either not being sounded at all or not efficiently sounded. The fog-horn on the barque was a mechanical fog-horn of the kind known as "Norwegian" fog-horns. One similar to it was produced in court. It had been surveyed and passed in London about Nov. 1898 by Capt. Rice, Board of Trade surveyor, and appears from the evidence to have been kept, and to have been at the time of the collision, in good working order. The Elder Brethren advise me that this class of fog-horn is efficient, as required by art. 15. I find that there was nothing the matter with the fog-horn, and further, after seeing the plaintiffs' witnesses and hearing their evidence, I am satisfied that it was being duly and properly sounded as required by the regulations. It is said by the defendants that this cannot have been the case, because no one on the Campania heard it, though those on duty on board her were fully on the alert. But the fact that the sound of the fog-horn does not appear to have reached the ears of those on board the Campania is not sufficient to override the positive evidence of the witnesses from the barque that it was properly sounded. The Elder Brethren advise me that, as a matter of experience, sound signals in a fog are not always to be heard as they might be expected to be, and especially by persons on steamers approaching at considerable speed, and sounding their own fog whistles, and that this makes it all the more necessary that the speed of vessels in a fog should be moderate, as provided by the 16th article. I am of opinion that the Embleton is not to blame for this collision.

The case made against the Campania is that she was guilty of a breach of art. 16 in that her speed was excessive in the circumstances. No other point was suggested against her, and I think it is clear that, apart from this question of speed, no precautions were neglected on board her to insure the safety of the large number of persons and valuable property intrusted to the care of her experienced commander. The 16th article is one of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which apply everywhere at sea to British vessels and the vessels of all the principal maritime nations. This article is as follows: [His Lordship read the article.] What is a moderate speed depends on the existing circumstances and conditions in each case. In this case the fog was very dense, and there is no dispute about the speed of the Campania. It is pleaded by the defendants that from nine to ten knots. Capt. Walker said that calculated from the revolutions of the engines the speed worked out at 9.23 knots. It seems to have been somewhere between nine and ten knots at the time. The engines were working at slow. The contention on the part of the defendants was that for the Campania this speed was a moderate speed in the existing circumstances and conditions. The evidence of Capt. Watson, the general superintendent of the company, was to the effect that at sea the Campania could not be safely navigated at less speed, for that if she were she would not steer properly and there would be uncertainty about her course and the distance run; and, further, that being a twin-screw steamer she could be brought to a standstill in a very short distance by reversing her engines full speed astern. Three methods of reducing her speed still further were suggested by the plaintiffs. First, that she could be worked with one engine; to which it was answered that in that case her helm would have to be kept hard over against the screw which was working, and that she could only keep her course then with the engine working full speed, which would give her about thirteen or fourteen knots an hour; and that if the one engine were worked slowly her course could not be relied on. Secondly, that her vacuum could be cut off in a manner explained by the witnesses and stated to be done when she is engaged in docking. To this it was said that it would not be practicable at sea, as it would prevent her from properly reversing her engines in an emergency, and her steering would be affected if the speed were below nine knots. Thirdly, that she could work her engines at slow and stop from time to time, so that her speed could be kept down to a very low rate. The objection made to this course was that in a run of any distance in a fog, for instance from Tuskar to the Skerries, where she would be crossing the tide, it would not be possible to ascertain with reasonable certainty the distance the vessel had run, nor the course which she had actually made, and that, therefore, her safety and that of those on board of her would be imperilled. I do not think it is necessary to criticise the first two suggestions and the objections thereto. The third is sufficient for the purpose of my judgment. Moreover, it is one of general application, and has formed the subject of consideration in previous decided cases. In the case of The Irrawaddy (ubi sup.), in 1887, where a collision occurred in the channel between the Mull of Galloway and Port Patrick, in a thick fog, this vessel was going at 6.5 knots an hour, and was condemned under the rule which corresponded to the present 16th article. Lord Hannen, in the course of his judgment, said: "I should add that, so far as I am able to form an opinion on this matter, it seems to me quite untenable to argue that a vessel is justified in going at the lowest rate she is constructed to go at, if that is not a moderate speed. It appears to me that if a vessel is so constructed that she cannot go at a moderate pace, she must take the consequences. I quite accept the view that there is great difficulty in dealing with a vessel by checking her speed from time to time—that is, by stopping and taking the way off her, and that it has a tendency to throw a vessel out of her course and leads to difficulties. Yet I have to deal with the matter as a lawyer, and I have to say what is a moderate speed; and I say if it be necessary to reduce the speed of a vessel below that which is its lowest speed, though it may cause inconvenience, yet it must be done in what appears to be the only practical way of doing it—namely, by stopping from time to time." Again, in the case of The Resolution, in the year 1889 (ubi sup.), the Sesostris, going against a two and a half knot current in the Straits of Gibraltar at a speed of five knots an hour, in a dense fog, was held to blame for excessive speed by Sir Charles Butt, who made the following remarks in part of his judgment: "I know it is said, and nearly always said in these cases, that large steamers cannot go below a certain rate, because, apart from the question of steege way, the revolutions would be so slow that the engines would stop on the centre. . . . But if a vessel cannot reduce her speed sufficiently with the continuous action of her engines, and therefore cannot go at what would be a reasonable speed in a fog without occasionally stopping her engines, it is her duty to occasionally stop them. Masters can always carry out the manœuvre in that way, and I will not yield to what I know is the strong disinclination of the masters of these large vessels to stop their engines. They hate and abhor the very idea, but it is to my mind their duty to do so if they cannot otherwise reduce their speed sufficiently." The following observations made by Lord Romilly in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of The Pennsylvania in the year 1870 (ubi sup.), where a collision occurred about 200 miles east of Sandy Hook between a barque and the steamship Pennsylvania, which was going at seven knots an hour in a thick fog, and whose master alleged that no less a speed than that would have enabled him to keep the vessel under command, are also in point: "Their Lordships do not mean to lay down what rate of speed would have been proper under these particular circumstances; in some cases four knots an hour and in others three and a half knots an hour have been held to be an improper rate of speed; it always must have reference to the peculiar circumstances of the case. But their Lordships are of opinion that in a thick fog in the Atlantic Ocean, in the direct line to New York, about 200 miles to the east of Sandy Hook, where frequently there must be a great number of vessels congregated, seven knots an hour was too great a speed at which to proceed. It was argued that if their Lordships held that seven knots an hour was too great a speed at which to proceed in a thick fog in that position, it would paralyse all the efforts of mercantile transactions, and that neither passengers nor goods could be properly conveyed across the Atlantic with a due regard to business and trade. Their Lordships do not concur in that argument, and are of opinion that the lives of passengers and the safety of goods must be protected in the first place. Their Lordships are of opinion that, even if these fogs should last longer than they are said to do, still the steamers must abate their speed, and that if they do not they must take all the consequences of a collision." I have expressed myself much to the same effect in the case of The Germanic, reported in the Times of the 22nd Feb. 1896. Now the Elder Brethren are of opinion, and I agree with them, that a speed of nine knots an hour in such a fog as that which prevailed on the present occasion is a greatly excessive speed for any steamer to proceed at. At such a speed it is practically impossible to take effective steps to avoid doing damage to another vessel after she is seen only 150ft. off, ahead; and as a general rule speed such that another vessel cannot be avoided after being seen is excessive. See the City of Brooklyn (34 L. T. Rep. 932; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 230; 1 P. Div. 276). The impact of a steamer, especially a large one, proceeding at a speed of anything approaching nine knots an hour upon another vessel is terrible. In the present case the Campania went right through the barque, cutting her in two, although the barque was fully laden, and part of her cargo consisted of pig-iron and bar-iron and felt, stowed in the part where she was struck. The advantages to be gained by a very slow speed as compared with greater speed are clear. One of the most important is that those on board a vessel proceeding at very slow speed have more opportunities, while traversing a given space, of hearing the sound signals of an approaching vessel than if their vessel were going faster. For instance, if a steamer proceeding at ten knots an hour had half a knot to traverse before reaching the spot where her course and that of an approaching sailing vessel would intersect, those on board of her would only have the chance of hearing about three sound signals from the sailing vessel, for the steamer would cover the half knot in three minutes, and the sound signals on the sailing vessel ought to be given at intervals of not more than one minute. If, however, the steamer were only proceeding at five knots an hour those on board her would have the chance of hearing six sound signals while covering the half knot distance. Moreover, it is obvious that at the slower speed more time is given to act for an approaching vessel when her signals are heard or she is seen, and that the way of a steamer is much more quickly taken off by reversing when she is going at slow than at a fast speed; and, even if a collision is not avoided, its consequences may be much less disastrous if the speed is very slow. The greater proportion of ordinary cargo boats—probably most of them—cannot attain a greater speed than from nine to ten knots when going at full speed. Such a steamer would be condemned for excessive speed if she ran at full speed into a vessel in a dense fog. These vessels, by working their engines at slow, can usually reduce their speed to about three knots an hour without any difficulty. The contention for the defendants comes to this, that as their vessel cannot, as they allege, go with safety to her navigation at less speed than about nine knots an hour, she is justified in keeping on at that speed in a dense fog. Possibly a similar contention would be made on behalf of a considerable number of the large and fast passenger boats of the day. The 16th article is imperative, and I believe it would be most dangerous, having regard to the traffic to be met with everywhere, especially near to the coasts, in crowded waters, if this contention were to be upheld. It is based on the supposed necessity of the Campania to keep the speed at which she was going for the safety of her own navigation. But I am advised that this basis is unsound. Capt. Watson himself stated that a fog may be so dense that it is not possible to see across the ship, and that in that case she would probably have to stop her engines. A special signal is provided by art. 15 (b) for such a case. The vessel's position afterwards would have to be ascertained by estimation, and soundings if possible. If the fog be not so dense as to require the vessel to stop, she can go at a moderate speed within the rules by going slowly ahead, and stopping her engines from time to time. The objection to this by the defendants is that she cannot then steer properly and ensure a good course and certainty as to the distance run; but the Elder Brethren advise me that unless there is something exceptional in the circumstances all that this might involve would be delay, and the taking of proper precautions to haul out from the coast, if approaching it, and for verifying her position, and that there was nothing in the circumstances or conditions of the present case to prevent the Campania from proceeding in this manner, and yet keeping sufficient steerage way. The court fully appreciates the anxiety of the defendants to ensure the safety of their vessels, passengers, and crews, and the desirability of completing the voyages without unnecessary delay, but the risk of collision between their vessels and others which they may meet with on their passages can be best averted by a strict adherence to the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, even though this may cause some inconvenience. Other dangers of navigation can be guarded against by proper precautions, even though there may be some delay caused by carrying them out. I am of opinion that the Campania was guilty of a breach of the said 16th article, and must be held solely to blame for the collision. I may add that I have made a search for decisions of foreign courts upon the subject under consideration, but with the time and means at my disposal I have been unable to find the reports of such decisions except some of those in the United States. I have referred to a number of cases decided in that country, and they appear to me to be in practical accordance with those of our courts. See especially the decisions of the experienced judge, Brown, J., of New York, in the Federal Reporter. Some of these cases are collected in Mr. Marsden's Book on Collisions at Sea (4th edit., pp. 434 et seq.), to which may be added The Martello (34 Fed. Rep. 71).

[ADM.]

THE CAMPANIA.

[ADM.]

ADM.]

THE WHITLIEBURN.

[ADM.]

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Batesons, Warr, and Wimshurst, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

Friday, Dec. 21, 1900.

(Before BARNES, J. and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE WHITLIEBURN. (a)

Collision—Narrow channel—Vessel turning round—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 25.

Art. 25 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is not infringed by a vessel turning round in a narrow channel whereby some portion of her length must necessarily during the process fail to remain on that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on her starboard side.

THIS was an action arising out of a collision which occurred on the 10th Aug. 1898 between the plaintiffs' steamship Fernlands and the defendants' sailing vessel Whitlieburn.

The following were the facts:—

The collision occurred in the river Scheldt, about 3.40 p.m., a little below the entrance to the Kattendyk Dock which is on the east side of the river. The Fernlands was a screw steamer of 2042 tons gross register, fitted with engines of 120 horse-power nominal, and was manned by a crew of twenty-one hands all told. She was on a voyage from Antwerp to Alexandria with a general cargo and was in charge of a duly licensed pilot. She had just come out of dock stern first and had straightened down the river on the east side. The Whitlieburn, which was a sailing

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TRIMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE MOURNE.

[ADM.]

vessel of 1874 tons register, manned by a crew of twenty-eight hands all told, was on a voyage from Tacoma to Antwerp with a cargo of wheat. She had been coming up the river in charge of a duly licensed pilot in tow of a tug, and when a little below the dock entrance had begun to turn round. Her precise position was a matter of conflict between the parties, but while she was more or less athwart in the process of turning, her head being to the westward, the Fernlands, which was above her in the river with her engines stopped, came ahead and attempted to pass her. The stern of the Whitlieburn at this time was to the east of mid-channel. The forward part of the Fernlands cleared the stern of the Whitlieburn, but her port side, about 25ft. forward of the poop bulkhead, collided with the Whitlieburn's port counter, and the Fernlands then scraped along and sustained damage to some 60ft. of her plating. The Whitlieburn also sustained damage for which her owners counter-claimed in this action.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants with (inter alia) failing to keep to that side of the channel which lay on her starboard band in breach of art. 25 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and it is upon the application of that article that this case is reported.

By art. 25 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

In narrow channels every steam vessel shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such vessel.

Laing, Q.C. and Roche for the plaintiffs.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Bateson for the defendants.

BARNES, J. (after dealing with the facts and the other points in the case) said:—Then it is said that there was a breach of a statutory rule, in that the Whitlieburn was guilty of a breach of art. 25 of the Sea Rules. I do not consider that that rule is at all applicable to this case. The vessel was swinging, and, in order to swing in a narrow place like this, she must turn round in the way she was turning round. The rule is not applicable to such circumstances. Several reasons might be given to make this clear; but it is enough to say that the Elder Brethren think it was not practicable to act upon it, and that it cannot, as a matter of seamanship, be applied to such a situation. The fact that the vessel may have been somewhat over to the east side is accounted for by the fact that the tide was setting her there, which would naturally occur in the course of the swing she was obliged to perform. The conclusion to which I have come is that the collision was due to the fault of the steamer alone, and that the Whitlieburn must be freed from blame.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Botterell and Roche.

Solicitors for the defendants, Downing, Bolam, and Co., agents for Downing and Handcock, Cardiff.

Jan. 15 and 16, 1901.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President, and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE MOURNE. (a)

Collision—Vessel acting under continuous starboard helm—Course authorised or required by rules—Duty to sound helm signal—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 28.

Art. 28 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is limited in its application, and only applies where a vessel is taking a course in order to give effect to the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea; hence where a vessel leaving dock under starboard helm sighted another vessel on her port bow and continued on her starboard helm, she was held not bound under art. 28 to give a two-blast signal.

THIS was an action arising out of a collision between the plaintiffs' steam flat the Bengal and the defendants' steamship the Mourne, which occurred at about 6.5 a.m. on the 17th Oct. 1900, on the eastern side of the river Mersey, between the entrances to the Salisbury and Clarence Docks. The plaintiffs' case was that the Bengal, which was a steam flat of 117 tons register, manned by a crew of three hands all told, and fitted with engines of 20 horse-power nominal, was proceeding from the north entrance to the Salisbury Dock with the intention of bringing up alongside the wall which runs to the Clarence Dock. The wind was light from about S.E., there was a slight haze, and the tide was high water slack, but with a drain of ebb running down the river wall. The Bengal left the dock under easy starboard helm, and when in the entrance saw the masthead and green lights of the Mourne and momentarily a glimpse of her red about two points on her port bow, distant about 400 yards, and at the same time heard a two-blast signal from her. The Mourne then shut in her red light, and the Bengal, swinging under her starboard helm, brought the Mourne's green light on to her starboard bow, so that the vessels were then in a position to pass starboard to starboard, but the Mourne suddenly reopened her red light broad on the Bengal's starboard bow and close to her. The engines of the Bengal were then put full speed ahead, but the collision occurred at about a right angle (as was found by the learned judge), the stem of the Mourne striking the starboard side of the Bengal with the result that the latter sank.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants (inter alia) with improperly navigating the Mourne too fast, and, in the circumstances, too close into the dock entrances.

The defendants' case, which agreed with that of the plaintiffs as to the weather, wind, and tide, was that the Mourne, which was a steamship of 228 tons gross, having a crew of eight hands and fitted with engines of 45 horse-power nominal, was outward bound from Garston. She was heading straight down the river, keeping to the east side of the channel, and was making about seven knots an hour through the water. When she was about half a mile above the entrance to the Salisbury Dock the masthead and red lights of the Bengal were seen leaving the Salisbury Dock, bearing

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., Q.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

ADM.]

THE MOURNE.

[ADM.]

nearly right ahead and about half a mile distant. Very shortly afterwards the Bengal opened her green light and shut in her red. The helm of the Mourne was then starboarded a little and her whistle was sounded two short blasts, but, when the Bengal had been brought about half a point on her starboard bow, the red light of the Bengal was again opened. The helm of the Mourne was thereon immediately ported and one short blast was sounded on her whistle and her engines were slowed, and, when the red light of the Bengal had been brought well clear on her port bow, her helm was steadied. The vessels were then in a position to pass clear, port side to port side, but, when only a short distance off, the Bengal again suddenly opened her green light. The engines of the Mourne were then reversed and her helm was put hard-a-port, but the collision occurred.

The defendants in their defence charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with improperly failing to indicate the course of the Bengal by means of her steam whistle, in breach of arts. 28 and 29 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

In the course of the argument the defendants also charged the plaintiffs with a breach of art. 23 of the said regulations.

By the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 23. Every steam vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another shall, on approaching her, if necessary, slacken her speed or stop and reverse.

Art. 28. . . . When vessels are in sight of one another, a steam vessel under way in taking any course authorised or required by these rules shall indicate that course by the following signals on her whistle or syren—viz, . . . two short blasts to mean "I am directing my course to port."

Art. 29. Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any vessel, or the owner or master or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen or by the special circumstances of the case.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Bateson for the plaintiffs.—The Mourne was to blame for (inter alia) proceeding down the river too close to the dock wall. It was high water at the time, when vessels were likely to be leaving the docks; she also failed to ease her speed or reverse her engines when the circumstances required it. The Bengal was not to blame for failing to sound the two short blasts. Art. 28 of the regulations is not applicable to the circumstances of this case. That article only applies when a vessel is adopting some course "authorised or required" by the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, whereas the Bengal was starboarding in the course of her voyage, and not for the purpose of avoiding the Mourne. When her helm was first starboarded she had not even seen the Mourne. After she had seen the Mourne, her starboarding was in reality a continuation of her course. In any event, the failure to sound the two-blast signal could not have contributed to the collision.

Baden-Powell, Q.C. and Miller for the defendants.—The Bengal is to blame for not giving the two-blast signal. In continuing under starboard helm, she was a vessel keeping her course under art. 21 of the regulations, and was therefore taking a course authorised or required by the regulations. If she was not keeping her course, then it was bad seamanship on the part of those navigating her not to indicate to the Bengal the course she was in fact adopting, and she must be held to blame under art. 29.

Aspinall, Q.C. in reply.

Sir F. JEUNE.—There is, I think, in this case a broad question of fact which substantially governs the whole matter. According to the account of the Bengal her action was an extremely simple one, and perfectly consistent with all that she wished to do. It is quite clear that her object was to come out of dock, and, making a turn as sharp as possible under the action of her starboard helm, to get to the place whither she wished to go. That is all she did. But the story told by the Mourne attributes to her, to my mind, a totally different course of action, because the case of the Mourne is that the Bengal got further out into the river and got herself into a position of being practically end on, and then was seen first on one bow and then on the other, backwards and forwards, under the influence perhaps of bad steering. That is a broad issue of fact. Which story is true? I have no doubt whatever that the story told by the Bengal is the true story. It appears to me that it is a mere question of evidence. In the first place the story told by the Mourne of the change of lights, backwards and forwards, is wholly impossible, having regard to the very short time at the disposal of the Bengal. But, on the other hand, when one looks at the conduct of the Mourne there are several things which appear to me to render her conduct open to a good deal of criticism. In the first place I accept the view of the dockmaster that the Mourne was coming down a great deal too near to the wall. I am not going to make that a substantial charge against her, that she was too much on her right side of the river, but what I think is to be emphasised is this, that if a vessel chooses, for purposes of her own, to come down so close to the dock wall as she did, and at the speed which she had on her, she renders it incumbent upon those on board her to keep an extremely vigilant look-out, especially as it is well known that vessels are in the habit of leaving the dock at that time of tide. It is sufficient to say that she seems to have thought it right to keep the mate on the look-out until she had passed the landing-stage, and then to have taken him off the look-out to assist in clearing up the deck forward. Although, no doubt, the captain on the bridge would be in a position to see, and did see, a good deal of what was going on ahead, still it appears to me that she was not being navigated with that extreme care which was incumbent upon a vessel which had voluntarily placed herself in that position. The question of speed is only important as emphasising the necessity of taking care. I believe, as I have said, the story of the Bengal to be true. On the other hand I think the Mourne, coming down the river outside her and having her on the starboard bow, for some reason or other, having before starboarded and blown a two-blast signal, just before the collision ported and perhaps gave a single blast, with the result that she ran into the Bengal, striking her on the starboard bow, practically a right-angle blow. It is not easy to see why the Mourne adopted this very much mistaken course; but that it was a much mistaken course appears to all of us to be the case, for if she had not struck the Bengal she would probably have run into the pier or dock wall. Therefore it is quite clear that her action in porting in the way she did was altogether a mistaken one. Having got so far, it is not necessary to speculate as to what the exact reason for her action was. It may be that having at first thought starboarding was the proper course to take, so as give the Bengal room to pass green to green, afterwards she may have thought that the Bengal was really going to cross the river into her proper water, across the bows of the Mourne, and so go up river. In those circumstances the Mourne may have made the mistake, by not watching very carefully to see what the action of the Bengal really was. The fact appears to be clear that when the vessels were green to green the Mourne thought proper to port her helm and to port into the green light of the Bengal. I have no doubt that was what happened, and she must be held to blame for it, although I am not able to say what her real motive was in so doing. That, to my mind, really determines the case. There is nothing else which is material. I am not going into the question whether the Mourne should have stopped sooner than she did. Her own story shows that at an earlier time than she did stop there was risk of collision which rendered it imperative to stop. But I do not dwell upon that because I cannot accept her story, I do not believe the lights were seen first on one bow and then on the other.

ADM.]

THE MOURNE.

[ADM.]

I must consider the charges made against the Bengal, apart from the main facts of the case. It is said she ought to have stopped and not gone on in the way she did, because when the collision became imminent she went on at full speed. That is undoubted. It is also said she ought to have given a two-blast signal at some time after altering her helm. With regard to going on at full speed instead of stopping, that is a matter of navigation upon which I have had an opportunity of consulting the Elder Brethren. The obligation is not now the same as it used to be. The obligation now is to stop if necessary or right to do so. Now, I am advised by the Elder Brethren that the action of the Bengal was on the whole the best in the circumstances that could have been taken. Placed in a position of great difficulty, and near to the wall on the one side, and with this vessel coming down upon her on the other, her only chance of safety, it appears to me, was to go ahead as fast as she could. There was a chance of her being able to avoid the collision if she could get across the bows of the Mourne, and that she nearly did so is clear, because she was struck a considerable distance from her stem. I do not think any substantial blame is to be attached to those on the Bengal for taking what appears to us to be their only practical chance of safety. The other point is somewhat more difficult, because it turns upon the construction of art. 28, but I think when one realises what the facts are, that is clear. Under art. 28, when vessels are in sight of one another, a steam vessel under way in taking any course authorised or required by these rules shall indicate that course by the following signals on her whistle or syren—viz., two short blasts to mean "I am directing my course to port," &c.

Now, it is said that the Bengal, when she was in sight of the Mourne, was a steam vessel under way in sight of another, and in taking the course she did ought to have indicated that course by two blasts. But when one considers the wording of this rule I am of opinion that it does not apply to the circumstances of this case. In the first place, the view which I take of the facts is that the starboard action of the helm of the Bengal had begun at some earlier time, before she left the entrance, and, as is said in the pleadings, she was coming out under easy starboard helm. That appears to me consistent with the short voyage she was on and the object which she had in view, and therefore I do not think circumstances ever arose in this case which would have compelled her to give the blasts indicated by this rule. I doubt very much whether when she started her course, so to speak, the vessels were in sight of one another; but certainly it does not appear to me to come within the rules because she was not, in so starboarding, taking a course authorised or required by the rules. She was taking a course for the purposes of her own voyage, and which had nothing on earth to do with the vessel approaching, and her action in starboarding as she did was not in any way taking a course authorised or required by the rules. Therefore it does not appear to me that this rule applies. Where it does apply is where a vessel, having a course and being on a course, is found varying it or making some alteration of it authorised or required by the rules. For example, if vessels are meeting end on and you port your helm in order to comply with the requirements of the rule then applicable; or, to take another case, where a vessel sees another on her starboard bow, and under the circumstances is required to keep out of the way; or, to take yet other cases, where the following vessel has to keep out of the way of the overtaken ship, or where a steamship has to give way to a sailing vessel. In all those cases the course is authorised by the rules, and if in so doing the vessel alters her course by the action of her helm she is required to give notice to the other vessel. Those are the sort of illustrations to be given to show that this rule does not apply where a vessel which is on any circular course, which she has adopted before, in order to reach the place she desires to reach, is keeping on on that course, acting the whole time under a starboard helm. I think that in such circumstances a state of things does not arise in which she is required to give notice to the other vessel by signals. That appears to me to be decisive of that point, and I need not pursue the further proposition, whether the absence of compliance with that rule contributed, or could have contributed, to the collision. I very much doubt whether it could have done so, because the real cause of the collision was the mistake made by the Mourne in porting her helm under the circumstances. In the circumstances of this case, which are of importance, there was no such obligation placed upon the Bengal to give the two-blast signal, as to render her liable for not giving it, and in those circumstances I have to hold the Mourne entirely to blame.

Solicitors: for the plaintiffs, Pritchard and Sons, agents for Batesons, Warr, and Wimshurst, Liverpool; for the defendants, Thomas Cooper and Co.

ADM.]

THE DEVONIAN.

[ADM.]

Jan. 31, Feb. 1, 4, 5, and 6, 1901.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE DEVONIAN. (a)

Collision—Tug and tow—Improper lights on tug—Liability of tow—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, Preliminary Definition, art. 3—Rules for the Navigation of the River Mersey made by Order in Council the 17th Sept. 1900, art. 4 (a)—Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 419 (4).

A steam-tug made fast to a vessel at anchor in the river Mersey ready to assist her if required is a steam vessel towing or attached for the purpose of towing or manœuvring her, and must at night exhibit the lights required by art. 4 (a) of the Mersey Rules.

In such circumstances the tow is responsible for the lights of the tug, and will be deemed to be in fault if the tug exhibit other lights, and the breach of the rule may have contributed to a collision between the tow and another vessel.

THIS was an action arising out of a collision between the plaintiffs' steamship the Veritas and the defendants' steamship the Devonian, which occurred at about 10.45 p.m. on the 12th Oct. 1900 in the river Mersey.

The facts of the case were shortly as follows:—

The Veritas was a Norwegian steamship, and had in the course of her voyage put into the river Mersey owing to her engines having broken down.

At the time of the collision she was lying to her anchor, having a tug named the Prairie Cock fast on her starboard side ready to assist her if required. The weather was fine and clear, and the tide was half flood, running about two knots an hour.

The Veritas was exhibiting two anchor lights in accordance with the special rules for the navigation of the Mersey—that is to say, a white light forward and a white light at the stern. The Prairie Cock was carrying the lights for a steamship under way—that is, her side-lights and mast-head light.

In these circumstances the Devonian, which was coming up the river in charge of a compulsory pilot and with a steam-tug fast ahead of her, ran into and sank the Veritas.

It was alleged on behalf of the Devonian that the Veritas was not exhibiting any or any proper or visible anchor lights, and that the under-way lights exhibited by the Prairie Cock were misleading; and that, if any fault was to be attributed to any person on board the Devonian, that person was the compulsory pilot.

The evidence showed that there had been a difference of opinion between the pilot and the master of the Devonian upon some questions of the navigation of the vessel, and that in some particulars, at any rate, the master had overridden the pilot.

The following were among the charges made by the defendants in their defence:

Par. 5. The Veritas was not exhibiting any anchor lights or any proper or visible anchor lights properly carried and showing as required by the regulations.

Par. 7. Those on board the Prairie Cock improperly exhibited wrong and misleading lights.

Par. 8. Those on board the Prairie Cock failed to obey arts. 4 and 6 of the Mersey Rules.

The learned judge found that the Veritas was exhibiting proper anchor lights and that they were burning sufficiently brightly, and that the Devonian was to blame for not having seen them. He also found that the pilot had not been properly assisted, and that the plea of compulsory pilotage did not avail the defendants.

The point on which this case is reported is whether the Veritas was liable for the improper exhibition of lights by those on board the Prairie Cock.

By the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 3. A steam vessel when towing another vessel shall, in addition to her side-lights, carry two bright white lights in a vertical line one over the other, not less than 6ft. apart. . . . Each of these lights shall be of the same construction and character and shall be carried in the same position as the white light mentioned in art. 2 (a), except the additional light, which may be carried at a height of not less than 14ft. above the hull. . . .

By the Rules for the Navigation of the River Mersey made by an Order in Council dated the 17th Sept. 1900:

Art. 4 (a). A steam vessel when towing another vessel or vessels, or when attached for the purpose of towing or manœuvring such vessel or vessels, shall carry the compulsory lights prescribed by art. 3 of the General Regulations.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60):

Sec. 419.—(1) All owners and masters of ships shall obey the collision regulations, and shall not carry or exhibit any other lights or use any other fog signals than such as are required by those regulations.

(4) Where in a case of collision it is proved to the court before whom the case is tried that any of the collision regulations have been infringed, the ship by which the regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary.

Laing, K.C. and Stubbs for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted that the Prairie Cock does not come within art. 4 (a) of the Mersey Rules. She was right in exhibiting the lights for a vessel under way; she was not at anchor (see the Preliminary Definition to the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea); she was not towing, but she was under way:

The Romance, 83 L. T. Rep. 488; (1901) P. 15.

If the lights of the Prairie Cock were improper, the Veritas is not liable for the negligence of her tug in the circumstances of this case. The relationship of master and servant did not exist. Even if the Veritas is responsible for the Prairie Cock's lights, the Mersey Rules have not the statutory sanction of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and, if they have that sanction, then it is submitted that the wrongful exhibition of under-way lights by the Prairie Cock could not possibly have contributed to the collision. A tow is not to be deemed to be in fault because her tug exhibits wrong lights.

Joseph Walton, K.C., Aspinall, K.C., and Glynn for the defendants.—The Prairie Cock was the servant of the Veritas, and the latter is liable for her default. The Prairie Cock should have been

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., K.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE DEVONIAN.

[ADM.]

carrying anchor lights or towing lights, and her failure to do so is a breach of a statutory rule for which the Veritas must be held to blame: (Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 419). It cannot be successfully argued that the Prairie Cock was not attached for the purpose of towing or manœuvring, and, if she was not, then she was moored to the Veritas, just as a vessel is moored to a buoy, and should have exhibited anchor lights. The Romance (ubi sup.) was decided before the Mersey Rules applicable to this case came into force. The question, then, is, Could these improper lights possibly have contributed to the collision?

The Funny M. Carvill, 32 L. T. Rep. 646; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 565; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 417.

[Sir F. JEUNE.—If the Veritas was carrying proper lights, is it material what lights the Prairie Cock was exhibiting?] It is submitted that the extra light might even then have been of importance and have influenced the navigation of the Devonian: (The Gannet, 82 L. T. Rep. 329; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 43). [Sir F. JEUNE referred to The Breadalbane (46 L. T. Rep. 204; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 505; 7 P. Div. 186).]

Laing, K.C., in reply, referred to

The Argo, 82 L. T. Rep. 602; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 74.

The following cases were also cited:

The Cleadon, 4 L. T. Rep. 157; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 41;

The American and Syria, 31 L. T. Rep. 42; L. Rep. 6 P. C. 127;

The Niobe, 65 L. T. Rep. 502; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 89; L. Rep. 13 P. 55;

The Quickstep, 63 L. T. Rep. 713; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 603; L. Rep. 15 P. 196;

The Mary Hounsell, 40 L. T. Rep. 368; L. Rep. 4 P. 204;

The E. A. Packer, 22 Fed. Rep. 668;

The Philadelphian, 82 L. T. Rep. 601; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 72; (1900) P. 262.

THE PRESIDENT.—This case raises one material question of fact, and one—perhaps two—questions of law, and I propose to give judgment upon all of them, although the question of law might perhaps be more elaborated, but the question of fact, which is really the governing and the main question, is one, as far as the statement of it is concerned, which is extremely simple. [His Lordship dealt with the facts and found that the Veritas was exhibiting proper anchor lights and that the Devonian was to blame for not making them out. He then proceeded.] One easily sees the reason, now that one knows what was going on on board the Devonian, why there should have been a failing in that respect, because I am afraid it must be said that the condition of things on board the Devonian was to some extent deplorable. She had a pilot on board, and it is clear there was a wrangle going on between the pilot and the captain. The rights and wrongs I should have thought were sufficiently clear, because it appears to me to be quite clear, when the pilot is on board, that it is his duty to take charge and give orders, and it is the duty of the captain and everybody else to obey those orders; and when the law recognises the freedom from liability of a vessel which has a compulsory pilot on board, it appears to me to imply not only that the pilot shall be there compulsorily, but in authority, because if he is not in authority and if it is a case of merely making suggestions which the captain may or may not follow, it appears to me the whole basis of compulsory pilotage disappears—that being the foundation of the English law which exempts vessels from liability if they have a compulsory pilot on board. Therefore I think in this case the pilot was altogether in the right and the captain of the Devonian in the wrong. But I need not trouble to deal with that matter. The pilot desired to turn the vessel at an earlier period than the captain thought right. The captain thought it was his duty to give orders and he did not desire it done, and the pilot gave way, and afterwards the pilot seems to have been inclined to put it on record in the document he made that he did not give orders but made suggestions, and one of those suggestions was of a very material kind—as to the action of the Hornby towing to the westward, which was not obeyed, but she went to the eastward, because she said she could not go to the west. Under those circumstances I need not go further into it. As we know, the lights of the tug of the Veritas were first made out just about the time the Hornby was attaching herself to the Devonian, and it may be that in the operation of getting attached, and by reason of the smoke of the Hornby, that some obstacle was presented to seeing the lights which may not have attracted so much attention as the green and red lights of the tug would be likely to do. Without going further into the matter, there are abundant reasons for thinking that there may have been causes operating upon the Devonian or upon those on board of her which prevented them from seeing the lights of the Veritas, which they certainly should have done. Therefore, my view is that the account of the Veritas ought to be accepted.

Now comes the further question, which is mainly a question of law (or perhaps there are two questions of law), and which is by no means so simple. The lights exhibited by the tug Prairie Cock on this occasion were the lights of a vessel under way—the masthead and side-lights—and the position of things was this: She was attached to the starboard side of the Veritas fore and aft by a 7in. hawser. It is said, and quite truly no doubt, that at the time she was not towing the Veritas; she was engaged rather to stand by her and be ready, and was paid a comparatively small sum for the purpose, than to actually assist her at the moment. The Veritas was riding to a single anchor. There may have been some reason for doubting whether she was holding the ground sufficiently. Under these circumstances the captain of the Veritas was anxious to engage the services of the tug in case anything went wrong with the anchor and the vessel required holding up, or perhaps to ease the strain on the anchor. I do not lay more stress upon the 7in. hawser than this, because it was a rope sufficiently strong to serve as a towing hawser if necessary, and under those circumstances she was lashed alongside the Veritas. Now was she within the rule of the Mersey, which I think has the statutory authority of one of the general regulations? I pause for a moment in passing to say I do not think that it is necessary to do more than to say that that is so. So far as I have looked into the question, the 4th rule of the Mersey is a rule which has the force of the general regulations—

ADM.]

THE DEVONIAN.

[ADM.]

I mean the same force, imposing a statutory liability upon the person who does not comply with the regulation. For this purpose I assume that is the case. Then I find the rule says: "A steam vessel when towing another vessel or vessels, or when attached for the purpose of towing or manœuvring such vessel or vessels, shall carry the compulsory lights prescribed by art. 3 of the general regulations." That is the two towing lights. Now was this vessel, the Prairie Cock, attached to the Veritas for the purpose of towing or manœuvring her? That is the first question which I have to decide. I have taken the opinion of the Elder Brethren upon it, and they think she was attached for the purpose of towing or manœuvring. I entirely agree with that view. She certainly was attached. I do not say there was any strain on the hawser, but she was there. What for? It is admitted for the purpose of rendering assistance if necessary. What assistance? Why, assistance in towing, in holding her up to her anchor and against the tide, supposing the vessel dragged; and therefore she was there, it appears to me clearly, not actually towing, not attached for towing, but attached for the purpose of towing if and when it was desired by the tow that she should do so. Therefore I cannot think that this article does not apply. I think it does, and therefore I think that the Prairie Cock ought to have exhibited her two towing lights.

Now there is a further question about which there has been a good deal of interesting discussion, as to whether this omission on the part of the tug might not possibly have contributed to the collision. That is a matter to which I have given a good deal of consideration. One has to start with the hypothesis that the Veritas was in fact exhibiting her proper lights, and therefore the question is, supposing the Veritas to be exhibiting her proper lights, but those not to have been seen by the persons on board the Devonian, can it be said, or ought it to be said, that the absence or failure to exhibit the two towing lights on the tug could have contributed to the collision in question? Now, for myself, I confess I do not think it can. I mean that the Veritas had sufficient indication in my opinion to have protected her from collision with another vessel. She was exhibiting the lights necessary for her to exhibit, and they ought to have been, and would have been, I think—if there had been a proper look-out on board the Devonian—sufficient protection to her from the Devonian coming into collision with her. Therefore I assume it may be said that no additional light was necessary, and I think it is sound to say that if sufficient lights are exhibited it is immaterial whether more lights are exhibited than would have been sufficient. It is not necessary to go elaborately into the authorities to establish that proposition, because there is authority for saying that if sufficient lights were exhibited it matters not whether another light is exhibited, which, although it ought to have been, could only have been somewhat superfluous, and was something which was not necessary. If authority is to be given for that, I should refer to the case of The Breadalbane (ubi sup.), which appears to me, and always has appeared to me to be perfectly good law, and perfectly sound, and, so far as I am able to judge, it has been upheld by a recent decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Argo (ubi sup.), which was an appeal from myself. I hope I am dealing correctly with that report. I have not been able to see the judgment, and have not read it, but I know what I decided myself, and as the Court of Appeal held the same view I know what they must have thought, because in the case of The Argo I was very much influenced by the case of The Breadalbane, which was a case where no stern light was exhibited, but where there was a binnacle light which perhaps did not have the same range as a proper stern light; and therefore, if the question had been whether the vessel came within the range of the light, there might have been a doubt. But the following vessel ought to have seen, and I have no doubt did see, and had every opportunity of seeing, the binnacle light, and the view taken, as I understand in that case, was that there being a light exhibited, which the steam tug ought to have seen, although it was not precisely at the same place as directed by the regulations, even if the stern light had been properly exhibited it could have made no conceivable difference. That was substantially the view I took, and in the case of The Argo I think that was the case in which there were two things: First of all there was a light to be seen on part of the vessel as she came out of the harbour, though not a proper light, and there was another light which was visible and ought to have been seen, and was not seen, by the on-coming vessel. Therefore the conclusion I came to was it showed such a clear absence of look-out on the part of those responsible that even if the proper lights had been exhibited, in all human probability they would have been no more seen than the light the failure to see which brought about the collision. So far as the direct effect of the lights of the tug were concerned, I think it might well be said that if the Devonian failed to see the anchor light of the Veritas, it might be that an additional towing light of the Prairie Cock would not have afforded more than an extra light and a supererogative advantage. But that does not, I think, quite exhaust the case, and a consideration has impressed itself upon the minds of the Trinity Masters and myself which to my mind is very material. The lights exhibited by the Prairie Cock were those of a vessel under way, and no doubt they impressed, and would impress, upon the minds of those on board the Devonian that she was a vessel unattached, under way, coming down the river in the ordinary way. I do not lay any stress upon the consideration that probably she would be moving. I do not lay any stress upon the consideration that the lights of the Prairie Cock were seen in different ways and at different times, or that those on the Devonian saw at one time the red and at another time the green light, because I think it is extremely probable that the seeing of those lights at different times and in different ways arose from the action of the Devonian's own helm, and not from any motion of the Prairie Cock, which indeed appears to me to be negated by the evidence. But there is this very important consideration, that she saw the lights on a vessel under way, and they would and could suggest nothing except that a vessel under way was coming down the river by herself. First of all, if the towing lights had been exhibited would the Devonian probably or might she have seen them? I think she would. It is not a case like that of The Argo or The Breadalbane, where the look-out was so completely deficient that practically nothing was seen, because probably if another light had been exhibited it would not have been seen any more than those that were exhibited were not seen, but it is clear that the Devonian did see both the green, red, and mast-head lights on board the tug, and it is of course quite possible, indeed my own view is that it is the case, that it was because she did see the lights of the tug, and concentrated her attention upon them, that she failed to see the neighbouring and perhaps dimmer—I dare say they were dimmer—lights of the Veritas. It is the usual operation of the human mind when you have your attention very strongly directed to one object to notice that, in exclusion to anything else; and seeing those one set of lights, they were the only ones that those on board her were able to regulate their conduct by. But if the two towing lights had been exhibited, I think in the first place they would probably have been seen. I think the Devonian would have seen two towing lights on the Prairie Cock as she did see the masthead light of that vessel. If they had been seen might they not possibly—because one need not go further than that—have caused those on board the Devonian to be more alert than they were to discover the neighbouring lights of the Veritas? I think they might. I do not say it would have been so, but I cannot help thinking that it is quite within the range of possibility that the Devonian, had they seen the two towing lights, would have said to themselves, "This is a vessel towing another," and therefore that other must necessarily be in close proximity. It is to be remarked that there was another vessel, the Hildebrand, exhibiting her anchor lights not very far off, and it may be that it was her lights also which to some extent prevented the lights of the Veritas attracting the attention which they would otherwise have attracted. But if those on board the Devonian had seen two towing lights on the tug, I think the natural condition of their minds would have been to be very alert to look out to see where was the tow which presumably the tug had in charge at that time. They would then have looked carefully between the lights of the Hildebrand and the lights of the tug. They would have scanned with glasses the whole of the space between them which might be occupied by the lights of a vessel in tow, and I cannot help thinking that it is not only possible, but even probable, because I will say that, with their attention sufficiently called to this matter, they would have had the use of their eyes and more probably the use of their glasses, and would have succeeded in making out the lights of the Veritas, and been in a position to avoid the collision which they unfortunately were not.

ADM.]

THE DEVONIAN.

[ADM.]

Therefore I think the proposition is made out, going by steps, that the tug Prairie Cock ought to have exhibited those towing lights, and that someone is responsible under the Merchant Shipping Act and the regulations for the collision which happened by reason of those lights not being exhibited. Under those circumstances was it the persons in control of the Veritas? That raises a question of great interest, and upon that there is a considerable amount of authority. The question is, Is the

Veritas responsible for her tug exhibiting improper lights? I do not think that it can possibly be put on any broad common law doctrine. It cannot, I think, be said in a simple way that the relation between the two was the relation of master and servant, and therefore whatever the tug did wrong the tow was responsible for. In the case of principal and agent or master and servant where a servant is employed the master is responsible for his wrong acts by reason of the common law relation between them, but as has been pointed out in more than one case, especially in the case of The Quickstep (63 L. T. Rep. 713), this is not a relation which one can properly seek to impose in these cases. One cannot say it depends solely upon the common law position, because the tug holds rather the position of independent contractor, or rather the position of a person employed but independently employed. As in the common case as it is put in The Quickstep (ubi sup.) of taking a wherry on the river the man who takes the wherry is not responsible for all the mistakes made by the man whom he employs, or in the common case of a cab a man is not responsible for all the mistakes of his cabman because it is true he employs him as a servant, but he is an independent servant, and the master is not liable for the mistakes he makes under those circumstances. That is not a doctrine upon which to my mind reliance can be placed. But the doctrine upon which reliance can be placed is more that of the Admiralty law—namely, that under some circumstances the tug and tow must be considered to be a composite single body so created, the control being in the tow and not in the tug. In the first place, it is to be observed that although that is the Admiralty doctrine still there must be, I was going to say a flavour—I hardly know whether that term is right—of the common law about it. It compels one to say there must be a relation, in fact, of master and servant. Unless it can therefore be shown that the tow and tug really stood in the relation to one another of employer and employed, neither the Admiralty nor any other doctrine applies to make the tug liable. That of course is illustrated by the case of The Quickstep, where a good many barges were in tow of a single tug, and it is illustrated further by the way in which I believe the American courts have worked the matter out in cases where in their rivers there are a very large number of barges owned by many owners, and under the control of a single tug. In those cases it has been held that the relation of master and servant does not apply at all. In point of fact there are many masters and one servant responsible, and no one is master more than the other. Under those circumstances one might use Admiralty language and say there is no identification of the two, or you might put it upon the failure of the common law relation between master and servant. However it is put, the result is the same—that there is no such relation between them as would enable you to import either common or Admiralty law. That only applies where the question of who is master, or is there any master, can fairly be asked. A further principle which appears to me to be necessary for the due development of the Admiralty doctrine consists in the identification of tow and tug, and I quite agree with the view which has been put forward, that under those circumstances it is necessary to show more for the proposition introducing the Admiralty doctrine than a mere employment. For example, if the tug were at a very considerable distance from the tow—I think I put in the course of the argument the case of a tow sending for the tug which is starting for her voyage to reach her, and perhaps being miles away from her—it is impossible to say that the tow would be liable for misconduct or neglect on the part of the tug in that case. Why? Because the circumstances would not arise which would give rise to a reasonable application of the Admiralty doctrine, and in order to make that doctrine apply it is necessary to show that in fact the circumstances were such that the two were identified, and that the control of the tug and the tow was a reasonable and practicable thing. If that breaks down, if you could show that there was no such control, and there could be no such control, then every foundation for the Admiralty doctrine vanishes. Now the question is, How is the line to be drawn: when is it to be said that a tug and tow are in such a relation in fact to one another as that the tow should be held liable for misfeasance or misconduct on the part of the tug? The point that was made by Mr. Laing suggests a line which it appears to me impossible to adopt. He says the true line which is to be drawn is: Is there actual towing going on; is the tow-ropes tight—that is what it really comes to; is there a strain upon it? if so, one is towing the other, and in the operation of towing it is the duty of the tow when practicable to control the tug, and it becomes correspondingly responsible if the tug is badly managed. I am unable to draw the line at this point. In every case you must show circumstances in which the control is practicable and possible, but I do not know and I do not think that those circumstances are limited to the case of there being an actual strain for the moment on the hawser which connects the tow and the tug. In this case there was no such strain. The vessels, as I have said already, were lying alongside of one another connected by means of a hawser, the one being ready, if needed, to render assistance which—from the broken-down condition in which the Veritas was rendered peculiarly necessary. But I agree that there was no actual strain on the hawser, and the tug was not rendering any service beyond that of being ready, waiting to render any if necessary. But can that make any difference? I do not think it can. I think the true principle and the true line is, Were the two in such a position towards one another that the control of the tow and the tug was practicable and possible? That appears to me to be the true test, and I apply that to the authorities that have been mentioned, such as The Niobe (ubi sup.) and the other cases, and I should say that liability has been established, because the tow ought to have, and was in a position to, exercise control, and that control over the tug ought to have been applied. If you find those circumstances do not exist, then the tow cannot be held liable, and that appears to me to be a fair and good rule. In this case what real difference is there? What possible difference can it make whether the screw of the tug was turning at the moment or not? That is what it comes to. It is admitted that if the screw of the tug was turning and some strain was put upon the hawser to hold the ship up—of course, no possible distinction can be made between holding her to the tide and towing her forward, that is not suggested—that the rule would apply. To my mind, the distinction is a great deal too fine, and a broader view which I have suggested is the one which suggests itself to my mind. A further point is suggested, which perhaps arises rather from something which was passing in my own mind as to whether the tow would be liable for what we may call the internal economy of the tug, and I confess it is possible that somewhat nice questions might arise upon that point, but I do not think it necessary to go into them, partly because one or more of the authorities have dealt with the case where the tow would be liable for some failure of lights on the tug, and if she was liable for lights at all it appears to me she might be properly liable for lights in this case and also because I think it comes well within the principle which I have ventured to indicate. It appears to me the tow is responsible for the conduct of the tug so far at least as she can practically and reasonably exercise it. That at any time, to my mind, is the minimum of the obligation, and this case appears to me to fall within that minimum of obligation, which in this case is to have taken care that the tug exhibited proper lights. The tug was absolutely, in fact, connected with her, lying close beside her, and it appears to me impossible to say that the pilot on the Veritas might not perfectly well have interfered, and told the captain of the tug to put his proper towing lights up. I agree there might have been a difference of opinion between the two upon the subject, but the responsibility on the part of the pilot is to see that she had her proper lights up, and if we once make up our minds what the proper lights were, then it becomes the duty of the Veritas to see that the proper lights were put out. Therefore I think that the Veritas in this case was responsible under the circumstances for the Prairie Cock not exhibiting her two towing lights, and I have already said that in my judgment the absence of those two towing lights might have contributed to this collision. Under these circumstances I have to hold the Devonian to blame for bad look-out in not seeing the lights of the Veritas, and I am compelled also to hold the Veritas to blame on account of the improper lights which, in my judgment, the Prairie Cock was exhibiting.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., agents for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

Friday, March 1, 1901.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President.)

THE TURRET COURT. (a)

Practice—Costs of shorthand-writer's notes—Time for application for—Power of court to vary its own order.

The ordinary order of judgment with costs does not include the cost of a transcript of the shorthand-writer's notes. Such costs must be applied

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., K.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE PORT VICTOR.

[ADM.]

for at the hearing. Where an order has been made for judgment with costs, and that order has been drawn up, the court has no power to alter its decree by subsequently allowing special costs.

THIS was a motion in a collision action which had occurred between the plaintiffs' steamship Ramillies and the defendants' steamship Turret Court.

The collision action was heard by the President and Trinity Masters, on the 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th June, and the 5th and 12th July 1900, and resulted in judgment being entered for the plaintiffs with costs. The plaintiffs subsequently brought in their bill of costs for taxation before the Assistant Registrar of the Admiralty Court.

Among the items was a claim for the costs of a transcript of the shorthand-writer's notes and of copies of the same of evidence for the use of counsel which had been used at the trial. To this item the defendants objected, and it was disallowed. The plaintiffs appealed to the President, who made the following order.

Upon hearing both solicitors on the plaintiffs' application to review the taxation of their bill of costs, the President referred it back to the Assistant Registrar with directions to allow the costs of the shorthand-writer's notes of certain of the plaintiffs' evidence, and of copies thereof for the use of counsel, and that the defendants do have the costs of this application dated the 4th March 1901.

On the 5th March the President on the application by defendants' solicitors directed that the application be argued in court by way of motion on Monday, the 11th March. Upon the motion being called on :

D. Stephens, for the defendants, contended that these costs were special costs, and were not covered by the order for judgment with costs made by the President at the hearing of the action. The proper time for applying for such costs is at the conclusion of the hearing. The court has no power to alter its own order, and subsequently allow the costs of shorthand notes. He referred to

Kirkwood v. Webster, 9 Ch. Div. 239 ;

Ashworth v. Outram, 39 L. T. Rep. 441 ; 9 Ch. Div. 483 ;

De la Warr v. Miles, 45 L. T. Rep. 425 ; 19 Ch. Div. 80 ;

Ashworth v. Tweedale, 35 S. J. 191 ;

Hill and others v. Metropolitan Asylums District Board, 43 L. T. Rep. 462 ; 28 W. R. 664.

Batten, for the plaintiffs, contended that the court had discretion to vary its own order, and to allow the plaintiffs these costs. That no rule had ever been laid down to the effect that an order for the payment of special costs must be made at the hearing; and, further, that the original order for costs included all such costs as might eventually be found to have been properly incurred. He cited

Steed ; Re Jay, 33 W. R. 80.

Stephens in reply.

The PRESIDENT.—I am obliged to decide this matter upon what I confess seems to me to be a somewhat narrow rule. I find it to be so, but I feel myself unable to alter it. If I am wrong, perhaps the Court of Appeal will be able to give a wider, and possibly a wiser, definition. It appears to me clear that the courts have held—not with regard to this division, but I desire to follow the analogy of other divisions on a matter of principle—that it is a long-standing and well-recognised rule that the costs of a shorthand-writer's notes shall not be allowed unless special directions have been given by the judge or court—that when the court gives costs it gives the ordinary costs, and these do not include the costs of a shorthand-writer's notes. I think it is a narrow view, because I should have thought that the wider view was the proper one, and that when the court gives costs it means to give all the costs which may hereafter be determined to have been necessary. The courts have held otherwise, however, and have held that an order for such special costs must be embodied in the judgment of the court. That is clearly the view of Jessel, M.R., in the case of Earl De la Warr v. Miles (ubi sup.). I do not think it is necessary to deal with any other case, because he is a great authority. The Master of the Rolls says: "The first objection is that according to the settled practice these costs are not to be allowed unless the judge or the court gives a special direction to that effect. That rule was laid down long ago, and I believe that it has been consistently followed since. It seems to me to be a right rule, and if it had not been laid down before I should have been disposed to lay it down now." Therefore, according to well-recognised law, unless there is a special direction by the court these particular costs cannot be allowed. It follows that the application for such costs must be made at the time of judgment, because if it is not and the order is drawn up, it cannot be disputed that the court has not afterwards power to alter its judgment, because, by an omission, it was not brought before the notice of the court. By those decisions I hold myself to be bound. I have made an order in the case giving the costs and not making any special direction, and under those circumstances I say—and I say it with regret, but I feel compelled to say it—that I cannot modify that order by giving the costs for the shorthand-writer's notes. I say with regret, because in the particular circumstances of the case, if I had been able to do so, I should have in all human probability allowed those costs. Therefore I refuse them, because I consider myself bound by the rule of practice to which I have referred.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Pitchard and Sons.
Solicitors for the defendants, Botterell and Roche.

March 7 and 23, 1901.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President.)

THE PORT VICTOR. (a)

Salvage—Government stores—Liability of charterers for proportion of salvage.

Where Government stores are being carried at the risk of charterers and such stores are salvaged from a danger for which the charterers were responsible, the charterers are liable to pay salvage. There is a personal liability to pay salvage apart from the liability of the res.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., K.C., and SUTTON TIMMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[ADM.]

THE PORT VICTOR.

[ADM.]

THE plaintiffs in this action were the owners, masters, and crews of the steamship Amelie and of the tugs Columbia and Shamrock; the defendants were the Jamaica Fruit Importing and Trading Company, who were the charterers under a time charter of the steamship Port Victor.

On the 4th June 1897 the Port Victor, while on a voyage from London to Jamaica, collided with the steamship Roecliff in the English Channel and sank her.

The Port Victor was severely damaged and had to take salvage assistance.

The cause of the collision was the negligent navigation of the Port Victor.

An action in rem was brought for salvage by the present plaintiffs and by the owners of the tug Lady Vita.

At the time of the collision the Port Victor had on board some Government stores owned by the Admiralty. These goods were shipped by the charterers under contracts entered into with the Admiralty, and were carried under the Admiralty regulations for the conveyance of Government stores.

By these regulations it was provided in the note at their head that

The term "owners" used in the following regulations is to be understood as signifying the party or parties who engage to convey the stores under the agreement for freight or charter-party.

Clause 17 provided that

The owners will be held responsible for the safe delivery of the Government stores shipped, the act of God, Queen's enemies, fire, and all other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of what nature and kind soever during the voyage always excepted; and provided always that the liability of the owners arising from negligent navigation shall be limited as provided by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and shall in no case exceed 20*l.* per freight ton.

The stores were shipped under the usual Admiralty bill of lading, which is subject to the stipulations contained in the charter-party or other agreement entered into with or on behalf of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and in the regulations of Her Majesty's Transport Service.

The salvage action was heard before Barnes, J., assisted by two of the Elder Brethren, on the 17th July 1897, when he awarded the sum of 800*l.* to the Amelie, 600*l.* to the Columbia, 400*l.* to the Shamrock, and 400*l.* to the Lady Vita, making a total of 2200*l.* in all. These awards were based on the total values of the Port Victor and her cargo, all questions as to the liability for the proportion due for the salvage of the Government stores being reserved for further consideration if necessary.

On the Admiralty being applied to they refused to pay salvage, or enter an appearance on the ground that the collision had been brought about by the negligence of the Port Victor, and as their contract did not exonerate the carrier from liability for negligence they declined to recognise the claim. The proportion of salvage that the Admiralty would have been liable to pay, had they recognised the claim, would have been 297*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.* The plaintiffs now sought to make the defendants liable for this amount.

By the terms of the charter-party, clause 10:

The captain shall sign bills of lading at any rate of freight the charterers or their agents may choose, without prejudice to the stipulations of this charter-party, and the charterers hereby agree to indemnify the owners from any consequences that may arise from the captain following the charterer's instructions and signing bills of lading. . . . The owners shall not under any circumstances be liable for condition of fruit or other cargo, and the charterers hereby indemnify the owners against any claim arising under any bill of lading.

Aspinall, K.C. (Dawson Miller with him) for the plaintiffs.—These Government Stores were at the risk of the defendants, and it is the defendants who have been saved a loss by the rendering of these salvage services. By the terms of the charter party the captain was to sign bills of lading as the charterers or their agents might choose, and the charterers agreed to indemnify the owners against any consequences that might arise from the captain so signing bills of lading and from any claim that might arise under any bill of lading. The captain acting in pursuance of the charterers' or their agents' instructions, signed the bills of lading for the Government stores which contained no negligence clause. In consequence of this omission, if the Government had sued the shipowners for non-delivery of their goods, there would have been no defence to the action, but the shipowners would have had a remedy over against the charterers.

Milburn and Co. v. Jamaica Fruit Company, 83 L. T. Rep. 321; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 122; (1900) 2 Q. B. 540.

The result is that these defendants had an interest in these stores, and have been saved a pecuniary loss by reason of these salvage services. They cited

The Five Steel Barges, 63 L. T. Rep. 499; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 580; 15 P. Div. 142;

Milburn and Co. v. Jamaica Fruit Company, 83 L. T. Rep. 321; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 122; (1900) 2 Q. B. 540;

Kennedy's Civil Salvage, p. 179;

The Pallada, Times, Dec. 24, 1900;

Duncan v. Dundee, Perth, and London Shipping Company, Scotch Sess. Cas. 4th series, vol. 5, p. 742;

The Gemma, 81 L. T. Rep. 379; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 585; (1899) P. 285;

The Dictator, 67 L. T. Rep. 563; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 251; (1892) P. 304.

Carver, K.C. (Scrutton, K.C. with him) for the defendants contra.—The defendants were not carriers, but intermediaries between the carriers and the Government. They cannot be made liable for salvage. In the case of The Five Steel Barges (ubi sup.) the party held liable was in possession of the barges, and was for all practical purposes their owner, and had also a lien on them. There are propositions in the judgment in The Five Steel Barges (ubi sup.) which are not good law. Such propositions would render underwriters, mortgagees, or a vendor who had a right to stop in transitu liable for salvage. The fact that a salvage action can be maintained in personam does not necessarily import a personal obligation because proceedings in personam in Admiralty are really only a means of enforcing one's remedy against the res. Probably the only persons who can be sued in personam for salvage are the owners of the res or persons to whom the salvors have delivered it and who have appropriated it. Here the defendants were not owners of the ship nor in possession of her or of the goods; nor were they carriers. It is submitted that Duncan v. Dundee, Perth, and London Shipping Company (ubi sup.) does not apply. There is not even a personal obligation on an owner to pay salvage; the personal liability only takes the place of the obligation of the res. There may be a personal liability on an owner in the case of damage, but not of salvage. [THE PRESIDENT.—But a person who takes the goods must surely be liable for their value?] Yes, perhaps, but the defendants did not take them :

ADM.]

THE PORT VICTOR.

[ADM.]

The Hope, 3 C. Rob. 215 ;
The Trelawney, 3 C. Rob. n. 216 ; 4 C. Rob. 223 ;
The Chieftain, 4 Notes of Cases, 459 ;
The Elton, 55 L. T. Rep. 232 ; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 66 ; (1891) P. Div. 265 ;
The Cargo ex Schiller, 36 L. T. Rep. 714 ; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 439 ; 2 P. Div. 145 ;
The Zephyrus, 1 W. Rob. 329 ;
The Rapid, 3 Hagg. 419 ;
Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Company, 56 L. T. Rep. 220 ; 34 Ch. Div. 134.

At common law a salvor only had a possessory lien, but no right in personam :

Harford v. Jones, 1 Ld. Raym. 393 ; 2 Salk. 654 ;
Nicholson v. Chapman, 2 H. Bl. 254.

He also referred to

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3 ;
The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 546, 554, 557, 560, 568 ;
Anderson v. Ocean Steamship Company, 52 L. T. Rep. 441 ; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 401 ; 10 App. Cas. 107 ;
Kennedy's Civil Salvage, p. 11.

Aspinall, K.C. in reply.—The defendants had a special property in these goods. They were entitled to possession of them, and could have sued the salvors for their loss had it been caused by the salvors' negligence during the salvage operations. The right to salvage mainly depends upon benefit conferred.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 23.—THE PRESIDENT.—This is a claim for salvage in respect of certain Government stores carried in the steamship Port Victor, and the claim is made against the Jamaica Fruit Importing and Trading Company, of London, the defendants, as being interested in the cargo: The proportionate part of the salvage award for which the defendants are liable, if at all, has been ascertained, and the only question remaining is that of liability. The interest of the defendants in the cargo is of the following nature: By a charter-party of the 9th Oct. 1896 the defendants became the charterers of the Port Victor for thirty-six months. By clause 10 the charterers indemnify the owners against any claim arising under any bill of lading, and by clause 22 negligence of the master and officers is made one of the subjects of mutual exception. The defendants entered into various arrangements in respect of goods to be conveyed by the Port Victor, and inter alia engaged for the conveyance of the Government stores above mentioned, the engagement being made subject to the regulations for the conveyance of Government stores. These regulations provide for bills of lading, and further provide that the owners—which term is expressly declared to signify the party or parties who engage to convey the stores under the agreement for freight or charter-party—will be held responsible for the safe delivery of the Government stores shipped. The goods in question were shipped under a bill or bills of lading which state them to be shipped subject to the regulations contained in the charter-party, and in the regulations for Her Majesty's Transport Service. The salvage service was rendered necessary by reason of a collision caused by the negligence of the Port Victor. The result, therefore, is that as between the Government and the defendants, the defendants were responsible for the safe delivery of the goods, and they were therefore directly interested in the preservation of the goods and the salvage service was a direct benefit to them. It was argued before me that the above facts bring the case within that of The Five Steel Barges (ubi sup.), decided by Lord Hannen. In that case the defendants were under a contract to build and deliver certain barges to the Government. The barges were being towed by the plaintiffs for the defendants from Chepstow to Portland, and were saved by the plaintiffs, who brought an action in personam against the defendants in respect of two of the barges, which were given up to the Government. It was argued for the plaintiffs that the defendants had an interest in the barges being delivered safely to the Government, and that therefore a service was rendered to them personally. It was said in answer that the plaintiffs had lost any rights they possessed against the barges by giving them up to the Government, and that the defendants had no property in them. Lord Hannen held that it was perfectly clear within the authorities that an action in personam lies against the owners of a vessel which has been saved, even though the property has been transferred to others and the lien lost. "In this case," the learned judge proceeded, "the property does not appear to have been in the defendants because it would, I think, under the contract be in the Government. But I am of opinion that the right to sue in personam is not confined to the case of the defendants being the actual legal owners of the property saved. I think it exists in cases where the defendant has an interest in the property saved, which interest has been saved by the fact that the property is brought into a position of security. The jurisdiction which this court exercises in salvage cases is of a peculiarly equitable character. The right to salvage may arise out of an actual contract, but it does not necessarily do so. It is a legal liability arising out of the fact that property has been saved, that the owner of the property who has had the benefit of it shall make remuneration to those who have conferred the benefit upon him, notwithstanding that he has not entered into any contract on the subject. I think that proposition equally applies to the man who has had a benefit arising out of the saving of the property. In this case the defendant was under contract with the Government to supply them with barges at a certain price. Payment was to be made by certain instalments, of which only one remained unpaid at the time of the services. I think if Mr. Barnes' argument is well founded—viz., that those instalments were all paid on condition that the barges should be delivered within twelve months of the date of the contract, it would follow that, if the defendants

ADM.]

THE PORT VICTOR.

[ADM.]

had not been in a position to deliver the barges within the twelve months, then either they would have been liable in damages for not performing the contract or liable to make restitution of the instalments which had been paid them on conditions not fulfilled by them. It appears to me, therefore, that they had substantially an interest, to the full amount of the barges, at the time of the services, and that the same moral obligation to which the law has given force in the case of an owner applies to those who have an interest in the property." There is a decision in the Scotch courts which appears to me to be in accordance with that in The Five Steel Barges. In Duncan v. Dundee Shipping Company (ubi sup.) it was held by the Court of Session that the shipowners in that case were acting as common carriers, and were in the circumstances of the case liable for the safe delivery of the goods, and that, therefore, they had no defence to a claim for salvage in respect of such goods. "The case," Lord Shand said, "comes to this, that the carrier of these goods being absolutely bound to deliver them at the end of the voyage, the salvage has directly enured to his benefit, for it has enabled him to fulfil his contract and to earn the freight which he charged for these goods. On the ground that it is established in this case as a matter of fact that the benefit of this salvage, in so far as regarded the cargo, enured directly to the carrier, I am of opinion that he is liable for the salvage which is here claimed."

It was argued before me that the present case can be distinguished from that of The Five Steel Barges on the ground that in that case the defendants had a lien for the price of the barges, and so, for practical purposes, were the owners, although the property in law was no doubt in the Government. It was contended that the claim for salvage is limited to claims against the owners, or at least against the persons who, like carriers, are in possession of the goods at the time of the salvage, but that in the present case the defendants were not the owners of the goods, nor were ever in possession of them. A legal foundation for this view was sought in the argument that the Admiralty action in personam is based on the supposition that the goods were allowed by the salvors to be returned to their former possessor on the terms that he should be liable to pay the salvage reward. I think that this contention is based on too narrow a view of the right of a salvor, and, in my opinion, the nature and origin of the Admiralty action for salvage do not impose any limits on that right narrower than those indicated by Lord Hannen and Lord Shand in the cases I have mentioned. It is quite true that in the case of The Elton (ubi sup.) I said, relying on the authorities I there cite, that "although salvage suits in the form of actions in personam are comparatively rare, the Court of Admiralty always had jurisdiction, founded apparently on the fiction of an action in rem, having been brought and the property saved having been allowed to be taken by the owners, to entertain such suits where at least there existed a corpus of property saved." But in the following year, when I had occasion, in the case of The Dictator (ubi sup.) to examine the subject of the origin and nature of the Admiralty jurisdiction more fully, I came to the conclusion, which the approval expressed by the Court of Appeal in the case of The Gemma (ubi sup.) leads me to hope was well founded, that the action in personam did not arise out of jurisdiction in rem, and that the distinction between actions in personam and actions in rem, depended only on whether the person or property of the defendant was arrested in the first instance. To rest the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court upon an implied request from the owners of the property in danger to the salvors, or on an implied contract between the salvor and owner, with the relinquishment of the res for consideration is, I think, to confuse two different systems of law and to resort to a misleading analogy. The true view is, I think, that the law of Admiralty imposes on the owners of property saved an obligation to pay the person who saves it simply because, in the view of that system of law, it is just he should, and this conception of justice naturally imposes a proportionate obligation on any person whose interest in the property is real, though falling short of that of ownership. I see no reason, therefore, why I should not follow the view of Lord Hannen and of the Scotch Court of Session, that a man who has had a benefit arising out of the saving of the property is liable to a claim for salvage no less than the actual owner of it. It was urged before me that to take this view would expose mortgagees and insurers to salvage actions. I do not think it is necessary in this case to define exhaustively the classes of persons against whom under various circumstances claims of salvage might be made. There is, no doubt, the authority of eminent judges in the courts of common law for saying that contribution cannot be required by an owner from the lender upon bottomry or respondentia (Parke on Marine Insurance, ii., 398, and the judgments of Lord Mansfield and Lord Kenyon, there cited). On the other hand, Dr. Lushington, in The Louise (Br. & L. 59), held that mortgagees came within the term "owners" in the sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 relating to salvage. It is, however, easy to see that the contingent interests of a person who makes advances by way of mortgage, or otherwise, on property, or of an insurer, is of a different character from that of persons who have a direct interest in its safe delivery, and may negative, or at least impose, different conditions on the right of a salvor against some of these persons. It may be, therefore, that it will become necessary hereafter to consider what is the exact definition of the interest in the property saved which gives rise to a claim of salvage. But in the present case I have no doubt that the defendant had such an interest; and my judgment must, therefore, be for the plaintiff.

A stay of execution, pending appeal, was granted on the condition of 150*l.* being paid into court.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, W. A. Crump and Son.

Solicitors for the defendants, Parker, Garrett, and Holman.

PRIV. CO.] AJUM, GOOLAM, HOSSEN, & Co., &C. v. UNION MARINE INSURANCE Co. [PRIV. Co.]

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Dec. 5, 6, 12, 1900, Feb. 8 and March 2, 1901.

(Present: The Right Hons. Lords HOBHOUSE, MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, and LINDLEY.)

AJUM, GOOLAM, HOSSEN, AND Co., AND OTHERS
v UNION MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (a).

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF MAURITIUS.

Marine insurance—Seaworthiness—Loss from unascertained cause.

Where a ship is lost shortly after leaving port without any known cause sufficient to account for the catastrophe, the presumption in favour of unseaworthiness may be rebutted by evidence as to the actual condition of the ship at the time of sailing.

Pickup v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company (39 L. T. Rep. 341; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 43; 3 Q. B. Div. 594) approved.

A ship cannot be considered unseaworthy in consequence of a defect easily curable by those on board.

Judgment of the court below reversed.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Mauritius, dated the 1st Feb.
1899, whereby it was ordered that judgment be entered for the defendants, the rights of Ajum, Goolam, Hossen, and Company, and Hajee Essop Mamode Sulliman and another, in the case in guarantee, remaining intact.

The question raised by the appeal was whether the steamship Taif was seaworthy when she started on the voyage in question in the case, or was unseaworthy as found by a majority of the court below.

The appellants Hossen and Co. filed their declaration on the 28th Dec. 1896, claiming to recover Rs.126,346 from the respondents, the Union Marine Insurance Company, under certain policies of insurance subscribed by them, and dated in Mauritius the 23rd Sept. 1896, on bags of sugar free of particular average per the steamship Taif, at and from Mauritius to Bombay.

The respondents, the Union Marine Insurance Company, filed their plea on the 26th Jan. 1897, denying liability on the ground that the Taif was unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage.
The appellants, Hossen and Co., being the owners of the cargo on the steamship Taif, thereupon by notice of intervention filed on the 19th Feb. 1897, commenced proceedings in guarantee against Hajee Cassim Joosub and another (the defendants in guarantee), the owners of the steamship Taif, to recover the said sum of Rs.126,346 in case
the Union Marine Insurance Company Limited should succeed in their defence. On the 2nd April 1897, an order was made by consent, that the defendants in guarantee should intervene in the case of Hossen and Co. against The Union Marine Insurance Company.

The action came on for hearing on the 12th
May 1898, before Delafaye (Acting Chief Justice), Moncrieff, and Oliver Smith, J.J. The evidence consisted of depositions of witnesses at a wreck inquiry at Colombo, depositions of witnesses taken on commission at Bombay, Glasgow, and Mauritius, oral evidence given before the court, and various exhibits.

The evidence on all sides agreed that the Taif went down in deep water about nineteen hours after she started on her voyage without having encountered any weather sufficient to account for her loss.

The following facts were also proved or admitted:—

The Taif was a British steel screw steamer built in 1884, of 859 tons net and 1441 tons gross register, and at the time of her loss was on a voyage from Mauritius to Bombay laden with sugar in bags.

On the 23rd Sept. 1896, the Taif was lying in the harbour of Port Louis, Mauritius, where she had been taking in her cargo. Between 8.30 and 9 a.m. on that date the loading of the holds of the Taif had been completed, and the same were then full of bags of sugar. Some 300 bags of sugar were loaded later in the morning, but before 10.30 a.m., and were stowed in the storeroom, in the saloon cabin, in the dispensary, and hospital.

At the time that the loading of the holds was completed the after-ballast tank was full of water, and the Taif had a considerable list to port.

At 9 a.m. on the 23rd, the master was ready to sail except that he had not received orders from his agent or his clearance papers, and but for this he would have gone to sea. The Taif usually sailed with her after-ballast tank full when carrying cargo.

Between 9 a.m. and 11.30 a.m. the Taif was inspected on three different occasions by three different customs officers; once by the collector of customs on his rounds of the harbour, and twice by other officers who went for the purpose of granting her her clearances. On each occasion the clearance was withheld upon the grounds of the vessel's list, and of the submerging of her disc or load-line. At one of these inspections or at a subsequent interview, the captain of the Taif said that he could raise the vessel to the Plimsoll mark by pumping out the tank.

About noon an interview took place between the captain of the Taif, the ship's agent, the collector of customs and his deputy at which the clearance papers were refused by the collector until the ship had been put in order. The captain and agent then returned on board the Taif, and some time between twelve and one orders were given to pump out the ballast tank, and the pump was set to work.

According to the engineers it required at least three hours to empty the after-ballast tank from full, but at 1.15 p.m. the senior tide surveyor who had made the last of the three previous inspections, again inspected the Taif's load-lines, and having given the captain his clearance papers, allowed the Taif to sail at 1.30 p.m. Except for the pumping nothing else was done to remedy or alter the condition of the ship, and the Taif went to sea with free water in her after-ballast tank, a considerable list, and her port load-line submerged.

The Taif having started at 1.30 p.m. on the 23rd, encountered a strong wind and a confused sea, the wind being on the starboard side. Almost immediately after leaving, the after-ballast tank was filled up again by order of the master, and during the afternoon the sails were also set.

PRIV. CO.] AJUM, GOOLAM, HOSSEN, & Co., &c. v. UNION MARINE INSURANCE CO. [PRIV. CO.]

Some increase in the list of the ship seems to have occurred during the afternoon and night, as at 4 a.m. on the 24th, it had become considerably worse. At 4.15 a.m. the master ordered the after-ballast tank to be emptied, and pumping was commenced and went on as long as steam was available. At 6 a.m. the stokehole fires fell over to one side and stopped the supply of steam, and between 8 and 9 a.m. on the 24th the Taif fell over to port and went down.

The wells of the Taif were sounded periodically on the voyage, but she made no water at any time, and did not leak.

The figures relative to the amount of list with which the Taif started were variously given.

No trustworthy figures were given of the total amount of weight put on board the Taif.

Free water in a ballast tank is dangerous at sea. It causes listing, rolling, and may damage the tank top and start a plate.

Cargoes of sugar are liable to settle, and if there is a list, a cargo of sugar will probably settle to the side of the list.

The Taif had been engaged for some time in carrying sugar from the Mauritius to Bombay but had never before loaded so many bags. On some of the occasions on which she had sailed with her after-ballast tank full she had carried a correspondingly less number of bags.

The hearing of the case and arguments after several adjournments was concluded on the 2nd Sept. 1898, and the court took time for consideration.

On the 1st Feb. 1899, judgment was delivered by two of the learned judges in favour of the respondents (the Union Marine Insurance Company) and by the other learned judge in favour of the appellants. Delafaye, C.J. in giving judgment for the appellants declined to hold that there was any presumption to be drawn from the fact of the Taif sinking some nineteen hours after sailing without having encountered any weather sufficient to account for her loss, and was of opinion that he was unable to say or even to safely conjecture what it was that caused the ship to sink and that the safe and rational conclusion was that the loss was occasioned by the action of the sea.

Moncrieff and Oliver Smith, JJ. both found that the vessel was unseaworthy, because when she left harbour she had an unusual list, and a considerable amount of freewater in her after-ballast tank, and was deficient in stability, and she sank about nineteen hours after she sailed without any apparent cause other than her instability.

On the 13th March 1899, leave to appeal was granted both to the plaintiffs (Hossen and Co.) and the defendants in guarantee (Sulliman and another) by the Supreme Court of Mauritius.

Asquith, Q.C., J. B. Matthews, and L. Batten appeared for the appellants.

J. Walton, Q.C., Horridge, and A. D. Bateson for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

March 2.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

Lord LINDLEY.—This is an action on four policies of insurance on cargo shipped on board the s.s. Taif to be carried from Port Louis in

Mauritius to Bombay. The underwriters defend the action on the ground that the ship was unseaworthy when she sailed. The burden of proving that she was so is on them, and the sole question is whether they have established their contention. In the court below the Chief Justice held that they had not; but his two colleagues Moncrieff and Oliver Smith, JJ. came to a different conclusion. The decision of the court was therefore in favour of the underwriters and against the plaintiffs, and from this decision the plaintiffs have appealed. The underwriters have the great advantage of the undoubted fact that the vessel capsized and sank in less than twenty-four hours after leaving port without having encountered any storm or other known cause sufficient to account for the catastrophe; and there is no doubt that if nothing more were known they would be entitled to succeed in the action. If nothing more were known unseaworthiness at the time of sailing would be the natural inference to draw; there would be a presumption of unseaworthiness upon which a jury ought to be directed to act and upon which a court ought to act if unassisted by a jury. But if, as in this case, other facts material to the inquiry as to the seaworthiness of the ship are proved those facts must also be considered; and they must be weighed against the unaccountable loss of the ship so soon after sailing, and unless the balance of the evidence warrants the conclusion that the ship was unseaworthy when she sailed such unseaworthiness cannot be properly treated as established, and the defence founded upon it must fail. The law on this point was finally settled in Pickup v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company (39 L. T. Rep. 341; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 43; 3 Q. B. Div. 594), which followed Anderson v. Morice (31 L. T. Rep. 605; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 58). In these cases the court pointed out the danger and error of acting on the presumption in favour of unseaworthiness in case of an early loss of which the assured cannot prove the cause; and the court pointed out the necessity of bearing in mind that the defence of unseaworthiness must be overruled unless supported by a sufficient weight of evidence in its favour after duly considering all the evidence bearing on the subject, including, of course, the very weighty evidence with which the underwriters start their case. In this case an enormous mass of evidence has been given as to the condition of the ship before and when she sailed, and as to the mode in which she was loaded. Much of such evidence is very conflicting, but the results are clear and some of them are really not in controversy. [His Lordship went through the evidence in the case, and continued:] Such are the facts. There is no proof whatever that the ship was in danger when the captain ordered water to be pumped into the after tank. There is no evidence to show that if the great increase of the list which took place after 10.30 p.m. had been reported to the captain it could not then have been remedied. He says that he thinks it could. But when he came on deck after 4 a.m. it was too late to right the ship. The unseaworthiness relied upon by the defendants is stated in their sixth plea to arise from the ship being overloaded top heavy and crank when she started on her voyage. Danger from water in her after tank is not referred to. It was contended by the defendants' counsel that with such a cargo as the ship had and stowed as it was she was unsafe when she sailed whether her after tank was empty or full. If empty she was top heavy and unstable, if full she was overloaded and too deep in the water. The difficulty in accepting this view is that the direct evidence is very strong to show that when she left port she was neither overloaded nor top heavy. The port authorities objected to her sailing when she was too deep in the water and had a heavy list; but they allowed her to sail when these defects were cured by pumping out water from her after tank. This not only lightened the ship and brought her load line up, but considerably reduced the serious list which she had when the port authorities refused to let her sail. Their Lordships are satisfied that when she sailed she was not too deep in the water. Indeed overloading in this sense was practically abandoned in the court below, and was negated by all the judges. On the inquiry at Colombo some of the crew said that in their opinion she was overloaded; and opinions were expressed that she must have been top heavy. But there was much evidence the other way, and weighing the whole evidence as it now stands their Lordships agree with the chief justice in accepting the pilot's evidence that she was neither overloaded nor top heavy when she left port. The other judges also negative top-heaviness, but they think her after tank was half full of water, and that this was a source of danger. Their Lordships are of opinion that the evidence tends more strongly to show that the loss of the ship was attributable to mistakes made in her management after she sailed rather than to her unseaworthiness when she sailed. The balance of the evidence is against rather than in favour of her unseaworthiness at that time. It was strongly contended that the captain filled the after tank early on the voyage, because he knew that the ship was unstable with a full cargo and an empty after water tank. It was contended that his desire was to sail if he could with a full cargo and a full tank, and that when prevented from doing this by the port authorities he satisfied them by pumping water out intending to pump it in again as soon as he got out to sea. But the pumping out of water from the after tank began on the 22nd Sept. before any difficulties with the port authorities arose; and as already stated there is no proof whatever that it was necessary to fill the after tank to avoid danger whether present or prospective. It may have been desirable to do so for other reasons; but to give effect to the theory in question would be to substitute conjecture for proof. On previous voyages with full cargoes the after tank appears to have been sometimes empty and sometimes full although the captain's evidence on this head is far from satisfactory. A great point was made in the court below, that the ship sailed with a large quantity of water in her after tank, and that the weight and wash of this water was or at all events might become a source of danger. This contention seems to have made a great impression on Moncrieff and Smith, JJ. Indeed, their judgments are mainly based upon it. It took the plaintiffs somewhat by surprise as it was inconsistent with the defendants' main contention, that the tank was empty when the ship sailed, and being empty that she was top-heavy. The suggestion that water in the tank made the ship unseaworthy, was not seriously pressed before their Lordships. The fact that the quantity of water in the tank cannot now be satisfactorily ascertained even approximately, and the fact that it could be increased or diminished with ease if desired probably accounts for the practical abandonment of this point by the experienced counsel who conducted the case for the underwriters before their Lordships. They fell back on overloading and top-heaviness. Even if water in the tank might be a source of danger the judgment of Lord Blackburn in Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72) shows that a ship ought not to be treated as unseaworthy by reason of something objectionable, but easily curable by those on board. The case is no doubt one of difficulty, and no one can be surprised that the underwriters defended the action on the ground of unseaworthiness. But as the evidence came out they were forced from one theory to another, and they have failed to prove their case. It is supposed that the cargo must have shifted; but this is a mere supposition, and there is no evidence of any bad stowage or other cause to account for any shifting of the cargo. All is conjecture. The real cause of the loss is unknown, and cannot be ascertained from the evidence adduced in this action. But underwriters take the risk of loss from unascertainable causes; and, after carefully weighing all the evidence and bearing in mind the presumption of unseaworthiness on which the underwriters rely, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that unseaworthiness at the time of sailing is not proved. They agree with the Chief Justice, and feel compelled to differ from his colleagues. The consequence will be that they will humbly advise His Majesty to allow the appeal, and to order judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs in the action for the sum assured and damages in the nature of interest at 4 per cent. per annum from the 21st Dec. 1896 until payment and costs, other than those occasioned by joining the shipowners as interveners. The insurance company must pay the costs of the appeal of the plaintiffs except those occasioned by the intervention of the shipowners. As regards the shipowners who were added as interveners, and appealed separately, their Lordships consider that the plaintiffs having joined them for their own convenience ought to pay their costs of the action and intervention, and that against them the action should be dismissed with costs, and their Lordships will so advise His Majesty. It would be unjust to the underwriters to order them to pay the costs of the shipowners' appeal, and they must bear their own costs of that. As the appeals have been consolidated, one order will be drawn up on both appeals.

PRIV. CO.] AJUM, GOOLAM, HOSSEN, & Co., &C. v. UNION MARINE INSURANCE CO. [PRIV. CO.]

Solicitors for the appellants Hossen and Co., H. C. Barker and Son.

Solicitors for the appellants Joosub and another, Wallons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Solicitors for the respondents, Field, Roscoe, and Co., for Batesons, Warr, and Wimshurst, Liverpool.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Jan. 24 and Feb. 19, 1901.

(Before SMITH, M.R., COLLINS and ROMER, L.JJ.)

PARSONS v. NEW ZEALAND SHIPPING COMPANY
LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bill of lading—Description of goods—Mistake in marks—Liability of person signing bill of lading—Short delivery—Exception in bill as to correctness of marks—Bills of Lading Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), s. 3.

Sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 provides that, subject to certain exceptions, a bill of lading representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the person signing the same, notwithstanding that such goods, or some part thereof, may not have been so shipped.

The indorsee of a bill of lading brought an action for short delivery against the agents of the ship-owners who had signed the bill.

The bill of lading described the goods consigned, which were a large number of frozen lambs' carcasses, as being "marked and numbered as in the margin," and it also contained a clause that the ship would not be responsible for correct delivery unless each package was correctly marked by the merchant before shipment with a mark, number, or address. The marks and numbers in the margin of the bill consisted of a particular brand followed by three figures.

On the discharge of the ship in London the defendants tendered to the plaintiff some carcasses marked as in the bill of lading which the plaintiff accepted, and others marked with the same brand as that mentioned in the bills of lading, but having after the brand three figures different from those mentioned in the bill of lading.

The plaintiff refused to accept these last-named carcasses, and brought this action for short delivery.

At the trial Kennedy, J. found as facts that the figures following the brand had no distinctive value as regards the meat market, and that the meat tendered, as a commercial article, was absolutely unaffected in its character or value by the figures following the brand. He also found that the carcasses tendered by the defendants were the very goods which had been shipped on board under the bill of lading.

Held (affirming the decision of Kennedy, J. (82 L. T. Rep. 327; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 33; (1900) 1 Q. B. 714), that the defendants were entitled to judgment.

Per Smith, M.R. : The defendants were protected by the clause in the bill of lading relieving the ship from responsibility for correct delivery unless the goods were correctly marked before shipment.

Per Collins and Romer, L.JJ. : The defendants were not estopped by sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 from showing that the goods they tendered were identical with those shipped under the plaintiff's bill of lading.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Kennedy, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the indorsee of two bills of lading against the signers of the bills, who were agents of the owners of the steamship Fifeshire.

The claim was for 12*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* damages for non-delivery of 154 frozen carcasses of lambs.

The defendants paid into court 29*l.* in respect of thirty-one carcasses and the action proceeded as to the remaining 123 carcasses.

The carcasses in question were part of a large number consigned from Timaru, New Zealand, to London.

The bills of lading described the consignment as "being marked and numbered as in the margin," the marginal marks being, as to 608 carcasses "Sun Brand 622 X," and as to 226 carcasses "Sun Brand 488 X"; and also contained the following clause :

The ship will not be responsible for correct delivery unless each package is distinctly, correctly, and permanently marked by the merchant, before shipment, with a mark and number or address.

Together with each bill of lading the plaintiff received an invoice, a certificate of insurance, and a specification, all following the description of the goods in the bills.

The plaintiff alleged that there had been a short delivery of 102 carcasses marked "Sun Brand 622 X," and of twenty-one marked "Sun Brand 488 X." On the discharge of the ship being completed the defendants tendered to the plaintiff 102 carcasses marked "Sun Brand 522 X" and twenty-one marked "Sun Brand 388 X," but the plaintiff refused to accept them.

It appeared that the first figure in each mark, which was put on by the Christchurch Freezing Company, near Timaru, meant the day of the week when the lamb was killed, the second figure had reference to the weight of the carcass, and the third showed from which of the Christchurch Company's works the carcass came.

At the trial of the action before Kennedy, J. without a jury, the learned judge found as facts (1) that the figures had no distinctive value as regards the market for the meat; that, as a commercial article, the meat was absolutely unaffected in character or value whether marked 522 or 622, 488 or 388; and (2) that there was no tally at Timaru, except of the number of carcasses, and that the carcasses tendered by the defendants were in fact those which were shipped as part of the consignment mentioned in the plaintiff's bill of lading.

The learned judge held that the defendants were not precluded by sect 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 from relying on these facts, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The case is reported 82 L. T. Rep. 327; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 33; (1900) 1 Q. B. 714.

The plaintiff appealed.

The Bills of Lading Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), provides as follows :

... And whereas it frequently happens that the goods in respect of which bills of lading purport to be signed have not been laden on board, and it is proper that such bills of lading in the hands of a bona fide holder for value should not be questioned by the master or other person signing the same on the ground of the goods not having been laden as aforesaid: Be it therefore enacted . . .

[CT. OF APP.] PARSONS v. NEW ZEALAND SHIPPING COMPANY LIMITED. [CT. OF APP.]

Sect. 3. Every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other person signing the same, notwithstanding that such goods or some part thereof may not have been so shipped, unless such holder of the bill of lading shall have had actual notice at the time of receiving the same that the goods had not been in fact laden on board: Provided that the master or other person so signing may exonerate himself in respect of such misrepresentation by showing that it was caused without any default on his part, and wholly by the fraud of the shipper, or of the holder or some person under whom the holder claims.

Jan. 24.—Dankwerts, K.C. and Loehnis for the plaintiff.—Sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 does not entitle the defendants to say that the goods mentioned in the plaintiff's bills of lading were not in fact shipped. The marks are the only things by which the carcasses can be identified. The bills of lading are bought and sold on the faith of statements in it being correct. The correctness of the marks is a most material matter. The certificate of insurance which the plaintiff received with the bills of lading continues for two months after delivery of the carcasses in the London Docks, and the insurance company would repudiate any liability if a claim were made against them in respect of carcasses bearing marks different from those mentioned in the certificate, which follows the description of the carcasses given in the bills of lading. It is not a fulfilment of the defendant's contract that they should offer to deliver carcasses marked differently from those they contracted to deliver. The defendants kept the plaintiff waiting for the delivery of the carcasses due to him until the ship was completely discharged, and it was found that there were 123 carcasses remaining which were claimed by nobody. It was only then that the defendants tendered these remaining carcasses to the plaintiff, and in the meantime the price of frozen lamb had been falling. The usual modern practice is to put a clause into a charter-party providing that the bill of lading shall be conclusive evidence against the owners of the quantity of cargo received being as stated therein:

Lishman v. Christie and Co., 57 L. T. Rep. 552; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 186; 19 Q. B. Div. 333;

Fisher, Renwick, and Co. v. Calder and Co., 1 Com. Cas. 456.

The object of the enactment in sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 is to prevent disputes arising out of mistakes in the description of the goods named in the bill of lading. The defendants cannot go behind the bills of lading and show what goods actually were put on board. The present case is exactly within the words of the section:

Bradley v. Dunipace, 5 L. T. Rep. 356; 7 H. & N. 200; affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber, 1 H. & C. 521.

There are also dicta to be found in the plaintiff's favour in other cases:

Blanchet v. Powell's Llantwit Collieries Company, 30 L. T. Rep. 28; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 224; L. Rep. 9 Ex. 74;

Jessel v. Bath, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 267.

Carver, K.C. and Leck for the defendants.—In the first place sect. 3 does not apply to the facts of the present case, and the defendants are therefore not estopped from showing that the goods they tendered were the goods actually shipped under the plaintiff's bills of lading; and, secondly, the defendants are entitled to rely upon the clause in the bills that the ship is not to be responsible for correct delivery unless each package is correctly marked before shipment. As to the Act of Parliament, sect. 3 does not make a bill of lading conclusive against its signer except as to statements of the quantity and kind of the goods shipped. The preamble to the Act shows that the Act was directed to cases in which the goods in respect of which a bill of lading purports to be signed have not been laden on board, and sect. 3 clearly refers, not to questions of misdescription of marks on goods, but to the question whether the goods were in fact shipped. Kennedy, J. has found as a fact that the goods with reference to which the bills of lading were signed were actually laden on board. The section therefore does not apply to the present case. The marks are put on the carcasses merely as a means of identification so as to facilitate delivery. The plaintiff cannot complain if the ship delivers to him the identical goods shipped under the bills of lading, though the identification marks on the goods do not exactly correspond with those given in the bills of lading. The insurance which the plaintiff received with his bills of lading was by a declaration made under an open policy by the Christchurch Freezing Company with the insurance company—i.e., a declaration by which the Christchurch Freezing Company insured all their shipments of frozen lambs whatever marks the carcasses might bear. These declarations under an open policy need not be made at all; sometimes they are not made till after the goods insured have been lost:

Stephens v. Australasian Insurance Company, 27 L. T. Rep. 585; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 458; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 18.

The courts do not read sect. 3 in its strictest sense. Where the weight of a cargo is material, a master may be bound by the statement of weight in a bill of lading which he has signed:

Bradley v. Dunipace (ubi sup.).

But where the weight is not material, a statement of the weight of the goods in the bill of lading is not made conclusive by sect. 3:

Blanchet v. Powell's Llantwit Collieries Company (ubi sup.).

The plaintiff would not have suffered any damage by accepting as those which he claimed the carcasses tendered by the defendants. No greater liability attaches to the signer of a bill of lading than to a vendor. If the defendants had agreed to sell to the plaintiff the goods mentioned in the bills of lading and had tendered what were in fact tendered to the plaintiff, the plaintiff would have been bound to accept:

Hopkins v. Hitchcock, 8 L. T. Rep. 204.

Secondly, as to the clause in the bills relative to correctness of marks. The marks are merchants' marks, not shipowners' marks. They are nothing more than an equivalent to the address of the consignee, put on to insure correct delivery. It was only by the fault of the shippers that proper speedy delivery was not made here. The case comes within the clause in the bills :

Jessel v. Bath (ubi sup.);

Grant v. Norway, 10 C. B. 665;

Cox and Co. v. Bruce and Co., 57 L. T. Rep. 128 ;
6 Asp. Mar Law Cas. 152 ; 18 Q. B. Div. 147.

Danckwerts, K.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 19.—SMITH, M.R. read the following judgment:—This is an action by an indorsee for valuable consideration of two bills of lading signed by the defendants to recover the sum of 124*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* for short delivery thereunder in the Port of London of 154 carcasses of frozen lambs ex steamship Fifeshire, and the question is whether the plaintiff was bound to accept in fulfilment of the contract contained in these bills of lading carcasses of frozen lambs which not only did not bear the marks and numbers upon the bills of lading of which he was indorsee for value, but bore marks and numbers which were different from, and not those upon, the bills of lading. It is sufficient to trace what took place in respect of one of these bills of lading, for by so doing the case will be freed of many details, and the point will thus become more conspicuous. On the 30th March 1899, the defendants signed a bill of lading, which, so far as material, is as follows: "Shipped in good order by the Christchurch Meat Company Limited, on board the steamship Fifeshire, now lying in Timaru, 1076 carcasses, frozen lambs, being marked and numbered as in margin, to be delivered in like good order and condition (subject to exceptions not material to this case) at the Port of London unto order or assigns." The marks and numbers in the margin of the bill of lading were as follows: "The Sun Brand, Canterbury, N.Z., Lamb 622 X, 608 carcasses, 722 X, 468 carcasses, weighing 35,806*lb.*" The meaning of these marks and numbers, apart from special meanings unknown to the plaintiff, was that 608 carcasses of Sun Brand, Canterbury, New Zealand, lambs marked 622 X, and also 468 carcasses of similar lambs marked 722 X—i.e., 1076 carcasses in all, and so marked and numbered—had been shipped under the bill of lading upon the steamship Fifeshire, which carcasses so marked and numbered, and not, in my judgment, marked and numbered with other and different marks and numbers, were contracted to be delivered in like good order and condition, subject to exceptions, at the port of discharge. Before dealing with what these marks and numbers further indicate I will state what took place. On the 16th June 1899, the plaintiff purchased the lambs covered by this bill of lading from the agents of the shippers, the Christchurch Meat Company, and upon such purchase received an invoice from them. By this invoice the plaintiff was debited with 1076 carcasses marked 622 X and 722 X, and for these carcasses he paid the sum of 820*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.* Upon the purchase the bill of lading was indorsed and handed to the plaintiff, and he also then received from the vendors a certificate of insurance which covered 608 carcasses marked 622 X and 468 carcasses marked 722 X, for two months from the date of the arrival of the steamship Fifeshire in dock, when lying at the premises of the Leadenhall Market Storage Company and other places. It will thus be seen that these carcasses were shipped under specific marks and numbers. They were taken on board by the ship as being carcasses so marked and numbered, and were to be, in my judgment, as I have said before, delivered, subject to exceptions not material to the point in hand, under these marks and numbers, and certainly not under different marks and numbers at the port of discharge. There is no question in the case of marks and numbers being obliterated by sea perils or otherwise. These carcasses were purchased by the plaintiff from the shippers under the specific marks and numbers, and, as before stated, the plaintiff held a certificate of insurance covering carcasses so specifically marked and numbered and none other. Upon the plaintiff having thus become indorsee of the bill of lading and purchaser of the carcasses above-mentioned, application was made on his behalf for delivery, together with others, of the 608 carcasses marked 622 X and of the 468 carcasses marked 722 X, when delivery of the 468 carcasses marked 722 X was duly made, but delivery of the whole of the 608 carcasses marked 622 X was refused upon the ground that the defendants could not deliver the whole of these 608 carcasses; for, it was said, they had not all been shipped on board; but the defendants were willing to deliver to the plaintiff 507 of the 608 carcasses marked 622 X, as in my judgment they were bound to do, but this was 101 carcasses short of the bill of lading quantity, and in respect of this shortage of 101 carcasses they subsequently tendered 101 carcasses not marked 622 X but carcasses marked 522 X. These the plaintiff refused to accept in fulfilment of his contract with the defendants, and Kennedy, J. has held that he could not refuse and was bound to take these 101 carcasses not marked according to his bill of lading, but marked in an altogether different way, for 622 X is certainly not the same mark and number as 522 X; and the plaintiff appeals.

Before I come to sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855, I wish to consider whether the marks and numbers 622 X, which are the marks and numbers whereby to identify the plaintiff's carcasses and without which they could not be identified, were marks and numbers which were material to the plaintiff either as regards the identity of the carcasses which the plaintiff was entitled to receive under his bill of lading or as regards his dealing with the carcasses after he received them, for if material to the plaintiff I cannot agree with Kennedy, J. that the plaintiff was bound to accept the carcasses tendered in fulfilment of the contract contained in the bill of lading. If the marks and numbers were not material to the plaintiff other considerations would arise, and in my opinion that case would not be the present case. Now, first of all, why are marks and numbers of identification placed in the ordinary course of business upon goods and also upon a bill of lading? In my opinion in the first place to identify to the holder of the bill of lading, whoever he may be, the goods which that holder is entitled to demand and take delivery of ex ship upon its arrival. In the present case there were in the hold of the Fifeshire many thousands of carcasses under different bills of lading with different marks and numbers. If a holder of a bill of lading has, for instance, a bill of lading for carcasses or for other goods, take it for corn in sacks, in a ship containing different shipments of carcasses or corn, with no marks at all thereon, a very improbable contingency, what is he to demand ex ship upon its arrival? It seems to me he can demand nothing, and he must wait until all the holders of other bills of lading with marks and numbers thereon have been satisfied and then take what happens to be left in the hold of the ship, and it may be thus lose the market in the mean time; and, again, if he has a bill of lading with marks and numbers on it and no goods with like marks and numbers come up out of the hold of the ship, the same thing must happen. Again, suppose a bill of lading holder were to take ex ship goods not marked in accordance with his bill of lading, say goods marked as in this case 522 X, instead of goods marked 622 X according to his bill of lading, what would be his position if and when the holder of the bill of lading for goods marked 522 X came and demanded his goods from the bill of lading holder, who had taken the goods marked 522 X under a bill of lading only covering goods 622 X? The answer is obvious. The person who has thus taken these goods would have to give them up. Surely these matters have only to be stated to show the materiality of marks and numbers of identification in commerce and the importance necessarily attaching to them in the carrying on of daily business. In my judgment the marks of identification in this case are very material, although there may be some cases in which certain identification marks may be superfluous or for some other reason immaterial. But this remark has no place in the present case. Again, if in the present case the plaintiff could be forced to take the carcasses marked 522 X as Kennedy, J. has held that he can be, what becomes of his insurance which only covered carcasses marked 622 X and not carcasses marked 522 X? In my opinion if the plaintiff had had to make a claim against the insurance company if the goods were burnt, the company, under a defence that their insurance covered carcasses marked 622 X and not carcasses marked 522 X, would stand well for judgment, or at the very least there would obviously be protracted litigation. With these remarks as to the materiality of marks and numbers of identification I come to the Bills of Lading Act 1855. In my opinion sect. 3 of this Act prevents a person who has signed the bill of lading from attempting to show in a case such as this that, of the carcasses marked 622 X, 101 were not shipped, but that carcasses marked 522 X were shipped in their place. In my opinion the Bills of Lading Act was passed to shut out a person who signs the bill of lading from a controversy such as this with a holder for value of a bill of lading. This section enacts that "every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other person signing the same, notwithstanding that such goods or some part thereof may not have been so shipped, unless such holder of the bill of lading shall have had actual notice at the time of receiving the same that the goods had not been in fact laden on board; provided that the master or other person so signing may exonerate himself in respect of such misrepresentation by showing that it was caused without any default on his part, and wholly by the fraud of the shipper or of the holder or some person under whom the holder claims." No question arises upon the latter part of this section. What then are the goods in this case represented by the bill of lading to have been shipped on board the steamship Fifeshire? In my opinion the representation is not that 608 carcasses not marked or numbered at all, nor that 608 carcasses mark 522 X, have been shipped, but that 608 carcasses marked 622 X have been shipped. That being, in my opinion the representation of the bill of lading, the Bills of Lading Act 1855 applies to this case and shuts out the present suggested defence from the defendants, and I do not think that the Bills of Lading Act is confined to marks of quality and quantity which are comparatively rare when compared with marks of identification, and which quality marks when used are usually coupled with a statement in the bill of lading "weight, contents, and value unknown." In my opinion sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act applies to what is usual if not universal in commerce—viz., to goods as in the present case shipped under specific marks and numbers of identification, and so represented in the bill of lading. The above is my opinion independently of the special value found in this case to be attached to the marks and numbers themselves. It was proved that "Sun Brand X" denotes the quality of the carcasses; the number 6 denotes the date when the animal was killed and put into ice; the duplication of the numbers (2.2.) show where the animal was killed and frozen; the final number 2 shows the grade. These numbers appear to me to be material, apart from identification, should disputes arise as to the freshness or otherwise of or about the quality of the carcasses. Moreover, if the plaintiff is bound to take carcasses marked 522 X, as Kennedy, J. holds he is, instead of carcasses marked 622 X, he will be bound to take carcasses killed and frozen at a date different from that at which carcasses marked 622 X in his bill of lading, which he has purchased, were killed and frozen. Can this be? I think not. Kennedy, J. embarked upon the inquiry as to whether a carcase marked 522 X had any different value in the market for meat from a carcase marked 622 X, and as a commercial article he found that it was absolutely unaffected in its character or value; but, with submission, it is not merely a question as to whether the carcasses under the different marks were of the same value in the market, but whether the marks and numbers were material or immaterial to the plaintiff. If I purchase cases of champagne identified by marks A B C, what answer is it when I claim my goods so marked and identified, to say that the goods tendered, which are marked X Y Z, are of the same value in the market, or even of greater value than those marked A B C? For the reasons above I think that the marks of identification in this case were of materiality to the plaintiff, and that the tender was not a good tender. Kennedy, J. also investigated the question whether 101 carcasses marked 622 X were put on board at Timaru, and he came to the conclusion that they were not, and that the 101 carcasses marked 522 X were put on board in their place; but this, in my opinion, for the reasons above, he could not go into as a defence by a person who signed the bill of lading, and I think that the plaintiff could not be forced by the defendants in this case to take the 101 carcasses not marked according to his bill of lading; and if this case had rested here I could not have found for the defendants. For the reasons hereafter appearing I need say nothing about the damages.

A very formidable point was next taken by Mr. Carver for the defendants, which was that even if the tender of 101 carcasses was a bad tender the defendants were protected by a clause in the bill of lading for being sued in the circumstances of this case for incorrect delivery of 608 carcasses marked 622 X. This clause is as follows: "The ship will not be responsible for correct delivery unless each package is distinctly, correctly, and permanently marked by the merchant before shipment with a mark and number or address." What is the meaning of each package being correctly marked with the mark and number before shipment? In my judgment it can only mean correctly marked with the mark and number according to the bill of lading; for with what else can the mark and number upon the packages mentioned in this clause be correct? These marks and numbers must also be distinct and permanent. In my opinion, this is the true meaning of this clause, and it was inserted to meet a case like the present, where the goods were not correctly marked according to the bill of lading. It must not be forgotten that the bill of lading is drawn by the shippers, who ought to make the marks and numbers in the bill of lading and on the goods correct with each other. Kennedy, J. has found, and I do not differ from his finding upon this issue, though he has not applied the clause, for it was not necessary for him to do so in the view he took of this case, that the 101 carcasses marked 522 X were not correctly marked, and should have been marked 622 X, in which case, and in which alone, in my opinion, they would have been correctly marked within the meaning of the clause. As, therefore, these 101 carcasses were not correctly marked, this clause comes into play and exempts the defendants from the present claim of the plaintiff. For this last reason I think this appeal should be dismissed, and with costs.

COLLINS, L.J. read the following judgment:— This case raises a point of some difficulty upon the meaning and effect of sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855. The case came before us on appeal from Kennedy, J. in whose judgment the facts are fully set out. The plaintiff is the indorsee for value of two bills of lading signed by the defendants; and he sues for damages for non-delivery of certain carcasses, part of a consignment of frozen lambs' carcasses embraced in the said bills of lading. The same point arises on both the bills of lading, and it is not necessary to refer to more than one of them. This acknowledged the shipment of "1076 carcasses frozen lamb," "being marked and numbered as in the margin." The marks in the margin are "Sun Brand, Canterbury, N.Z., Lamb, 622 X 608 carcasses, 722 X 468 carcasses, weighing 35,806lb." The learned judge has found as a fact, and I think the evidence warrants his conclusion, that there were included among the 608 carcasses described in the margin as having the marks 622 X 101 carcasses marked 522 X, which by a mistake of the shippers were misdescribed in the margin of the bill of lading as marked 622 X instead of 522 X, but were in fact shipped under, and intended to be comprised in, the bill of lading. Those marked 522 X were, as he finds, of precisely the same character and value as a commercial article as those marked 622 X, so that a contract for sale of Sun Brand lambs, second quality, of the Christchurch Company's freezing might have been satisfied equally well out of either mark, or out of both indiscriminately. In fact, the first two marginal figures have no significance whatever to the buyer, and convey to him no representation as to the character of the meat. The final figure does indicate the grade. In the words of Kennedy, J., "The meat as a commercial article is absolutely unaffected in its character or value, whether it is marked 522 or 622." The defendants tendered those carcasses marked 522 X as being part of those shipped under the plaintiff's bill of lading, but, the price of frozen lamb having fallen since his purchase, the plaintiff refused to accept them, and brought this action for damages for non-delivery. His contention is that under sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855, the defendants are estopped from denying that the goods marked as described in the margin of the bill of lading were shipped, and that, as those he tendered did not bear identically the same marks, there has been a failure to deliver which entitles the plaintiff to the damages fixed by the bill of lading in case of loss—viz., the invoice price of the goods. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that the goods tendered were in fact the goods shipped under and comprised in the bill of lading, although some of them were by mistake described as bearing a mark which they did not bear; that the existence and identity of the goods are unaltered in fact, though the identification may be more difficult by reason of the misdescription. And this was the view taken by Kennedy, J. He was of opinion that the identity of the goods tendered with those shipped under the bill of lading was proved, and my judgment is based on the finding. If such identity could not be established, very different considerations would arise. As the plaintiff's case is rested wholly on the estoppel of the Bills of Lading Act, it is desirable to see what was the mischief to which the Act was addressed in order to determine whether sect. 3 will bear the construction placed on it by the plaintiff. The preamble, so far as it relates to this matter, is as follows: "Whereas it frequently happens that the goods in respect of which bills of lading purport to be signed have not been laden on board, and it is proper that such bills of lading in the hands of a bonâ fide holder for value should not be questioned by the master or other person signing the same on the ground of the goods not having been laden as aforesaid, Be it therefore enacted," &c. The mischief, therefore, which it was thought desirable to remedy only arose when the goods in respect of which the bill of lading purported to be signed had not been put on board, and the master or person signing relied on that fact as an excuse for non-delivery. Here it is a fact that all the goods in respect of which the bill of lading was intended to be signed were put on board, though certain of the marks on some of them were miscopied in the bill of lading, and the person signing is not setting up that they have not been laden, but, on the contrary, is insisting that they have been laden and is claiming to deliver them. Sect. 3 is as follows: [His Lordship read the section, and continued]: The section, therefore, addresses itself to the mischief named in the preamble. It deals with persons who have acted on a misrepresentation in a bill of lading that goods have been shipped when they have not, and estops the person signing from denying the shipment. It is the identity of the goods shipped with those represented as shipped which is the pith of the matter; that is the subject of the misrepresentation referred to, and nothing which could not be material to such identity need be embraced in the estoppel. It is obvious that when marks have no market meaning and indicate nothing whatever to a buyer as to the nature, quality, or quantity of the goods which he is buying it is absolutely immaterial to him whether the goods bear one mark or another. These considerations throw a light on the interpretation of the section. It is only as to "such shipment" that the bill of lading is said to be conclusive, and such shipment refers back to the goods which the bill of lading represents to have been put on board. Now, the goods which the bill of lading represents as shipped continue to be the same goods, whichever out of any number of merely arbitrary marks are put on them, and will remain the same whether the marks were on them before shipment or are rubbed off or changed after shipment. In other words, they go to the identification only, and not the identity. The goods represented by the bill of lading to have been shipped have been shipped, and a mistaken statement as to marks of this class merely makes identification more difficult; it does not affect the existence or identity of the goods.

It seems to me, therefore, that both on the strict wording of the section and having regard to the mischief to which it was addressed the plaintiff has failed to bring his case within the estoppel which it creates. It is not the fact and it would not be true to say that the 1076 carcasses which the bill of lading represented to have been shipped were not shipped because the bill of lading did not correctly describe the mark on some of their number. In my opinion, as I have already said, their identity was unaffected, and the property in them, marked as they were, passed to the plaintiff on the transfer of the bill of lading. The defendants are estopped from denying "such shipment," but nothing more, and the shipment is none the less the shipment represented by the bill of lading because some of the marks were misdescribed. The defendants are not here questioning the bill of lading on the ground of the goods not having been laden, and are not driven to asserting anything which they are estopped from asserting. I agree with Kennedy, J. that to adopt the construction contended for by the appellant would be to strain the fair meaning of the section and extend it beyond the mischief it was intended to meet. Moreover, if mere identification marks are within the estoppel, any discrepancy between the marks on the goods and the mark in the margin would equally destroy the identity. Every difference would be equally material, whether the result of accident or clerical error. To hold this would impose an enormous and, indeed, having regard to the practice of tallying, an impossible task on the shipowners. Marks which convey a meaning as to the character of the goods stand on a totally different footing. These, it seems to me, would be embraced in the estoppel, because the characteristics which they indicate are essential to the identity of the goods, and an article so marked is a different article in the market from one not so marked. They are material factors in the identity as distinguished from the identification of the goods sold, and therefore a discrepancy between the goods described and the goods shipped would mean a difference of identity, and the shipowner would therefore fail to prove that the goods which the bill of lading represented to have been shipped had been shipped, and being estopped from denying that the goods shipped were "such" as the bill of lading represented them to be he could not make a good delivery. On the other hand, suppose a mere arbitrary mark correctly described in the bill of lading had got rubbed off in transit, and that the package was, nevertheless, otherwise sufficiently identified, would not the indorsee of the bill of lading be bound to accept it? Would not the property in it have passed to him so that he could have maintained trover for it if the shipowner had on demand refused to deliver it, and though he might have his action for any delay in delivery through difficulty of identification, could he sue the carrier for non-delivery on the footing that it had been lost, though the carrier was pressing it on his acceptance? If not, it must be because the loss of the mark has not destroyed the identity. But the appellant's argument involves a right to sue for non-delivery in such a case, since the ground of rejection and of action would be precisely the same in both cases—viz., the want of correspondence in marks between the thing shipped and the thing tendered. Suppose the master had signed the bill of lading, and the price of the goods had gone up, and the action had been brought against the shipowner claiming delivery of the carcasses in question, could he have defended himself on the ground that the master could not make him responsible for goods that had not been put on board, and that the undelivered balance of the bill of lading quantity had not been put on board? (See Grant v. Norway, 10 C. B. 665.) Or, on proof of the actual facts, would he not have been held liable on the ground that the goods were put on board, and that the master's mistake in allowing a wrong mark of this class to get into the margin (not a quality mark, as in Cox v. Bruce, ubi sup.) was a mistake within the scope of his authority, and that all the 1076 carcasses were in fact shipped? Or, to take a still simpler case, if this action had been brought before the Bills of Lading Act, and the same facts had been proved, would they have supported a defence that the goods had never been put on board, and that the defendant therefore never became liable to deliver them? I think the defendant would have been forced to admit that he had in fact received on board the goods intended to be described in the bill of lading. But, if this be so, this case is clearly not within the mischief at which the Bills of Lading Act was pointed. Indeed, it was not suggested in argument that the shipper could have maintained this action, and the plaintiff takes only the shippers' rights under the bill of lading by the transfer, except so far as the statutory estoppel alters them. That estoppel is, in my opinion, limited to the identity of the goods shipped. An element of confusion, as it seems to me, has been introduced into this case based on the meaning which the first figure of the marks in question, the only one which did not correspond with the bill of lading, had for the manufacturers, indicating, as it did, to them the day of the week on which the carcass was put into the freezing process. But, as it is found as a fact that these figures conveyed nothing whatever to dealers in these goods, and, further, that the first figure indicated in fact nothing which had any bearing on the quality of the goods, but was merely a private mark helping the manufacturers to trace them through their books, it seems to me that any considerations based on them can have no place in the discussion. The same remark applies to the insurance. The goods were equally covered under the floating policy, whether they were 522 or 622: (see Stephens v. Australasian Insurance Company, ubi sup.). The result is that the right of action, if any, for loss or inconvenience caused by the mistake is untouched, but the plaintiff cannot maintain an action for non-delivery based on estoppel.

The decided cases throw little light on the matter. They certainly do not favour the appellant's contention. Bradley v. Dunipace (ubi sup.) merely decided that where two sets of bags of rye meal of two different sizes but with the same mark had been shipped promiscuously, but the master had signed two bills of lading for them, one of which was for 467 bags, with a statement of weight added which, if calculated, would have worked out to approximately 12st. a bag, the master was not excused from delivering the right bags to the holder of the 467 bill of lading by the clause "not responsible for weight." It was his duty to deliver the right bags, and the statement of weight might have helped him to identify them. This does not seem to touch the point in discussion. Cox v. Bruce (ubi sup.) emphasises the distinction between quality marks and other marks. Blanchet v. Powell's Llantwit Collieries Company (ubi sup.) decided that a master who had signed a bill of lading for goods described as of a certain weight was not estopped in an action brought by him against the consignee for lump freight from ascertaining that the amount stated was a mistake and that a less weight had been shipped, though he might have been had the action been against him for non-delivery. The defendant by paying money into court had admitted liability for some freight, whereas the defence, if good, would have gone to the whole. The issue of amount shipped was therefore immaterial. The decision and the dicta do not touch the question of marks, going not to quantity or quality, but to identification only. The other cases cited come no nearer to the point. It remains to consider the effect of the clause in the bill of lading: "The ship will not be responsible for correct delivery unless each package is distinctly, correctly, and permanently marked by the merchant before shipment with a mark and number or address." The bill of lading is on the shippers' (the Christchurch Company Limited) own form. One side of it has a printed statement of their address and different factories and an enumeration of various brands used by them. The practice with respect to them, as proved in evidence, is that a bill of lading is filled in at their factory with the marks and numbers supplied to them by their own servants, whose business it is to tally the goods into cold vans for carriage to the ship's side.

They are thence shot rapidly—at the rate of about 1000 per hour—into the cold chamber in the ship, and no attempt is made by the ship to do more than tally the number of carcasses received. The marks and numbers filled in by the shippers in the margin are accepted by the person who signs the bill of lading without verification. Timaru, the port of loading, is an open roadstead and dangerous, and it is important that the loading should be done with the utmost dispatch. What, then, is meant by "correctly marked" in the clause? The marks referred to seem in their context to be clearly indentionation marks, which would get copied as such into the margin of the bill of lading. If so, it is difficult to see what standard of correctness could be applied to such a mark which did not include conformity to the mark in the margin of the bill of lading as tendered by the shippers. If the two coincide, it is difficult to see in what other respect the "correctness" of the mark could be material. At all events, the clause is clearly framed on the footing that but for the clause the reciprocal rights to give and take delivery would be unimpaired by the incorrectness of mere identification marks, the shipowner being left at his peril to deliver to the person entitled, the latter retaining his right to complain of "incorrect delivery" brought about by the difficulty of identification, but not excused from accepting if the identity of the goods were established. I regard it not so much as a separate ground of defence in itself as confirmatory of the main position above indicated that in the contract of the bill of lading mere identification marks are not regarded as affecting the central obligation to give and take delivery of the goods shipped, though incorrectness may furnish ground for a cross-claim if the consignee is thereby damaged. As to the point that, if the estoppel is not extended to the identification marks, it will lead to great difficulty in practice, I think the difficulty is less formidable than it appears at first sight. It must be remembered that the difficulty, such as it is, exists in all cases where there is no estoppel. At the time when the Bills of Lading Act 1855 was passed bills of lading were much more rarely signed by persons other than the master than is the case now, and whenever the action was brought against the shipowner who had not signed, which would be the usual case, difficulty of identification would not have excused delivery or acceptance, if identity were in fact established. The Legislature does not seem to have addressed itself to the matter at all, but to have left it to the ordinary law. I am of opinion, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J. read the following judgment:—On the evidence it has been found by Kennedy, J. that the carcasses tendered by the defendants were part of those shipped under, and intended to be described in, the plaintiff's bill of lading. I am not prepared to differ from that finding. The plaintiff, however, contends that the defendants are by sect. 3 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 precluded from going into evidence in order to establish the identity of the carcasses tendered with those described in the bill of lading, by reason of the discrepancy between the marks on these carcasses and the marks mentioned in the bill of lading. This contention raises a question of general importance as to the

[CT. OF APP.]

THE CAMPANIA.

[CT. OF APP.]

meaning and effect of the section which speaks of a bill of lading "representing goods to have been shipped." Is every reference in a bill of lading to the marks on the goods of necessity part of the description of the goods within the meaning of the section? I think not. When it is remembered what the state of the law was at the time when the Act was passed, and what was the mischief intended to be remedied by the Act, it appears to me pushing the estoppel created by the section too far against the person signing the bill of lading to hold that he can in no case be permitted to go into evidence to prove a mistake in the bill of lading in reference to some of the marks on the goods. Suppose, by way of example, a bill of lading was dealing with five parcels of goods of the same size, quality, and value, and, after describing these goods accurately, it proceeded to state that the parcels were numbered consecutively 1 to 5, could a purchaser refuse to accept delivery of one or two of the parcels, and hold the signer of the bill of lading estopped under the section, because it turned out that the two out of the five parcels which should have been respectively marked 3 and 4 were both marked 4? It appears to me that he could not, and that to hold the contrary would be to put a construction on the Act, and give an effect to its wording, which was never contemplated by the Legislature, and which the contents of the Act do not justify. In short, for the purposes of the Act a description in a bill of lading of marks on the goods is not of necessity part of the description of the goods themselves. Of course, difficult questions may arise on particular bills of lading, whether certain references to marks do or do not form part of the description of the goods within the meaning of sect. 3. Those questions will fall to be determined according to the circumstances of the particular cases in which they arise. But, speaking generally, when the section refers to the bill of lading as "representing goods to have been shipped" it is, in my opinion, only contemplating those statements which may be said to describe the goods in the ordinary mercantile sense—that is to say, statements which would substantially affect a purchaser relying on the bill of lading as to the quantity, quality, or value of the goods he was buying. Marks on the goods which, so far as the purchaser is concerned, have no meaning, and could only be referred to in the bill of lading in order to assist in the more sure or speedy identification or delivery of the goods, do not, in my opinion, form part of the description of the goods within the meaning of sect. 3, so as to bind the signer of the bill of lading by way of estoppel. If a bill of lading makes a mistake in describing some marks like those last mentioned, and thereby delivery of the goods is delayed or not effected, the purchaser will have all the remedies for any damage caused by the delay or non-delivery which he would have had if the Act had not been passed. In this point of view, no doubt, marks assisting identification are material to a purchaser. But I do not think he is entitled, merely because a mistake in the bill of lading as to the identification marks may cause trouble in delivery, to say that sect. 3 applies, and that the signer of the bill of lading is bound to admit that the goods exactly as mentioned in the bill of lading were shipped, and yet cannot be delivered. Applying the above considerations to the case now before us,

I come to the conclusion that the appellant fails. The differences in marking between the goods he refuses to take and the goods mentioned in the bill of lading are differences in respect of matters not relating to the quantity, quality or value of the goods he bought on the faith of the bill of lading, and which in no wise influenced or affected him in his character of a person considering whether he should buy the goods referred to in the bill of lading. It is clear on the evidence that, so far as he is concerned, the differences in marking are wholly unsubstantial so far as they relate to the goods in themselves. All that can be said on his behalf is that, owing to the marks not being correctly described in the bill of lading as compared with the marks on the goods themselves, some delay in delivery would probably ensue, and in fact did ensue. But, as already pointed out, this will not justify him in contending that the defendants are estopped under sect. 3, whatever other rights it may give him. As to the insurance I need not add anything to what has been said by Collins, L.J. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed, and I have not to decide the further point that was raised upon the clause in the bill of lading which has been referred to by the Master of the Rollis and Collins, L.J. But, had I been obliged to take the view that the signer of the bill of lading was estopped as contended for by the appellant, I should have felt some difficulty in holding that a clause which was directed to "correct delivery" in case of packages not being "distinctly, correctly, and permanently marked by the merchant before shipment," freed the signer of the bill of lading from liability in a case where, ex hypothesi, he would be obliged to admit that goods of the appellant were shipped and are not delivered, and were not lost, injured, or altered in any way during the voyage.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Charles Butcher.

Solicitors for the defendants, William A. Crump and Sons.

Wednesday, May 15, 1901.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., SMITH, M.R., and ROMER, L.J., and Nautical Assessors.)

THE CAMPANIA. (a)

Collision—Fog—Speed—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 16.

A passenger steamship, fitted with twin screws, which was proceeding at the rate of nine and a half knots an hour in a dense fog, was held not to be going at a moderate speed, and to have committed a breach of art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, although it was proved that her engines were so constructed that she could not go slower without stopping from time to time.

That article is imperative, and, therefore, although such consequences as loss of handiness and the risk of loss of position may result from proceeding at a lower rate of speed, which may be attained by occasionally stopping her engines, considerations of that nature do not justify a vessel in proceeding at more than a moderate speed.

The judgment of Barnes, J. affirmed.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., K.C., and SUTTON TRIMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CT. OF APP.]

THE CAMPANIA.

[CT. OF APP.]

THIS was an appeal in a collision action brought by the owners of the barque Embleton against the owners of the steamship Campania.

The case is reported in 83 L. T. Rep. 511 and 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 151.

The collision occurred at about 8.30 a.m. on the 21st July 1900 about twenty-six miles north-east of the Tuskar Light in the Irish Channel. The weather at the time was a dense fog.

The Campania was a twin-screw steamship of 12,950 tons gross and 4974 tons net register, carrying passengers, mails, and a general cargo. She was manned by a crew of 417 hands all told, and was bound from New York to Liverpool. She was on a course of N. 35 E. true. Her engines were working at slow, and she was making between nine and ten knots an hour.

The Embleton was a barque of 1196 tons register, and was on a voyage from Liverpool to New Zealand, laden with a general cargo, and manned by a crew of eighteen hands all told. She was sailing close hauled on the starboard tack, heading about S.S.E. true, and making about two knots an hour through the water.

There was some controversy in the court below as to whether she was sounding her foghorn, either at all, or as required by the regulations.

No signals were heard from her by those on board the Campania, and the first that was seen of her was the loom of her hull about 150ft. from the steamer's bows.

The engines of the Campania were at once put full speed astern and the helm put hard-a-starboard, but the Campania struck the Embleton, causing her to sink almost at once.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants with proceeding at too high a rate of speed, in breach of art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and the main question in the action was whether in the circumstances the speed of the Campania was a breach of the regulation.

By the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 16:

Every vessel shall in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rainstorms, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions. A steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.

Barnes, J. found, as a fact, that the whistle of the Embleton was being duly sounded at proper intervals, but was of opinion that the Campania was, under the circumstances, being navigated at an excessive rate of speed, and found her alone to blame for the collision.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

Pickford, K.C. and Batten (with them Butler Aspinall, K.C.) for the appellants.—In determining what is a moderate speed, due regard must be had not only to the safety of other vessels, but also to the vessel herself. In the case of a fast mail steamer like the Campania, the safest speed is that at which she can manœuvre most readily. At a lower speed than the one at which she was going she will not steer well, and, if she were to go ahead and then occasionally stop, as suggested, there would be danger of her losing her position. It is submitted that as the collision occurred in the open sea, and the Campania could at a speed of nine and a half knots be brought to a standstill in a little more than her own length, such a speed was a moderate one under the circumstances.

Joseph Walton, K.C., Laing, K.C., and Bateson, for the respondents, were not called on.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In this case I agree entirely with the reasons of the very careful judgment of Barnes, J., and I think that would be sufficient for the purpose of giving the judgment of the court. But, having regard to the arguments that have been addressed to us by Mr. Pickford and Mr. Batten, and to the commercial point of view insisted on by them, I think it right to state my own views with reference to the objections to the judgment which have been raised. Barnes, J. has found, acting in entire concurrence with and on the advice of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, that this vessel, the Campania, was disobeying art. 16, and if she was disobeying it of course she is to blame. The nautical assessors who assist us tell us that they entirely agree in the findings of the learned judge of the court below, and therefore I have only to deal with the matter, not from the point of view of any dispute of fact, but from the point of view of the arguments addressed to us. The collision happened twenty-six miles N.E. of the Tuskar, and early in the day, in a position where the Elder Brethren have thought, and on the facts it is really not disputed, that vessels would be likely to be met with navigating in the opposite direction. The Campania, which has an ordinary full speed of twenty-one knots, was steaming uniformly—that is to say, continuously—before and at the time of the collision at a speed of a little over nine knots—9.23—roughly, between nine and ten knots an hour. The weather was such that vessels could only be seen at a distance of possibly the ship's length, about 600ft. The distance at which the other vessel was actually seen was 150ft. The Campania is a twin-screw vessel, and it is said that she is best under command about nine knots—that is to say, a speed of not less than nine knots—and that she does not steer so well, and possibly, I think, she steers badly, if going under nine knots. I think it is very important to consider one fact pointed out in the judgment of Barnes, J.—namely, that from nine to ten knots is the full speed of a very large proportion of the cargo steamers navigating the seas, and if we are to have a different rule for vessels which have a higher ordinary speed, the Legislature should so lay it down. The court should not impose a less responsibility upon a ship that is going at that speed unless the circumstances are such as to show that there has been no breach of the rule. The reasons why the Campania says she must go, and was right in going, at over nine knots are, first, that she might otherwise lose her reckoning; in other words, she might either overrun her log or not know by mere observation, counting the number of revolutions, what distance she had gone. Of course it is common knowledge that vessels do calculate their speed and ascertain their position partly by the number of revolutions of their engines when they are running without interruption. As to that, I would call attention to what Barnes, J. was

CT. OF APP.]

THE DEVONIAN.

[CT. OF APP.]

advised on the point. He says in his judgment: "But the Elder Brethren advise me that unless there is something exceptional in the circumstances, all that this might involve would be delay and the taking of proper precautions to haul out from the coast, if approaching it, and for verifying her position." So far as losing her position is concerned, what had occurred to my mind before I noticed the advice given to Barnes, J. by his assessors was that although it might involve delay and difficulty it cannot be a sufficient reason to justify a higher rate of speed, or a speed which we think would be a breach of the rules. The other ground put forward is that she manœuvres best at nine knots, and assuming there is risk of collision she is handier at nine knots. As to that the learned judge, having adopted the view laid down over and over again in the Admiralty Court, that vessels in such a position ought to stop from time to time and listen—feel their way—I remember Lord Esher and Butt, J. saying the same thing—Barnes, J. is advised thus: "The objection to this by the defendants is that she cannot then steer properly and ensure a good course and certainty as to the distance run; but the Elder Brethren advise me . . . there was nothing in the circumstances or conditions of the present case to prevent the Campania from proceeding in this manner and yet keeping sufficient steerage way."

Therefore if we are to accept the arguments of Mr. Pickford and Mr. Batten, we must on some ground of law go against the advice given in the court below and concurred in by our assessors and many most distinguished judges. To my mind in these collision cases the facility in handling these large steamers is by no means the only important consideration. One of the most important considerations is how soon the way can be taken off a very large ship. I do not rely upon the circumstances of this particular case so very much, though it is very striking that a ship should cut through a barque of 1100 tons, laden with iron, and sink her in a very few minutes, with the loss of eleven of her crew. But I rely upon the experience of the courts, that when you have this enormous momentum, and if that momentum is the consequence of nine or ten knots speed, you have to take it off by reversing, and I think that facility in taking off way quickly and reducing to a position of comparative rest is not only of great importance so as to avoid collision, but also in avoiding the serious consequences of it. I think that consideration must have affected the framers of the rule and the judges in construing it when dealing with questions of speed. Next, speaking for myself, I must say that I think the court below did consider that vessels which are going at nine and ten knots and not stopping and doing that very thing which learned judges have pointed out ought to be done, do not give themselves the same opportunity of hearing sound signals, for it is common knowledge that foghorns and other sounds are not easily distinguishable in abnormal weather. I see no reason for differing from the views of the learned judge, and in my opinion it is of very great importance that persons who have this great responsibility, both to their own ship and to other ships, should not act contrary to the rule so often recognised, unless there is paramount necessity. I have only one more word to say. I am not going to say for a moment that there may not be cases in which under the rule it would be right to go at a higher rate of speed than what, in other circumstances, would be thought to be moderate. I can imagine that even in a fog, owing to danger, either from narrow channels or currents, it might be necessary for the safety of the ship to go at a higher speed. This is not one of those cases. It is a case of a steamship in St. George's Channel, where, speaking generally, there is ample sea room, but where there is danger from other vessels which are likely to be coming down to the Tuskar. I have, perhaps, said more in this case than I need have said, because I end as I began by saying that I see no reason to differ from the very carefully considered judgment of the learned judge, and I think we could not upon any ground of law, and certainly not of fact, hold that this speed at which the Campania was going was, within the terms of art. 16, moderate, having regard to the existing circumstances and conditions. The appeal must be dismissed.

SMITH, M.R.—I have not the slightest doubt in the world that the Campania was breaking the rule in going at the speed she did in this dense fog.

ROMER, L.J. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondents, Batsons, Warr, and Wimshurst, Liverpool.

Monday, May 20, 1901.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., SMITH, M.R., and ROMER, L.J., and Naval Assessors.)

THE DEVONIAN. (a)

Collision—Tug and tow—Improper lights on tug—Liability of tow—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 3—Mersey Rules, art. 4 (a) Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 419 (1), (4).

A steam-tug made fast to a vessel at anchor in the river Mersey, ready to assist her if required, is a steam vessel towing or attached for the purpose of towing or manœuvring her, and must at night exhibit the lights required by art. 4 (a) of the Mersey Rules.

In such circumstances the tow is responsible for the lights of the tug and will be deemed in fault under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 419, if the tug exhibit other lights, and if the breach of the rule may have contributed to a collision between the tow and another vessel.

The Regulations for the Navigation of the River Mersey, made by Order in Council the 17th Sept. 1900, have the same statutory sanction as the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. Judgment of Sir F. Jeune, affirmed.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action brought by the owners of the Norwegian steamship Veritas against the owners of the steamship Devonian.

A report of the case will be found in 84 L. T. Rep. 125; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 158.

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., K.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CT. OF APP.]

THE DEVONIAN.

[CT. OF APP.]

The collision occurred in the river Mersey about 10.45 p.m. on the 12th Oct. 1900.

The Veritas at the time was at anchor in the river, exhibiting two anchor lights in accordance with rule 6 of the Mersey Rules—namely, a white light forward and a white light aft, not less than 15ft. lower than the forward light. She had put into the Mersey on account of her engines having broken down, and at the time of the collision the tug Prairie Cock was fast fore and aft on the starboard side, ready to assist her if required.

The Prairie Cock was exhibiting the usual masthead and side lights of a steamship under way.

In these circumstances the Devonian, which was coming up the river in charge of a duly qualified pilot with a steam-tug fast ahead of her, ran into the Veritas. At the trial it was alleged on behalf of the Devonian that the Veritas was not exhibiting any, or, at least, proper and visible, anchor lights, and that those on board the Devonian were misled by the under-way lights of the Prairie Cock. It was also contended that, if the Devonian was in fault, the collision was due to the negligence of the pilot alone.

The learned judge found that the Veritas was exhibiting proper anchor lights, that they were burning sufficiently brightly, and that those on board the Devonian were to blame for not having seen them. He also found that the pilot had not received proper assistance from those on board the Devonian, and that the plea of compulsory pilotage did not avail the defendants. He further held that the Prairie Cock ought to have been exhibiting the regulation towing lights, and as, in his opinion, the absence of the towing lights might have contributed to the collision, he held that the Veritas was to be deemed in fault for the tug's breach of the statutory rule as to lights. He therefore found both vessels to blame for the collision.

By the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 3. A steam vessel when towing another vessel shall, in addition to her side-lights, carry two bright lights in vertical line one over the other, not less than 6ft. apart. . . . Each of these lights shall be of the same construction and character, and shall be carried in the same position as the white lights mentioned in art. 2 (a), except the additional light, which may be carried at a height of not less than 14ft. above the hull. . . .

By the Mersey Rules:

Art. 4. (a) A steam vessel when towing another vessel or vessels, or when attached for the purpose of towing or manœuvring such vessel or vessels, shall carry the compulsory lights prescribed by art. 3 of the General Regulations. . . .

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60):

Sect. 419.—(1) All owners and masters of ships shall obey the collision regulations, and shall not carry or exhibit any other lights, or use any other fog signals, than such as are required by those regulations.

(4) Where in a case of collision it is proved to the court before whom the case is tried that any of the collision regulations have been infringed, the ship by which the regulations has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances made departure from the regulation necessary.

Laing, K.C. and Stubbs for the appellants.—The Veritas is not liable for the negligence of the tug. There is no evidence that the Veritas had control over the tug's lights. In order to bring the Veritas within the highly penal sect. 419 (a) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 the breach must be by the ship herself. That section cannot depend on a nice inquiry of fact as to which vessel had control at the time of the accident. The tow can only be made liable for a wrong act of the tug when it is such a one that it could have been checked and corrected by the tow. If the defendants' contention is right, a breach by the tug under sect. 419 involves the master of the tow in committing a misdemeanour. The tug is an independent contractor:

Jones v. Liverpool Corporation, 14 Q. B. Div. 890.

The question is, was the tug in fact under the control of the tow, and it is submitted she could not be in this case, for she had not begun to tow. She was merely attached to the tow instead of being anchored a short distance off. The tug was, under the circumstances, exhibiting proper lights, and does not come within either art. 4 (a) of the Mersey Rules or art. 3 of the Regulations. She was not at anchor, nor made fast to the ground nor ashore. She was not towing. It may be that this is a casus omissus. The exhibition of under-way lights could not, in the circumstances, possibly have contributed to the collision.

Joseph Walton, K.C. (Aspinall, K.C. and Glynn with him) for the respondents.—The tow is responsible for the negligence of the tug. The tug and tow become one instrument of navigation, and the tug is as much one with the ship as if she was a part of it:

The American and The Syria, 31 L. T. Rep. 42; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 350; L. Rep. 6 P. C. 127.

The failure of the Prairie Cock to carry towing lights is a breach of the regulations, and it cannot be argued she was not attached for the purpose of towing or manœuvring. If the tow had drifted, the tug might at any moment have been called to put a strain on the rope.

Laing, K.C. in reply.

The following cases were also cited:

The Niobe, 59 L. T. Rep. 257; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300; 13 P. Div. 55;

The Quickstep, 63 L. T. Rep. 713; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 603; 15 P. Div. 196;

The Stormcock, 53 L. T. Rep. 53; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 470;

The Morgengry and Blackcock, 81 L. T. Rep. 417; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 591; (1900) P. 1.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This is an interesting and important case. Before I deal with the law applicable to the case I think it is desirable I should clear away any misunderstanding as to what the facts are. If the case had been that of a tug merely hanging on to a vessel at anchor—hitched on, as Mr. Laing cleverly put it when he opened the case—for the purpose of preventing herself drifting away, and not at the time engaged, or not at the time in a condition to enter the service of any ship, I think very different considerations might have arisen. It is for that reason I think that we ought to be very careful to ascertain what the facts are. In all these cases statements made in the ship's log are assumed to be honest, except perhaps in salvage cases. The ship's log is taken to be a fair contemporaneous statement of what manœuvres are being carried out, and over and over again the court has taken a log as fair evidence against the ship. The log in this case says that about seven o'clock a tug came, and was engaged to make fast alongside, and to manœuvre and keep the vessel to her anchor until she could enter the dock. When that position is put to the captain, he is asked, "Is that right?" He answers "Yes, he was engaged to stop alongside to manœuvre, and to keep us up to our anchor if anything should happen." I think the learned President has come to the conclusion, and I do not think there is any evidence to show that it is wrong, that the tug was fast fore and aft, and that she was in a position to put a strain on the rope at any time she might see fit or be required to do it. I do not think we could come to any other conclusion merely because it was only a 7in. rope. The judge seems to have thought it was a larger rope which was going to be employed. At any rate, he has come to the conclusion that she was there to assist, and to manœuvre, if necessary, the vessel to which she was fast. In these circumstances I am clearly of opinion that she comes within the words under which a steam vessel when towing another vessel or attached for the purpose of towing shall carry the lights prescribed. I come to the conclusion that the tug was in such a position and doing such work in the Mersey as made it imperative for her within the rule to have two white lights at her masthead. We have not troubled Mr. Walton on the question whether the absence of that white light might have contributed to the collision. I will only say that since The Fanny M. Carvill (32 L. T. Rep. 646; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 565; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 417; 13 A. C. 455, n.) was approved by the unanimous judgment in the case of The Duke of Buccleuch (65 L. T. Rep. 422; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 68; (1891) A. C. 310), I have considered it settled that "the true construction of this section is that the infringement must be one having some possible connection with the collision; or, in other words, the presumption of culpability may be met by proof that the infringement could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision." It has not been argued before us that the rule has not the force of the statutory rule, and, for the reasons very clearly stated by the learned judge, I think he was right in coming to the conclusion, not only that there was a possibility, but more than a possibility, that the absence of a second white light might by possibility have contributed to the collision.

There still remains another very important point, and one not free from difficulty—namely, as to whether or not the Veritas was responsible for the presence—or, rather, the absence—of the second white light, and whether she is responsible in such a way as to bring her within sub-sect. 4 of sect. 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act. With regard to her responsibility, apart from the statute, I think there is not any real difficulty about the law. There has been difficulty about its application. Ever since the case of The Cleadon (4 L. T. Rep. 157; 1 Mar. Law Cas. 41; 14 Moo. P. C. C. 97), it has, I think, been recognised that where one ship is in tow of another the two ships are, for some purposes, to be regarded as one, the commanding or governing power being with the tow, and the motive power with the tug. That was really the judgment in the case of The Cleadon. When that case came to be considered in The Niobe (ubi sup.), Lord Selborne used these words: "Where a ship in tow has control over and is answerable for the navigation of a tug, and the two vessels are physically attached to one another for a common operation—that of the voyage of the ship in tow, for which the tug supplies the motive power—they have been considered by high authority to be for many purposes properly regarded as one vessel." No doubt there have been cases in which that rule has not been applied, or it has not been necessary to apply it, as, for instance, where, the action being brought against a tug, as in the case of The Stormcock (ubi sup.), the tug was held responsible for its own negligence in respect of its own manœuvring. Speaking for myself, I think that if you find two vessels are so attached, and are under such management and control that they move practically as one vessel, the tow is responsible for the action of the tug. Whether or not the tug is also responsible we need not consider. Therefore, if it was a case of collision actually brought about by absence of lights, that would dispose of the case, because I think, attached as she was, waiting for the orders of the master or pilot of the tow to put on her engines for the purpose of manœuvring, the two vessels were so attached and were under such control as to be regarded as one vessel. It still remains to consider the point as to which I have had considerable doubt—viz., as to sub-sect. 4: "Where in a case of collision it is proved to the court before whom the case is tried that any of the regulations have been infringed, the ship by which the regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulations necessary." Mr. Laing says that "ship" is a physical object; a ship on which or by which the rule has been infringed. I think that would be too narrow, for when this section was passed, that by law the tug and tow were to be regarded as one ship was perfectly well known, and ex hypothesi the authority which could direct proper lights to be exhibited would be the tow, as well as the master of the tug if he regarded it as his own duty. In these circumstances I think it is right to say that the ship by which the rule has been infringed in this case was the authority to see that proper lights were exhibited on the tug, and, having neglected to see that that was done, the ship has infringed the regulations. I do not deny that it is possible to come to another conclusion on the matter, and I do not put it as a matter that is absolutely clear. But, giving it the fullest consideration I can give it, I think it is not straining the section to say the regulation has been infringed by the ship, the master of which had the duty imposed on him of controlling and governing the tug, and that it would be wrong for us to hold that, because the particular place where the light was not exhibited happened to be on board the tug which was alongside the ship, therefore the regulation was not infringed by the ship. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed.

SMITH, M.R. and ROMER, L.J. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

[CT. OF APP.]

THE PORT VICTOR.

[CT. OF APP.]

Solicitors for the appellants, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., agents for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, and Hill, Liverpool.

Wednesday, May 22, 1901.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., SMITH, M.R., and ROMER, L.J.)

THE PORT VICTOR. (a)

Salvage—Government stores—Liability of charterers for proportion of salvage—Action in personam.

Where Government stores are being carried at the risk of charterers, and such stores are salvaged from a danger for which the charterers are responsible, the charterers are liable to pay salvage.

Salvors have a right to sue in personam as well as in rem, provided some property or some interest in property has been saved to the person whom it is sought to make responsible for salvage.

Judgment of Sir F. Jeune affirmed.

THIS was an appeal by defendants in a salvage action in personam from a judgment of Sir F. Jeune, pronouncing that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover salvage from the defendants. The case in the court below is reported in 84 L. T. Rep. 363; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163.

The plaintiffs in the action were the owners, masters, and crews of the steamship Amelie and of the tugs Columbia and Shamrock. The defendants were the Jamaica Fruit Importing and Trading Company, who were the charterers under a time charter of the steamship Port Victor.

On the 4th June 1897 the Port Victor was on a voyage from London to Jamaica when she collided in the English Channel with the steamship Roeliff, and in consequence had to take salvage assistance.

An action was accordingly brought against her by the present plaintiffs and the owners of the tug Lady Vita.

At the time of the collision the Port Victor, which was sailing under a time charter, had on board some Government stores owned by the Admiralty.

These stores were shipped by the charterers under contracts entered into with the Admiralty, and were carried under the Admiralty regulations for the conveyance of Government stores. In the note at the head of these regulations it was provided that:

The term "owners" used in the following regulations is to be understood as signifying the party or parties who engage to convey the stores under the agreement for freight or charter-party.

Clause 17 provided that:

The owners will be held responsible for the safe delivery of the Government stores shipped, the act of God, Queen's enemies, fire, and all other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of what nature and kind soever during the voyage always excepted; and provided always that the liability of the owners arising from negligent navigation shall be limited as provided by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and shall in no case exceed 20l. per freight ton.

The stores were shipped under the usual Admiralty bill of lading, which is subject to the stipulations contained in the charter-party or other agreement entered into with, or on behalf of, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and in the regulations of Her Majesty's Transport Service.

The salvage action was heard before Barnes, J. assisted by two of the Elder Brethren, on the 17th July 1897, when he awarded the sum of 200l. to the Amelie, 600l. to the Columbia, 400l. to the Shamrock, and 400l. to the Lady Vita, and reserved all questions as to the liability for the proportion due for the salvage of the Government stores for further consideration, if necessary.

On the Admiralty being applied to they refused to pay salvage or enter an appearance, on the ground that the collision had been brought about by the negligence of the Port Victor, and, as their contract did not exonerate the carrier from liability for negligence, they declined to recognise the claim. The proportion of salvage that the Admiralty would have been liable to pay, had they recognised the claim, would have been 297l. 15s. 8d., and the plaintiffs sought to make the defendants liable for this amount.

By clause 10 of the charter-party:

The captain shall sign bills of lading at any rate of freight the charterers or their agents may choose, without prejudice to the stipulations of this charter-party, and the charterers hereby agree to indemnify the owners from any consequences that may arise from the captain following the charterer's instructions and signing bills of lading. . . . The owners shall not under any circumstances be liable for condition of fruit or other cargo, and the charterers hereby indemnify the owners against any claim arising under any bill of lading.

Sir F. Jeune gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Carver, K.C. (Scrutton, K.C. with him) for the appellants.—The defendants were not carriers, but intermediaries between the carriers and the Government. They cannot be made liable for salvage. In the case of The Five Steel Barges (63 L. T. Rep. 499; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 580; 15 P. Div. 142) the party held liable was in possession of the barges, and was for all practical purposes their owner, and had also a lien on them. If a time charterer in such a case as this is made liable for salvage, so must underwriters, mortgagees, or a vendor who had a right to stop in transitu be liable. The fact that a salvage action can be maintained in personam does not necessarily import a personal obligation, because proceedings in personam in Admiralty are really only a means of enforcing one's remedy against the res. Probably the only persons who can be sued in personam for salvage are the owners of the res or persons to whom the salvors have delivered it, and who have appropriated it. Here the defendants were not owners of the ship, nor in possession of her or of the goods: nor were they carriers. There is not even a personal obligation on an owner to pay salvage; the personal liability only takes the place of the obligation of the res. He also referred to

Duncan v. Dundee, Perth, and London Shipping Company, Scotch Sess. Cas. 4th series, vol. 5, p. 742;

The Parlement Belge, 42 L. T. Rep. 273; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234; 5 P. Div. 197;

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., K.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CT. OF APP.]

THE PORT VICTOR.

[CT. OF APP.]

The Meg Merrilies, 3 Hagg. 346;
The Rapid, 3 Hagg. 419;
The Johannes, Lush. 182;
The Two Friends, 1 C. Rob. 271;
Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Company,
 56 L. T. Rep. 220; 34 Ch. Div. 234;
Hartfort v. Jones, 1 Ld. Raym. 393; 2 Salk. 654;
The Cargo ex Schiller, 36 L. T. Rep. 714; 3 Asp.
 Mar. Law Cas. 439; 2 P. Div. 145;
The Fusilier, Br. & L. 341;
The Zephyrus, 1 W. Rob. 329;
The Chieftain, 4 Notes of Cases, 459;
The Trelawney, 3 C. Rob. n. 216; 4 C. Rob. 223.

Butler Aspinall, K.C. and Dawson Miller, for the respondents, were not called upon.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—We have listened to an extremely able and learned argument from Mr. Carver, going back into the history and the original foundation of salvage jurisdiction. With the greater part of that argument I absolutely and entirely agree, and in the judgment I propose to give I do not desire in any way to infringe upon any of the main principles which Mr. Carver contends for. I think this case is, as was the case before Sir James Hannen, and the case in the Scotch courts, of a very special character, and I should like to state the facts first. The defendants became the charterers of a ship for eighteen months. They might use that ship for their own purposes, putting their own cargo on board. The particular amount of freight which they were going to pay to the shipowners was by no means the measure of the freight which they would earn. They could make any bargain they liked with the persons who put cargo on board; and it is clear that in this case the bargain between the particular owners of goods and the defendants was different from the bargain between the defendants and the shipowners. Now, in that position of things the defendants contracted with the Government to carry some Government stores. By the terms of the contract they are to be liable in any event for the delivery of these stores. The stores are then put on board their hired ship, and the combined adventure then consists of the ship, of the goods belonging to various owners, amongst others the Government, and of the interest that the charterers have in earning the freight. The vessel meets with some disaster, and is salvaged and towed into an English port. The salvors, for some reason which I do not know, do not arrest—at any rate they do not arrest the cargo—and the whole adventure then comes back to its original position and the salvage action is brought. Now, Mr. Carver does not say an action in personam cannot be brought against the owners of the ship. He admits, and I do not think he could possibly have contested it, having regard to the long practice, that against any person in the position of owner of the ship an action in personam can be brought. He does not say that an action in personam cannot be brought against the owners of the cargo for the same reason. Therefore, whether or not the foundation of the action was that there must originally have been an arrest, in which I entirely agree, it was not conclusive as to the form of action, because dealing with the simple case of owner of ship and cargo, certainly an action in the present day can be brought in the Admiralty Court for salvage either in personam or in rem. We, then, have to consider what is the real position of these defendants, apart from authority and apart from the decisions to which I will refer in a moment, in respect of the interest which has been the subject of salvage. I think the defendants were bailees of these goods. It is perfectly true that they were put, not upon their own ship, but upon a hired ship, but they were put there in pursuance of a contract made with the defendants and for the purpose of earning freight which was to go into the pocket of the defendants, and under a contract whereby the defendants undertook, if I may use the expression, in the event which happened, to deliver these goods. Now, when the accident happened which led to the salvage, what were the real interests which were at risk and at stake? There was the interest of the owners of the ship, the interest of the owner or charterer in the freight—because, of course, the charterers' freight may be an entirely different thing from what the owner's freight is—in fact it is quite possible that the chartered freight would not be at risk at all because it might be something paid for the hire of the ship in advance and so not be at risk at all—and then there is the interest of the owner of the goods. In my opinion that includes, for the purpose of what we have got to consider, all the persons who were collectively or singly the owners of goods for the purpose of that adventure. I do not think it at all necessary to go through the cases which Mr. Carver has put of persons whose contracts may be affected more or less indirectly by the destruction of the goods. I think that in a common maritime adventure of the kind we are speaking of the persons who have the interest of owners in the goods by virtue of the contract they have made for the purpose of delivery, have an interest for the purpose of salvage. Now, before I come to the authorities, which I think binding upon us in this sense that they are the authorities of great judges, I wish to say one word upon a part of Mr. Carver's argument to which I entirely assent. I quite agree that in all salvage services there must be some res saved. That was clearly established in the case of The Kenpor (48 L. T. Rep. 887; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 98; 8 P. Div. 115), where Lord Esher laid it down that something must be saved in order to give valid ground for a salvage action. That authority, together with others, is cited in Mr. Justice Kennedy's book. I entirely agree with Mr. Carver's argument that you must have a property saved so as to represent a fund out of which the salvors can be remunerated. But when once you get that, I consider that, at any rate in the present day, proceedings against the persons who properly can be made liable to pay that salvage may be either in rem or in personam. It is quite immaterial to consider what the original object of jurisdiction in personam was. In the present day, both in the County Courts and in the Superior Courts, because property has been saved, the people who are liable to pay salvage can be proceeded against in personam. Now, how do the authorities stand? Speaking for myself, I really feel almost bound by an authority of so great a lawyer on such a subject as Sir James Hannen, under circumstances practically identical with the circumstances of the present case. I should hesitate a very long time to overrule his decision in the case of The Five Steel Barges (ubi sup.). They were five Government barges. Three of them were still in such a position that they could be proceeded against in rem, and were so proceeded against. The other two had been delivered to the Government, and the action was brought against the persons who had previously been interested in these barges. Sir James Hannen used these words, speaking on this very point—an action in personam against a person who had been interested in the property: "I think it exists in cases where the defendant has an interest in the property saved, which interest has been saved by the fact that the property is brought into a position of security." I ventured in my own way to paraphrase those words, "the subject of salvage." Here he speaks of an interest in property which has been saved. Further on he says it is a legal liability "arising out of the fact that property has been saved; that the owner of the property, who has had the benefit of it, should make remuneration to those who have conferred the benefit upon him, notwithstanding that he has entered into no contract on the subject. I think that proposition equally applies to the man who has had a benefit arising out of the saving of the property." I do not intend to decide more than is necessary for this case, but having regard to ordinary commercial relations, in my opinion that test of Sir James Hannen does include, and properly includes, the class of persons within which the defendants in this case come—I mean the charterers of ships who have received goods put upon their hired ships and are liable to replace those goods if they are lost, and are interested in the earning of freight for carrying those goods.

I do not wish to rely on the case of Duncan v. Dundee, Perth, and London Shipping Company (ubi sup.) beyond saying that independently four very learned Scotch judges—I see one was President Inglis—came to the same conclusion. It seems to me that at any rate we are justified upon these authorities, as well as upon principle, in coming to the conclusion that Sir Francis Jeune was right. Mr. Carver has ingeniously endeavoured to suggest that the reason why proceedings in personam have been taken against the owner of property, whether ship or goods, is because the salvors have handed back the property to the owners for the purpose of continuing the adventure. I see nothing in any of the cases which amounted to special handing back. If actions in personam had been originally founded upon some misrepresentation or inducement by the owners of the goods or ship, whereby they had persuaded the salvor into not standing up for his rights, I could understand the distinction, but looking at the long-standing authorities and the reasons, I come to the conclusion that these defendants had such a direct interest in these goods, in the fulfilment of the contract of carriage, that they are properly made defendants in this action. Therefore, without attempting to deal with the further developments which Mr. Carver says are the consequences of that view, I am of opinion that the decision of the court below must be upheld.

SMITH, M.R.—We are asked to overrule the President of the Admiralty Division on a point as to which he has, no doubt, special knowledge, and we are asked to reverse the authority of Sir James Hannen, who of all men was a man of peculiar knowledge on that point—namely, as to whether an action in personam for salvage was properly brought in the Admiralty Court. The judgment of Sir James Hannen in The Five Steel Barges (ubi sup.) was delivered in 1890, after the judgment of the Scotch Court of Session in Duncan v. Dundee, Perth, and London Shipping Company (ubi sup.), and curiously enough the Scotch case was not brought to the attention of Sir James Hannen when he decided the case of The Five Steel Barges (ubi sup.). Therefore we have, independently of each other, four Scotch judges and afterwards Sir James Hannen spontaneously arriving at the same conclusion. Now we are asked in the year 1901 to say that all of those five learned judges were wrong in what they decided in those cases. I myself am prepared to rest my judgment upon the judgment of Sir James Hannen, and I will say this, that having read this judgment through twice during the argument of this case, I consider it is founded upon common sense. A clearer judgment was never delivered by any learned judge, and I refuse to say it is wrong. I think this appeal ought to be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Parker, Garrett, and Holman.

Solicitors for the respondents, W. A. Crump and Son.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

March 7 and 9, 1901.

(Before BIGHAM, J.)

HARLAND AND WOLFF LIMITED v. J. BURSTALL AND Co. (a)

Contract of sale—Goods to be delivered c.i.f.—Delivery to shipper—Shortage in goods—Property in goods—Insurance of price and "profit."

In a contract for the sale and delivery of unascertained goods c.i.f., the shipment of a quantity of such goods substantially less than the quantity contracted to be sold is not a substantial or pro tanto execution of the contract.

Whether in such a contract the shipment of the full quantity would be, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, a sufficient appropriation of the goods to vest the property in such goods in the purchaser, query.

Where such goods are insured by the vendor in his own name at their invoice price, together with an addition for "profit," and are lost during the voyage, the purchaser is not entitled to recover from the vendor the sum paid to him by the underwriters under this "profit" insurance.

ACTION for breach of contract, in the Commercial Court.

Counsel for the plaintiffs, Scrutton, K.C. and Mackinnon.

Counsel for the defendants, J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and T. F. D. Miller.

(a) Reported by J. ANDREW STRAHAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B. Div.]

HARLAND AND WOLFF LIMITED v. J. BURSTALL AND CO.

[K.B. Div.]

The facts and arguments appear sufficient from the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 9.—BIGHAM, J. read the following judgment.—This is an action brought to recover damages for the breach of a contract by which the plaintiffs bought of the defendants 500 loads of timber on c.i.f. terms. The facts are as follows: The defendants are timber merchants trading at Quebec. In the autumn of 1899 they had in stock a quantity of about 600 loads of Waney timber. On the 9th Aug. the plaintiffs, who are shipbuilders at Belfast, telegraphed to the defendants' London house asking if they had any Waney timber to offer. The answer to the inquiry was contained in a letter from defendants of the 17th Aug. saying: "We can offer you about 500 loads first-class Waney for shipment as soon as tonnage is procurable." The letter then described what the size of the timber would be, and mentioned the terms of sale and of payment. On the 13th Sept. the defendants telegraphed to the plaintiffs that they had an offer of freight room for 500 loads, and asking whether they would buy. On the 14th Sept. the plaintiffs telegraphed that they would take 500 loads, and thereupon the defendants engaged room for that quantity in a ship called the Merrimac. The bargain was reduced into the form of a contract note on the 20th Sept., and, so far as is material, the terms were as follows: "Sold 500 loads prime Waney pine, cost, freight, and insurance, freight to be deducted from the invoice, and paid by buyers in terms of charter-party, and the balance to be paid in cash ten days after final delivery in Belfast." The note also described the sizes of the timber to be shipped. The defendants then proceeded to select from their stock timber to answer the contract, but apparently they were unable to collect as much as 500 loads of the required description, and they, in fact, only collected 470 loads. This quantity they shipped, taking bills of lading to their own order. The ship sailed on the 24th Oct., but was lost on the voyage to Belfast. The bills of lading were never tendered to the plaintiffs, nor was the shipping invoice sent to them, but no doubt the defendants intended that the shipment should be applied to the plaintiffs' contract. The insurance of the goods was effected by the defendants in the following manner: They had a floating policy open with underwriters upon which they were in a position to declare 92 per cent. of the value of their risks; as to the remaining 8 per cent., the defendants took the risk themselves. By arrangement with their underwriters the defendants were also entitled to declare on each adventure a further 20 per cent. for what they called "profit." Accordingly, when the shipment by the Merrimac was made, they declared the invoice price as the value (about 2000*l.*) and they also declared 400*l.* for the "profit." The question is whether by what they have done the defendants have performed their contract. They say they have; they contend that by the sale itself, or, if not by the sale, then by the shipment, they vested the property in the 470 loads of timber in the plaintiffs, and that, having insured it and arranged for the freight, they did all that the contract required them to do. Perhaps if these contentions were well founded the defendants would be right; but, in my opinion, they are not well founded. No shipment within the meaning of the contract was ever made. The contract was to ship 500 loads; a shipment of 470 loads does not comply with the requirement. Nor does it satisfy the contract pro tanto. The shipment cannot be made piecemeal; it must be in one parcel. Some evidence was given before me to show that in a contract of that kind it is open to the vendor to deliver about the quantity named, and that "about" means 10 per cent. more or less; and reliance was placed on the fact that during the negotiations leading up to the contract note the word "about" was used. I am quite satisfied, however, that no such custom as that contended for in fact exists, and I think the use of the word "about" in the negotiations has no significance, and cannot be allowed to qualify the reading of the document into which the contract was finally reduced. Of course, in carrying out a commercial contract such as this some slight elasticity is unavoidable; no one supposes that the delivery is to be within a cubic foot of the named quantity, but it must be substantially of the quantity named; and in my judgment 470 loads is not substantially 500. It was a shipment which the plaintiffs would have been entitled to reject if it had been tendered to them as a shipment under the contract. I doubt, moreover, whether, even if the shipment can be regarded as within the meaning of the contract, it can be said to have vested any property in the goods in the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs had no notice of the so-called appropriation of the goods, nor were they in any way tendered to them; and it was always, in my opinion, open to the defendants to have substituted other timber in place of the shipment in the Merrimac, and, if such substituted timber complied with the contract requirements, to have insisted on the plaintiffs accepting it. Such a position is, of course, inconsistent with the contention that the property in the goods in the Merrimac had passed to the plaintiffs. For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the defendants cannot say that they have performed their contract. I assess the damages for the breach on the evidence before me at 175*l.*

It was argued by the plaintiffs that, if the defendants could be said to have fulfilled their contract, then they (the plaintiffs) were entitled to the full benefit of the insurance, and they asked for a judgment for 400*l.*, the amount of the so-called profit insurance. It is not necessary that I should decide this point, because I have found that the defendants never did make the contract shipment, but I desire to say that I do not think the plaintiffs could recover this sum. All the defendants were bound to do was to insure the cost of the goods; they chose to do more, and to insure a so-called profit in addition. This they did, in my opinion, for their own benefit; it was an insurance without interest, for, beyond the price of the goods, the defendants had nothing at risk, and the underwriters might have refused to pay the 400*l.* But the underwriters have paid it, and the defendants, I presume, have the money in their pockets. No doubt the plaintiffs themselves could have insured anticipated profit, and the insurance would have been legitimate enough, because any profit to result from the arrival of the goods would enure to them. So they might have authorised the defendants to make such an insurance; but they did not do so. The insurance therefore cannot be said to have been effected under the terms of the contract or at the plaintiffs' request, and therefore the plaintiffs are not entitled to the proceeds of it.

K.B. Div.] Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN TYRER & Co. AND HESSLER & Co. [K.B. Div.]

Judgment for 175l. for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Parker, Garrett, and Holman.

Solicitors for the defendants, W. A. Crump and Son.

Thursday, May 2, 1901.

(Before KENNEDY and PHILLIMORE, JJ.)

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN TYRER AND Co. AND HESSLER AND Co. (a)

Charter-party—Hire payable in advance—Breach—Waiver—Estoppel.

By a charter-party, payment of the hire was to be made in cash fortnightly in advance, otherwise the owners were to have the faculty of withdrawing the steamer from the service of the charterers.

On the 21st June a fortnight's hire became due in advance.

On that date the steamer commenced a voyage from B. to S. She arrived at S. on the 25th, and lay there until the 27th, on which day she proceeded to H. to load her homeward cargo. While at S. the master, who was the servant of the owners, telegraphed to H. to order the cargo to be ready.

On the 28th June the owners by telegraph withdrew the vessel for nonpayment of the hire.

Held, that the withdrawal was unlawful, as the owners by their conduct were estopped from so doing, for by allowing the charterers to alter their position after the right of withdrawal had accrued, they must be taken to have waived their right.

Nova Scotia Steel Company v. Sutherland Steam Shipping Company (5 Com. Cas. 106) considered.

The mere fact that punctual payment of hire has been waived on former occasions, does not amount to a waiver of punctual payment of future instalments.

SPECIAL CASE stated by arbitrators.

By a charter-party dated the 13th Feb. 1900, and made between Hessler and Co. as owners and Henry Tyrer and Co. as charterers, being a time charter of the s.s. Lagom for about nine months, it was (inter alia) agreed that payment for the hire of the vessel was to be made in cash fortnightly in advance to the owners at West Hartlepool, and, in default of such payment, the owners or their agents should have the faculty of withdrawing the steamer from the service of the charterers without prejudice to any claim the owners might otherwise have on the charterers in pursuance of that charter.

The vessel was handed over to Henry Tyrer and Co. under the charter-party, on the 6th April 1900, and on that day the first fortnight's hire was duly paid in advance, and the vessel remained in the charterer's hands, and was employed by them until the 28th June 1900, when she was withdrawn from their service by Hessler and Co., such withdrawal giving rise to the claim for damages by the charterers, which was the subject of the arbitration.

The second payment of hire was due on the 20th April, and was paid the 27th April. The third was due the 6th May and paid the 10th May. The fourth the 20th and paid the 26th May. The fifth the 6th June and paid the 11th June.

No complaint was ever made by Hessler and Co. about the hire not being paid absolutely on the day when it was due, and no suggestion was ever made that if the hire was not paid on the actual date when it became due, the vessel would be withdrawn from the service of the charterer.

Early in the currency of the charter complaints were made as to the short carrying capacity of the vessel, and in answer to a letter on this subject, written by Tyrer and Co. on the 20th June to Hessler and Co., the latter replied on the 21st June:

Your letter of yesterday to hand, which will receive Mr. Hessler's attention on Friday.

On the 21st June another fortnight's hire of the vessel became due in advance. No application for payment thereof was made, and no debit note was sent therefor, and no intimation was given that if the hire was not paid the vessel would be withdrawn from the charterer's service.

On the 21st June the vessel had just commenced a voyage from Burntisland to Stockholm on the charterers' account. She arrived at Stockholm on the 25th June and lay there until the 27th, when she proceeded to Hernösand to load her homeward cargo on the charterers' account. While at Stockholm the master of the steamer, who under the charter-party was the servant of and paid by Hessler and Co., telegraphed to Hernösand to order the cargo for the steamer to be ready.

On the 28th June, about 3.30 p.m., Tyrer and Co. received from Hessler and Co. a telegram as follows:

Lagom. Astonished not received hire from you due 21st inst. Please note we withdraw steamer in accordance with charter.

This was the first communication which had been sent by Hessler and Co. to Tyrer and Co. since their promise of the 21st June that the matter should have Mr. Hessler's attention, and in spite of Tyrer and Co.'s protests and offer to pay the freight, Hessler and Co. refused to cancel the withdrawal. Hessler and Co., prior to their telegram of the 28th June, never demanded payment of the hire or sent a debit note.

The arbitrators found as a fact that Hessler and Co. waived the immediate and punctual payment of the hire, and ought to have demanded payment of the hire before withdrawing the vessel from the service of the charterers, and that such withdrawal was not bona fide for the purpose of enforcing payment of the hire. They held that such withdrawal was an unlawful act, and awarded Tyrer and Co. damages.

The arguments amply appear from the judgments delivered below.

Carver, K.C. (Bigham with him) for Tyrer and Co.

Hamilton, K.C. for Hessler and Co.

KENNEDY, J.—In this case the question arises upon a case stated by arbitrators, who have given one of the parties, who were the charterers under a charter-party of the steamer Lagom, 586l. 13s. 7d.

K.B. Div.] Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN TYRER & Co. AND HESSLER & Co. [K.B. Div.]

for damages for the unlawful withdrawal, as it is termed, of the steamship from the chartered service. The question is whether that can be upheld. This question seems to me to give rise to points of some interest and difficulty, but we have both come to a clear conclusion and there is no reason for delay in its expression. The contract between the parties which is set out in the case, was, as to its material parts, to charter the Lagom for about nine months it being amongst other things agreed that payment for the hire of the vessel was to be made in cash fortnightly in advance to the owners at West Hartlepool, and in default of such payment or payments as therein specified, the owners or their agents should have the faculty of withdrawing the steamer from the service of the charterers without prejudice to any claims which the owners might otherwise have on the charterers in pursuance of that charter. The vessel entered upon the services of the charterers on the 6th April last year, and it is stated that there were several payments not made in advance fortnightly as prescribed by the charter-party. It is also stated that no objection was raised and no warning given in respect of such lateness of payment. For myself, I lay no stress whatever in the judgment which I am about to pronounce upon the facts there stated. It seems to me that although persons may be generous or careless in enforcing their rights with regard to the days of payment, yet that does not give a so to speak prescription to the person in whose favour a remission of strictness is made, in regard to the observance of the charter in the future. However that may be, on the 28th June this vessel was withdrawn by notice by telegram, the telegram being sent by the owners of the vessel to the charterers, "Please note we withdraw steamer in accordance with the charter." At that time the fortnightly payment had been due for seven days. It was due it has been stated on the 21st June, and it was on the 28th June, as I have said, that the that the notice was sent. The arbitrators have come to the conclusion that there was no right to withdraw. They appear to have stated their reasons in the case, and I must say that as far as they are concerned, except in relation to the expression, "waive immediate and punctual payment of hire," as to which I shall have to say a word or two, I cannot agree in the grounds of opinion there given. I think it is clear that whatever may have been their purpose, their own personal advantage in giving notice of withdrawal is a matter which ought not to have been weighed with the arbitrators, and is not a legal ground for dealing with the decision of the case. I will say in a moment why I personally do not agree with their finding that the owners ought to have demanded payment before withdrawing the vessel; but with the conclusion to which the arbitrators have come, in finding that it was an act which was not justified by the agreement, and, therefore, for which damages, if provable, could properly be claimed by the charterers, I agree. Therefore my judgment is ultimately in favour of the charterers, and I will just very shortly state the grounds in dealing with the arguments that have been advanced to us on either side. In my opinion in construing this document, proceeding as I hope upon a reasonable and sound basis, and saying that where words are clear I decline to import other words so as to alter their meaning, as I find in this document nothing requiring a claim or demand for payment, I cannot acquiesce in the view that is put forward by Mr. Carver, and which apparently the arbitrators accepted, that there could be no default of such payment within the meaning of the charter-party, unless there had previously been a demand of payment on the part of the owners. There is not a word in the charter-party to justify it. I decline altogether to introduce into business documents connected with shipping, any inferences to be drawn from that which is necessarily and historically more or less a technical view of the law with regard to forfeitures in relation to landlord and tenant. It seems to me that when one man says to another, and the other agrees to it, "Cash is to be paid fortnightly in advance, and in default of such payment fortnightly in advance I am to have certain rights of withdrawal," I should not be justified as a lawyer in importing into that contract that which business men would be sorry to see imported, namely, a fresh term as to the demand of payment and when it is to be given. It would be extremely difficult to say either at what time or in what manner it was to be given, and by doing so it might be said we were introducing a new term in order to give precision to the contract between the parties. I do not think there was any claim or demand which, according to this contract, ought to be made before doing that which I think the owners reserved to themselves the right of doing, that is to say if the payment was not made fortnightly in advance to give notice of withdrawal. Notice they must give; notice they have given. It seems to me that they were entitled each time when the day passed for payment and payment had not been made, subject to any right which may have arisen by special circumstances, to exercise their option which they could only do by notice to withdraw the vessel.

Therefore, with regard to the argument which was put before us by Mr. Carver—namely, that there was no default because there was no demand—speaking for myself, I confess I have a strong view that there is no such implied term in the agreement between the parties, and therefore, so far as this case rests upon that, the case fails. Then the next point was taken that the right could not be exercised, because it had not accrued until the fortnightly period had begun. If the point is to be so stated I should not agree with that also. I think myself it must depend upon the circumstances of the case. I think that there must be a notice determining it. A notice is a general request wherever there is to be an election, and here the shipowner has a right to elect whether he will treat the nonpayment as forfeiture or not. But it seems to me what he ought to do is to give notice either immediately, or, from a business point of view, and looking at the business position of affairs, within that which I should call a reasonable time, I can conceive its not mattering to the knowledge of both parties whether a day had passed or not, the vessel doing nothing and intending to do nothing, and so far as the charterer was concerned no loss to him, because the day had passed, but at any rate it ought to be a notice which is given within at least a reasonable time after the default in payment is known to the shipowners. Now in this

K.B. Div.]

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN TYRER &amp; Co. AND HESSLER &amp; Co.

[K.B. Div.]

case I do not think that there was such a notice. It may be put in this way; I referred to the term waiver as mentioned in this case. It seems to me to come to the same thing that their conduct was such that the owners must be taken to have waived the immediate and punctual payment of the hire. By that I mean this, I come to the conclusion that the facts stated in the case are sufficient to create what may be called an estoppel on the one side, or a waiver if you please, such conduct as does prevent the owners from now insisting upon the right to withdraw the ship by reason of the nonpayment on the 21st June. In my opinion their conduct was such as to their knowledge was calculated to produce, and did in fact produce in the ordinary course of business in the user of this ship, a position on the part of the charterers in dealing with the ship which entitles them to say: "We had a right to assume, and to act upon the assumption, that the use of this vessel was not forfeited, and that you did not intend to withdraw." What is the position? On the 21st June payment ought to have been made, and it was not made for seven whole days, that is not including the first, until the 28th and when notice was given this vessel was being used and having engagements made for her by the charterers without one suggestion on the part of the owners that they were going to treat the withdrawal of the ship as a right which they would exercise because of something which took place on the 21st June. I do not myself think anything turns on the alleged letter of the 21st June, which for some reasons the arbitrators have stated in the case as being written about the remission of future hire as a matter to be considered in the future, the charterers having said that they must have some negotiations about the alleged breach of warranty of the capacity of the ship, and for this reason: That letter, written on the 21st June, while it says that the letter of the charterers on that question will receive their attention on the Friday—that would be some days ahead—was written at a time when it was still open to the charterers to fulfil the contract, because they had the whole of that day until the end of the 21st as found by the case, to make payment. Therefore there was nothing in their writing that letter, because they had not then got the right of withdrawal. But it does appear that on the 21st June the vessel had begun her voyage from Burntisland to Stockholm. She arrived at Stockholm on the 25th and she lay there until the 27th and the charterers were making engagements and arrangements with regard to her user and in regard to her crew in the ordinary course of business. On the 27th the charterers, still, of course, presuming they had got the user of her, and that she had not been withdrawn, proceeded to Hernösand to load coal; and while at Stockholm the master of the steamer telegraphed to Hernösand ordering the cargo down from some place inland and incurring expense on the part of the charterers for the steamer on arrival. I do not think the act of the master, although he is the servant of the owners, apart from the conduct of Messrs. Hessler in allowing him so to do and authorising him so to act and to remain the person to carry out the charterers' wishes with regard to the ship, is of much importance, but I think that if under those circumstances, a week having elapsed since an alleged right by default had accrued, and it being a case in which in the ordinary course of business it must have been known to the owners that the charterers were acting in the way they were because they believed that the vessel was still remaining in their service, and that there had been no election to withdraw on the ground of their nonpayment, I think under these circumstances the action of the master is important, because it is in that sense the action of the owners who had it in their power to put a stop to that conduct, and they knew that by not putting a stop to it they were allowing and causing the charterers to act in a way quite different to that in which they would have done if they had known that the charter had been put an end to. I think, therefore, on that ground the charterers are right. I will only say a word in conclusion as to a case which has been much referred to, which was decided by my brother Bigham, to whose judgment I should attach the utmost importance in a matter of this kind, although it is not binding upon us. That is the case of the Nova Scotia Steel Company Limited v. Sutherland Steam Shipping Company Limited (5 Com. Cas. 106). Upon the first of the grounds on which he came to the decision as it is reported I need not express any opinion, because there were special facts in the case with regard to loading cargo. He decided upon those particular facts, that what had happened amounting to a waiver of the defendant's right to withdraw the vessel. But on the more general ground I will just say this: It seems to me that when he goes on to say: "The defendants had lost their right to withdraw the vessel by not having exercised it sooner," he means, I venture to think, what I have endeavoured to express in this case, not necessarily that that option must be exercised on the very moment at which the default takes place, but that, assuming from a business point of view, they might, within a reasonable time after notice of non-payment, have exercised an option, they ought to have done it on the facts of that case sooner than they did, because not having done it sooner there had been mischief done to the parties whose conduct had been affected by the non-withdrawal of the ship, being allowed to load the ship and deal with it as their own, and making their arrangements with regard to it accordingly. Then he further says: "I hold that the exercise of the option to withdraw ought to have been made by the defendants themselves sooner than it was made, and not having been made, they must be taken to have waived their right." That is substantially the ground on which I decide this case. Whether the word "waiver" is the best word or not, it expresses, I think, sufficiently that which is the right of the charterers here—namely, to say: "You have so acted as to lead us to believe a certain state of things, and to act upon that belief, and having done that you cannot now say that you have withdrawn on account of some failure of ours to perform the contract at an earlier date."

PHILLIMORE, J.—This is a difficult case, but upon the whole I think the decision of the arbitrators must be supported. It is said that it may be supported on three grounds. The first is, that where there is a forfeiture, not ipso facto, but at the option of the person entitled to take advantage of the default and that forfeiture is to operate by reason of the nonpayment of money, there ought to be a demand of the money before the forfeiture. Now I prefer to say that I express no opinion one way or the other; I am not at all certain one way or the other. I should like to agree with my learned brother at once, but I am not prepared to agree with him; neither, on the other hand, am I prepared to disagree. Analogies from the law of personal property are very dangerous, and cannot be pushed very far; but I am not sure that it is not deserving of consideration whether in all cases where the forfeiture is for nonpayment of hire, and that forfeiture is to be at the election of the parties, I think I might go further and say nonpayment of money, and that forfeiture is to be at the election of one of the parties, it was not the law of England that there shall be a demand for the money before there is a forfeiture. I express no further opinion upon that. The second point taken by Mr. Carver was that the forfeiture here must be exercised at once, because otherwise the charterer might be in the position of having to pay a fortnight's hire only to get his ship for eleven or twelve days of that fortnight, and lose his charter at the end. I was rather impressed at one time by that argument, but I have come to the conclusion it is not sound. If, and I do not say for the moment decidedly one way or the other, the charterer is liable for the fortnight's hire, as soon as a portion of that fortnight has been actually used by him, if he is liable to pay that in advance, or on the first day, or before the first day, that liability is only to be removed if the whole fortnight is to be taken away from him, then I think this case cannot be otherwise than that he would have to pay however early the owners gave the notice, because they certainly could not give notice until some time in the first day, possibly not until the end of the first day. If, on the other hand, the charterers are not liable if the owners determine, which is a possible view, the charter-party during the fortnight they are not liable for that fortnight, then the charterer is not damaged by the exercise of the option in the fortnight; and if my brother Bigham, in the case which has been referred to, decided on that view, I must respectfully express my dissent from it. But, as my brother has pointed out it may very well be that he decided it upon the ground that has been adopted to-day, and on a ground which I concur in, only I prefer rather to put my judgment in this way. The one condition which Bramwell, L.J. pointed out in Williams v. Stern (42 L. T. Rep. 719; 5 Q. B. Div. 409) as not existing in that case, in my opinion, is in existence in this case. I think here the charterer did alter his position, and he altered his position upon the faith that the forfeiture would not be enforced, and he was allowed to do so by reason of the delay in giving notice of the forfeiture. It seems to me expense was incurred, and very appreciably incurred by the charterer in going from Stockholm to Hernösand, which expense he would have saved if the owner had exercised the option while he was lying in the harbour at Stockholm, and if he had found the notice ready for him by or before the time the ship had got to Stockholm. I think that the owner must have known that the charterer would incur that expense. I do not myself attach much weight to the fact as my brother Bigham did in the other case, that the captain is partially the owner's servant, and the actual acts of commission which involve the charterers in expense were the acts of the captain who is partially the owner's servant. I prefer to put it on the ground that, as a matter of business the ship owners must have known that the charterers would incur expense, and they let him incur the fruitless expense of a voyage in ballast to a distant port which they might have saved if they had given notice determining the charter at a reasonable time. Therefore I agree that our judgment should be for the respondents.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitors: Field, Roscoe, and Co., for Batesons, Warr, and Wimshurst, Liverpool; W. A. Crump and Son, for Turnbull and Tilly, West Hartlepool.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Feb. 5 and March 5, 1901.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President, and BARNES, J.)

THE DEERHOUND. (a)

Charter-party—Demurrage—Delay owing to consignee having other vessels discharging in the dock—Liability of charterer for acts of consignee—Extra cost of discharge owing to stevedore's men refusing to allow crew to work.

A vessel was chartered to proceed to the S. dock, Maryport, and there unload her cargo. Owing to the fact that the consignee, who had bought the cargo from the charterers, had other vessels discharging in the dock at the time of her arrival, she was unable to get a berth and unload within the time agreed by the charter-party.

Held, that the charterers were not responsible for the delay.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the judge of the Cardiff County Court.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Deerhound; the defendants were H. Borner and Co. the charterers.

By a charter-party dated the 28th May 1900 the defendants chartered the Deerhound to load a cargo of iron ore at Carthage, and proceed therewith to Senhouse Dock, Maryport.

The Deerhound arrived in the basin, Senhouse Dock, on the 13th June 1900, and was brought into the dock by midnight on the 15th June, but was not got into a berth until the 26th June.

The plaintiffs claimed demurrage, and it was agreed that, if entitled to any, they were entitled to twenty-two hours' demurrage. They also claimed a sum of money representing the difference between what they alleged had been improperly deducted from the freight by the defendants for extra labour in discharging the cargo, by reason of the plaintiff failing to supply winches and the use of the crew in order to discharge the same.

By the terms of the charter-party time for discharging was to count from the time when the

ADM.]

THE DEERHOUND.

[ADM.]

ship was in every respect ready in berth, "but berth guaranteed within twenty-four hours after arrival or time to count."

The cargo was received by the consignees, and the delay in unloading occurred through their having other vessels in the dock berth, which prevented the Deerhound from getting a berth.

By the terms of a bye-law of the Maryport Dock Company, no one consignee was allowed to have more than three vessels in dock at the same time, and the charterers contended that they were not responsible for delay caused entirely by the consignees.

With regard to the deduction made from freight for extra cost of discharge it was stipulated by the charter-party that the ship should give the "use of cranes and winches with necessary steam power and hands," which it was alleged had not been done. It appeared that the owners were ready and willing to perform their part of the contract, but that the stevedores employed by the consignees of the cargo had refused to work with the ship's crew owing to some rule of the labour union.

The County Court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs on both issues.

From this judgment the defendants appealed.

Laing, K.C. and Sankey for the appellants.—The charterers are not liable. They did not prevent the vessel getting a berth. It was the action of the consignees, who had a number of vessels discharging at the same time, and who therefore were prevented by the dock company's rules from getting the Deerhound a berth. In Watson v. Borner (4 Com. Cas. 335) the facts are very similar, and in that case it was held that the charterers were not liable because the obstacles which prevented the charter-party from being carried out were obstacles the risk of which the shipowner took upon himself. As to the extra cost of discharge the shipowner undertook to supply winches and the use of his crew by the charter-party, and he did not do so, and in consequence the charterers have had to pay 4*d.* per ton extra for discharge of the cargo. The loss must be where it falls.

Robson, K.C. and Bailhache for the respondents.—Watson v. Borner is not in point. It was decided on a different ground. In that case the consignees filled two capacities, as they were owners of a private wharf as well as consignees of the cargo. The real ground of the judgment was that the wharf being a private one, and managed by the consignees, it could not be said the consignees as such prevented the ship from getting to the wharf. There is an absolute contract by the charterers not to put obstacles in the way of the discharge, and load with the usual dispatch:

Ashcroft v. Crow Orchard Colliery Company, 31 L. T. Rep. 266; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 397; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 540.

They also referred to

Tapscott v. Balfour, 27 L. T. Rep. 710; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 46;

Nelson v. Dahl, 41 L. T. Rep. 365; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 172, 392; 12 Ch. Div. 568;

Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 42 L. T. Rep. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 129, 302; 5 Asp. Cas. 599.

Laing, K.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the court (the President, Sir F. H. Jeune, and Barnes, J.) was delivered by

BARNES, J.—This is an appeal from the decision of the County Court judge at Cardiff in an action by the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Deerhound, against the defendants, the charterers of the vessel, holding that the plaintiffs are entitled to receive from the defendants 22*l.* for twenty-two hours' demurrage at Maryport, and in respect of a charge of 4*d.* per ton on the cargo discharged, which had been deducted from the freight payable by the charterers. The facts were as follows: On the 28th May 1900 the vessel was chartered by the plaintiffs to the defendants by charter-party of that date to load at Carthage or Porman a cargo of iron ore, and proceed to Maryport, Senhouse Dock, and there deliver the same as customary when and as directed by the consignee, to whom notice was to be given of the same being ready for discharge, paying for discharging 1*s.* per ton, freight to be paid as in the charter-party mentioned. The charter-party provided that the cargo was to be shipped at the rate of 200 tons per working day of twenty-four consecutive hours (weather permitting), Sundays and holidays excepted, and to be discharged on the same conditions (subject to certain exceptions); days to be averaged to avoid demurrage. Time not to count between the hours of 1 p.m. on Saturdays and 7 a.m. on Mondays, unless used, and the time for discharging should count when ship is in every respect ready in berth, but berth guaranteed within twenty-four hours after arrival or time to count, and in free pratique, as per custom of port, written notice of such readiness to be given to consignees during office hours. Ship to work night and day if requested to do so, and to give use of cranes and winches with necessary steam power and hands, charterers paying all extra expenses of night work. Demurrage (if any) at the rate of 20*s.* sterling per hour. Dispatch money at the rate of half the demurrage, not less than 10*s.* per hour, to be settled in discharge port. Steamer to be consigned to Messrs. Gibson and Greenop or Mr. Joseph Holmes at Maryport. There was a cesser clause in the charter, but by a letter of the 21st June the charterers guaranteed that the charter-party would be carried out in its entirety, and on the conditions as to time provided therein, and to pay any demurrage legally incurred according to the terms of the charter-party. After loading under the charter-party the vessel proceeded to Maryport, and arrived in the harbour outside the Senhouse Dock on Wednesday, the 13th June, and on the 14th, at 10 a.m., the master gave notice to Messrs. C. Cammal and Co. Limited, the consignees and holders of the bills of lading, to whom the defendants had sold the cargo, that the vessel had arrived and was ready to discharge. At the time the vessel arrived as aforesaid the said consignees had other vessels at berths in the dock and waiting to discharge, and in consequence the vessel was not allowed, in accordance with the dock regulations, to enter the dock until midnight of the 15th. If the time is to count from the time at which the vessel entered the dock, it is admitted that she was afterwards duly discharged, but the plaintiffs' claim is that in the circumstances they are entitled to treat

ADM.]

THE DEERHOUND.

[ADM.]

the time as counting from 10 a.m. on the 15th, and if they are right I understand the effect would be to give them twenty-two hours' demurrage. The County Court judge held that the case was governed by the case of Ashcroft v. Crow Orchard Colliery Company (ubi sup.), and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for twenty-two hours' demurrage. It was argued before this court that the decision was wrong in law, and also that the presence of the other vessels for the same consignees did not, according to the regulations, prevent the Deerhound from getting into dock. With regard to the second point, it seems clear that the case was heard in the court below on the admissions of counsel, witnesses who were present to prove the facts therefore not being called, and that the case proceeded on the assumption that the consignees had other vessels at the berths in the dock and waiting to discharge, which fact did, according to the regulations and practice of the port, which the harbour master acted on, prevent the vessel from getting into the dock until the night of the 15th, and I think the case must be decided on the principal point, which is one of general importance. Several cases were cited to us, but they appear to me to turn so much on their particular facts and the language of the particular charters that they are only indirectly of assistance in arriving at a conclusion in this case. In Tapscott v. Balfour (27 L. T. Rep. 710; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 46), where a vessel was to proceed to a dock as ordered by the charterers, and load coal which would be supplied by a colliery agent and loaded from the tips, it was held that the lay-days did not commence until the vessel got into dock, and that the charterers were not responsible for delay in her so doing, caused by the colliery agent having three other vessels in the dock and two more ready to go in, and not being permitted by the dock regulations to have more than three vessels in the dock at a time. It was the usual course to load through a colliery agent, and there was nothing improper or unreasonable in the course pursued by the charterers: (see the remarks made by Bovill, C.J. at p. 50). The next case is Ashcroft v. Crow Orchard Colliery Company (ubi sup.), which the judge of the court below acted on. In my opinion that case does not govern the present case, and is entirely different from it both in the language of the contract and the facts. The charter was for the loading of the plaintiffs' vessel with a cargo of coal at the port of Liverpool, to be loaded with the usual despatch of the port, or if longer detained to be paid 40s. per day demurrage, and the charterers engaged to load "on the above terms"; and by a memo. at foot the vessel was to load in the Bramley Moore or Wellington Dock, High Level Railway. By one of the regulations of the docks no coal agent was to be allowed to have more than three vessels in the dock loading and to load at the cranes at one time. The charterers acted as their own coal agents, and as they had three other ships loading in the docks and other charters in their books having priority over the plaintiffs' vessel, she was not allowed to go into the dock for thirty days after she was ready to do so. The judgment in that case appears to me to have proceeded on the ground that the court construed the particular contract before them as imposing an absolute obligation to load the vessel with the usual despatch of the port, and it was immaterial to consider whether the delay occurred outside or inside the dock: (see the observations on this case made by Lord Esher in Nelson v. Dahl, 41 L. T. Rep. 369; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 172, at p. 177; 12 Ch. Div. 588 and 589; and by Lord Blackburn in Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 42 L. T. Rep. 845, at p. 851; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 306; 5 App. Cas. 599, at p. 622). The last case was Watson v. Borner (5 Com. Cas. 377), where a steamship was chartered to carry a cargo to Dowlais Wharf, Cardiff. The cargo was sold by the charterers to the Dowlais Iron Company, the lessees of the wharf, which was in the Roath Dock, Cardiff. The company had control of the wharf and the berthing of vessels there. The time for discharge, according to the charter-party, did not commence until 6 a.m., after the vessel was ready in berth. It was held that the charterers were not responsible for delay caused to the vessel in getting into berth after she had got into dock, by the consignees, in order to suit their business arrangements, giving preference to other vessels which arrived at the dock after the plaintiffs' vessel. The ground of the decision appears to be that the owners of the vessel had agreed to take her to the wharf, that the delay was caused by the way in which the Dowlais Company, as proprietors of the wharf, managed the business, and that the charterers were not responsible for this merely because the Dowlais Company happened to be the purchasers of the cargo.

In the present case the plaintiffs agreed that the vessel should proceed to the Senhouse Dock, Maryport, and the charterers agreed by the clauses in the charter-party, as to discharge and guarantee of berth, to discharge her within a certain time after her arrival—that is, arrival in dock. It is the ordinary and natural implication that neither party should prevent the other from performing that part of the contract which falls to be performed by the other, and if the charterers, by themselves or their agents, acting within the scope of their authority, had placed impediments in the way of the shipowners bringing their vessel into dock, the charterers ought to be responsible for the delay so caused, as if the vessel had in fact arrived in dock. It appears to follow that if the charterers have other vessels which they have to discharge and have arranged to discharge in the docks before the vessel which by the charter is to proceed to the dock, and by the practice of the port will not be admitted into the dock while the charterers have the other vessels in the way, the charterers do prevent the shipowners from performing their contract until the charterers have cleared away the impediments. The charterers, however, had sold the cargo to consignees. The position then is that those consignees became agents of the charterers, to receive the cargo and pay the freight in accordance with the charter-party, and their obligations arose after the vessel arrived in dock. It is true that the consignees had, at the time of the vessel's arrival outside the dock, other vessels at berths in the dock and waiting to discharge, in consequence of which the plaintiffs' vessel was prevented from entering the dock, but the charterers are not, in my opinion, responsible for

ADM.]

THE HEATHER BELL.

[ADM.]

this. The engagements and actions of the consignees in relation to the other vessels were not entered into or taken by them as agents for the charterers. It was not contended that there was anything unreasonable in the charterers selling the cargo to the particular consignees. The charterers would not know what the engagements of the consignees would be at the time of the vessel's arrival. As between the shipowners and charterers the delay is one of the risks taken by the shipowners when they agree to take their vessel to a particular dock. They could guard against it by proper stipulations in the charter-party. There appears to me to be nothing unreasonable in the view which I have expressed of the shipowners' position. It is contemplated in this class of case that the cargo may be sold. Very frequently the charterers' liability under the charter-party ceases by virtue of the cesser clause on shipment. It was so in this case but for the letter of guarantee above referred to. In such cases the shipowners have to look to the consignees only at the port of discharge, and for this purpose the bills of lading usually incorporate the terms of the charter. Even when the charterers remain liable on the charter for its due performance, the cargo is frequently sold to consignees who have to act for the charterers in performing their obligations under the charter-party with regard to the cargo, but are not otherwise agents for the charterers, and the shipowners will have such rights against the consignees, as such, as are provided for by the bills of lading, but as against the charterers only such rights as are conferred by the charter-party. The shipowners know that in ordinary course the cargo may be received by persons other than the charterers, and over whose other engagements the charterers have no control, and there is nothing in the charter-party imposing on the charterers the risk of such other engagements preventing the vessel from reaching the spot to which it has been agreed that she shall go. The result in this case is that the defendants are not liable, in my opinion, for the delay occasioned before the vessel arrived in dock. There is another point turning on the facts of this case, and not of general importance. Owing to repairs to the Senhouse Dock it was only available as a tidal harbour when the Deerhound arrived, and the steamer grounded after tidefall when discharging, and in consequence it was necessary to use the winches. The master of the vessel was ready and willing to give the use of the winches, with necessary steam power, and the ship's hands to work them, but the stevedore's men would not allow the crew to work the winches, and insisted on doing it themselves, and on being paid 4*d.* per ton additional for discharging. The defendants, as I understand, have deducted the amount of 4*d.* per ton on the cargo discharged from the freight, and the County Court judge has held that they were not entitled to do so. I am of the same opinion on the point. The shipowner was only to pay 1*s.* per ton for discharging, and he was ready and willing to perform his part of the contract. The loss through the extra demand of the stevedore's men must fall on the charterers. The appeal must be allowed as to the item for demurrage. In my opinion each of the parties should pay their own costs of the appeal, except that the costs of the printing of the record should be divided between them.

Solicitors: for the appellants, Ince, Colt, and Ince; for the respondents, Downing, Bolam, and Co., agents for Downing and Handcock, Cardiff.

Feb. 15, 16, March 4 and 25, 1901.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President.)

THE HEATHER BELL. (a)

Mortgage—Charter or agreement for use of ship by mortgagee—Wrongful seizure by mortgagee—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 34.

Where the mortgagee of a vessel entered into a charter or agreement for the use of the vessel with a third party (the plaintiff) whereby the plaintiff was to have possession of the ship for about six weeks, and was to run her on specified voyages between places in the United Kingdom and was to finance the vessel, being granted the highest charge and lien on the vessel the mortgagee could grant to secure any sums he might so disburse:

Held, that such a charter or agreement did not impair the value of the mortgagee's security, and that the latter was liable in damages to the plaintiff for taking possession of the vessel under his mortgage after default had been made by the mortgagee.

Where a mortgagee wrongly took possession of the mortgaged ship as against the charterer, and paid wages then due to the crew from the charterer, it was held that the charterer was liable to the mortgagee for the wages so paid.

THIS action arose under the following circumstances:—

In July 1900 the defendant, William Ward, sold the steamship Heather Bell to the South Coast and Continental Service Limited for the sum of 2500*l.* Of this sum 625*l.* was paid in cash, and three bills for 625*l.* each at two, four, and six months respectively were given for the balance.

To further secure the payment of the sums due upon the bills the purchasers mortgaged the Heather Bell to the defendant.

The plaintiff, William Horton, was the owner of an hotel at Rhos, Colwyn Bay, North Wales, called the Rhos Abbey Hotel, and of the pier at that place.

The plaintiff was anxious to secure a service of passenger vessels between Liverpool and Rhos during the summer months, and with that object he, on the 29th Aug., entered into an agreement with the South Coast and Continental Service Limited, the material parts of which are set out below. Previous to this the plaintiff had to some extent financed the Heather Bell.

The material parts of the agreement of the 29th Aug. were as follows:

Memorandum whereby the South Coast and Continental Service Limited, the owners of the Heather Bell . . . agree to charter her to William Horton, of Bryn Dinarth, Colwyn Bay, from Aug. 29 until Oct. 15, 1900, on the following terms: (1) The boat shall be delivered to William Horton, at Liverpool, forthwith as

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., K.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE HEATHER BELL.

[ADM.]

she now is. . . . The vessel shall be used for passenger and merchandise traffic between Liverpool, Rhos-on-Sea, Llandudno, Menai Straits, Colwyn Bay, and Rhyl, and not otherwise without the consent in writing of the owners. (2) It is admitted that at the present time part of the machinery of the boat is held as a lien for the repairs thereto; and it has been agreed that the said William Horton will advance such amount as may be necessary to liberate such machinery, and shall add same to what is already due to him thereon. (3) The owners also admit that William Horton has advanced certain other sums in connection with the boat, for which sums it is agreed that the said W. Horton shall have a charge and lien on the boat, ranking in the highest position the owners are able to fix the same having regard to existing circumstances. (4) The said W. Horton is hereby authorised to sell such of the effects on board the boat as may not be requisite or necessary for the use of the boat and the service aforesaid, but shall bring the proceeds into the accounts hereinafter mentioned. (5) The said W. Horton shall be in no way responsible . . . for any repairs which may be from time to time necessary or desirable, but any repairs he thinks fit to execute shall be added to his charge and lien. (7) The charterer shall keep true and exact accounts of all receipts . . . and of all payments and expenses of the service. The before-mentioned expenses shall be paid out of the before-mentioned receipts . . . and accounts shall be made up weekly. (8) The profits of the venture (if any) shall belong to and be divided into equal shares and proportions between the owners and the charterers at the expiration of the charter. (10) In case the mortgagees of the said vessel shall exercise their rights (if any), and thereby the charter hereby granted shall be affected, the owners shall not be responsible to the charterers in damages or otherwise in respect thereof.

The defendant had notice of this agreement.

The Heather Bell ran (daily) in pursuance of this agreement from Liverpool to Llandudno and Rhos until the 4th Sept., when she was taken in execution by the sheriff under a judgment which had been obtained against her owners.

On the 8th Sept. the sheriff withdrew from possession, but on the same day the Heather Bell was seized by the defendant under his mortgage, the bill for 62*l.* which fell due on the 4th Sept. having been dishonoured by the South Coast and Continental Service Limited.

The plaintiff then brought this action against the mortgagee to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by him owing to the withdrawal of the Heather Bell from the service in which she had been engaged.

The defendant denied liability, and also counter-claimed for wages paid to the master and crew when he took possession. These wages had become due before the defendant took possession.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60):

Sect. 34. Except so far as may be necessary for making a mortgaged ship or share available as a security for the mortgage debt the mortgagee shall not by reason of the mortgage be deemed the owner of the ship or share, nor shall the mortgagor be deemed to have ceased to be the owner thereof.

Carver, K.C. and Leslie Scott for the plaintiff.

Robson, K.C. and Ernest Pollock for the defendant.

The following authorities were cited:

Cory v. Stewart, 2 Times Rep. 508;

Collins v. Lamport, 11 L. T. Rep. 497; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 153;

VOL. IX., N. S.

Keith v. Burrows, 37 L. T. Rep. 291; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 481;

Brown v. Tanner, 18 L. T. Rep. 624; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 94; L. Rep. 3 Ch. 806;

The Celtic King, 70 L. T. Rep. 652; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 440; (1894) P. 175;

Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 34

Cur. adv. vult.

March 4.—THE PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is whether the defendant, Mr. Thomas William Ward, was justified in taking possession of the Heather Bell by virtue of a mortgage to him of that vessel notwithstanding a contract (I purposely use a general term) which had been entered into between the owners and the plaintiff in regard to her. The mortgage to the defendant was registered on the 13th July 1900, and, after reciting that the South Coast and Continental Service Limited had purchased the Heather Bell from Mr. Thomas William Ward, mortgaged the vessel to Mr. Ward to secure the instalments of the purchase money with interest. On the 4th Sept. 1900 default was made in the payment of one of these instalments, and thereafter the defendant was unquestionably entitled to exercise his rights as mortgagee and take possession of the vessel unless he was prevented from doing so by the operation of the contract to which I have referred. That contract was made on the 29th Aug. 1900 between the South Coast and Continental Service Limited, and was in the following terms: [His Lordship then read the agreement, and continued:] It was alleged by the plaintiff that this contract was a charter-party, and by the defendant that it was an agreement. In fact it was both. It provided for the terms on which the plaintiff should use the vessel on the service between Liverpool and Rhos and other places, and it also gave the plaintiff a charge on the vessel in respect of the advances and payments made, or to be made, by him, and referred to in clauses 2 and 3. The law with regard to the rights of the mortgagor of a ship to deal with it so long as the mortgagee abstains from taking possession is, in general, well recognised. The 70th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which enacted that "a mortgagee shall not by reason of his mortgage be deemed to be the owner of a ship or any share therein, nor shall the mortgagor be deemed to have ceased to be the owner of such mortgaged ship or share, except in so far as may be necessary for making such ship or share available as a security for the mortgage debt," received an authoritative exposition by Lord Westbury in the case of Collins v. Lamport (ubi sup.), decided in 1865. It was there laid down that "as long as the dealings of the mortgagor with the ship are consistent with the sufficiency of the mortgagee's security, so long as those dealings do not materially prejudice or detract from or impair the sufficiency of the security of the vessel, as comprised in the mortgage, so long is there Parliamentary authority given to the mortgagor to act in all respects as owner of the vessel, and if he has authority to act as owner he has of necessity authority to enter into all those contracts touching the disposition of the ship which may be necessary for enabling him to get the full value and full benefit of his property." This case, therefore, asserts in the clearest terms the right of a mortgagor

ADM.]

THE HEATHER BELL.

[ADM.]

to deal with his property, provided that his dealings do not materially impair the security of the mortgagee, and his right so to deal is not limited to doing so by any particular form of contract, whether that of a charter-party or any other. The case of Keith v. Burrows (ubi sup.) shows that the mortgagor is by no means bound to employ the ship in a way profitable to himself, or of advantage to the mortgagee, as providing earnings of which the mortgagee might take possession. Lord Cairns in that case laid it down in the broadest terms: "The mortgagee of a ship does not, ordinarily speaking, or by a mortgage such as existed in the present case, obtain any transfer by way of contract or assignment of the freight, nor does the mortgagor of a ship undertake to employ the ship in any particular way, or, indeed, to employ the ship so as to earn freight at all. The mortgagor of a ship may allow the ship to lie tranquil in dock, or he may employ it in any part of the world, not in earning freight, but for the purposes of bringing home goods of his own, or for his own benefit."

The principles of these cases were followed in the case of Cory Brothers v. Stewart (ubi sup.). In that case it would appear that by the terms of the charter-party the whole, or nearly the whole of the freight was payable at or before the time of the sailing of the vessel, so that the mortgagee could not by taking possession obtain any or any substantial advantage out of the operation of the charter party. "The security," said the Master of the Rolls, "was of course a freight-earning ship, but a particular charter-party was not part of the security. That was not what was mortgaged. The ship must be capable of earning freight, but not necessarily within a week or a month, or any particular period. If anything had been done in the present case which had prevented the ship from being a freight-earning ship that would no doubt have impaired the security, but what had in fact happened had not impaired the security. The mortgagee so long as he kept possession could not throw over the charter-party, but must fulfil it in all its terms." It is not, to my mind, easy to reconcile the principles laid down in these cases with the principle which governed the case of Brown v. Tanner (ubi sup.) in the Court of Appeal. There the mortgagor, after making a charter-party under which freight was payable, during the voyage assigned the freight to a third person. It was held that the mortgagee, having taken possession before the freight became due, was entitled to it notwithstanding its assignment by the mortgagor. Page Wood, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court said: "The mortgagor can bind the mortgagee by a charter-party, being to that extent in a different position from the mortgagor of real property, who cannot bind his mortgagee by a lease. This was decided by Lord Westbury in Collins v. Lamport. But we cannot accept the inference drawn from the case by Mr. Druce, that the mortgagor, having so effected a charter-party, can also mortgage the freight before it becomes due so as to prevent the mortgagee of the ship on taking possession before the freight is due from receiving it. So to hold would enable the mortgagor to deprive the mortgagee of the whole benefit of the security. The ship might be chartered for several years, and the freight immediately assigned behind the back of the mortgagee." I am not aware whether Lord Cairns (who was Lord Chancellor at the time, and who appears to have sat in the case decided before Brown v. Tanner) was party to the decision in Brown v. Tanner. The report is silent on the point. If he was, the decision in Brown v. Tanner clearly cannot be at variance with his Lordship's previous decision in Keith v. Burrows. But I confess it is not to me easy to understand why, if the freight under a charter-party is no part of the mortgagee's security, and if the mortgagor may make a charter-party which yields no freight, or may make a charter-party under which the freight is made payable to a third party before the voyage commences, he may not assign the freight during the continuance of the voyage. It certainly can make no practical difference to the mortgagee whether the freight is alienated by the charter-party itself or by a subsequent document, his power of obtaining it being equally in both cases destroyed. However, for the purposes of the present case, it is sufficient for me to say that whether the freight created by a charter-party can or cannot be assigned subsequently so as to defeat the prospect of the mortgagee obtaining it by taking possession, the mortgagee cannot challenge or repudiate a charter-party merely on the ground that its terms are unfavourable to the interests of the mortgagor and therefore of himself. I may add that the case of The Celtic King (ubi sup.), decided by Barnes, J., illustrates the kind of charter-party which does impair the security of the mortgagee, and may therefore be repudiated by him. In that case there was an agreement by which a shipowner, whilst a steamer was being built for him, bound himself to fit her for a particular trade—that is to say, the trade in frozen meat—and run her for five years as one of a particular line, and it was held that this agreement would have a depreciatory effect upon the security of the mortgagee. "It seems to me," said the learned judge, "that where there is a contract of this particular character it would be prejudicial to the security if the mortgagee were to be obliged to admit that he could not sell the ship to realise his security in an open market without that restrictive contract. It is not like an ordinary contract for the ordinary employment of a ship which is made from time to time as things are good and as things are bad, but it is a contract which binds the vessel for a very long period and has various clauses in it which might make it extremely difficult for anybody to purchase a ship of this kind if they were bound by its terms." While, therefore, it would seem clear on the earlier authorities that the mortgagee, as I have said, cannot repudiate a contract made by the mortgagor on the ground that it is unfavourable, that must be understood with the limitation that the contract must not be such as by reason of the length of time during which it binds the ship, or by reason of unusual provisions in it, to injuriously affect the power of sale by the mortgagee. To apply these principles to the present case: Can it be said that the contract in question impairs the security which the Heather Bell constituted for the defendant by reason of his mortgage? During the argument I had some doubt whether the security was not impaired by the provisions in sect. 7 which appeared by the term "before-mentioned expenses" to make the sums

ADM.]

THE HEATHER BELL.

[ADM.]

advanced or to be advanced by the plaintiff under clauses 2 and 3 payable out of the gross receipts of the vessel. This would have been in effect an assignment of the earnings of the ship during the period of the contract, and, notwithstanding the case of Cory Brothers v. Stewart, I should have thought it difficult, having regard to the decision in Brown v. Tanner, to hold that such a contract did not impair the security and render the sale of the vessel difficult, if not impossible, according to the view taken in The Celtic King, unless, indeed, it could be said that the comparatively short time during which the contract in the present case was to be in force—viz., till the 15th Oct. 1900—made a material distinction with the facts in the case of The Celtic King. But, on considering the present contract, I come clearly to the conclusion that the “before-mentioned expenses” in clause 7 do not include the sums referred to in clauses 2 and 3. This difficulty being cleared away, there remains, I think, no other. It is true that clauses 2 and 3 give the plaintiff a charge and lien on the Heather Bell for his advances, but this charge is clearly subordinated to that of the defendant, and, therefore, in no way impairs his security. The right conferred by sect. 4 to sell certain articles of equipment appears to relate to some matters of very trifling importance. The rest of the contract provides for the terms on which the boat was to be run. I do not think I have to inquire whether these terms were unduly favourable to the plaintiff. They were not likely to be so, as the plaintiffs had interests in the steamer running apart from her earnings. I do not think that they were unusual terms for the employment of such a vessel as the Heather Bell, constructed as she was, for exactly such employment as is contemplated by the contract. I doubt if they would render the vessel less saleable during the currency of the contract; certainly they would not at its termination, which was only some five weeks after the defendant took possession. It results, therefore, that in my opinion the defendant had no right to interfere with the execution of the contract; and there must be judgment for the plaintiff, with costs, and an inquiry as to the amount of damages.

March 25.—The liability of the plaintiff in respect of the counter-claim was now argued.

Ernest Pollock for the defendant.—It should be implied that there was a request of the plaintiff that the defendant should pay these wages. See

Johnson v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 17 L. T. Rep. 445; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 38; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 21;

The Orchis, 62 L. T. Rep. 407; 15 C. P. Div. 38; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501.

Carver, K.C. for the plaintiff contra.—No request should be implied. The payment of the wages was incidental to the wrongful taking possession of the vessel, which has been declared to be illegal. See

The Ripon City, 78 L. T. Rep. 296; (1898) P. 86; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391.

The PRESIDENT.—The remaining question is as to a counter-claim for a sum of money, which, put shortly, was for wages due to the master and crew of the ship before the mortgagee seized her. Now, it is clear to my mind that this question is covered by the case of Johnson v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company. If the mortgagee had rightly seized, there would be no question whatever that the payment of the wages would give him a claim against the person liable to pay them; but in this case I have held that the mortgagee had no right to take possession of the ship as against the person who was properly in possession under the charter-party—namely, the charterer. Does that make any real difference? I think that it does not. In the first place, I am by no means certain that on the facts of the case it would not be sufficient to say there was an implied request, because when I find that notice was distinctly given of the intention to pay these sums, so that it would have been open for the plaintiff to say “No, don’t pay for me; I will deal with the matter myself,” and he took no such step, I do not think it would be too far to go, on the facts, to say that there was an implied request. If it were necessary, I should say there was. I do not think, however, that the matter need be put upon that ground, because it seems to me immaterial whether the mortgagee had the right to take possession or not. The ship was his property, and the seizure was practically a good seizure but for the fact that there was a charter-party which, by the Admiralty law, the mortgagee could not disturb. What difference does that make? I do not think it makes any. The principle is decided in the case of Johnson v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, namely, that if there is an implied request it would be enforced; but the law goes further, and says, in the words afterwards used by Lord Esher in the case of The Orchis, that “if by reason of the default of one person the property of another becomes subject to seizure by law, if the person whose property is thus seized by a right process of law in consequence of the default of another pays the debt, the law implies a promise from the one whose debt is paid to repay it to the person who paid it.” Now, I do not think anything turns upon the actual phrase “is thus seized,” because I take it that it is enough that in this case there was a threat of seizure by those—namely, the master and crew—who had the power to seize, and, although the mortgagee’s ownership is not the same as that of the actual owner, still for all real intents and purposes, looking at the law in its broadest aspect, it appears to me that the mortgagee, in order to protect the property in which at the moment he was interested in fact—whether rightly or not does not matter—was compelled to pay certain sums, and the reason was that it was by the default of the plaintiff they were unpaid. It therefore seems to me that this case comes within the principle of the judgments in the case of Johnson v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company and The Ripon City. In the latter case I put it upon the ground that “the personal liability of the defendants to pay the sum which the plaintiff was considered to be compelled to pay, and did pay, was wanting.” In this case I think the defendant was compelled to pay and did pay, and that it was by reason of the default of the person—namely, the plaintiff—who was legally liable. In those circumstances I think the counter-claim must succeed, and with such costs as are properly attributable to it. With regard to the costs as a whole, if my attention had been called to the 2*l.* alternatively paid into court by way of satisfaction for any damage sustained, I might have thought that that might prove to be sufficient, and the plaintiff not entitled to costs. But I did give the plaintiff the costs, because his rights were infringed, and I do not think I ought to go back from that. With regard to the reference, I think the costs must be left open. There will be no costs of this hearing.

ADM.]

THE FRANKLAND.

[ADM.]

Judgment for the plaintiff on the claim; for the defendant on the counter-claim.

Solicitors for plaintiff, Whitley and Co., Liverpool.

Solicitors for defendant, H. Forshaw and Hawkins, Liverpool.

Monday, April 1, 1901.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President.)

THE FRANKLAND. (a)

Collision—Contribution between joint tortfeasors—Admiralty rule as to division of damages—Objection to registrar's report.

Where two vessels have been found both to blame for a collision and each has been condemned in a moiety of the other vessel's damages, such damages include a sum of money which one of them has become liable to pay for damage done to a third vessel in consequence of the collision.

In such cases the common law rule of no contribution between joint tortfeasors does not apply.

THIS was a motion in objection to the registrar's report assessing the damages in a collision action.

On the 8th Aug. 1900 a collision occurred between the Swedish steamship Avera and the steamship Frankland in Long Reach, river Thames.

The action was tried before Barnes, J., assisted by two of the Elder Brethren, on the 27th Nov. 1900, and resulted in his finding both vessels to blame and decreeing accordingly.

The Avera at the time of the collision was proceeding from the Thames to Middlesborough in ballast, and was struck on the starboard bow and driven against the barge Hope.

An action was commenced in the City of London Court by the owners of the barge against the owners of the Avera, who admitted liability for the collision, subject to the damages being assessed by the registrar of the City of London Court. This was done, and the damages were assessed at 26*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* with interest and costs.

At the reference before the registrar of the Admiralty Court the moiety claim of the Frankland was settled by the parties out of court, and the moiety claim of the Avera was heard on the 1st March 1901.

At the reference it was not suggested that the owners of the Avera had improperly admitted liability for the damage done to the barge Hope, nor was the amount of the damages paid disputed.

The only contention of the owners of the Frankland was that, the plaintiffs and defendants being joint tortfeasors, the plaintiffs could not obtain contribution from the defendants for any part of the damages decreed due in the City of London Court.

The registrar held that, as both vessels had been found to blame, and as it had been admitted by the defendants that the damage done to the barge was damage in fact arising out of the collision, the plaintiffs' right to recover rested on the decree of the Admiralty Court. Consequently the Admiralty rule for division of the damages must apply, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants a moiety of the damages and costs—viz., 17*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.*

The defendants moved to set aside the registrar's report.

Dawson Miller in support of the motion.—There is no difference between the Admiralty practice and the common law practice. At common law the plaintiffs could not recover, for the rule that there is no contribution between joint tortfeasors is settled law. In The Avon v. The Thomas Joliffe (63 L. T. Rep. 712; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 605; (1891) P. 7) Butt, J. held that when both tug and tow could be sued for the whole amount of damage done to a third vessel, neither could obtain contribution from the other. That was not a case in which a decree had been, or apparently could have been, obtained for division of damages between tug and tow, and consequently it came within the common law rule. See, too,

The Englishman and Australia, 72 L. T. Rep. 203; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 605; (1895) P. 212.

He also referred to

The Milan, 5 L. T. Rep. 590; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 185; Lush, 388;

The Bernina, 58 L. T. Rep. 423; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 257; 13 App. Cas. 1.

Butler Aspinall, K.C. and Dr. Stubbs, contra.—The doctrine of no contribution between joint tortfeasors ought not to be applied by the Admiralty Court. It is not founded on any principle of equity, and is inconsistent with the language of the decree in a collision action. The principle upon which this court has always acted is to divide all the losses consequent on a collision, and make each wrongdoer pay a moiety—e.g., salvage, loss of charter party, the expense of raising either vessel if wrecked. They referred to

Palmer v. Wick and Pulteney Town Steam Shipping Company (1894) A. C. 318;

Tatham, Bromage, and Co. v. Burr, 78 L. T. Rep. 473; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 401; (1898) A. C. 382;

The North Britain, 70 L. T. Rep. 210; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; (1894) P. 77.

Dawson Miller in reply.

THE PRESIDENT.—The question raised in this case presents some difficulty, because I confess it appears to me there are two principles which are to a certain extent in conflict. On the one hand it is contended that where two vessels come into collision, ex hypothesi by the fault of both, and one of them, in consequence of the collision, comes into contact with another vessel and does damage which has to be paid for,

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., K.C., and SURTON TIMMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.] BAKU STANDARD; OWNERS, &amp;C., SS. ANGELE v. OWNERS, &amp;C., SS. BAKU STANDARD. [P. C.

then that is part of the "damages arising out of the collision" which, by the decree of the Admiralty Court, are to be shared between the two vessels. On the other hand it is contended that inasmuch as the collision with the third vessel is a tort, and as both the vessels which previously came into collision are joint tortfeasors, if one is sued by the third vessel she is sued for a tort, and therefore, if her owners have to pay, they cannot recover from the owners of the other vessel, on the principle that there is no contribution between joint tortfeasors. I confess it is not very easy to see one's way out of this difficulty. My own inclination is to rest upon the broad language of the decree of the Admiralty Court, which no doubt has decided that these two vessels were to blame, and that for the damages—practically in terms, and certainly, according to the meaning of the decree, for all damages arising out of that collision—both vessels are equally responsible; that is to say, they have to divide them between them. Then the only question is, What damages come within the category which have to be divided equally? The expenses of salvage or the expenses arising from a contract which had to be broken, or many other things, might be suggested as giving rise to incidental damage, to be brought into those damages which are to be equally divided. Then it is said that all these suggested damages do not arise out of tort, and that, therefore, the principle of no contribution between joint tortfeasors does not arise in those cases. I confess there is that great difficulty, but, on the whole, I am inclined to rest upon the wording of the decree of the Admiralty Court, that all "damages arising out of the collision" are to be divided equally. Are these damages? Beyond all question they are. It may well be that if a third vessel sued and recovered against one of the two other vessels, as she could, it is within the ordinary common law principle that the vessel which was sued could not recover against the other vessel with which she came into collision. But to my mind it is an extension of that doctrine to say that you must so construe the decision of the Admiralty Court as to exclude damages arising from tort committed by one of the vessels in consequence of or as the result of the collision. No doubt it is a rule of law that joint tortfeasors cannot be called upon to contribute, and I do not intend to vary from that in the slightest degree, but I do not wish to extend it so as to put upon a decree of the Admiralty Court a limitation arising out of an extension of that principle. Unfortunately there is no decision in the courts of law which governs this case. The case of The Avon v. The Thomas Joliffe (ubi sup.) only decides that where a person is injured he can bring an action against either of the persons who did him that injury, and can recover from one, and that one cannot have the decree amended so as to enable him to recover from the other tortfeasor. In that respect the Admiralty Court does not differ from the principle of the common law; and both cases of The Englishman and the Australia (ubi sup.) seem to go no further. All they say is that you can recover against one of two joint tortfeasors, and that one cannot recover against the other. All that is law which I think is very obvious, but, none of those cases go so far as to say that where damages are connected with what in law would be a tort, they are not damages which fall within the wording of the decree of the Admiralty Court. I find no decision to that effect. I do not think the case of The Milan (ubi sup.) really helps one one way or the other. I should not like to rely strongly upon that case, even if I thought it applied, because there is no doubt that the most intelligible principle upon which The Milan (ubi sup.) rests is the identification of the cargo with the ship. That principle has been so shaken in the case of The Bernina (ubi sup.), that I should not be prepared to rely upon the decision in The Milan (ubi sup.) as one which ought to be strongly relied upon, or extended in the present day. But I do not think the case of The Milan (ubi sup.) really affects the matter, because it was only a case where cargo owners brought an action and inasmuch as the cargo was in a wrongdoing ship its owners could only recover half its value from the wrong-doing ship. In my view, in the present case, the damages are to be recovered, not less because the collision with the barge arose out of a tort.

Solicitors for the appellants, Botterell and Roche.

Solicitors for the respondents, Stokes and Stokes.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

May 8 and June 13, 1901.

(Present: Lords MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, LINDLEY, and Sir FORD NORTH.)

THE BAKU STANDARD; OWNERS, MASTER, AND CREW OF THE STEAMSHIP ANGELE v. OWNERS, MASTER, AND CREW OF THE STEAMSHIP BAKU STANDARD. (a)

Salvage—Damage suffered by salvaging vessel during services—Liability of vessel salvaged for damage—Onus of proof.

Where a vessel suffers damage while rendering salvage services and there is no proof that those in charge of her have been guilty of any negligence or unskilful management, there is a presumption that such injury is caused by the necessities of the services, and, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the vessel salvaged is liable to compensate the salvaging vessel for such damage. It is not the custom of a Court of Appeal to vary the decision of a court below on a question of amount merely because, had the case come before them in the first instance, they might have awarded a different sum.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople affirming, on rehearing, an award, in an action for salvage, of O'Malley, J., sitting in Vice-Admiralty.

The facts of the case were shortly as follows: About 6 p.m. on the 10th Dec. 1898 the Baku Standard, an oil tank steamship of 3708 tons gross and 2375 net register, while on a voyage from London to Batoum in ballast, broke her propeller shaft. At the time she was in the Sea of Marmora, Erekli Light bearing N. 15 degrees W. and 10½ miles distant. The weather was fine, there was no sea, and the wind was a light breeze from the N.E. While she was lying

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., K.C., and SUTTON TRIMMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

P.C.] BAKU STANDARD; OWNERS, &C., SS. ANGÈLE v. OWNERS, &C., SS. BAKU STANDARD. [P.C.]

broken down two steamships spoke her and offered assistance, but, as in each case they were outward bound from Constantinople, their services were not accepted. Eventually, about 10 p.m. on the same day, the respondents' steamship Angèle came up and her services were engaged.

The Angèle was a steamship of 1821 tons gross and 1149 tons net register, fitted with engines of 209 horse power nominal, and at the time was on a voyage from Marseilles to Constantinople in ballast. A hawser was passed without difficulty, and towing commenced at about 12.10 a.m. on the morning of the 11th Dec.

The weather remained fine, and towing proceeded without event until about 3 a.m., when a shock was felt on board the Angèle, and her engines began to race, indicating some injury to her propeller. She, however, continued towing the Baku Standard, and brought her to a safe anchorage off Constantinople about 9 p.m.

Upon her arrival a survey was held, and it was found that two of the four blades of her propeller had been broken off, and that the third one was damaged, having been broken about 8in. from the boss.

At the trial of the action before O'Malley, J., sitting in Vice-Admiralty, it was contended that this damage was due to the towage. The judge awarded 1000*l.* to the plaintiffs for salvage services, and such amount as might be found due to them for damage occasioned to the propeller.

At the reference before the registrar and merchants, the damages were assessed at 1316*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, and judgment was given for this amount accordingly.

The defendants appealed, and the case was re-heard and affirmed on appeal.

The defendants now appealed to the Privy Council.

Aspinall, K.C. (Scrutton, K.C. with him) for the appellants).—The judge was wrong in holding the defendants liable for the damage to the propeller. For the plaintiffs to recover in respect of such damage they must establish that it was occasioned by the necessities of the service. If the cause of the damage is left in doubt the defendants ought not to be made to pay for it:

The Thomas Blyth, Lush, 16;

The Cornelius Grinnell, 11 L. T. Rep. 278; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 140.

Joseph Walton, K.C. and Dr. Stubbs, for the respondents, contra.—If the salvors have not been guilty of negligence, the presumption is that any loss or damage incurred during the rendering of the services was occasioned by the necessities of the service. The practice of the courts has always been to give effect to this presumption:

The De Bay, 49 L. T. Rep. 414; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 156; 8 App. Cas. 559; Kennedy on Civil Salvage, p. 143.

Aspinall, K.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 13.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir FORD NORTH.—This was an appeal by the master and owners of the steamship Baku Standard from a judgment of the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, affirming a judgment of O'Malley, J. by which he awarded to the master and owners of the steamship Angèle (the present respondents) the sum of 1000*l.* for salvage and towage services; and also damages subsequently assessed at 1316*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.* The facts were as follows: The Baku Standard, of London, was a large oil tank screw steamer of 2375 tons register. On the evening of the 10th Dec. 1898, while passing through the Sea of Marmora on a voyage to Batoum, in ballast, she became disabled by the fracture of her propeller shaft. This was about 6 p.m. She was practically in no danger, as she was not making any water; there were numerous steamers about, and the weather was not unfavourable. Tugs could easily have been procured the next day from either Constantinople or the Dardanelles, and if in the meantime the currents had carried her towards the shore she could have anchored in safety. But she was helpless, and made the usual signals for assistance. First one and then another steamer came up and offered help, but the master declined their aid, thinking he might do better. About 10 p.m. the Angèle, having seen the signals, came up. She was a British steamer of 1149 tons, belonging to Malta, and bound for Constantinople in ballast; and after some discussion it was agreed that she should tow the Baku Standard to Constantinople, then about fifty miles distant. The price to be paid for her services was left to be settled between the owners. Accordingly a 4½in. wire hawser belonging to the Baku Standard was carried to the Angèle and made fast on her starboard quarter. The other end of that hawser was shackled to the starboard cable of the Baku Standard, the total distance between the vessels being about sixty fathoms. When ready the Angèle, with the other vessel in tow, started for Constantinople between midnight and 1 a.m. on the 11th Dec. It appeared that both vessels (probably from being in ballast) steered irregularly and yawed a good deal. About 3 a.m. a violent shock was felt on board the Angèle and her engines began to race, indicating some injury to the screw. But she completed her tow to Constantinople, reaching that port in the evening of the same day. Upon her arrival there it was found that two of the four blades of her propeller had been broken off from the boss, while a third blade had also been broken across about 8in. from the boss. There could be no doubt that this occurred at the time of the shock above-mentioned, but there was no direct evidence what was the cause of the accident. Various suggestions were made, but it was impossible to ascribe the injury with certainty to any definite cause. It occurred during the towage, and there was no proof that the master and crew of the Angèle were guilty of any negligence or unskilful management. The action was instituted on behalf of the Angèle claiming salvage and also the amount of damage actually sustained by her in carrying out the salvage work, with consequent demurrage, and other expenses. The judge of the Supreme Consular Court condemned the defendants in 1000*l.* for salvage service, and also for the other damages claimed, the amount to be ascertained by the registrar. That decision was affirmed on appeal. The amount claimed for damages was 1504*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*, and the registrar awarded 1316*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.* To deal first with the question of damages. It is clearly settled that when the vessel of a salvor has, without default on his part, been injured in the performance of

PRIV. CO.]

KÖNIG v. BRANDT.

[CT. OF APP.]

salvage services, compensation may be awarded to him in respect of the injury so sustained, and damages consequent thereon. It was laid down by the Judicial Committee in The De Bay (ubi sup.) that it was always justifiable—and sometimes important, if it could be done—to ascertain what damages and losses the salvaging vessel had sustained in rendering salvage services. It is often difficult and expensive, and sometimes impossible, to ascertain exactly the amount of such loss, and in such cases the amount of salvage must be assessed, in a general manner, upon so liberal a scale as to cover the loss, and to afford also an adequate reward for the services rendered. It is also laid down in the case of The Thomas Blyth (ubi sup.) that when the vessel of a salvor was injured or lost while engaged in a salvage service, the presumption was that the injury or loss was caused by the necessities of the service, and not by the default of the salvors; and that the burden of proof lay upon the parties who alleged that the loss was caused by the salvors' own acts. Adopting the principles thus laid down, and in the absence of any evidence that the damage to the Angèle was caused by negligence or default on the part of the master or crew of that vessel, their Lordships are of opinion that the damages assessed by the registrar were rightly awarded against the appellants. That being so, the compensation to be given for salvage services, as distinguished from compensation for damage, ought to be calculated on a less liberal scale than if the sum given for salvage was intended to cover compensation for damage also. Their Lordships are of opinion that, considering the evidence and that the compensation for damage was dealt with separately, full justice would have been done by an award of less than 1000*l.* for salvage. But that is a question of amount only, and it is not the custom of the committee to vary the decision of a court below on a question of amount, merely because they are of opinion that if the case had come before them in the first instance they might have awarded a smaller sum. It has been laid down in The De Bay (ubi sup.) and other cases that they would only do so if the amount awarded appeared to them to be grossly in excess of what was right; which is not the case here. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed. The appellants must pay the respondents' costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Jull, Godfrey, and Danvers.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

April 16 and 17, 1901.

(Before RIGBY, COLLINS, and STIRLING, L.JJ.)

KÖNIG v. BRANDT. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Consignment of goods—Alleged specific appropriation—Claim for lien—Bills drawn against particular shipments of goods—Contemporaneous letter of advice—Non-acceptance of bills—Passing of property in goods.

The defendants carried on business in London, and their practice was to sell in their own names goods shipped to them by P. and Co., who carried on business abroad. P. and Co. used to specify in advising drafts against what particular shipments the same were drawn, so as to enable the defendants to tell whether the particular shipments consigned to them did in fact cover the then outstanding drafts, but not to affect their right to treat all shipping documents as cover for the whole account between them and P. and Co.

P. and Co. used likewise to draw upon the plaintiffs, who also carried on business in London, against shipments of goods, bills which the plaintiffs accepted. P. and Co. afterwards forwarding to them, as security, before the bills reached maturity, bills drawn by P. and Co. on first-class firms (among them being the defendants), accompanied by the shipping documents of the goods shipped by them to such firms, and on such firms accepting the bills the plaintiffs would hand over to them the shipping documents which otherwise would have been retained.

The defendants having received instructions from P. and Co. to sell certain goods at a specified price, entered into contracts for the sale thereof. Subsequently P. and Co. wrote to the defendants that they had drawn upon them against the goods, and the bills were specified. The bills were drawn to the order of the plaintiffs by P. and Co. upon the defendants for various sums, and were together intended to provide for part of the credit or advances made by the plaintiffs to P. and Co.

Bills of lading for the goods, indorsed in favour of the defendants, were afterwards forwarded to them by P. and Co. The defendants took possession of the bills of lading, and applied them in satisfying, so far as they would go, the contracts into which they had entered; but, becoming doubtful as to the financial position of P. and Co.'s firm, they declined to accept the bills of exchange, and claimed to treat the proceeds of sale of the goods as available for payment of the general balance of account between themselves and P. and Co.

Held (affirming the decision of Buckley, J.), that there was no specific appropriation of the goods in favour of the plaintiffs; that the defendants were not compellable to accept the bills; and that nothing had been done to defeat the primary right of the defendants, in whose custody the goods were, to deal with them for their own purposes and irrespective of any rights of the plaintiffs.

(a) Reported by E. A. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CT. OF APP.]

KÖNIG v. BRANDT.

[CT. OF APP.]

THIS was an appeal on the part of the plaintiffs, König Brothers, that the order made in this action by Buckley, J., and dated the 26th March 1901 (refusing to make any order upon the plaintiffs' motion except that the costs thereof should be costs in this action), might, except in regard to the direction as to costs, be reversed or varied; and that it might be ordered that the defendants William Brandt, Sons, and Co., their servants and agents, be restrained until the trial of this action or further order from parting or dealing with the proceeds of sale of 2250 bags of linseed and 2375 bags of linseed respectively shipped by the firm of William Paats, Roche, and Co., of Buenos Ayres, per the ship Minho, and 1518 bags of linseed shipped by the same firm per the ship Virgen de Lourdes, the respective bills of lading for all which shipments were in the months of Jan. and Feb. 1901 sent to the defendants, or any part of such proceeds of sale, without providing for the payment to the plaintiffs of all moneys owing to the plaintiffs in respect of the sum of 9000*l.*, part of the credits or advances to the amount of 12,500*l.* made by the plaintiffs to the firm of William Paats, Roche, and Co., such sum of 9000*l.* being the amount intended to be provided for by three bills of exchange, dated the 22nd Jan. 1901, drawn to the order of the plaintiffs by the said firm upon the defendants for the respective sums of 2500*l.*, 3000*l.*, and 3500*l.*, which bills the defendants refused to accept.

The material facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment of Buckley, J., which was delivered on the 26th March 1901, as follows:

BUCKLEY, J.—In Aug. 1899 and onwards William Paats, Roche, and Co. were a firm of merchants carrying on business at Buenos Ayres. At the same time William Brandt, Sons, and Co. were a firm of merchants and foreign brokers carrying on business in the city of London. As between Paats and Co. and Brandt and Co. there was a course of dealing respecting which I will read from the affidavit of Augustus Philip Brandt. He says: "At first the said William Paats, Roche, and Co. were in the habit of drawing from time to time drafts for large amounts which they advised to my said firm without specifying in the drafts the shipments or contemplated shipments in respect of which they were drawn, and though, as a rule, they remitted in due course bills of lading as cover for the drafts, my firm found that this course of business was inconvenient because it was impossible to tell readily whether the shipping documents which my said firm might have in hand or expect at any particular time were sufficient to cover the drafts drawn by the said William Paats, Roche, and Co., and whether, therefore, they might prudently accept the bills of the last-mentioned firm. Consequently the said William Paats, Roche, and Co. were requested by my said firm to specify and thereafter did specify in advising against what particular shipments or contemplated shipments such drafts were drawn. The practice of specifying the shipments against which bills were drawn was adopted entirely for the protection and convenience of my said firm, and to enable them to tell whether the particular shipments consigned to them did in fact cover the then outstanding drafts, and to enable them to exercise a discretion in accepting the drafts, and was not intended to and did not affect the right of my said firm to treat all shipping documents as cover for the whole account between them and the said William Paats, Roche, and Co., or give any security to bill holders upon the shipments. We were never under any obligation to accept a draft, but always reserved the right to refuse if in our judgment the state of the general account between us and the said William Paats, Roche, and Co., the cover in hand or expected, and all the other circumstances, justified us in so doing. All accounts between us and the said firm of William Paats, Roche, and Co. were made up with interest on both sides." During the same time König Brothers were a firm carrying on business in the city of London, and, under a transaction which initiated with a letter of the 25th Aug. 1897 written by König Brothers to Brandt and Co. as the representatives of Paats and Co., a course of business had been established between the parties. As to the course of business between them, I will read from the affidavit of Friedrich Adolph König. He says: "Considerable business took place between Paats, Roche, and Co. and my said firm in accordance with those terms, the course of such business being for Paats, Roche, and Co. to draw upon my firm, against their shipments of goods, bills which we accepted, and for Paats, Roche, and Co. afterwards to forward to us as security, before the bills accepted by us reached maturity, bills drawn by them on first-class firms accompanied (except in such instances as hereinafter mentioned) by the bills of lading and shipping documents of the goods shipped by them to such firms, and on such firms accepting the bills when presented by my firm for us to hand over to such firms the bills of lading and shipping documents, and, in the event of any such firm declining to accept such bills, my firm would have retained the bills of lading and shipping documents and the goods to which they related as security for the bills so accepted by us. In some instances the bills of lading and shipping documents would be sent direct to the firms on whom Paats, Roche, and Co. had drawn in our favour, but in those cases the said documents and the goods to which they related were so sent as cover for the bills drawn in our favour, and in order that by means of the said documents and goods, or by means of the bills being accepted, our previous advances should be met. No objection was taken by us to this departure from the original terms, provided the bills in our favour were drawn on firms of whom we approved and were accepted by such firms. It is usual in dealings of a similar nature, where the parties are well known to each other, to send the shipping documents to the intended acceptors of the bills direct, it being a condition that they will accept the bills when presented. This course was always adopted by Messrs. Paats, Roche, and Co. when drawing on the defendants, who are a well-known firm of merchants." That being the course of dealing between those two firms of Brandt and Co. and König Brothers respectively, the transaction with which I have to deal is this: By a telegram of the 15th Oct. 1900, Paats and Co. instructed Brandt and Co. to sell for them 500 tons of linseed, and a contract was made accordingly. The grain was to follow. That transaction is known as "linseed business

[CT. OF APP.]

KÖNIG v. BRANDT.

[CT. OF APP.]

No. 22," and the contract is dated the 17th Oct. 1900. On the 19th Oct. 1900, upon further instructions given by Paats and Co. to Brandt and Co. the latter sold for Paats and Co. 300 tons of linseed, and that is known as "linseed business No. 23." On the 30th Oct. 1900 Paats and Co. wrote to König Brothers: "We have the honour to inform you that we have made free to value upon your esteemed firm against our shipments for account of third parties"—then follow the descriptions of three bills, aggregating to 12,500*l.*, at ninety days sight, London and Union Bank—"which please protect on presentation to the debit of our account. The shipping documents which form the security for these drafts as cover will be forwarded to you as usual." What next took place was that on the 22nd Jan. 1901 Paats and Co. drew upon Brandt and Co. three bills for 2500*l.*, 3000*l.*, and 3500*l.* respectively, making a total of 9000*l.* I will read one of those bills, which will be sufficient as they are all in similar form: "Buenos Ayres, 22nd Jan. 1901. 2500*l.* At ninety days sight of this our second of exchange (first and third of the same tenour and date unpaid) pay to the order of Messrs. König Brothers 2500*l.* sterling. Value in account which place to account of against shipment of grain as advised per Citta de Milano." On the same date Paats and Co. wrote to Brandt and Co.: "We confirm our respects of the 18th inst., and now beg to inform you that we have taken the liberty of drawing upon you against . . . and against linseed business No. 22, 5500*l.*, and against linseed business No. 23, 3500*l.*, as follows." Then the letter gives the numbers of the bills and their amounts, and they are the same amounts as before mentioned—viz., 2500*l.*, 3000*l.*, and 3500*l.*, making 9000*l.* They conclude thus: "Which drafts we recommend to your protection on presentation to our debit." What took place, therefore, so far as that transaction is concerned, was this: Paats and Co. drew upon Brandt and Co. bills which refer to a certain cargo of grain by these words "which place to account of against shipment of grain" and so on, and simultaneously wrote to Brandt and Co., saying: "Against linseed contract No. 22 and linseed contract No. 23 we have drawn these bills." Now, I pause there for the purpose of saying that, as I understand the decision in Brown, Shipley, and Co. v. Kough (52 L. T. Rep. 878; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 433; 29 Ch. Div. 848), the effect of a bill in that form and of a letter of advice in that form is not to appropriate the goods contained in the shipment referred to in the bills to answer the bills; it is not a specific appropriation. On the 21st Jan. 1901 Paats and Co. wrote to König Brothers, and the letter to them was as follows: "We confirm our respects of the 17th inst., and have the honour to hand you inclosed." Then follows a list of bills, among which are the 2500*l.* and the 3000*l.* and the 3500*l.* on Brandt and Co. Then they go on to say: "Which we request you to negotiate at best for our credit against our drafts of 12,500*l.*" On the 18th Feb. 1901 Brandt and Co. received the letter of the 22nd Jan. 1901 which I have read. Two days before that—i.e., on the 16th Feb. 1901—Brandt and Co. heard of the death of William Paats, who was the senior member of the firm of Paats and Co., and Brandt and Co. had reason to believe that the firm of Paats and Co. would request a moratorium. On the 18th Feb. 1901 Brandt and Co. received from Paats and Co. a further letter, dated the 25th Jan. 1901, and that is one in which they wrote: "We beg to confirm our letter of the 22nd inst., and to hand you inclosed bills of lading and invoices for the following linseed contracts"—amongst which were the linseed business No. 23, 2250 bags—"and request you to credit us for the following amounts." In respect of that the sum is 1859*l.* 10s. On the 25th Feb. 1901 Brandt and Co. received another letter, dated the 1st Feb. 1901, in which Paats and Co. say: "Please find herewith further bills of lading and invoices for the following linseed contracts No. 23, 2375 bags, and we request you to credit us with the following amounts." In respect of that the sum is 1871*l.* 16s. 4d. The bills drawn on Brandt and Co. came forward; they were sent to Brandt and Co. for acceptance, and, under the circumstances which I have mentioned, Brandt and Co. refuse to accept them. The bills of lading as they came forward were indorsed by Paats and Co.: "Deliver to Messrs. William Brandt, Sons, and Co., or order. Paats, Roche, and Co." That is the state of the facts. In that state of things König Brothers claim to be entitled as against the cargoes of linseed which I have referred to—or rather against the sums which are to be placed by way of credit against them, the linseed having been sold—to have a security. The question is whether they are entitled to such a security or not. First, I want to examine what was the position of matters as between Paats and Co. and Brandt and Co. It appears to me that in the course of business as between Paats and Co. and Brandt and Co., the latter had in the middle of Oct. 1900 sold linseed forward by the orders of Paats and Co., and, in order to complete all those contracts, Paats and Co. were bound to supply Brandt and Co. with linseed to comply with the orders for goods which they had sold. Paats and Co. did send shipping documents relating to linseed indorsed to Brandt and Co., or their order, and the same were sent to answer these particular contracts. What were Brandt and Co.'s rights in respect of them? According to the course of business as between Paats and Co. and Brandt and Co. as detailed in the affidavit which I have read, it seems to me that Brandt and Co. were entitled to take that linseed and to sell it, and to appropriate the proceeds of sale to the general account as between them and Paats and Co. But suppose that it were the fact that they were not entitled to do so unless they also accepted the bills, I have got to see then whether Paats and Co. were entitled to say to Brandt and Co.: "We send you these goods to answer the sales which you have made under our order; but we send them on the condition that you shall not take the goods unless you accept these bills." It appears to me that they could not do that. It seems to me that immediately Paats and Co. sent to Brandt and Co. the bills of lading representing the goods indorsed to their order, the property passed to Brandt and Co., and that Brandt and Co. were entitled to take that property, and the proceeds of that property, and to deal with it according to the course of business as between them and Paats and Co. What is argued on the other hand is this: It is said that that is not so; that the goods were only sent with a condition that Brandt and Co. should accept the bills; that Brandt and Co. did not accept them; and that, therefore, either the property did not pass or that, if it did pass, it reverted in Paats and Co. Upon that I will only refer to what was said in the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Banner; Re Tappenbeck (34 L. T. Rep. 199; 2 Ch. Div. 278, at p. 289) by Mellish, L.J. Referring to Shepherd v. Harrison (24 L. T. Rep. 857; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 66; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 116), he said, the bill having been sent to an agent: "Under these circumstances it was held by the House of Lords that the consignee had no right to keep the bill of lading without accepting the bill of exchange. This case is no authority for holding that if the property in the goods had already passed, the property would revert on the bills of exchange being refused acceptance." But suppose that I were wrong in respect of that, I want to go on to investigate next what were the rights as between Paats and Co. and König Brothers. Now, here I am assuming a hypothesis contrary to what I said just now, that, as between Paats and Co. and Brandt and Co., Paats and Co., by reason of Brandt and Co.'s refusing to accept the bills, had retaken the property and had the disposal of the goods. Suppose that that was so, what did they do? They wrote to König Brothers. The letter was that of the 30th Oct. 1900, saying that they had drawn upon König Brothers for such and such amounts, "which please protect," and adding, "The shipping documents which form the security for these drafts as cover will be forwarded to you as usual." That did not give any security, of course; it was a promise of something to be done in the future. In effect they say: "We have drawn upon you and we ask you to come under liability for our benefit, and we will hereafter give you a security." That will not give a security. Then on the 21st Jan. 1901 they write that they hand König Brothers certain bills—those were bills in the form which I have read—and add, "which we request you to negotiate at best for our credit against our drafts of 12,500l." Paats and Co. then sent to König Brothers the bills in the form in which they were in Brown, Shipley, and Co. v. Kough (ubi sup.), which would show, of course, that a particular cargo was referred to in the bill. But otherwise there was no communication by Paats and Co. to König Brothers that the goods dealt with by such bills of lading, if there were any—and, of course, there would be in respect of those shipments—were to be security for them. It seems to me that the utmost that they did by the letter of the 21st Jan. 1901 was in effect to say: "We give to you, König Brothers, such rights as arise from the fact that the bills on Brandt and Co. which we send you contain a reference to the cargo." Does that give a security? It appears to me that it does not. If the proposition be right as laid down by Chitty, J., and, I think, again by the Court of Appeal, in Brown, Shipley, and Co. v. Kough (ubi sup.) be correct, it seems to me that that cannot be so. Chitty, J. says this (at p. 856 of 29 Ch. Div.): "I take it now to be settled law that a mere reference on the face of the bill to a cargo, showing that the bill is drawn (to use a term in mercantile language) as against the cargo, does not create any charge in favour of the bill-holder as against the cargo or the proceeds of the cargo." In the letter of the 21st Jan. 1901 that is the most that, it seems to me, König Brothers got. They got such benefit as would flow from the fact that the bills were drawn—according to mercantile language—as against the cargo. To show that that proposition is right, I will refer to what Mellish, L.J. laid down in Robey and Co.'s Perseverance Ironworks v. Ollier (27 L. T. Rep. 362; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 695, at p. 699). There the Lord Justice says this: "The indorsement of a bill gives only a right to the bill, and I do not think that any mercantile man would suppose, because he saw in the bill the words 'which place to account cargo per A.,' that he was to have a lien on the cargo. A mercantile man who is intended to have a lien on a cargo expects to have the bill of lading annexed; if there is no bill of lading annexed, he only expects to get the security of the bill itself." It seems to me, therefore, that all that König Brothers got from Paats and Co. was such right, if any, as arose from the fact that the deal was in the form in which, in point of fact, it was. That, it seems to me, is not an appropriation of the goods to answer the bill. But then the plaintiffs' counsel disclaimed the notion of appropriation, and said that their case really rested upon equitable assignment. I do not see how equitable assignment is available at all. For the purpose of equitable assignment, it seems to me that you must get to this: that Paats and Co. having goods in the hands of Brandt and Co., which goods, or the proceeds of which goods, belonged to them, Paats and Co. say to Brandt and Co.: "Hand those goods or their proceeds to König Brothers, and tell König Brothers of that." I do not see that the facts here come up to that. What Paats and Co. had said to Brandt and Co. was: "Here are these goods deliverable to you to answer our sales." And, according to the course of business as between Paats and Co. and Brandt and Co., if Mr. Brandt's affidavit is right, the proceeds would go to the general credit of the account as between the parties. It appears to me that Paats and Co. could not, and did not, assign in favour of König Brothers any right in respect of these goods. I must, therefore, make no order upon this motion except that the costs of the motion be costs in the action.

From that decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

Henry Terrell, K.C. and Christopher James for the appellants.

Birrell, K.C. and R. J. Parker for the respondents.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments.

The following authorities were cited or referred to in the course of the arguments:

Frith v. Forbes, 4 De G. F. & J. 409;

Inman v. Clare, 1 Johns. 769;

Shepherd v. Harrison, 24 L. T. Rep. 857; 1 Asp.

Mar. Law Cas. 66; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 116;

Brown, Shipley, and Co. v. Kough, 52 L. T. Rep.

878; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 433; 29 Ch. Div.

848;

Ex parte Banner; Re Tappenbeck, 34 L. T. Rep.

199; 29 Ch. Div. 278, at p. 288;

Tailby v. Official Receiver, 60 L. T. Rep. 162; 13

App. Cas. 523, at p. 543;

Sale of Goods Act 1893, s. 19, sub-ss. 1, 2, 3.

CT. OF APP.]

KÖNIG v. BRANDT.

[CT. OF APP.]

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned judge in the court below ought to be supported, and that the relief asked for by this appeal ought to be declined. I think that the learned judge in the court below was quite right in his judgment upon the points that were there raised, and that that is sufficient. I therefore say that the decision found by the learned judge in the court below was right and ought to be affirmed, and I do not think it necessary to make any other observations upon the points argued. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the decision of Buckley, J., and I agree with the grounds upon which he has arrived at it. The foundation of Mr. Terrell's argument is double; he has two points. First of all he contends that by the general agreement between the plaintiffs, König Brothers, and William Paats, Roche, and Co., the foreign firm in Buenos Ayres, the plaintiffs became entitled to a specific assignment of the particular cargo upon which the lien is claimed in this case. The plaintiffs say that there was a general agreement which gave them an equitable right to each specific portion of cargo as and when it was the subject-matter of a bill of exchange drawn against it, and that, taking the antecedent agreement and the appropriation by the drawing of a particular bill of exchange against it, the conditions entitling them to their lien were fulfilled. On that ground they say that they have a lien upon the proceeds of a particular cargo in this case. But, furthermore, they say that that lien overrides any claim of the defendants William Brandt, Scns, and Co. to hold that cargo in their own right. Buckley, J. has held first—I think that he held it as the second point, but it is one of the essential points—that no specific appropriation of this particular cargo in favour of the plaintiffs was made out; and, secondly, that nothing was done to defeat the primary right of the defendants, in whose custody it is, to deal with it for their own purposes and irrespective of any rights of the plaintiffs. Now, I will deal with the second point first. The defendants were the persons who acted as correspondents for the foreign firm of William Paats, Roche, and Co.. Their course of business was to sell in their own name, as principals, certain consignments forwarded to them by the foreign firm abroad. They did in point of fact sell and become liable to the purchasers for the delivery of the particular consignment in question respecting which the point as to the right of lien in this case arises. Now, having sold that consignment, as far back, I think, as October of last year by a contract to arrive they were bound to the purchasers of that cargo to furnish the goods therein named as soon as they came forward. In that state of facts the foreign firm of William Paats, Roche, and Co. sent to the defendants a letter in which they make mention of certain drafts which they have drawn in favour of the plaintiffs, and invite the protection of the defendants to these drafts, amounting in all to a sum of something like 9000*l.* By a letter dated a day or two afterwards, they forward bills of lading for one portion—that is, the portion in question in this case—of the consignments in respect of which they have by the letter I first referred to stated that they have drawn drafts in favour of the plaintiffs. I need only deal with the bill of lading embracing the particular consignment now in question. The bill of lading is forwarded fully indorsed in favour of the defendants, and it represents goods to the value of about 1800*l.* Now, it is said by Mr. Terrell that the obligation to accept all these drafts to the extent of about 9000*l.* was a condition precedent, as I understand him, to any right whatever on the part of the defendants to deal with this particular bill of lading indorsed to them and primā facie, therefore, conveying to them the unincumbered property in and the right to deal with those goods. That seems a very extraordinary and unreasonable contention on the face of it. But I do not say that it would be impossible for the parties to agree that such were their rights. We have, however, got to find out—and we have only got the materials of the affidavits and documents before us—whether business was being done between the defendants in England and William Paats, Roche, and Co. out in Buenos Ayres on these terms. When you come to look at the defendant Augustus Philip Brandt's affidavit which Buckley, J. has adopted, it seems to me, if we believe it, to negative any such possibility. When on an application of this kind we are not finally deciding upon the rights of the parties, it seems to me to be quite reasonable to accept the statement of Augustus Philip Brandt in this matter, especially where it coincides with the common-sense view, and what one would anticipate ought to be the course of dealing between the parties. Just look at the position of the defendants. They have sold by the direction of the foreign firm of William Paats, Roche, and Co. this particular consignment. They have made themselves responsible to the purchasers. Are we to assume that they have agreed that their right to deal with the bill of lading, representing the parcel that they have sold in performance of a contract for which they have become personally liable at the instance of the vendors, is to be fettered by an obligation to make themselves personally liable by accepting bills to the extent of 9000*l.*? The contention, negatively put, as it was put by Mr. Parker, appears to me to be ridiculous. I cannot gather that out of the agreement between the parties; and, if I do not get it out of the agreement between the parties, I certainly do not get it as an inference of law from the method in which the bills of lading have been sent and the method in which the drafts which the defendants were invited to accept have been sent. We have not got here a case analogous to that of Shepherd v. Harrison (24 L. T. Rep. 857; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 66; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 116) at all. Shepherd v. Harrison (ubi sup.) was a case between buyer and seller, and the seller sent to his own agent in England a bill of lading not indorsed over and in favour of the buyer, but indorsed generally. He sent it to his agent, and he sent along with it a draft for acceptance by the buyer. The seller having so protected himself and retained the ius disponendi by keeping the bill of lading in this form in the hands of his agent, the agent then by a letter sent the bill of lading and the draft for acceptance to the buyer. It was held by the House of Lords that the effect of that transaction was that the property did not pass; that the action of the agent in sending the bill of lading indorsed generally with the draft for acceptance, made the acceptance of the draft a condition of the property passing to the buyer at all; and that therefore in that case the property did not pass. Here you have a case where it is essential to the original underlying obligation in the whole matter—that is, the obligation on the part of the defendants to deliver to the persons to whom they have contracted as principals to sell—that they should acquire the right to deal with the subject-matter of his contract (namely, linseed in this case) when it comes forward. A bill of lading, unfettered, passing the absolute property to them, is sent to the defendants, who have come under the obligation which I have named at the instance of the persons who send the bill of lading. You certainly cannot infer from that transaction that as a matter of law—apart from some general agreement which might or might not be found in other instances—that the right to deal with that bill of lading so sent is defeated because in another letter they have been apprised that drafts have been drawn in favour of the plaintiffs, embracing, among other things, the price of this particular consignment, or a sum in respect of this particular consignment. It seems to me that it certainly cannot arise as a matter of law. The conditions under which it arose in Shepherd v. Harrison (ubi sup.) do not arise here, and the surrounding circumstances negative any intention that it should arise. Having got that question of law, I look to the actual statements of the defendants on the one hand and the plaintiffs on the other, and I find that the defendant Augustus Philip Brandt's affidavit absolutely negatives any such arrangement. His affidavit is to the effect that the defendants had been at one time in the habit of accepting drafts drawn by the foreign firm of William Paats, Roche, and Co.; that they always had the right to consider whether any particular draft sent forward for their acceptance was one that in the state of dealing between them and William Paats, Roche, and Co. they would be justified in accepting; that that practice was afterwards at the defendants' instance and for their convenience modified to a certain extent by intimation being given in the communications from the agents abroad in respect of what consignments they wanted drafts accepted; but that the object of that was merely to apprise the defendants as to how they stood approximately when the question came before them as to whether they would or would not accept a particular draft; and that there was no obligation imposed on them to accept a particular draft in derogation of their general right of lien in their general account as between them and William Paats, Roche, and Co. That being so, the convenience of the defendants was considered and met by giving them better information, guiding them in the question whether they would or would not accept a particular draft. But it did not go further, and their contention and the assertion in the affidavit is that that was not meant in any way to modify, and did not modify, the defendants' general right to assert their general lien. Well, in this particular case William Paats, Roche, and Co. have got into difficulties, and are largely indebted to the defendants, and the defendants claim—and Buckley, J. has accepted their contention—that their right to deal with the proceeds of these goods in relief of the indebtedness of William Paats, Roche, and Co. to them is unfettered by whatever has happened in the correspondence, whereby they have been invited to accept these drafts in favour of the plaintiffs. The defendants have refused to accept those drafts, and they claim to hold these goods unincumbered by any lien on the part of the plaintiffs. I quite agree with Buckley, J.'s view upon the matter. I think that he was absolutely right in holding that the defendants' right is unfettered by anything that has happened between the plaintiffs and William Paats, Roche, and Co.

Now I come to the other side of the question. Even assuming—as Buckley, J. does—for the purpose of the second branch of the argument, that I am wrong upon that first point (though upon this point perhaps it would be unnecessary, feeling as strongly as I do on the first point, to give any opinion), nevertheless it does seem to me that Buckley, J. was right upon this point also. That is to say, I do not think that the facts here do amount to any specific appropriation of these goods in the defendants' hands for the benefit of the plaintiffs, because when you come to look at the agreement under which the plaintiffs claim their right, what does it amount to? It is an agreement whereby the plaintiffs undertake undoubtedly to finance, and do finance, William Paats, Roche, and Co.; that is to say, they give their acceptances by means of which William Paats, Roche, and Co. are able to procure goods abroad which they afterwards ship to England. And in letters which have been read they undertake in order to give security for these drafts—these drafts, I think, are drawn at ninety days—that within forty-five days they will give good bills on other persons; and, further, that, as to some of them, if not as to all of them, and as to good trade bills I think, they will put the defendants in possession of documents—give them documentary bills. That is their undertaking. But when William Paats, Roche, and Co. give the defendants the documents, the reason of their giving the documents with the bills is that they may be in a position to demand from the persons on whom those bills are drawn that they shall accept those bills. When, however, they have accepted the bills they part with the documents. With regard to the documents, as Mr. Parker pointed out, it merely was putting a weapon in the hands of William Paats, Roche, and Co. to make it a certainty that they would be able to secure that which was to be their real protection—namely, bills drawn on good firms in England. Now, that practice was pursued for some time, and no doubt when they had the documents they had a lien upon the goods represented by the documents. But after awhile that was found, for some reason or another—why, we do not know—to be inconvenient. It is suggested by Mr. Parker, and it seems the most reasonable explanation, that what they did want was the security of these good firms upon which the bills were drawn. That was their real security, and that they did not think it worth while to insist upon, having the intermediate lien upon the documents ancillary to and antecedent to their getting possession of the acceptances. But, anyhow, they ceased to insist, and, as they did not insist, they never got possession of the documents in this case. And they had ceased for some time apparently to demand or receive possession of documents. They waited in the

[CT. OF APP.]

KÖNIG v. BRANDT.

[CT. OF APP.]

expectation, which appears to have been always realised, that they would get the acceptances, which was what they wanted as their security, on good firms. But not having got their documents, they certainly did not get the actual security of a lien. Now, how do they make out that they have nevertheless got a lien upon this particular consignment, in respect of which they never have had the documents? They had to get two things: they had to get an agreement that they were to have a lien upon this particular consignment, and they had to show that this particular consignment had been appropriated to that lien. The agreement was not merely a general agreement that consignments should be appropriated, but they had to get the agreement which I have mentioned, and then they had to get this particular consignment earmarked as specifically appropriated. Suppose they get a general agreement, which is what Mr. Terrell relies upon, where do they get the specific appropriation under that agreement of this particular consignment? It seems to me that the only thing which they can rely upon as giving them a specific lien upon this particular cargo or portion of a cargo is the fact that it does appear that particular bills were drawn purporting to be drawn against this particular cargo. It does appear in the correspondence between the defendants and William Paats, Roche, and Co. that the latter firm purport to draw bills against this particular consignment among others. But it has been held in the case of Brown, Shipley, and Co. v. Kough (52 L. T. Rep. 878; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 433; 29 Ch. Div. 848) that the drawing of a bill purporting to be drawn against a particular cargo does not operate to give a lien to the holder of that bill on that cargo. It is not an assignment; it is not an appropriation. It seems to me that in this particular case Mr. Terrell is not able to show that there has been a specific appropriation of this particular cargo for the benefit of his clients. It seems to me, therefore, that Buckley, J. was right on both grounds, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I come to the same conclusion. I desire to rest my judgment upon the first of the two grounds which have been dealt with by Collins, L.J.—namely, that it has not been made out that the defendants have not a right to deal with the goods and the proceeds of the goods in the way in which they intend to do. I come to that conclusion partly upon the written documents and partly upon the affidavits—in fact, upon the evidence which is now before the court. And in anything that I say I am directing myself to that evidence as it now exists; and I do not desire in any way to prejudice the disposal of the action when matters may be investigated which have not yet been brought before the court and which, no doubt, require and will have investigation. Now, the position is this: William Paats, Roche, and Co. are a mercantile firm carrying on business in Buenos Ayres. The defendants are correspondents of theirs in London, and the plaintiffs are also persons in London who have dealings with William Paats, Roche, and Co. In the month of October of last year the defendants received instructions by telegraph from William Paats, Roche, and Co. to sell 500 tons of linseed at a specified price. They tell us that on the 17th Oct. 1900 they entered into a contract for the sale of that amount of linseed accordingly, and this is the transaction referred to as “linseed business No. 22.” Then on the 19th of the same month a further telegram was received by the defendants with reference to 300 tons of linseed. The defendants succeeded in selling that in the same way, and that is a transaction which is referred to as “linseed business No. 23.” In both cases, as I understand, the contracts entered into by the defendants were entered into with purchasers in their own names for the delivery of these quantities of linseed, amounting in one case to 500 tons and in the other to 300 tons. That being so, there was incumbent upon William Paats, Roche, and Co. the duty of forwarding to the defendants the proper amount of linseed to enable them to fulfil the contracts, and that began to be done in the month of January of the present year. On the 22nd Jan. 1901 William Paats, Roche, and Co. wrote to the defendants: “We confirm our respects of the 18th inst., and now beg to inform you that we have taken the liberty of drawing upon you against shipment of about 3000 tons wheat”—then they specify certain bills, amounting to 15,000*l.*, which do not relate to the present transaction at all. I merely refer to that to point out that they are stated to be against shipments of wheat by a particular steamer. Then the letter goes on: “And against linseed business No. 22, 5500*l.*, and against linseed business No. 23, 3500*l.*, as follows”; and then it specifies the bills—three bills in all. Then the letter goes on, “which we recommend to your protection on presentation to our debit” These, therefore, purport to be drawn against the linseed contracts. Three days afterwards, on the 25th Jan., William Paats, Roche, and Co. wrote again to the defendants: “We beg to confirm our letter of the 22nd inst., and to hand you inclosed bills of lading and invoices for the following linseed contracts”—one of these is No. 23, 2250 bags—“and request you to credit us with the following amounts.” In respect of No. 23 is an amount of 1859*l.* 10*s.*, which I understand to be the price of the linseed as appearing by the invoice which was inclosed. I need not pursue the transaction further. That will be enough to bring out the point which arises in the present case. Those letters of the 22nd Jan. and the 25th Jan. both arrived in London on the 18th Feb. In the meantime, on the 16th Feb., William Paats, who was the head of the firm in Buenos Ayres, had suddenly died, and the defendants had become aware of that, and had also been informed that there was some question as to the financial position of William Paat’s firm. The bills of lading were indorsed in favour of the defendants, and the defendants took possession of those bills of lading and applied them in satisfying, so far as they would go, the contracts of sale which they had entered into. They declined, however, to accept the bills for 9000*l.* which had been forwarded to them by the letter of the 22nd Jan., and they claimed to treat the proceeds of sale of this linseed as available for the payment of the general balance of account between themselves and William Paats, Roche, and Co.

The first question that we have got to decide is whether those claims are well founded. It has been strongly argued that this case very closely resembles, as in some of its features it does resemble, the case of Shepherd v. Harrison (ubi sup.)

[CT. OF APP.]

THE HEATHER BELL.

[CT. OF APP.]

in the House of Lords. In that case it was laid down that where a bill of exchange and a bill of lading come together, being sent by a vendor to a vendee, with a request that the vendee will accept the bill of exchange, the person who receives the letter and documents cannot avail himself of the bill of lading unless he accepts the bill of exchange. The general rule is stated very shortly by Sir George Mellish in the case which has been referred to of Ex parte Banner; Re Tappenbeck (34 L. T. Rep. 199; 2 Ch. Div. 278, at p. 289), and is this: "Every person who consigns goods to another has a right to give directions how the goods are to be disposed of, and a consignee to whom such directions are given must dispose of the goods in the way directed or else return them." The directions which are given in respect of these goods are contained strictly in the letter of the 25th Jan. 1901. The letter with regard to the bill of exchange is dated a day or two before, but I lay no stress whatever on the fact that the letters are separate. The directions might, in my view, have been contained in one and the same letter. And the question which we have got to decide upon the construction of these documents, and having regard to the course of business between the parties, is whether a condition was imposed on the defendants of accepting the bills of exchange before they availed themselves of any bill of lading of the linseed. Now, the fundamental point to be remembered is this, to which I have already called attention: the defendants had already on behalf of William Paats, Roche, and Co. entered into contracts for the sale of this very linseed in respect of which they were personally liable, and they were entitled, as I have already said, to receive from William Paats, Roche, and Co. a sufficient supply of linseed to enable them to fulfil that contract. No doubt they were, to a certain extent, in the hands of William Paats, Roche, and Co., and that firm, forwarding to them a bill of lading of linseed of which they estimated the value was 1859l. 10s. might nevertheless attach to that, if they saw fit, a condition that the person to whom it was sent should not avail himself of it unless he saw fit to accept bills of exchange to the amount of 9000l. It is quite possible, abstractly considered, that such a condition might be imposed, and, if it is imposed in express terms, then the rule which is stated by Sir George Mellish in Ex parte Banner; Re Tappenbeck (ubi sup.) applies. But that is not a natural state of things, and the court will not construe a correspondence between merchants in such a way as to throw such a responsibility upon the receiver of such documents unless it is clear beyond doubt that such is the meaning of the transaction. Now what do we find here? Let me look, first, at the letter of the 25th Jan. 1901: "We hand you inclosed bills of lading for the following linseed contracts," and so on, "and request you to credit us with the following amounts." That refers, first of all, to linseed contracts—contracts in respect of which the defendants had made themselves liable. They send the bills of lading which are to be applied to those contracts, and a bill of lading for a particular quantity of linseed which is to be applied to contract No. 23. The meaning of that direction I take to be, "Take the linseed which is represented by the bill of lading in question, and apply that in fulfilment of your duty toward the purchasers under No. 23 contract." Then what is to be done? They are to "credit us with the following amounts," and then comes the amount of the price appearing by the invoice. The effect of the direction is this: "In the account relating to that contract you are to credit us with that amount." What is to be done with the bills of exchange? They say that against the linseed contract No. 22, 5500l., and against the linseed contract No. 23, 3500l., are drawn, "which drafts we recommend to your protection on presentation to our debit." That was an invitation, no doubt, to accept those bills of exchange, and, if that was done, the defendants were authorised to debit those against the respective linseed contracts. Now that seems to me perfectly intelligible. It does not involve, as it seems to me, necessarily the imposition on the defendants of a condition to accept bills to the amount of 9000l. before they touch any linseed which is to be applied in fulfilment of contracts which have already been entered into. And, when we look at the surrounding circumstances, that seems to me to be quite clear, because one of the defendants, Mr. Augustus Philip Brandt, who has made an affidavit on behalf of the defendants, tells us this: [His Lordship read an extract from that affidavit as set forth in the judgment of Buckley, J., and continued:] Now, if that be a true account of the course of business between William Paats, Roche, and Co. and the defendants, it seems to me that this letter of the 22nd Jan. ought not to be treated as imposing upon the defendants an obligation to accept these bills before they can take advantage of the bills of lading which were forwarded. Mr. Augustus Philip Brandt also swears that he had no notice of any of the relations between the plaintiffs and William Paats, Roche, and Co. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the result at which Buckley, J. arrived was perfectly correct, and that this appeal must be dismissed. At present I say nothing on the second point which was argued by Mr. Terrell, as to the effect of the contract which was entered into between the plaintiffs and William Paats, Roche, and Co. Whatever it may be, it does not seem to me that that affects the present stage of the case between the plaintiffs and the defendants.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Druces and Atlee.

Solicitors for the respondents, Hollams, Sons, Coward, and Hawksley.

May 22 and 23, 1901.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., SMITH, M.R., and ROMER, L.J.)

THE HEATHER BELL. (a)

Mortgage—Charter for use of ship by mortgagor—Wrongful seizure by mortgagee—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 34.

Where the mortgagor of a vessel entered into a charter or agreement for the use of the vessel with a third party (the plaintiff) whereby the plaintiff was to have possession of the ship for about six weeks, and was to run her on specified voyages between places in the United Kingdom

(a) Reported by BUTLER ASPINALL, Esq., K.C., and SUTTON TIMMIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CT. OF APP.]

THE HEATHER BELL.

[CT. OF APP.]

and was to finance the vessel, being granted the highest charge and lien on the vessel the mortgagor could grant to secure any sums he might so disburse :

Held, that such a charter or agreement did not impair the value of the mortgagee's security, and that the latter was liable in damages to the plaintiff, the charterer, for taking possession of the vessel under his mortgage after default had been made by the mortgagor.

Where a mortgagee wrongly took possession of the mortgaged ship as against the charterer, and paid wages then due to the crew from the charterer, it was held that, in the circumstances, the charterer was liable to the mortgagee for the wages so paid.

Judgment of Sir F. Jeune, P. affirmed.

THIS was an appeal and a cross appeal from a judgment of Sir Francis Jeune, President, in favour of the plaintiff on the claim, and the defendant on the counter-claim.

The case is reported in the court below (ante, p. 192).

The material facts were shortly as follows:—

On the 4th July 1900 the defendant William Ward sold the steamship Heather Bell to the South Coast and Continental Service Limited for the sum of 2500*l.* Of this sum 625*l.* was paid in cash, and three bills for 625*l.* each at two, four, and six months respectively were given for the balance. To further secure the payment of the sums due upon the bills the purchasers mortgaged the Heather Bell to the defendant.

The plaintiff William Horton was the owner of the Rhos Abbey Hotel and of the pier at Rhos, Colwyn Bay, North Wales. In order to secure a service of passenger vessels between Liverpool and Rhos during the summer months he entered into an agreement on the 29th Aug., notice of which was given to the defendant, with the South Coast and Continental Service Limited. Previous to this the plaintiff had to some extent financed the Heather Bell.

The material parts of the agreement of the 29th Aug. were as follows :

Memorandum whereby the South Coast and Continental Service Limited, the owners of the Heather Bell, agree to charter her to William Horton, of Bryn Dinarth, Colwyn Bay, from the 29th Aug. until the 15th Oct. 1900 on the following terms: (1) The boat shall be delivered to William Horton, at Liverpool, forthwith as she now is . . . The vessel shall be used for passenger and merchandise traffic between Liverpool, Rhos-on-Sea, Llandudno, Menai Straits, Colwyn Bay, and Rhyl, and not otherwise without the consent in writing of the owners. (2) It is admitted that at the present time part of the machinery of the boat is held as a lien for the repairs thereto; and it has been agreed that the said William Horton will advance such amount as may be necessary to liberate such machinery, and shall add same to what is already due to him thereon. (3) The owners also admit that William Horton has advanced certain other sums in connection with the boat, for which sums it is agreed that the said W. Horton shall have a charge and lien on the boat, ranking in the highest position the owners are able to fix the same, having regard to existing circumstances. (4) The said W. Horton is hereby authorised to sell such of the effects on board the boat as may not be requisite or necessary for the use of the boat and the service aforesaid, but shall bring the proceeds into the accounts hereinafter mentioned. (5) The said W. Horton shall be in no way responsible . . . for any repairs which may be from time to time necessary or desirable, but any repairs he thinks fit to execute shall be added to his charge and lien. (7) The charterer shall keep true and exact account of all receipts . . . and of all payments and expenses of the service. The before-mentioned expenses shall be paid out of the before-mentioned receipts . . . and accounts shall be made up weekly. (8) The profits of the venture (if any) shall belong to and be divided into equal shares and proportions between the owners and the charterers at the expiration of the charter. (10) In case the mortgagees of the said vessel shall exercise their rights (if any), and thereby the charter hereby granted shall be affected, the owners shall not be responsible to the charterers in damages or otherwise in respect thereof.

In pursuance of this agreement the Heather Bell made daily trips between Liverpool, Llandudno, and Rhos until the 4th Sept., when she was taken in execution by the sheriff under a judgment which had been obtained against her owners.

On the 8th Sept. the sheriff withdrew from possession, but on the same day the Heather Bell was seized by the defendant under his mortgage, as the bill for 625*l.*, which fell due on the 4th Sept., had been dishonoured by the South Coast and Continental Service Limited.

The plaintiff then brought an action against the mortgagee to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by him owing to the withdrawal of the Heather Bell from the service in which she had been engaged.

The defendant denied liability and also counter-claimed for wages paid to the master and crew when he took possession. These wages had become due before the defendant took possession.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) :

Sect. 34. Except so far as may be necessary for making a mortgaged ship or share available as a security for the mortgage debt, the mortgagee shall not by reason of the mortgage be deemed the owner of the ship or share, nor shall the mortgagor be deemed to have ceased to be the owner thereof.

Sir Francis Jeune gave judgment for the plaintiff on the claim and the defendant on the counter-claim.

The defendant and the plaintiff appealed.

Robson, K.C. and Ernest Pollock for the appellant.

Carver, K.C. (Leslie Scott with him) for the respondent.

The following authorities were cited :

- Cory v. Stewart*, 2 Times Rep. 508 ;
Collins v. Lamport, 11 L. T. Rep. 497 ; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 153 ;
Keith v. Burrows, 37 L. T. Rep. 291 ; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 481 ; 2 App. Cas. 636 ;
Brown v. Tanner, 18 L. T. Rep. 624 ; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 94 ; L. Rep. 3 Ch. 597 ;
The Celtic King, 70 L. T. Rep. 562 ; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 440 ; (1894) P. 175 ;
Laming v. Seater, 16 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 828 ;
Johnson v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 17 L. T. Rep. 445 ; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 21 ; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 38 ;
The Ripon City, 78 L. T. Rep. 296 ; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391 ; (1898) P. 78 ;
The Orchis, 62 L. T. Rep. 407 ; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501 ; 15 P. Div. 38 ;
The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 34.

The court dismissed the appeal and the cross-appeal.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I propose to deal with the cross-appeal first. The defendant, being the mortgagee of the vessel, took possession, as he was entitled to do, but subject to an agreement which, as we have already intimated, we think he was not properly entitled to set aside. Therefore he wrongfully took possession. If that was all that had happened and he had thought fit to pay the wages due, I think it would be very difficult to hold that there was an implied request. I express no opinion with regard to the second ground upon which the learned judge has decided in favour of the defendant. But after the seizure of the vessel the parties negotiated, and while that was going on the defendant says: "Wages are still going on; had we not better pay the crew off?" On two occasions he asked that and got no reply, and came to the conclusion that there was an implied request. We think it was quite open for him to come to that conclusion, and that therefore on that ground the counter-claim was right and the counter-appeal must be dismissed. With regard to the costs, we think the order of the President, giving the plaintiff the costs, ought to stand, and the costs of the reference will be reserved. Now comes the main appeal of Mr. Robson and Mr. Pollock, which is that the mortgagee has a right to say that an agreement entered into on the 29th Aug. between the mortgagor and the plaintiff was invalid as against him. The purchase money, or an instalment of it, became due on the 7th Sept., and there is some evidence that the plaintiff suspected that under some circumstances that instalment would not be paid, and that the mortgagee might enforce his rights, but of course it does not follow that the mortgagee would take possession. We have to consider what are the rights of a mortgagor who is in possession of a ship, and the rights of the mortgagee depending upon the mortgage. I may say that I think no fraud was imputed or could be imputed on the evidence against Mr. Horton, who, as we are told, is a solicitor and a gentleman interested in developing his estate at Rhos, by running steamers to bring traffic and tourists from Liverpool during the summer months. In the first place, the position of mortgagee and mortgagor is defined by statute. Sect. 34 of the present Act, which is in all respects the same as the section referred to in Collins v. Lamport (ubi sup.), provides that except in so far as may be necessary for making such ship or share available as a security for the mortgage debt a mortgagee shall not by reason of his mortgage be deemed to be the owner of a ship or any share therein, nor shall the mortgagor be deemed to have ceased to be the owner thereof. Now, of course, it is obvious that if the owner remains in possession he may enter into contracts in dealing with the ship. When that question came before Lord Westbury in Collins v. Lamport (ubi sup.), the only test which he laid down in the several passages which I read from the judgment, and which I will not read again, is whether the dealings will materially impair the security of the mortgagee. If not, then they are to stand. When that test was discussed in the House of Lords in Keith v. Burrows (ubi sup.), Lord Cairns used language in which I do not think he meant to go further, but which puts it in a somewhat different way. He says: "The mortgagee of a ship does not, ordinarily speaking, or by a mortgage such as existed in the present case, obtain any transfer by way of contract or assignment of the freight, nor does the mortgagor of a ship undertake to employ the ship in any particular way, or indeed to employ the ship so as to earn freight at all. The mortgagor of a ship may allow the ship to lie tranquil in dock, or he may employ it in any part of the world, not in earning freight, but for the purpose of bringing home goods of his own or for his own benefit." And later on, having referred to the incidents of contract, he says: "All those acts would be the ordinary incidents of the ownership of the mortgagor who remains the dominus of the ship with regard to everything connected with its employment until the moment arrives when the mortgagee takes possession." Now, the real question is, Was this contract of the 29th Aug. one which would impair the sufficiency of the security, or, to adopt the other phrase, impair the security? At first I confess I did not like the look of the transaction, and thought it required investigation. Now that I have heard all the evidence it amounts to this: No fraud imputed, no improper agreement, and the Sims' contract not having apparently provided a profit, and he not being able to pay the 850*l.* which he was to pay, Mr. Horton on the 29th Aug. said, "I will run the boat for half profits till the 15th Oct. if you will let me have it on those terms." I am not prepared to say, the boat being worth 2500*l.* odd and being insured for 1500*l.* odd, that the agreement to run her on half profits must impair or does impair the security. It does take the boat for a period of six weeks out of the power to earn freight, unless that freight is produced by the profits, but I cannot say that under the circumstances there might not be an honest apprehension, or expectation rather, that there would be profits. Therefore to undertake to run the boat at half profits seems to me not to be terms which either the mortgagor or the charterer might consider would do any wrong to the rights of the mortgagee. Several other clauses of the charter-party have been referred to, but I need not go through them. If under clause 4 the charterer or the mortgagor were attempting to sell part of the equipment of the ship, as at present advised I do not think they have any right to do it, but Mr. Robson has asked us to say that because those words are used in the agreement it must impair the security. I cannot say that the existence of that clause, though it might impair the rights of the parties if a sale of the equipment of the ship had been attempted, makes the charter-party such that it is not binding upon the mortgagee. Then, again, certain expenses are to be paid out of the receipts. It may be a perfectly proper arrangement under the charter-party, although, if under that Mr. Horton seeks to set off something else, when taking those accounts the question would have to arise whether the security was impaired. Then the only other point is that the ship is not insured. I quite agree that the mortgagee has a right to prevent the vessel being run unless she is properly protected against perils of the sea, but it cannot be contended that if a charter-party is otherwise binding on the mortgagee, the fact that he could have restrained her from running

CT. OF APP.]

NICKOLL AND KNIGHT v. ASHTON, EDRIAGE, AND Co.

[CT. OF APP.]

until properly insured would justify him in setting aside the charter-party. Therefore, having regard to the judgments of Lord Westbury, and in the case in the House of Lords, I cannot find that this agreement was one to impair the security of Mr. Ward, and therefore, being entered into by the mortgagor under his powers as owner, as contemplated in the section of the Merchant Shipping Act, it is binding on the mortgagee. He is entitled to take the benefit of it, but he is not entitled to treat it as of no effect.

SMITH, M.R. and ROMER, L.J. concurred.

Appeal and cross appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, H. Forshaw and Hawkins, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondents, Whitley and Co., Liverpool.

April 17 and May 3, 1901.

(Before SMITH, M.R., WILLIAMS and ROMER, L.J.J.)

NICKOLL AND KNIGHT v. ASHTON, EDRIAGE, AND Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Contract—Impossibility of performance—Implied condition—Agreement for shipment of goods by specified ship at specified time—Stranding of ship by perils of the sea.

The defendants contracted to sell to the plaintiffs a cargo of cotton seed to be shipped by the steamship Orlando at Alexandria in Jan. 1900, for carriage to the United Kingdom, and by a clause in the contract it was agreed that in case of prohibition of export, blockade, or hostilities, preventing shipment, the contract or any unfulfilled part thereof was to be cancelled.

After the making of the contract, but before Jan. 1900, the steamship Orlando was stranded through perils of the sea, and was so damaged thereby that it was impossible for her to arrive at Alexandria in Jan. 1900.

Held, by Smith, M.R., and Romer, L.J., Williams, L.J. dissenting (affirming the judgment of Mathew, J.), that the contract was subject to an implied condition that the parties should be excused if before breach performance became impossible by reason of the steamship Orlando ceasing to exist as a cargo-carrying ship without the defendants' default.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Mathew, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of a contract to ship a cargo of Egyptian cotton seed.

The contract was dated the 24th Nov. 1899, and the material parts were as follows:

Sold this day to Messrs. Nickoll and Knight, the following Egyptian cotton seed, namely, a cargo to consist of from 1600 tons to 1900 tons, to be shipped at Alexandria, and (or) Port Said, and (or) Ismalia, during the month of Jan. 1900, per steamship Orlando, at 6l. 3s. 9d. per ton . . . the vessel to go to any safe floating port in the United Kingdom.

Clause 5. In case of prohibition of export, blockade, or hostilities, preventing shipment, this contract or any unfulfilled part thereof is to be cancelled.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

After this contract had been made the steamship Orlando, being then in the Baltic, was stranded by perils of the sea.

On the 20th Dec. the charterers gave notice to the plaintiffs of the fact that the ship was so badly damaged that it would be impossible for her to load before March.

On the 28th Dec. the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs that as the performance of the contract of the 24th Nov. was rendered impossible, they considered the contract as cancelled.

The plaintiffs in the following February commenced the present action for damages for breach of contract, and claimed the difference between the agreed price 6l. 3s. 9d. per ton and 7l. 13s. 9d. per ton, which was the market price on the 31st Jan. 1900.

At the trial of the action before Mathew, J. without a jury, the learned judge held that the contract of the 24th Nov. was subject to an implied condition that the performance of it was to be subject to the continued existence of the ship, and her fitness to take cargo, so that the performance was excused by its becoming impossible through loss or damage of the ship by sea peril; and he therefore gave judgment for the defendants.

The case is reported 82 L. T. Rep. 761; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 94; (1900) 2 Q. B. 298.

The plaintiffs appealed.

April 17.—Joseph Walton, K.C. (Hollams with him) for the plaintiffs.—There is no such implied condition in this contract as was held by Mathew, J. The contract is an absolute one—viz., to ship the cargo at a certain time by a certain ship at a certain place. As far as the express terms of the contract go, the agreement is an absolute one. The ship has not arrived at the agreed port by the agreed time, and there is therefore a breach of the contract, for which the plaintiffs are entitled to recover:

Shubrick v. Salmond, 3 Burr. 1637.

The question here is really one of delay. The ship did not arrive at the agreed time, and whether the delay be caused by default of the defendants, or adverse winds, or any other cause, is immaterial. There is no question here of the existence of the ship, and the case upon which the defendants rely (Taylor v. Caldwell, 8 L. T. Rep. 356; 3 B. & S. 826) does not apply here. Neither is it a case where the ship is one over which the defendants had no control, as if the agreement had been to ship by a certain vessel of the P. and O. Company. In such a case as that, a condition would probably be implied that if the ship did not arrive the performance of the contract would be excused. There is in the agreement a clause providing for the cancellation of it in certain circumstances, and the omission in that clause of any mention of stranding shows that such an incident as that was not intended to be considered as excusing performance. He cited also on this point:

Hills v. Sughrue, 15 M. & W. 253;

Ashmore and Son v. Cox and Co. (1899) 1 Q. B. 436.

Bray, K.C. (Edward Bray with him) for the defendants.—The principle applicable to this case is that which was laid down by Blackburn, J. in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.), thus: "The principle seems to us to be that, in contracts in which the performance depends on the continued existence of a given person or thing, a condition is implied that the impossibility of performance arising from the perishing of the person or thing shall excuse the performance." And again he says that "in the absence of any warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor." The principle there laid down has been approved:

Robinson v. Davison, 24 L. T. Rep. 755; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 269;

Howell v. Coupland, 30 L. T. Rep. 677; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 462; 33 L. T. Rep. 832; 1 Q. B. Div. 258.

Here the steamship Orlando was the certum corpus, on whose continued existence as a cargo-carrying vessel the whole contract depends, and her stranding was caused by no default of the defendants. Though the ship did not actually cease to exist, yet her injuries were so great that, as far as the performance of this contract is concerned, she may be treated as non-existent. The fact that this contract depends on the existence of the steamship Orlando differentiates it from the case cited by the plaintiffs of Ashmore and Son v. Cox and Co. (ubi sup.). No definite ship was there named, the shipment was to be merely "by sailor or sailors," so that the impossibility of performance in that case was only an impossibility from a mercantile point of view. There was no certum corpus as there is in the present case. As to the argument founded on clause 5 of the contract, the matters there mentioned are simply things which might prevent the loading of the Orlando, supposing she had arrived at Alexandria. They belong to a different class of things from conditions having reference to the existence of the ship itself. The application of the principle laid down in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) is so general that there is no reason in saying that the mention of the things named in clause 5 implies that the principle of Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) is to be excluded in construing this contract. He referred also to

Johnson v. Macdonald, 9 M. & W. 600.

Joseph Walton, K.C. replied.—The principle laid down in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) applies only to cases of a certain person or thing ceasing to exist. If the court should dismiss this appeal, and hold that Taylor v. Caldwell applies to a case of mere delay, that will be a great extension of the principle laid down by Blackburn, J.

Curr. adv. vult.

May 3.—SMITH, M.R. read the following judgment:—This is an action for damages by the buyers of a cargo of Egyptian cotton seed against the sellers for not shipping the same pursuant to a contract dated the 24th Oct. 1899, and the question is whether upon its true construction the contract is a positive and absolute contract to ship the seed, or a contract subject to any, and what, implied condition. The contract upon which the question arises, so far as material, is as follows: "Sold this day to Messrs. Nickoll and Knight, the following Egyptian cotton seed—namely, a cargo to consist of from 1600 tons to 1900 tons, to be shipped by the steamship Orlando at Alexandria . . . during the month of Jan.

1900. (Signed) Ashton and Co." Clause 5 is as follows: "In case of prohibition of export, blockade, or hostilities preventing the shipment, the contract or any unfulfilled part thereof is to be cancelled." It is perfectly plain upon the face of the signed contract that the parties deliberately agreed that the shipment of the seed should not be in any ship or ships, but in one particular named ship, for the words in print "ship or ships" are obliterated, and the words "per steamship Orlando" are inserted in writing in their place; and it is equally plain that the contract could only be performed by the defendants shipping the seed contracted for in the steamship Orlando during the month of Jan. 1900, and in no other ship. Now, is a contract such as this a positive and absolute contract by the shipper to ship on board the named ship the contracted cargo, or is it a contract subject to any, and what, implied condition? I find in the judgment of Blackburn, J., delivering the unanimous judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in the year 1863 in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.), which case has been followed and applied in the Exchequer Chamber in Appleby v. Myers (16 L. T. Rep. 669; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651), and in the Court of Exchequer in Robinson v. Davison (ubi sup.), and in the Queen's Bench and Court of Appeal in Howell v. Coupland (ubi sup.), that a rule as to the construction of certain contracts has been laid down, which rule is as follows: "Where from the nature of the contract it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless, when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived, some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract, they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done, there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor." In my judgment the contract in the present case falls directly within this rule, for, from the beginning, the parties must have known that the performance of the contract would become impossible unless the particular thing specified—that is, the steamship Orlando—continued to exist as a cargo-carrying ship down to and during the month of Jan. 1900; and I have no doubt that the true construction of the contract is that it is not a positive and absolute contract as contended for by the plaintiffs, but is a contract subject to the condition that the parties shall be excused if, before breach, performance becomes impossible by reason of the particular specified thing—that is, the steamship Orlando—ceasing to exist as a cargo-carrying ship without the defendants' default.

But it is argued that, although there may be this implied condition, it only applies if the particular thing actually perishes; for instance, it is suggested that if the roof of the music-hall in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) had alone been destroyed and the hall itself not burnt to the ground, the judgment in that case would not have been given, even although with the roof off the hall could not have been used for the purpose for which it was let, and it is said that, as the steam-

CT. OF APP.]

NICKOLL AND KNIGHT v. ASHTON, EDRIDGE, AND CO.

[CT. OF APP.]

ship Orlando did not actually perish, this case is not within the implied condition. I do not agree. In my judgment, if the ship ceased to exist as a cargo-carrying ship when the time for the performance of the contract arrived, so that it could not be used to ship the cargo in, the implied condition would attach. If the steamship had gone to the bottom before the month of January 1900, and remained there during that month, so as to be wholly unable to take in a cargo, would not the ship have ceased to exist, whereby the performance of the contract became impossible, the ship being then at the bottom of the sea? Quoad the performance of the contract, it would have perished; and what is the difference in principle between the ship being at the bottom of the sea and being stranded upon a rock in the Baltic, as the Orlando was, and thereby wholly unable to take in a cargo pursuant to the contract? In either case, in my opinion, the performance of the contract became impossible by reason of the particular specified thing—i.e., the ship—ceasing to exist as a cargo-carrying ship, or, in other words, as regards that purpose having perished. This is not a case in which the thing contracted for is possible in itself, and the contracting party is only unable to perform it by causes beyond his own control, such as in the case of an unexpected sudden frost: (Keaton v. Pearson, 7 H. & N. 386). In such a case it is the party's own fault for undertaking unconditionally to fulfil a promise. In the present case, as before pointed out, he has not done so, for the promise he has made is conditional. It also seems to me that the suggested point of the detention of a ship by adverse winds clearly would not fall within the above rule, for in such a case the ship has not ceased to exist at all. It exists as a cargo-carrying ship, but is merely behind time on its voyage. The next point taken by the plaintiffs was, that by reason of clause 5 of the contract the implied condition of the continued existence of the ship was negated, and that it was only the matters mentioned in that clause which excused the performance of the contract. In my opinion the matters mentioned in clause 5 in no way negative the true construction of the contract, which is that the contract is not positive and absolute, and that clause 5 affords an excuse for the not shipping of the cargo, over and above the perishing of the ship, which is the implied condition. In my judgment it is not true to say that there is a warranty in this contract that the ship shall be in existence in Jan. 1900. I think that the judgment of Mathew, J. is correct, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J. read the following judgment:—I regret to say that I have come to a different conclusion from that arrived at by the Master of the Rolls, with which I understand Romer, L.J. agrees. The question in this case is whether, according to the true construction of the cotton seed cargo contract, there was an absolute contract by the sellers, the now defendants, to load a cargo in January. In other words, did the sellers take upon themselves the risk of the ship declared by them under this contract being prevented by unforeseen circumstances beyond their control from loading a cargo at one of the ports of loading named in the contract during the month of Jan. 1900? It was argued by the plaintiffs that there was an absolute contract, and that the defendants did take the risk from which they had not in terms protected themselves. On the other hand, it was argued by the defendants that this was a case of a cargo to be shipped by a particular vessel at a named port at a particular time, and that the obligation to load was made to depend on the arrival of that vessel at that port at the proper time; and that the defendants had not warranted that the vessel should be able and ready to take the cargo on board at the stipulated time, and therefore that the defendants were, in the event which happened, of the disability of the ship through perils of the sea, without default of the defendants, to take the cargo at Alexandria at the proper time, relieved from further performance of a contract which assumed the continued existence and safe arrival of the vessel in a condition fit to take the cargo. The obligation to ship the cargo, the defendants argued, was not absolute, but, in common with every other obligation in the contract, was conditional on the arrival in proper time of the declared vessel at Alexandria. Now, it was settled by the judgment of Blackburn, J. in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) that "where from the nature of the contract it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless, when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived, some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract, they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done, there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor." Prior to the decision in Howell v. Coupland (ubi sup.) it used to be supposed that the doctrine as expressed by Blackburn, J., like the cases de certo corpore cited by him from the civil law, was based upon the assumption of the continued existence, at the date for the fulfilment of the contract, of something existing at the date of the making of the contract: which is obviously quite different from the present existence, at the date for fulfilment of the contract, of something to come into existence after the contract by the action of a party to it done in pursuance of the contract. The principle laid down in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) was, however, somewhat widened in the case of Howell v. Coupland (ubi sup.); for in that case it was decided that on a contract for the sale of a specific crop on particular land the seller is to be excused if the performance is prevented by the subject-matter of sale ceasing to exist, without default of the promisor, before the time of performance, even though the subject-matter of the contract was not in existence at the time of the contract as is assumed, as it seems to me, in the principle as stated by Blackburn, J. The fact is that the answer to the question whether the obligation of the contract is dependent on the existence of some thing, or combination of things, at the time for fulfilment, or whether one party to the contract warrants the existence at that time of that thing, or combination of things, is always a question of intention of the parties to be gathered from the contract as expressed, and the subject of it. Hannen, J. in Baily v. De Crespigny (19 L. T. Rep. 681; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 180) thus expresses himself: "There can be no doubt that a man may by an absolute contract bind himself to perform things which subsequently become impossible, or to pay damages for the non-performance, and this construction is to be put upon an unqualified undertaking, where the event which causes the impossibility was, or might have been, anticipated and guarded against in the contract, or where the impossibility arises from the act or default of the promisor. But where the event is of such a character that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made, they will not be held bound by general words which, though large enough to include, were not used with reference to the possibility of the particular contingency which afterwards happens." Can it be said that the non-arrival of the Orlando at Alexandria in January (the event which caused the impossibility) was not, or might not have been, anticipated and guarded against in the contract? Or can it be said that that event cannot be reasonably supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties, or that the general words were not used with reference to the possibility of the contingency which afterwards happened—namely, the non-arrival in time at Alexandria of the Orlando by reason of the perils of the sea? I do not think so, nor do I think business people would think so. The time of loading is a condition introduced into the contract for the benefit of the buyers. It is a condition which the buyers could waive. The event which caused the impossibility of loading in January is an event against which the sellers could have insured. The selection of the vessel, the terms of the charter of that vessel, the risk the vessel selected would have to run by reason of the length of the preliminary voyage, are all matters within the control of the sellers. The buyers have no voice in the matter. Is it unreasonable to read the general words as throwing on the sellers the risk of the non-arrival of the selected ship within the contract time? The sellers might have excepted this risk, or insured against it. It seems to me that, in order to prevent general words covering a particular obligation, which in terms the general words are wide enough to include, the particular obligation must be of the essence of the contract, and, further, must be of the essence of the contract in such sense that neither party can waive the obligation, or, to express it in other words, the condition must be such that to waive it would be to make a new and a different contract. No doubt, where a contract is made with reference to certain anticipated circumstances, and where, without default of either party, it becomes wholly inapplicable to any such circumstances, it cannot be applied to other circumstances which could not have been in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made; but, where a party to a contract promises the other party to do a certain thing, or to have a certain thing done, at or before a specified time, and fails to perform his promise, in such case, even though the thing promised to be done is of the essence of the contract, and a condition precedent, so that the promisor cannot claim to have the promisee carry out his side of the contract, this does not put an end to the contract in such sense that neither party can enforce any obligation under it against the other, but only gives the promisee the option to rescind the contract, unless indeed the anticipated circumstance which has failed to occur or continue is of such a character as to put an end in a commercial sense to the commercial speculation entered upon by the parties to the contract; but a circumstance which one of the parties to the contract can waive without putting an end to the commercial speculation cannot be such a circumstance.

In the present case nothing has caused it to be impossible for the sellers to supply cotton seed of the contract quality, or to prevent them shipping it on board the Orlando at Alexandria. The sellers, according to my view, took upon themselves to promise that the owners of the Orlando should have her at Alexandria ready to take the cargo at a specified time. The peril of the sea has made it impossible for the owners of the Orlando to have her there at that time, and made it impossible, therefore, for the sellers to load the Orlando at Alexandria in January, but this event has not made it impossible that the contract should be carried out. On the contrary, if the buyers choose to waive the time condition, the contract can be performed by loading the Orlando at Alexandria. Nothing in the facts of this case suggests that the delay for repairs was so long as to put an end to the commercial speculation intended by the parties to the contract. By reason of the perils of the sea the Orlando did not arrive at the time the shipowner contracted it should arrive, but the delay was not such that the voyage was frustrated, neither was the contract of sale. It follows that the plaintiffs had a good cause of action on the failure of the sellers to load the cotton seed, even though the perils of the sea made it impossible for the Orlando to arrive at Alexandria at the specified time. I have thought it right to express my opinion on this matter (which unfortunately is contrary to that of my brothers), although it is not, for a reason which I will give, of very great practical importance with regard to the result of the action; for I entirely agree with the opinion of Mathew, J. as to the measure of damages in case the plaintiffs have a right of action; and according to this measure the sum paid into court, together with a denial of liability, is more than sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' cause of action.

ROMER, L.J.—A clear principle applicable to cases of this kind was laid down by Blackburn, J. in delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.). The passage of the judgment in which that principle is stated has already been read. It was laid down after a review of all the previous cases, and after very careful consideration. That judgment has often been followed, and has never been dissented from. The principle there laid down is one which works complete justice between the parties to contracts of this kind. It is a principle which is easy to follow, and one which affords a certain guide in a doubtful and difficult branch of the law. It is most useful to business people to know clearly the law on such a subject, and therefore I think that it is important that the principle, as laid down in the case referred to, should be adhered to, and not rendered doubtful or weakened by making exceptions to its application. The question is whether that principle applies to the present case. In my opinion it does. I think that the parties to this contract must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless in Jan. 1900 the particular specified thing necessary for carrying it out—namely, the steamship Orlando—continued to exist; and therefore they must at the date of the contract have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done under the contract. Then is there here any implied warranty by the defendants that the ship shall continue to exist? There is clearly no express warranty to that effect, and, in my opinion, no such warranty can be implied. Some liability on the part of the vendors in respect of the ship must, I think, be implied, and no doubt many difficult cases with regard to the extent of that liability might arise. But it is not necessary in this case to consider exactly the extent of that liability, for I think that a warranty cannot be implied that the ship in question should continue to exist in January. That being so, in my opinion the principle laid down in Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) applies. The only question that remains is whether the ship continued to exist in Jan. 1900 within the meaning of that principle. I think that she did not. She was not then in existence as a cargo-bearing ship or for the purposes of the contract. This point has been fully dealt with by the Master of the Rolls, and I need not add anything to what he has said in reference to it. I should perhaps add, with regard to the argument founded on clause 5 of the contract, that that clause does not in my opinion affect the view which I have expressed, for the different special circumstances dealt with in that clause all contemplate the existence of the ship. For these reasons I agree with the Master of the Rolls in thinking that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Hollams and Co.
Solicitors for the defendants, Tilleards and Co.

Friday, June 7, 1901.

(Before SMITH, M.R., WILLIAMS and STIRLING, L.JJ.)

PRICE AND ANOTHER v. MARITIME INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance (marine)—Advances for disbursements—Charge given by master on freight—Insurance "warranted free of all average"—Conditional charge—Total loss of ship by perils of sea—Part of freight payable—Partial loss.

The plaintiffs advanced money for ship's disbursements to the captain of an Italian ship, who gave them a note by which he promised to repay the amount advanced ten days after the arrival of the ship at the port of destination, and he thereby pledged the vessel and freight, and directed the consignees at the port of destination to pay the amount from the freight received.

The plaintiffs then effected an insurance against perils of the sea of the advances so made, by a policy warranted free of all average.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By perils of the sea the ship became a constructive total loss on the voyage, and so never arrived at the port of destination. But part of the cargo being saved, freight became payable on it by Italian law, and was in fact paid.

In an action by the plaintiffs against the underwriters as for a total loss:

Held (affirming the decision of Bigham, J.), that, by reason of payment of part of the freight, there was no total loss, and the plaintiffs were therefore not entitled to recover upon the policy.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought upon a policy of insurance against sea perils, "warranted free of all average."

In Dec. 1898 an Italian barque, called the Cinque, was loading at Pensacola a cargo of timber for carriage to Southampton. For payment of his disbursements the master borrowed from the Citizens' National Bank of Pensacola a sum of 760l. 12s. 9d., and gave them a document of which the following is a copy:

Pensacola, Fla., Dec. 30, 1898.—Ten days after arrival at port of destination of the steel barque, called Cinque, of which I am the master, now lying at Pensacola, Fla., loaded with P.P. sawn timber and lumber, and ready to sail for Southampton, I promise to pay to the order of myself the sum of 760l. 12s. 9d. British sterling in approved bankers' demand bills on London, value received for necessary disbursements of my vessel at this port; for the payment of which I hereby pledge my vessel and freight; and my consignees at the port of destination are hereby directed to pay the amount of this obligation from the first amount of freight received for account of my said vessel. Any other draft or obligation by me drawn at this port on said freight to be secondary to this.—Signed in duplicate, one being accomplished, the others to stand void.—TOMMASO RITTORI, master of the steel barque Cinque.

This document was indorsed in blank by the master, and indorsed by the bank to the plaintiffs for collection.

The plaintiffs on receiving this document effected the policy sued on on behalf of the bank.

On the 15th Jan. 1899 the barque sailed from Pensacola, but, meeting with bad weather, put in for refuge at San Miguel, in the Azores, where she went ashore and became a constructive total loss.

The underwriters on cargo paid as on a total loss, but part of her cargo was salvaged and was sold. The purchasers paid to the master of the ship the sum of 790l. as "distance freight" which was due under Italian law, which governed the contract of affreightment.

The plaintiffs brought this action upon the policy, and the defence was that, by reason of the payment of the distance freight, the loss was not a total loss.

Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury held that there had been no total loss of the freight, and therefore no total loss within the terms of the policy, and he gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Carver, K.C. and Scrutton, K.C. for the plaintiffs.—The document given by the captain is in the nature of a bottomry bond:

The Haabet, 81 L. T. Rep. 463; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 605; (1899) P. 295;

The Dora Forster (1900) P. 241.

The obligation is therefore conditional on the safe arrival of the ship. The ship never arrived, and there has therefore been a total loss of the security. Upon the true construction of the document the words imply that the obligation on the owners is conditional, just as the master's obligation is conditional, to pay on the arrival of the ship at the port of destination. The clause directing that the amount of the obligation is to be paid by the "consignees at the port of destination" also confirms this view of the meaning of the document. They cited also

The Karnak, 21 L. T. Rep. 159; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 276; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 505;
The Elpis, 27 L. T. Rep. 664; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 472; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 1;
Lucena v. Craufurd, 3 B. & P. 75; 6 R. R. 623;
Lloyd v. Fleming, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 192;
 L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 299.

Joseph Walton, K.C. and J. A. Hamilton, K.C. for the defendants.—The question is whether there has been a total loss. One of the things insured was the charge on the freight. The freight was not totally lost, because 790*l.* became due in respect of it and has been paid. On the true construction of the document signed by the master the liability on the owners was, we submit, not conditional. The words are perfectly plain as they stand, and there is no reason for implying any such condition as the plaintiffs seek to put in.

Carver, K.C. in reply.

SMITH, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Bigham, J., who decided in favour of the defendants in an action upon a policy of marine insurance. Certain bankers at Pensacola made advances to the amount of 760*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.* to the captain of an Italian ship in respect of disbursements made by him at that place where the ship was loading for a voyage to Southampton. It was in consideration of these advances that the captain signed the document of the 30th Dec. 1898. The bankers then, to protect themselves, effected the insurance which is now sued upon. The question is whether there was a total or only a partial loss. The document signed by the captain contains, first of all, a promise to pay the 760*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.* ten days after the ship's arrival at the port of destination, in approved bankers' demand bills, value received for necessary disbursements of the vessel; and for the payment of this sum he pledges his vessel and freight. That pledge is not made in any way conditional on the arrival of the ship. Then the document contains a direction to the consignees at the port of destination to pay the amount of the obligation from the first amount of freight received for account of the vessel. That clause does not, in my opinion, make the obligation conditional on the arrival of the ship, because the consignees would naturally be at the port of destination. Now, what security did the bankers obtain under that document? They had, firstly, the personal obligation of the captain, which was conditional on the arrival of the ship at the port of destination, then they also had the obligation lying on the owners, and then they had a charge on the vessel and freight. These they insured by a policy which is "warranted free of all average"—that is to say, the underwriters insured only against a total loss. The ship then left Pensacola and got as far as the Azores, where she became a constructive total loss. But by Italian law, which has to be applied to this case, a freight pro rata itineris, or distance freight, was earned, and paid, to the amount of 790*l.* Can it be said that, under these circumstances, there was a total loss of the subject-matter of the insurance? The obligation on the captain has been lost, and perhaps also the obligation on the owners. But there has not been a total loss of the freight. Consequently there has been only a partial loss, and as the policy was against a total loss only, the underwriters are not liable. For these reasons I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I do not propose to say anything as to the extent of the security obtained by the bankers under the document signed by the captain, nor as to the effect of the constructive total loss of the ship. I limit myself to the question of the charge given on the freight. In my opinion that charge was not conditional on the arrival of the ship at the port of destination, but was a charge which existed in any event. Then comes the question, What was the charge intended to secure? It was intended to secure repayment of the money advanced by the bankers. It was not limited to the obligation which the captain took upon himself, that he would pay on the arrival of the ship at the port of destination. That being so, it seems clear, in my judgment, that there has been no total loss of the security obtained by the bankers, because part of the freight—namely, 790*l.*—was not lost, but was received at the port of refuge. The only point which Mr. Carver could make on the construction of the document as showing a limit to the charge on the freight was the direction to consignees at the port of destination to pay the amount of the advance. But that direction seems to me to have been put in merely because in the ordinary course of business the consignees would probably be at the port of destination.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question in this case seems to me to be one of the construction of a document upon the terms of which money was advanced for ship's disbursements by certain bankers to the captain of an Italian ship. By that document the captain promised to repay the amount of the advance ten days after the arrival of the ship at the port of destination. It is admitted that that promise is conditional on the arrival of the ship. But then come some words giving a charge on the vessel and freight, and the question is whether this charge is conditional in the same way as the captain's promise to pay. The actual words used in the document are "for the payment of which I hereby pledge my vessel and freight." It is contended that those words mean "for the conditional payment of which I hereby pledge," &c., or "for the payment of which, subject to the before-mentioned condition, I hereby pledge," &c. But the document contains here no words importing any condition. The word "which" naturally refers to the sum of 760*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.*, and I can see no reason why we should insert words to vary that natural meaning. There is a reason why the captain's promise to pay should be conditional on the arrival of the ship, but I can see no reason why the charge on the freight should be conditional. It was said that bankers advancing money in cases such as this would be placed in

K.B. Div.]

REPETTO v. MILLAR'S KARRI AND JARRAH FORESTS LIMITED.

[K.B. Div.]

great difficulties with regard to protecting themselves by insurance if, notwithstanding the non-arrival of the ship, a small amount of freight should become payable. But if they choose to insure against a total loss only instead of against a partial loss as well, that is their fault. Another point was taken—namely, that the direction to the “consignees at the port of destination” to pay the amount of the obligation out of freight shows an intention by the parties to the document that the pledge of the freight is only to take effect in the event of the vessel arriving at the port of destination. But, in my opinion, it would be a strain upon those words to construe them as meaning what is contended for, and I cannot accede to the contention. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Thomas Cooper and Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Field, Roscoe, and Co., for Batesons, Warr, and Wimshurst, Liverpool.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

March 22 and April 2, 1901.

(Before BIGHAM, J.)

REPETTO v. MILLAR'S KARRI AND JARRAH FORESTS LIMITED. (a)

Shipping—Bill of lading—Charter-party—Incorporation of charter-party with bill of lading—Signature of bill of lading by master—Right of master to sue for freight.

By a charter-party, containing the usual exceptions, an agreed rate of freight was to be paid on unloading and right delivery of cargo to be provided by the charterers. The captain was to sign bills of lading at port of loading, and the charterers' liability was to cease on vessel being loaded. The charterers loaded the cargo, and the master signed bills of lading which described the cargo as shipped by the charterers in the ship “whereof L. Repetto is master,” and provided that the cargo should be delivered to the shippers or their assigns at the port of discharge, they paying freight as per charter-party. In an action by the master against the charterers to recover the balance of freight due:

Held, that the master signed the bills of lading, not as principal, but merely as agent for the shipowner, and therefore he was not entitled to sue for the freight.

COMMERCIAL CAUSE tried before Bigham, J.

The facts appear in the judgment.

Scrutton, K.C. and Leck for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled as master of the ship who signed the bill of lading to sue for the balance of the freight due from the defendants. It is admitted by the defendants that this balance is due, but they say they are entitled to set-off against the plaintiff's claim an amount alleged to be due to them on a prior transaction. This amount is not a mutual debt between the plaintiff and the defendants, and cannot be set off against the plaintiff:

Isberg v. Bowden, 8 Ex. 852.

Although there is a cesser clause in the charter-party, by which the charterers' liability under the charter was to cease on the ship being loaded, yet as the bill of lading incorporates the terms of the charter-party, and as the plaintiff is suing on the bill of lading, which is the later document, the cesser clause does not prevent the plaintiff from recovering:

Gullichsen v. Stewart Brothers, 50 L. T. Rep. 47; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 130, 200; 13 Q. B. Div. 317.

The plaintiff is the party to the contract in the bill of lading; he signed the bill of lading and may either sue or be sued on it, and the two parties mentioned in the bill of lading are the plaintiff and the defendants. It is a contract made by an agent in his own name, and by the ordinary law of principal and agent he can sue or be sued on it (Priestley v. Fernie, 13 L. T. Rep. 208; 3 H. & C. 977); and, if he sued on it, his principal, the shipowner, cannot sue, as there is only one contract. The general rule applicable in such cases is well stated in the notes to the case of Thomson v. Davenport (9 B. & C. 78 in 2 Smith L. C., 10th edit., at p. 400: “That an agent who has made a contract in his own name for an undisclosed principal, may sue on it in his own name, is established by several cases, particularly Sims v. Bond (5 B. & Ad. 389).” The only difference here is that the defendants knew that there was a principal. Blackburn, J. in Calder v. Dobell (25 L. T. Rep. 129, at p. 133; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 486, at p. 500) says: “I apprehend that where a man is acting as agent, the principal is not the less bound because the contract is so drawn as to make the agent also liable.” In such cases either the shipowner or the master can maintain an action for the freight:

Smith v. Plummer, 1 B. & A. 575;

Atkinson v. Cotesworth, 3 B. & C. 647;

Sims v. Bond, 5 B. & Ad. 389;

Jesson v. Solly, 4 Taunt. 52;

Cawthron v. Trickett, 9 L. T. Rep. 609; 1 Mar.

Law Cas. O. S. 414; 15 C. B. N. S. 754;

Evans v. Forster, 1 B. & Ad. 118;

Ailen v. Coltart, 48 L. T. Rep. 944; 5 Asp. Mar.

Law Cas. 104; 11 Q. B. Div. 782;

Elbinger Actien-Gesellschaft v. Claye, 28 L. T. Rep.

405; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 313;

Shepard v. De Bernales, 13 East, 565.

The fact that the bill of lading protects the plaintiff against his own negligence does not prevent the defendants from having a contract with him, and does not prevent him from recovering in this action:

Westport Coal Company v. McPhail, 78 L. T. Rep. 490; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 378; (1898) 2 Q. B. 130;

Jones v. Nicholson, 10 Ex. 28.

The plaintiff is also entitled to recover on an implied contract by the defendants to pay him the freight, arising from the fact that at their request he parted with the goods to them, and thereby parted with his lien:

Brouncker v. Scott, 4 Taunt. 1.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (P. C. Morris with him) for the defendants.—The defendants are not

K.B. Div.]

REPETTO v. MILLAR'S KARRI AND JARRAH FORESTS LIMITED.

[K.B. Div.]

liable to the plaintiff in respect of this balance of freight. The plaintiff is not the proper party to sue for the freight. The contract is not contained in the bill of lading alone, as the bill of lading expressly incorporates the charter-party, and both must be taken and read together, so that we have to look at the charter-party to see what the contract is, or with whom it is made. The charter-party must be regarded as constituting the contract:

Sewell v. Burdick, 52 L. T. Rep. 445; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 79, 298, 376; 10 App. Cas. 74;
Rodocanachi v. Milburn, 56 L. T. Rep. 594; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 100; 18 Q. B. Div. 67;
Wagstaff v. Anderson, 41 L. T. Rep. 227; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163, 290; 4 C. P. Div. 283.

But even assuming that the bill of lading is the contract, it is a contract with the shipowners and not with the master. The master does not render himself personally liable upon it, nor is he entitled to sue upon it. It was not intended to introduce any fresh party other than the two parties to the contract in the charter-party—namely, the shipowner and the charterers (the defendants). The inference to be drawn from the documents and from the facts of the case is that the plaintiff signed the bill of lading, not as principal, but as agent for his principal, the shipowner, and, signing as agent merely, it follows that he could not have been sued, and it must also follow that he cannot sue in this action. In the next place, it is said that there is an implied promise on the part of the defendants to pay the freight to the plaintiff arising from their request to him to deliver the goods to them; but the defendants' request for the goods was made, not to the plaintiff, but to the London agents of the shipowner. He is therefore not entitled to sue upon that ground. He also referred to

Cock v. Taylor, 13 East, 399;
Moorsom v. Kymmer, 2 M. & S. 303;
Steamship County of Lancaster v. Sharpe and Co., 61 L. T. Rep. 692; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 448;
 24 Q. B. Div. 158.

Leck, in reply, referred to

Shields v. Davis, 6 Taunt. 65. Cur. adv. vult.

April 2.—BIGHAM, J. read the following judgment:—This action is brought by Lorenzo Repetto, the master of a vessel called the Beecroft, to recover a balance due for freight. The indorsement on the writ shows that the gross freight was 338*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.*, and that this amount has been reduced by payments on account and by disbursements for the ship at the ports of loading and discharge to a sum of 256*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* Since action brought, a further sum of 39*l.* 1*s.* has been paid, leaving 217*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.*, the balance sued for. The defendants do not dispute that they owe this balance, but they say that they owe it to the owner and not to the plaintiff, and that they have a set-off as against the former to the amount of the claim. The question I have to determine is whether the plaintiff (the master) can maintain the action. The facts are as follows: By a charter-party dated the 28th Aug. 1899, Fortunato Repetto (not the plaintiff) chartered the Beecroft to the defendants to bring a cargo of timber from Australia at an agreed rate of freight, the defendants undertaking to provide the cargo. The charter-party contained the usual exceptions.

The freight was to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo. Then there was the following clause: "The captain to sign bills of lading at port of loading at any rate of freight without prejudice to this charter, and, should the bills of lading for the entire cargo show less sum in the aggregate than the amount of freight due the ship under this charter (allowing for advances to the master), the difference to be paid at the port of loading in cash. The charterers' liability under this charter to cease on vessel being loaded. Ship to have an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage." The defendants loaded the cargo and presented bills of lading to the plaintiff for signature. These bills of lading described the cargo as shipped by the defendants in the Beecroft, "whereof L. Repetto is master." The exceptions were more extensive than those mentioned in the charter-party. The bills of lading provided that the cargo should be delivered to the shippers or their assigns, "they paying freight for the same as per charter-party dated the 28th Aug. 1899, all the terms and exceptions contained in which charter are herewith incorporated." These bills of lading the plaintiff signed as master of the ship. The ship then proceeded on her voyage, and on her arrival at the port of discharge the cargo was delivered to the defendants against presentation of the bills of lading. This action was then brought, and it was no doubt brought in the name of the master, Lorenzo Repetto, in the hope that the defendants might thereby be precluded from setting up the set-off which they allege they have against Fortunato Repetto. There are only two ways in which a promise can possibly arise on the part of the defendants to pay freight to the plaintiff. It can arise out of the bill of lading itself, or it can arise by implication from the delivery of the goods by the plaintiff at the request of the defendants. There can be no doubt that where a master signs a bill of lading without qualification—that is to say, without anything in the document to show that he does so merely as agent—he makes himself personally liable upon it to the shipper. The shipowner who has authorised the master to sign the bill of lading is also liable upon it. The one liability arises out of the representation on the document that the master is a principal; the other liability arises out of the circumstance that in truth the master has signed for the shipowner. The master is estopped from denying the truth of the representation which he has made—in other words, he is not allowed to give evidence to discharge himself from a liability which he has apparently undertaken; and the shipowner is bound by the contract because it has been entered into on his behalf and with his authority. Thus two separate liabilities are created for the performance of one contract. But no difficulty arises out of this state of things, for the shipper has not a concurrent remedy against both master and owner; he has merely a right to elect which of the two he will hold liable, and, having once finally elected, his remedy against the other is gone. And, as either master or owner may be sued, so either may sue, for the existence of the liability on the one hand involves the existence of the correlative right on the other. These rules apply not merely to contracts created by bills of lading, but to all simple contracts; they form part of the law relating to principal and agent. Now, applying this law to the circumstances of the present case, one must look to see what it is that the master has signed. It is not a mere bill of lading in the ordinary form; it is a bill of lading which in express words incorporates all the terms of a charter already made between the master's owner and the charterers (the defendants). Thus the two documents must be read as one, and it is to the contract so created that the plaintiff has put his signature. Then, reading the two documents together, does it appear that in signing he did so as agent merely, or does it appear that he did so as principal? By the charter-party the shipowner promises the defendants that his servant, the master, shall sign bills of lading as presented. Why is this provision inserted? It is inserted with two objects; first, to enable the charterers, in case they ship their own goods (as they did in this case), to obtain a negotiable instrument which they can transfer by indorsement, and on which, if need be, they can obtain money; and, secondly, it is inserted to enable them, in case they ship the goods of other people, to hand to such other people bills of lading which in their hands can serve a similar purpose and which shall express the freight they may have agreed to pay. These are the only objects with which the provision is inserted, and in my opinion the plaintiff, when he signed the bills of lading sued on, did so merely in order to effectuate the first of these purposes and so to carry out the promise which his owner had made by the charter-party. I think this is the meaning to be put on the two documents when read together. It is neither apparent from the documents nor is it the fact that the master or the charterers intended that a new contracting party should be introduced into the business by the signing of the bills of lading. It is not necessary to stop to consider what the effect might have been if the bills of lading had been indorsed to third parties so as to pass the property in the goods. Here the charterers, the shippers, the consignees, and the receivers of the cargo are one and the same, and the Bills of Lading Act has therefore no bearing on the case. I come to the conclusion that the master's signature to the bills of lading must be read as the signature of a mere agent fixing a liability on his principal only. The master, therefore, could not be sued, and it follows as a consequence that he cannot sue. A point was taken during the argument that the master could not be taken to have intended to contract, inasmuch as he had excluded himself from the consequences of his own barratry; and it was said that it was absurd to suppose that the master could have contracted upon such a footing. I am not disposed to place much importance upon that point, for I think it very likely that the clause in the bill of lading, which is different from the clause in the charter-party by which the liability of the persons signing the bill of lading in respect of his own barratry is excluded, is in the bill of lading per incuriam. It is part of the print, and was probably overlooked and not struck out at all. Therefore I am not disposed to place any importance upon that point. But it was said that the master is entitled to sue, if not on the bill of lading, at all events on an implied contract to pay the freight. It is said that the master held possession of the goods in order to enforce the shipowner's lien, and that he had given up the possession at the request of the defendants, who were, as I have said, the consignees and receivers of the cargo, and that it must be implied from the request and from the fact that he had given up possession that the defendants had promised to pay the freight. I do not think there is anything in that point. It was not at the request of the defendants to the master that the lien was parted with and possession of the goods given up. The application by the receivers for possession of the goods was made only to Messrs. Clarkson, who were the agents for the shipowner, and it was the shipowner through them who gave up possession at the receivers' request. I find, as a fact, that there was no request for possession made to the master, and that therefore no implied contract has arisen to pay him. The question was argued as to what the position would be if the master stood in the relation in which the plaintiff contended he did stand—that is, as principal on the contract. It was said that, inasmuch as the charter-party contained a clause for cesser of liability, the defendants would not be liable to pay. I do not think this is right. The defendants would be liable, in my opinion, if the master could sue, and certainly would be liable if an action were brought by the shipowner for the freight mentioned in the bill of lading. I think the case of Gullichsen v. Stewart Brothers (ubi sup.) makes that clear. The bill of lading is supplemental to the charter-party and creates the liability which, but for the bill of lading, would probably be gone—namely, the liability to pay the freight. The two documents which must be read together are in a sense a contract, but the bill of lading, which is the later document, I think overrides the charter-party and makes the defendants liable to pay the freight; but the person to sue in this case is, in my opinion, the shipowner and not the master. I think this action must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

K.B.] Re ARBIT. BETWEEN MARGETTS AND OCEAN ACCIDENT, &C., CORPORATION LIM. [K.B.]

Action dismissed and counter-claim dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, R. Greening.

Solicitors for the defendants, James White and Leonard.

Tuesday, May 21, 1901.

(Before RIDLEY and PHILLIMORE, J.J.)

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN MARGETTS AND OCEAN ACCIDENT AND GUARANTEE CORPORATION LIMITED. (a)

Marine insurance—Policy—Collision with "any vessel"—Anchor in bed of river attached by chain to vessel—Collision with anchor—Right of assured to recover as for collision with "vessel."

By a policy of marine insurance on certain tugs, the assured was protected against damage to any of the insured tugs "owing to actual collision between any such tug and any vessel, bridge, wharf, mooring pier, or similar structure."

One of the insured tugs struck against an anchor in the bed of a river and was damaged. The anchor was attached by some twenty or thirty

(a) Reported by W. W. OBB, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B.] Re ARBIT. BETWEEN MARGETTS AND OCEAN ACCIDENT, &C., CORPORATION LIM. [K.B.]

fathoms of chain to the bows of a schooner, the after part of which was lying on the bank of the river.

Held, that the anchor so attached to the schooner was a part of the schooner, and that collision with the anchor was a collision between the tug and a "vessel" within the meaning of the policy, and that the assured was therefore entitled to recover under the policy for the damage to the tug.

AWARD stated in the form of a special case.

By a policy of assurance, dated the 1st Dec. 1899, and made between P. Margetts, hereinafter called the assured, and the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation Limited, hereinafter called the corporation, it was provided that should any difference arise between the corporation and the assured as to any question, matter, or thing concerning or arising out of that insurance, every such difference should be referred to the arbitration and decision of a neutral person.

A copy of the policy formed part of this case. The amount assured was 1000*l.*; the annual premium 126*l.* 5*s.*, and the policy was to be in force from the 21st Nov. 1899 to the 21st Nov. 1900, and was on the tugs of the assured set out in the list attached to the proposal form.

A difference having arisen between the assured and the corporation, it was provided by an order of a master dated the 20th Feb. 1901 that William Pickford, K.C. be appointed arbitrator to settle the difference between the parties.

The arbitrator accordingly heard the allegations and evidence of the respective parties, and at their request stated his award in the form of a special case.

By the policy of assurance, which was a river craft policy, it was provided that the corporation would pay to the assured, or to the persons to whom the assured might be held liable, the following sums in respect of damage occasioned during the period covered by the policy (inter alia).

The amount of any damage which shall be caused to any of the tugs belonging to the assured, and covered by this policy as aforesaid, owing to actual collision between any such tug and any vessel, bridge, wharf, mooring pier, or similar structure, but such damage shall not be taken to include any claims for detention or salvage.

The amount to be paid by the corporation under the policy for damages and costs was not to exceed 500*l.* in respect of any one collision or series of collisions, and not to exceed 1000*l.* during the twelve months.

The Ada was a tug belonging to the assured and covered by the policy.

At about 9.30 p.m. on the 13th Aug. 1900 the Ada, while coming up the river Thames on the north side of mid-channel, ported her helm to avoid a down-coming steamer, and struck upon an anchor in the bed of the river. The anchor was attached by about twenty or thirty fathoms of chain to a schooner called the Excel, which was lying on the north bank of the river with her after part on the mud, but attached to the anchor at her bows. In consequence of striking the anchor the tug sank and sustained considerable damage.

It was agreed before the arbitrator that the sum of 490*l.* was due from the corporation to the assured if the corporation were liable under the above circumstances.

It was contended on behalf of the assured that as the anchor was attached to the schooner it was part of the vessel, and that the striking of the anchor by the tug was an actual collision between the tug and a vessel.

It was contended on behalf of the corporation that the anchor was not a part of the schooner, and that the striking of it by the tug was not an actual collision between the tug and a vessel.

So far as it might be a question of fact for the arbitrator, he found that under the circumstances the anchor was a part of the schooner, and that the striking of the same by the tug was a collision between the tug and a vessel.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the facts herein stated the corporation were liable to pay to the assured the amount of the damage to the tug. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then the arbitrator found and awarded that the assured was entitled to recover against the corporation the sum of 490*l.* If the court should be of opinion in the negative, then the arbitrator found and awarded that the assured was not entitled to recover anything against the corporation.

A. E. Nelson (with him Butler Aspinall, K.C.) for the plaintiff (the assured).—The question raised is whether this anchor was part of the vessel to which it was attached by the chain. We submit that the anchor was part of the schooner. If the anchor had been hanging over the bows, instead of being attached to the bows by the chain, then it would be conceded that it would have been part of the vessel. The vessel must be taken as a whole, and no vessel is seaworthy unless she is provided with an anchor, which is, therefore, a necessary part of the vessel. This anchor was in the river as part of the vessel itself, and that was the only reason it was in the river. Collision between warp and warp of two ships, is a collision between ship and ship within the meaning of the words "collision" or "collision or otherwise" in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts 1868, s. 3, and 1869, s. 4:

The Warwick, 63 L. T. Rep. 561; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 545; 15 P. Div. 189.

That would show that the warp is part of the vessel. So, collision by a tug towing a vessel was held to be collision by the vessel itself, upon the ground as explained by Lords Selborne and Watson that the vessel and tug, being attached to each other for a common operation, must be regarded as one vessel:

McCowan v. Baine and others; The Niobe, 65 L. T. Rep. 502; (1891) A. C. 401; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 89.

Upon the same principle the anchor attached to the schooner must be regarded as part of the schooner. In European and Australian Royal Mail Company Limited v. Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company (14 L. T. Rep. 704; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 351), a damaged vessel used as a coal-hulk was held not to be a vessel, as it was not intended to be used again as a vessel; and the question was there treated as one of fact. The thing must be taken as a whole, and when so regarded the anchor is part of the ship. The ship could not go to sea, as a seaworthy ship, without it.

K.B.] Re ARBIT. BETWEEN MARGETTS AND OCEAN ACCIDENT, &C., CORPORATION LIM. [K.B.]

Spencer Bower for the corporation (the defendants).—The question is, whether an anchor to which a vessel is attached by a chain, and which is some distance away from the vessel, is part of the vessel for the purposes of being collided against. If the anchor had been hanging over the bows of the vessel, then it might be taken as part of the vessel; but if the anchor is allowed to trail behind the ship, then it could not be said that it is a part of the ship. The mere connecting of two things or objects by a chain does not make them one thing. In Hoskins v. Pickersgill (3 Doug. 222) it was held that, on a policy of insurance of a ship employed in the Greenland trade, on "ship, tackle, apparel, and furniture," the fishing tackle was not included. The case of The Niobe (ubi sup.) is distinguishable, as there is a very wide distinction between a tug actually towing a vessel, as in that case, and an anchor at some distance from the vessel, as in this case. The schooner and the anchor were two distinct things at two termini, the anchor at one end and the schooner at the other, connected by a chain. The anchor is not part of the vessel when in this position. It is in the position of a rock to which the ship might be fastened. There is no decision as to an anchor, but in this case the schooner and the anchor must be regarded as two distinct things connected by a chain. He referred to

The Romance, 83 L. T. Rep. 488; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 149; (1901) P. 15.

[PHILLIMORE, J. referred to Gale v. Laurie (5 B. & C. 156; 1 Hag. Adm. 109).]

RIDLEY, J.—I think that the question which is left to us by the arbitrator must be answered by saying that the corporation are liable to pay to the assured the amount of the damage to the tug. The facts are that the tug, the vessel in question, came into collision with an anchor, to which a schooner was riding, and the question we have to determine is whether the anchor was a part of the vessel. I think it must properly be regarded as part of that vessel, and therefore as being a vessel within the meaning of the clause in the policy of insurance, which is set out in the special case. I concede that at first sight, and in popular language, you might distinguish between an anchor and the vessel, and you probably would. If you were asked to describe what had happened you would say that the tug had come into collision with an anchor; you would not say, using ordinary language, that it had come into collision with a ship; you would describe the object which it had come into collision with as an anchor, but when one comes to look at the authorities and to consider what is the proper definition which this word bears, I think an anchor is to be regarded as a portion of the vessel. The question, it is quite true, has never actually been decided, because it has not been decided that that portion of the equipment of a vessel—namely, the anchor—must be regarded as part of the vessel itself. That is quite true, and counsel for the corporation has argued that it must be regarded as a different thing. Of course, it is true, when a vessel is riding to her anchor, the anchor may be a considerable distance from the vessel, but that does not make it less part of the vessel. I should suppose no one would argue that a grappling-iron, for instance, is not a portion of the balloon, which drags the balloon to the ground, and it is, to my mind, a similar question when you regard a ship and an anchor; but it cannot be said that a rock to which a vessel may be made fast is any part of it. The question has arisen for decision, not so much on the question of an anchor as on that of a tug towing a vessel, in the case of The Niobe (ubi sup.), where a tug which was towing a vessel had come into collision, and the ship which the tug was towing was held liable to pay the damages. There the House of Lords decided that it must be considered that the vessel herself, the Niobe, had caused the damage, although in point of fact physically it had been caused by the tug. It was necessary in that case to come to some conclusion as to the general way in which words of this kind are to be interpreted, and Lord Selborne and the other noble Lords came to the conclusion that the narrow construction of the word "ship" could not be accepted in which and by which only the actual hull would be included. Lord Selborne says: "But I cannot adopt so narrow a construction of those words. I should hold them to extend to cases in which the injury was caused by the impact, not only of the hull of the ship insured, but of her boats or steam launch, even if those accessories were not (as in this case) insured as being in effect parts of the ship." That seems to me to be the first thing one has to grasp as the ground of the decision in the case of The Niobe (ubi sup.), which is, to my mind, a much stronger one than the decision which we are arriving at to-day. That is the first position, namely, that the boats and steam launch and other gear, which are the equipment or the appurtenances of a ship, are to be regarded as the ship itself, and you have got, according to the case before the House of Lords, to this, that a tug was so regarded in that instance. Then it seems to me an anchor clearly must be so regarded, although it be at the end of a rope, and although the vessel had no contact with it except by the rope. But when you had got a tug which was not part of the equipment of the ship it was necessary to fortify the argument by showing that, for reasons apart from this case, and which do not exist here, the tug was to be regarded as part of the ship, and the majority of the noble Lords came to the conclusion that it was. I think, putting it shortly, one of them (Lord Morris) said: "I consider the tug part of the apparatus for moving the ship Niobe," and there are grounds for saying that it has for other purposes been found necessary to say that the tug and ship go together. Those reasons are not required here. It appears to me we need not go further than to say that this anchor must be regarded in the same way as the boats and the steam launch belonging to the ship would have been regarded in the case of McCowan v. Baine (ubi sup.) if they had been the actual object in collision.

Then counsel for the corporation says this does not apply because the damage in that case was not done by the anchor; but it was done by a tug towing the vessel. It appears to me that that is not a sufficient reason for dissenting from or distinguishing the reasoning in that case. I think we must follow that reasoning, and we must class that part of the vessel as a ship whether it causes the collision or does the damage, or has the damage done to it. The rest of the cases which have been cited are a little further from the point than the one I have been quoting, but they all seem to be in the same direction. The cases with regard to fishing tackle, and fishing stores, appear to rest on a special finding as to whether or not they were part of the equipment of the ship, and I do not think they are immediately in point. But I am clear for the above reasons that we must answer this question in the affirmative.

K.B. Div.]

POLL v. DAMBE.

[K.B. Div.]

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. We have to consider whether there has been a collision with a ship. Now a collision with a ship cannot mean a collision with the whole ship in the sense of contact with every piece of the ship. There is a collision with a ship if there is contact with any portion of it. Now there are various movable portions of a ship which in one sense may be regarded as distinct from a ship, and treated possibly as appurtenances of a ship, and in another sense are parts of the ship. There is a narrow point of view in which you might say the hull, masts, and yards, and in the case of a steamer the funnel and bridge, and possibly the steering gear, are the ship; and the boats, marling spikes, cables, and anchors, and even the sails, because they can be unbent, are appurtenances of the ship. That is quite true in one sense, but in another sense all these articles are part of the ship. For instance, if there was a collision with a raked out jib-boom, or the studding sail boom, or a sail or the boat of a ship set in the skids or hung in the davits, or with the anchor a-cockbill, nobody would doubt that in all good sense that would be a collision with the ship, although in another sense you might say, "I did not actually touch the ship; I only touched her anchor, or her boat, or her sail." So, in the same way, about an anchor. A collision with an anchor, or a cable which serves as an anchor to the ship, is a collision with a part of the ship extended for this purpose. A ship very often does extend her area by putting up additional rigging or by swinging her boats over the side—I am not speaking of sending her boats away—or by casting out her anchor, or by casting out a tow-line with which she is fast to another vessel; those are all portions of the ship projecting for the same purpose as my arm may project from my side, but none the less are part of the ship. The decision in The Niobe (ubi sup.) is very much stronger than even this case, I think, because a tug towing a vessel was there held to be part of the vessel; and therefore a collision with the tug would be a collision with the ship. Nobody who knows anything about the decision in the House of Lords of The Niobe (ubi sup.) would have the slightest difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the learned Lords were decidedly upholding, and possibly more than decidedly upholding, the view that if the damage in that case had been done by the Niobe to the vessel Valetta by the rope out between the Niobe and the tug Flying Serpent, then the damage in that case would be held to be damage done by the Niobe within the meaning of the clause in that case. Now let me put it round the other way. The Valetta is insured against damage done by collision with a vessel, and she is injured by a rope from the Niobe, and instead of recovering against the Niobe she goes against her own underwriters, nobody would doubt she would be entitled after the decision of the House of Lords, if not independently of that, to recover as by reason of a collision with a vessel. That seems a stronger case than the present. I think some assistance is to be got from the case of Gale v. Laurie (ubi sup.) and the decision in the King's Bench. I do not lay much stress upon it. I think both upon the principle and the light given by the House of Lords we ought to have no hesitation in holding that this accident is within the policy and the plaintiff ought to recover.

Judgment for the plaintiff, the assured.

Solicitors for the assured, Louless and Co.

Solicitors for the corporation, William Hurd and Son.

May 14 and June 13, 1901.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., LAWRENCE and PHILLIMORE, JJ.)

POLL v. DAMBE. (a)

Merchant shipping—Foreign ship in British port—Desertion of foreign seaman—Inducing such desertion—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 236 (1).

Sect. 236 (1), which makes it an offence to persuade or attempt to persuade "a seaman or apprentice to . . . desert from his ship," does not apply to the persuading or attempting to persuade a foreign seaman to desert a foreign ship lying in a British port.

P. was a foreign sailor serving on board a Russian ship. While the Russian ship was lying in a British port, A. persuaded him to desert. A. was afterwards prosecuted for an offence under sect. 236 (1) and convicted.

Held, that the conviction was wrong.

CASE stated by the stipendiary magistrate for the county borough of Cardiff.

The respondent was the master of the Russian ship Lennox, which at the time of the alleged offence was lying at the West Dock at Cardiff. The Lennox was not registered or owned in the United Kingdom, and was not a British ship but a foreign ship.

On the 25th Dec. 1900, one Johannes Pilder, who was then a foreign seaman lawfully engaged on the Lennox, met the appellant Poll, a boarding master living at Cardiff. At this interview the appellant persuaded Pilder to desert from the Lennox and to join another ship where he would receive better wages. Pilder did then desert from the Lennox, and on the following day was taken to the railway station at Cardiff by the appellant, who, after providing him with a ticket, saw him leave the station in a train for Bristol in the company of five other sailors and an agent of the appellant. Pilder was subsequently arrested, on a warrant, as a deserter from the Lennox.

Upon the hearing of the information, charging the appellant, under sect. 236 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, with having unlawfully persuaded Pilder to desert from his ship, it was contended on behalf of the appellant that the magistrate had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the case, the offence being charged in respect of a foreign seaman engaged on a

(a) Reported by J. ANDREW STRAHAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B. Div.]

POLL v. DAMBE.

[K.B. Div.]

foreign ship, and that by sects. 260 and 261 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, Part 2 of the Act (under which head the section creating the offence is classified), was restricted in its application to those ships mentioned in those sections—viz., sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom and sea-going British ships registered out of the United Kingdom.

The magistrate was of opinion that sect. 236 was applicable to foreign ships, that the words "his ship" in that section were as general as the words "any ship in the United Kingdom" in sect. 111, and that, as both sections are classified under Part 2 of the Act, the present case was governed by Reg. v. Stewart (80 L. T. Rep. 660). He therefore convicted the appellant, and fined him 5*l.* and costs, but stated this case for the opinion of the High Court.

Bailhache for the appellant.

H. Sutton for the respondent.

The arguments of counsel appear sufficiently for the judgment.

Besides the authorities therein mentioned, counsel cited

Thomson v. Hart, 18 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th ser., Just. 3; Bank of England v. Vagliano, 64 L. T. Rep. 353; (1891) A. C. 353;

The Fulham, 81 L. T. Rep. 19; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 425, 559; (1899) P. 251, at p. 259.

June 13.—PHILLIMORE, J. read the following judgment of the court.—This is a case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for Cardiff, and upon it we have to determine whether it is an offence under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 to persuade in England a foreign seaman to desert from a foreign ship when such ship is lying in an English port. The language of sect. 236, sub-sect. 1, is as follows: "If a person by any means whatever persuades or attempts to persuade a seaman or apprentice to neglect or refuse to join or proceed to sea in or to desert from his ship, or otherwise to absent himself from his duty, he shall for each offence in respect of each seaman or apprentice be liable to a fine not exceeding 10*l.*" By sect. 742 "seaman" includes every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices, duly indentured and registered) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship. The language of the Act is thus wide enough to cover this case; but it is contended on behalf of the appellant that Part 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act, in which this section is found, applies only (except in certain specified places) to British ships, and the word "ship" in sect. 236 must be read as meaning British ship. Sect. 236, making it criminal to persuade desertion, may be looked upon as supplementary to the earlier sections, which made desertion itself punishable. They are sects. 221 to 224, both inclusive, and sect. 238. Sects. 221 to 224 are in equally general terms, and they follow upon sect. 220, which contains express words limiting its own application to the crews of British ships; there is, therefore, some ground for supposing that sects. 221 to 224 were not intended to be so limited. The sections as to the application of Part 2 are sects. 260 to 266, both inclusive. By sect. 260 this part "shall, unless the context or subject-matter requires a different application, apply to all sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom, and to the owners, masters, and crews of such ships," with certain qualifications as to lighthouses, vessels, yachts, and fishing-boats, which are dealt with in sects. 262 and 263. By sect. 261 this part shall, unless as aforesaid, apply to all sea-going British ships registered out of the United Kingdom, and their owners, masters, and crews in respect of certain specified matters, one of which is discipline. It will be important to note that this specification of details occurs only in the section which deals with British ships registered out of the United Kingdom, and that there is the same arrangement in sect. 109 of the Act of 1854, which in substance corresponds with the two sects. 260 and 261 of the Act of 1894. This is not unimportant in view of some observations of Blackburn, J. in the case of Leary v. Lloyd (3 E. & E. 178). Sect. 264 enables colonial Legislatures to adopt any provisions of this part which do not otherwise apply, and sect. 265 provides for the case of an apparent conflict of laws "in any matter relating to a ship or to a person belonging to a ship." This section would meet the case of a conflict between the laws of different parts of His Majesty's dominions; but it might have a wider application in the case of any sections of Part 2 of the Act which apply to foreign ships. Sect. 266 is not material to this case. It is clear, therefore, that as a general rule this part of the Act is not to apply to foreign ships—that is to say, it is not to be enforced against foreign ships or owners of foreign ships, or persons on board foreign ships, or as to matters done or to be done on foreign ships. But it does not, therefore, necessarily follow that it does not apply to persons who have deserted from foreign ships or to English subjects who in England have abetted such desertion. A formidable argument, however, against the application of the section as to desertion from foreign ships is derived from sect. 238. By this section, where it appears to the Crown "that due facilities are or will be given by the Government of any foreign country for recovering and apprehending seamen who desert from British merchant ships in that country," the Crown may by Order in Council direct that this section shall apply, and where it applies and a seaman deserts when within any of the king's dominions from a merchant ship belonging to a subject of that country, "any court, justice, or officer that would have had cognisance of the matter if the seaman had deserted from a British ship shall, on application of a consular officer of a foreign country, aid in apprehending the deserter," and may "order him to be conveyed on board his ship or delivered to the master . . ." It is said that it is only under this section that desertions from foreign ships can be dealt with by an English court, and also that this section would be unnecessary if the general provisions of sects. 221 to 224 applied to foreign as well as British ships. The third sub-section of sect. 238 inflicts a penalty not exceeding 10*l.* for harbouring or secreting a deserter who is liable to be apprehended under this section. This is said to overlap the second sub-section of sect. 236. There is no sub-section in sect. 238 corresponding with sub-sect. 1 of sect. 236, under which the information in the present case is laid. The weight of this argument is to a certain extent lessened by the consideration that the Act of 1894 is a consolidating Act, and includes not only the Act of 1854, but several other Acts. Sect. 238 is a re-enactment of the Foreign Deserters Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 26), an earlier Act than the Act of 1854. It may well be that the Act of 1854 did make that of general application which had only limited application by the Act of 1852; and in some respects the special provisions of the Act of 1852, as reproduced in sect. 238, are different from the general provisions in the Act of 1894. Still, in our opinion, having regard to the terms of sect. 221, the general sections as to deserters, 221 to 224, do not apply to cases which come, or may come by the operation of an Order in Council, under sect. 238. The procedure is different; the seaman to whom sect. 222 applies is to be conveyed on board his ship, not by warrant of the court, but by the master or certain other persons, with or without the assistance of a police constable, and may require to be taken before a court to be dealt with according to law. More complicated provisions are applied to cases under sect. 223. But under sect. 238 there is to be a warrant under which the man is to be conveyed on board his ship, and when the warrant has been issued the seaman apparently has no direct right to have recourse to the court which issued it. The penalty for harbouring is different, and in sect. 238 there is a significant proviso to which we have not yet referred excepting the case of a seaman who is a slave. There is no such proviso in sects. 221 to 224. We therefore come to the conclusion that sects. 221 to 224 apply only to British ships, and that the offence of desertion from a foreign ship is punishable only under sect. 238, and where that section has been applied by Order in Council. Similarly, we must hold that the offence of harbouring a deserter from a foreign ship comes, if at all, under sub-sect. 2 of sect. 238, and does not come under sub-sect. 2 of sect. 236. Holding this, can we hold that sub-sect. 1 of 236 applies in respect of foreign ships? We think it is impossible so to hold. The words "seaman" and "ship" in sub-sect. 1 must have the same limited meaning as the same words in sub-sect. 2. This view is in accordance with the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in the year 1860 in the case of Leary v. Lloyd (sup.) upon the parallel section (257) of the Act of 1854. We have, however, not held ourselves concluded by that decision, but have reconsidered the matter upon the following grounds: First, the case was only argued on one side; secondly, Blackburn, J. who delivered the judgment of the court, seems to have thought that there was something special in the sections about discipline limiting their application, though possibly not the application of the other section in the other part of that Act, to British ships, and we think this is not so. Thirdly, we think the case of The Milford (Swabey, p. 362) was not brought to the notice of the court. Now, the case of The Milford is certainly an authority for not restricting Part 3 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 to British ships. Dr. Lushington, in dealing with the argument that the 109th section of the Act of 1854 restrained the application of sect. 191, says, "The language there used, however, is affirmative, stating the cases to which the third part of the Act shall extend; there are no negative words which extend to show that the court should not apply sect. 191 to foreign masters and seamen." This observation is perfectly general, and the authority of Dr. Lushington on shipping matters and on the construction of Acts was so high that it is unfortunate that The Milford case was not brought before the Court of Queen's Bench before it decided Leary v. Lloyd (sup.). It should be added that the law as decided in The Milford case has been accepted ever since, and that the remedies given by sect. 191 were, and those of the corresponding section (sect. 167 (1) of the Act of 1894) are, always afforded in proper cases to masters of foreign ships. On the other hand, it may be said Dr. Lushington's judgment may well be supported on other grounds as well, and that he relied on other grounds as well. The decision may rest upon the ordinary rule as to the application of the lex fori. Again, the effect of sect. 191 was to enable the master to sue in the Admiralty Court and thereby to obtain process in rem against the ship. By the ordinary maritime law as administered in the other countries he had this right always, just as a seaman had. The English law had been exceptional in denying him this remedy, and in denying it to him because of a point of internal jurisdiction. When sect. 191 brought the maritime law of this country into line with that of other countries it would have been absurd that the anomaly thus removed from municipal cases should have been left for foreign ones. These considerations certainly affect the weight of The Milford case as an authority in the present case. On the other hand, the case of Cope v. Doherty (2 De G. & J. 614) and the class of cases represented by The Zollverein (Swabey, 96) show that there were other parts of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 which our courts have declined to hold to be applicable to foreign ships. We do not, however, decide this case upon the ground that no sections in Part 2 of the Act of 1894 apply to foreign ships. We agree with our brethren Darling and Channell in the case of Reg. v. Stewart (80 L. T. Rep. 660; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 534; (1899) 1 Q. B. 964) that there may be acts done in relation to foreign ships which when done by English subjects in England come as much under the present provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 as if they were done in relation to English ships. We think that the case they had to deal with was one of such cases. We ground our decision upon the fact that this part of the Act (Part 2) contains a special provision for the case of desertion from foreign ships, and has thus shown that its general provisions are limited to desertion from British ships. We hold, therefore, the appellant was not liable to conviction under sect. 236 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and that the appeal must be allowed with costs.

Conviction quashed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Hier Jacob, for Morgan Rees, Cardiff.

Solicitor for the respondent, Solicitor of the Board of Trade.

May 16 and June 19, 1901.

(Before KENNEDY and PHILLIMORE, JJ.)

DAVIDSSON v. HILL AND OTHERS. (a)

Negligence—Injury causing death—Alien—Death of alien on foreign ship by collision on high seas—Negligence of British ship—Right of representative of alien to maintain action against English shipowner—Fatal Accidents Acts 1846 and 1864 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, s. 1; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 95, s. 1).

The provisions of the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846 and 1864 extend to a case where the person in respect of whose death damages are sought to be recovered in an English court against the owner of a British ship was an alien, and was at the time of the negligent act which caused his death on board a foreign ship on the high seas; and therefore a foreigner, the widow of a foreign seaman killed on the high seas while on board a foreign ship by a collision with a British ship caused by the negligent navigation of the British ship, can maintain an action in England under these Acts against the English shipowner for the negligence of his servants in causing the death.

Adam v. British and Foreign Steamship Company Limited (79 L. T. Rep. 31; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 420; (1898) 2 Q. B. 430) dissented from and not followed.

ARGUMENT of a question of law in an action on the following statement of facts:—

1. Between 2 a.m. and 3 a.m. on the 11th Aug. 1900 a collision occurred on the high seas between the defendants' steamship Exeter City and the Norwegian barque Ratata. Shortly after the collision and in consequence thereof the Ratata sank, and Johan Davidsson, a Norwegian subject employed as sailmaker on board the Ratata, and another man, also a Norwegian subject, were drowned.

2. The collision and the consequent drowning of Johan Davidsson were solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Exeter City by the defendants' servants.

3. The plaintiff, Josefina Davidsson, is the lawful widow of the said Johan Davidsson, deceased, and brings this action under the provisions of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93 and 27 & 28 Vict. c. 95 on behalf of herself and the six children lawfully begotten of herself and the said Johan Davidsson, deceased, to recover compensation for his death. There is no executor or administrator of Johan Davidsson, deceased.

The question to be decided by the court was whether upon the facts stated above the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages in this action.

The Fatal Accidents Act 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) provides:

Sect. 1. Whereas no action at law is now maintainable against a person who by his wrongful act, neglect, or default may have caused the death of another person, and it is oftentimes right and expedient that the wrongdoer in such case should be answerable in damages for the injury so caused by him: Be it therefore enacted, that whosoever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony.

Sect. 2. And be it enacted, that every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and child of the person whose death shall have been so caused, and shall be brought by and in the name of the executor or administrator of the person deceased, &c.

The Fatal Accidents Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 95) provides (in sect. 1) that where there is no executor or administrator of the person deceased, or that, there being such executor or administrator, no such action as in the previous Act mentioned shall be brought by or in the name of such executor or administrator within six calendar months after the death of the deceased, then the action may be brought by or in the name of all or any of the persons for whose benefit the action might have been brought by the executor or administrator.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (Henry Stokes with him) for the plaintiff.—The question is whether the widow of the foreign seaman who lost his life on the high seas through the negligence of a British ship is entitled to maintain this action. A long series of cases assumed that the action could be maintained, but there is an express decision on the point by Darling, J. in Adam v. British and Foreign Steamship Company Limited (79 L. T. Rep. 31; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 420; (1898) 2 Q. B. 430), in which it was held that the action could not be maintained in this country. There is, however, a decision to the opposite effect by Sir Robert Phillimore in The Explorer (23 L. T. Rep. 604; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 507; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 289). Coming to the Act, the preamble is very general, and in sect. 1 the plain words of the Legislature provide that if the person had been only injured and not killed, and if the injured person himself could have maintained the action in this country, then, in case of his death, the action may be maintained in this country by the widow. The words are as wide and as express as if the word "foreigner" had been used. The object of the Act was that the wrongdoer should not escape liability by killing a person instead of merely injuring him. In every case, therefore, it comes simply to this: Could the deceased person himself have maintained the action if he had been injured only and not killed? If so, in the case of his death the action can be maintained by his personal representative. In this case the deceased if he had been merely injured could clearly have maintained an action in this country against the defendants. Generally, to maintain an action of tort the act must be actionable by the lex loci and the lex fori; but in this case, as the accident took place on the high seas, no conflict of law arises, and the case is governed by the law maritime by which all torts on the high seas are actionable, apart from death. The plain words, therefore, and the plain policy of the Act cover this case. As the plaintiff is asking the court to dissent from the judgment of Darling, J. it is necessary to go through the cases. In The Guldfaxe (19 L. T. Rep. 748; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 201; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 325) it was held by Sir R. Phillimore, though not without doubt, that the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction to entertain a suit under this Act by the representative of a person killed in a collision between two vessels. In that case the injured person, whose representative was suing, was a British subject, and the wrongdoer was a foreigner—the converse case to the present. This decision was approved of by the same judge two years afterwards in The Explorer (ubi sup.), in which he held that this Act extended to the case of an alien killed on board a foreign vessel on the high seas, and that the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction under the Act to entertain a suit by the representatives of the alien so killed. The next case is The Franconia (36 L. T. Rep. 640; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 2 P. Div. 163), afterwards overruled, in which it was held by the same judge and by the Court of Appeal (being equally divided) that the Admiralty Division had jurisdiction to entertain an action against a foreign ship for the death of the plaintiff's husband. Then we have Harris v. Owners of the Franconia (2 C. P. Div. 173), in which Reg. v. Keyn (2 Ex. Div. 63; 13 Cox C. C. 403) was held binding on all the courts and was followed. In Seward v. Owner of the Vera Cruz; The Vera Cruz (52 L. T. Rep. 474; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 386; 10 App. Cas. 59) it was held by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords (overruling The Franconia, ubi sup.) that the Admiralty Division had no jurisdiction to entertain an action in rem for damages for loss of life under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93. There the person suing was a British subject and the person sued was a foreigner and the owner of a foreign ship, and all that the court had there to decide or deal with was whether the Admiralty Division had jurisdiction in rem over these claims under Lord Campbell's Act, under the words in the Admiralty Court Act 1861, "any claim for damage done by any ship," and it was held that there was no such jurisdiction, though in the elaborate judgments of Lords Selborne and Blackburn language is used which clearly seems to assume that an ordinary action under the Act could have been maintained by a foreigner. Though statutes generally legislate for those who are subjects of this country, yet equally so they sometimes legislate for foreigners, and we contend that this is one of those cases; and if this Act is applicable at all to accidents on the high seas there is no legal principle which prevents a foreigner from suing. [KENNEDY, J. referred to Glaholm v. Barker (13 L. T. Rep. 653; L. Rep. 1 Ch. 223).] The object of the Act was to render the Englishman liable, and if it once be admitted that the Act is applicable to accidents on the high seas, then it can make no difference whether the person who is killed is a British subject or a foreigner. The decision of Darling, J. in Adam v. British and Foreign Steamship Company Limited (ubi sup.), in which he held that an action would not lie at the suit of an alien under this statute, is founded on a misconception, and, as there is a long line of authorities on the other side, it ought not to be followed. He also referred to

Colquhoun v. Heddon, 62 L. T. Rep. 853; 25 Q. B. Div. 129;

Jefferys v. Boosey, 23 L. T. Rep. O. S. 275; 4 H. L. Cas. 815;

Rouledge v. Low, 18 L. T. Rep. 874; L. Rep. 3 H. L. 100;

The Bernina, 58 L. T. Rep. 423; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 257; 13 App. Cas. 1.

[PHILLIMORE, J. referred to Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (72 L. T. Rep. 873; (1895) A. C. 517).]

Balloch (F. Laing, K.C. with him) for the defendants.—The question resolves itself shortly to this, whether the language of this Act shows an express or clear intention to confer on a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction a new right of action in respect of a wrong committed out of the jurisdiction. If the Legislature in this Act is to be assumed to be legislating for foreigners as well as British subjects, then the language is wide enough to include this case. But on the authorities it is submitted that the courts in construing such statutes as these must assume that our Legislature does not legislate for persons other than its own subjects, unless it shows a clear intention to do so. No such clear intention is shown in this statute. Before this Act was passed no such right of action as this was given either by the law of England or by maritime law, and therefore if the plaintiff has any right to maintain this action it must be under the statute. I must admit that if this man had been merely injured instead of having been killed he would have had a right of action—that is, a right in personam. This statute confers new rights, and the question is, Does it show a clear intention to confer upon and extend these new rights to foreigners over whom the courts of this country have no jurisdiction? The onus as to showing that is on the plaintiff. The person who is suing in this action is not the injured person, but another person suing under a new right, and the right so to sue must be given in express terms. There are two classes of cases which illustrate the principle. First, we have statutes limiting the liability of shipowners, such as sect. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862. The words of sect. 504 were perfectly general; they were, "no owner of any sea-going ship" shall be liable to more than a specified amount with respect to certain things. The statute was therefore wide enough to give that right to every owner, whether British or foreign. There have been a number of decisions on these Acts which show that the provisions apply only to British ships, and that a foreigner could not limit his liability. In Cope v. Doherty (31 L. T. Rep. O. S. 173, 307; 4 K. & J. 367; 2 De G. & J. 614), decided on sect. 504, Wood, V.C. said: "I decide entirely upon those general principles that the Legislature was simply intending to regulate those rights which exist between its own subjects, unless otherwise actually expressed, and that there was no intention either to restrict or enlarge the rights of a foreigner." The Wild Ranger (7 L. T. Rep. 725; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 275; Lush. 553), General Iron Screw Collier Company v. Schuurmann (4 L. T. Rep. 138; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 60; 1 J. & H. 180), and The Amalia (8 L. T. Rep. 805; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 359; Br. & Lush. 151) are to the like effect, and show that the statutes are not to be construed as limiting or extending the liabilities of foreigners unless they do so in express terms. The next class of cases is as to navigation, where the same principles are laid down:

The Zollverein, 27 L. T. Rep. O. S. 160; Swab. 96;
The Saxonia, 6 L. T. Rep. 6; Lush. 410.

In Story's Conflict of Laws (7th edit. 1872), p. 471,

K.B. Div.]

DAVIDSSON v. HILL AND OTHERS.

[K.B. Div.]

s. 373g., the matter is dealt with, and the paragraph ends thus (p. 472): "But beyond that limit"—that is, the three miles limit—"anywhere upon the high seas, British statutes can have no legitimate operation, except under peculiar circumstances, their general force and operation ceasing at that limit." If the Legislature had intended to confer this right on a foreigner for an act done on the high seas, then it would also have imposed a like liability, which could only have been by giving a right of action in rem, and the fact that they have imposed no such liability is strong to show that they have conferred no such benefit. The point was decided against our contention in The Explorer (ubi sup.), but it was not raised again until it was raised before Darling, J. and decided in favour of the defendants' contention in Adam v. British and Foreign Steamship Company Limited (ubi sup.), which ought to be followed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

June 19.—KENNEDY, J. read the following judgment:—In this case I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. If the deceased seaman, who came to his death through the negligence of the defendants' servants, had been a British subject, no doubt, in my view, could have arisen as to the right of the widow to maintain such an action as the present. The action is an action in tort. The defendants, whose servants occasioned the death, are British subjects, and were at the time navigating a British ship, the property of the defendants. Their negligence and the consequent death of the seaman by drowning, which give rise to the claim, both took place on the high seas, "which," to quote the language of Lord Esher (then Brett, L.J.) in Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company (48 L. T. Rep. 546, at p. 549; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65, at p. 68; 10 Q. B. Div. 521, at p. 537), "is the common ground of all countries," and therefore, as he proceeds to state, the well-known rule in the case of actions of tort "with regard to the exclusive jurisdiction of a foreign country does not apply." Does it make any difference that the deceased was not a British subject, but a Norwegian subject? The contention put forward on behalf of the defendants is that the foreign nationality makes all the difference. Now, in considering how this stands, it is, I think, not irrelevant to point out that, if the deceased had been only damaged by the negligence of the defendants' servants and not drowned, he could have prosecuted an action for the negligence in the High Court of Justice if it be assumed, as it properly must be in order to test the right, that the presence of the defendants in this country, and therefore within the jurisdiction, had prevented any technical difficulty arising as to the service of the proceedings upon them. He could equally have maintained his action if, the circumstances being otherwise the same, the defendants, instead of being British subjects, had been foreigners: (see the judgment of Brett, L.J. in Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company, ubi sup.; and the judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore in The Leon, 44 L. T. Rep. 613; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 404; 6 P. Div. 148, citing the earlier decisions of Dr. Lushington in The Wild Ranger (ubi sup.) and The Zollverein (ubi sup.). If this be so, it would seem to be rather a strange thing that the foreign nationality of the sufferer by another's negligence in no way prejudices his right of action here if he is only hurt and not killed, yet that, if he is killed, it should form, the circumstances being otherwise identical, an absolute bar to any relief of the sufferer's family under these Acts. The Acts are Acts the express object of which is to create a liability in an action for damages at the suit of relatives who suffer from the death of the deceased person, whenever the act, neglect, or default which causes the death is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action to recover damages in respect thereof. It is contended, however, by the defendants that such is the law, and the ground upon which it is based is that the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846 and 1864 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 95) must be understood as applicable only to British subjects and those persons, whatever be their nationality, who are actually within the territorial jurisdiction of the British Crown. The deceased man, Johan Davidsson, was a Norwegian subject, and, as I understand the statement of counsel, had his home with his family in Norway.

The defendants properly rely on a recent decision of my brother Darling in Adam v. British and Foreign Steamship Company Limited (ubi sup.), and there is no doubt we cannot decide in favour of the plaintiff in the present case without disagreeing from Darling, J. in regard to that judgment. It becomes, therefore, my duty respectfully to consider the grounds upon which it is based, and to state why I feel myself compelled to differ from his decision. The circumstances there were substantially identical with those of this case. The learned judge in his judgment agreed that "there can be no doubt that had the deceased man been an English subject this action would have lain, notwithstanding that the negligence and death both occurred upon the high seas." He decided against the plaintiff on the ground, as he stated (79 L. T. Rep., at p. 32; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 421; (1898) 2 Q. B., at p. 432), that "it is a principle of our law that Acts of Parliament do not apply to aliens, at least if they be not even temporarily resident in this country, unless the language of the statute expressly refer to them." In a later passage in his judgment, at p. 434, the proposition is stated in a somewhat modified form. "The intention of the Legislature is to be collected from the statute, and I see no implied, and certainly no express, intention to give to foreigners out of the jurisdiction a right of action which even British subjects had not until the passing of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93." In support of the proposition thus laid down my brother Darling cites passages from the judgments of Dr. Lushington in The Zollverein (ubi sup.), of Jervis, C.J. in Jefferys v. Boosey (ubi sup.), and of Lord Esher in Colquhoun v. Heddou (ubi sup.). I venture to think that it is very important, in order to judge rightly of the applicability of these expressions of judicial opinions to other cases, to pay careful attention to the kind of case which in each instance gave occasion for the utterance of them. Before proceeding in this direction I will only remark in passing that in Routledge v. Low (18 L. T. Rep., at p. 878; L. Rep. 3 H. L., at p. 119) Lord Westbury expressed his dissent from the reasoning in Jefferys v. Boosey (ubi sup.), the sum of which he states to be "the conclusion that a British statute must be considered as legislation for British subjects only unless there are special grounds for inferring that the statute was intended to have a wider operation"; and that Lord Brougham in his judgment in Jefferys v. Boosey (23 L. T. Rep. O. S., at p. 275; 4 H. L. Cas., at p. 970) states the law in more guarded terms than those quoted from the judgment of the Chief Justice. "Generally," he says, "we must assume that the Legislature confines its enactments to its own subjects over whom it has authority, and to whom it owes a duty in return for their obedience. Nothing is more clear than that it may also extend its provisions to foreigners in certain cases, and may, without express words, make it appear that such is the intentment of those provisions. But the presumption is rather against the extension, and the proof of it is rather upon those who would maintain such to be the meaning of the enactments." If, now, we look at the cases in which the judicial dicta in question have been uttered, we find, in my opinion, that in each of them the statutory enactment under consideration was one which related to matter of a special and exceptional kind. In Jefferys v. Boosey (ubi sup.) the Act under consideration was 8 Anne, c. 19, creating the special and peculiar property in literary productions called copyright; in Colquhoun v. Heddon (ubi sup.) the statute was an Income Tax Act, and the particular question was the construction of the words "in or with any insurance company existing on the 1st Nov. 1844." In The Zollverein (ubi sup.) the principal statutory provision in view was sect. 296 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which imposed a duty in regard to navigation, which has not been imposed by the maritime law, and could not be held in the Court of Admiralty to bind a foreign vessel, and the position is grounded upon the want of equity which there would be in a decision which allowed the foreigner to benefit by a breach of the municipal law to which he could not himself be held amenable. So, again, in the case of Cope v. Doherty (31 L. T. Rep. O. S. 307; 2 De G. & J. 614) the statutory provisions under consideration, the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, Part 9, were provisions of a peculiar character in so far as they placed a restriction, limiting liability, upon the general law of nations. Under that general law the owners of a ship injured by the negligent navigation of another are entitled to full damages; but to hold the provisions of the Act which created this peculiar restriction as intended to apply to foreigners would be, as Wood, V.C. puts it in his judgment, "an attempt on the part of the British Parliament to legislate for foreigners by taking away those rights and privileges which they enjoy by the general law, which gives full compensation for damages." And even in this case Knight Bruce, L.J., in his judgment on the appeal, reserved a question whether the Act might not apply if instead of both the plaintiffs' and the defendants' ships being foreign, one had been British. "I assume," he says (31 L. T. Rep. O. S. at p. 307; 2 De G. & J. at p. 621), "that the plaintiffs," the parties who were claiming the limitation, "would have been right if both the Tuscarora and the Andrew Foster had been British in ownership and character, all things else being the same; nor do I say whether the plaintiffs would have been right or wrong, if one only of the two ships had been of that description, or if the collision had happened in a British river or a British port." The law as to the limitation of liability is the same as applied to foreign ships as was afterwards dealt with by the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63).

It seems to me that the Fatal Accidents Acts, which are under our consideration in the present case, embody legislation which is of a very different character. The basis of the claim to which they give statutory authority is negligence causing injury, and that is a wrong which I believe the law of every civilised country treats as an actionable wrong. They create, no doubt, a new cause of action (see per Lord Selborne and Lord Blackburn in The Vera Cruz (ubi sup.), for previously the relatives of the deceased could not in England sue the wrongdoer. The measure of damages is not the same as in an action by the injured man, and his death is an essential constituent of the right of action. None the less, as I venture to think, is it true to say that in substance the purpose effected by the legislation is to extend the area of reparation for a wrong which civilised nations treat as an actionable wrong; indeed, the right of redress given is, in a sense, according to the decisions of the Queen's Bench (Blackburn and Lush, J.J.) in Read v. Great Eastern Railway Company (18 L. T. Rep. 822; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 555) and the Queen's Bench Division in Griffiths v. Earl of Dudley (47 L. T. Rep. 10; 9 Q. B. Div. 357), so far identified with the right of the injured man that, if death ensues after he has sued and recovered damages, the relatives have no cause of action under this legislation. In Scotland (see Bell's Principles of the Law of Scotland) and in most of the American States (see Ex parte Gordon, 14 Otto, 515) the right of action in the relatives of the deceased person for compensation for his death by the negligence of another is recognised by the law, and I believe, though I cannot quote any authority upon the point, that it is also recognised by the law of France and Germany. It seems to me, under all the circumstances and looking at the subject-matter, more reasonable to hold that Parliament did intend to confer the benefit of this legislation upon foreigners as well as upon subjects, and certainly that as against an English wrongdoer the foreigner has a right to maintain his action under the statutes in question. It is not necessary to decide whether—assuming, of course, that no technical difficulty arises as to service of proceedings—the action could be maintained in the English courts, the death occurring through negligence in collision on the high seas, and both parties were foreigners, or where the wrongdoers were foreigners and the sufferer English. My present opinion is that an action could be maintained, but I desire to be understood as not expressing, as it is not necessary to express, a decided opinion upon this point. Here the plaintiff seeks to enforce her claim against a British subject, and I cannot see why she should not do so. If she has not the right, we should have the anomaly, as it seems to me, that if a foreigner and an Englishman serving on the same ship were both drowned on the high seas by the same collision negligently caused by an

K.B. Div.]

DAVIDSSON v. HILL AND OTHERS.

[K.B. Div.]

English vessel, the widow of the one could, and the widow of the other could not, obtain by suing the owners of the ship in fault in personam that reparation which our Legislature in these statutes has declared to be a just reparation. Let me add that the view which I take has the weighty authority of Sir Robert Phillimore in The Explorer (ubi sup.), after argument by Mr. R. G. Williams. That decision was no doubt overruled by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords in The Vera Cruz (ubi sup.), but, as I understand, the judgment of the House of Lords is upon a different point altogether—namely, that the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction to entertain an action in rem for loss of life under Lord Campbell's Act—and it will not be, I think, wholly undeserving of notice that in the case of The Bernina (ubi sup.), which was litigated in 1886 and 1887—that is, two years after the decision in The Vera Cruz (ubi sup.) was carried up to the House of Lords—one of the two successful claimants for damages under Lord Campbell's Act in an action in personam, against the owners of the wrongdoing ship, was, as I have ascertained from the Admiralty Registry, Habiba Toeg, of Bagdad, the mother (as appears from the statement in the judgment of Lord Esher in The Bernina, 56 L. T. Rep., at p. 259; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 76) and administratrix of Moses Aaron Toeg, a passenger on a ship from London to Bushire and who had lost his life in the collision caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants in the course of the voyage, and who, as I presume from his name and from his mother's nationality, was a foreigner. No question of her right to recover on the ground of nationality either of herself or the deceased was raised by the defendants, and therefore the case is not in any sense a decision in favour of the right. But in a case contested so persistently as this was, it is difficult to suppose that the question would not have been raised, had it been one in which the point could be rightly and successfully taken. I am of opinion that judgment must be for the plaintiff.

PHILLIMORE, J. read the following judgment:—I agree with the judgment of my learned brother. We have here to determine whether a foreigner, the widow of a foreign seaman, killed on the high seas when navigating on board one of the ships of his own country by collision between his ship and a British ship, can maintain an action in England against the English owners of the British ship for the negligence of their servants in causing the collision and death. I start with the proposition that if the man had not been killed, but only injured, he during his life could have maintained an action for damages, such an action being maintainable by the lex fori and by the lex loci delicti commissi, whether the locus be regarded as English or British territory, or as the high seas over which maritime law, or maritime law as administered in this country, prevails. As regards English or British territory this is common knowledge. That such a tort would also be actionable by the law maritime as administered in this country is shown by The Ruckers (4 C. Rob. 73), and by other cases which I am about to cite. I have no doubt that other countries administer the law maritime in the same way. For some proof of it I cite the observations in the American cases of The Belfast (7 Wallace, 624) and Ex parte Gordon (14 Otto, 515). This not being an action in rem, it is not necessary to show that the High Court of Admiralty would, while there was such a separate court, have had jurisdiction. But I have no doubt that it would. The principle of the decision in The Zeta (69 L. T. Rep. 630; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 369; (1893) A. C. 468), and the reasoning of Lord Herschell, in whose judgment all previous cases are cited, the language of my brother Bruce in The Theta (71 L. T. Rep. 25; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 480; (1894) P. 280), and the settled practice of the Admiralty Division to allow in proper cases such actions in rem, have concluded this question, the true key to which might have been found long ago in the language of Dr. Lushington in The Sarah (Lush. 549). I have hitherto not considered one possible lex loci, the law of the foreign ship, in this instance that of Norway. If such a tort were not actionable by the law of Norway, it would be necessary to consider which was the law applicable, whether that of the British ship on which the act of negligence was committed, or that of the Norwegian ship on which the act was felt, or whether, as the death of the deceased seaman was in the sea by drowning, general maritime law, or maritime law as administered in the English courts, should apply. This matter underwent great discussion in Reg. v. Keyn (ubi sup.). It will be found treated of in the separate judgments of Lindley, J. at p. 98 (2 Ex. Div.); of Denman, J. at pp. 101 to 107; Brett, J. at p. 148; Bramwell, J. at p. 150; Lord Coleridge, C.J. at p. 158; and of Cockburn, C.J. at pp. 232 to 238. It would be necessary also to consider the case of The Leon (ubi sup.). But till it is otherwise pleaded and proved, I take the law of Norway to be the same as our own.

Having thus established my first proposition that an injured man could have maintained during his life an action for damages in such a case as the present, I come to apply the Fatal Accidents Act 1846. This statute enacts as follows: [His Lordship read sect. 1, and proceeded:] These words (of that section) are wide enough, and no one doubts that they apply to foreigners in England, or to British seamen as against a British shipowner on the high seas. There is the lex fori, and, if the tort be held to be done on the British ship, the lex loci. It has not been pleaded that the law of Norway differs in this respect from ours; and I leave, as before, the possible consequences of such a state of things out of consideration. If the lex loci be the law maritime, I am not sure that it must not now be held that the injury done to the relatives of a dead man by killing the breadwinner is to be deemed an actionable tort by the law maritime. The reasoning of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Ex parte Gordon (ubi sup.), already cited, and the fact that by the law of Scotland, and I believe now by the law of many civilised countries, for example, the United States (ubi sup.), France (see Zachariae, edit. 1878, vol. 4, p. 17), and Germany, as I am informed, this action lies, lead me to think that if at one time this tort was not actionable by the law maritime, it may yet well be actionable now. I have still to consider the decision and reasoning of my brother Darling in Adam v. British and Foreign Steamship Company Limited (ubi sup.). That decision is in point, and, if we decide now in favour of the plaintiff, we must disagree with it. It rests mainly, I think, upon the principle that Acts of Parliament are to be deemed not to apply to non-resident aliens unless the court is compelled so to apply them. There are a number of decisions upon the construction of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, which set forth this principle as applicable to the construction of statutes imposing a burden upon a foreigner. Perhaps the strongest of these is Cope v. Doherty (ubi sup.); but even in that case the reservation of Knight Bruce, L.J. (31 L. T. Rep. O. S., at p. 308; 2 De G. & J., at p. 621) would make me pause. On the other hand, where it is a case of giving a remedy to a foreigner, the decision of Dr. Lushington in The Milford (31 L. T. Rep. O. S. 42; Swab. 362), and the constant practice which has followed upon that decision, is the other way. This latter position is, I think, sound. Our courts are not only open, but open equally, to foreigners as to British subjects; and foreigners who have the benefit of the English common law have also the benefit of English statutes. At any rate, where a statute brings the English law into harmony with the law of the foreigner, as in the case of The Milford (ubi sup.), I think this must be so. If an Englishman on board a foreign ship, or a foreigner on board a British ship, is run down by a British ship upon the high seas, it seems almost certain that an action would lie. Are the representatives of a foreigner on board a ship of his own nationality, whose national law would probably give them at least as good a remedy as that given by the Fatal Accidents Act, to be deprived of their right to recover because they must have recourse to statute law instead of to unwritten common law? I think not. Is the law to be different for a Scotch owner of a British ship and the English owner of a British ship, and can it be that as against the owner in this case, if he were a Scotchman, the foreigner could maintain an action because the law of solatium is part of the common law of Scotland, but as against an English owner he cannot, because the Fatal Accidents Act is a statutory addition to the common law of England? I think not. There must be judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

Judgment for plaintiff on the question of law, with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Stokes and Stokes.

Solicitors for the defendants, Ince, Colt, and Ince.

June 18 and 21, 1901.

(Before MATHEW, J.)

PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY v. THE KING. (a)

Seamen—Lascars—Ship registered in the United Kingdom—Crew space—Merchant Seamen (Indian) Act No. 13 of 1876—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60).

The crew space required for Lascars, who are British subjects and natives of India, upon ships registered in the United Kingdom, and trading between England and Australia and England and India, is regulated by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and not by the Merchant Seamen (Indian) Act No. 13 of 1876.

PETITION OF RIGHT.

The petitioners are a corporation owning ships trading between England and India, China and Australia respectively, and have for many years employed to navigate their steamers a class of British subjects, natives of India, called Lascars.

Such Lascars have been shipped for many years in British India under agreements in the form approved by the Governor-General of India in council.

For many years the crew space provided for such Lascars has largely exceeded the crew space required to be provided for Lascars by the Indian Act of 1876 (1876, No. 13, s. 9) in cases to which that section is applicable, but has fallen short of the crew space required to be provided for seamen by sect. 210 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 in cases to which that section is applicable.

Two of the petitioner's ships, registered before the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 in the United Kingdom, in conformity with the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and the Acts amending the same, traded between England and Australia and England and India, carrying a crew of Lascars accommodated as stated above, and shipped under an agreement as stated above.

A surveyor of ships appointed by the Board of Trade inspected the crew space occupied by the Lascars on the two ships, and alleged that the provisions of sect. 210 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 had not been complied with, and reported such failure to the appropriate chief officer of Customs, who thereupon altered the registered tonnage of the ships, and disallowed the deduction of the crew spaces from the tonnages.

The petitioners admitted that if Lascars were seamen within the meaning of that word in sect. 210 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, the space required by that section had not been provided for such seamen.

It was submitted by the petitioners that in taking such action the surveyor acted on an erroneous construction of the statutes applicable to such Lascars and their crew space and the registered tonnage of the ships, and wrongly considered that the English Acts and not the Indian Acts regulated the crew space to be provided for the Lascars.

A declaration was accordingly asked for that the crew space provided for such Lascars complied with the statutes in that behalf if it exceeded the crew space required by sect. 9 of the Indian Act 1876, No. 13.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 288:

If the Governor-General of India in Council, or the respective legislative authorities in any British possession abroad, by any Acts, ordinances, or other appropriate legal means, apply or adapt any of the provisions in the third part of this Act contained to any British ships registered as trading with, or being at any place within their respective jurisdiction, and to the owners, masters, mates, and crew thereof, such provisions, when so applied and adapted as aforesaid and as long as they remain in force, shall in respect of the ships and persons to which the same are applied be enforced, and penalties and punishments for the breach thereof shall be recovered and inflicted throughout Her Majesty's dominions, in the same manner as if such provisions had been hereby so adopted and applied and such penalties and punishments had been hereby expressly imposed.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

And by sect. 290 :

If in any matter relating to any ship, or to any person belonging to any ship, there appears to be a conflict of laws, then, if there is in the third part of this Act any provision on the subject which is hereby expressly made to extend to such ship, the case shall be governed by such provision, and if there is no such provision the case shall be governed by the law of the place in which such ship is registered.

These sections are re-enacted verbatim in sects. 264 and 265 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

By the Merchant Seamen (Indian) Act No. 1 of 1859 :

Sect. lxx. A place or places of shelter shall be provided below, well caulked and substantial, for the men engaged under this Act ; such place or places shall be arranged as to allow for the men the following spaces : (1) For each European seaman or apprentice or other person shipped on the same footing as a European seaman nine superficial feet, if the place be not less than six feet in height from deck to deck : or fifty-four cubic feet if the height from deck to deck be less than six feet. (2) For each Lascar or native seaman or other person shipped on the same footing as a Lascar, four superficial feet, and if the place allotted be under the top-gallant fore-castle, such fore-castle deck shall be not less than 4ft. 6in. above the one below it. Every such place shall be kept free from stores or goods of any kind not being the personal property of the crew during the voyage, and if any such place in any ship is not in the whole sufficiently large to give such space for each seaman and apprentice as hereinbefore required, or is not properly caulked and in all other respects securely and properly constructed and well ventilated, the owner shall for each such failure to comply with the provision of this section, incur a penalty not exceeding 200 rupees ; and if any such space as aforesaid is not kept free from goods and stores as aforesaid the master shall, for every such failure to comply with the provisions of this section, incur a penalty not exceeding 100 rupees.

Sect. cxviii. The following words and expressions in this Act shall have the meaning hereby assigned to them, unless there be something in the section or context repugnant to such construction, that is to say : The word "seaman" shall include every person (except master, pilots, and apprentices) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship.

By the Merchant Seamen (Indian) Act No. 13 of 1876, sect. 9 :

And whereas it is expedient to increase the space required by the said Act, No. 1 of 1859, sect. 70, to be allowed for European seamen and apprentices and for Lascars or native seamen. It is hereby enacted as follows : Such section shall be read as if for the expressions "nine superficial feet," "fifty-four cubic feet," and "four superficial feet," the expressions "ten superficial feet," "sixty cubic feet," and "six superficial feet" were respectively substituted, and as if in the third paragraph of the same section after the word "superficial" the words "thirty-six cubic" were inserted.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 77 :

(1) The tonnage of every ship to be registered, with the exception hereinafter mentioned, shall, previously to her being registered, be ascertained by rule 1 in the 2nd schedule to this Act, and the tonnage of every ship to which that rule 1 can be applied, whether she is about to be registered or not, shall be ascertained by the same rule. . . . (3) For the purpose of ascertaining the register tonnage of a ship the allowance and deductions hereinafter mentioned shall be made from the tonnage of the ship as aforesaid. (4) In the measurement of a ship for the purpose of ascertaining her register tonnage no deduction shall be allowed in respect to any space which has not been first included in the measurement of her tonnage.

And by sect. 79 :

(1) In measuring or re-measuring a ship for the purpose of ascertaining her register tonnage the following deduction shall be made from the space included in the measurement of the tonnage—namely : (a) In case of any ship (i.) any place used exclusively for the accommodation of the master and any space occupied by seamen or apprentices and appropriated to their use which is certified under the regulations scheduled to this Act with regard thereto. The regulations referred to are those contained in the 6th schedule above set out.

By sect. 742 :

In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby assigned to them—that is to say : "Seaman" includes every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices duly indentured and registered) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship.

And by sect. 210 :

(1) Every place in any British ship occupied by seamen or apprentices and appropriated to their use, shall have for each of those seamen or apprentices a space of not less than seventy-two cubic feet, and of not less than twelve superficial feet measured on the deck or floor of that place, and shall be subject to the regulations in the 6th schedule of this Act, and those regulations shall have effect as part of this section ; and if any of the foregoing requirements of this section is not complied with in the case of any ship, the owner of the ship shall for each offence be liable to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds. (2) Every place so occupied and appropriated shall be kept free from goods and stores of any kind not being the personal property of the crew in use during the voyage, and if any such place is not so kept free, the master shall forfeit and pay to each seaman or apprentice lodged in that place the sum of one shilling for each day during which, after complaint has been made to him by any two or more of the seamen so lodged, it is not so kept free.

And by the 6th schedule :

Regulations to be observed with respect to accommodation on board ships : (1) Every place in a ship occupied by seamen or apprentices appropriated to their use shall be such as to make the space which it is required by the second part of this Act to contain available for the proper accommodation of the men who are to occupy it, and shall be securely constructed, properly lighted and ventilated, properly protected from weather and sea, and, as far as practicable, properly shut off and protected from effluvia which may be caused by cargo or bilge water. (2) A place so occupied and appropriated as aforesaid shall not authorise a deduction from registered tonnage under the tonnage regulations of this Act unless there be in the ship properly constructed privies for the use of the crew, as such number and of such construction as may be approved by the surveyor of ships. (3) Every place so occupied and appropriated as aforesaid shall, whenever the ship is registered or re-registered, be inspected by one of the surveyors of ships under this Act, who shall, if satisfied that the same is in all respects such as is required by this Act, give the collector of Customs a certificate to that effect, and if the certificate is obtained but not otherwise, the spaces shall be deducted from the register tonnage. (4) No deduction from tonnage as aforesaid shall be authorised unless there is permanently cut in a beam and out in or painted on or over the doorway or hatchway of every place so occupied and appropriated the number of men which it is constructed to accommodate with the words "Certified to accommodate seamen." (5) Upon any complaint concerning any place so occupied and appropriated as aforesaid, a surveyor of ships may inspect the place, and if he finds that any of the provisions of this Act with respect to the same are not complied with, he shall report the same to the chief officer of Customs at the port at which the ship is registered, and therefore the registered tonnage shall be altered, and the deduction aforesaid in respect of space disallowed, unless and until it be certified by the surveyor, or by some other surveyor of the ships, that the provisions of this Act in respect of the place are fully complied with.

K.B. Div.] PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION CO. v. THE KING. [K.B. Div.]

The Merchant Shipping Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124), in sect. 9, contained similar provisions to those in the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, ss. 79, 210, and sched. 6.

Sir Robert Reid, K.C. (Bray, K.C. and Scrutton, K.C. with him) for the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company. The point raised here is whether certain provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, relative to the crew space on ships, are applicable to the case of Lascars. What we contend is that by virtue of statutory provision in Imperial Acts, followed by statutory provision in Indian Acts, the amount of accommodation required by Lascars is regulated by the Indian statutes, and is not regulated by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. The rules as to space laid down by the Indian Government have been complied with. Before the year 1867 there was no provision in any British Act regulating the crew space in any ship. The first statute is 4 Geo. 4, c. 80, passed in 1823, and in accordance with sects. 25 and 26 of that Act an Indian Act of 1850 was passed, which is now repealed, that required compliance with certain regulations in the employment of Lascars and Indian servants in British ships to be complied with, though it was not until seventeen years later that a British Act dealt with the question of crew space. He referred to the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 288, 290. These sections are reproduced in the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, but there are provisions in 1854 authorising the Governor-General to apply and adapt any provisions in this statute. [MATHEW, J.—Does this Act deal with crew space? ] No. There is no crew space dealt with until 1867. Taking the Act of Geo. 4 and this Act of 1854, as early as 1854 regulations could be made in India for the accommodation of Lascars, and there was power to adapt the provisions of the British Act in regard to them, but this Act did not include crew space. The next statute to be considered is the Merchant Seamen (Indian) Act No. 1 of 1859. The preamble of that statute refers to the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and by sect. 70 crew space has to be provided for European seamen and also for Lascars. It is in that Act that the first step is made to provide for crew space in any Indian legislation. In 1867 the Merchant Shipping Act of that year was passed (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124), and by sect. 9 certain crew space is required in British ships. In 1876 the Merchant Seamen (Indian) Act No. 1 of 1876 was passed, and by sect. 9 the Indian Act of 1859 was amended. We say that we have supplied the accommodation necessary under the Indian Acts, and that is the accommodation required. Both the Merchant Shipping Acts of 1854 and 1867 have been repealed by the Act of 1894, and we contend that, having regard to sect. 38 of the Interpretation Act 1889, whatever rights we had under those statutes are still existing unless they are expressly repealed. [MATHEW, J.—But there was nothing but the Indian Acts to affect you. These other statutes do not appear to have touched you in any way.] That is what we say—namely, that the provisions as to crew space in the Act of 1867 were concurrent and always subject to the Indian legislation affecting Lascars. Although the Act of 1854 has been repealed, yet the Indian Acts made in pursuance of that statute were, and still are, operative, unless expressly or necessarily repealed by subsequent legislation. I submit that they have never been repealed. It is said that the legislation that makes it wrong for us to proceed under the Indian Acts is the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. I am aware that there is a provision in that statute which deals with the conflict of laws, and which says that in such a case the British Act will apply, but I contend that there is no conflict of laws so far as Lascars are concerned. The laws are concurrent, and each applies to its own subject-matter. He referred to the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 77, 79, 125, 210, 260, 261, 264, 265, 735, 742, sched. 6. If the Indian Act of 1876 had been passed in 1895 it would have been valid under sect. 264, unless there was a conflict. In this way I am assisted by the Interpretation Act 1889, and enabled to treat the Indian Act of 1876 as though it had been passed in 1895 in India, or which is the same proposition, but in a reverse manner, the Act of 1894 of Great Britain as though it had been passed in 1875. If there is a conflict, it is obvious that the Imperial Act will prevail; or if there is no provision relating to the subject, because the ships are registered in Great Britain. But here there is a general enactment passed with reference to the existing legislation, the statute of Geo. 4, and also with reference to the previous British Act of 1854 and the Indian legislation made in pursuance of the undoubted legal powers which were given. There can be no conflict in such a case. A conflict can only arise where you cannot reconcile the two provisions. The Act of 1894 requires crew space for a "seaman," not "British seaman." The fact is that the conflict does not arise, because by virtue of statutory provisions the subject matter is capable of being dealt with under the jurisdiction of the Governor-General of India in Council. The question is whether the Act of 1894 necessarily expresses an undoing of that which has been lawfully done by the Indian legislation.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, K.C.) (the Solicitor-General, Sir E. Carson, K.C., and Sutton with him) for the Crown.—In the first place these vessels are registered in the United Kingdom, while in the various Acts to which the other side have referred provision is made for local legislation where the vessel is registered in British possessions abroad. Again, the contentions raised are not confined to vessels trading in Indian ports, but must extend to the vessels wherever they are, and must apply not only to the Lascar crew space but also to the crew space for Europeans. He referred to 4 Geo. 4, c. 80, ss. 2, 20, 25, 26.

The other side are in error in supposing that

[K.B. Div.] PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION CO. v. THE KING. [K.B. Div.]

the Indian statutes were regulations made under sect. 26. They were legislation made quite apart from any Imperial Act. The recitals of the Indian Acts show this, for they do not refer to the Act of Geo. 4. He referred to Navigation Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 29), ss. 7, 8. In that year, 1849, Lascars became British seamen for the purpose of the Navigation Acts. The first relevant Act is the Merchant Seamen (Indian) Act, No. 1, 1859. When one looks at the preamble and the following sections it is clear that these are not regulations made under the Act of Geo. 4. It is an Act of the Indian Legislature passed with reference to sect. 288 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which it recites at length. That Act contained no provision as to crew space, but in the Indian Act there is a regulation as to crew space in sect. 70 which relates to both European seamen and Lascars. I submit that that shows that the Indian Act does not contain regulations made in pursuance of 4 Geo. 4, and the only British legislation in reference to which it is passed is sect. 288 of the Act of 1854, and part 3 of that Act to which sect. 288 relates. That shows that European sailors and Lascars for this purpose stand on the same footing, and so if the Indian Act prevails as to Lascars it must do so as to European sailors. He referred to Merchant Shipping Act 1867, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 124, s. 9.

That is the first Imperial statute that requires crew space. It is to be read as a part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and by sect. 2 of that Act "seaman" is defined to mean "every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices duly indentured and registered) engaged in any capacity on board any ship." When the Act of 1867 was passed, it provided that as regards every British vessel there should be a certain crew space for the seamen. No distinction is to be made between Lascars and other seamen. He referred to

Merchant Shipping Act 1894, 57 & 58 Vict. c. 60, ss. 77, 79, 113, 125, 210, 260, 264, 265, 735, 742, sched. 6;

Interpretation Act 1889, 52 & 53 Vict. c. 63, s. 18.

I submit that so far from the context otherwise requiring in the case of sect. 210 of the Act of 1894 and the incorporated 6th schedule, everything in the context points to the fact that the same space is to be provided for all seamen on board British ships. The position taken up by the Board of Trade in this matter has not been shaken by the argument of the other side, and these provisions as to crew space apply in the case of all seamen in British vessels. It has not been made out that the vessels in question, which have been registered here in the United Kingdom, are protected by the Indian Acts.

Sir R. Reid in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 21.—MATHEW, J.—This was a petition of right presented by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company under the following circumstances: The petitioners are owners of ships trading between England, Australia, and India, and among their ships are the Australia, trading between England and Australia, and the Oriental, trading between England and India. The crews of those ships are composed of European seamen and a class of British subjects, natives of India, who are known as Lascars. The agreements with the Lascars, these native seamen, are entered into in British India, and are in accordance with sect. 125 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. The petitioners sought for a declaration that the crew space provided for the Lascars in their ships was regulated by the Indian Act of 1876, with which they alleged they had complied, while it was contended for the Crown that the subject-matter was regulated by sect. 210 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. These ships were registered in the United Kingdom in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and the statutes amending the same. Now, the first statute to which my attention was called was 4 Geo. 4, c. 80, s. 25, and by that section, contained in the Act which threw open trade between the British possessions and India, the Governor-General of Fort William in Council was required, as soon as may be, to make, ordain, and publish rules and regulations to be observed by masters and owners of ships trading under the authority of this Act. Ships trading under the authority of this Act "were ships trading between any of the British possessions and India, the crews of which ships or vessels shall be wholly or in part composed of Asiatic sailors, for the due supply of provisions, clothing, and other necessary accommodation for such sailors." Sect. 26 provided that all such rules and regulations, until they shall be repealed or altered, shall be observed and performed according to the true intent and meaning thereof, in like manner as if they had been inserted in and had formed part of the Act. Now, it was contended by the counsel for the petitioners that the Governor-General was given absolute power under that statute for the time being, to exercise an exclusive jurisdiction for the protection of Lascars. It was provided, as I have said, that if any regulations were made by the Governor-General, they were to have the effect of being inserted in the statute, and therefore to have statutory operation; but it was not disputed, and it could not be disputed, that any such regulations being made, Parliament would have the power to modify and alter them. Now, the argument of the learned counsel for the petitioners was this, that that Act authorised the subsequent Indian legislation, to which I shall have to refer, as to Lascars, and that those subsequent Acts were to be traced to that statute and the authority given by that statute, and that an independent code of regulations was contemplated in consequence for Lascars as distinguished from other seamen on board these ships. I am satisfied that the Indian legislation did not spring from the statutes in question, and that the statute of Geo. 4 had no relation to the Indian Acts, and that these statutes spring out of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. Now, on turning to that Act it is clear, in the first place, that it applied in terms to such ships as the petitioners', to their crews, and on turning to the definition of seaman in that Act, it included all persons employed in any capacity on board any ship within the meaning of the Act; and no distinction was drawn between any parts of the different crews, between Lascars and European seamen. There seems to be no reason why any such distinction should be made, and, as I have said, the definition clearly indicated that there was no intention to make any such distinction. The statutes contained various provisions in Part III. as to the crews of the ships referred to in the statute. There was no provision, and that was agreed, as to the spaces to be appropriated to any of the crew, and in the third part of the Act really the only provisions which had any reference to the accommodation of the crew was that contained in sect. 231, and that appeared to be confined to sleeping accommodation only. The statute contains two important sections which are set out in the plea and answer. By the first of those sections, 288, it was provided that "If the Governor-General of India in Council or the respective legislative authorities in any British possession abroad, by any Acts, ordinances, or other appropriate legal means, apply or adopt any of the provisions in the third part of this Act contained to any British ships registered at, trading with, or being at any place within their respective jurisdictions, and to the owners, masters, mates, and crews thereof, such provisions, when so applied and adopted as aforesaid, and as long as they remain in force, shall, in respect of the ships and persons to which the same are applied, be enforced" as provided for in Part 3. Sect. 290 went on to provide that "If in any matter relating to any ship or to any person belonging to any ship there appears to be a conflict of laws, then, if there is in the 3rd part of this Act any provision on the subject which is hereby expressly made to extend to such ship, the case shall be governed by such provisions; and if there is no such provision the case shall be governed by the law of the place in which such ship is registered." Now, the effects of that appear to be perfectly plain. Any legislation in India or elsewhere, as described in the section, is kept under the control of the Imperial Parliament. Where the law of the ship is in conflict with any ordinance made by the Governor-General in India, the law of the ship is to prevail. That statute having been passed, the first Indian Act which relates to this matter was passed by the Governor-General of India in Council in 1859. Now that Act, as appears from the preamble, was clearly passed under the powers conferred by sect. 288. I need not read the section, which is set out in the preamble to that statute. This Indian Act provided for the first time, and very imperfectly, for spaces to be appropriated to the sailors on board, and sect. 70 contained these provisions: "A place or places of shelter shall be provided below a well caulked and substantial deck for the men engaged under this Act; such place or places shall be so arranged as to allow for the men the following spaces," and then for each European seaman a provision was made, and for the Lascars in the same way a very scanty provision was also made. That statute was acted upon, and I am told continued to be acted upon down to the passing of the amending Act in the year 1876. Meanwhile, by the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act of 1867, further provision was made for spaces to be appropriated to the sailors on board such ships as these. I need not refer to the provisions of that statute, because they are repeated with certain additions by the Act which repealed the Act of 1867—namely, the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894. In the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, under sect. 210, there is the provision as to the spaces to be appropriated to the members of the crew, and there is a schedule, and both statute and schedule are set out in the plea and answer. Now, when that Act was passed, there can be no question that the Indian Act was in conflict with the Imperial Act. The provisions made by the one, scanty and inadequate as it certainly was, was entirely set aside, and better accommodation provided under the provisions of the Act of 1894, and in those circumstances it appears perfectly clear that in the conflict the Imperial Act must prevail. Sect. 265 of the Act of 1894 repeated the provisions of sect. 288 of the Act of 1854. It preserved, therefore, the enactment that in case of conflict the Imperial Act should prevail, and that appears to me to be abundantly clear as the result of the different enactments, and there would appear to be no doubt as to position of the petitioners and of the Crown with reference to this matter.

I ought to add, though perhaps it is not very important, that after this Act of 1859 and after the Act of 1867 an amending Act was passed by the Indian Legislature, and the provisions of that Act did expand and did extend to some extent the provisions of the earlier Act, but left the British seaman and the native alike in a much worse position than they would have been under Imperial Legislation. Now, how was this contention on the part of the Crown, which appears to me to be right, sought to be met on the part of the petitioner. The argument was an extremely subtle one, but it appears to me an entirely untenable one. It was said you must go back to the Act of George IV., and that initiated a series of provisions confined to Lascars, and that they were therefore intended to be dealt with by that independent legislation, and where you find the word "seaman" in an Imperial Act in pari materia you must insert the words "except Lascars." I see no ground whatever for any such contention. As I have said, it appears to me the Act of George IV. was not the source of the subsequent statutes and that they had a different origin. I see no indication whatever of any intention that a separate and exclusive system of legislation should be maintained with respect to the Lascars who constitute part of these crews. But the object of the argument, of course, was to make out that the legislation by the Indian Acts and by the Imperial Act were not in conflict, but ran parallel to each other. As I said, I see no ground whatever for any such suggestion. Attention was called to one section of the Act of 1894—sect. 260—and, if I follow the argument correctly, what was attempted to be made out was this: That section related to the application of Part I of the Act, which related to the crews, among other matters, and provided, "This part of this Act shall, unless the context or subject-matter requires a different application, apply to all sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom, and to the owners, masters, and crews of such ships." Now, it was said the crews of those ships, where they consisted of Lascars and Europeans, required an application according to the subject-matter. The subject-matter was partly, therefore, Lascars, and the interpretation contended for by the learned counsel for the petitioners, that there was intended to be separate legislation starting with the Act of

[K.B.] ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSUR. CORPORATION v. SJÖFORSKRINGS AKTIEBOLAGET VEGA. [K.B.]

George IV., and that that section recognised the existence of that intention. Again, it seems to me to be impossible to act upon any such far-fetched argument, and the case appears to me to be a perfectly plain one. It follows that the Crown is entitled to the declaration asked for: That the petitioners since 1867 have been, and are now, bound to appropriate to the use of the Lascars the accommodation for seamen specified in sect. 210 of the Act of 1894 and the 6th schedule as part of that section. Further, that by sect. 265 of the Act of 1894 the provisions of that Act relating to the accommodation for seamen must govern that matter, and not those of the Indian Acts. That was the one point which was discussed before me, and which it was arranged should be disposed of in the first instance, and on that point my judgment is in favour of the Crown.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitors: Freshfields; Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

May 9 and June 15, 1901.

(Before BIGHAM, J.)

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION v. SJÖFORSKRINGS AKTIEBOLAGET VEGA. (a)

Marine insurance—Time policy—Continuation clause—Policy for twelve months with continuation clause—Policy for more than twelve months—Validity—Contract executed abroad but negotiated in England—By what law governed—Stamp Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), ss. 92, 93.

A policy of marine insurance contained the following continuation clause: "Should the vessel be at sea or abroad on the expiration of this policy, it is agreed to hold her covered until arrival at her port of final destination in the United Kingdom or on the continent of Europe at a pro rata daily premium to the within." At the expiration of the twelve months the vessel, having been damaged, was in a port abroad, and her owners intended to bring her home under temporary repairs. While on the voyage home she was lost.

In an action on the policy in respect of the loss which had thus occurred after the twelve months:

Held, that the policy, by reason of the continuation clause, was a policy for more than twelve months, and, being a time policy, was therefore invalid under sect. 93, sub-sect. 3, of the Stamp Act 1891, and could not be given in evidence in respect of the loss which had occurred after the expiration of the twelve months.

The defendants were a Swedish company, and the policy was executed in Sweden, but it was negotiated in London by the London agent of the defendants. It was in the English language, and was on an ordinary Lloyd's form, and there was a provision that if there were any dispute the defendants agreed to be bound in all things by the jurisdiction and decision of the English law courts.

Held, that the contract was a contract made in England, and should be governed by English law as the intention of the parties was that it should be so construed according to English law.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION by Bigham, J. in a commercial cause in which the plaintiffs claimed 750*l.* and interest under a marine policy of re-insurance subscribed by the defendants.

By a policy dated the 20th Oct. 1898 Messrs. Pickford Brothers, brokers at Lloyd's, effected on behalf of the owners of the steamship Merrimac, with Messrs. Gray, Dawes, and Co., an insurance for 4200*l.* on the hull and machinery of the Merrimac against all risks "for and during the space of twelve calendar months commencing at noon 18th Oct. 1898; and ending at noon 18th Oct. 1899." At the foot of the policy were the words: "Including printed clauses as attached." Attached to the policy was a printed slip, headed "Elder, Dempster, and Co. Time clauses." No. 7 of these clauses provided:

Should the vessel be at sea or abroad on the expiration of this policy, it is agreed to hold her covered until her arrival at her port of final destination in the United Kingdom or on the continent of Europe at a pro rata daily premium to the within.

By a policy, dated the 24th Oct. 1898, Gray, Dawes, and Co. reinsured with the plaintiffs 1050*l.* of the 4200*l.* against the risk of total or constructive total loss only, and this policy was expressed to be "a reinsurance of Gray, Dawes, and Co., underwriters, subject to terms, pro rata returns, continuation, valuation clauses, and conditions of the original policy or policies, and to pay as may be paid thereon." This policy was for the same period as the first policy—namely, "for the space of twelve calendar months from noon 18th Oct. 1898 to noon 18th Oct. 1899."

By the policy now sued upon, dated the 22nd Oct. 1898, the plaintiffs reinsured with the defendants, a Swedish company, 750*l.* of the 1050*l.* reinsured by them, and this policy was executed in Stockholm. It was against risk of total and (or) constructive total loss only, and was for the same period as the other two policies—namely, "for and during the space of twelve calendar months commencing at noon on the 18th Oct. 1898, and ending at noon on the 18th Oct. 1899." This policy contained these clauses: "Continuation clause as per original policy," and it was expressed to be a:—

Reinsurance to the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation, subject to all the same clauses, terms, conditions, continuations, &c., that do or shall attach to the original policy and (or) policies, and to pay and (or) receive as may be paid and (or) received thereon, anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding. All claims and (or) losses payable in London. In the event of claim the Vega Company agree and undertake to pay upon the claim note of the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation stating such claim to have already been settled by same. In case of any dispute under this policy the Vega Company agree to be bound in all things by the jurisdiction and decision of the English law courts.

During the currency of these policies the Merrimac sustained heavy damage, and put into Quebec for temporary repairs. Temporary repairs were effected in Quebec with the intention of bringing the vessel home for permanent repairs.

On the 25th Oct. 1899, after the expiration of the twelve months for which the vessel was insured, the Merrimac sailed from Quebec, and was totally lost on that voyage home.

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[K.B.] ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSUR. CORPORATION v. SJÖFORSKRINGS AKTIEBOLAGET VEGA. [K.B.]

At the trial before Bigham, J. the policy of reinsurance sued on was tendered in evidence. The policy was not stamped, and the learned judge at the trial took the objection, according to his previous decision in Charlesworth v. Faber (5 Com. Cas. 408), that the policy being a time policy, and being for a period exceeding twelve months, was invalid by reason of the provisions in sect. 93, sub-sects. 2 and 3 of the Stamp Act 1891, but he reserved the point for further consideration.

The sections of the Stamp Act 1891 applicable to the case are set out in the judgment of the learned judge.

Joseph Walton, K.C. and A. H. Chaytor for the plaintiffs.—The policy of re-insurance upon which the plaintiffs sue is a valid policy. The question is whether it can be stamped, or whether by reason of the continuation clause which is incorporated into it, it is a policy for more than twelve months, and therefore invalid as a time policy for more than twelve months. The same question arose in Charlesworth v. Faber (5 Com. Cas. 408), as to the effect of the continuation clause, and was decided against the contention of the plaintiffs in this case. It was there decided that the re-insurance policy, being, by reason of this continuation clause, for a period exceeding twelve months, was invalid. The point was not there argued, and it is submitted that that decision was wrong. Even if that case was rightly decided, the present case is distinguishable. In that case the policy was issued in London, and was governed by English law; whereas here the policy is issued in Sweden, and is to be construed according to Swedish law. There is therefore this question to be considered, whether these provisions of the Stamp Act 1891 apply to this policy at all. The contract must be governed by Swedish law, so far at least as relates to the form of the contract, and if the form of the contract is such that it would have been valid according to Swedish law, then it can be enforced in this country although there may be a non-compliance with the provisions of the Stamp Act. By Swedish law this continuation clause would have been free from any objection. Speaking generally, the legality of a contract is to be determined by the law of the country where the contract was made; where, however, the question is merely one of procedure, then it is determined by the law of the country where it is sought to be enforced. If the question relates to the right and validity of the contract itself, then it is governed by the law of the country where the contract was made; but as to procedure it is otherwise. This was clearly laid down in Leroux v. Brown (20 L. T. Rep. O. S. 68; 12 C. B. 801), where it was held that an action would not lie in the courts of this country to enforce an oral agreement made in France (and valid there), which, if made here, could not, by reason of the Statute of Frauds, have been sued upon. But if the section of the Statute of Frauds there applicable had made the contract invalid altogether, then the law of France would, by that decision, have applied and the action could have been maintained in this country. In accordance with this view, in the converse case of Bristow v. Sequeville (5 Ex. 275), it was held that a document, which, by the law of a foreign country is not admissible in evidence for want of a stamp, may, nevertheless, be admitted in this country; but where, by the foreign law, the want of a stamp renders the contract void, it cannot be enforced here. The cases of Guepratte v. Young (4 De G. & S. 217) and Branley v. South-Eastern Railway Company (6 L. T. Rep. 458; 12 C. B. N. S. 63) are to the same effect. Applying these principles to the present case, the Stamp Act 1891, in sect. 93, says that the policy, being a time policy, and being for a period exceeding twelve months, is invalid altogether. That does not deal with procedure only, but the essential legality of the contract. Therefore, although this policy could not have been sued upon if made here, it can be sued upon because it was made in Sweden. Secondly, even assuming that the Stamp Act does apply, yet this policy can be stamped after execution upon paying the penalty. The contract was not one contract for a period exceeding twelve months; it was really two contracts, one for time—namely, for the twelve months—and the other for a voyage, and the termini of that voyage would be the place where the ship might be at noon on the 18th Oct. 1899 and her port of final destination. In that view of the case the policy would come within sect. 94 of the Act, which provides that: "Where any sea insurance is made for a voyage and also for time, or to extend to or cover any time beyond thirty days after the ship shall have arrived at her destination and been there moored at anchor, the policy is to be charged with duty as a policy for a voyage, and also with duty as a policy for time." Under that section the policy may be regarded as constituting two contracts, one for time and one for the voyage, and it would be good on being stamped accordingly.

Theobald Mathew (Scrutton, K.C. with him) for the defendants.—The policy is governed by English and not by Swedish law. The parties clearly intended the contract to be construed according to English law. The policy was on an ordinary Lloyd's form, as the previous policies were. It was negotiated in London, and claims were to be payable in London, and there was an express stipulation that the defendants were "to be bound in all things by the jurisdiction and decision of the English law courts." The contract was not really made in Sweden, but even if it were, it does not follow that it must be interpreted by Swedish law. Primā facie the lex loci contractus governs the construction of the contract. The court, however, may look at the evidence for the purpose of seeing whether the parties intended otherwise:

Re Missouri Steamship Company Limited, 61 L. T. Rep. 316; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 423; 42 Ch. Div. 321.

Here the whole facts show that the parties intended English law to apply. By clause 7 of the time clauses an obligation was imposed to issue a continuation policy. The whole time covered by the policy would be therefore more than twelve months, and the policy would be invalid under sect. 93 of the Act. He referred to Gedge v. Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation (5 Com. Cas. 229), and Bigham, J. referred to Buchanan and Co. v. Faber (4 Com. Cas. 223).

Joseph Walton, K.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

K.B.] ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSUR. CORPORATION v. SJÖFORSÄKRINGS AKTIEBOLAGET VEGA. [K.B.]

June 15.—BIGHAM, J. delivered the following judgment:—The only question in this action to be dealt with by me at present is as to the admissibility in evidence of the policy sued on. The facts so far as they are material are as follows: On the 20th Oct. 1898 Messrs. Gray, Dawes, and Co., effected a policy of insurance on a vessel called the Merrimac for the space of twelve calendar months from the 18th Oct. 1898 to the 18th Oct. 1899. That policy was to run, therefore, for twelve months from the 18th Oct. 1898 to the 18th Oct. 1899. The policy was in the ordinary Lloyd's form, and it contained at the bottom of it the words: "Including printed clauses as attached"; and there was attached to the policy a slip containing a number of stipulations headed: "Time clauses." One of the stipulations, the 7th, was as follows: "Should the vessel be at sea or abroad on the expiration of this policy, it is agreed to hold her covered until arrival at her port of final destination in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent of Europe, at a pro rata daily premium to the within." The amount of the policy was for 4200*l.* That was a policy which was clearly an English contract, governed exclusively by English law. Subsequently, the present plaintiffs, the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation, reinsured for Gray, Dawes, and Co., a part of that risk, namely, 1050*l.* That reinsurance policy purported to be on its face: "A reinsurance of Gray, Dawes, and Co., underwriters, subject to terms, pro rata returns, continuation, valuation clauses, and conditions of the original policy or policies, and to pay as may be paid thereon." That policy is also on the ordinary Lloyd's form, and like the first policy is an English policy governed exclusively by English law. Those two policies being in existence, the present plaintiffs effected a third policy reinsuring part of the risk which they had already reinsured. They reinsured 750*l.*, and they reinsured it with the defendants in this way. The defendants are a foreign company with their head office in Sweden, and, as I understand, they are a corporation constituted according to the Swedish law. Their business is to insure marine risks, and for the purpose of carrying on that business they have in London an agent named Guttman, who solicits orders and business on behalf of the defendant company, and having obtained offers of business he submits these offers to the defendants in Stockholm, and they either accept them or reject them. If they accept them they then issue a policy. In this case Guttman submitted this reinsurance on behalf of the Royal Exchange Corporation to the defendants. The defendants accepted the offer and then issued the policy which is now sued on. This policy sued on is also on the ordinary Lloyd's form. It is for all practical purposes, word for word, the same as the two previous policies. It is for the space of twelve months commencing at noon on the 18th Oct. 1898, and ending at noon on the 18th Oct. 1899, the same period as in the two other policies, and it contains these words: "Continuation clause as per original policy." That continuation clause is the clause to which I have already referred, and it appears in extenso in the first policy. Then this policy contains the following memorandum, which is not to be found in the first two policies: "Being a reinsurance to the Royal Assurance Corporation, subject to all the same clauses, terms, conditions, continuations, &c., that do or shall attach to the original policy and (or) policies and to pay and (or) receive as may be paid and (or) received thereon anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding. All claims and (or) losses payable in London. In the event of claim the Vega Company agree and undertake to pay upon the claim note of the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation stating such claim to have already been settled by same. In case of any dispute under this policy the Vega Company agree to be bound in all things by the jurisdiction and decision of the English law courts." Then the document is sealed or executed according to the law of Sweden. When the twelve months expired—that is to say, when the period from the 18th Oct. 1898 to the 18th Oct. 1899 had come to an end, the ship was in Quebec. She had been seriously damaged apparently. As to this I have had no evidence so far, but it was said that she was seriously damaged at that time, and the ship-owners proposed to bring her home under temporary repairs. The defendants declined to be bound by the risk which would be involved in bringing her home in that condition, and they accordingly defend this action. They thought—rightly or wrongly—that their policy, even with the continuation clause, did not oblige them to undertake a risk of that kind. The ship came home under temporary repairs after the twelve months had been run out, and she was lost. She went to the bottom and thereupon this action was brought. It came on for trial before me on the 9th May, and the plaintiffs then tendered in evidence the policy which I have just described, the third policy in the series, the policy issued by the defendants. It is not stamped, and the question I have to decide is whether I ought to admit the document in evidence, and, if I ought, then on what terms as to penalty or otherwise.

The provisions of the Stamp Act 1891 with reference to policies are as follows. Sect. 14 provides: "(1) Upon the production of an instrument chargeable with any duty as evidence in any court of civil judicature in any part of the United Kingdom, or before any arbitrator or referee, notice shall be taken by the judge, arbitrator, or referee, of any omission or insufficiency of the stamp thereon, and if the instrument is one which may legally be stamped after the execution thereof, it may, on payment to the officer of the court whose duty it is to read the instrument, or to the arbitrator or referee, of the amount of the unpaid duty, and the penalty payable on stamping the same, and of a further sum of one pound, be received in evidence, saving all just exceptions on other grounds." Then sub-sect. 4 of the same section provides: "Save as aforesaid, no instrument executed in any part of the United Kingdom, or relating, wheresoever executed, to any property situate, or to any matter or thing done or to be done, in any part of the United Kingdom, shall not, except in criminal proceedings, be given in evidence, or be available for any purpose whatever, unless it is duly stamped in accordance with the law in force at the time when it was first executed." Those provisions are general provisions applicable to all documents which are required to be stamped. Then there are a certain number of provisions of the Act, beginning with sect. 92, which relate exclusively to policies of sea insurance. Sect. 92 defines what a policy of sea insurance is. It says: "For the purposes of this Act the expression 'policy of sea insurance' means any insurance (including re-insurance)"—and therefore including a policy of the kind sued upon in this action—"made upon any ship or vessel, or upon the machinery, tackle, or furniture of any ship or vessel, or upon any goods, merchandise, or property of any description whatever on board of any ship or vessel, or upon the freight of or any other interest which may be lawfully insured in or relating to any ship or vessel, and includes any insurance of goods, merchandise, or property for any transit which includes not only a sea risk, but also any other risk incidental to the transit insured from the commencement of the transit to the ultimate destination covered by the insurance." Then sect. 93 provides: "(1) A contract for sea insurance (other than such insurance as is referred to in the fifty-fifth section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862) shall not be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy of sea insurance." That means to say that there must be a writing. Then sub-sect. 2 says: "No policy of sea insurance made for time shall be made for any time exceeding twelve months." Then sub-sect. 3 of sect. 93 provides as follows: "A policy of sea insurance shall not be valid unless"—and I think here the words "if it be a time policy" must be read in—"unless, if it be a time policy, it is made for a period not exceeding twelve months." Therefore by sect. 93 it is perfectly clear that a policy made for more than twelve months is not valid, whatever that expression may mean. Then sect. 95, sub-sect. 1, says: "A policy of sea insurance may not be stamped at any time after it is signed or underwritten by any person, except in the two cases following, that is to say," the first refers to a mutual insurance and need not be here mentioned; then "(b) Any policy made or executed out of, but being in any manner enforceable within, the United Kingdom, may be stamped at any time within ten days after it has been first received in the United Kingdom on payment of the duty only." Then sub-sect. 2 of that section says: "Provided that a policy of sea insurance shall, for the purpose of production in evidence, be an instrument which may legally be stamped after the execution thereof, and the penalty payable by law on stamping the same shall be the sum of one hundred pounds." Now the first question is whether this policy of reinsurance now sued on is a policy for more than twelve months, because if it is, it is invalid. I am of opinion that it is a policy for more than twelve months. It is made for a time exceeding that period. It is true that the risk may possibly not continue beyond the period of twelve months, for the vessel may be in a home port when the twelve months expires; but in my view the mere fact that the policy is only to extend beyond the twelve months in certain events does not prevent it from coming within the enactment. It was suggested that I might regard the document as containing two separate contracts of insurance, one for time, namely, for twelve months, and another for a voyage, under clause 7 of the "time clauses," and then, upon payment of the penalty mentioned in sub-sect. 2 of sect. 95, the document would be admissible in evidence to prove the insurance of the voyage—in this case the voyage from Quebec home—as distinguished from the time. I do not, however, think this contention is sound. I should be obliged to say if it were sound, that there was one contract of insurance to which no implied warranty of seaworthiness attached, namely, the time policy, and another to which such a warranty did attach, namely, the voyage policy, and that both contracts were to be discovered in the one document. Moreover, the voyage is not in any way specified; the termini are not named. There is therefore no description of the particular risk insured within the meaning of sub-sect. 3 of sect. 93 of the Act, which says: "A policy of sea insurance shall not be valid unless it specifies the particular risk or adventure." It is clear that a voyage policy which does not specify the termini of the voyage is not a valid policy at all. The risk in a policy of insurance must be defined, and if it is a voyage policy the voyage must be described by its termini. It must state where the voyage commenced and where it ends; it need not do more; it need not specify what route is to be followed, or what ports of call may be put into during the voyage itself, but it must at all events specify the place where the voyage is to commence and the place where it is to end; and so with a time policy. A time policy must specify the date when the risk is to commence, and must also specify the date when the risk is to end. I therefore am of opinion that this document cannot be regarded as constituting two policies of insurance, one for time and another for the voyage; nor do I think it can be regarded as constituting two separate policies of insurance for time—that is to say, one for twelve months and another for an undetermined time commencing at the end of the twelve months and finishing nobody knows when. Therefore I come to the conclusion that it is one contract for more than twelve months, and therefore invalid within the meaning of the statute; but I do not mean to decide, nor is it necessary for me to decide, that this policy is not perfectly good as a time policy for twelve months. I think if the loss had occurred during the twelve months the policy could have been given in evidence against the defendants, because I think it would be competent for the court to reject the 7th (or continuation) clause altogether as forming a part of the contract which was not good in law and being a separate part which could be rejected. I may refer to what was said by Willes, J. in Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway Company (17 L. T. Rep. 650, at p. 652; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 235, at p. 250): "The general rule is that, where you cannot sever the legal from the illegal part of a covenant, the contract is altogether void; but where you can sever them, whether the illegality be created by statute or by the common law, you may reject the bad part and retain the good." And therefore I think, though it is unnecessary to decide it in this case, that if this loss had occurred during the twelve months the policy could have been put in evidence. It is in my view a perfectly good policy for twelve months, but it is not a good policy for anything longer, it is an invalid policy.

[K.B.] ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSUR. CORPORATION v. SJÖFORSÄKRINGS AKTIEBOLAGET VEGA. [K.B.]

But it was said that even if it was invalid according to English law, yet it was admissible in evidence in our courts, because it was to be construed by Swedish law. No doubt, as a rule, the law to be applied in construing and enforcing a contract is the law of the country where the contract is made, but this is only because, in the absence of other circumstances, our courts assume that such was the intention of the parties. If it should clearly appear from other circumstances that the parties intended that their rights should be ascertained and determined by some other law, our courts will give effect to such intention. The law relating to the subject is fully dealt with in the comparatively recent case of Re Missouri Steamship Company Limited (61 L. T. Rep. 316; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 423; 42 Ch. Div. 321). It is sufficient to say that, in my opinion, that case is an authority for the proposition that I have just laid down. In this case the circumstances do, in my opinion, clearly show an intention that the contract should be governed by English law, and not by Swedish law. It is a reinsurance of a reinsurance of an original insurance effected at Lloyd's. The original insurance is on the old Lloyd's form and is a contract made in England to which English law alone is applicable. So is the first reinsurance. Then comes the policy now sued on. It is no doubt executed by the defendants in Sweden, but it was in every business sense made in London. It was negotiated here by the resident agent of the defendants; it is drawn upon the common Lloyd's form, as are the other policies from which it springs, and it contains the additional clause which I have already read, whereby it is provided that all claims and losses shall be payable in London—that is to say, the place of performance is to be in London; that payment shall be made on the claim note of the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation—that is to say, upon a claim note settled by the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation in accordance with English law, and that in case of any dispute the defendants shall be bound in all things by the jurisdiction and decision of the English law courts. In face of these facts I can have no doubt but that both parties intended that the contract should be construed and dealt with as an English contract, and I am convinced that if at the time the negotiations for the contract were going on, it had been suggested to the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation that they were reinsuring with reference to Swedish law a risk which they had undertaken with reference to English law, they would at once have repudiated the suggestion, and so too would the defendants. But, even assuming that the policy is to be interpreted with reference to Swedish law, I should still be of opinion that it could not be admitted in evidence. The statute makes such a contract invalid; that means no more than that it is a contract which cannot be put in suit. It is not illegal, it is not immoral, and there is no reason why the contract should not be entered into; but it is invalid in the sense that it cannot be put in suit. The case therefore falls within the authority of Leroux v. Brown (20 L. T. Rep. O. S. 68; 12 C. B. 801). The document is shut out because it would be contrary to our procedure to admit it. For these reasons I think that this is a policy which cannot be stamped at all and cannot be admitted in evidence, and the misfortune cannot be cured by the payment of any penalty. I must therefore hold that the plaintiffs are unable to make out their case, and I must give judgment against them. It is only right that I should say that this point was not taken by the defendants. It was taken by me as I thought I was bound to take it. The defendants did not desire to, nor did they attempt to argue the point. Their desire was that the case should be tried on the merits, as distinguished from the point with which I have dealt. In my view the case cannot be tried on its merits in this court, because the case cannot be launched; but if the parties are willing to go to arbitration—which can only be done by consent—I see no reason why their differences cannot be settled without reference to the point which I felt bound to take, and which decides the action, as perhaps the arbitrator would not feel himself bound to take it, although I must point out that the provisions of the statute may in his opinion oblige him to take the same point.

K.B.]

THE VERITAS.

[ADM.]

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Hollams, Sons, Coward, and Hawksley.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

July 15, 16, and 29, 1901.

(Before GORELL BARNES, J.)

THE VERITAS. (a)

Priorities of liens—Salvage—Damage to property of harbour board—Maritime lien—Action in rem—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 7.

There is a maritime lien under sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 for damage done by a ship to the works of a harbour authority, although they may be within the body of a county.

A lien for damage done by a ship takes precedence of a prior lien for salvage, and an award for salvage cannot be recovered against the res to the detriment of a claimant in respect of subsequent damage.

THESE were motions by the owners of the tugs Prairie Cock and Sea Cock, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and the owners of the steamship Caledonian, respectively, for payment out of court of the sum of 927l. 9s. 2d., the proceeds of the Norwegian steamship Veritas.

The facts of the case fully appear in the judgment. The collision action between the Devonian and the Veritas there referred to is reported in 84 L. T. Rep. 675; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 158; (1901) P. 221.

Section 11 of the Mersey Docks Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 30) gives the dock board power to raise and remove any wreck which, in their judgment, may be an obstruction to navigation, and it also gives them power to sell such wreck and retain the expenses of raising it, "rendering the overplus (if any) to the person or persons entitled to the same."

Section 94 of the Mersey Docks Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 92) is as follows:

In every case in which any damage shall be done to any lock, gate, bridge, pier, landing-stage, jetty, platform,

(a) Reported by CHRISTOPHER HEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[ADM.]

THE VERITAS.

[ADM.]

quay, . . . or other work belonging to the board through the misconduct, negligence, or default of the master of any vessel, or any other person on board of any vessel . . . such vessel may be detained until such damage shall have been paid for or a deposit shall have been made by the master or owner of such vessel equal in amount to the claim or demand made by the board for the estimated amount of the damage so done by such vessel.

Sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65) is as follows :

And be it enacted that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to or damage received by any ship or sea-going vessel, or in the nature of towage, or for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or sea-going vessel, and to enforce payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county, or upon the high seas, at the time when the services were rendered or damage received, or necessaries furnished, and in respect of which such claim is made.

By sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) :

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship.

Carver, K.C. and Batten for the owners, masters, and crews of the tugs Prairie Cock and Sea Cock.—It is contended by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board that they have a possessory lien under sect. 94 of the Mersey Docks Consolidation Act 1858. A possessory lien does not override a maritime lien; therefore sect. 94 is of no avail to them :

The Gustaf, 6 L. T. Rep. 660; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 230; Lush. 506.

Nor have they a maritime lien under sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861; for a maritime lien can only be enforced by the court, and here they could not at the time enforce their lien, if they had any, because the res had been sold under their statutory powers, and not by order of the court. A maritime lien is not operative unless there is a judgment in rem. Here there is no judgment in rem. There is nothing which gives the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board a higher claim than the salvors. It is true it is stated in Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice, p. 80, and other text-books, that a damage lien takes priority of the lien of a salvor for services rendered prior to a collision, but the authorities cited do not support this proposition :

The Cargo ex Galam, 9 L. T. Rep. 550; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 408; Br. & L. 167; 2 Moo. P. C. C. 216;

Attorney-General v. Norstedt, 3 Price, 97; 17 R. R. 554.

They also referred to

Marsden's Collisions at Sea, 4th edit., p. 91;

Maclachlan on Shipping, 2nd edit., pp. 652, 653, and 6th edit., pp. 740, 741;

The Admiralty Court Act 1840, s. 4.

Bailhache and W. S. Glynn for the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Caledonian.—The owners of the tugs Prairie Cock and Sea Cock have no claim for salvage. The collision between the Devonian and Veritas was, at the trial, held to be partly caused by the negligent exhibition of improper lights by the tug Prairie Cock, and the subsequent services were rendered necessary on account of the collision. The tug Sea Cock belongs to the same owners as the Prairie Cock, and the owners at any rate are not entitled to profit by the result of their own negligence :

The Ripon, 52 L. T. Rep. 438; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 365; 10 P. Div. 65;

The Devonian (ubi sup.).

Aspinall, K.C. and Maurice Hill for the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.—Priority of dates of judgment does not give priority in the absence of laches on the part of the person seeking to take advantage of his lien :

The Africano, 70 L. T. Rep. 250; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 427; (1894) P. 141.

The Mersey Docks Consolidation Act 1858, s. 94, and the Mersey Docks Act 1874, s. 11, give the harbour board a priority over the other claimants. They would at any rate have had a maritime lien if the damage had been done at sea :

The Sarah (1862), Lush. 549.

See also

The Sara, 61 L. T. Rep. at p. 28; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 415; 14 App. Cas., at p. 216;

Currie v. McKnight, 75 L. T. Rep. 457; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 193; (1897) A. C. 97;

The Zeta, 69 L. T. Rep. 630; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 369; (1893) A. C. 468.

There is a maritime lien although the damage has been done in the body of the county :

The Bold Buccleugh, 19 L. T. Rep. O. S. 235; 7 Moo. P. C. C. 267.

With regard to the question of priorities, a right ex delicto takes priority over prior salvage. This is laid down in all the text books. See

Maude and Pollock's Law of Merchant Shipping, 4th edit. vol. 1, p. 619;

Coote's Admiralty Practice, p. 138;

Kennedy's Law of Civil Salvage, p. 7;

The Aline (1839) 1 W. Rob. 111.

It may be that the cases cited are not directly in point, but it is submitted that the proposition is, nevertheless, a correct one. The reason why a lien arising ex delicto should take precedence of a lien ex contractu is that the person who suffers damage has involuntarily received an injury, whereas a salvor, or other person who has a lien ex contractu or quasi ex contractu, voluntarily does the work or renders the service which gives rise to the lien. He takes the risk of the res being sufficient to pay him. They also referred to the following cases :

The Merle, 31 L. T. Rep. 447; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 402;

The Immacolata Concezione, 50 L. T. Rep. 539; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208; 9 P. Div. 37;

The Robert Pow, 9 L. T. Rep. 237; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 392; Br. & L. 99;

The Mary Ann, 13 L. T. Rep. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8;

The Benares (1850), 7 No. of Cas. Supp. 538;

The Two Ellens, 26 L. T. Rep. 1; 1 Asp. Mar. Law 208; L. Rep. 4, P. C. 161;

Westrup v. Great Yarmouth Steam Carrying Company, 61 L. T. Rep. 714; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 443; 43 Ch. Div. 241;

The Heinrich Bjorn, 55 L. T. Rep. 66; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 11 App. Cas. 270;

The Vera Cruz (No. 2), 52 L. T. Rep. 474; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 386; 9 P. Div. 96; 10 App. Cas. 59;

The Madonna d'Idra (1811), 1 Dodson, 37;

The Selina (1842), 2 No. of Cas. Supp. 18.

Carver, K.C. in reply.

ADM ]

THE VERITAS.

[ADM.

The following cases were also referred to :

- The Elin*, 49 L. T. Rep. 87; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 120; 8 P. Div. 129;
The Linda Flor, 30 L. T. Rep. O. S. 234; Swa. 309;
Barracough v. Brown, 76 L. T. Rep. 797; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; (1897) A. C. 615;
Ballantyne v. McKinnon, 75 L. T. Rep. 95; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 173; (1896) 2 Q. B. 455; Abbott on Shipping, 13th edit., p. 871.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 29.—BARNES, J.—There are three motions in this case for payment out of court of certain sums out of the proceeds of the Norwegian steamship Veritas which amount to 927l. 9s. 2d. The motions are made in these circumstances. In October last year the Veritas, laden with a cargo of ice for Liverpool, was in distress outside the Mersey, and salvage services were rendered to her by the steamship Caledonian, by which she was brought into and anchored in the Mersey. The services of the tug Prairie Cock were then engaged, and, while that tug was being made fast to the Veritas, a collision occurred between the Veritas and the steamship Devonian in consequence of which the Veritas began to fill, and salvage services were rendered to her by the tugs Prairie Cock and Sea Cock, with the result that she was brought to a place alongside the dock wall to the south of the Liverpool landing stage. From this place she drifted against the said stage, doing damage to the boom and other connections of the stage, and sank, and her cargo of ice perished. She was removed by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board under the powers conferred upon them by the 11th section of their Act of 1874. The board had also the right to detain her in respect of the damage under the 94th section of their Act of 1858. On the 15th Oct. an action was instituted in this court by the owners, master, and crew of the tugs against the Veritas in respect of the salvage services rendered by them, and on the same day she was arrested in the suit. The board intervened in that suit, and on the 19th Oct. an order was made, by consent, for the release of the Veritas, the interveners undertaking to furnish the plaintiffs with an account of receipts and expenditure in dealing with the wreck under statutory powers, and to lodge the overplus in court to the credit of this action to abide further order, without prejudice to liens, rights, or priorities of any claims on the Veritas or proceeds of sale. The vessel was accordingly released and afterwards sold on the 23rd Oct. by the board, and, after deducting the expenses of the board, the net proceeds amounted to the sum of 927l. 5s. 2d., which was brought into court to the credit of the action. On the 23rd Nov. an action was instituted in this court against the proceeds of the Veritas by the owners, master, and crew of the Caledonian in respect of the salvage services rendered by them, and on the 7th Dec. a caveat against the payment out of court of the proceeds was entered in the first action on behalf of the last plaintiffs, who afterwards intervened in the first action, though not until after judgment was obtained in it. On the 14th June 1901 judgment was obtained by the plaintiffs in the action in respect of the salvage by the Prairie Cock and Sea Cock in the sum of 320l. and costs, without prejudice to claims on the funds in court, and reserving all questions of priorities. On the 29th April 1901 judgment was given for the plaintiffs in the action in respect of the salvage by the Caledonian for 400l. and costs, all questions of priorities being reserved. On the 8th Feb. 1901 an action was instituted in this court by the board against the proceeds in respect of the damage done to the stage, in which the plaintiffs in the two salvage actions intervened, and on the 1st July 1901 judgment was given for the plaintiff for 600l. and costs, all questions of priorities being reserved. The owners of the Prairie Cock and Sea Cock appeared at the hearing. By their defence, as interveners, they had raised (inter alia) the question of whether or not the damage sustained by the board was due to the negligence of those on board the Veritas, and the judgment appears to have proceeded on the ground of such negligence being found by the court, and no point was raised before me that this was not so. [His Lordship, having read the formal judgment in the action brought by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, proceeded:] It is to be observed that all these judgments were conditional, and, as the funds are still in court, the claims have to be dealt with on their respective rights to priority: (The Africano, ubi sup.). A collision action was also tried between the Devonian and the Veritas in which the Devonian was on the 7th Feb. 1901 held to blame for a bad look-out, and the Veritas also to blame on the ground that the tug Prairie Cock, while alongside of her, was exhibiting only under-way lights, and had not a second masthead light for towing.

The board claim to have a maritime lien on the said proceeds for their damage, and to take priority over the salvors. This claim is disputed by both of the salvors. The Prairie Cock and Sea Cock claim to have priority over the damage claim, and over the claim of the prior salvors. The first salvors claim to have precedence over the second, and dispute the right of the second to claim salvage in the circumstances. These rival claims give rise to some questions of general importance and considerable difficulty which were very well argued by counsel before me. The first question to determine is with regard to the claim of the board. It was first argued by the salvors that the board had waived any right against the Veritas and the proceeds by selling the Veritas under the powers conferred by the said Acts. This point was principally made by the Prairie Cock and Sea Cock, who were parties to the consent order, though the owners of the Veritas and the Caledonian were not. The answer to the point appears to be that the board have recovered judgment against the proceeds in their action, to which both sets of salvors had become parties by intervening, and that the judgment is binding and conclusive, at any rate so far as it establishes a right on the part of the board to proceed for their damage against the proceeds: (Ballantyne v. Mackinnon, ubi sup.). Every possible point appears to have been raised in the defence put in on behalf of the tugs, but in their rejoinder these interveners withdrew their defence, except as to the question of priorities, and stated that they were willing that the board should have judgment for 600l. against the proceeds. The judgment reserved the question of priorities. Further, as showing that the board had not waived any right it may have to proceed against the fund, it is to be observed that, in selling under the powers aforesaid, the board do not extinguish the claimants' claims altogether against the proceeds, but hold the same subject to such rights as could be enforced against the res. By the 11th section of the Act of 1874 they are to render the overplus (if any) to the person, or persons, entitled to the same. This sale would not affect such rights as the salvors have against the proceeds, and there seems to me to be nothing inconsistent in the board also being allowed to enforce, by proceedings against the proceeds, any rights which they may have in respect of damage done by the Veritas to their property; and, although they had an option to detain the wreck until their damage was paid, or a deposit made for the same, that appears to be only an additional right, and, if not exercised, that does not prevent the board from enforcing by action any claim they may have to recover for the damage done to the stage and its connections. The case of Barraclough v. Brown (ubi sup.) which was cited does not apply in my opinion. That case was dealing with a liability only imposed by the Act referred to in the case. The second point raised by the salvors was that the board had not a maritime lien for their damage. That the board had a right to proceed in rem under the 7th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 is clear, and the judgment in favour of the board was no doubt under this section: (The Beta, 20 L. T. Rep. 988; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 447; The Uhla, 19 L. T. Rep. 89; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 148; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 29, note; The Sylph, 17 L. T. Rep. 519; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 24; The Malvina (1862), Lush. 493; The Merle, ubi sup.; The Zeta, ubi sup.). The judgment in favour of the board must, at least, have proceeded on this ground, though it would not necessarily proceed on the ground that there was a maritime lien for damage. It was argued by counsel for the salvors that although the board might have a right to proceed in rem, yet they had no maritime lien for the damage. As the damage came last in this case it is very questionable if it matters whether the board had a maritime lien or not, because, the board having a right to proceed in rem for their damage, the question rather is whether the salvors' claims are to have precedence of the right of the board to enforce payment of the damage done by the Veritas. But I will deal with the salvors' rights later on. However that may be, in my opinion, if it be material to decide the point (the case was argued as if it were), as the law now stands, the board had a maritime lien for the damage. The question is one upon which a great deal of argument may be expended, but the ground is now mostly covered by authority. It was decided in the Bold Buccleugh (ubi sup.) that a maritime lien arises in the case of damage done by one ship to another in favour of the injured party. The important passage from the judgment delivered by Sir John Jervis in that case is as follows: "Having its origin in this rule of the civil law, a maritime lien is well defined by Lord Tenterden to mean a claim or privilege upon a thing to be carried into effect by legal process; and Story, J. (1 Sumner, 78) explains that process to be a proceeding in rem, and adds, that wherever a lien or claim is given upon the thing, then the Admiralty enforces it by proceeding in rem, and indeed it is the only court competent to enforce it. A maritime lien is the foundation of the proceeding in rem, a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attaches; and, whilst it must be admitted that where such a lien exists a proceeding in rem may be had, it will be found to be equally true that in all cases where a proceeding in rem is the proper course, there a maritime lien exists, which gives a privilege or claim upon the thing to be carried into effect by legal process. This claim or privilege travels with the thing, into whosoever possession it may come. It is inchoate from the moment the claim or privilege attaches, and when carried into effect by legal process, by a proceeding in rem, relates back to the period when it first attached." That this reasoning is not strictly correct is shown by more recent decisions, where it has been held that there may be rights to proceed in rem without a maritime lien (The Heinrich Bjorn, ubi sup.), and there is no lien on a foreign ship under sect. 6 of the Act of 1840 for necessities. In The Two Ellens (ubi sup.) it was held there was no lien for necessities under sect. 5 of the Act of 1861, and in Westrup v. Great Yarmouth Steam Carrying Company (ubi sup.) that there was no lien for towage. In all these cases a proceeding in rem lies. Dr. Brown, in his work on Civil Law, published in 1802, at p. 143, has the following passage: "The torts of the master cannot be supposed to hypothecate the ship; nor, in my humble judgment, in strictness of speech, to produce any lien on it." I do not know of any English case earlier than the Bold Buccleugh (ubi sup.) in which the doctrine that collision gives rise to a lien is to be found: (see the notes collected by Mr. Marsden, at p. 187 of his work on Collisions at Sea, 4th edit.). The growth of the idea of maritime lien is also referred to in the President's judgment in The Dictator (67 L. T. Rep. 563; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 251; (1892) P. 304). The decision in The Bold Buccleugh (ubi sup.) has, however, whether rightly founded or not, been now acted on for fifty years, and in the case of Currie v. McKnight (ubi sup.) Lord Watson made the following remarks: "The principle of that decision has been adopted in the American courts; and in the Admiralty Court of England it has for nearly forty years been followed in a variety of cases in which lien for damage done by the ship has been preferred to claims for salvage, and seamen's wages, and upon bottomry bonds." He then proceeds to consider the case of The Bold Buccleugh (ubi sup.), and, further, he says: "And in my opinion it is a reasonable and statutory rule that when a ship is so carelessly navigated as to occasion injury to other vessels which are free from blame, the owners of the injured craft should have a remedy against the corpus of the offending ship, and should not be restricted to a personal claim against her owners, who may have no substantial interest in her, and may be without the means of making due compensation." So far these observations relate to damage in collisions between ships, but the principle seems to be substantially the same so far as regards damage done by a ship, which, if done on the high seas, would formerly have been within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court: (The Sarah, ubi sup., and Lord Herschell's judgment in The Zeta, ubi sup., where, after examining the cases, he came to the conclusion that it is impossible to maintain the proposition that the word "damage" was, according to the well-understood meaning of the phrase in the Admiralty Court, confined to damage due to collision between two ships). Under the 7th section of the Act of 1861 the court has jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship, and therefore has jurisdiction over this claim by the board. Even if it be said that the damage in question was not done on the high seas, some of the cases I have already referred to above are in point. In my opinion it follows from the decision in The Bold Buccleugh that there is a maritime lien for this kind of damage if it had occurred on the high seas, and it seems to follow that it was intended the law should be the same as to damage done by a ship elsewhere, and therefore whether the damage in question was done in the body of a county or not is immaterial, and I need not enter upon that question. This is the manner in which the 6th section of the Act of 1840 has been regarded, so far as damage received by a ship in the body of a county is concerned: (see The Bold Buccleugh, ubi sup., where the collision occurred in the river Humber; the judgment of Lord Bramwell in The Heinrich Bjorn, ubi sup.; and the judgment of Lord Halsbury in The Sarah, ubi sup.). It is not, in my opinion, inconsistent with these views that, while there is a lien on the ship for the damage done by her, there may be no lien in favour of an injured ship in cases like The Zeta (ubi sup.), where the reasons which have led to the recognition of a lien on a ship are not applicable.

ADM.]

THE VERITAS.

[ADM.]

The next and, in my opinion, the real question in the case is whether the claim of the board has precedence over the prior lien of the salvors. That salvors have a lien was not disputed. In the cases for a very long time past where a lien for salvage is spoken of it is always treated as if there was no question but that there is a maritime lien for salvage. It is probably natural that the idea of this lien should have developed more readily than that of a lien for damage. There is no reported case, so far as I am aware, in which the question has been raised and considered whether a lien for damage takes precedence of a prior lien for salvage or not. There is, however, the passage from Lord Watson's judgment in Currie v. McKnight (ubi sup.) which I have quoted above. It is possible that Lord Watson had not fully considered this point, but his judgments are always so full of learning and care that I do not think he would have expressed himself in these terms if he had felt any doubt about the matter. All the text-writers to whose works I have been referred give the precedence to the claim for damage: (see Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice, 2nd edit., p. 80; Maude and Pollock's Merchant Shipping, 4th edit., by Pollock, B. and Bruce, J., p. 619; MacLachlan on Merchant Shipping, 6th edit., pp. 740-741; Cooze's Admiralty Practice, p. 138; Abbott on Shipping, 13th edit., by Bucknill, J. and Mr. Langley, p. 871, and Admiralty Jurisdiction and Practice in County Courts, by Dr. Raikes and Mr. Kilburn, p. 123). I have referred to several American text-books, but cannot find any discussion of the point I have mentioned in them. In some of the works I have mentioned the following cases are cited: The Aline (ubi sup.), The Benares (ubi sup.), The

Cargo ex Galam (ubi sup.), Attorney-General v. Norstedt (ubi sup.), but none of these cases appear to me to be in point on the proposition in question for which they are cited. There is therefore this consensus of English text-writers, and no case to be found in which damage has ever been postponed to prior salvage. It would seem clear that maritime liens may be divided into two classes: first, liens arising ex delicto; and, secondly, liens arising ex contractu, or quasi ex contractu. It is almost obvious that liens of the latter class must, in general, rank against the fund in the inverse order of their attachment on the res. They are liens in respect of claims for services rendered, and it is reasonable that services which operate for the protection of prior interests should be privileged above those interests. Thus in the present case (subject to a point which will be dealt with hereafter) the second set of salvors are preferred to the first because the first share in the later benefit conferred on the common subject of the liens. It is also clear that liens arising ex delicto take precedence over prior liens arising ex contractu. The reasons for this are pointed out by Dr. Lushington in The Aline, at p. 118. The principal one appears to be that the person having a right of lien ex contractu becomes, so to speak, a part owner in interests with the owners of the vessel. He has chosen to enter into relationship with the vessel for his own interests; whereas a person suffering damage by the negligent navigation of a ship has no option. Reparation for wrongs done should come first, otherwise the injured party might be unable to satisfy his claim out of the res without paying off prior claims which arise in such circumstances that the claimants may be considered to have chosen to run the risks of subsequent events affecting their claims. It has even been held that the maritime lien for damage takes precedence of the lien of seamen for wages earned by them since a collision: (The Elin, ubi sup.). It was argued before me that salvage claims were not on the footing of claims arising ex contractu, and that, on grounds of public policy, they should have precedence over subsequent damage claims. The right to salvage may, but does not necessarily, arise out of contract. As the late Lord Hannen said: "It is a presumption of law arising out of the fact that property has been saved, that the owner of the property who has had the benefit of it should make remuneration to those who have conferred the benefit upon him, notwithstanding that he has not entered into any contract on the subject": (The Five Steel Barges, 63 L. T. Rep. at p. 501; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 582; 15 P. Div. at p. 146). To this may be added that salvage is not governed merely by a regard to benefit received, but also, on grounds of public policy, by a due regard to the interests of commerce and humanity. At the same time the right to proceed against the res is to obtain payment of the reward given for services rendered, and the salvors have had the option of rendering their services, and in deciding to render them are in a position to consider the risks they may run in recovering their reward, and whether or not it is advisable to render the services. From the time of rendering the services they are practically in the same relative position as a creditor who has obtained a lien strictly ex contractu, and while taking precedence over prior claims ex con-

[ADM.]

THE OIVINGDEAN GRANGE.

[ADM.]

tractu and prior salvage, in my opinion, the considerations I have referred to show that their claims should be postponed to subsequent damage claims; and, in my judgment, it is in the best interests of careful navigation that this should be so. I can see no satisfactory ground on which the claims of an injured party should be postponed to the claim of one who seeks to obtain a benefit for prior services rendered to what is in the court commonly spoken of as the "wrong-doing" vessel. Such principles as can be applied and general considerations are, in my judgment, the other way, and even if the damage in this case did not give rise to a maritime lien, but only to a right to proceed in rem, it seems to me that the latter right should be enforceable in priority to the salvage claims. For all practical purposes in a case where the damage comes last the position of the injured party, so far as regards claims arising prior to the damage, is much the same, whether he has a lien or only a right of process. I may sum up these remarks thus: There is a right to arrest a ship to obtain reparation for damage done by her which is not affected by prior claims against her arising from hypothecation which creates interests in her along with those of her owners. This right was no doubt enforced by the High Court of Admiralty before the doctrine was entertained in the case of The Bold Buccleugh that there was a maritime lien for damage, and, as regards such prior claims, the right would not seem to depend on the existence of a maritime lien for damage. A salvage claim may be regarded as if there had been a hypothecation to secure the reward of the salvors for services rendered, and that reward ought not to be recovered against the res to the detriment of a claimant in respect of subsequent damage. The matter is of importance when it is not possible or convenient to proceed against the owners personally, and it would be unreasonable and inequitable to satisfy out of the res a claim for a reward for prior salvage services which the salvors elected to render, in preference to a claim in respect of damage done.

The last point to deal with is that relating to the claims of the salvors inter se. Unless there is something to prevent the principles aforesaid from applying, the claim of the tugs is to be preferred to that of the Caledonian. But counsel for the latter vessel contended that in consequence of the decision in the case of The Devonian (ubi sup.) the claim of the Prairie Cock could not have precedence over that of the Caledonian, and that, as the Sea Cock belongs to the same owners as the Prairie Cock, the claim of the Sea Cock, so far as her owners are concerned, also could not have such precedence. To succeed in this contention it was practically admitted that it must be shown that the owners of the Prairie Cock and Sea Cock and the master and crew of the former could not recover salvage against the Veritas. But the tugs have recovered judgment for their services in their suit, the question of priorities only being reserved, and the owners, master, and crew of the Caledonian did not raise any objection in that suit to the plaintiffs therein recovering judgment. They did not intervene until after judgment, although they had previously entered a caveat against payment out of the proceeds. The judgment appears to conclude them now. The ground upon which it was sought to make out the point for the Caledonian was by applying the decision of the court in the case of the collision between the Devonian and the Veritas that the Veritas was to blame by reason of the wrong exhibition of lights on her tug the Prairie Cock. I do not consider it necessary to examine the decision at any length. It is sufficient to notice that there was no finding that the absence of the second masthead light in fact contributed to the collision, and, unless it did, the fact that the Veritas was held to blame under sect. 419, subsect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 does not appear in the circumstances to make the tug guilty of negligence which caused the collision so as to deprive the tug of the right to salvage for subsequent services when the vessel was being moved with the object of beaching her. As the control rested with the pilot of the Veritas, whatever were the strict statutory obligations, it would have been rather hard in the circumstances to hold the tug responsible to the tow for negligence as between the tug and tow. I need not, however, go into this question any further owing to the finding of the court being as above stated, and the fact that the judgment was recovered by the tugs without any objection by the Caledonian. The result is that in my judgment the claim of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board comes first; then the claim of the tugs; and, lastly, that of the Caledonian; and payment out must be made accordingly.

Solicitors for the second salvors, J. H. Thompson and McMaster, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the first salvors, Hill, Dickinson, and Co., Liverpool.

Solicitors for the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., agents for W. C. Thorn, Liverpool.

Feb. 12, 13, 14, and 15, 1901.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President, and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE OIVINGDEAN GRANGE. (a)

Collision—Contributory negligence—Thames Bye-laws 1898, bye-law 47.

The steamship F., proceeding down the river Thames against the tide, committed a breach of bye-law 47 of the Thames Bye-laws in neglecting to wait at B. point until the steamship O. G., which was coming up with the tide, and which, at the time, was turning in the river preparatory to entering the West India Dock, had passed clear. A collision occurred.

Held, that although the O. G. was to blame for not keeping a proper look-out and conducting the turning without proper care, the F. was also to blame for hindering the manœuvres of the O. G. by not obeying the rule, and so contributing to the collision.

THIS was a collision action brought by the owners of the Norwegian steamship Forsete against the owners of the steamship Ovingdean Grange.

The Forsete was a wooden steamship of 526 tons gross register, and at the time of the collision was on a voyage from London to Grimsby in ballast. The Ovingdean Grange was a steamship

ADM.]

THE OIVINGDEAN GRANGE.

[ADM.]

of 2413 tons gross register, and was on a voyage from Antwerp to Buenos Ayres via London with a general cargo and two passengers.

The collision occurred on the 22nd Aug. 1900, about 8.30 a.m., off Blackwall Point, Blackwall Reach, river Thames. The weather at the time was clear, the wind a fresh breeze from the S.W., and the tide one-third flood of the force of about two knots. The Forsete was coming down river, keeping to the southward of mid-channel, making four to five knots through the water; the Ovingdean Grange, having previously sounded four blasts on her whistle as a signal that she was about to turn in the river and then three more as her engines were put astern, was swinging under a port helm with a tug towing on her starboard bow.

The movements of the Forsete were hampered by a sailing barge coming up river, which passed close under her stern and struck her, and prevented the Forsete from porting and going under the stern of the Ovingdean Grange. The Forsete struck the Ovingdean Grange on the port side about the main rigging.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants (inter alia) with turning improperly and at an improper time and place, and in going astern and not ahead, as she should have done when the Forsete approached, so as to keep her stern well to the north of mid-channel.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with improperly starboarding and neglecting to wait above Blackwall Point until the Ovingdean Grange had swung clear, in breach of bye-law 47 of the Thames Bye-laws.

Bye-law 47 of the Bye-laws for the Regulation of the River Thames 1898 is as follows:

Steam vessels navigating against the tide shall before rounding the following points, viz. . . . Blackwall Point, wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear.

Aspinall, K.C. and Stubbs for the plaintiffs, the owners of the Forsete.

Laing, K.C. and Dawson Miller for the defendants, the owners of the Ovingdean Grange.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear from the judgment.

The following cases were referred to:

Cayser, Irvine, and Co. v. Carron Company; The Margaret, 52 L. T. Rep. 361; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 371; 9 App. Cas. 873;

The Monte Rosa, 68 L. T. Rep. 299; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 326; (1893) P. 23.

The PRESIDENT [after reviewing the evidence said:—The conclusion to which I have come is that the story of the Forsete has in it the substantial element of accuracy, by which I mean that, in all probability, what happened was that the Ovingdean Grange in turning brought herself to the south side of mid-river, and that the collision took place to the south and not to the north of mid-channel. It is common ground that the Ovingdean Grange was in about mid-river when she commenced to turn. She had been stopped tea minutes, according to the evidence of the engineer, and after that her engines were put full speed astern. The effect of that would be, in the opinion of the Elder Brethren, with which I agree, not only to destroy any headway which she had, but to give her sternway. Then assuming that she had been stopped without headway in about mid-channel, and given her action of reversed engines, I confess I see no answer to the statement that in these circumstances she must have come to the south of mid-river. There are other indications which point in the same direction. The blow was a right-angle blow. I think there is no doubt about that. If that be so, then it is very difficult indeed to understand how the collision could have taken place to the north of mid-channel, because we know where the Forsete was when, if the suggestion is true, she started to come out. [The learned judge then dealt with the collision between the Forsete and the barge, and continued:] On the whole, the balance of evidence, taking the admitted facts, points to the conclusion that the story of the Forsete's is the true story, and that the Ovingdean Grange got across to the south side of the river. How she did so is, I think, clear. She did not go ahead soon enough and kept her screw working astern for too long, and so, partly owing to that and partly owing to the action of the barge in preventing the Forsete from porting and keeping close to the point, and so passing close under the stern of the Ovingdean Grange, this collision came about. Therefore I am unable to absolve the Ovingdean Grange from blame. I do not say and I do not wish to say anything about whether the Ovingdean Grange was turning in an improper place. The Elder Brethren tell me it is not an unusual or improper place to turn in for the purpose of going into the West India Dock, and I confess I should not have thought it was an improper place. But if vessels take upon themselves to turn at that point they must do so with all due caution. It seems to me as if there was want of proper look-out on the Ovingdean Grange. I do not lay more stress upon that than this, that it explains why the Ovingdean Grange conducted her turning, not in an improper place, but not with that proper care which should have been shown.

Now I have to deal with the case of the Forsete, and more difficulty presents itself. The rule which applies in this case—rule 47 of the Thames Bye-laws appears to me to have been broken by the Forsete. It is clear, according to that rule, that as she was navigated against the tide she should have waited until vessels navigating with the tide had passed clear. The evidence indicates some action on her part which might be urged as some compliance with that rule, because she says that at a particular point she stopped when she heard three blasts from the Ovingdean Grange. I think, however, that the evidence of the engineer's log shows that the stopping was not a stopping in compliance with that rule, but merely part of the order to go full speed astern, as she afterwards did. Therefore she did not comply in any sense with that rule, which compels her to wait. Now comes the further question: If that be so, can it be said she ought to be held liable for any part of this collision, or ought it to be said that although she broke the rule she did not cause the collision, and that the Ovingdean Grange, notwithstanding breach of the rule by the Forsete, by ordinary care could have avoided the collision, and is therefore solely liable? I have considered that with the assistance of the Elder Brethren, to which I attribute considerable importance, because I think every case must turn upon its particular circumstances. I have been referred to the case of Cayzer, Irvine, and Co. v. Carron Company (ubi sup.), in which the law is elaborately laid down. The point of the whole matter appears to me to be expressed in the judgment of Lord Watson (52 L. T. Rep. at p. 364; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 375; 9 App. Cas. at p. 886), when he says that "a vessel which is proved to have disregarded these precautions"—that is rule 23 (now 47)—"must accept the onus of showing that the neglect of them did not contribute to any collision or damage which may have occurred at the time or subsequently." Then he says: "If that conduct on the part of the Clan Sinclair had been such as to place the Margaret at this disadvantage, to throw her into difficulties and make it doubtful what course she ought to pursue, then I could hardly have excused the Clan Sinclair from contribution to the collision in the present case. But the fact was not so . . . and the ground of my judgment is shortly this, that assuming there was a breach of the rule and culpable neglect, yet the consequences of that neglect could have been avoided by ordinary care on the part of the Margaret." The above passage expresses the law, and one has to apply it to the facts in this case. In that case some of the judges thought that ordinary care on the part of the Margaret would have prevented any collision even though the Clan Sinclair broke the rule and was therefore in a place where she ought not to have been. But the facts in the present case appear to me to be different. By not obeying this rule the Forsete brought herself into a position where she otherwise would not have been; that is to say, she got herself into the place where the collision occurred instead of being a considerable distance above. That, however, is not enough to condemn her. But then comes the question, by her being there did she hamper the course or the manœuvres of the Ovingdean Grange, or did she not? I think the Ovingdean Grange had a right to turn at the point she did, and the very object of rule 47 in this case appears to be that the vessel coming up to the point to turn round shall have the river clear from the approach of vessels coming down. That object not having been attained in this case, circumstances of difficulty arose, partly in connection with the Ovingdean Grange herself and partly in connection with the barge, which would not have arisen if the Forsete had obeyed the rule. Under those circumstances it appears to me and to the Elder Brethren that the Forsete by what she did enhanced the difficulties of the situation in which the Ovingdean Grange was placed, and threw upon her the difficulty of taking more than ordinary care in doing what she did. Therefore, although the Ovingdean Grange was to blame for not exercising more care than she did, I cannot say that there was not placed upon her a greater difficulty than there should have been placed upon her, by reason of the Forsete coming improperly into the position she did. It was not due entirely to the Ovingdean Grange, because no doubt the barge hampered the Forsete, but then the Forsete ought not to have been in that place, because by coming there she found herself hampered by the barge, and the Ovingdean Grange found herself confronted by difficulty to which she would not have been exposed had not the Forsete been in that place hampered by the barge. For that state of things the Forsete is responsible, having broken the rule, and therefore the conclusion to which I have come is that the Forsete and the Ovingdean Grange are both to blame for this collision.

ADM.]

THE SWIFT.

[ADM.]

Solicitors: for the plaintiffs, Thomas Cooper and Co.; for the defendants, William A. Crump and Son.

March 28 and 29, 1901.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President, and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE SWIFT. (a)

Jurisdiction—Damage done to oyster bed and oysters—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), ss. 7, 35—Sea Fisheries Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 45), ss. 51, 53, 54.

An action in rem will lie under sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 for damage done by a ship to an oyster fishery.

Where a vessel was so negligently navigated that in passing over an oyster bed, although due notice had been given of it, she took the ground and damaged the bed and oysters on it:

Held, that the owners of the fishery were entitled to recover damages for the injury to the bed and the oysters.

THIS was an action in rem brought by the Whitstable Oyster Fishery Company against the defendants, who were owners of the Norwegian brigantine Swift, for damages for injuries done to their oyster bed and oysters.

The material facts were as follows:—

About 12.30 p.m. on the 30th Sept. 1900, the Swift, while on a voyage from Fredrikstad to Faversham with a cargo of boards, was making for the East Swale, at the mouth of the river Thames. The weather was fine and clear, the wind a fresh breeze from the S.W., and the tide about two hours before high-water ordinary neaps, and the Swift, which was drawing 12ft. 2in. aft, was standing in on the starboard tack over the defendants' oyster bed towards the Whitstable shore, when she touched the ground aft in 12ft. of water. She then fell off slowly before the wind, came round under a starboard helm, and as she filled on the port tack dragged over the ground. Finally she got away to the northward and anchored in deep water.

About the middle of the north or sea boundary of the oyster beds a watch-boat was stationed, and the Swift was boarded by the crew, who made a complaint and subsequently reported that the master of the Swift had neglected to keep away when hailed by them that there was not sufficient water for her at the then state of the tide.

Evidence was called by the plaintiffs that the oyster beds had been injured by the grounding of the defendants' ship, and that large quantities of oysters had been destroyed.

The defendants did not dispute the title of the plaintiffs to the ownership of the oyster beds (b),

(a) Reported by CHRISTOPHER HEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b) The oyster fishery and beds lying below low-water mark are parcel of the Manor of Whitstable. For a full account of the fishery and its history see The Free Fishers of Whitstable v. Foreman, 16 L. T. Rep. 747, at p. 748; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 688, at pp. 694 to 704. The company was reconstituted by the Whitstable Oyster Fishery Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. xli.).

ADM.]

THE SWIFT.

[ADM.]

but contended that the Swift was being lawfully navigated without negligence at the mouth of a tidal river; that the ordinary user of the river as a public highway involved the right of grounding; that the master of the vessel, being a foreigner, had no knowledge, or in fact notice, that there was property under the water which would be injured by attempting to pass over it at that particular state of the tide; that there was no indication on the published charts of the existence of the oyster beds, nor were the limits of the fishery property marked by buoys and beacons. They also alleged that the chief purpose of the watch-boat being stationed where it was, was to prevent the oysters being stolen, and only a few of the beacons which should have indicated the boundary of the beds were standing above water, so that there was no proper indication of what the limits of the fishery were. It was further contended by the defendants that an action in rem in respect of the alleged damage to the oysters would not lie, for, at the time of the passing of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, there was no property in oysters as they were animalia feræ naturæ, so that this could not be such "damage done by a ship" as was contemplated by that statute. Further, that when the Sea Fisheries Act 1868 gave property in oysters by sect. 51, it provided a remedy in sect. 53, and limited that remedy to personal proceedings against the master of the ship or other person actually committing an offence against the Act.

By sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10):

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship.

Sect. 35 is as follows:

The jurisdiction conferred by this Act on the High Court of Admiralty may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or proceedings in personam.

Sects. 51, 53, and 54 of the Sea Fisheries Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 45) are as follows:

Sect. 51. All oysters . . . being in or on any private oyster bed which is owned by any person independently of this Act, and is sufficiently marked out or sufficiently known as such, shall be the absolute property of . . . such owner . . . and in all courts of law and equity and elsewhere, and for all purposes, civil, criminal, or other, shall be deemed to be in the actual possession of . . . such owner. . . .

Sect. 53. It shall not be lawful for any person other than the . . . owner of any such private oyster bed, his agents, servants, and workmen, within the limits of such bed . . . except for a lawful purpose of navigation or anchorage:—To disturb or injure in any manner, except as last aforesaid, any oyster . . . bed, or oysters . . . or the oyster . . . fishery. And if any person does any act in contravention of this section he shall be liable to the following penalty, namely, to a penalty not exceeding two pounds for the first offence, and not exceeding five pounds for the second offence; and not exceeding ten pounds for the third and every subsequent offence; and every such person shall also be liable to make full compensation to the . . . owner . . . for all damage sustained by . . . him by reason of his unlawful act, and in default of payment the same may be recovered from him by the . . . owner . . . by proceedings in any court of competent jurisdiction (but not in a summary manner), whether he has been prosecuted for or convicted of an offence against this section or not.

Sect. 54. Provided always, that nothing in the last foregoing section shall make it unlawful for any person to do any of the things therein mentioned . . . .

(b) In the case of a private oyster bed owned by any person independently of this Act, if it is not sufficiently marked out and known as such.

Aspinall, K.C. and A. E. Nelson for the plaintiffs.

Laing, K.C. and H. Stokes for the defendants, the owners of the Swift.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear above and in the judgment.

The following Acts and cases were referred to:

The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), ss. 7, 35;

The Sea Fisheries Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 45), ss. 51, 53, 54;

Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Q. B. 339;

The Vera Cruz, 52 L. T. Rep. 474; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 386; 10 App. Cas. 59;

The Octavia Stella, 57 L. T. Rep. 632; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 182.

THE PRESIDENT.—This is an action in rem brought in the Admiralty Division for damage done to oyster beds and to oysters, the property of the Whitstable Oyster Fishery Company, and it is brought against the owners of the brigantine Swift. The first question is one of law, namely, whether any such action can lie. I am perfectly clear that it can. Before the Fisheries Act 1868 I confess I should have thought it clear that an action would lie, because, apart from the authority of the decided cases, and the very well-known case of Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke (ubi sup.), I should have thought that where a person has property in the soil of a river and has a right of fishery, if anybody came and disturbed that soil and killed some of the oysters placed there by the owner of the fishery, an action at common law would lie against him, certainly for disturbing the soil, which appears to me to be a case of trespass with its peculiar damage, and, I should have thought, also in respect of the oysters, for they had become the subject of property in the ordinary way, having become reduced into possession. When we get to the Fisheries Act, the matter is perfectly clear. There the law, beyond all question, makes these things property, and therefore under the Fisheries Act we have persons owning property, whose property has, it is alleged, been damaged. The question left for consideration is whether the Admiralty Court gave jurisdiction of this particular kind—namely, to arrest the vessel and proceed afterwards in the Admiralty Court. It gave jurisdiction in rem and in personam, and the question is whether this is damage done by a ship within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act. Against that view the case of The Vera Cruz (ubi sup.) has been cited; but it appears to me a wholly different case. I can well understand that in the case of the Vera Cruz it may have been held, as it was held, that there was no damage done by a ship within the meaning of the Admiralty Act. Lord Campbell's Act gave an action, for the first time, to the executors or representatives of a person whose death had been caused by negligence, in respect of that negligence—that being, for the first time, a cause of action according to law, and the question was whether afterwards, when the Admiralty Court Act passed, the Admiralty Court obtained jurisdiction over such matters. I can understand that that would not be so, because the claim was damage done by a ship, and the House of Lords clearly thought that the damage in that case was not the sort of damage which was contemplated by the Admiralty Court Act. Lord Watson puts the matter simply on that very narrow basis. He said: "I entertain no doubt that a right of action such as that given by Lord Campbell's Act . . . is not damage done by a ship." When the learned judgment of Lord Selborne is read, it is seen that there is good reason for saying that although in the broad sense it was damage done by a ship, it was not damage done by a ship within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act. "No one can say," Lord Selborne says, "that Lord Campbell's Act relates expressly to claims for damage done by ships; and this section in the Act of 1861 relates to that and to nothing else—maritime damage by ships is the subject of that legislation; general injuries resulting in loss of life by wrongful acts, and so forth are the subject of the other. It is not very likely that when the legislation goes on such different lines it should be intended indirectly to affect by the one legislation, and in a peculiar manner, a particular case which may or may not arise under the other legislation." That by no means exhausts the very learned judgment which he delivered, but it appears to me that "damage done by a ship" was exactly what the damage in this case was; and, apart from the special property created in oysters by the Fisheries Act, it appears to me clear that the moment you say that you may have an action, either in rem or in personam, for damage done by a ship, you do bring in damage done not only to other ships but to other property. No doubt the fact that damage was done to piers was mainly had in view when actions for damage done by ships to other kinds of property were introduced, and in principle there appears to be no difference between damage done to fishery ground—belonging to persons or damage done to oysters upon those grounds, belonging to persons, and damage done to piers. Therefore I think it is clear that an action lies in respect of this particular matter.

ADM.]

THE SWIFT.

[ADM.

Then, what is the ground of the action? There is no doubt that this particular area, although owned by the plaintiffs, and although they have a right to lay down oysters in it, is still subject to the ordinary rights of navigation. That was the view expressed in Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke (ubi sup.), and it is sufficiently clear that although you may have a grant of rights of fishery and ownership of the soil, still such rights are not in derogation of the general rights of navigation which exist anterior to and independently of such special and private rights. Therefore the right to own this soil in this particular condition and to keep oysters there is a right which is subject to the ordinary purposes of navigation, and there is no power to exclude ships from passing over that area in the ordinary course of navigation. Indeed, one may go one step further, because if it can be shown that in the ordinary course of navigation it was necessary or proper to touch the soil, whether with the vessel herself or by anchors, in that case there would be such a right of grounding or anchoring, notwithstanding the ownership in the soil or in the oysters upon it. That was decided in the Colchester case, because there what was proved was that in the ordinary course of navigation it was necessary for vessels to ground at least once before getting up to Colchester, because the distance could not be done, as a matter of time, on a single tide. Therefore it was held that the ordinary rights of navigation, in spite of there being an oyster fishery, gave a right to ground under proper circumstances and at a proper time. So, if it could be shown that there was a right of grounding in the ordinary and proper course of navigation that would have been another matter, but in this case it is clear that the grounding was not—it is not suggested that it was—a grounding in the ordinary course of navigation. The master of the Swift never intended she should ground. How far he was negligent may be another matter, but it is clear that this act cannot be justified as an exercise of the ordinary rights of navigation. Under those circumstances was there negligence on his part? It is said that he had no knowledge and no sufficient notice, and need not necessarily have had any, that this was an oyster fishery. I agree it must be proved, not that he actually knew, but that he ought to have known: in other words, you could not show there was negligence, for this purpose, in his touching the ground at any place unless you can show that he knew, or ought to have known, that that was an area within which oysters were or were likely to be placed. In this case was there such knowledge? A great deal has been said about the beacons and marks indicating the area, and consideration of the evidence leads me to think that the beacons—namely those fixed, standing beacons—were at the time when this accident took place undoubtedly deficient. But there were also the floating beacons, though they would not serve the same purpose, because no doubt they are put there rather to divide one class of oyster from another, and they would not convey to anybody so clearly the knowledge that this area was fenced off. Still, they were there, and I am not prepared to say that they would not be sufficient to convey information as to their purpose to a person who was on the alert. But to my mind the matter does not depend upon the particular marks though it is a criticism of that to say that whether they were sufficient or not they were not seen by the captain or the mate of the Swift. Apparently, as far as I can make out, no one on the Swift saw any beacons at all, and that, to my mind, throws a great deal of light upon the case, because it does not show that care which a person navigating those waters ought to use. But the case does not stop there at all, because, to my mind, those on the Swift had, on that particular occasion, clear and distinct warning. Those on the watch-boat Betsy were there for the purpose, among other things, of keeping off ships which in their judgment might be likely to injure the ground, and their evidence is that they waved and hailed. I need not go into the question of whether they hailed, but they certainly have stated here that they gave very clear indications that the vessel approaching ought not to enter that particular area. The answer is a complete denial that any such waving or hailing was seen or heard on board the ship. At any rate, those in the Betsy were sufficiently on the alert, because directly after the vessel came in and, as they say, had been fast on the ground for a little time, they undoubtedly boarded her and made a complaint. The evidence of the captain of

H. OF L.]

WILLIAMS AND OTHERS v. CANTON INSURANCE OFFICE.

[H. OF L

the Swift is very unsatisfactory on that point, because he would not admit that anything of the sort occurred. If, as I have no doubt, they did board the Swift and make a complaint, I think one can go a step further and say that they were keenly alive to their duties. I am therefore disposed to believe that they saw the vessel entering the area in which she was likely to ground, and I cannot help thinking that in those circumstances they did what they say they did—namely, make signs to her to keep out of the oyster ground. The captain of the Swift, although he is in the habit of going to and from Faversham, said he did not know of the presence of these beds. It appears to me difficult to believe that a man in seafaring employment can go to and from Faversham for twenty years—even allowing for the fact of his being a foreigner—without knowing what I should think pretty nearly everybody knows, namely, that there are valuable oyster beds lying just off Whitstable. I am taking the same view as was taken by Lord Hannen in respect of the conduct of the pilot in The Octavia Stella (ubi sup.), and I confess I am quite unable to accept the view that the captain was not, as a mere matter of general knowledge, well aware of the presence of these oyster beds. Therefore I think that, both from general knowledge and from special warning received at the time, the captain knew, or ought to have known, that in entering that particular part of the water he was going upon what was an oyster bed. Then the question is, notwithstanding that, had he reason to suppose that he could go safely over without grounding—was it negligence on his part to take the ground? I think that it was? I think that he should have avoided going into that shelving area, and the Elder Brethren, whom I have consulted, are of the same opinion. I think there is negligence proved against the captain; that he knew or ought to have known of the presence of the oyster beds, and that under the circumstances his grounding was an act of negligence for which his owners are responsible. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs, with a reference to assess the damages.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lowless and Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Stokes and Stokes.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

April 25, 26, and July 22, 1901.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury),
Lords MACNAGHTEN, SHAND, DAVEY, BRAMPTON, ROBERTSON, and LINDLEY.)

WILLIAMS AND OTHERS v. CANTON INSURANCE
OFFICE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine insurance—Insurance on chartered freight—Lien—Cesser clause—Bill of lading freight—Loss by perils of the sea.

A ship was chartered for a specified voyage for a lump freight, payable on delivery of the cargo.

The charter-party provided that the master should sign bills of lading at any rate of freight which the charterers might require, but not under chartered rates, or difference to be settled in cash on signing bills of lading. There was also a clause providing for the cesser of the charterers' liability upon shipment of the cargo provided that the cargo was worth freight, dead freight, and demurrage on arrival at the port of discharge, the vessel to have a lien thereon for the recovery of all freight, dead freight, and demurrage.

The owners insured the lump freight "chartered or as if chartered, as valued, on board or not on board."

A full cargo was shipped, but, owing to the loss of part of it on the voyage by perils of the sea, the bill of lading freight at the port of discharge was not equal to the chartered freight, though the cargo itself was worth more than the chartered freight. The bills of lading preserved no general lien on the cargo.

In an action against the underwriters on the policy to recover the difference between the bill of lading freight and the chartered freight:

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that they were not liable, as there had been no loss of chartered freight by perils of the sea.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Smith, Williams, and Romer, L.J.J.), who had affirmed a judgment of Bruce, J. at the trial before him without a jury.

The case is reported, under the name of Brankelow Steamship Company v. Canton Insurance Office, 81 L. T. Rep 6; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 563; (1899) 2 Q. B. 178.

The action was brought by the appellants, the owners of the steamship Ramleh, against the underwriters of a policy of insurance upon chartered freight.

The facts are set out sufficiently in the head-note above, and more fully in the judgment of Lord Brampton.

J. Walton, K.C., Pickford, K.C., and Horridge, K.C., for the appellants, contended that the courts below were wrong in saying that only "bill of lading freight" had been lost by the perils insured against and not "chartered freight," and that if chartered freight was lost it was by the act of the master in signing bills of lading in the form in which they were signed. Where a policy refers to chartered freight the underwriter must be taken to contract with reference to the charter: (see The Alps, 68 L. T. Rep. 624; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 337; (1893) P. 109) which followed Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff, 47 L. T. Rep. 581; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 419; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 6; 7 App. Cas. 670). Therefore the respondents must be taken to have notice of the clause as to signing bills of lading, which were in the ordinary form. If a cargo was loaded under bills of lading under which the freight was 3000*l.* on arrival the charterer is not liable, but the owner is entitled to the bill of lading freight, and has a lien. The goods were lost and he lost the lien, and so lost the 600*l.*, the difference between the chartered freight and the bill of lading freight, which he cannot recover any other way. The loss is really a loss of chartered freight by perils of the seas; but if it is only bill of lading freight it is covered by the policy, which was on freight "chartered or as if chartered."

H. OF L.]

WILLIAMS AND OTHERS v. CANTON INSURANCE OFFICE.

[H. OF L.]

Curver, K.C. and J. A. Hamilton, K.C., for the respondents, maintained that there was in fact no loss of chartered freight. The cesser clause did not exonerate the charterers from the payment of the lump freight unless the correlative lien was effective. This was settled by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hansen v. Harrold (70 L. T. Rep. 475; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 464; (1894) 1 Q. B. 612), which practically overruled French v. Gerber (36 L. T. Rep. 350; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; 2 C. P. Div. 247): (see also the Scotch case of Arospe v. Barr, 8 R. 602). The respondents are not concerned with bill of lading freight. The appellants are in this dilemma: either the charterers are still liable for the freight, or the loss was caused by the act of their agent, the master, which is not a peril insured against. The following cases were also referred to:

Bensaude v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company, 77 L. T. Rep. 282; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 315; (1897) A. C. 609;

Turnbull, Martin, and Co. v. Hull Underwriters' Association, 82 L. T. Rep. 818; (1900) 2 Q. B. 402;

The Bedouin, 69 L. T. Rep. 782; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391; (1894) P. 1;

Wilson v. Jones, 15 L. T. Rep. 669; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 452; L. Rep. 2 Ex. 139;

Clink v. Radford, 64 L. T. Rep. 491; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 10; (1891) 1 Q. B. 625;

Dunlop v. Balfour and Co., 66 L. T. Rep. 455; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 181; (1892) 1 Q. B. 507;

Barber v. Fleming, L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 59.

J. Walton, K.C. in reply.—Hansen v. Harrold goes too far, and should be overruled. Gardner v. Trechmann (53 L. T. Rep. 518; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 558; 15 Q. B. Div. 154) is in the appellants' favour.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 22.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: A vessel called the Ramleh, owned by the Brankelow Steamship Company, was chartered at a lump sum freight. The charter was for a voyage from the River Plate to Liverpool and the freight by the charter-party was a lump sum of 3000*l.* A cesser clause provided that the charterers' liability was to cease upon shipment of the cargo, "provided said cargo is worth the freight, dead freight, and demurrage on arrival at the port of discharge, but vessel to have a lien thereon for recovery of all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and all other charges whatsoever." It is not denied that the vessel arrived at her port of discharge, Liverpool, worth the freight due. A claim is now made under a policy of insurance which was effected with the Canton Insurance Company against perils of the sea upon freight "chartered or as if chartered." These words "or as if chartered" have, to my mind, no meaning where there is, as in this case, a chartered freight, and if they have any meaning at all in other cases, of which I have some doubt, I decline to speculate as to what their meaning would be in a case different from the present. The chartered freight was earned so far as the charter itself was concerned, and if the whole charterers' freight has not been realised it has not been by any fault of the sea that this has occurred, and I am very clearly of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right and ought to be affirmed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I agree. I think that the judgment of Smith, L.J. is perfectly right. It seems to me to be clear that the insurance was upon the chartered freight. Whatever may be the meaning of the expression "freight chartered or as if chartered," the subject of the insurance was the lump sum freight valued at 3000*l.*—that and nothing else. I also think that one of two things has happened. Either this freight has not been lost and the charterers are liable to pay the full sum, or the loss has occurred not from perils of the sea, but in consequence of the form in which the bills of lading were taken. It seems to me that it is not desirable to discuss the question whether the cesser clause in the charter-party became operative, because that question may possibly have to be determined between the shipowners and the charterers. I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I think that the subject of the insurance is what has been called "chartered freight" only, and that it does not cover loss of the bills of lading freight. The charterer therefore cannot recover in this action. In the case of The Bedouin (69 L. T. Rep. 782; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391; (1894) P. 1) Lord Esher, M.R. held that the words "freight chartered and (or) as if chartered on board or not on board," which was the description of the risk insured in that case, was an elliptical expression for chartered freight or as if chartered on goods on board or not on board. "If there were any difficulty at all," he says, "in construing the words 'and (or) as if chartered,' it seems to me that these words 'on board or not on board' do conclusively show it must be chartered freight; because, if there is no charter, or no contract equivalent to a charter, there cannot be freight payable on goods not on board." This observation appears to me to be well founded. There are similar words in the policy before us, and I am therefore of opinion that the subject of the insurance was chartered freight, and nothing else. But can the owners recover? The 18th clause of the charter-party is not very clearly expressed. But I think that it was intended that the lien of the vessel for the chartered freight should extend to the whole of the cargo, and that an arrangement which conferred separate liens on the bills of lading freights payable on the several portions of the cargo, and therefore indirectly on those several portions only, was not a compliance with the contract. Otherwise, I do not understand the meaning of the proviso that the "said cargo is worth the freight, dead freight and demurrage, on arrival at port of discharge." The proximate cause of the loss to the owners (if they have suffered any) is from their having parted with the liability of the charterers without securing to themselves the lien for which they stipulated in the charter-party. Whose fault was this? I think that counsel for the respondents succeeded in placing his opponent in a dilemma. Either the master of the vessel deliberately or otherwise signed bills of lading in a form which he was not bound to accept and without reserving the entire lien, in which case the owners have suffered a loss from the act of their agent, which is not a risk insured against; or the master could not help himself, and was obliged to sign the bill of lading which the charterers required him to sign, in which case the charterers remain liable if (as counsel contended) the words "but vessel to have a lien thereon," &c., are to be read as a condition precedent to the cesser of liability. Quite apart from the decision in Hansen v. Harrold (70 L. T. Rep. 475; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 464; (1894) 1 Q. B. 612), the words of the 18th clause rather favour this construction. For the cesser of liability is not to be definitive until arrival of the ship at the port of discharge, the cargo being then worth the freight and demurrage. Reading the words in brackets with the subsequent words, they may mean provided that the cargo is sufficient on arrival, and the vessel has a lien thereon. Counsel for the appellants says that the case of Hansen v. Harrold went too far, and ought to be overruled. I certainly have no prejudice in favour of a decision to which I was a party, and I am perfectly prepared to review it, and, if necessary, to say that it is wrong. But no such necessity exists in the present case, as I believe that this House agrees with the Court of Appeal in holding that counsel for the appellants is impaled on the first horn of the dilemma put by counsel for the respondents.

LORD BRAMPTON.—My Lords: This action is brought by the Brankelow Steamship Company, the owners of a vessel called the Ramleh, and Williams and Co., the charterers of that vessel, to recover from the respondents a sum of 614*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.*, as representing an alleged loss by perils of the sea of a part of a lump freight of 3000*l.* insured against such perils by a policy of insurance made by the respondent company. By a charter-party, dated the 17th Sept. 1896, the appellants, Williams and Co., chartered the Ramleh to load a full and complete cargo at Buenos Ayres, to proceed to Liverpool, and there deliver the same, the agreed freight being the lump sum of 3000*l.*, payable as to a portion for ship's use at port of loading, and the balance in cash on the delivery of the cargo. In the charter-party there was a clause stipulating that the master should apply at the offices of the charterers or their agents to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight the charterers might require, but not under chartered rates; and the charterer's liability was to cease on shipment of the cargo (provided the said cargo was worth the freight, dead freight, and demurrage on arrival at the port of discharge); but the vessel to have a lien thereon for recovery of all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and all other charges whatsoever. On the 11th Nov. 1896 a policy of insurance was effected with the respondent office against perils of the sea upon freight chartered, or as if chartered, valued at 3000*l.* on board or not on board. It must be taken as an admitted fact that the brokers, when effecting this policy, were acting on behalf of and were making an insurance to cover the interests of all the plaintiffs. But of course, that is no admission that the charterers had in fact any such interest as would enable them to sue on the policy, nor can it extend the subject of the insurance beyond the language of the policy. The charterers availed themselves of the bills of lading clause, and under it bills of lading were signed by the master in respect of the whole of the goods which were shipped as the cargo. The aggregate of these bills of lading freights amounted to a sum exceeding the chartered lump freight of 3000*l.* The Ramleh left Buenos Ayres with a full cargo as stipulated and proceeded on her voyage. During the voyage a portion of the cargo for which bills of lading to the amount of 645*l.* had been given was lost by perils of the sea, but the Ramleh continued on her way and arrived at Liverpool, and there landed the remainder of her cargo, which was then still worth the freight, dead freight, and demurrage. Upon such freights as might become due on the bills of lading the vessel had no doubt a lien, but it was not a lien upon the whole cargo for the lump freight as stipulated in the charter-party, but a lien limited to the amount due on each separate bill of lading, the aggregate of which then amounted to only 2385*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.*; that is to say, in other words, the cargo was worth over 3000*l.*, amply sufficient to cover all the lump freight; whereas the bills of lading freights, upon which alone the ship had a lien, amounted only to 2385*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.*, leaving a deficiency of 614*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.*, to recover which this action was brought.

The only question for the consideration of this House is whether that deficiency ought in law to be treated as a loss by perils of the sea. In dealing with the subject of the insurer's liability under the policy, it must be assumed that it was made by the respondent insurance office, having regard to the terms of the charter-party; these could not fail to be important in determining the premium to be charged for the risk to be undertaken. In this case the sole subject-matter of insurance was the lump freight, and the sole undertaking was to indemnify the owner against loss by perils of the sea of any portion of it. By this policy there was no insurance of the ship, nor of any of the goods forming the cargo, nor of any bills of lading freights, nor so far as I can see was it material to the insurers whether the cargo was shipped by the charterers themselves, for the carriage of which they were to pay the lump sum of 3000*l.* to the owners of the ship, or whether it was made up of numerous shipments by various shippers under bills of lading, so long as the owners had the personal responsibility of the charterers, unless and until the Ramleh arrived at Liverpool with a cargo worth the freight due, and on such arrival had a lien on all such cargo for all freight. That the vessel did arrive with a cargo fully worth such freight is conceded, and if the stipulation as to the vessel's lien thereon as contained in the charter-party had remained available, her owners, the appellant company, would have had the satisfaction for the freight for which it had stipulated, and there would have been no loss at all of any part of it. To what, then, is this deficiency or loss to be attributed? And how came it to pass that the lien as given by the charter-party was so limited as to be unavailable, except for the aggregate amount of the bills of lading freights? The true answers to these questions were given by Bruce, J., by whom the case was tried without a jury, and by the Court of Appeal. I adopt the language of Smith, L.J. which very clearly states the position thus: "By whose act was it that the plaintiffs, the shipowners, had not a lien upon the cargo which arrived for all the lump chartered freight (the cargo which arrived being ample to secure this)? Surely that of the shipowners themselves, by not taking bills of lading with either the words 'freight and all other conditions as per charter-party' therein, or in some other form giving to themselves a lien over the whole cargo which arrived for the recovery of 'all freight' as mentioned in the cesser clause." Suppose every part of the cargo actually shipped had been the sole property of the charterers, and had been loaded by them or their agents in strict accordance with the terms of the charter-party and without any bill of lading at all, that a loss to the same amount of the cargo had occurred by perils of the sea, but that the remainder of the cargo being still, notwithstanding that loss, worth, and amply sufficient to satisfy, the lump freight, had arrived safely at Liverpool and come to the hands of the owners: would it not have been a little against good sense to say that the lump freight, which, according to the intention of both owner and charterers, had been liquidated by means of the lien on the cargo which arrived, had been lost by perils of the sea? I am very much disposed to think that in using in the policy the words "freight chartered or as if chartered," it was intended by the framers of and the parties to it, that, whatever the facts might be, whether the ship was wholly loaded by the charterers or wholly or partly under bills of lading by other shippers, the whole was to be treated for the purposes of the policy as one entire undivided cargo, loaded by the charterers, to be carried for that one lump freight. No doubt there was a loss of a substantial portion of the cargo by perils of the sea, and this occasioned to the owners of the goods a loss to that extent, and to the charterers a loss of their bills of lading freights. For these losses there may or there may not have been insurances by the persons concerned, but they certainly were not losses covered by this policy. The only contract made by the respondent insurers with the owners of the ship was to pay to them any loss occasioned by perils of the sea of the lump freight; but such loss could only happen in case of the arrival of the cargo so reduced by perils of the sea that its worth was less than that of the freight, dead freight, and demurrage. Such a contingency did not happen, and therefore the insurers are not liable, the loss (if any) which the owners have sustained being due not to any insufficiency in the worth of the cargo which arrived, but because they and the charterers, by the bills of lading under which the cargo was shipped, had deprived the owners of the lien stipulated for in the charter-party, and limited it to the amount of the freight due on the bills of lading, the aggregate of which was less, by the sum claimed, than the lump freight due. For these reasons I think that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord LINDLEY.—My Lords: The words in the policy, "chartered or as if chartered" have given rise to this litigation, and your Lordships will have to determine their real meaning and their effect when applied to the facts of this case. The policy does not in terms refer to any particular charter-party, but there is a charter-party to which it has to be applied, and the provisions of which must be regarded: (see Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff, 47 L. T. Rep. 581; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 6; 7 App. Cas. 670). That charter-party is dated the 17th Sept. 1896, and had been entered into before the policy was effected. By this charter-party the ship was chartered by the plaintiffs, her owners, to their co-plaintiffs, her charterers, for the voyage mentioned in the policy. She was to be loaded with a full and complete cargo. The freight was to be the lump sum of 3000*l.*, payable on the right and true delivery of the cargo. Perils of the sea and other perils were excepted, as usual (clause 8). There was a provision (18) requiring the master to sign bills of lading "at any rate of freight the charterers or their agents may require, but not under chartered rates." It was also stated "charterers' liability to cease upon shipment of the cargo (provided said cargo is worth the freight, dead freight, and demurrage on arrival at the port of discharge), but vessel to have a lien thereon for recovery of all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and all other charges whatsoever." Your Lordships will observe that under this charter-party two freights might become payable. First there is the lump sum of 3000*l.*, expressly mentioned in the charter-party, payable by the charterers to the owners; and for this the owners had a lien on the whole and every part of the cargo. There can be no doubt that the policy covered this freight, and that if it or any of it has been lost by perils of the sea the shipowners can recover the loss from the underwriters. But your Lordships will also observe that in this lump sum chartered freight the charterers had no beneficial interest. They might have insured against their liability to pay it, but it is plain that the policy was not effected to cover, and does not cover, any such risk as that. Then there might be (and, in fact, there was) the freight payable under bills of lading issued by the master pursuant to the 18th clause. This freight was very different from the lump sum chartered freight. The bills of lading freights were payable by the consignees of the cargo; their total was not one sum of 3000*l.*, but was the aggregate of the various sums payable in respect of the particular goods for which the bills of lading were respectively given; and, what is very important, there would be no lien on all the goods, for all the freight, whether chartered or bill of lading, unless such lien was expressly given by each bill of lading signed by the master. This bill of lading freight further differed very materially from the lump sum chartered freight; for if goods were jettisoned in the course of the voyage (as, in fact, some were), the right to be paid the bill of lading freight in respect of those goods would be lost by perils of the sea, whilst the right to be paid the lump sum chartered freight in full would still remain. A lump sum freight is a definite sum agreed to be paid for the hire of a ship for a specified voyage; and although only payable on the right and true delivery of the cargo, those words are not taken literally, but are understood to mean right and true delivery having regard to and excluding the excepted perils. In other words, the cargo does not mean the cargo shipped but the cargo which the shipowner undertakes to deliver. The non-delivery of some of it affords no defence to a claim for the lump sum freight, although such non-delivery, if wrongful, will give rise to a cross-action. This was settled by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage (29 L. T. Rep. 809; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 185; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 99), which followed a decision to the same effect by the Privy Council in The Norway (3 Moo. P. C. N. S. 245). It follows that if the bills of lading signed by the master had not been in such a form as to destroy the lien given by the charter-party for the lump sum freight on the whole cargo, such lien would have extended to the whole cargo ultimately landed; and if the value of the cargo landed had exceeded the lump sum freight, no part of such freight would have been lost by the shipowner, and he would have had no claim whatever against the underwriters in respect of it. Both the shipowners and the charterers were beneficially interested in the bills of lading freights. They were a security to the shipowners for the lump sum chartered freight, and the surplus of the bills of lading freights belonged to the charterers. But the two freights cannot be regarded as practically the same. The risks run by insuring them are substantially different. If the chartered freight had been a pro rata freight—i.e., so much a ton—a partial loss of cargo would have involved a partial loss of freight, and it might have been indifferent to the underwriters under which document the freight was payable. But where, as in this case, the chartered freight is a lump sum, and therefore payable in full, although some cargo is lost, a partial loss of cargo may not involve any loss of freight whatever. Indeed, as I have already pointed out, if as here there is a lien for the whole lump sum on the whole cargo, a partial loss of cargo can only affect the underwriters of a policy on the freight if the cargo landed is of less value than the lump sum. A partial loss of cargo will not affect them even then, if the charterer is personally liable for the difference; for the underwriters do not insure his solvency. It is clear, then, that the risk of insuring a lump sum freight is very different from the risk of insuring freight of the same amount, but apportioned by bills of lading, and accordingly liable to partial loss in the event of a partial loss of cargo.

I proceed to state the circumstances under which the loss sought to be recovered in this action arose. A full cargo was shipped. The master signed bills of lading for goods mentioned in them, and by these bills of lading freight was made payable in respect of those goods on delivery, but no lien on those goods for any other freight was created or preserved. The lien given by the charter-party for the lump sum freight could not be exercised against the holders of the bills of lading; it was practically extinguished. Some goods were jettisoned on the voyage, and those goods, and the freights payable in respect of them under the bills of lading given for them, were lost, and were lost by perils of the sea. The ship, however, arrived at her destination safely with the rest of her cargo. The value of the cargo which arrived exceeded the lump sum chartered freight; so that the shipowners' lien for that freight could have been asserted if such lien had not been lost by the issue of bills of lading which did not refer to it. It is plain from this statement that the lump sum chartered freight has not been lost by any of the perils assured against. If the bills of lading had not been issued in such a form as to extinguish the lien for the lump sum chartered freight it would not have been lost at all; for even assuming that the charterers' personal liability for the lump sum freight had ceased under clause 18 of the charter-party, still the loss of some of the cargo by perils of the sea did not occasion the loss of the chartered freight or any part of it. The cargo which arrived was worth more than the amount of the chartered freight, and would have been an available security for it. Unless, therefore, the policy covers the bills of lading freights as well as the lump sum chartered freight, the plaintiffs' claim cannot be supported. This brings me to the last question, which is, Do the words "freight chartered or as if chartered" cover or include the bills of lading freights, either together with or in substitution for the lump sum chartered freight? I cannot think that they do. The term "chartered freight" is free from ambiguity, and means the freight, if any, made payable by the terms of the charter-party—that is, in this case the lump sum of 3000*l.* The phrase "chartered or as if chartered" is alternative in form; if there is a chartered freight for certain goods or for a certain space in the ship, that is the freight insured, and no other freight for the same goods or space can be added to it or substituted for it if the underwriters' risk is altered. The alternative "or as if chartered" applies to freight, or what in business is treated as freight although not made payable by the express terms of any charter-party—for example, if the shipowner carries other people's goods without a charter-party, or perhaps if he carries his own goods. The phrase "as if chartered" would also cover freight payable under a charter-party entered into after the date of the policy, if the policy without those words would not extend to such freight. Counsel for the appellants relied strongly on the fact that in this case the policy was admittedly entered into on behalf of both shipowners and charterers, and that the only freight the charterers had a beneficial interest in was the bills of lading freights. But the interests of the assured were not disclosed to the underwriters, who, so far as appears, knew nothing of the parties interested, and the fact that the charterers had no beneficial interest in the chartered freight to which the policy plainly does apply cannot justify any court in straining the language of the policy so as to include a different subject-matter involving a different risk. If in this case the words of the policy do not apply to the bills of lading freights, if those words must be confined to the lump sum chartered freight, there is an end of this case; for no part of that freight has been lost by perils of the sea, although, undoubtedly, some of it has been lost for other reasons. It is unnecessary to consider whether, as counsel for the respondent contended, the charterers are personally liable to the shipowners for this loss, on the ground that the shipowners had no effective lien on the cargo landed for the whole of the chartered freight; or whether, as counsel for the appellant contended, the charterers are relieved from liability by the 18th clause of the charter-party properly construed, notwithstanding Hansen v. Harrold (ubi sup.) on which he relied. I purposely, therefore, pass over that question. The short but conclusive answer to the plaintiffs' claim is that the freight insured has not been lost by any of the perils insured against; and that the freight which has been lost by those perils is not the freight insured. This is the view taken by Bruce, J. and by the Court of Appeal, and their decision ought to be affirmed with costs. Lord Robertson has asked me to say that he concurs in the decision.

PRIV. CO.] THE CHITTAGONG; OWNERS SS. KOSTROMA v. OWNERS SS. CHITTAGONG. [PRIV. CO.]

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords: Lord Shand desires me to say that he concurs in the judgment proposed.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Pritchard, Englefield, and Co., for Simpson, North, Harley, and Birkett, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondents, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whetton.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

July 2 and 27, 1901.

(Present: Lords HOBHOUSE, DAVEY, JAMES OF HEREFORD, ROBERTSON, and Sir RICHARD COUCH.)

THE CHITTAGONG; OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP KOSTROMA v. OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP CHITTAGONG (a)

ON APPEAL FROM HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S COURT AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

Collision—Bosphorus—Crossing ships.

The steamship C., whilst turning at night in the Bosphorus under a port helm, opened her green and masthead lights on the port bow of the steamship K., which was coming up the Bosphorus in her proper water. About the same time the C. sounded two short blasts and starboarded her helm, to which the K. replied with one short blast and ported her helm. The vessels collided.

Held, the C. was alone to blame.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, sitting in vice-Admiralty in an action for damages by collision.

The collision took place a little to the northward of Leander Tower and, as the learned judge found, on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus. The Chittagong was a British steamship of 1912 tons gross register, and, at the time of the collision, was on a voyage from Batoum to Singapore with a cargo of petroleum; the Kostroma was a Russian steamship belonging to the Russian Volunteer Fleet, and, at the time, was on a voyage from Vladivostock to Odessa with a cargo of tea and copra, and had twenty-seven passengers on board.

The case of the appellants, the owners of the Chittagong, was that at about 6.30 p.m. on the 4th March 1900 she came to an anchorage in the course of her voyage just below the Palace of Dolma Bagtche heading up the Bosphorus, and remained there until about 10.30 p.m. the same evening, when she weighed anchor. The weather was dark but clear, the wind a light breeze from the northward, and there was a strong current setting down the Bosphorus towards the Sea of Marmora of the force of about four knots an hour. After proceeding slow ahead for a short time to gather sufficient way, she sounded her whistle and proceeded to turn under a hard-a-port helm. Whilst so doing the masthead and red lights of the Kostroma were seen about one and a half to two miles off. The Chittagong continued to turn, and by the time she had come round on to her course the green light of the Kostroma came into view on the starboard bow, and the red was shut in. The Chittagong was then in about the middle of the navigable channel, and her engines were put full speed ahead, and the helm steadied on a course of about S.S.W. The vessels then continued to approach one another, green to green, for three or four minutes, when the Kostroma suddenly opened her red light about three points on the starboard bow of the Chittagong, and nearly half a mile distant. The helm of the Chittagong was put hard-a-starboard and two short blasts sounded on her whistle, to which the Kostroma replied with one short blast, whereupon the engines of the Chittagong were immediately stopped and reversed, three short blasts were sounded on her whistle, and the helm steadied, but the Kostroma came on across her bows, and with her port side about amidships struck the stem of the Chittagong.

The appellants charge the Kostroma with entering the Bosphorus on the wrong side of the channel, and with improperly porting her helm when the vessels were green to green.

The case on behalf of the respondents, the owners of the Kostroma, was that she was coming up from the Sea of Marmora, making ten or eleven knots an hour on a course of N. 16 degrees E., and when abeam of Leander's Tower, the course was altered to N. 42 degrees E. in order to proceed up the Bosphorus. Vessels are not ordinarily allowed to pass through the Bosphorus at night, and usually anchor on the European side, but vessels of the Russian Volunteer Fleet have the privilege of passing through at night. After keeping on this course for about a minute, a faint green light, which proved to be the green light of the Chittagong, came into sight two or three points on the port bow of the Kostroma, and about the same time two short blasts were heard from the Chittagong. The Kostroma thereupon sounded a single short blast, and her helm was put hard-a-port. The Chittagong then sounded two more short blasts, which were replied to by those on board the Kostroma by another short blast signal, but the Chittagong continued to come on showing her green light, and although, when she was close up, the helm of the Kostroma was put hard-a-starboard to swing her stern clear if possible, the collision occurred.

The respondents charged the appellants with neglecting to keep a proper look-out, with leaving her anchorage at a wrong time and being navigated on the wrong side of the Bosphorus, with altering her course to starboard after giving a two-blast signal, with not keeping out of the way of the Kostroma, and with not stopping and reversing her engines in due time, if at all.

At the trial of the action, O'Malley, J. held that the Kostroma was not to blame for altering her course in the first instance, as, owing to the heading of the Chittagong during the greater part of the manœuvre of turning, her green light would not be visible to those on board the Kostroma before the helm was altered. He also held that, although the Chittagong at the time the Kostroma altered her course was on the wrong side of the channel, she was lawfully where she was, but that she committed a breach of art. 19 of the regulations in not keeping out of the way of the Kostroma, which was then a crossing ship, and further failed to comply with art. 23 in not stopping and reversing sooner than she did. He therefore held the Chittagong alone to blame for the collision.

PRIV. CO.] THE CHITTAGONG; OWNERS SS. KOSTROMA v. OWNERS SS. CHITTAGONG. [PRIV. CO.

From this decision the defendants, the owners of the Chittagong, appealed.

Art. 19 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is as follows :

When two steam vessels are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the vessel which has the other or her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Art. 23 is as follows :

Every steam vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, on approaching her, if necessary, slacken her speed or stop or reverse.

Art. 25 is as follows :

In narrow channels every steam vessel shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such vessel.

Aspinall, K.C. and Dawson Miller for the appellants.—The evidence shows that the Kostroma was coming up on the wrong side of the navigable channel in breach of art. 25 of the regulations. There was a bad look-out on board the Kostroma, and she ought to have seen the green light of the Chittagong before she altered her course. If she did see the green light of the Chittagong on her port bow, it was obvious the vessels were crossing vessels, and it was then her duty to keep her course and speed. It is admitted, however, that on hearing the two blasts from the Chittagong she hard-a-ported her helm, and afterwards it was put hard-a-starboard. Assuming art. 19 did not apply, then there was no duty on the part of the Chittagong to keep out of the way of the Kostroma, and the Kostroma ought not to have ported to her green light. All the evidence shows that the Chittagong stopped and reversed her engines as soon as there was danger of collision.

Joseph Walton, K.C. and Dr. Stubbs, for the respondents, were not called upon.

July 27.—The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD.—This is an appeal from a judgment or order of the Consular Court of Constantinople, dated the 1st Aug. 1901, whereby the appellants—the defendants in the suit—were declared to be liable in consequence of a collision between the above-named two vessels having been caused by the negligent navigation of the appellants' vessel the Chittagong. The collision in question occurred under the following circumstances: On the 4th March 1900 the Chittagong was anchored in the Bosphorus on the western or European side below the Palace of Dolma Bagtche. She was lying at the usual anchorage ground heading up the Bosphorus. In order to continue her voyage to Singapore, about 10.30 in the evening of the 4th March, she weighed her anchor, and after steaming slowly ahead for a short distance she proceeded to turn short round. At this time the Kostroma was coming up the Bosphorus from the Sea of Marmora, and the Chittagong would whilst turning be running across her course. It seems to be admitted that the Chittagong was by her movement on a wrong course or in a wrong position, whilst the Kostroma was on a right course. But on the part of the Chittagong it was urged at the bar that although by putting her helm a-starboard she was on a wrong course, the Kostroma, by observing the lights or by giving heed to "the two blasts" from the Chittagong, could have ascertained, without doubt, the course the Chittagong was taking, and could have avoided the collision by altering or deviating from the right course on which she was. It was, however, answered that the lights of the Kostroma were open to the observation of those on board the Chittagong, and the one short blast given twice from the former vessel was a distinct notice that she was continuing on her course. The judge in the court below came to the conclusion that, under the circumstances, the Chittagong should have ported her helm, and that if this had been done the collision might not have occurred. Their Lordships also are of opinion that the collision was solely occasioned by the negligence of those on board the Chittagong. Whilst it is not a decisive fact, yet it is most important in its effect that the Chittagong was pursuing a wrong course at the time of the collision, and that such wrong course ought not to have been persisted in after it was known that the Kostroma had not altered hers. This latter vessel, being on her right course, was justified in assuming that the Chittagong would give way and not persist, after being warned, in following a wrong course. Their Lordships are informed by the nautical assessors who have been present during the hearing of the case that the initial fault of the Chittagong was in having tried to make too sharp a turn, and they also expressed a strong opinion that there was negligence on the part of those who had charge of the Chittagong in not reversing her engines and going astern when they found that the Kostroma was pursuing her course. Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise His Majesty that the judgment of the court below should be confirmed, and that the appeal should be dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs of the appeal.

Solicitors for appellants, Botterell and Roche.

Solicitors for respondents, Jull, Godfrey, and Danvers.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

June 13, 14, Aug. 3 and 9, 1901.

(Before SMITH, M.R., WILLIAMS and STIRLING, L.J.J.)

BALMORAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. MARTEN. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance (marine)—Valued policy—Ship valued in policy at less than real value—General average loss—Salvage—Adjustment on basis of real value—Liability of underwriters.

*When a ship is insured for the full agreed value under a valued policy of insurance, and a general average loss is sustained, or a salvage award is paid, by the owners based upon a value larger than the value in the policy, the underwriters are not bound to pay the whole loss, but are bound to pay only in the proportion which the value in the policy bears to the value upon which the general average loss or the salvage award has been based. A ship was insured for 33,000*l.*, and was valued in the policy at that sum. A general average loss was sustained, and a salvage award was paid, by the owners upon the real value of the ship, which was 40,000*l.

Hold (affirming the judgment of Bigham, J.), that the underwriters were liable to pay only thirty-three-fortieths of the general average loss and of the salvage charges.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action as a commercial cause without a jury.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Balmoral, and they brought this action against the defendant, an underwriter, upon a policy of insurance upon the Balmoral, which had been underwritten by the defendant.

The Balmoral was insured by the policy for twelve months from the 5th Dec. 1898 to the 5th Dec. 1899 for 33,000*l.*, and by agreement the vessel was valued in the policy at 33,000*l.*

In June 1899, during the currency of the policy, while the vessel was on a voyage from Philadelphia to London with a general cargo, salvage services were rendered to her by the Amroth Castle.

On the 27th June an action was commenced by the owners of the Amroth Castle, for the recovery of salvage, against the owners of the Balmoral, her cargo and freight.

In that action the owners of the Balmoral were condemned to pay 500*l.* for salvage services to the ship and her cargo, together with costs and interest amounting to about 136*l.*

In that action the value of the Balmoral was stated by the owners to be 40,000*l.*, and that value was agreed between the owners and the salvors to be the value of the ship, by way of compromise to save the expense of a valuation.

Also during the currency of the policy a general average loss was sustained and general average expenses were incurred.

In adjusting the general average and salvage charges, the contributory value of the ship was taken at 40,000*l.*

The plaintiffs claimed to be reimbursed by the underwriters the whole of the ship's share of the salvage expenses and of the general average expenses. The underwriters refused to pay more than thirty-three-fortieths of these amounts, upon the ground that the salvage award and the general average contribution were based upon a value of 40,000*l.*, and the ship was insured for 33,000*l.* only.

At the trial Mr. Dawson, an average adjuster of many years' experience, gave evidence on behalf of the defendant to the effect that there was a well-known practice among English underwriters, extending over a long time, that when a vessel was insured for a sum less than the contributory value upon which general average was adjusted, or less than the amount at which the vessel was valued in a salvage action, the underwriters were only liable to pay in the proportion of the insured value to the contributory value or salvage value.

The plaintiffs contended that evidence as to this practice was not admissible, and that the alleged practice was wrong in law.

The action was tried before Bigham, J. without a jury, as a commercial cause, and the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the defendant (33 L. T. Rep. 283; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 139).

The plaintiffs appealed.

Joseph Walton, K.C. and D. C. Leck, for the appellants.—The judgment of the learned judge was wrong, for the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the underwriters the whole of the loss which they have sustained. The ship was fully insured at the agreed value of 33,000*l.*, and the underwriters are bound to pay the whole loss sustained by the owners up to that amount. The fact that the amount of the loss sustained by the owners has been arrived at by valuing the ship at a sum larger than the value agreed in the policy is immaterial. If the claim against the underwriters were made under the "suing and labouring" clause, they could not object that the amount was calculated upon a value different from the agreed value:

Dixon v. Whitworth, 40 L. T. Rep. 718; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 327; 4 C. P. Div. 371.

In Dickenson v. Jardine (18 L. T. Rep. 717; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 126; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 639) it was decided that, in a case of jettison of goods entitling the cargo owner to general average contribution, the cargo owner could recover from the underwriters the whole amount insured without first collecting the contributions to which he was entitled, and that the underwriters would be entitled to stand in his place with regard to the general average contributions. If this ship had been totally lost and abandoned to the underwriters, they would have been entitled to the whole of the wreck, and not merely to thirty-three-fortieths:

North of England Iron Steamship Insurance Association v. Armstrong, 21 L. T. Rep. 822; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 330; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 244.

These losses in respect of salvage and of general average loss were directly caused by the perils insured against, and the whole amount of those losses is recoverable upon the policy without any reference to the agreed value of the ship:

Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company, 46 L. T. Rep. 863; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 9 Q. B. Div. 192.

CT. OF APP.]

BALMORAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. MARTEN.

[CT. OF APP.]

If damage was caused to the ship by perils of the sea, the underwriters would have to pay the whole cost of the necessary repairs, and the same rule is applicable to a loss caused by the necessity of receiving salvage services. Salvage charges are just as much incurred for the general safety of the ship and cargo as a loss arising from jettison of a mast; and the method by which the amount of the salvage charges is arrived at is immaterial. The rule applicable in the case of damage to goods is not applicable in the case of damage to ship:

Aitchison v. Lohre, 41 L. T. Rep. 323; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 168; 4 App. Cas. 755.

The alleged practice of average adjusters is not in accordance with the law, and cannot be accepted:

Atwood v. Sellar, 41 L. T. Rep. 83; 42 L. T. Rep. 644; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 283; 4 Q. B. Div. 342; 5 Q. B. Div. 286;

Svensden v. Wallace, 52 L. T. Rep. 901; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 550; 10 App. Cas. 404.

That practice is contrary to the practice followed in the United States of America:

International Navigation Company v. Atlantic Insurance Company, 100 Fed. Rep. 304

Pickford, K.C. and Scrutton, K.C. for the respondent.—The decision of Bigham, J. was right. The agreed value in the policy is conclusive, and cannot be reopened. The loss for which the underwriters are liable must be ascertained by reference to that agreed value, but the shipowners are seeking to recover the amount of a loss calculated upon a larger value than the agreed value. Taking the agreed value, the loss which the shipowners have sustained is only thirty-three-fortieths of the amount claimed:

Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.).

It has been decided, in Aitchison v. Lohre (ubi sup.), that salvage charges are not recoverable from the underwriters under the "suing and labouring" clause, and therefore the case of Dixon v. Whitworth (ubi sup.) cannot now apply. The shipowners can only sue for the ship's share of the salvage award, and that is ascertained by the real value of the ship; therefore that, and the general average loss, so far as they are recoverable from the underwriters, must be ascertained by reference to the agreed value in the policy:

The Mary Thomas, 71 L. T. Rep. 104; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 495; (1894) P. 108.

Joseph Walton, K.C. in reply.—The agreed value in the policy is only conclusive for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the liability of the underwriters in case of a total loss:

Irving v. Manning, 1 H. L. Cas. 287.

The underwriters, in the case of any loss less than a total loss, must pay the whole amount of the loss, and it is immaterial how the amount has been computed. Salvage charges are a particular average loss and a direct loss by perils insured against, and the whole amount is recoverable.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 9.—The following judgments were read:—

SMITH, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs insured their ship with the defendant for the sum of 33,000*l.*, the ship in the policy being valued at the agreed sum of 33,000*l.* During the time covered by the policy an average loss was sustained which, taking the ship at its real value of 40,000*l.*, and not at its agreed value of 33,000*l.*, amounted to the sum of 56*l.*, and a salvage award had also to be paid by the plaintiffs, which amounted to the sum of 472*l.*, taking the ship at its real value of 40,000*l.*, and not at its agreed value of 33,000*l.* The question is whether the plaintiffs can recover from the defendant, upon this policy, the whole of either of these two amounts. Bigham, J. has held that they cannot, and I think for the reason hereafter given that Bigham, J. is right. It is not denied that his judgment is in accordance with the practice in vogue in this country, when a ship is valued in a policy by agreement of the parties at less than its real value. I am aware that, if it be shown that a practice is erroneous, it is not binding upon me (see Atwood v. Sellar, 41 L. T. Rep. 83; 42 L. T. Rep. 644; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 283; 4 Q. B. Div. 342; 5 Q. B. Div. 286; and Svensden v. Wallace, 52 L. T. Rep. 901; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 550; 10 App. Cas. 404); and I also know that the practice in America is not the same as here. But what is it that the plaintiffs are seeking to do? They are carrying in upon a valued policy claims based, not upon the agreed value between the parties of the thing insured—namely, upon a value of 33,000*l.*—but upon a value of 40,000*l.* In my judgment, the agreed value, apart from fraud, is binding between the assured and the underwriter whenever a claim is made by the one against the other upon a valued policy, and it is not competent for the assured, any more than for the underwriter, to open the value agreed to in the policy. The underwriter's answer to the claim now made by the plaintiffs is this. My liability to you, by agreement between you and me, was to be based upon the ship insured being of the value of 33,000*l.*, no more and no less, and I am, therefore, not liable to pay claims based upon a value of 40,000*l.*, and I think this is a good answer in this case. For these reasons I think the practice in existence in this country is correct, and that the judgment of Bigham, J. is right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—The case is not free from difficulty. The policy is a valued policy on the ship. Both sides are agreed that, as between the underwriters and the shipowners, the parties to the policy, the policy value cannot be opened, but each side says that the other is making a claim inconsistent with the valued policy. The shipowners say that, according to the terms of the policy, the ship is between themselves and the underwriters a fully-insured ship, and that the underwriters cannot consistently with the policy maintain that the ship is only insured to the extent of thirty-three-fortieths, or that the shipowners are their own insurers to the extent of seven-fortieths. On the other hand, the underwriters say that they insured the ship on the basis of the ship being worth 33,000*l.*, and that the shipowners have no right to ask them to pay on the footing of the ship being worth 40,000*l.* Bigham, J. decided in favour of the contention of the underwriters, chiefly on the ground, I think, of Mr. Danson's evidence, which proved undoubtedly that there was a well-known practice in England amongst underwriters and average adjusters whereby, if the policy value of the ship is less than her contributory value adopted in the average adjustment, or less than the amount at which the ship was valued in a salvage action, the same proportionate rebate is made upon the average assessment against the ship when indemnity is sought against the underwriters, unless otherwise provided in the policy. In my judgment it is necessary, in order to arrive at a decision between these respective contentions, to ascertain the nature of the claim of the insured owner in cases where there has been either a general average sacrifice or payment of general average contribution, or payment of the whole or a contributory share under a salvage award. In each of these cases the claim of the insured owner is a claim for a loss by perils of the sea; either something has been sacrificed to avert a peril for the benefit of all or salvage has been paid for the benefit of all. But there is an obvious difference in the links of the chain of cause and effect between a case where masts have been sacrificed or cargo jettisoned to avert a peril of the sea, and a case where the loss consists of the sum which has to be contributed so as to distribute the burden of the general average sacrifice or the burden of the salvage award. In the former case a part of the ship or cargo has been lost by voluntary sacrifice necessitated by perils of the sea, whereas in the latter case it is impossible to say what loss there has been until the general average contribution has been adjusted or until the salvage award has been made and the burden of it distributed. It is argued that this difference affects the nature and measure of the loss as between the underwriters and the insured owner, and also affects the right of the insured owner to recover from the underwriters the whole of the loss by perils of the sea without reference to contribution from other owners who have had the benefit of the sacrifice, leaving the underwriters to get a contribution from such owners by virtue of subrogation. To a certain extent this is, I think, plainly true. Losses for which underwriters are liable without any adjustment and losses for which underwriters are liable only after adjustment differ in two respects. The former can be recovered as particular average losses, while the latter generally cannot. The former losses fall within the rule in Dickenson v. Jardine (18 L. T. Rep. 717; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 126; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 639), in which it was decided that, in a case of jettison of goods entitling the cargo-owner to general average contribution from the owners of the ship, the insured cargo-owner is entitled to recover from the underwriters the whole amount insured without having first collected the contribution to which he was entitled from the ship and other owners of cargo, and that the underwriters, having paid the cargo-owner, would be entitled to stand in his place with respect to general average contribution, whereas losses for which the underwriters are only liable after adjustment clearly cannot be sued for until after adjustment, and then only to the extent of the insured owner's share of liability according to the statement of the average adjusters. The decision of Barnes, J. and of the Court of Appeal in The Mary Thomas (71 L. T. Rep. 104; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 495; (1894) P. 108) seems to make it clear that underwriters are only liable for general average expenditure after adjustment, and to the extent of the contribution due according to the average statement from the insured owner of ship, cargo, or freight, as the case may be, and The Mary Thomas seems also to establish that Dickenson v. Jardine (ubi sup.) has no application to such a case. The Mary Thomas, however, is not conclusive as to the case of salvage in the strict sense of the word. It is not conclusive as to salvage by a volunteer independent of agreement, for it will be seen that, in The Mary Thomas, the operations after the stranding were done under the orders of the master, just as in the present case the work by the Gamecock was done under the master's orders. In all these cases the liability of the underwriters is simply to recoup the insured owner his share of expenditure incurred by the master for the benefit of all. I think, however, that, even in the case of salvage proper, the liability of the underwriter is only to pay the share of the salvors' remuneration awarded against the owner whom he has insured from loss by perils of the sea. The outcome of all this is that neither in a case of general average contribution nor in the case of salvage proper is the underwriter a guarantor of the contributions due under the average statement, or the salvage award, from the other owners interested, but still the loss by ship, in having to pay salvage, is not a loss dependent on the salvage being for the benefit of owners other than the shipowner: (see Arnould on Marine Insurance, 3rd edit., pp. 728-9). It is a direct loss by the peril of the sea, which the salvors are entitled to recover from each owner to the extent that their volunteer services have benefited him. The liability does not seem to me to arise out of the equities of the owners inter se or out of the Rhodian law. To that extent the liability of the shipowner or the cargo-owner or other owner, as the case may be, to pay his share of salvage remuneration differs from his liability to pay his share of general average loss, and resembles a loss by jettison. Salvage, however, is generally not expressly named in marine policies, but it is to be remembered that the liability of the underwriters does not depend on the words of the policy, but upon salvage being made by the law of the land or the general law maritime a direct and immediate consequence of perils of the sea. Assuming that salvage is a partial loss of a ship by perils of the sea, which can only be recovered after the liability of the ship has been determined by the award of the court fixing the share of liability, and that the underwriters can in no case be subrogated to the rights of the insured owner, and that therefore so much of the judgment in Dickenson v. Jardine has no application, yet there remains the question how far the underwriters can resist payment of the share of salvage which the ship has had to pay. It is a loss by the perils of the sea. The ship has had to pay that amount. Prima facie the underwriters are bound to indemnify the shipowner against this loss. What is it that gets rid of this prima facie obligation? The suggestion is that it is got rid of by the fact that the full value of the ship has been agreed in the policy at 33,000*l.*, and the salvage award has been based on a value of 40,000*l.* It is said that this agreement estops the owner, as a party to the policy, from enforcing against the underwriters any indemnity against a loss based on a value inconsistent with that value. Secondly, it is said that the rule in cases of partial loss is to ascertain the proportion of the contribution of the ship to the total salvage expenditure according to the values and amounts on which the liability of the ship has been fixed by the court which disposed of the salvage action, and that then the liability of the underwriters will be the same proportion of the policy value. It may be that this is a convenient rule of thumb, but it is not the logical outcome of holding the parties to the policy to be bound by the figure of policy value; and it is to be recollected that the salvage valuation is based on the value of the damaged ship as salvaged, and the policy value is the value of the sound ship. In the case of Irving v. Manning (1 H. L. Cas. 287) it appears by the opinion of the judges, delivered by Patteson, J., that the meaning of a valued policy is not that as between the parties to the policy the policy value shall for all purposes be taken to be the value of the ship, but only that for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of compensation to be paid to the assured when the loss has happened the value shall be taken to be the sum fixed. The judges, having arrived at that conclusion, go on to approve the doctrine, established by Lewis v. Rucker (2 Burr. 1167), that on a valued policy on goods the amount to which the underwriters ought to be held liable for a partial loss is to be ascertained by computing such a proportion of the value in the policy as the difference between the price for which sound goods would have sold at the port of delivery and that for which the damaged goods actually sold bore to the price for which sound goods would have sold, and then Patteson, J. goes on to say: "But the extent and nature of the loss being ascertained by this comparison, the underwriter was held liable to pay the proportion so ascertained of the value in the policy": (see pp. 305, 306). This is not the way in which losses by actual damage to the ship are measured for the purpose of ascertaining the quantum of the liability of the underwriter. The underwriter has to pay the whole expense of repairs whether the policy value be high or low, less one-third for new work substituted for old, provided only such expenses do not exceed the total sum insured. Now, ought salvage expenses to be measured against the underwriters on the basis of a partial loss of goods or on the basis of repairs? Apart from the established practice spoken to by Mr. Danson, I should have thought that the measure of the loss against which the underwriters had to indemnify the shipowner was the actual sum which the shipowner had to pay for salvage, and that this was so whether the valuation in the policy was above or below the actual value. Salvage expenditure is the sum which the shipowner has had to pay to save the underwriters from a total loss. It does not seem to me to matter how that sum is arrived at. It is not in its origin a computation of the quantum of compensation which the underwriters have to pay the shipowner. It is a computation of the sum which the shipowner has to pay to save the underwriters from a total loss—i.e., of the sum which the shipowner has to pay to save the ship from perils of the sea—and this is clearly a direct loss by perils of the sea. But the evidence seems to show that in the case of salvage claims covered by a policy of insurance the Lewis v. Rucker (ubi sup.) measure has been applied for a very long time, and with much hesitation I am concurring in affirming the decision of Bigham, J.

STIRLING, L.J.—There is no dispute that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover on the policy in respect both of the average loss and the salvage award. Forasmuch, however, as the ship was insured at the full amount of the agreed value, the plaintiffs urge that the contract of the defendants is from its nature one of indemnity; that the plaintiffs have suffered a loss to the full amount apportioned to the ship; and that primâ facie they ought to be indemnified to that extent. It is, however, contended on behalf of the defendants that, inasmuch as by agreement between the parties the ship has been valued at 33,000*l.*, the plaintiffs must be taken to have contracted that for the purposes of the policy the ship shall be taken to be of that value; that, when the claim of the plaintiffs is investigated, it is found to be based on the ship being of the value of 40,000*l.*; and that under the contract they are only bound to pay the sum which would have been payable if, in the adjustment of the average and in the salvage proceedings, the value of the ship had been 33,000*l.* Now, in the case of Irving v. Manning (1 H. L. Cas. 287), a ship was insured by a policy in which the value was stated at 17,500*l.* The ship suffered damage while on the voyage, and the amount necessary to repair her was estimated at 10,500*l.*, while her value if repaired would only have been 9000*l.* The assured, having abandoned her, claimed for a total loss; and this claim was upheld by the House of Lords. The opinion of the judges who were consulted by the House of Lords was delivered by Patteson, J., who says: "By the terms of it (the policy) 'the ship, &c., for so much as concerns the assured, by agreement between the assured and assurers, are and shall be rated and valued at 17,500*l.*,' and the question turns upon the meaning of these words. Do they, as contended for by the plaintiff in error, amount to an agreement that for all purposes connected with the voyage, at least for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is a total loss or not, the ship should be taken to be of that value, so that when a question arises whether it would be worth while to repair, it must be assumed that the vessel would be worth that sum when repaired? Or do they mean only, that for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of compensation to be paid to the assured, when the loss has happened, the value shall be taken to be the sum fixed, in order to avoid disputes as to the quantum of the assured's interest? We are all of opinion that the latter is the true meaning; and this is consistent with the language of the policy, and with every case that has been decided upon valued policies." After referring to and discussing the previous cases on the subject, his Lordship continued: "The principle laid down in these latter cases is this: that the question of loss, whether total or not, is to be determined just as if there was no policy at all; and the established mode of putting the question, when it is alleged that there has been what is perhaps improperly called a constructive total loss of a ship, is to consider the policy altogether out of the question, and to inquire what a prudent uninsured owner would have done in the state in which the vessel was placed by the perils insured against. If he would not have repaired the vessel, it is deemed to be lost. When this test has been applied, and the nature of the loss has been thus determined, the quantum of compensation is then to be fixed. In an open policy, the compensation must be then ascertained by evidence. In a valued one, the agreed total value is conclusive; each party has conclusively admitted that this fixed sum shall be that which the assured is entitled to receive in case of a total loss. It is argued that this course of proceeding infringes on the generally received rule, that an insurance is a mere contract of indemnity, for thus the assured may obtain more than a compensation for his loss, and it is so. A policy of assurance is not a perfect contract of indemnity. It must be taken with this qualification, that the parties may agree beforehand in estimating the value of the subject assured, by way of liquidated damages, as indeed they may in any other contract to indemnify." This opinion was accepted by the House of Lords as a correct statement of the law. Two points were therefore decided: first, that the value stated in the policy is not conclusive for all purposes, but is conclusive for the purpose of ascertaining the compensation to be paid to the assured when a loss has happened; and, secondly, that a valued policy of insurance is a contract of indemnity with this qualification, that the amount recoverable is ascertained beforehand by way of liquidated damages. It is not to be inferred that the rule thus established is to be applied only for the purpose of ascertaining the amount to be paid to the assured, as is shown by Muirhead v. Forth and North Sea Steamboat Mutual Insurance Association (1894) A. C. 72, 79). There a policy contained a clause making it a condition that the assured should keep one-fifth of the value of the ship uninsured. The policy value of the ship was 3750*l.*; insurances were effected to the amount of 4000*l.*, and it was contended that there was no breach of the condition because the real value was 5000*l.*; but Lord Herschell said: "It is clear that, as between the parties to this action (viz., the assured and underwriters), the value of the vessel must be taken as 3750*l.*; and, if she was insured for more than four-fifths of 3750*l.*, it appears to me that the condition was broken." This rule (as is shown by the opinion of the judges in Irving v. Manning, ubi sup.), extends to cases of partial, as well as total loss, but is much less easy of application. As regards goods and freight, the rule appears to be that established in Lewis v. Rucker (2 Burr. 1167)—viz., that the assurer pays such proportion of the value stated in the policy as the amount of damage done bears to the total actual value, such damage and actual value being both ascertained with reference to the same time and place. It was said in argument on behalf of the defendants that this rule was introduced to avoid charging the underwriter with fluctuation in the market value of the goods. This is the reason for that part of the rule which requires that the proportion between the damage and actual value shall be ascertained with reference to the same time and place; but, after this proportion has been got, the rule requires (as in the case of a total loss) that the amount of compensation shall be assessed with reference to the value stated in the policy, and this is pointed out by Lord Mansfield in the case cited. In commenting on the same case in Irving v. Manning (ubi sup.), Patteson, J. says: "The extent and nature of the loss being ascertained by this comparison, the underwriter was held liable to pay the proportion so ascertained of the value in the policy; and this mode of treating partial losses on goods is always adhered to." Where, however, a ship is damaged without becoming a total loss, then, if the vessel is repaired, the rule is that the damage is to be taken as the cost of repairs less one-third, and the amount recoverable under a valued policy is the same aliquot part of the sum insured as the amount of damage is of the valuation in the policy; so that, when the sum insured is the full value stated, the assured recovers the whole of the repairs: (see Arnould, 6th edit., p. 940, the leading passages in which are quoted with approval by Lord Esher, M R. in Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company, 46 L. T. Rep. 863; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 9 Q. B. Div. 192, 209; Phillips, 5th edit., sect. 1435). It is contended that the rule as to repairs ought to be applied in the present case. In my opinion, however, this does not follow. The cost of repairs has no necessary relation to the value of the ship; whereas the amount here sued for is a sum apportioned by the average adjuster to the ship by a calculation in which the value of the ship directly enters as an important element. If indeed the shipowner were entitled to recover against the underwriters the whole of the average loss and the salvage award, the underwriters being subrogated into his rights of contribution against the owners of freight and cargo, as was held in Dickenson v. Jardine (18 L. T. Rep. 717; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 126; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 639) with respect to goods jettisoned, there would be what seems at least a plausible argument in support of the plaintiffs' contention; but the judgment of Barnes, J. in The Mary Thomas (71 L. T. Rep. 104; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 495; (1894) P. 108, 117) negatives such a right as regards the average loss; and the learned counsel for the plaintiffs admitted in argument that the shipowner could only sue for the ship's share of the salvage award.

This being so, I think that in assessing the amount of compensation to be paid by the underwriters it must be determined by reference to the policy value. The question then arises, What sum ought the plaintiffs to recover? Theoretically, I think the sum would be that which would be payable if the value of 33,000*l.* had been employed in the average adjustment instead of 40,000*l.*, or possibly, if the adjustment be based on the value of the ship as saved, to the proportion of 33,000*l.* which the saved value bears to the sound value at the same time and place. To this there are two objections: first, that the ascertainment of this sum would, or at all events might, involve a computation of greater or less complexity and the trouble of a reference back to the average adjuster; and, secondly, that it is contrary to a long-established practice, to which effect has been given by Bigham, J. This practice is not contrary to any rule of law, and in the circumstances ought, I think, to be followed. At the same time it seems to me that, when the policy value exceeds that adopted by the average adjuster, the like regard ought to be paid to it; for I think that to hold otherwise would be contrary to Irving v. Manning (ubi sup.) and the cases which have followed it, according to which the policy value is to be regarded whether it exceeds or falls short of the true value. I have only to add, with reference to the decision in the American courts, which was referred to in argument, that it was to

[CT. OF APP.]

THE WINKFIELD.

[CT. OF APP.]

a large extent based on the practice of average adjusters in the State of New York, which is different from that which prevails in England. So far as this ratio decidendi extends, that case supports the view taken by Bigham, J. I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Lowless and Co.
Solicitors for the respondent, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whatton.

Nov. 26 and Dec. 16, 1901.

(Before COLLINS, M.R., STIRLING and MATHEW, L.JJ.)

THE WINKFIELD. (a)

Collision—Limitation of liability—Claim by Postmaster-General for loss of registered letters and parcels on behalf of senders—Right of bailee to recover value of goods lost where under no liability to bailor.

In an action against a wrongdoer for the loss of goods caused by his negligence, a bailee in possession can recover the value of the goods lost, although he would have had a good defence to an action by the bailor for damages for the loss of the goods bailed.

A collision occurred between the steamships M. and W., in consequence of which the M., which was carrying passengers and mails, sank, and the greater portion of the mails were lost. The W. limited her liability under the provisions of sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

At the reference before the registrar and merchants, the Postmaster-General claimed against the fund in court, as bailee for the senders of registered letters and parcels lost by the collision, the estimated value of the same, although he was under no liability to the owners of them.

Held, reversing the decision of the President (Sir F. Jeune), that, as bailee in possession, he could recover damages for the loss of the goods irrespective of whether or not he was liable to the bailors.

Claridge v. South Staffordshire Tramway Company (66 L. T. Rep. 655; (1892) 1 Q. B. 422) overruled.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (Sir F. Jeune), confirming a report of the registrar, dated the 29th March 1901.

On the 5th April 1900 a collision occurred about eighty-six miles from Cape Town between the steamships Mexican and Winkfield in a fog. The Mexican was homeward bound from the Cape to England with passengers, mails, and a general cargo on board.

The Winkfield was at the time engaged as a transport, and was bringing out yeomanry and volunteers for service in South Africa, and horses and materials of war.

In consequence of the collision the Mexican was so badly damaged that she sank a few hours afterwards. Her passengers were safely got on board the Winkfield, but the greater portion of the mails and postal parcels on board of her, together with her cargo, were lost.

The owners of the Winkfield admitted their vessel was partly to blame for the collision, and, finding that the claims for loss or damage to ship and goods would exceed the amount of their statutory liability under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, they obtained on the 4th July 1900 a decree limiting their liability to 8*l.* per ton, and paid into court the sum of 32,51*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.*

At the reference before the registrar and merchants to assess the amounts of the claims put forward against the fund in court, a large number of claims were made, and amongst others one by the Postmaster-General on behalf of himself and the Postmasters-General of Cape Colony and Natal in respect of the loss of registered letters and parcels on board the Mexican, and lost by reason of the collision.

These claims represented the amounts the Post-office had had to pay for claims actually put forward by owners of registered letters and parcels which had been lost.

No question as to the real liability of the Postmaster-General to pay these claims was raised, and they were admitted by consent of the other parties, and duly allowed in full by the registrar.

The Postmaster-General, however, also claimed a further sum representing the estimated value of letters and parcels for which no claim had so far been put forward. The registrar refused to allow the claim on the ground that the Postmaster-General was not liable over to the senders, and therefore he could not sue as a bailee.

On a motion by the Postmaster-General in objection to the registrar's report, the President confirmed it, holding that he was bound by the decision of Claridge v. South Staffordshire Tramway Company (66 L. T. Rep. 655; (1892) 1 Q. B. 422), and that in the face of that decision the claim of the Postmaster-General could not be sustained.

The Postmaster-General appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, K.C.) and Acland for the appellant.—The decision in Claridge v. South Staffordshire Tramway Company (ubi sup.) is wrong. There it was held that the bailee of a chattel, who was under no liability to the bailor for injury to the chattel bailed, could not recover against the person by whose negligence the chattel was injured. The case was commented on by Smith, L.J. in Meux v. Great Eastern Railway Company (73 L. T. Rep. 247, at p. 250; (1895) 2 Q. E. 387, at p. 394). It is submitted that as against a wrongdoer a person in possession has a good title, not merely for the purpose of bringing an action, but also to recover the thing itself, if it exists, or damages for its loss if it has ceased to exist. As against a wrongdoer he can recover the value of the real article. The doctrine that a bailee cannot recover unless he is chargeable over is wrong in principle. It is clear that the bailee could sue to recover the chattel itself if it were in existence; he ought, therefore, to be able to recover the value of the chattel if it has been lost. As between bailor and bailee the party suing could only recover the value of his interest in the chattel, but as against a stranger who was a wrongdoer the bailee could recover the chattel, or its full value, possession giving him right to sue. This rule avoided multiplicity of actions, one by the bailor and one by the bailee. Under the old law it was laid down that the bailee alone could sue the wrongdoer, and having recovered was liable over to his bailor.

Heydon v. Smith, 13 Co. Rep., p. 69.

The words "because he was chargeable over" in that case mean that the bailee was the only person who could sue, and that when he recovered he was liable over to the bailor. The law is correctly stated in Holmes, C.J.'s Lectures on Common Law, 5th lecture, pp. 166, 167, 170, 171, 175, 178, and 180. The history of the law of bailments is also dealt with in Pollock and Maitland's History of English Law, vol. 2, p. 169. A bailee could have brought an action for detinue supposing the wrongdoer had made away with the chattel. He ought, therefore, to be able to recover the value of the whole thing. In The Minna (L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 97) the bailees of a barge were held to be the proper persons to sue where a collision had taken place between the barge and a steamship. They also referred to the following cases:

Sutton v. Buck, 2 Taunton, 302;
Martini v. Coles, 1 M. & S. 140;
Lyle v. Barker, 5 Binney (Pennsylvania) 457;
Rooth v. Wilson, 1 B. & A. 59;
Burton v. Hughes, 2 Bingham, 173;
Moore v. Robinson, 2 B. & A. 817;
Nicholls v. Bastard, 2 Crompt. M. & R. 659;
White v. Webb, 15 Connecticut Rep. 302;
Brierly v. Kendall, 17 Q. B. 937;
Jeffries v. Great Western Railway Company, 26 L. T. Rep. O. S. 214; 5 E. & B. 802;
Waters v. Monarch Insurance Company, 26 L. T. Rep. O. S. 217; 5 E. & B. 870;
London and North Western Railway Company v. Glyn, 33 L. T. Rep. O. S. 199; 1 E. & E. 652;
Turner v. Hardcastle, 5 L. T. Rep. 748; 11 C. B. N. S. 683;
Swire v. Leach, 11 L. T. Rep. 680; 18 C. B. N. S. 479.

Pickford, K.C., and Batten for the respondents, contra.—The Postmaster-General cannot sue because he was not in possession of the letters and parcels. They were in the actual possession of the owners of the Mexican at the time they were lost. If therefore the right of action was in the bailee in possession they are the proper persons to bring the action. But the steamship company were contractors, not bailees. If the Postmaster-General is entitled to sue, every ship-owner who carries goods under a bill of lading is entitled to do so too. Secondly, the test of the right of the bailee to recover is the liability of the bailee to the bailor. The Postmaster-General is not bound in any way to account for the money, and has absolute discretion as to claims. It is the obligation to account to the true owner which is the foundation of the action. Pollock and Maitland, in their History of the English Law, vol. 2, p. 170, state the law in a somewhat different manner from Holmes, C.J. The right of recovering damages against the bailee is, as the cases show, reduced in proportion to his liability to the bailor:

Dockwray v. Dickinson, Skinner, 640;
Mayne on Damages, 6th edit., p. 414.

There is no contract that the Postmaster-General should represent the parties. In the case cited above it was held that the bailee could maintain the action, but only for his own share. Most of the cases cited by the Attorney-General are cases of trover, and in none of them was the point expressly raised. It might be that in cases of trover, where the wrongdoer had taken the chattel out of the possession of the bailee, the latter could recover the full value of the chattel. There were dicta to that effect. That, however, did not apply to the case of an injury to a chattel in the possession of a bailee. In such a case there was no authority which showed that a bailee could recover damages which he had not sustained. Further, payment to a bailee would be no defence to an action by the bailor for the loss of the goods.

They referred to the following Year Books:

11 Henry IV., pp. 23 and 24;
 9 Edward IV., p. 34, plea 9;
 3 Henry VII., p. 4, plea 16;
 20 Henry VII., p. 1, plea 1;
 21 Henry VII., p. 14 (b), plea 23.

Also to

Addison v. Overend, 6 T. R. 766;
Sedgworth v. Overend, 7 T. R. 279.

Scrutton, K.C. for the owners of the Mexican.

Christopher Head for the owners of the Winkfield.

The Attorney-General in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 16.—COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the order of Sir Francis Jeune dismissing a motion made on behalf of the Postmaster-General in the case of the Winkfield. The question arises out of a collision which occurred on the 5th April 1900, between the steamship Mexican and the steamship Winkfield, and which resulted in the loss of the former, with a portion of the mails which she was carrying at the time. The owners of the Winkfield, under a decree limiting their liability to 32,514l. 17s. 10d., paid that amount into court, and the claim in question was one by the Postmaster-General, on behalf of himself and the Postmaster-General of Cape Colony and Natal, to recover out of that sum the value of letters, parcels, &c., in his custody as bailee, and lost on board the Mexican. The case was dealt with by all parties in the court below as a claim by a bailee who was under no liability to his bailor for the loss in question, as to which it was admitted that the authority of Claridge v. South Staffordshire Tramway Company (ubi sup.) was conclusive, and the President accordingly, without argument and in deference to that authority, dismissed the claim. The Postmaster-General now appeals. The question for decision, therefore, is whether Claridge's case was well decided. I emphasise this because it disposes of a point which was faintly suggested by the respondents, and which, if good, could distinguish Claridge's case—namely, that the applicant was not himself in actual occupation of the things bailed at the time of the loss. This point was not taken below, and, having regard to the course followed by all parties on the hearing of the motion, I think it is not open to the respondents to make it now, and I therefore deal with the case upon the footing upon which it was dealt on the motion—namely, that it is covered by Claridge's case. I assume, therefore, that the subject-matter of the bailment was in the custody of the Postmaster-General as bailee at the time of the accident. For the reasons which I am about to state, I am of opinion that Claridge's case was wrongly decided, and that the law is that in an

CT. OF APP.]

THE WINKFIELD.

[CT. OF APP.]

action against a stranger for loss of goods caused by his negligence, the bailee in possession can recover the value of the goods, although he would have had a good answer to an action by the bailor for damages for the loss of the thing bailed. It seems to me that the position, that possession is good against a wrongdoer and that the latter cannot set up the jus tertii unless he claims under it, is well established in our law, and really concludes this case against the respondents. As I shall show presently, a long series of authorities establishes this in actions of trover and trespass at the suit of a possessor. And the principle being the same, it follows that he can equally recover the whole value of the goods in an action on the case for their loss through the tortious conduct of the defendant. I think it involves this also, that the wrongdoer who is not defending under the title of the bailor is quite unconcerned with what the rights are between the bailor and bailee, and must treat the possessor as the owner of the goods for all purposes quite irrespective of the rights and obligations as between him and the bailor. I think this position is well established in our law, although it may be that reasons for its existence have been given in some of the cases which are not quite satisfactory. I think also that the obligation of the bailee to the bailor to account for what he has received in respect of the destruction or conversion of the thing bailed has been admitted so often in decided cases that it cannot now be questioned, and, further, I think it can be shown that the right of the bailee to recover cannot be rested on the ground suggested in some of the cases—namely, that he was liable over to the bailor for the loss of the goods converted or destroyed. It cannot be denied that since the case of Armory v. Delamirie (1 Stra. 504), not to mention earlier cases from the Year Books onward, a mere finder may recover against a wrongdoer the full value of the thing converted. That decision involves the principle that as between possessor and wrongdoer the presumption of law is, in the words of Lord Campbell in Jeffries v. Great Western Railway Company (26 L. T. Rep. O. S., at p. 214; 5 E. & B., at p. 806), "that the person who has possession has the property." In the same case he says (26 L. T. Rep. O. S., at p. 214; 5 E. & B., at p. 805): "I am of opinion that the law is that a person possessed of goods as his property has a good title as against every stranger, and that one who takes them from him, having no title in himself, is a wrongdoer, and cannot defend himself by showing that there was title in some third person, for against a wrongdoer possession is title." The law is so stated by the very learned annotator in his note to Wilbraham v. Snow (2 Wms. Saund. 47 f.). Therefore it is not open to the defendant, being a wrongdoer, to inquire into the nature of limitation of the possessor's right, and, unless it is competent for him to do so, the question of his relations to, or liability towards, the true owner cannot come into the discussion at all; and, therefore, as between those two parties full damages have to be paid without any further inquiry. The extent of the liability of the finder to the true owner not being relevant to the discussion between him and the wrongdoer, the facts which would ascertain it would not have been admissible in evidence, and therefore the right of the finder to recover full damages cannot be made to depend upon the extent of his liability over to the true owner. To hold otherwise would, it seems to me, be in effect to permit a wrongdoer to set up a jus tertii under which he cannot claim.

But, if this be the fact in the case of a finder, why should it not be equally the fact in the case of a bailee? Why, as against a wrongdoer, should the nature of the plaintiff's interest in the thing converted be any more relevant to the inquiry, and therefore admissible in evidence, than in the case of a finder? It seems to me that neither in one case nor the other ought it to be competent for the defendant to go into evidence on that matter. I think this view is borne out by authority; for instance, in Burton v. Hughes (ubi sup.) the plaintiff, who had borrowed furniture, and was therefore bailee, was held to be entitled to sue in trover wrongdoers who had seized it, without giving in evidence the written agreement under which he held it. The point made for the defendant was that "the qualified interest having been obtained under a written agreement could not be proved except by the production of that agreement duly stamped." The argument on the other side was "that the existence of some kind of interest having been established, the precise nature of it or the terms upon which it was acquired were immaterial to the support of this action." Best, C.J., in delivering judgment, says: "If this had been a case between Kitchen and the plaintiff the agreement ought to have been produced, because that alone could decide the respective rights of those two parties; but it appears that Kitchen was to supply the plaintiff with furniture, and the question is whether, after he had obtained it, he had a sufficient interest to maintain this action." The case which has been referred to (Sutton v. Buck, ubi sup.) confirms what I had esteemed to be the law upon the subject—namely, that a simple bailee has a sufficient interest to sue in trover." By holding, therefore, that the agreement defining the conditions of the plaintiffs' interest was immaterial the court in effect decided that the right of the bailee in possession to sue could not depend upon the fact or extent of his liability over to the bailor, since the plaintiff was allowed to keep his verdict in trover, the agreement defining his interest and liability being excluded from the discussion. In Sutton v. Buck (ubi sup.), on the authority of which this case was decided, it was held that possession under a general bailment is sufficient title for the plaintiff in trover. The plaintiff had taken possession of a stranded ship under a transfer void for noncompliance with the Register Acts, and he sued the defendant in trover for portions of the timber, wood, and materials of which the defendant had wrongfully taken possession. Sir James Mansfield, C.J. had nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that the transfer was defective without registration. On motion the nonsuit was set aside, Sir James Mansfield being a member of the court, and a new trial ordered on the ground that the plaintiff had sufficient possession to maintain the action against the wrongdoer. It is true that Chambre, J. reserved his opinion as to the measure of damages, but on the new trial the plaintiff recovered a verdict apparently for the full value of the things converted, and on further motion for a new trial the only point argued was that the defendant was justified as lord of the manor in doing what he did, a contention which was rejected by the court. In Swire v. Leach (ubi sup.) a pawnbroker, whose landlord had wrongfully taken in distress pledges in the custody of the pawnbroker, was held entitled to recover in an action against the landlord for conversion the full value of the pledges. This case was decided by a strong court, consisting of Erle, C.J., Williams and Keating, JJ., and has never, so far as I know, been questioned since. The duty of the bailee to account to the bailor was recognised as well established. See also Turner v. Hardcastle (ubi sup.), a considered judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, which included Willes, J., who had not been a party to Swire v. Leach (ubi sup.), and where the bailee's right to recover full damages, and his obligation to account to the bailor is again affirmed.

The ground of the decision in Claridge's case was that the plaintiff in that case, being under no liability to his bailor, could recover no damages, and though for the reasons I have already given I think the position is untenable, it is necessary to follow it out a little further. There is no doubt that the reason given in Heydon and Smith's case (ubi sup.)—and itself drawn from the Year Books—has been repeated in many subsequent cases. The words are these: "Clearly, the bailee, or he who hath a special property, shall have a general action of trespass against a stranger, and shall recover all in damages because that he is chargeable over." It is now established that the bailee is accountable, as stated in the passage cited and repeated in many subsequent cases. But whether the obligation to account was a condition of his right to sue, or only an incident arising upon his recovery of damages, is a very different question, though it was easy to confound one view with the other. Holmes, C.J., in his admirable lectures on the Common Law, in the chapter devoted to bailments, traces the origin of the bailee's right to sue and recover the whole value of chattels converted, and arrives at the clear conclusion that the bailee's obligation to account arose from the fact that he was originally the only person who could sue, though afterwards by an extension, not perhaps quite logical, the right to sue was conceded to the bailor also. He says at p. 167: "At first the bailee was answerable to the owner because he was the only person who could sue; now it was said he could sue because he was answerable to the owner." And again at p. 170: "The inverted explanation of Beaumanoir will be remembered, that the bailee could sue because he was answerable over, in place of the original rule that he was answerable over so strictly because only he could sue." This inversion, as he points out is traceable through the Year Books, and has survived into modern times, though, as he shows, it has not been acted upon. Pollock and Maitland's History of English Law, vol. 2, p. 170, puts the position thus: "Perhaps we come nearest to historical truth if we say that between the two old rules there was no logical priority. The bailee had the action because he was liable, and was liable because he had the action." It may be that in early times the obligation of the bailee to the bailor was absolute—that is to say, he was an insurer. But long after the decision of Coggs v. Bernard (2 Ld. Raym. 909), which classified the obligations of bailees, the bailee has, nevertheless, been allowed to recover full damages against a wrongdoer, where the facts would have afforded a complete answer for him against his bailor. The cases above cited are instances of this. In each of them the bailee would have had a good answer to an action by his bailor; for in none of them was it suggested that the act of the wrongdoer was traceable to negligence on the part of the bailee. I think, therefore, that the statement drawn, as I have said, from the Year Books may be explained, as Holmes, C.J. explains it, but whether that be the true view of it or not, it is clear that it has not been treated as law in our courts. Upon this, before the decision in Claridge's case, there was a strong body of opinion in text-books, English and American, in favour of the bailee's unqualified right to sue the wrongdoer: (see Mayne on Damages, 6th edit., p. 416, and cases there cited; Sedgwick on Damages, 7th edit., vol. 1, p. 61, note (a); Story on Bailments, 9th edit., sect. 352; Kent's Commentaries, 12th edit., vol. 2, p. 568, note (e); Pollock on Torts, 6th edit., pp. 354, 355; Addison on Torts, 7th edit., p. 523; and as I have already pointed out Williams, J., the editor of Williams Saunders, was a party to the decision of Swire v. Leach). The bailee's right to recover has been affirmed in several American cases entirely without reference to the extent of the bailee's liability to the bailor for the tort, though his obligation to account is admitted: (see them referred to in the passages cited, and in particular see Ullman v. Barnard, 73 Mass. Rep. 554; Parish v. Wheeler, 22 New York Rep. 494; and White v. Webb, ubi sup.). The case of Rooth v. Wilson (ubi sup.) is a clear authority that the right of the bailee in possession to recover against a wrongdoer is the same in an action on the case as in an action of trover, if indeed authority were required for what seems obvious in point of principle. There the gratuitous bailee of a horse was held entitled to recover the full value of the horse in an action on the case against a defendant by whose negligence the horse fell and was killed. The case was decided by Lord Ellenborough, C.J.-Bayley, Abbott, and Holroyd, JJ. The three latter seem to me to put it wholly on the ground that the plaintiff was in possession and the defendant a wrongdoer. Abbott, J. says shortly: "I think that the same possession which would enable the plaintiff to maintain trespass would enable him to maintain this action"; and Bayley, J. points out that case is a possessory action. But Lord Ellenborough undoubtedly rests his judgment on the view that the plaintiff would himself have been responsible in damages to his bailor to a commensurate amount. This, no doubt, was his personal view, but it was not the decision of the court, and, as I have pointed out, it has certainly not been acted upon in subsequent cases. Therefore, as I said at the outset, and as I think I have now shown by authority, the root principle of the whole discussion is that, as against a wrongdoer, possession is title. The chattel that has been converted or damaged is deemed to be the chattel of the possessor and of no other, and therefore its loss or deterioration is his loss, and to him, if he demands it, it must be recouped. His obligation to account to the bailor is really not ad rem in the discussion. It only comes in after he has carried his legal position to its logical consequence against a wrongdoer, and serves to soothe a mind disconcerted by the notion that a person who is not himself the complete owner should be entitled to receive back the full value of the chattel converted or destroyed. There is no inconsistency between the two positions; the one is the complement of the other. As between bailee and stranger possession gives title—that is, not a limited interest, but absolute and complete ownership, and he is entitled to receive back a complete equivalent for the whole loss or deterioration of the thing itself. As between bailor and bailee the real interests of each must be inquired into, and, as the bailee has to account for the thing bailed, so he must account for that which has become its equivalent and now represents it. What he has received above his own interest he has received to the use of his bailor. The wrongdoer, having once paid full damages to the bailee, has an answer to any action by the bailor: (see Story on Bailments, 9th edit., sect. 352, and the numerous authorities there cited). The liability by the bailee to account is also well established (see the passage from Lord Coke and the cases cited in the earlier part of this judgment), and, therefore, it seems to me that there is no such preponderance of convenience in favour of limiting the right of the bailee as to make it desirable, much less obligatory, upon us to modify the law as it rested upon the authorities antecedent to Claridge's case. I am aware that in two able text-books, Beven's Negligence in Law (2nd edit., at p. 885), and Clerk and Linsell on Torts (2nd edit., at p. 237), the decision in Claridge's case is approved, though it is there pointed out that the authorities bearing the other way were not fully considered. The reasons, however, which they give for their opinions seem to be largely based upon the supposed inconvenience of the opposite view; nor are the arguments by which they distinguish the position of bailees from that of other possessors to my mind satisfactory. Claridge's case was treated as open to question by the late Master of the Rolls in Meux v. Great Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.), and, with the greatest deference to the eminent judges who decided it, it seems to me that it cannot be supported. It seems to have been argued before them upon very scanty materials. Before us the whole subject has been elaborately discussed, and all, or nearly all, the authorities brought before us in historical sequence. I think the appeal must be allowed.

CT. OF APP.] BLACKBURN AND ANOTHER v. LIVERPOOL, &C., STEAM NAVIGATION CO. [K.B. DIV.]

STIRLING, L. J. and MATHEW, L. J. concurred.

Solicitors: for the appellant, The Solicitor for the Post Office; for the respondents, Thomas Cooper and Co.; for the owners of the Mexican, Botterell and Roche; for the owners of the Winkfield, Thomas Cooper and Co.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Nov. 26 and 27, 1901.

(Before WALTON, J.)

BLACKBURN AND ANOTHER v. LIVERPOOL, BRAZIL, AND RIVER PLATE STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

Bill of lading—Exception—Perils of the sea—Exception of any peril of the seas, whether arising from negligence of the crew or otherwise—Opening of valve by mistake whereby sea water was admitted to ship—Damage to cargo—Liability of shipowner.

A cargo of sugar was shipped under a bill of lading which contained an exception of "any loss or damage resulting from any peril of the seas, rivers, or navigation of whatever nature or kind soever (whether arising from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariner, engineers, or others of the crew, or otherwise howsoever)." During the voyage the engineer, intending to fill a ballast tank with sea water to be used for the boilers in discharging the cargo, opened the sea-cock, and he then intended to open the valve of the ballast tank, but by mistake he opened the valve of a tank in which part of the sugar was stored, with the result that the sea water flowed into the tank where the sugar was instead of into the ballast tank, and the sugar was damaged:

Held, that the damage was caused by a peril of the seas within the meaning of the exception in the bill of lading, and that the shipowners were protected by the exception and were not liable for the damage.

COMMERCIAL ACTION tried by Walton, J. without a jury, in which the plaintiffs claimed damages for breach of duty in and about the carriage and delivery of sugar by sea by the steamship Tropic.

The agreed statement of facts was as follows:—

1. At all material times the steamship Tropic was on time charter to the defendants.
2. The plaintiffs in Dec. 1900 and in Jan. 1901 shipped a quantity of sugar in bags on board the Tropic at Pernambuco, in good order and condition.
3. The plaintiffs received from the defendants five bills of lading in respect of the shipment of sugar. The bills of lading which are all in the same form were dated respectively the 31st Dec. 1900, and the 4th and 10th Jan. 1901.
4. One of such bills of lading was attached hereto.
5. By the terms of the bills of lading the sugar was to be carried by the defendants to New York to be there delivered by them to the plaintiffs' order in the like good order and condition, subject to the exceptions contained in the bills of lading.
6. The plaintiffs remained the holders of the bills of lading, and were the receivers of the cargo.
7. The Tropic left Pernambuco on the 10th Jan. 1901. She arrived at New York on or about the 31st Jan. 1901, and completed the discharge of the sugar by the 9th Feb. 1901.

K.B. Div.] BLACKBURN AND ANOTHER v. LIVERPOOL, &C., STEAM NAVIGATION CO. [K.B. Div.]

8. The sugar so shipped by the plaintiffs was contained in 54,373 bags. All the bags were delivered to the plaintiffs, but a considerable number thereof proved to be damaged.

9. The damaged bags had been carried in the Tropic's deep tank, a water-tight compartment in the bottom of the vessel. This tank was a usual and proper place in which to carry the cargo.

10. The damage was caused by an incursion of sea water into the deep tank under the following circumstances: When the Tropic was outside Sandy Hook the chief engineer, being under the mistaken impression that the Tropic was going to Williamsburg Wharf to discharge her cargo, desired to fill the No. 4 ballast tank with water for boiler use while discharging instead of taking in water at the Williamsburg Wharf, where, according to his previous experience, the water was contaminated with sewage. He therefore opened the sea-cock and intended to open the valve of No. 4 tank, but by mistake he opened the valve of the deep tank, with the result that the water ran into the deep tank where the bags of sugar were, instead of into No. 4 ballast tank. The sea-cock was open from 11.30 a.m. on the morning of the 30th Jan. 1901 until 3 p.m. of the same day. The mistake was not discovered until six o'clock in the morning of the 31st. Jan. 1901. The water was then pumped out.

11. By the terms of the bills of lading the Tropic was to discharge alongside Refiners Wharf if required, but until after her arrival at New York it was not known by the defendants or anyone on board the Tropic, where she would be required to discharge. The Tropic was not intended by the plaintiffs to go, and did not in fact go, to Williamsburg Wharf.

12. The defendants admitted, without prejudice to the question of liability, that the damage done to the sugar amounted to 1319l. 17s. 6d.

The bills of lading contained an exception (amongst others) of Loss or damage resulting from . . . any of the following perils (whether arising from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, or others of the crew, or otherwise howsoever), namely, . . . or other peril of the seas, rivers, or navigation of whatever nature or kind soever and howsoever such collision . . . or other peril may be caused. . . .

Carver, K.C. (Bailhache with him) for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to recover for the damage to the sugar. By their contract the defendants were bound safely to carry and safely to deliver the sugar, which they failed to do. They are therefore clearly liable, unless they come within the exception in the bill of lading; but they do not come within the exception. The damage was not caused by a peril of the seas. The damage resulted from the opening of the sea-cock, and letting the sea water into the ship. That act was not an accident; it was not accidental, but it was intentional, as the engineer intended to open the sea-cock, and he opened it, and so he let the sea water into the ship, and he intended to do so. The opening of the valve into the deep tank was, no doubt, accidental, but that was not the real cause of the damage. The act being intentional was not a peril of the sea; nor does it come under the head of negligence in "navigation" within the exception. The act of the engineer in filling No. 4 tank was not an act of navigation, and therefore the damage did not result from a peril of navigation. If it was not an act of navigation none of the other exceptions in the bill of lading exempt the defendants:

The Accomac, 63 L. T. Rep. 737; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 579; 15 P. Div. 208;

Carmichael and Co. v. Liverpool Sailing Ship Owners' Mutual Indemnity Association, 57 L. T. Rep. 550; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 184; 19 Q. B. Div. 242, at p. 247 (per Lord Esher, M.R.), and at p. 250 (per Fry, L.J.);

Canada Shipping Company v. British Shipowners' Mutual Protection Association, 61 L. T. Rep. 312; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 422; 23 Q. B. Div. 342, at p. 344 (per Bowen, L.J.);

Good v. London Steamship Owners' Mutual Protecting Association, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 563.

Horridge, K.C. and Maurice Hill for the defendants.—The defendants are within the exception in the bill of lading of loss or damage resulting from a peril of the seas. When the sea-cock was opened so as to admit the sea water the ship was not tight, and was not fit to carry the cargo. The ship then was subjected to a peril of the seas, in the same way as if the sea had come into the ship by collision. It was an accidental admission of sea water at sea, and that is a peril of the seas within the exception. Even if it were not a peril of the seas, it was a peril of "navigation" within the exception, and it was just the same whether the opening in the ship was made before sailing, as in the case of Carmichael and Co. v. Liverpool Sailing Ship Owners' Mutual Indemnity Association (ubi sup.), or after sailing, as in this case. Although the primâ facie duty of the defendants was to carry the sugar safely, they are exempt in this case by the exception of loss by peril of the seas or of navigation:

Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company Limited v. Hamilton, Fraser, and Co., 57 L. T. Rep. 695; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 200; 12 App. Cas. 484;

Wilson and Co. v. Owners of the Cargo of the Xantho (or The Xantho), 57 L. T. Rep. 701; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; 12 App. Cas. 503;

Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. v. Pandorf and Co., 57 L. T. Rep. 726; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212; 12 App. Cas. 518;

The Southgate, (1893) P. 329;

The Crossington, 64 L. T. Rep. 329; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 27; (1891) P. 152.

Carver, K.C. and Bailhache in reply.

WALTON, J.—I think the law on this subject is clear and is established by the cases which have been referred to of The Xantho (ubi sup.) and Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. v. Pandorf and Co. (ubi sup.), of which I think the case of Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. v. Pandorf and Co. (ubi sup.), is the example most applicable to the present case. It is to be noted that in those two cases no question arose with regard to what is called the negligence clause; and in neither of them was the shipowner exempt from damage arising from the negligence of the crew. As I understand the law when there is no negligence clause, it is this: That the shipowner is bound absolutely as an insurer to deliver safely, subject to the exception of perils of the seas, or any other exceptions which there may be in the bill of lading. If the shipowner fails to carry safely, but the loss is caused by one of the excepted perils, then prima facie he is not liable; but in cases which came long before Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. v. Pandorf and Co. (ubi sup.), the effect of which is there recognised, and in the case of The Xantho (ubi sup.), the contract of the shipowner was not merely as an insurer to deliver safely subject to the excepted perils, but there was the further contract—namely, that he would use due care and diligence to deliver safely. The exceptions, therefore—and I am assuming that they contain no exception of negligence—relieve him from his absolute obligation as an insurer to deliver safely, but do not relieve him from his obligation to exercise due care and diligence in carrying cargo. Therefore, even when the loss is occasioned by one of the exempted perils—again assuming that negligence is not an excepted peril—if the shipowner has failed to use due care and diligence in carrying the cargo, although he may be exempt so far as the absolute obligation to deliver safely is concerned, he is not exempt from the consequences of the breach of his contract to use due care and diligence; and, therefore, if the loss, although occasioned by perils of the sea, has been brought about by want of due care and diligence on the part of the shipowner, the shipowner renders himself liable, notwithstanding the exceptions. In the present case there is what is sometimes called a negligence clause, and the shipowner is exempt by an exemption of perils of the seas, even though the loss by such perils is brought about by the negligence of the crew. Therefore in this case we have not got to consider the liability of the shipowner arising from the want of due care and diligence on the part of his servants, the crew of the vessel. The only question is whether the loss was occasioned by perils of the seas or of navigation. If it was so occasioned, the shipowner is protected by the exemption, although the loss was brought about by the negligence of some of his servants, the crew of the vessel. It is perfectly true that in the first place to bring the case within the exception there must be an accident. By that I understand the loss must have been something which might happen, not something which must happen, as Lord Halsbury said in Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. v. Pandorf and Co. (ubi sup.), as, for instance, wear and tear is not a casualty or accident, because a ship must decay, and wear and tear must take place. He says: "I think the idea of something fortuitous and unexpected is involved in both words "peril" or "accident"; you could not speak of the danger of a ship's decay; you would know that it must decay, and the destruction of the ship's bottom by vermin is assumed to be one of the natural and certain effects of an unprotected wooden vessel sailing through certain seas." In the next place, the accident must not only be an accident that is something in the nature of a casualty, something fortuitous, but it must be an accident of the seas, and a peril of the seas. That is pointed out by Lord Herschell in his judgment in the case of The Xantho (ubi sup.). But it appears to me to be entirely a fallacy to say that because the loss has been occasioned by mistake or neglect—mistake if you like on the part of the crew—it is not an accident. It is obviously not a thing which must happen; it is a thing which may happen, and in the ordinary popular sense, which is the sense in which one must interpret the words of a bill of lading, and in the sense in which I am now using the word, whether arising from some negligence of a servant or not, it is an accident. It is a casualty, something fortuitous, and it seems to me that this loss now in question did arise from an accident—that it was fortuitous.

K.B. DIV.] BLACKBURN AND ANOTHER v. LIVERPOOL, &amp;C., STEAM NAVIGATION CO. [K.B. DIV.]

Then, was it an accident of the seas? As I understand the judgments in Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. v. Pandorf and Co. (ubi sup.) and in The Xantho (ubi sup.), one of the perils of the seas is this, that if the ship is not kept tight the sea water will come in. It may damage the cargo, or sink the ship, and if by some accident the ship is not kept tight, and the water does come in and sink the ship, we say that is a loss of the ship by perils of the seas. Those considerations afford a very simple answer to the question which arises in this case. The engineer, intentionally, it is true, opened the sea-cock. After he had done that the ship remained perfectly tight. Opening the sea-cock no doubt allowed sea water to flow into what we may call certain parts of the ship, but the ship was perfectly tight. The sea water could not come into the carrying part of the ship, and could never sink the ship, or do any damage to anybody or to anything. It was exactly as if the water had been admitted into the ballast tank; then the ship would have remained perfectly tight, although the sea water was flowing in from the sea-cock, so that those parts of the vessel into which the sea is flowing are no doubt open to the sea. That being the position of things, the engineer, not doing in the least what he intended to do, but entirely by mistake, which probably was an act of negligence—which makes no difference in the present case—opened a valve or cock by which he let the water into the carrying part of the ship. He let the sea into the ship, and when this cock was opened the ship was no longer tight, and if it had been left open the ship would have gone to the bottom of the sea if the deep tank was not tight. As it was, it only damaged the cargo in that carrying space in which this sugar was stowed. I cannot distinguish that from the case in which one of the crew accidentally and by mistake opens or leaves open a porthole. That is an act of one of the crew, and in that sense it is an act of one of those under the shipowner's control. It is an act of negligence. He opens the port, or leaves the port open, and the ship is no longer tight, and therefore the water comes in. In either case an opening is accidentally made by mistake, the effect of which is that the ship ceases to be tight, and consequently begins to leak, and damage follows. It seems to me that in either case the ship, by negligence—by an accident—is exposed to the peril that every ship while afloat is exposed to—namely, that if she is not kept tight the water will come in. That seems to me to be one of the essential perils of the seas, and a peril to which every ship is necessarily exposed while she is afloat, because she is afloat. Damage arising from that peril appears to me to be within this exception, and therefore I think the shipowners bring the case within the exception and are exempt from liability. Therefore there must be judgment for the defendants with costs.

Judgment for the defendants.

K.B.] MANCHESTER LINERS LIM. v. BRITISH & FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE CO. LIM. [K.B.]

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Walker, Son, and Field, for Weightman, Pedder, and Weightman, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Field, Roscoe, and Co., for Thornely and Cameron, Liverpool.

Dec. 13 and 16, 1901.
(Before WALTON, J.)

MANCHESTER LINERS LIMITED v. BRITISH AND FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED. (a).

Marine insurance—Policy on “chartered or hire money” to cover “loss of hire money”—Loss of hire through vessel becoming inefficient—Government charter-party—Option to discharge vessel—Loss by discharge of vessel—Right of assured to recover on policy.

By a charter-party in the Government form the Admiralty chartered a vessel for transport service for three months certain, and thenceforward until they should give notice to the owners that the vessel was discharged from their service, such notice to be given when the vessel was in port in the United Kingdom; and the charter-party provided that if the ship became incapable from any defect, or from any cause whatsoever, to perform the service efficiently, the Admiralty might make abatement by way of mulet out of the freight. The shipowners effected a time policy upon “chartered or hire money” to “cover the loss of hire money calculated at” so much per day caused by (amongst other things) want of repairs or breakdown of machinery, rendering the vessel inefficient for the service. Under the charter-party the vessel had made a voyage and had returned to England, and, the three months having previously expired, the Admiralty had continued the employment, and had given instructions that the vessel was to proceed on another voyage on a certain day. While the vessel was in dry dock it was discovered that some of the blades of her propeller were cracked and that it would take some time to repair the damage. In consequence of this the Admiralty, under their option in the charter-party, gave the owners notice discharging the vessel, and the vessel was discharged from the Government service as from that date. The vessel then underwent repairs, which took fifteen days from the date of her discharge by the Admiralty. In an action on the policy by the owners of the ship to recover from the insurers the loss of hire money for the fifteen days:

Held, that the “chartered or hire money” in the policy meant “hire money” in the nature of freight payable under a contract; that the loss of such hire to the shipowners for the fifteen days was caused by the exercise of the option which the Admiralty had under the charter-party to discharge the vessel from their service, and not by the want of repair, breakdown of machinery, or other perils insured against under the policy, and that there was therefore no loss under the policy, for which the shipowners were entitled to recover.

COMMERCIAL ACTION tried by Walton, J. without a jury, the plaintiffs’ claim being for a partial loss upon a policy of marine insurance underwritten by the defendants. The plaintiffs, the Manchester Liners Limited, were the owners of a steamship called the Manchester Corporation of 5473 tons, and the policy upon which they now sued was a policy effected with the defendants, an insurance company, on the 9th March 1900.

The Manchester Corporation was chartered by the Government for transport service by a charter-party dated the 14th Dec. 1899. The charter-party was in the Government form, and was made between the Commissioners for Executing the Office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of the one part, and the agent on behalf of the owners of the vessel of the other part, and after reciting that a copy of the regulations for Her Majesty’s transport service had been delivered to the owners and the master of the ship, provided that the Manchester Corporation

Shall on and from the 25th Nov. 1899 be at the service of the said commissioners to the extent hereinafter mentioned for the space of three calendar months certain and thenceforward until the Commissioner, for Executing the Office of Lord High Admiral aforesaid for the time being shall cause notice to be given to the second party named [that is, to the agent of the owners of the ship], his executors or administrators, or to the master or other person having charge of the said ship, that she is discharged from Her Majesty’s service, such notice to be given when the said ship is in port in the United Kingdom.

Then, as to the rate of payment, the owners

Shall be allowed and paid for the freight of the ship at the rate of twenty-four shillings per ton per calendar month for the number of tons above-mentioned during such time as the said ship shall be continued in Her Majesty’s employ, and shall duly and efficiently perform the service for which she is hereby engaged.

The charter-party contained the following clause:

Provided always and it is hereby agreed and declared that if at any time or times hereafter it shall be made to appear to the said commissioners that any delay has been caused or has accrued by breach of orders or neglect of duty, or that the said ship became incapable from any defect, deficiency, breach of orders, or from any cause whatsoever, to perform efficiently the service contracted for, then and in every such case it shall and may be lawful to and for the said commissioners to retain in arrear the pay of the ship for two months as aforesaid, and to put the said ship out of pay, or to make such abatement by way of mulet out of the freight of the said ship as they shall adjudge fit and reasonable.

Under this charter-party the vessel had made a voyage to South Africa, and she was on her homeward voyage on the 9th March 1900 when the policy of insurance sued upon was effected with the defendants. She arrived in England on the 31st March, and the Commissioners of the Admiralty gave orders that she should proceed on another voyage to South Africa, the date fixed for the sailing from London being the 13th April.

By the permission of the Admiralty the plaintiffs put the vessel in dry dock for the purpose of being cleaned and repainted, and while the vessel was in dry dock it was discovered that three of the blades of her propeller were cracked; and, in consequence of that, on the 5th April 1900 notice was given by the Admiralty to the master of the ship “that the hired transport Manchester Corporation was that day discharged from Her Majesty’s service," and on the 7th April the Director of Transports on behalf of the Admiralty wrote to the plaintiffs' agents that "the Manchester Corporation was discharged from Her Majesty's service on the 5th inst."

K.B.] MANCHESTER LINERS LIM. v. BRITISH & FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE CO. LIM. [K.B.]

In answer to a letter from the plaintiffs' agents the Director of Transports on the 9th July 1900 wrote:

That it was intended that this vessel should make another voyage, and she was being prepared to that end when it was discovered on the ship going into dry dock that three of her propeller blades were cracked, and the Divisional Transport Officer, Royal Albert Docks, reported that they would probably take about eighteen days to replace. As she has lost blades of her propeller on the way out, and had to put into Gibraltar to replace them, and as she lost further blades between Gibraltar and the Cape, it was decided to discharge her from the service and appropriate another transport in her place.

And subsequently, on the 16th Nov. 1901, in answer to a letter written by the defendants' solicitors, the Director of Transports wrote admitting that the reason of their decision was:

That the Admiralty were unwilling to run the risk of further trouble similar to that which had been previously experienced.

The material terms of the policy of insurance, dated the 9th March 1900 (being for a sum of 3000*l.* at a premium of 3*l.* per cent.) were as follows:

And it is hereby agreed and declared that the said insurance shall be and is an insurance (lost or not lost) at and from and for and during the space of three calendar months from 8th March 1900 to 7th June 1900, both days inclusive, Greenwich mean time. If required by the assured it is agreed to return pro ratâ daily premiums on cancelling this insurance and arrival. And it is also agreed and declared that the subject-matter of this policy as between the insured and the said company, so far as concerns this policy, shall be and is as follows, upon chartered or hire money valued at 19,500*l.* To cover and pay the loss of hire money calculated at 21*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* per day as per clause attached. In the event of total or constructive total loss of steamer, no claim to be made for the unexpired time in the ship or vessel called the Manchester Corporation.

The clause attached, which was contained in a printed slip, was as follows:

The amount to be paid on this policy in the event of loss of time as mentioned in this clause shall be 21*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* daily on 19,500*l.* In the event of loss of time from deficiency or inefficiency of men or stores, collisions, stranding, want of repairs, breakdown of machinery, or any causes appertaining to the duties of the owners preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four hours, or rendering her inefficient for the service, the payment of hire shall cease from the hour when the detention or inefficiency begins until she be again ready and in a fully efficient state to resume her service.

Being for and during the space of three calendar months (beginning and ending with Greenwich mean time) as employment may offer.

The plaintiffs in their points of claim alleged that the policy sued on was a policy executed by the plaintiffs in continuation of a policy with the defendants on the 8th Dec. 1899, while the Manchester Corporation was employed in Her Majesty's transport service under a contract with the Director of Transports of the 25th Nov. 1899; that on the 5th April 1900, while still employed under this contract, the vessel became inefficient for service under the contract, by reason of damage to or defect in the propeller, and was not ready and efficient to resume the service until 5.30 p.m. on the 20th April 1900, a period of fourteen days and seventeen and a half hours; and the plaintiffs claimed 491*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.*, defendants' proportion of loss of hire on fourteen days and seventeen and a half hours.

The defendants, in their points of defence, alleged that notice that the vessel was discharged from Her Majesty's service was given on the 5th April 1900; that the plaintiffs had not between the 5th and the 20th April any chartered or hire money at risk, and had between those dates no insurable interest within the terms of the policy; and that if there was any loss of chartered or hire money the proximate cause of the loss was the notice of the commissioners discharging the vessel, and not the alleged inefficiency, and that the defendants were under no liability to the plaintiffs.

Carver, K.C. (L. Noad with him) for the plaintiffs.—The defendants contend that there was no loss within the meaning of the policy. The plaintiffs' contention is that there was a loss, and that what was lost was the use of the ship for the period from the 5th April to the 20th April, when she was again fit for service. What was at risk was the loss of hire which would accrue under a clause in this form. The Government charter-party does not contain a cesser clause, or a cesser of hire at all; it contains a clause which enables the Admiralty to deprive the shipowner of hire; but it does not make the hire cease on certain events, and under the clause it would be a matter of discretion for the commissioners to make the pay cease. The first question is, What was the subject-matter insured by this policy? The policy, which was a time policy, does not refer to the charter-party, and the charter-party does not contain a cesser clause, so that the insurance effected by the policy is not a limited insurance merely against the loss of hire arising under this form of a Government charter-party, but is a general insurance against the loss of hire which would take place assuming that the vessel were working under a charter-party with the cesser of hire clause in it. Therefore the risk insured against accrues if the vessel becomes unable to work within the meaning of that clause for twenty-four hours. Our first argument, therefore, is on the assumption that this was an insurance on the actual employment of the ship and against the loss of the use of the ship, and, arguing on that assumption, there must be a loss under the policy caused by something done under the charter-party. The loss of the hire by the cancellation of the agreement is a loss within the policy; it was a loss by the action of the Admiralty in giving notice under the charter-party. Secondly, even if the plaintiffs are wrong in their first contention, and if the policy is limited to freight under the charter-party, the plaintiffs are still entitled to recover. There was a want of repair or breakdown of machinery within the meaning of the marginal clause in the policy. The plaintiffs had an interest in the "hire money" payable under the charter-party, and there was a loss of this hire money by perils of the seas insured against. There was a defect within the meaning of the marginal clause, and also within the meaning of the charter-party, which entitled the commissioners to put the ship out of pay. The loss arising therefrom was a loss from perils of the seas; and this loss arose, not from the act of the commissioners, but from the defect which brought about that act. Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff (47 L. T. Rep. 581; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 6; 7 App. Cas. 670) appears at first sight to be against the plaintiffs' contention, but when carefully looked at it is really in their favour. In that case, which also turned on the Admiralty charter-party, the Admiralty simply took under their power of mulct any freight that had been earned. No doubt Lord Selborne there says that he came to the conclusion, though with reluctance, that the loss was not so proximately resulting from the perils of the seas insured against as to make it payable under the policy; but he puts a hypothetical case which precisely applies to this case. He says: "If, in the present case, the other terms of the charter-party being the same, a power had been reserved to the charterers or their agents to determine the contract, and their liability to further freight, on the occurrence of any such damage to the ship by perils of the sea as might render her inefficient for the service which she had undertaken, and if such power had been exercised before any further freight was earned, I should have been of opinion that this was a loss of freight by perils of the sea, for which the insurers were liable." Here there were two causes operating: the first was a defect in the ship, which was the proximate cause of the loss, and that was a peril insured against, and that defect, coupled with the decision of the Admiralty, caused the loss which was a loss of the chartered or hire money. In such cases the proximate cause of the loss is considered by Cleasby, B. and Bramwell, B. in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company Limited (31 L. T. Rep. 789, at pp. 793-4; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125, at pp. 127, 148). The plaintiffs are entitled to recover on the two grounds, that there was by perils insured against a loss of the Government employment, and that, apart from Government employment, there was a loss of expectant hire which they were prevented from earning. [He also referred to Phillips on Insurance, sect. 1208.]

K.B.] MANCHESTER LINERS LIM. v. BRITISH &amp; FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE CO. LIM. [K.B.]

Scrutton, K.C. and Loehnis for the defendants.—It is said for the plaintiffs that there was a loss of the Government employment, but the answer to that is that there was not a loss by perils insured against. The insurance was not such a general insurance as the plaintiffs contend it was. It was not an insurance against the loss of expected employment, but was only against loss under a contract. The subject-matter of the policy is said to be chartered or hire money; but it is perfectly clear on the authorities that chartered or hire money means money accruing due for the use of the ship under a contract: (per Blackburn, J. in Barber v. Fleming, L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 59, at pp. 70, 71; per Lord Selborne, L.C. in Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff, 47 L. T. Rep. at p. 582; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 9; 7 App. Cas. at p. 672; per Lord Ellenborough in Forbes v. Aspinall, 13 East, 323; Patrick v. Eames, 3 Camp. 441; Re Jamieson and Newcastle Steamship Freight Insurance Association, 72 L. T. Rep. 648; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 593; (1895) 2 Q. B. 90). To come within the policy the hire money must be due under a contract, as the insurance is an insurance of hire money arising under a contract. The first thing to determine is the subject-matter of the insurance. In this case that subject-matter is "chartered or hire money valued at —"; that is, hire money to be earned under a contract in the nature of a charter-party. Then, when the subject-matter is ascertained, the next thing to be considered is, against what perils the subject-matter is insured. The perils insured against are set out in the clause attached to the policy, as the policy states that the insurance is "to cover and pay the loss of hire money as per clause attached." What was at risk immediately before the 5th April was the freight payable under the charter-party; after the 5th April there was no freight payable as the service had been determined. There was therefore no hire money at risk from the 5th to the 20th April, and therefore there was no loss of such hire money by any perils insured against. The freight or hire money was lost, not by any of the perils insured against, but by the exercise of the option to cancel in the charter-party, and the exercise of that option was the proximate cause of the loss: (Mercantile Steamship Company Limited v. Tyser, 7 Q. B. Div. 73; per Lord Watson in Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff, 47 L. T. Rep. at p. 587; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 12; 7 App. Cas. at p. 690). Therefore the defendants' answer is twofold: first, that the subject-matter of the policy was chartered or hire money arising under an existing contract (namely, the charter-party) which was determined by the option given to the hirers by that contract, and that at the time when this money sued for was alleged to have accrued there was no existing contract under which any hire money was payable, and therefore there was no hire money at risk; and, secondly, there was no loss by any perils insured against, but the loss arose merely from the exercise by the Admiralty of the option to determine the contract given to them in that contract. For these two reasons the defendants are entitled to succeed.

Carver, K.C., in reply, referred to Joyce v. Kennard (25 L. T. Rep. 932; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 194; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 78) and Crowley v. Cohen (3 B. & Ad. 478).

Curr. adv. vult.

Dec. 16.—WALTON, J.—In this case the plaintiffs are the Manchester Liners Limited, and the action is brought against the British and Foreign Insurance Company upon a marine policy of insurance. The plaintiffs were the owners of a steamer called the Manchester Corporation, which was chartered by them to the Admiralty by a charter-party made on the 14th Dec. 1899, and by that charter-party she was placed at the service of the commissioners for the space of three months certain, and "thenceforward until the commissioners shall cause notice to be given to the said second-named party"—that is the shipowners—"that she is discharged from Her Majesty's service, such notice to be given when the said ship is in port in the United Kingdom." Therefore the service was for three months certain, to be continued until notice was given that the service was at an end, and that notice might be given at any time when she was in a port in the United

K.B.] MANCHESTER LINERS LIM. v. BRITISH &amp; FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE CO. LIM. [K.B.]

Kingdom. Then the rate of payment was provided for and a clause inserted that the ship might under certain conditions be put out of pay. [His Lordship read these clauses of the charter-party.] The service therefore under that charter-party commenced as from the 25th Nov. 1899, and was upon the terms stated. On the 9th March 1900 the shipowners effected with the defendants a policy of insurance for the space of three calendar months, from the 8th March 1900 to the 7th June 1900, both days inclusive, and it was on "chartered or hire money valued at 19,500*l.* to cover and pay the loss of hire money calculated at 21*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* per day, as per clause attached. In the event of total or constructive total loss of steamer, no claim to be made for the unexpired time." [His Lordship then read the clause attached.] On the 3rd April 1900 the vessel was in a port in the United Kingdom—namely, in London. She had made a voyage to the Cape and had returned. In the course of that voyage to the Cape there had been some trouble with the blades of her propeller, and she had been repaired at Gibraltar, and again at the Cape. On the 3rd April she was back again in London and was preparing, under the instructions of the Admiralty, to proceed on another voyage, and I think there is no doubt that but for what happened she would have proceeded on another voyage, and her services under the charter-party would have been continued. She was put into dry dock, no doubt for the purpose of the voyage, and when there it was discovered that some of the blades of the propeller were cracked, and in consequence of that the Admiralty gave the shipowners notice that the ship was from that date discharged from Her Majesty's service. A further notice was given on the 7th April, but there is no doubt that from the 5th April the service was put an end to and the vessel discharged as from that date from Her Majesty's service, that is, from the service under the charter-party. As to the reason why the Admiralty exercised their right which they had under the charter-party so to put an end to the service, two letters from the Admiralty were put in and admitted as evidence. [His Lordship read these letters, and proceeded.] Therefore the position, so far as the undoubted facts are concerned, was this: The three months certain in the charter-party had expired, and the service was being continued on the terms of the charter-party, which provided that at any time when the vessel was in a port in the United Kingdom, the Admiralty could, with or without reason, put an end to the service, and they did so on the 5th April for the reason stated in their letters. The blades of the propeller were repaired, and the repairs occupied from the 5th April, when the vessel was discharged from the service, till 5.30 p.m. of the 20th April, so that from the 5th to the 20th April the vessel was undergoing repair and was not fit to be used. Under the circumstances which I have stated, the plaintiffs claim payment, under the policy, by the defendants of their proportion of 21*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* a day from the 5th April to 5.30 p.m. on the 20th April 1900. The defendants contend that the subject-matter of the insurance was hire money to be earned under a contract in the nature of a time charter; that the only hire money at risk on the 5th April was the freight payable under the charter-party of the 14th Dec.; and that there was no loss of such freight by the perils insured against. On the other hand, counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs contended that the subject-matter of the insurance was not limited to freight or hire money payable under a contract, but included or covered the interest of the shipowner in the use of his ship, entirely independent of any particular contract for the payment of freight or hire.

It seems to me clear that a shipowner has an interest in the use of his ship, and that he may insure himself against the loss which he may undoubtedly suffer from being deprived of its use by perils of the seas or other causes. But in cases of this kind it is not enough to consider what interest the shipowner had, and against what losses he might lawfully have insured himself; the true question must be whether the interest in respect of which he claims to be insured, and the loss against which he claims to be indemnified, were in fact covered by the terms of the policy which he effected, and upon which he sues. In the present case the subject-matter of the policy is "chartered or hire money," and, in my judgment, this means hire money in the nature of freight payable under a contract. I do not think that it is enough for the plaintiffs, in order to entitle them to succeed in this action, to show that they were interested in the use of their ship, and that they were deprived of such use for fourteen or fifteen days by a peril insured against. Counsel, however, contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that they had an interest, as undoubtedly they had, in the "hire money" payable under the charter-party of the 14th Dec. 1899; and that they lost this hire money from the 5th April to the 20th April by perils insured against under the policy. Reading the policy and slip together, it seems sufficiently plain that the insurance was against the loss of hire money by reason of the payment of the hire ceasing in consequence, amongst other things, of want of repairs or breakdown of machinery preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four hours or rendering her inefficient for the service, which must mean for service under the contract upon which she is at the time employed. It is said that in the present case there was a want of repair or breakdown of machinery which prevented the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four hours, and which rendered her inefficient for service under the charter-party of the 14th Dec. 1899, and that, in the language of the slip, it was on this event, and in consequence of this, that the payment of hire ceased from the 5th April until the 20th April. Is this a correct statement of the facts? It appears to me that this is the question which I have to decide in this case. The fact is that the hire ceased on the 5th April (not merely till the 20th April, but altogether), because on the 5th April the charter-party came to an end; and it came to an end on the 5th April because the Admiralty had on that day, the vessel being then in a port in the United Kingdom, an absolute right at their discretion, whether with or without reason, to discharge the vessel from the service, and they exercised this right. The motive upon which the Admiralty acted, and their reason for acting, were undoubtedly that they ascertained, when the vessel was put into dry

K.B. Div.]

THE MINNEAPOLIS.

[ADM.]

dock, that the propeller blades were cracked and would require repair, and they were afraid that they might give trouble again in the future. It is clear, however, that as between the plaintiffs and the Admiralty, the motive upon which, or reasons for which, they acted were altogether irrelevant; and, as against underwriters on the policy in question, I do not think that it was competent to the plaintiffs to search into the reasons which induced the Admiralty to act, and to say that, because their reason for putting an end to the contract, as they were entitled to do with or without reason, was the want of repair or breakdown of machinery, there was therefore a claim under the policy. If the service had continued and the Admiralty had put the vessel out of pay from the 5th April to the 20th April, the case would have been different. It is to be observed that in the event of a total or constructive total loss of the vessel, the underwriters were not to be liable for the loss of hire for the unexpired time; and still less, in my opinion, was it the intention of the parties, as expressed in this policy, that the underwriters should take the risk of the employment of the vessel ceasing by the exercise by the hirers of the absolute right given to them by the contract to put an end to the service, whatever the motive or reason influencing them in so acting may have been. I have carefully considered the authorities cited by counsel for the plaintiffs, and his very clear and, if I may say so, very useful argument.

Perhaps I ought to say a word as to the instances to which he referred of the loss of freight by damage to, or loss of, the ship by perils of the seas. He suggested that in such cases, or some of them, an argument similar to that relied upon by the defendants in the present case might be used, to the effect that the freight was lost not by the perils of the seas, but by the act of the shipowner in electing either not to repair his ship or not to forward the cargo by another vessel. If the cases are considered, they will be found, I think, to be very different from the present case. In such cases the freight may be lost because the necessary repairs will cause so much delay that it frustrates the voyage. In that case the freight-earning voyage being destroyed by perils of the seas, there is a clear loss of the freight by the same perils. Or again, the cost of repair may be so great, as compared with the value of the ship when repaired, that a reasonable uninsured shipowner would not repair the ship at all, and in that case the ship is practically lost, and the freight also, by perils of the seas; at all events, unless there is another vessel available by which the cargo can be carried to its destination. If there is another such vessel available, the shipowner may—but he is not bound as between himself and the cargo owner to—forward the cargo and earn his freight. It is said by counsel for the plaintiffs that, if under such circumstances the shipowner elects not to forward the cargo, the freight may be said to be lost by his act, and that it is notwithstanding a loss by perils of the seas and recoverable against underwriters. In the first place I desire to avoid expressing an opinion whether in such a case the loss would be a loss by perils of the seas, if the cargo could be forwarded at an expense to the shipowner less than the freight to be earned by forwarding it. But, if in such a case the loss is to be treated as a loss by sea perils, it must, I think, be on the ground that the freight insured was the freight arising from the carriage of the cargo by the ship named in the policy, that this was lost by the loss of the ship, and therefore by perils of the seas, and that the right remaining in the shipowner to save as much as possible of the money lost by forwarding the cargo in another vessel is in the nature of salvage, to the benefit of which the underwriter is entitled on payment of a total loss; and on this basis, therefore, it is plain, as in the other cases, that the freight insured is lost by perils of the seas, I think, therefore, there is no true analogy between any of these cases and the present case. But, after all, every case of this kind must depend upon the terms of the particular contract and their application to the particular facts of the case; and I have come to the conclusion that the loss in respect of which this action is brought was not a loss covered by the policy underwritten by the defendants. Therefore, there must be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, William A. Crump and Son.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, and Whetton.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Aug. 7 and 8, 1901.

(Before BARNES, J. and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE MINNEAPOLIS. (a)

Salvage—Apportionment—Special awards—Non-navigating portion of crew—Horsemen.

A large steamer carrying passengers, cargo, horses, and cattle, fell during bad weather with a dismantled barque in the Atlantic, and, after taking off her crew and cutting away the wreckage of her masts, towed her to the Azores. The owners of the barque in settlement of the salvage claim paid 8250l. to the owners of the steamer.

In an action for apportionment:

Held, that the owners were entitled to 6175l. and the master to 500l.; that as special awards and according to their rating those of the crew who had taken off the crew of the barque should receive 150l., those who had cut away the wreckage 300l., the boat's crew employed during that service 25l., and the boat's crew engaged in passing ropes 75l.; and that the remaining sum of 1025l. was to be divided rateably amongst the whole crew, the non-navigating portion, consisting of the surgeon, purser, cooks, stewards, and stewardesses, to share as if rated at one-third of their actual rating, and the horsemen and foreman, who were in the employment of the owners and liable to be called upon to perform duties, at one-third of the rating of an A.B.

The Coriolanus (62 L. T. Rep. 844; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 514; 15 P. Div. 103) distinguished.

This was an action for apportionment of salvage brought by certain members of the crew of the

(a) Reported by CHRISTOPHER HEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE MINNEAPOLIS.

[ADM.]

steamship Minneapolis. The defendants were the owners of the vessel.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Laing, K.C. and Nelson for the plaintiffs.

Aspinall, K.C. and A. Pritchard for the defendants.

The arguments of counsel were directed to the special claims of the boats' crews which took off the crew of the salvaged vessel, cut away the wreckage, passed the ropes and made connection, and to the share, if any, of the salvage reward to which the non-navigating portion of the crew and the horsemen and horse foreman were entitled. The following cases were referred to:

The Coriolanus, 62 L. T. Rep. 844; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 514; 15 P. Div. 103;

The Spree, 69 L. T. Rep. 628; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 397; (1893) P. 147.

Aug. 8.—BARNES, J.—This is a suit by some of the crew of the steamship Minneapolis against the owners of that vessel, and practically, by reason of the statement of counsel for the plaintiffs that they appeared for the master and all the crew besides those who are on the record as plaintiffs, it is a suit between all those who are interested in the salvage action, which has been settled, to obtain an apportionment of the reward. It appears that on the 21st March 1901 the Minneapolis when homeward bound from New York to London with a general cargo and passengers, and in latitude 44 degrees 49 minutes N. and longitude 35 degrees 47 minutes W., fell in with the Comet, a four-masted barque, bound in ballast from Greenock to Philadelphia to load a cargo of oil for Japan. The Minneapolis is a vessel of 13,401 tons gross register, belonging to the Atlantic Transport Line, and she had a crew of 148 persons. There were some sixty-two passengers and a number of horses and cattle. It is not necessary to go in great detail into the services that were rendered. Substantially they appear to be these: First of all a lifeboat, with an officer and crew, was sent to take off the crew of the Comet—I presume that at that time it was not certain whether the vessel could be saved or not—and they, in the course of three trips, succeeded in bringing the whole of the crew of the Comet, and the master and his wife, on board the Minneapolis. Then, later on, the Minneapolis sent a boat, with the second officer in charge and others of the crew, for the purpose of cutting away the wreckage of the masts, or some of the masts—I think the foremast and mizzenmast—of the Comet, with a view, if possible, of taking the barque in tow, if the risk of her being lost by the puncturing of the hull by the masts was done away with. Some of those men seem to have gone on board, and at very considerable risk succeeded in cutting away the wreckage. That all, I think, took place on the 22nd March. On the 23rd March, the weather having somewhat moderated, the Minneapolis was able to take the Comet in tow, and on the following day the Comet was safely brought to Ponta Delgada in the Azores. Now, the result of the litigation and settlement between the salvors and the owners of the Comet is that a sum of 40,000 dollars was agreed to be paid by the owners of the Comet to the salvors as a whole, and that, I am told, represents 8250*l.* in English money. The question before the court is, How is that sum to be apportioned between the owners, master, and crew of the Minneapolis? It is quite obvious at the outset that a very large portion must go to the owners of the Minneapolis. In the first place, this is a very large vessel, belonging to the line I have referred to, and her value, with cargo, is stated to be 300,000*l.* at least, and there is some freight amounting to 3000*l.* odd. The owners were put to expense which, in round figures, is stated to be somewhere about 2000*l.*, partly from the consumption of coal, stores, and for extra victualling, and partly the various expenses which were consequent upon the disorganisation of their service through their vessel being late in her arrival and otherwise, details of which were furnished. The real instrument of salvage was this large, powerful steamer, because it was by means of her being treated as a tug on the occasion that this vessel was rapidly taken into the Azores.

The apportionment which I propose to make is as follows: To the owners, I think, the sum of 6175*l.*, having regard to their interests and so forth, should be awarded. Next comes the consideration of the master's claim. The master had a very serious responsibility in determining to deal with such a salvage as this. He was in charge of a very large steamer, with a numerous crew and a number of passengers, and also live stock on board, and it is easy to see that his responsibility is great in determining what to do on such an occasion. I think, having regard to those considerations, that he should receive the sum of 500*l.* Now I come to deal with some matters which are of importance. They are matters which arise in this way. It is obvious from what I have said that a number of those who are the deck and engine-room and stoke-hole part of the crew did a great deal of extra work in connection with the actual salvage services, because they did not remain simply on board their own steamer, but did outside work, some of it of a substantial and important character. In the first place, there was the transfer of the crew and master and the master's wife from the Comet to the Minneapolis, which was a most desirable thing to do in order to save their lives if it had not been possible to take the Comet in tow. To do that the boat made three trips. Particulars have been furnished me of those who were on board the boat. The names are: Paul, chief officer; Pollard, second officer; Pearce, quartermaster; Morton, Griffiths, Ferguson, Mowat, and Elt, A.B.'s. Apart altogether from the part which they take in the general award to the crew, I think their services ought to be recognised by an award of 150*l.*, to be divided amongst them in proportion to their ratings. Then there comes a still more important matter. It appears that the boat, as I have said, was sent in charge of the second officer, Mr. Lazalle, with certain of the crew, to cut away the masts, and we are told that that was a risky and difficult matter to do. They had to go on board the ship which had no one on board and was rolling about, and somehow to hold on whilst two masts were cut away. Those who did this work appear to have been Mr. Lazalle; Mr. Berkeley, the second engineer; P. Kircaldy, the senior third engineer; J. McQueggan, leading fireman; H. Porter, fireman; W. Trim, carpenter. I think those men did a very useful service, because by that means the Comet was enabled to be towed, and, as I have said, there was risk in going on board to do this work. Amongst those men I consider that the sum of 300*l.* should be distributed according to their ratings. Now, I have looked through the details of the evidence, but I cannot find who were the persons who were left in the boat whilst those whom I have mentioned went on board and cut away the masts. I assume that some sailors must have assisted in rowing the boat whilst those men went on board, and, lest I should leave anybody out who assisted in that matter, I think that they should get 25*l.* in recognition of their assistance. In addition to that, there was a suggestion made of the merits of those who remained on board the Comet whilst she was in tow to St. Michaels; but I find, on looking through the list, that I have really rewarded all those persons in dealing with the crew of the boat which transferred the crew of the Comet and those who went to cut away the masts, and I do not think it necessary, therefore, to deal in any way specifically with those who remained on board the Comet. I do not suppose their danger was a very material matter to consider outside the general award to the officers and crew. But there remains Mr. Brown, the third officer who was in charge of the boat which went later on, on the 23rd, to pass ropes and make connection. That appears to have been a duty of some danger and difficulty, and I have had no particulars given me exactly as to who were the persons doing that. The names, however, can easily be ascertained. I think there should be divided amongst Mr. Brown and the seamen who did that work, according to their ratings, a sum of 75*l.* The result of these deductions is to leave the sum of 1025*l.* to be divided amongst the rest of the crew, and that crew, as I have said, numbered, without the master, 147 persons. That sum should be divided amongst the crew according to their ratings subject to these qualifications. I have considered the way in which what I may call the navigating and non-navigating members of the crew may be treated in the case of The Spree, (1893) P. 147, and it is not necessary that I should go over the judgment which I gave in that case, because it would be only repeating a number of reasons which have been there pointed out for differentiating between those who are the real workers of the ship both on the deck and down in the engine room department, and those who are merely members of the crew attending, not to working the ship at all, but to working such parts of her as are concerned with the passengers and otherwise, like the horsemen.

ADM.]

THE MINNEAPOLIS.

[ADM.]

Dealing first with the navigating members of the crew, it will be seen from what I have already said that a good number of the deck hands and officers are specially remunerated for what they did outside the ship, and as regards what was done on board the ship I see no particular reason for drawing any particular distinction between the various navigating members of the crew—that is to say, the officers, seamen, engineers, firemen, donkeymen, greasers, and trimmers, and so forth—and they, I think, should therefore take their share of the 1025*l.* according to their ratings. Then there remain a number of persons who were not in the navigating and working part of the ship as a navigating machine, such as the surgeon, cook, steward, stewardess, purser, and so forth. It was not contended before me that any of these persons whom I am now considering were to be excluded from the salvage award, and I think that is the right view to take, for the reasons which I gave in the course of my judgment in The Spree. It is quite true that some of these, if not all of them, do not in one sense perform any active service in the rendering of the salvage service, but it must not be forgotten that they are all on the articles, that they are all liable to take their stations, that they are all persons who run some risk in so far as the ship salving is at any extra risk, and that if any of those persons who went away and assisted had been lost, extra duties would necessarily be required to be performed by those who are left. So I think it would not be wise that these persons should be excluded from the salvage award altogether. I think it would be bad policy and lead to difficulties if they were not recognised. Therefore, I think the parties are right in not suggesting they should be excluded; but, at the same time, whatever their merits are, they do not bear a high proportion of the work of those who are actually engaged in performing services on the deck or in the engine room and so forth, and, having regard to the large size of this steamer, practically they were not in any serious risk. As I said before in the case of The Spree, without laying down a rule, as each case must be governed by its merits, because in some cases you might find the steward of the vessel hauling on the ropes, as happened in the case of The Noordland, referred to in the case of The Spree, I think the proper thing to do is to treat all those with whom I am dealing as if they were rated at one-third of their ratings; that is to say, they will take a share as if their rating was a third of what it really is. It is less, I agree, than what I mentioned in the case of The Spree, but there are reasons for differentiating. Then there are the horsemen and the horse foreman. Again, it is not now suggested that they should be excluded. Their case is not the same as that of the cattlemen in The Coriolanus (62 L. T. Rep. 844; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 514; 15 P. Div. 103), who were not really servants of the ship-owners. These men are really the servants of the shipowners. They are paid so much for the trip, and I was informed that these men have their stations at the boats, and are liable, therefore, to be called upon to perform duties, so far as they can, very much in the same way as stewards. I think that persons in that position ought to be just as much included in a salvage award as those who are in the cabin department. In order to recognise their position, and yet not reward them as if they had done a great deal, I think the proper thing to do, and the Elder Brethren, with whom I have had a long consultation, agree, is to treat them as rated at one-third of the rating of an A.B., and let them take a proportion on that basis. The costs will be borne by the parties in proportion to their awards.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Lowless and Co.

Solicitors for defendants, Pritchard and Sons.

ADM.]

THE MERSEY.

[ADM.]

Monday, Nov. 4, 1901.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President)

THE MERSEY. (a)

Collision—Practice—Transfer of action from County Court—Cross-action in High Court—Priority of time in commencement of action—Conduct of action.

Where an action is commenced in the County Court and a cross-action is brought in the High Court in respect of the same matter, and an order is made transferring the County Court action and consolidating the two actions, the original plaintiffs in the High Court action will have the conduct of the consolidated action, unless it appears that there was a clear priority of time in commencing the County Court action. Where proceedings are commenced practically simultaneously the High Court action will be treated as the principal cause.

THIS was a motion by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, the owners of the steamship Miles K. Burton, praying that an action for damage by collision brought against them in the Liverpool County Court by the Birkenhead Corporation, the owners of the steam ferry Mersey, might be transferred to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court, and consolidated with an action commenced by them in the High Court in respect of the same collision. They also asked that their action might be made the principal cause.

On the 27th Sept. 1901 a collision occurred in the river Mersey between the steam hopper dredger Miles K. Burton, belonging to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and the steam ferry Mersey, which is the property of the corporation of Birkenhead, in consequence of which both vessels were damaged.

It was agreed between the legal representatives of the parties that neither of them would take proceedings without giving notice to the other.

On the 20th Oct. the corporation of Birkenhead gave notice that they were commencing proceedings, and at 3.15 p.m. they instituted an action under the Admiralty jurisdiction of the County Court of Liverpool claiming 300*l.* damages.

On the same day, at 3.50 p.m., the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board issued a writ in rem in the Liverpool District Registry of the High Court claiming damages against the owners of the Mersey in respect of the collision.

Service of the summons in the County Court proceedings was accepted, and an undertaking was given to appear in the High Court action at about the same time.

It was estimated by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board that the damage their vessel had sustained by the collision amounted to about 500*l.*

There was no opposition on the part of the Birkenhead Corporation to the transfer of their action to the High Court; but each party claimed to be treated as plaintiffs and to have the conduct of the action.

Aspinall, K.C. (Bateson with him), for the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, in support of the motion.—The harbour board are plaintiffs in the High Court action, and therefore ought to be plaintiffs in the consolidated action. The plaint in the County Court and the writ in the High Court were issued practically simultaneously.

E. G. Hemmerde (F. E. Smith with him) for the Birkenhead Corporation, contra.—The party that first institutes proceedings ought to be treated as plaintiffs:

The Never Despair, 50 L. T. Rep. 369; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 211; 9 P. Div. 34.

The practice was settled by that case. Here, although, it may be, there is not much difference in time, yet the Birkenhead Corporation were clearly the first to institute proceedings. If the question of the amount claimed were to influence the court, parties would claim an amount exceeding the jurisdiction of the County Court, so as to obtain the conduct of the action.

Aspinall, K.C., in reply.—It cannot be properly urged in this case that the Birkenhead Corporation were the first to institute proceedings, as there was an arrangement between the legal representatives of the parties that neither should commence proceedings without giving notice to the other.

The PRESIDENT.—In this case two actions of damage have been commenced in respect of the same collision, one at 3.15 p.m. on the 21st Oct. in the Liverpool County Court, and the other at 3.50 p.m. on the same day in the High Court. The motion by the plaintiffs in the High Court for the transfer and consolidation of the County Court action is not opposed except on one point—namely, that the plaintiffs in the High Court ask as part of the order that their action shall be treated as the principal cause. I must decide this matter upon principle, although I do not think that my decision, in the circumstances, will in any way affect the real interests of the parties concerned. In The Never Despair (ubi sup.) Sir James Hannen took in chambers what, with all respect to Sir Robert Phillimore, I think was the wiser course. He held that the action which was already in the High Court, where the order of transfer was made, must be deemed to be the principal cause, and that the plaintiffs in that suit should, therefore, have the conduct of the consolidated actions, but he found that Sir Robert Phillimore had, in previous cases, gone on the principle of priority of time, and on the matter being adjourned into court he varied his first decision. If, therefore, there is clear priority of time, I ought to follow Sir Robert Phillimore as did Sir James Hannen. In the present case, no doubt, if I had to decide the matter absolutely, as a jury and anything depended upon it, there would be some evidence to show that the County Court plaint was issued at 3.15 p.m., and the writ in the High Court action not till 3.50 p.m.; but, for practical purposes, I cannot regard the case as one in which either party commenced proceedings before the other—that is to say, I cannot attach sufficient importance to the times of 3.15 p.m. for the plaint and 3.50 p.m. for the writ to enable me to say that there is a clear priority of time which would or should give the advantage to one party or the other. I think that the proper way to look at the matter is to treat the proceedings as if they had been taken simultaneously, which was evidently the intention of the parties,

(a) Reported by CHRISTOPHER HEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.
VOL. IX., N. S.

ADM.]

THE BRISTOL CITY.

[ADM.]

with the result that I am entitled to regard the matter as Sir James Hannen looked at it—namely, as a case in which one party is in the court already, and being so is entitled to the advantage, whatever it is, of having their action treated as the principal cause. I agree that it would not be a safe principle to act upon in every case to give the advantage to the party making the larger claim; still it is the fact that the claim of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board is larger than the claim of the Birkenhead Corporation, and I think the Dock Board should have the conduct of the consolidated actions. The costs of the motion will be costs in the cause.

Solicitors for the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, Rowcliffes, Rawle, and Co., agents for W. C. Thorne, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the Birkenhead Corporation, F. Venn and Co., agents for Alfred Gill, Birkenhead.

Nov. 20, 21, and 22, 1901.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President, and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE BRISTOL CITY. (a)

Collision in river Avon—Fault of pilot—Master holder of pilotage certificate—Wrong description of owners in certificate—Sects. 599 and 633 of Merchant Shipping Act 1894—Meaning of words "same owner."

Sect. 599 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 gives a pilotage authority power to grant a pilotage certificate to a master of a ship, allowing him to pilot the ship to which he belongs, or any one or more ships belonging to the same owner, within the district over which they have authority. It also gives them power to renew certificates from year to year.

A collision occurred in the river Avon between the steamtug P. and the steamship B. C., partly through the fault of the pilot in charge of the B. C. The master of the B. C. had been granted a certificate by the pilotage authority, which had been renewed from year to year, authorising him to pilot the steamship J. C. The B. C. was managed by the same firm, but did not, in fact, belong to the same owners as the J. C., but no alteration had been made in the certificate on the transfer of the master to the B. C., or on the renewal of the certificate.

Held, that the certificate was bad, and the B. C. was, at the time of the collision, in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law.

Semle, if the certificate had been in order, she would have been exempted from compulsory pilotage.

THIS was an action for damage by collision brought by the owners of the tug Peri against the owners of the steamship Bristol City

The collision occurred about 10 a.m. on the 26th March 1901 in the river Avon, off Lamb and Flag Point in Hung Road.

The Peri at the time was coming up the river on a voyage from Portishead to Bristol, and the Bristol City was coming down the river on a voyage from Bristol to Cardiff in ballast. She was in charge of a duly qualified pilot, but her master also held a pilotage certificate which had been granted under the provisions of sect. 599 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and which authorised him to pilot the Jersey City, or any other vessel belonging to the same owners, within the district.

In consequence of the collision the Peri was badly damaged, and had to be beached on the Gloucestershire side of the river to prevent her sinking.

The defendants, in their defence, while denying that the collision was caused by the negligence of those on board the Bristol City, pleaded that the fault, if any, was that of the pilot, who, they alleged, was solely in charge at the time of the collision.

At the trial of the action before the President (Sir F. JEUNE) he found both vessels to blame for the collision, but held that, so far as the Bristol City was concerned, it was caused solely by the negligence of the pilot who was in charge. He reserved the question whether the Bristol City was at the time compulsorily in charge of the pilot for further consideration.

It is on this question that the case is reported.

Sects. 599 and 633 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 are as follows:

Sect. 599 (1). A pilotage authority may, if they think fit, on the application of the master or mate of any ship, and on payment by him of the usual expenses, examine him as to his capacity to pilot the ship of which he is master or mate, or any one or more ships belonging to the same owner as that ship, within any part of the district of the pilotage authority. (2) A pilotage authority, if on examination they find that any master or mate is competent, shall grant him a certificate . . . specifying (a) the name of the person to whom it is granted; (b) the ship or ships in respect of which it is granted; (c) the limits within which the master or mate is entitled to pilot the ship or ships; and (d) the date on which it is granted. (3) The person to whom a pilotage certificate is granted shall, while he is acting as master or mate of any of the ships specified in the certificate, be entitled to pilot that ship within the limits specified in the certificate without incurring any penalty for not employing a qualified pilot. (4) A pilotage certificate so granted shall not be in force for more than the period of one year from its date, but may be renewed from year to year by an indorsement under the hand of the secretary or other proper officer of the pilotage authority who have granted the certificate.

Sect. 633. An owner or master of a ship shall not be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship within any district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law.

The certificate granted to the master of the Bristol City was in the following terms:

Whereas Alfred Sendall, master of the steamship Jersey City, registered at the port of Bristol, whereof Charles Hill and Sons are the owners, has applied to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Bristol, being a pilotage authority within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, to be examined as to his capacity to pilot the said ship, or any one or more ships belonging to the same owners within the district over which the said pilotage authority has jurisdiction. And whereas the said Alfred Sendall has thereupon been examined, and having been found competent, the said pilotage authority do by virtue of and in pursuance of the provisions of the said Act and of all other powers thereunto them enabling, grant the said Alfred Sendall this pilotage certificate to enable him to pilot the said ship or any other ship or ships belonging to the same owners, of

(a) Reported by CHRISTOPHER HEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADM.]

THE BRISTOL CITY.

[ADM.]

which he shall be acting as master or mate at the time, within the district over which the said pilotage authority has jurisdiction, without incurring any penalties for the non-employment of a qualified pilot.—In witness, &c.

The certificate was dated the 8th Dec. 1891, and it had been renewed from year to year, but no alteration had been made, either in the name of the vessel, on the master being transferred to the Bristol City, or in the name of the firm described as owners.

It was admitted by the plaintiffs, the owners of the Peri, that the Bristol City was at the time of the collision within waters in which pilotage was compulsory by law.

Evidence was called to prove that at the time the certificate was granted Charles Hill and Sons were not the owners of the Jersey City according to the register, but that she was owned in sixty-fourth shares, and that although certain shares were owned by individual members of the firm, there were a number of other shareholders who were not members of it.

The Bristol City was also owned in sixty-fourth shares, and was registered in the sole name of Charles Gathorne Hill, as the owner of sixty-four sixths. As a matter of fact, although he was described as sole owner, he held these shares partly for himself, and partly as trustee for members of his family.

Since Dec. 1891, the date of the certificate, there had been several changes in the firm through death, and Charles Gathorne Hill himself had since died.

Laing, K.C. and Lewis Noad for the defendants.—The master's certificate is bad. When the certificate was granted Charles Hill and Sons were not the sole owners. Even assuming the certificate was not invalid and capable of being renewed from year to year, the Bristol City is not a vessel owned by the same owners as the Jersey City; for whether the date of the certificate is taken, or that of its renewal or the date of the collision, Charles Hill and Sons were at no time the owners of the Jersey City or the Bristol City. Since 1891 Charles Gathorne Hill and other members of the firm have died so that a vessel owned by the firm in 1891 would if owned by the firm in 1901 be really owned by a different firm carrying on business under the old name:

The Earl of Auckland, Lush. 165.

Although the master may have a certificate, and assuming it was a good one, the owners of the Bristol City cannot be liable, for it has been held that the fault was solely that of the duly qualified pilot who was in charge at the time of the collision within a district in which pilotage was compulsory by law. Therefore under sect. 633 the defendants are relieved from liability. Sect. 599 does not remove the compulsion to take a pilot; it merely extends the class of qualified pilots, and owners are bound either to take a pilot or a man who has a certificate.

Aspinall, K.C. and Dawson Miller for the plaintiff, contra—There was no compulsion in this case to take a pilot. The Earl of Auckland (ubi sup.) is not an authority in point, because in that case the certificate entitled the master to pilot any ships belonging to one Carey, who was described as owner, and as a matter of fact Carey was only the broker and manager, and in no sense the owner. What one should really look to is who are the actual owners, who, in fact, not merely in name, are the owners of the vessel. As the vessels are held in sixty fourth shares the owners must be expected from time to time to change, and it would be absurd to suppose that the fact of a share changing hands during the life of the certificate should invalidate it.

The PRESIDENT.—I think there can be no doubt that if this certificate had been a good one it would have had the effect of exempting the Bristol City, so that the pilot on board would not be a pilot taken by compulsion of law, and therefore her owners would not be able to plead compulsory pilotage; but, after hearing the arguments and having the facts now before me, I have come to the conclusion that this certificate cannot be considered a good certificate for that purpose. The first objection taken was that there is a misstatement on the face of the certificate as to the ownership, at the time of the original issue of the certificate, of the Jersey City. That occurs in the preliminary statement. It is stated there that "Alfred Sendall, master of the ship Jersey City, whereof Charles Hill and Sons are the owners." Now Charles Hill and Sons were not the owners, and the question is what effect did that have on the certificate. The case of the Earl of Auckland (ubi sup.) does not appear to me to be conclusive on that matter, because, as was pointed out by counsel for the plaintiffs in that case, the misstatement occurred in the actual material body of the certificate. The certificate there was a certificate given to a man as master of a ship of which somebody was stated to be the owner, and that was a misstatement, and there was an obvious misstatement in the material part of the certificate. This case is not exactly the same case. In this case there is a misstatement merely in the preliminary statement of the ownership of the Jersey City at that time. But when the future effect of the certificate is considered I am inclined to think that a matter arises on that misstatement which may well be considered to render the certificate bad, because it is not a certificate only in favour of Sendall whilst master of the Jersey City, but it is in his favour while he commands any ship of the same owners as the Jersey City. The words are: "To enable him to pilot the said ship or any other ship or ships belonging to the same owners." As I read the certificate I can read it only in one way, and that is that it is a certificate in favour of him while he commands the Jersey City or any other ship belong to the same owners—that is to say, Messrs. Charles Hill and Sons. I do not think it is possible to read the certificate without understanding that "same owners" means the owners mentioned above, and nobody else. Therefore it is a certificate enabling him to pilot the Jersey City, owned by Messrs. Charles Hill and Sons, and any other vessel owned by Charles Hill and Sons; and if Charles Hill and Sons were not the owners of the Jersey City, then it follows that, supposing Mr. Sendall was transferred to another vessel, if that other vessel was not owned by Messrs. Charles Hill and Sons, then it could not be in accordance with the terms of the certificate; but, on the other hand, if it was owned by them, then it would be in violation of the Act of Parliament, because it would not be owned by the same persons as owned the Jersey City. Therefore I think it is impossible to sustain the certificate.

ADM.]

THE ACANTHUS.

[ADM.]

